Tukaram Gatha

तुकाराम गाथा

Original Marathi with English translation, a plain-language reading, and an explanation of what each abhanga means

Volume 1: Gatha 1-500 - 497 abhangas

About This Edition

> This reading edition brings together four layers for every abhanga: the original Marathi, an English translation, a rendering in plain words, and a short explanation of its meaning.
> The English layers are devotional reading aids. No translation can fully carry Tukaram's Marathi music, wordplay, cultural setting, or spiritual force. Readers are encouraged to return to the original and to consult Marathi teachers and established scholarly editions.

Marathi source: Tukaram Gatha on Marathi Wikisource. The source dataset identifies the Marathi text as public domain. English reading layers are from the Ananta Satsang online edition.

Editorial note: We ask forgiveness for any inaccuracies in rendering Tukaram Maharaj's original Marathi.

GATHA 0001 Devotion to Vitthal

Adoration, refusal of heavens

मराठी मूळ

समचरणदृष्टि विटेवरी साजिरी । तेथें माझी हरी वृत्ति राहो ॥१॥
आणीक न लगे मायिक पदार्थ । तेथें माझें आर्त्त नको देवा ॥ध्रु.॥
ब्रम्हादिक पदें दुःखाची शिराणी । तेथें दुश्चित झणी जडों देसी ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे त्याचें कळलें आम्हां वर्म । जे जे कर्मधर्म नाशवंत ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Beautiful is the sight of those even feet poised upon the brick. Let my awareness, O Hari, rest right there. I have no use for the illusory things of this world; do not let that anguish rise in me, O God. The stations of Brahma and the gods are but pillows of sorrow; never let my disturbed mind cling there. Tuka says: we have learned the crux of it. All karmic duties, all dharmic observances, every bit of it turns to dust.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let my mind rest on his feet, there on the brick, and stay. I want nothing else. The things of this world are not real; let me not ache for them. And I do not want the heavens either. Even the seat of Brahma, even the place of the gods, is only a soft place to lie down in sorrow. You can rise there, and you can fall from there. His feet do not pass away. Every duty, every rite, wears out in the end. I have learned the heart of it. Only this remains.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praying for one thing and naming its price. He fixes his attention on Vitthal's feet, set level on the brick at Pandhari, and asks that it never move from there. Then he refuses everything else, downward and upward alike: not only worldly things, but the highest heavens a soul can earn. He calls them pillows of sorrow, because whatever you can rise to you can also fall from, so even heaven is only a comfortable place to keep on suffering. The feet on the brick are the one thing that never passes. He says he has understood this to the root: every duty and every ritual wears out in the end, and only that resting place remains.

Adoration

मराठी मूळ

सुंदर तें ध्यान उभे विटेवरी । कर कटावरी ठेवूनियां ॥१॥
तुळसीचे हार गळां कासे पीतांबर । आवडे निरंतर तें चि रूप ॥ध्रु.॥
मकरकुंडलें तळपती श्रवणीं । कंठीं कौस्तुभमणि विराजित ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे माझें हें चि सर्व सुख । पाहीन श्रीमुख आवडीनें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Beautiful, that meditative vision: he stands upon the brick, hands placed on his hips. Garlands of tulsi around his neck, yellow silk at his waist; that form alone pleases me ceaselessly. Makara earrings flash at his ears, the Kaustubha gem shines at his throat. Tuka says, this is my entire happiness: to gaze with love upon that blessed face.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How beautiful he is to hold in the mind. He stands on the brick, his hands upon his hips. Tulsi garlands at his neck, yellow silk at his waist. I never tire of that form. The fish-shaped earrings catch the light. The Kaustubha gem shines at his throat. Tuka says: this is my whole happiness, to gaze on that dear face with love.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the most loved of all Tukaram's abhangas, a still portrait of Vitthal as he stands in the temple at Pandhari. Tukaram is not describing a god in the abstract. He is looking at the actual image, feature by feature: the easy posture, hands on hips, as though the Lord has been waiting; the garlands, the silk, the earrings, the jewel. The point is in the last line. He asks the form for nothing. Simply to look at that face, with love, is already his entire happiness. The seeing is the reward.

GATHA 0003 Devotion to Vitthal

Adoration, one request

मराठी मूळ

सदा माझे डोळे जडो तुझे मूर्ती । रखुमाईच्या पती सोयरिया ॥१॥
गोड तुझें रूप गोड तुझें नाम । देईं मज प्रेम सर्व काळ ॥ध्रु.॥
विठो माउलिये हा चि वर देईं । संचरोनि राहीं हृदयामाजी ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे कांहीं न मागे आणीक । तुझे पायीं सुख सर्व आहे ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let my eyes cling forever to Your form, O husband of Rakhumai, my dear one. Sweet is Your form, sweet is Your name; grant me love at all times. O Vitthal, my mother, give me only this boon: pervade and abide within my heart. Says Tuka, I ask for nothing more; all happiness lives at Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let my eyes never leave your form, husband of Rakhumai, my own. Sweet is your form, sweet is your name. Give me love for you, always. Vitthal, my mother, grant me only this: come and live inside my heart. Tuka says: I ask for nothing else. All happiness is there at your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

A short prayer with a single request inside it, asked three ways: that his eyes stay fixed on Vitthal, that his love be kept steady, and that the Lord live inside his own heart. Notice that he calls Vitthal both husband, of Rakhumai, and mother in the same breath; the bond is closer than any one human relationship can hold. And he is careful to want nothing beyond this. Not power, not release, only the presence and the love. That refusal of any further ask is the whole shape of his devotion.

GATHA 0004 Devotion to Vitthal

Adoration, the bridal voice

मराठी मूळ

राजस सुकुमार मदनाचा पुतळा । रविशशिकळा लोपलिया ॥१॥
कस्तुरीमळवट चंदनाची उटी । रुळे माळ कंठीं वैजयंती ॥ध्रु.॥
मुगुट कुंडले श्रीमुख शोभलें । सुखाचें ओतलें सकळ ही ॥२॥
कासे सोनसळा पांघरे पाटोळा । घननीळ सांवळा बाइयानो ॥३॥
सकळ ही तुम्ही व्हा गे एकीसवा । तुका म्हणे जीवा धीर नाहीं ॥४॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He is radiant, tender-limbed, an idol of Love itself, eclipsing the splendor of sun and moon. A musk-mark on the brow, sandalwood paste upon the body, the Vaijayanti garland swaying at his throat. Crown and earrings adorn that luminous face; he is joy poured into form. A golden silk at the waist, a Paithani draped on the shoulders, and his complexion dark as a rain-filled cloud, O women. Come together now, all of you, says Tuka, for my heart has no steadiness left.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He is radiant and tender, beauty itself, putting the sun and the moon to shame. A musk mark on his brow, sandal paste on his body, the long Vaijayanti garland swaying at his neck. Crown and earrings, that shining face, joy poured into a shape. Golden silk at the waist, fine cloth across his shoulders, his skin dark as a rain cloud. Friends, come, all of you, together. Tuka says: my heart cannot hold still any longer.

WHAT IT MEANS

Here Tukaram speaks in the voice of a young woman calling her friends to come and look at the dark Lord. This is the bridal mood of bhakti, where the soul's love for God is sung as a girl's helpless love at the sight of her beloved. He piles up the beautiful details, not as a catalogue, but as someone who cannot look away and cannot keep the feeling to herself. The last line is the real subject: the heart has lost its composure. Devotion here is not calm. It is the loss of all steadiness before beauty.

Longing, the ache of separation

मराठी मूळ

कर कटावरी तुळसीच्या माळा । ऐसें रूप डोळां दावीं हरी ॥१॥
ठेविले चरण दोन्ही विटेवरी । ऐसें रूप हरी दावीं डोळां ॥ध्रु.॥
कटीं पीतांबर कास मिरवली । दाखवीं वहिली ऐसी मूर्ती ॥२॥
गरुडपारावरी उभा राहिलासी । आठवें मानसीं तें चि रूप ॥३॥
झुरोनी पांजरा होऊं पाहें आतां । येईं पंढरीनाथा भेटावया ॥४॥
तुका म्हणे माझी पुरवावी आस । विनंती उदास करूं नये ॥५॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hands resting on the waist, garlands of tulsi in hand: show me that form, O Hari. Both feet placed upon the brick: show that form to my eyes, O Hari. A yellow silk at the waist, its sash displayed in splendor: show me that image, and quickly. You stand at the Garuda pillar, and that very form dwells in my mind. I waste away, I become a cage of ribs from pining; come now, O Lord of Pandhari, come to meet me. Says Tuka, fulfill my longing; do not let this plea go desolate.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hands on your hips, tulsi garlands in hand: show me that form, Hari. Both feet set on the brick: show me that form. Yellow silk at the waist, the sash bright: show me that shape, and quickly. You stand by the Garuda pillar, and that form lives in my mind. I am wasting away. I am becoming a cage of ribs from missing you. Come, Lord of Pandhari, come and meet me. Tuka says: give me what I long for. Do not let this prayer go unanswered.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is viraha, the ache of separation. Tukaram keeps asking to be shown the same form, over and over, the way someone in love keeps returning to the one thing they want. He already carries the image in his mind, and yet that is not enough; he wants the living presence. The middle of the poem turns physical: he is thinning to a cage of ribs with the wanting. This is not a calm meditation but a cry, and it ends as a plea: do not leave this asking empty.

GATHA 0006 Devotion to Vitthal

Adoration, the friend

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे नव्हे आणिकांसारिखा । तो चि माझा सखा पांडुरंग ॥५॥
विराण्या - अभंग २५

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Garuda as his mount, yellow silk at his waist, when shall I see that dark and lovely one? Most beautiful of all that is beautiful, dark as a monsoon cloud, the Vaijayanti garland shines upon his neck. A crown upon his head with the radiance of ten million suns, the flawless Kaustubha jewel shines at his throat. His blessed face, molded entirely from bliss; at his left side, tender Rakhumadevi. Uddhava and Akrura stand on either side; the Sanakas sing his heroic ballads. Tuka says, he is like no other; he alone is my friend, Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Garuda for his mount, yellow silk at his waist: when will I see that dark and lovely one? Most beautiful of the beautiful, dark as a heavy cloud, the Vaijayanti garland bright on his neck. A crown on his head with the light of ten million suns, the clear Kaustubha jewel at his throat. That blessed face, shaped wholly out of bliss, and tender Rakhumadevi at his left side. Uddhava and Akrura stand on either side; the sages sing his great deeds. Tuka says: he is like no one else. He alone is my friend, Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

Again a vision of Vitthal in full glory, but framed by a single question: when will I see him? Tukaram builds the whole court around the Lord, his mount, his jewels, his queen, his companions, the sages singing him, and then sets himself apart from all of it as the one still waiting for the sight. The last line is the point of the whole catalogue. Out of all that majesty, this dark Lord is not a distant king to him but a friend. The grandeur is real, and the relationship is still intimate.

Bridal defiance

मराठी मूळ

वाळो जन मज म्हणोत शिंदळी । परि हा वनमाळी न विसंबें ॥१॥
सांडूनि लौकिक जालियें उदास । नाहीं भय आस जीवित्वाची ॥२॥
नाइकें वचन बोलतां या लोकां । म्हणे जालों तुका हरिरता ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let people excommunicate me, call me fallen. I will not release my grip on Vanamali. Casting off worldly regard, I have become a renunciant. Neither fear nor hope for life remains. I do not hear the words these people speak. Tuka says: I am dyed in Hari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let people cast me out. Let them call me a loose woman. I will not let go of Vanamali. I have dropped my good name and stopped caring. I no longer fear for my life, and I no longer hope for it. I do not even hear what these people are saying. Tuka says: I have been dyed through with Hari.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sings as a woman whose love for God has broken every rule of respectability, and who no longer cares. To the world she looks shameless; to herself she is simply unable to release her beloved, Vanamali, the garlanded Lord. The poem is about what happens when love for God outgrows the fear of being judged: the names people throw stop landing, because she can no longer even hear them. The closing image is dyed cloth. The color has soaked all the way through, and there is no washing it out.

GATHA 0008 Devotion to Vitthal

Bridal mysticism

मराठी मूळ

आधिल्या भ्रतारें काम नव्हे पुरा । म्हणोनि व्यभिचारा टेकलियें ॥१॥
रात्रंदिस मज पाहिजे जवळी । क्षण त्यानिराळी न गमे घडी ॥२॥
नाम गोष्टी माझी सोय सांडा आतां । रातलें अनंता तुका म्हणे ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My first husband never fulfilled my desire, so I have taken to adultery. Day and night I need him near me; not one moment apart from him can I bear. Abandon my name, my stories, all concern for me now. Tuka says: I am dyed through in Ananta.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My first husband never satisfied my heart, so I have turned to another. Day and night I need this one beside me. I cannot bear even a moment away from him. Forget my name. Forget my story. Stop worrying over me. Tuka says: I am dyed through with Ananta, the endless one.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is one of Tukaram's boldest images. The soul's old attachments, the whole settled life of the world, are the first husband who never satisfied the heart. God is the new love she has run to. By calling it adultery he names exactly how it looks from outside: a scandal, a betrayal of duty. But the poem is told from inside the love, where the only unbearable thing is a moment apart. He tells the world to drop his name and his story, because the person they knew is gone, soaked through with the endless one.

GATHA 0009 Devotion to Vitthal

Union, arrival

मराठी मूळ

हाचि नेम आतां न फिरें माघारी । बैसलें शेजारीं गोविंदाचे ॥१॥
घररिघी जालें पट्टराणी बळें । वरिलें सांवळें परब्रम्ह ॥२॥
बळियाचा अंगसंग जाला आतां । नाहीं भय चिंता तुका म्हणे ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This is my vow now: I will not turn back. I have sat down right beside Govinda. I barged into his house and became chief queen by sheer force. I have wed the dark-skinned Parabrahman. The strong one holds me in bodily embrace now. No fear, no worry remains, says Tuka.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is my vow now: I will not turn back. I have come and sat down beside Govinda. I walked straight into his house and made myself his chief queen by force. I have married the dark one, the Absolute himself. Now the mighty one holds me close. No fear is left, no worry, says Tuka.

WHAT IT MEANS

If the earlier poems were longing, this one is arrival. The soul has stopped pleading and simply taken her place beside God, even forcing her way in. Tukaram calls the dark Lord Parabrahman, the Absolute, and in the same breath marries him and is held by him: the highest reality of the philosophers is also the husband in the embrace. The vow not to turn back, and the fearlessness at the end, mark the difference between wanting God and being at rest in God. The striving is over.

GATHA 0010 Devotion to Vitthal

Bridal mysticism, gone mad for God

मराठी मूळ

नाहीं काम माझें काज तुम्हांसवें । होतें गुप्त ठावें केलें आतां ॥१॥
व्यभिचार माझा पडिला ठाउका । न सर ती लोकांमाजी जालें ॥२॥
न धरावा लोभ कांहीं मजविशीं । जालें देवपिशी तुका म्हणे ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have no desire, no business left with you. What was hidden has now been made known. My adultery stands exposed. I have become worthless among people. Do not hold any greed toward me, says Tuka. I have gone mad for God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have nothing left to do with you. What was hidden is out in the open now. Everyone knows what I have done. Among people I am worth nothing anymore. So do not set your hopes on me. Tuka says: I have gone mad for God.

WHAT IT MEANS

The secret love has become public, and Tukaram does not flinch. He addresses the world, the old life, and tells it plainly that the bond is finished and that he has no standing left to lose. Where the world sees ruin, a woman who has thrown her reputation away, he sees freedom: there is nothing left for anyone to bargain over. The last line names it without apology. What looks like madness from outside is, from inside, the whole point. He has been taken over by God.

GATHA 0011 Devotion to Vitthal

Abandon

मराठी मूळ

विसरले कुळ आपुला आचार । पती भावे दीर घर सोय ॥१॥
सांडिला लौकिक लाज भय चिंता । रातलें अनंता चित्त माझें ॥२॥
मज आतां कोणी आळवाल झणी । तुका म्हणे कानीं बहिरी जालें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have forgotten my clan, my prescribed conduct. Husband, brother-in-law, household duties: all forgotten. I have cast off social standing, shame, fear, and worry. My mind is dyed through with Ananta. Let no one try to call me back now. Tuka says: I have gone deaf.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have forgotten my family and the rules I was raised to keep. Husband, his brothers, the running of the house: all gone from my mind. I have thrown off my standing, my shame, my fear, my worry. My mind is dyed through with Ananta, the endless one. Let no one try to call me back now. Tuka says: I have gone deaf to all of it.

WHAT IT MEANS

A list of everything the soul has let fall: clan, custom, the whole web of household roles, and then the inner holds too, shame and fear and worry. This is not carelessness. It is what happens when one love grows large enough to crowd out every other claim. The closing image answers the obvious objection. Surely someone will call her back to her duties? She cannot be called back, because she has gone deaf. The voice of the old life simply no longer reaches her.

GATHA 0012 Devotion to Vitthal

Absorption

मराठी मूळ

न देखें न बोलें नाइकें आणीक । बैसला हा एक हरि चित्तीं ॥१॥
सासुरें माहेर मज नाहीं कोणी । एक केलें दोन्ही मिळोनियां ॥२॥
आळ आला होता आम्ही भांडखोरी । तुका म्हणे खरी केली मात ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I see nothing else, speak nothing else, hear nothing else. Hari alone is seated in my awareness. In-laws' home or mother's home, I belong to no one. I have merged both and made them one. They accused me of being quarrelsome. Tuka says: I made that charge true.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I see nothing else. I say nothing else. I hear nothing else. Hari alone is seated in my mind. I have no home now, not my in-laws' and not my mother's. I have folded the two into one. People charged me with being a troublemaker. Tuka says: I have made their charge come true.

WHAT IT MEANS

The senses have narrowed to a single object. Seeing, speaking, hearing, all of them rest on Hari and nothing besides. Tukaram uses a married woman's two homes, her in-laws' and her mother's, the two places a life is supposed to belong to, and says he belongs to neither, having merged them into one in God. The last couplet has a flash of humor. People called him a quarreler with the world's expectations. Rather than deny it, he agrees: yes, and I have made it completely true. The break with the world is total now, and he owns it.

GATHA 0013 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the strength of the surrendered

मराठी मूळ

दुजा ऐंसा कोण बळी आहे आतां । हरि या अनंता पासूनिया ॥१॥
बळियाच्या आम्ही जालों बळिवंता । करूं सर्व सत्ता सर्वांवरी ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे आम्ही जिवाच्या उदारा । जालों प्रीतिकरा गोविंदासी ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who else is so mighty, apart from Hari, from Ananta? We who belong to the mighty one have ourselves become mighty. We hold dominion over all. Tuka says: we are lavish with our very lives. We have become lovers of Govinda.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who is mighty now, except Hari, except the endless one? We belong to the mighty one, and so we have become mighty ourselves. We hold sway over everything. Tuka says: we give our very lives without counting the cost. We have become lovers of Govinda.

WHAT IT MEANS

A turn from longing to strength. Having given himself to God, Tukaram finds he has taken on God's own power: the one who belongs to the mighty becomes mighty too. This is not pride. It is the confidence of someone who has nothing of his own left to protect, and so can be reckless with his life. Here the strength and the love are one thing. To be a lover of Govinda is to share in his sway over all things.

GATHA 0014 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the end of coming and going

मराठी मूळ

क्षणभरी आम्ही सोसिलें वाईट । साधिलें अवीट निजसुख ॥१॥
सांडी मांडी मागें केल्या भरोवरी । अधिक चि परी दुःखाचिया ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे येणें जाणें नाहीं आतां । राहिलों अनंताचिये पायीं ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For a brief moment we endured what was difficult, and gained the Self's own unfading joy. All that giving up and starting over, again and again, only multiplied the sorrows. Tuka says: no more coming, no more going. I remain at Ananta's feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We bore something hard for a moment, and won a joy that never goes stale, the joy that is our own true nature. All that letting go and beginning again, over and over, only added to the sorrow. Tuka says: now there is no more coming and going. I have come to rest at the feet of the endless one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram weighs two paths against each other. One is the endless round of renouncing a thing, then grasping a new thing, then renouncing again, which only multiplies grief. The other is a brief, sharp difficulty that buys a joy which does not fade, the happiness that is the Self's own nature. Coming and going is his name for rebirth, the soul moving from body to body. To rest at God's feet is to step out of that traffic for good.

GATHA 0015 Ecstasy and Joy

Union, no second

मराठी मूळ

आम्हां आम्ही आतां वडील धाकुटीं । नाहीं पाठीं पोटीं कोणी दुजें ॥१॥
फावला एकांत एकविध भाव । हरि आम्हांसवें सर्व भोगी ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे अंगसंग एके ठायीं । असों जेथें नाहीं दुजें कोणी ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We are now elder and younger to each other. There is no one behind us, no one before us, no second anywhere. Solitude has ripened. One unwavering feeling. Hari savors all things alongside us. Tuka says: bodily togetherness, in one place, where no second exists.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now we are everything to each other, the older and the younger both. There is no one behind us and no one ahead, no second anywhere. The solitude has ripened, and the feeling is single and steady. Hari shares in everything with us. Tuka says: we are together, body close to body, in one place where no second exists.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the language of union pushed almost to nonduality. God is no longer only the beloved but every relation at once, elder and younger, the whole family folded into one. The repeated no second is the key: where there were two, lover and beloved, there is now no gap left to cross. Tukaram keeps the warmth of the bridal image, body close to body, but what it points to is a oneness in which separateness has simply dropped away.

GATHA 0016 Ecstasy and Joy

Bridal mysticism, the barren union

मराठी मूळ

सर्व सुख आम्ही भोगूं सर्व काळ । तोडियेलें जाळ मोहपाश ॥१॥
याचसाठी सांडियेले भरतार । रातलों या परपुरुषाशीं ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे आतां गर्भ नये धरूं । औषध जें करूं फळ नव्हे ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We savor every joy for all time. The snare of delusion is cut away. For this alone we abandoned our husband. We are dyed through with the Other Man. Tuka says: now no conception need be carried. The medicine we have compounded bears no fruit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We taste every joy, and for all time. The net of delusion is cut. This is why we left the husband and gave ourselves wholly to the Other Man. Tuka says: now no child need ever be conceived. The medicine we have taken bears no further fruit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram returns to the daring image of the soul who leaves her lawful husband, the old worldly life, for the Other Man who is God. The closing couplet is a startling figure: this union produces no child, bears no fruit. He means it as freedom. The fruit of ordinary action is more birth, more becoming; this love is barren in the best sense, it sets no new round of consequences turning. The net of delusion is cut, and nothing further is conceived.

GATHA 0017 Ecstasy and Joy

Union, time and death finished

मराठी मूळ

एका जिवें आतां जिणें जालें दोहीं । वेगळीक कांहीं नव्हे आतां ॥१॥
नारायणा आम्हां नाहीं वेगळीक । पुरविली हे भाक सांभाळिली ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे जालें सायासाचें फळ । सरली ते वेळ काळ दोन्ही ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

With one soul, living now sustains two. No separation remains. O Narayana, between us there is no distance. This promise You have kept, You have honored it. Tuka says: the fruit of striving has come. Both time and death are finished.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One soul now, and that one life carries us both. No separation is left. Narayana, there is no distance between us; you made that promise, and you have kept it. Tuka says: the reward of all the striving has come. Time and death, both of them, are over.

WHAT IT MEANS

The two have become one soul, so fully that a single life now holds both. Tukaram reminds God of a promise made and kept: no distance between them. Then he names the result in the largest terms he has. The long effort of the spiritual life has borne its fruit, and both time and death are finished, because what is now joined to the deathless can no longer be touched by either.

GATHA 0018 Ecstasy and Joy

Intimacy after union

मराठी मूळ

हासों रुसों आतां वाढवूं आवडी । अंतरींची गोडी अवीट ते ॥१॥
सेवासुखें करूं विनोदवचन । आम्ही नारायण एकाएकीं ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे आम्ही जालों उदासीन । आपुल्या आधीन केला पति ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now we laugh and sulk and deepen our delight; the sweetness within is inexhaustible. In the joy of service we exchange playful words, just Narayana and ourselves, alone together. Tuka says: we have become dispassionate. We have brought our husband under our control.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now we laugh, we sulk, we let the delight grow; the sweetness inside never runs dry. In the joy of serving him we trade playful words, just Narayana and me, alone together. Tuka says: we have grown free of craving, and we have brought our husband under our own sway.

WHAT IT MEANS

After union comes intimacy, the easy play of two who are sure of each other: laughing, sulking, teasing. Tukaram makes a fine point at the end. He calls himself free of craving and in the same breath says he has brought God, the husband, under his control. There is no contradiction. It is precisely the lover who wants nothing for herself who holds the beloved completely. Detachment here is not coldness; it is what makes the closeness safe and total.

Exhortation, a warning to the half-hearted

मराठी मूळ

मजसवें आतां येऊं नका कोणी । सासुरवासिनी बाइयानो ॥१॥
न साहवे तुम्हां या जनाची कूट । बोलती वाईट ओखटें तें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे जालों उदास मोकळ्या । विचरों गोवळ्यासवें आम्ही ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not come with me now, any of you, O women bound to your in-laws' houses. You cannot endure the cunning cruelty of these people; they speak bitter, painful words. Tuka says: I have become detached and liberated. I wander with the Cowherd.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not come with me now, none of you, you women still tied to your in-laws' houses. You could not bear the sly cruelty of these people, the bitter and ugly things they say. Tuka says: I have become free and unbound. I wander now with the Cowherd.

WHAT IT MEANS

Here the voice turns to warn, not to invite. Tukaram, still in the woman's persona, tells the other women not to follow his path lightly. The road he has taken means enduring the world's mockery and spite, and only someone already loosed from worldly ties can bear it. This is the honest underside of his ecstasy: the love that frees you also exposes you. He does not pretend the cost is small. He says only that he is now free enough to pay it, and walks off with the Cowherd.

GATHA 0020 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, past the reach of advice

मराठी मूळ

शिकविलें तुम्हीं तें राहे तोंवरी । मज आणि हरी वियोग तों ॥१॥
प्रसंगीं या नाहीं देहाची भावना । तेथें या वचना कोण मानी ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे चित्तीं बैसला अनंत । दिसों नेदी नित्य अनित्य तें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What you taught held only so long as there was separation between me and Hari. In that moment, there is no awareness of the body. Who then would heed such words? Tuka says: Ananta is seated in my awareness. He does not let the impermanent appear as permanent.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The advice you gave me worked only while there was still a gap between me and Hari. Once that gap closes, the body is not even felt; who would listen to such counsel then? Tuka says: the endless one is seated in my awareness. He no longer lets me mistake what passes for what lasts.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers the well-meaning people who keep urging him to be sensible. Their advice was useful, he allows, but only at a stage he has now passed: the stage of separation, when one is still managing a self and a body. Once God is fully present, the body drops out of awareness and the old counsel has nothing left to grip. The last line names the real change: with God seated in his mind, he can no longer be fooled into treating the passing world as though it were permanent.

Exhortation, against imitation

मराठी मूळ

सांगतों तें तुम्हीं अइकावें कानीं । आमुचे नाचणीं नाचूं नका ॥१॥
जोंवरी या तुम्हां मागिलांची आस । तोंवरी उदास होऊं नका ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे काय वांयांविण धिंद । पति ना गोविंद दोन्ही नाहीं ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Listen to what I say, hear it well. Do not dance as we dance. So long as you hold desire for former things, do not pretend to be detached. Tuka says: why this pointless commotion? Neither husband nor Govinda. Both, gone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hear me well: do not try to dance the way we dance. As long as you still want your old life, do not put on the show of being detached. Tuka says: what is the use of all this empty noise? You end with neither: not the husband, and not Govinda. Both are lost to you.

WHAT IT MEANS

A sharp warning against imitation. It is easy to copy the outward signs of the renunciant, the ecstatic dance, the talk of detachment, while the heart still clings to the old life. Tukaram says that half-measure is the worst of both worlds. The one who only pretends loses the husband, the ordinary life given up for show, and never truly gains Govinda either, because the wanting was never real. You must actually let go, or you fall between the two and hold nothing.

GATHA 0022 Autobiography

Autobiography, the irresistible pull

मराठी मूळ

आजिवरी तुम्हां आम्हां नेणपण । कौतुकें खेळणें संग होता ॥१॥
आतां अनावर जालें अगुणाची । करूं नये तें चि करीं सुखें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे आतां बुडविलीं दोन्ही । कुळें एक मनीं नारायण ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Until today, between you and me, there was innocence. In wonder we played, while togetherness lasted. Now the pull of the Attributeless has become irresistible. What ought not be done, that very thing I do with joy. Tuka says: both lineages are drowned now. In single-pointed mind, only Narayana.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Until now there was an innocence between us; we played together in wonder while the closeness lasted. But now the pull of the Formless one has grown too strong to resist. The very thing I should not do, I now do gladly. Tuka says: both family lines are drowned now. In a single-pointed mind, there is only Narayana.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram marks a threshold. There was a sweet early stage, playful and innocent, but the pull of God, here the formless absolute, has grown past all restraint. He admits plainly that he now does, and gladly, what convention forbids. Both lineages drowned means he has let sink the honor of both families a person carries, his own and his spouse's. What is left is a mind fixed on one thing only. The scandal he names is the price of that single-mindedness.

GATHA 0023 Autobiography

Autobiography, the dreaded disgrace arrives

मराठी मूळ

सासुरियां वीट आला भरतारा । इकडे माहेरा स्वभावें चि ॥१॥
सांडवर कोणी न धरिती हातीं । प्रारब्धाची गति भोगूं आतां ॥२॥
न व्हावी ते जाली आमुची भंडाई । तुका म्हणे काई लाजों आतां ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My husband's house grew disgusted with me, and my mother's home naturally the same. No mediator will take this matter in hand. Let me now endure the course of prarabdha. The disgrace I dreaded has come upon me. Tuka says: what is there to be ashamed of now?

IN PLAIN WORDS

My husband's house is sick of me, and my mother's home, just as naturally, the same. No go-between will take up my case. So let me bear out the course of my destiny. The disgrace I had dreaded has come upon me. Tuka says: and now, what is there left to be ashamed of?

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the lowest, most human point of the sequence: rejection by both homes, with no one willing to mediate. Tukaram, in the woman's voice, stops resisting and accepts the working out of prarabdha, the destiny already set in motion by past action. The turn comes in the last line. The very thing she feared most, public disgrace, has now actually arrived, and with it a strange relief: once the worst has happened, shame loses its grip. There is nothing left to protect.

GATHA 0024 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, dying before death

मराठी मूळ

मरणाही आधीं राहिलों मरोनी । मग केलें मनीं होतें तैसें ॥१॥
आतां तुम्ही पाहा आमुचें नवल । नका वेचूं बोल वांयांविण ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे तुम्ही भयाभीत नारी । कैसे संग सरी तुम्हां आम्हां ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I died before death itself. Then I did as was in the mind. Now you see this marvel of ours. Do not spend words for nothing. Tuka says: you are fear-stricken women. How can there be equal company between you and us?

IN PLAIN WORDS

I died before death came for me. After that, I did whatever was in my heart. Now look at this wonder of ours, and do not waste your words on it. Tuka says: you are women still ruled by fear. How can there be equal company between you and us?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names the secret behind everything in this sequence: he died before dying. The self that fears disgrace and clings to its homes was let go while the body still lived. Once that death is done, nothing remains to lose, and he simply acts from the heart. So he tells the cautious women not to waste breath judging him; they are still governed by fear, and he is not. Between the fearful and the free there can be company, but not equality. They are no longer standing on the same ground.

GATHA 0025 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the moth and the flame

मराठी मूळ

परपुरुषाचें सुख भोगे तरी । उतरोनि करीं घ्यावें सीस ॥१॥
संवसारा आगी आपुलेनि हातें । लावूनि मागुतें पाहूं नये ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे व्हावें तयापरी धीट । पतंग हा नीट दीपासोई ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If you would taste the joy of the Other Man, cut off your head and take it in your hands. Set fire to worldly existence with your own hands, and once lit, never look back. Tuka says: be that fearless, as the moth goes straight to the lamp.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If you want the joy of the Other Man, then cut off your head and carry it in your own hands. Set fire to your worldly life with your own hand, and once it is lit, never look back. Tuka says: be that fearless. Be like the moth that flies straight into the lamp.

WHAT IT MEANS

A hard saying about the cost of loving God. The Other Man is God, the one the soul runs to; the joy of that love is real, but Tukaram refuses to make it cheap. To have it you must offer your own head, the proud separate self, and burn the old life down by your own choice, with no looking back. The moth flying into the flame is his image for the only attitude that works: not careful, not hedged, but willing to be consumed. Half-courage will not reach it.

GATHA 0026 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the knots are your own

मराठी मूळ

अइकाल परी ऐसें नव्हे बाई । न संडा या सोई भ्रताराची ॥१॥
नव्हे आराणुक लौकिकापासून । आपुल्या आपण गोविलें तें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे मन कराल कठीण । त्या या निवडोन मजपाशीं ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Listen, but it is not so easy, dear one. Do not abandon the care of your husband. This is no mere withdrawal from social reputation. You have entangled yourself, by yourself. Tuka says: if you will make your mind firm, then come to me, having disentangled yourself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Listen, but it is not as easy as that, dear one. Do not just walk out on your husband and your duties. This is not only a matter of giving up your good name; you tied these knots yourself, with your own hands. Tuka says: if you can truly make your mind firm, then untangle yourself first, and come to me.

WHAT IT MEANS

A correction to anyone who heard the earlier poems as simple permission to abandon their responsibilities. Tukaram, still in the woman's frame, says the path is harder than it looks. The bonds of an ordinary life were not tied by others; you made them yourself, and you must actually loosen them, not merely shrug off your reputation. The invitation stands, but with a condition: come only when the mind is genuinely firm and the knots are genuinely undone. Otherwise the gesture is empty.

GATHA 0027 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, inner and outer as one

मराठी मूळ

आहांच वाहांच आंत वरी दोन्ही । न लगा गडणी आम्हां तैशा ॥१॥
भेऊं नये तेथें भेडसावूं कोणा । आवरूनि मना बंद द्यावा ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे कांहीं अभ्यासावांचुनी । नव्हे हे करणी भलतीची ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

As one is within, so one should flow outward, both the same. We have no need for false mixing. Where there is nothing to fear, why frighten anyone? Rein in the mind and lock it shut. Tuka says: without practice, this work cannot be done by just anyone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let what is inside you and what shows outside be the same, both alike. We have no use for a false blend of the two. Where there is nothing to be afraid of, why go about frightening others? Hold the mind in and keep it shut. Tuka says: without practice, this is not work that just anyone can do.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram's standard for an honest life: no gap between the inner state and the outer show. The false mixing he rejects is the hypocrite's, one thing within and another without. He adds a quiet ethic: do not use fear on people when there is nothing to fear; govern your own mind instead. And he ends with realism. This integrity is not a mood you can summon; it takes practice, steady work, and not everyone is willing to do it.

GATHA 0028 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, beyond the debates

मराठी मूळ

बहुतांच्या आम्ही न मिळो मतासी । कोणी कैसी कैसी भावनेच्या ॥१॥
विचार करितां वांयां जाय काळ । लटिकें तें मूळ फजितीचें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे तुम्ही करा घटापटा । नका जाऊं वाटा आमुचिया ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We do not agree with the opinions of many. Each has fancies of their own. In deliberating, time goes to waste. What is false is the root of disgrace. Tuka says: you do your wrangling. Do not walk our paths.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We do not fall in with the opinions of the crowd; everyone has fancies of their own. Endless arguing only wastes the time you have. What is false is the root of every disgrace. Tuka says: go on with your wrangling if you must. Only do not try to walk our road.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the path of direct devotion against the endless debate of opinions and schools. People hold a thousand views, and arguing among them burns up a life without arriving anywhere. He names the real danger: falsehood, which is where disgrace begins. So he declines the debate entirely. Others may keep wrangling; he simply asks them not to mistake that for his road, which is walked, not argued.

GATHA 0029 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, before and after the joy

मराठी मूळ

त्याचें सुख नाहीं आलें अनुभवा । कठिण हें जिवा तोंचिवरी ॥१॥
मागिलांचे दुःख लागों नेदी अंगा । अंतर हें संगा नेदी पुढें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे सर्वविशीं हा संपन्न । जाणती महिमान श्रुति ऐसें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

His joy has not yet come into experience. It is hard on the soul until then. He does not let the sorrows of the past touch the body. This distance he does not let grow further. Tuka says: in all respects, he is complete. The Vedas alone know such greatness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Until his joy has actually been tasted, it is hard on the soul, this waiting. But once he is near, he does not let the old sorrows touch you, and he does not let the gap between you widen again. Tuka says: in every way he is complete. Even the Vedas only just manage to know a greatness like his.

WHAT IT MEANS

Two stages, named plainly. Before God's joy is felt, the soul has a hard time of it; the waiting is real and is not glossed over. But once that joy arrives, God himself does the guarding: he keeps the sorrows of the past from reaching you, and will not let the distance between you grow again. The closing line sets God beyond full measure. He is complete in every respect, so great that even the Vedas, the highest authority Tukaram can name, only barely take it in.

GATHA 0030 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, singleness without argument

मराठी मूळ

न राहे रसना बोलतां आवडी । पायीं दिली बुडी माझ्या मनें ॥१॥
मानेल त्या तुम्ही अइका स्वभावें । मी तों माझ्याभावें अनुसरलें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे तुम्हीं फिरावें बहुतीं । माझी तों हे गती जाली आतां ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My tongue will not stop speaking of him with love. My mind has taken the plunge at his feet. Those who find it agreeable, listen naturally. I have followed my own devotion. Tuka says: you may wander among many. This is now my condition.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My tongue will not stop speaking of him with love. My mind has thrown itself down at his feet. Listen if it sits well with you; I have simply followed my own love. Tuka says: you are free to wander among many gods and many ways. This is what has become of me.

WHAT IT MEANS

A statement of singleness with no wish to argue. Tukaram cannot stop praising God; his mind has already taken the plunge at God's feet, and there is no calling it back. He does not insist that others agree; he only reports that he followed his own love where it led. The generous last line lets everyone else keep their wandering among many paths. He is not converting anyone. He is just telling them, plainly, what he himself has become.

GATHA 0031 Autobiography

Autobiography, shame set aside

मराठी मूळ

न बोलतां तुम्हां कळों न ये गुज । म्हणउनी लाज सांडियेली ॥१॥
आतां तुम्हां पुढें जोडीतसें हात । नका कोणी अंत पाहों माझा ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे आम्ही बैसलों शेजारीं । करील तें हरी पाहों आतां ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Without speaking, you cannot know this secret. That is why I have set aside all shame. Now, before you, I join my hands. Let no one seek my end. Tuka says: I have sat down beside Hari. Now let us see what He does.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You cannot know this secret unless I speak it, so I have set my shame aside to tell you. Now I fold my hands before you all: let no one test how far I can be pushed. Tuka says: I have gone and sat down beside Hari. Now let us see what he chooses to do.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram explains why he says such exposing things in public. The secret of his love cannot be known unless he speaks it, so he gives up his shame in order to be honest. Then a plea and a surrender: he folds his hands and asks not to be provoked past his limit, and he hands the outcome over. He has taken his place beside Hari and will simply wait to see what God does. The boldness and the helplessness are held together. He has said everything and now controls nothing.

GATHA 0032 True Worship

True worship, no fine voice needed

मराठी मूळ

नये जरी तुज मधुर उत्तर । दिधला सुस्वर नाहीं देवें ॥१॥
नाहीं तयाविण भुकेला विठ्ठल । येइल तैसा बोल रामकृष्ण ॥ध्रु.॥
देवापाशीं मागें आवडीची भक्ति । विश्वासेंशीं प्रीति भावबळें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे मना सांगतों विचार । धरावा निर्धार दिसेंदिस ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If a sweet reply does not come to you, if God has not given you a fine voice, Vitthal is not hungry without that. Let the words Rama, Krishna come as they may. Ask God for the devotion born of love, for love accompanied by trust, empowered by feeling. Says Tuka, I tell the mind this thought: hold firm your resolve, day by day.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If no sweet words come to you, if God did not give you a fine voice, do not worry: Vitthal is not hungry for any of that. Let the names Rama and Krishna come however they come. Ask God only for the devotion that is born of love, for love joined to trust and carried by real feeling. Tuka says: I keep telling my own mind, hold your resolve firm, day after day.

WHAT IT MEANS

Reassurance for the ordinary devotee. You do not need eloquence or a beautiful singing voice; God is not waiting to be impressed by your skill. Simply let the holy names come as they will. What to ask for is not talent but the right inwardness: devotion that grows from love, love that rests on trust, the whole thing carried by genuine feeling rather than performance. And the practical close, addressed to his own mind: this is not a one-time decision but a resolve to be renewed every single day.

GATHA 0033 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the night vigil

मराठी मूळ

सावध जालों सावध जालों । हरिच्या आलों जागरणा ॥१॥
तेथें वैष्णवांचे भार । जयजयकार गर्जतसे ॥ध्रु.॥
पळोनियां गेली झोप । होतें पाप आड तें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे त्या ठाया । ओल छाया कृपेची ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have become vigilant, I have become vigilant. I have come to Hari's night-vigil. There, multitudes of Vaishnavas, roaring in victory. Sleep has fled. The sin that stood obstructing is gone. Tuka says: in that place, the moist shade of grace.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have woken up, I have woken up. I have come to Hari's night of keeping watch. Crowds of his people are here, their cry of victory thundering. Sleep has run away from me, and the sin that was blocking the path is gone. Tuka says: in that place there is a cool, moist shade, the shade of grace.

WHAT IT MEANS

The vigil here is both literal and inward. Tukaram has come to the all-night singing of God's name and finds himself truly awake at last. The roar of the gathered devotees, the fleeing of sleep, the lifting of the sin that stood in the way, all of it describes a soul coming to attention. The final image is the reward: where God's name is kept through the night, there is a cool, moist shade, relief from the heat of the world, and he names that shade grace.

GATHA 0034 The Saints

Saints, the quietly good

मराठी मूळ

आपुलिया हिता जो असे जागता । धन्य माता पिता तयाचिया ॥१॥
कुळीं कन्यापुत्र होतीं जीं सात्त्विक । तयाचा हरिख वाटे देवा ॥ध्रु.॥
गीता भागवत करिती श्रवण । आणीक चिंतन विठोबाचें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे मज घडो त्याची सेवा । तरी माझ्या दैवा पार नाहीं ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who stays awake to one's own good, blessed are the mother and father of such a one. When daughters and sons born in the family are sattvic, even God feels joy. They listen to the Gita and the Bhagavata, and contemplate upon Vithoba. Tuka says: may it come to pass that I serve such souls; my fortune would be without limit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Blessed are the mother and father of the one who stays awake to his own true good. When the daughters and sons born into a family are pure-hearted, even God feels glad. They sit and listen to the Gita and the Bhagavata, and they keep their thoughts on Vithoba. Tuka says: if I am granted the chance to serve such people, then my good fortune has no limit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram praises not the famous or the powerful but the quietly good: the person awake to his own real welfare, and the family whose children grow up pure-hearted, listening to scripture and keeping God in mind. Such a household, he says, gladdens even God. And he places himself below them, asking for nothing grander than the chance to serve such people. To him that service would be the height of good fortune. Holiness here is ordinary and domestic, and he honors it.

GATHA 0035 The Nature of God

Nature of God, kin of the lowly

मराठी मूळ

अंतरींची घेतो गोडी । पाहे जोडी भावाची ॥१॥
देव सोयरा देव सोयरा । देव सोयरा दीनाचा ॥ध्रु.॥
आपुल्या वैभवें । शृंगारावें निर्मळ ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे जेवी सवें । प्रेम द्यावें प्रीतीचें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He savors the sweetness within and seeks the companionship of devotion. God is kinsman, God is kinsman, God is kinsman of the lowly. With His own splendor He adorns the pure. Tuka says: He dines alongside them. One should give the love of affection.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He tastes the sweetness that is inside you, and looks for the bond of real devotion. God is your kin. God is your kin. God is the kin of the lowliest. With his own splendor he dresses and adorns the pure of heart. Tuka says: he sits and eats beside them. So give him the love that comes from real affection.

WHAT IT MEANS

The heart of Tukaram's picture of God: not a distant judge but a kinsman, and above all the kinsman of the lowly, the people the world overlooks. God is not impressed by show; he tastes the sweetness within and wants only true devotion. He clothes the pure-hearted in his own glory and sits down to eat at their side, the most intimate, domestic sign of belonging. The instruction that follows is simple: since God comes this close, meet him with real affection, the love of family, not formal worship.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

With relish she stages a performance of desperate craving. "Look, no one sees my suffering!" She has driven the poor man mad with her demands. "Yes, yes," he says, cornered by shame. "I simply cannot eat a morsel." Yet she needs a full measure of wheat for three meals a day. Last time you brought sugar, ten and a half seers vanished in seven days. "My stomach torments me without end." The only remedy: milk, rice, sugar, and ghee. "At the second watch, fits seize me. I lose all sense and cannot sleep." "I cannot sleep unless flowers are strewn about me. And keep the children away." "I rub sandalwood on my body and forehead, yet a constant pain pierces my skull." "My flesh is falling from the bone. How can you not see my suffering?" Tuka says: she made him a donkey while alive, and hauled him to hell after death.

IN PLAIN WORDS

With great relish she puts on a show of suffering. Look, she cries, no one sees how much I suffer. She has driven the poor man out of his mind with her demands, and he, cornered and ashamed, can only say yes, yes. I cannot eat a bite, she says, yet she needs a full measure of wheat for three meals a day. The sugar you brought last time, ten and a half seers, was gone in seven days. My stomach torments me without end, she says, and the only thing that helps is milk, rice, sugar, and ghee. At midday the fits seize me, I lose all sense, I cannot sleep. I cannot sleep unless flowers are strewn around me, and keep the children away. I rub sandalwood on my forehead, yet my head splits with constant pain. My flesh is falling from my bones; how can you not see my suffering? Tuka says: she made the man a donkey while he lived, and dragged him to hell after he died.

WHAT IT MEANS

A piece of pure social satire, and proof that Tukaram's plain speech could turn comic and merciless. The scene is a household ruined by a manipulative spouse who performs illness to control her husband: she claims she cannot eat while devouring the stores, demands delicacies, stages fits, banishes the children, and insists no one understands her suffering. Tukaram is not mocking sickness. He is mocking the using of sickness as a weapon, the false performance of need. The brutal last line is his verdict: such a partner turns a living man into a beaten donkey and damns him after death. The same eye that adored Vitthal saw domestic cruelty exactly as it was.

GATHA 0037 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, footprints everywhere

मराठी मूळ

जेथें तेथें तुझीं च पाउलें । त्रिभुवन संचलें विठ्ठला गा ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Step by step, all of Yours has reached us. Do not let a second sentiment arise in us. Wherever one looks, Your footsteps alone. You have pervaded the three worlds, O Vitthala. The doctrines of difference and non-difference are conversations of delusion. Do not give us debate with them. Tuka says: not an atom exists without You, yet see, You are vaster than the sky.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Step by step, everything of yours has reached us. Do not let any second feeling rise in us. Wherever I look, your footprints, and only yours. You have filled the three worlds, Vitthal. The doctrines that argue whether the world is different from you or one with you are only the chatter of delusion. Do not drag us into that debate. Tuka says: not a single atom exists without you, and yet, look, you are larger than the sky.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reports an arrival: God has come to him completely, and he asks only that no second loyalty ever divide him again. He sees God's footprints everywhere, the whole of the three worlds full of him. Then he waves away the great philosophical quarrel of his age, whether the world is different from God or identical with him, calling it delusion's chatter and refusing to be pulled in. The closing paradox holds his whole vision: God is in the smallest atom and at the same time vaster than the sky. Present everywhere, and beyond all measure.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let us bow to the dust of holy feet and eat their leftover scraps; let us make a bonfire of all past karma and leave it behind. This priceless capital we tie in the knot of our cloth; Vitthal of the destitute is the God who befits us. All gains come from this one contemplation, from singing the name of Govinda. The rounds of birth and death will cease, and the proven path will become easy. Those who went before us blazed the trail; come, let us follow their tracks. Says Tuka, let us rend the cloth of jiva-hood and go to the mother's home of our own true nature.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let us bow to the dust of the saints' feet and gladly eat the scraps they leave; let us make a bonfire of all our past deeds and walk away from it. This is priceless wealth, and we tie it in the knot of our cloth: Vitthal, God of the destitute, is the Lord who suits us. Every gain comes from this one thing, holding him in mind and singing the name of Govinda. The journeys of birth and death will stop, and the proven path will turn easy. Those who went ahead have marked the trail; come, let us follow their footprints. Tuka says: let us tear off this sense of being a separate self and go home, to the mother-home of our own true nature.

WHAT IT MEANS

A pilgrim's call to the road. Tukaram gathers the whole method into a few moves: revere the saints, even to eating their leftovers; burn off the past; carry the one real treasure, God's name, tied close like a trader's purse. He names his God deliberately, Vitthal of the destitute, the Lord fit for the poor and the lowly. The promise is the end of the round of birth and death, and the reassurance is that the path is not untried; the saints ahead have already blazed it. The last image is homecoming: to drop the feeling of being a separate self is to return to one's own true nature, like a married woman going home to her mother.

Confession, the leftover scraps

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The saints have eaten and gone; I remain behind with the leftover scraps and the leaf-plates to clean. I stayed apart from both the ritually pure and the ritually impure, separate from all. No one needs to teach me the rules of high and low; God himself has taught me well. I do not touch another's portion; I stand knowing my appointed place. Let no one harbor any doubt; I care only for the meal of devotion. Tuka says: I have taken the bribe from Narayana, and now I rush about eagerly. The desire is fulfilled.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The saints have eaten and gone, and I am left behind with the scraps and the used leaf-plates to clear away. I have stayed apart, off to one side, away from both the ritually pure and the ritually impure. No one needs to teach me what is high and what is low; God himself has taught me well. I do not reach for anyone else's portion; I stand in the place that is mine. Let no one here have any doubt about me: the only thing I hunger for is the meal of devotion. Tuka says: I have taken Narayana's bribe, and now I rush about eagerly, my one craving satisfied.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the language of caste-purity inside out with quiet irony. He casts himself as the lowly one left to clear the saints' used leaf-plates, and says he keeps apart from the whole pure-and-impure system, not because he is shut out but because God has taught him to see past it. He wants no one else's share and no rank; his only hunger is for devotion, the meal that matters. The closing image is playful: God has bribed him with love, and now he scurries about happily, a man owned by the one craving he is glad to have.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Partake of this feast by the grace of God; see who among you has the fitness for it. Even Brahma and the gods find these leavings hard to obtain; do not feel aversion to the savor of Brahman. The vessel overflows and is enough for all; everyone here has the right. The wish-fulfilling Lord has turned toward us; he fulfills every longing. This feast never runs short; each morsel makes you want another. Says Tuka, the cooking is by Lakshmi's own hand, with Kamari alongside, beyond compare.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sit and eat this feast by the grace of God, and see who among you is fit for it. Even Brahma and the gods can scarcely get these leavings; so do not turn up your nose at the taste of Brahman. The dish overflows, enough for everyone; here every single person has the right to eat. The wish-granting Lord has turned toward us, and he satisfies every longing. This feast never runs out; each mouthful only makes you want the next. Tuka says: it is cooked by Lakshmi's own hand, and it is beyond compare.

WHAT IT MEANS

The feast is Tukaram's image for the joy of God's name, and the point is who is invited: everyone. He inverts the ordinary purity rules. What looks like mere leftovers is something even the gods can barely obtain, so no one should feel it beneath them, and no one is too low to be served. The dish overflows, the right to eat belongs to all, and the supply never fails. By saying it is cooked in Lakshmi's own kitchen he marks it as the richest fare there is, set freely before the lowly. This is his open table, the opposite of a guarded one.

GATHA 0041 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the worthless vessel

मराठी मूळ

अवगुणांचे हातीं । आहे अवघी फजीती ॥१॥
नाहीं पात्रासवें चाड । प्रमाण तें फिकें गोड ॥ध्रु.॥
विष तांब्या वाटी । भरली लावूं नये होटीं ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे भाव । शुद्ध बरा सोंग वाव ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When faults hold the reins, all ends in disgrace. Where the vessel has no worth, even sweetness turns insipid by that measure. Poison filled in a copper cup: do not let it touch the lips. Tuka says: let feeling be pure. Pretense is empty wind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When your faults hold the reins, everything ends in disgrace. If the vessel itself is worthless, even sweet food tastes flat, judged by that. Poison poured into a fine copper cup is still poison: do not bring it to your lips. Tuka says: let the feeling inside be pure. Show and pretense are only empty wind.

WHAT IT MEANS

A short teaching on inner worth over outward form. If your character is faulty, no amount of appearance will save you from disgrace; a worthless vessel spoils even sweet food. The copper cup is the sharp image: a beautiful container does not make poison safe to drink. So the test is never the container but the contents, never the show but the heart. Tukaram's standard, here as everywhere, is purity of feeling. Everything done for effect is just wind.

GATHA 0042 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, count the profit

मराठी मूळ

ज्यांची तुज गुंती । ते तों मोकलिती अंतीं ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे बरा । लाभ काय तो विचारा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To Hari's night-vigil, why, O mind, do you not go? Where will you find any loss? Life is spent for nothing. Those with whom you are entangled will let you go in the end. Tuka says: consider well, what is the profit?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why, mind, will you not go to Hari's night of singing? Where do you see any loss in it? Your life is being spent for nothing. The people you are tangled up with will let go of you in the end. Tuka says: think it over carefully. Where is your real profit?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram argues with his own mind in plain merchant's terms, the language of profit and loss he knew from his trading years. Going to the all-night singing of God's name costs you nothing and risks nothing, he says, while the life you are spending on worldly attachments is simply being wasted. The hard truth in the middle: the people you cling to will let go of you at the end anyway. So he asks the only sensible question. When you add it all up, where is the actual gain?

GATHA 0043 Prayers

Prayer, free me from karma

मराठी मूळ

धर्माची तूं मूर्ती । पाप पुण्य तुझे हातीं ॥१॥
मज सोडवीं दातारा । कर्मापासूनि दुस्तरा ॥ध्रु.॥
करिसी अंगीकार । तरी काय माझा भार ॥२॥
जिवींच्या जीवना । तुका म्हणे नारायणा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You are the very form of dharma. Sin and merit rest in Your hands. Free me, O Giver, from karma so hard to cross. If You accept me as Your own, what burden remains mine? Tuka says: O Narayana, life of the life within.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You are dharma itself, made visible. Sin and merit both rest in your hands. Set me free, O giver, from karma that is so hard to cross. If you take me as your own, then what burden is left for me to carry? Tuka says: Narayana, you are the life within my life.

WHAT IT MEANS

A prayer of handing over. Tukaram places the whole weight of right and wrong, sin and merit, in God's hands rather than his own, and asks to be freed from karma, the chain of consequence too hard for a person to cross alone. The pivot is the third line: if God accepts him, the burden is no longer his to carry. This is the logic of surrender. What you cannot lift yourself, you give to the one who can. The last words name how close that one is: the very life inside his life.

GATHA 0044 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the greater strength

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे बहु लाटे हें भोजन । नाहीं रिता कोण राहत राहों ॥५॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even Brahma and the gods fall short of this treasure, yet we who surrender are mightier still. By renouncing desire, the gain of devotion appears, and Padmanabha becomes indebted through service. The milk of the wish-fulfilling cow has no limit; it rains at the mere stream of longing. Sitting in one place, the tide rises and pierces beyond the triputi. For us servants of Vishnu there is no separation from Hari; Narayana has come to rest within our very being. Tuka says, this feast is lavish; no one who stays can remain unfed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even Brahma and the gods come up short of this treasure, yet we who surrender are stronger than they are. When you let go of desire, the gain of devotion appears, and Padmanabha himself becomes the debtor, bound by the service you offer. The milk of the wish-granting cow has no end; it rains down at the first trickle of longing. Sitting still in one place, the tide rises in you and breaks past the knower, the known, and the knowing. For us, the servants of Vishnu, there is no being parted from Hari; Narayana has come to rest inside us. Tuka says: this feast is lavish. No one who stays at the table goes away unfed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Surrender, Tukaram insists, is not weakness but the greater strength: the one who gives himself up outranks even the gods who strive. He flips the usual account of debt too, when you serve God by letting go of desire, God becomes the one in your debt. The images pile up abundance: the wish-cow's endless milk, the rising inner tide that breaks past the threefold split of knower, known, and knowing into pure oneness. And the conclusion is hospitable, his favorite note: the table is loaded, and anyone who simply stays is fed.

GATHA 0045 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, wake up, you already are

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When duality is broken, what remains is all Hari. Outside yourself, no place need be searched. Know this much: still the mind with the mind. The hunter's signals must be learned by the one who knows them. Was the body ever real to begin with? The sprawl of body-relations is a scarecrow that only appears to protect. Tuka says: wake up! Do not grope uselessly. You ARE, O dear one. Open the eyes on the body.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the sense of two is broken, what is left is all Hari. You need not search for him anywhere outside yourself. Know just this much: still the mind by means of the mind. Like a hunter, you must learn to read the signs, and only the one who knows them can. Was the body ever real to begin with? The whole sprawl of body and its relations is a scarecrow, something that only looks as if it guards anything. Tuka says: wake up. Do not grope about in the dark for nothing. You already are. Open your eyes, right here in this body.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is Tukaram at his most directly nondual. The whole search ends when the sense of being separate from God dissolves; then nothing remains but Hari, and there is nowhere outside to look. He gives a method, stilling the mind by the mind itself, and warns that it takes a trained eye, like a hunter reading tracks. Then the sharp question: was the body, and the whole tangle of relations built on it, ever truly real, or only a scarecrow that frightens and seems to protect while guarding nothing? The poem ends as a shout to wake up. You already are what you are seeking. Open your eyes where you stand.

GATHA 0046 The Nature of God

Nature of God, limbs of one body

मराठी मूळ

विष्णुमय जग वैष्णवांचा धर्म । भेदाभेदभ्रम अमंगळ ॥१॥
अइका जी तुम्ही भक्त भागवत । कराल तें हित सत्य करा ॥ध्रु.॥
तुका म्हणे एका देहाचे अवयव । सुख दुःख जीव भोग पावे ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The world is Vishnu-constituted. This is the dharma of Vaishnavas. The delusion of difference and non-difference is inauspicious. Listen, O devotees, O Bhagavatas: whatever serves your good, do that truly. Tuka says: the limbs belong to one body. Whatever pleasure or pain comes, the one being experiences it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The whole world is made of Vishnu. This is the dharma of his devotees. The delusion that argues over difference and non-difference is an unholy thing. Listen, devotees, lovers of God: whatever truly serves your good, do that, and do it in truth. Tuka says: we are all limbs of one body. Whatever pleasure or pain comes to any, it is the one being who feels it.

WHAT IT MEANS

One of Tukaram's most quoted teachings, and the ground of his ethics. If the whole world is made of God, then the quarrel over whether things are different from God or identical with him is not merely useless but unholy; it divides what is one. From this he draws a practical command to the devotees: do what genuinely serves the good, and do it honestly. And he gives the reason in an image that needs no philosophy: all beings are limbs of a single body, so another's pain and another's joy are, in truth, felt by the one being we all are. To wound another is to wound yourself.

GATHA 0047 Renunciation

Renunciation, no regret

मराठी मूळ

आम्ही जरी आस । जालों टाकोनि उदास ॥१॥

तुका म्हणे चित्तीं । नाहीं वागवीत खंती ॥५॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We have cast off desire and become dispassionate. Who now fears what lies ahead, even death, O Hari? Let this body fall wherever it may; let it mount whatever steed it will. What is yours remains with you. We are as we have always been. Gone are honor and dishonor. The hold of pleasure and pain is broken. Tuka says: in my consciousness, I carry no regret.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We have thrown off desire and grown calm. Who now is afraid of anything ahead, even of death, O Hari? Let this body fall wherever it falls. Let it ride whatever it rides. What is yours stays with you; we are just as we have always been. Honor and dishonor are gone now. The grip of pleasure and pain is broken. Tuka says: in my mind I carry no regret at all.

WHAT IT MEANS

The peace that comes after desire is set down. Once a person wants nothing, fear loses its handle, even the fear of death. Tukaram grows indifferent to what becomes of the body, where it falls, what happens to it, because he no longer identifies with its fortunes. He tells the world, in effect, keep what is yours; I am unchanged. With desire gone, the pairs that rule ordinary life, honor and dishonor, pleasure and pain, lose their hold. And the proof of it is the last line: a mind that carries no regret. Nothing is left clung to or undone.

GATHA 0048 Renunciation

Renunciation, beyond praise and blame

मराठी मूळ

निंदी कोणी मारी । वंदी कोणी पूजा करी ॥१॥

देहभोग भोगें घडे । जें जें जोडे तें बरें ॥२॥
अवघें पावे नारायणीं । जनार्दनीं तुक्याचें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Someone slanders, someone strikes. Someone bows, someone worships. To me, this is nothing, that is nothing; I am separate from both. What the body experiences through its nature, whatever is gained, that is well. Everything of Tuka's reaches Narayana, in Janardana.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One person slanders me, another strikes me. One bows to me, another worships me. To me, this is nothing and that is nothing; I stand apart from both. Whatever the body undergoes by its own nature, and whatever it gains, that is fine. Tuka says: everything that is mine reaches Narayana, who is Janardana.

WHAT IT MEANS

The evenness of one who has stepped out of the self's accounting. Praise and blame, a worshipper's bow and an attacker's blow, are treated exactly alike, because Tukaram no longer takes any of them personally; he stands apart from both. He lets the body undergo whatever its nature brings and counts whatever comes as fine, neither chased nor refused. The final line gives the reason it can all be let go: everything he is and has flows to Narayana, the Lord he calls Janardana. Held by God, he has nothing of his own left to defend.

GATHA 0049 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, every place is enough

मराठी मूळ

जन विजन जालें आम्हां । विठ्ठलनामा प्रमाणें ॥१॥
पाहें तिकडे बापमाय । विठ्ठल आहे रखुमाई ॥ध्रु.॥
वन पट्टण एकभाव । अवघा ठाव सरता जाला ॥२॥
आठव नाहीं सुखदुःखा । नाचे तुका कौतुकें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Populated or solitary, it is the same to us, for the name of Vitthal is the measure of all. Wherever I look, the Father and Mother are there: Vitthal is there, Rakhumai is there. Forest and city hold one feeling; every place has become sufficient. No memory remains of pleasure or pain. Tuka dances in wonder.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Crowded street or empty forest, it is all the same to me now, because the name of Vitthal is the measure of every place. Wherever I look, my father and mother are there: Vitthal is there, and Rakhumai. Forest or city, the feeling is one; every place has become enough. No memory of pleasure or pain stays with me. Tuka dances, lost in wonder.

WHAT IT MEANS

For Tukaram the name of God has leveled every difference between places. A busy town and a lonely forest are equal, because God fills both, and wherever he turns he meets the divine parents, Vitthal and Rakhumai. When the whole world has become God's presence, no place is better or worse, and the swings of pleasure and pain leave no mark. What remains is the simplest sign of that freedom: he dances, carried away in wonder, at home everywhere.

GATHA 0050 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the diamond on the anvil

मराठी मूळ

हिरा ठेवितां ऐरणीं । वांचे मारितां जो घणीं ॥१॥
तोचि मोल पावे खरा । करणीचा होय चुरा ॥ध्रु.॥
मोहरा होय तोचि अंगें । सूत न जळे ज्याचे संगें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे तोचि संत । सोसी जगाचे आघात ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A diamond placed upon the anvil survives the blows of the hammer. That alone fetches its true worth; the imitation is crushed to dust. That alone becomes the touchstone: the thread does not burn in its company. Tuka says: that alone is a saint who endures the blows of the world.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A diamond laid on the anvil takes the hammer's blows and survives. That alone proves its true worth, while the fake is pounded to dust. That alone is the touchstone, the gold beside which the thread does not burn. Tuka says: just so, only that one is a saint who bears the blows of the world.

WHAT IT MEANS

A test made of metaphors. A real diamond survives the hammer that shatters an imitation; true gold does not catch fire. Tukaram uses these to define a saint not by serenity in comfort but by what survives pressure. The mark of the real one is endurance: he takes the world's blows, its scorn and cruelty, and is neither destroyed nor coarsened by them. Saintliness, here, is proven on the anvil, not in the showcase.

GATHA 0051 The Saints

Saints, the nearest door

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे देवा । त्यांची केली पावे सेवा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By their embrace, liberation as sayujya-union is attained. Such is the greatness of the saints; the limit of speech has been reached. All sacred places and auspicious times rest at their feet. Tuka says: service done to them reaches God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One embrace from them, and the union with God that is final freedom is yours. Such is the greatness of the saints, and here speech reaches its limit and stops. Every holy river, every sacred day, all of it rests at their feet. Tuka says: any service done to them reaches God himself.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram exalts the company of the saints above all pilgrimage. Their mere embrace, he says, grants sayujya, the soul's union with God, which is liberation; words simply run out trying to praise them. All the sacred rivers and auspicious days that people travel to find are already gathered at the saints' feet. And the practical heart of it: you do not need to reach God past them, for service rendered to the saints reaches God directly. The holy person is the nearest door.

Surrender, the I-ness emptied

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A dawning has come upon my I-ness. The one who enjoys and the one who renounces is Panduranga. He has taken up residence in this body. The occasion has been set aside; how little separates ruin from well-being. Tuka says: whatever comes to bear upon action, nothing of me remains. The whole body becomes a chintamani once ego and desire are pulled out from the root.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A reckoning has come for my sense of being I. Now it is Panduranga who enjoys and Panduranga who renounces; he has come to live in this body. The occasion for it is set aside; how thin the line is between ruin and good. Tuka says: whatever falls to be done, nothing of a separate me is left. The whole body turns into a wish-granting jewel once pride and craving are pulled out by the root.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the dissolving of the ego. His I-ness has been called to account and emptied; now it is God, Panduranga, who acts through him, both the enjoying and the renouncing. With the separate self gone, action still happens, but no one is left to claim it. The closing line names the transformation plainly: when pride and desire are torn out at the root, the very body becomes a chintamani, a wish-granting jewel, because what lives in it now is God. Surrender is not loss but this exchange.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Where there is no malice, no violence, no deceit, no body-consciousness, and the soul is pure as crystal, there all people come. That one is the pilgrimage-place of liberation; moksha flows from a single glimpse. What need has a pure mind for rosary beads? Such a one adorns all ornaments. The praises of Hari thunder from that mouth forever, and joy dwells in that awareness. Body, mind, and wealth have been given to Purushottama; no expectation remains. Says Tuka, such a one surpasses even the touchstone; how can I describe that glory?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Where there is no malice, no cruelty, no deceit, no clinging to the body, where the heart is clear as crystal, there everyone comes. That person is the holy place where liberation is found; one look at him, and freedom flows. What use are rosary beads to a mind already pure? Such a one is the ornament of all ornaments. The praises of Hari thunder always from that mouth, and joy fills that mind. Body, mind, and wealth, all given to Purushottama, with no expectation of anything back. Tuka says: such a one outshines even the touchstone. How could I ever describe that glory?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram paints the living saint as a place of pilgrimage in human form. The marks are inward: no malice or cruelty or deceit, no clinging to the body, a heart clear as crystal. To such a person all people come, and a single sight of him grants the liberation that pilgrims seek at sacred sites. He needs no prayer beads, for his purity is already complete; God's praise pours from him and his mind is full of joy. He has given everything, body, mind, and wealth, to God and expects nothing in return. The touchstone turns iron to gold, but this one, Tukaram says, surpasses even that, and beggars description.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All that exists is already offered to Krishna alone. Not knowing this, the mind takes it to be its own. Therefore the five elements come seeking you, ghosts on your trail. You have cheated the true Owner of what is his; this forgetfulness itself draws punishment. Tuka says: Death has squeezed the throat, and still, mine, mine, again and again.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Everything there is has already been offered to Krishna alone. Not knowing this, the mind takes it to be its own. So the five elements come hunting you, like ghosts on your trail. You have cheated the rightful Owner of what is his, and that very forgetting is what brings the punishment. Tuka says: Death already has its grip on your throat, and still you keep saying, mine, mine, again and again.

WHAT IT MEANS

A sharp warning about ownership. Everything belongs to God and was always his; the mind's error is to forget this and call things its own. Tukaram pictures the consequences as creditors: the five elements that make up the body come to reclaim what was borrowed, like ghosts dogging a debtor. To treat God's property as your own is theft, and the forgetting is the crime that draws the penalty. The closing image is unforgettable: even with Death's hand already closing on the throat, the unawakened person is still clutching and crying mine, mine. Possessiveness outlasts almost everything.

Social criticism, where defilement lives

मराठी मूळ

महारासि सिवे । कोपे ब्राम्हण तो नव्हे ॥१॥
तया प्रायश्चित्त कांहीं । देहत्याग करितां नाहीं ॥ध्रु.॥
नातळे चांडाळ । त्याचा अंतरीं विटाळ ॥२॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A Brahmin who rages at the touch of a Mahar is no Brahmin at all. For that, no atonement exists, not even giving up the body. He will not touch one the world despises, yet the defilement lives inside him. Tuka says: whoever you keep company with in consciousness, you belong to that jati.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A Brahmin who flares up in anger when a Mahar touches him is no Brahmin at all. For that fault there is no atonement, not even by giving up his life. He will not touch the one the world calls untouchable, yet the real defilement is sitting inside him. Tuka says: whatever you keep company with in your heart, that is the caste you truly belong to.

WHAT IT MEANS

One of Tukaram's most direct attacks on caste pride. He grants the Brahmin his rank and then dismantles it: the man who reacts with rage and disgust at a Mahar's touch has, by that very rage, forfeited his Brahminhood, and no penance can buy it back. The twist is the relocation of defilement. The pollution is not in the body of the so-called untouchable but in the heart of the one full of contempt. And the closing rule reaches everyone: your real caste is set by what your heart keeps company with, not by your birth.

Metaphor, the harm of spite

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The fool sulks at the oil-seller woman and in his spite eats his food dry. Look to your own good; do not hold back out of false shame. Out of dislike for people she casts off her husband, shaves her head, and gives up all attachment; in a rage she runs off to the neighbour woman's house, and behind her the dogs fill the empty house. In a mad fit she burns down her own house and never sees how much she has lost. Says Tuka: acting out of spite, she has bared her own shame for the whole world to see.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The fool sulks at the oil-seller woman, and in his spite he eats his food dry. Look to your own good yourself; do not hold back out of false shame. Out of dislike for people, she throws away her husband, shaves her head, and casts off her ties. She storms off to the neighbor woman's house in a rage, and behind her the dogs fill the empty house. In a mad fit she burns her own house down, and never sees how much she has lost. Tuka says: acting out of spite, she bared her own shame for the whole world to see.

WHAT IT MEANS

A string of comic vignettes about self-defeating anger. Each figure injures only himself: the man who, sulking at the oil-seller, eats his food dry rather than ask; the woman who in pique abandons husband and home, shaves her head, storms off, and lets the house go to the dogs and the fire. The thread running through them is the line in the middle: look to your own good, and do not let spite or false shame govern you. Anger, Tukaram shows, does not strike the one it is aimed at; it strips and exposes the angry person.

GATHA 0057 Prayers

Prayer, servant of the servants

मराठी मूळ

मज दास करी त्यांचा । संतदासांच्या दासांचा ॥१॥
मग होत कल्पवरी । सुखें गर्भवास हरी ॥ध्रु.॥
नीचवृत्तिकाम । परी मुखीं तुझें नाम ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे सेवे । माझे संकल्प वेचावे ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Make me the servant of your saints, the servant of the servants of their servants. Then, O Hari, I will gladly endure the womb and birth again, age after age. Let my work be the lowliest there is, only let your name stay in my mouth. Says Tuka: let every resolve of mine be spent in that service.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Make me the servant of your saints. No, lower: the servant of the servants of their servants. Then I will gladly take birth again, age after age, O Hari. Let my work be the lowliest there is, only let your name stay in my mouth. Tuka says: let every plan and wish I have be spent in that service.

WHAT IT MEANS

A prayer of radical humility. Tukaram does not ask to be a saint, or even a servant of saints, but the servant of their servants' servants, placing himself as low as language allows. From that low place he asks for something most seekers flee: he will accept rebirth itself, life after life, without complaint, on one condition, that God's name stay on his lips even in the meanest labor. The closing line gives his whole will away: let every intention he forms be used up in service. To be the lowest servant with the Name is, to him, the highest thing he can want.

Moral ideal, the bitter heart

मराठी मूळ

कुशब्दाची घाणी । अमंगळविली वाणी ॥२॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Constant burning, constant anguish in the consciousness. Avoid even the sight of such a one; though a corpse, he walks among the living. The stench of harsh words has defiled his speech. Tuka says: such a one knows nothing of kind words, nothing of doing good for others.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Always seething, always some grievance gnawing at the heart. Do not even let yourself see such a person: though he breathes, he is a walking corpse. The stench of harsh words has fouled his speech. Tuka says: he knows nothing of a kind word, nothing of doing good for anyone.

WHAT IT MEANS

A portrait of the bitter person, and a warning. The one consumed by constant resentment is, for Tukaram, already dead while living; better not even to be in his sight, because the poison spreads. His speech is fouled by the habit of harsh words, and he has lost the very capacity for kindness or for doing good to others. Set beside Tukaram's pictures of the saint, this is the photographic negative: where the saint's heart is soft as butter and his mouth full of God's praise, the bitter man's heart burns and his mouth gives off a stench.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who keeps no Ekadashi vow, know him for a walking corpse in this world; Time counts out his days, gnashing its teeth at him. The house with no tulsi at its door, know it for a cremation ground. The family without a single devotee of God drowns in the heat of the ocean of existence. The mouth that never utters Vithoba's name is, plainly, a washerman's filthy pit. Says Tuka: his hands and feet are dead wood, for they never carry him to the kirtan of Hari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The one who keeps no Ekadashi vow, know him for a corpse walking in the world. Time is counting out his days, grinding its teeth at him in anger. The house with no tulsi plant at its door, know that house for a cremation ground. The family without a single devotee of God drowns in the heat of the river of existence. The mouth that never speaks Vithoba's name is, plainly, a washerman's filthy pit. Tuka says: his hands and feet are dead wood, for they never carry him to the singing of Hari's name.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram draws a hard line between a life turned toward God and one that is not, using the ordinary signs of Varkari devotion. No Ekadashi fast, no tulsi at the door, no devotee in the family, no Name on the lips, no feet that walk to the kirtan: each absence, he says, marks something already dead. The images are deliberately harsh, the walking corpse, the house that is a cremation ground, the mouth that is a washerman's dirty pit. He is not so much cursing such people as shocking them awake. A life without the Name, to him, is not neutral; it is a kind of death dressed up as living.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We are forever in rags; a thief who comes near takes fright and flees, and only the street dogs guard our house. Is this any way to keep a household? And yet, if it is greatness you want, this is how to win it. Our house, built with great labour, is a flimsy thing of castor twigs that cannot bear a second load. Wealth and grain are in other people's houses; our belly is filled by begging; what cattle or calves have we to tend? All worry is gone now; our only capital is cow-dung and earth, the gleaming plastered walls and the tulsi at the door. Says Tuka: O God, I have handed over every longing to you; you yourself now keep our household.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We are forever in rags. A thief who comes near takes fright and flees, finding nothing. We go out to the front and beg, and our only watchmen are the street dogs. Is this any way to keep a house, tell me, or is all the effort wasted? And yet, if it is greatness you want, this is how to come by it. We built our house with great labor, and it is truly lasting: a flimsy thing of castor twigs that could not bear a second weight. Wealth and grain are in other people's houses; our belly is filled by begging. What cattle or calves do we have to tend and guard? All our worry is gone now. Our only capital is cow-dung and earth, the gleaming plastered walls and the tulsi at the door. Tuka says: O God, I have handed every craving over to you. You yourself keep our household now.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram's portrait of his own contented poverty, half rueful joke and half confession of freedom. He is so poor that burglars flee empty-handed and dogs are his only guards; he begs his food and owns no cattle to fret over. He turns it all into a strange boast: if you want true greatness, he says, this is the road. His lasting house is a hut of castor twigs; his only wealth is the dung and earth that plaster its clean walls, and the tulsi at the door. The point lands in the last lines. Having nothing has freed him from all worry, because he has handed every desire to God, and God himself now keeps his household. Poverty, surrendered, has become security.

Moral ideal, what does it cost you

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If you regard another's woman as a mother, what does it cost you? If you refrain from slander and from coveting another's wealth, tell me, what does it cost you? Sitting in one place and repeating the name of Rama, tell me, what effort is there in that? If you trust the word of the saints, tell me, what does it cost you? Speaking the truth requires no effort; tell me, what is the expense? Says Tuka, God is won by just these things; no other contrivance is needed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If you treat another man's wife as your own mother, what does it cost you? If you hold back from slander and from coveting other people's wealth, tell me, what does that cost you? To sit where you are and say the name of Rama, where is the hardship in that? To trust the word of the saints, what does it cost you? To speak the truth takes no special effort; tell me, what is the expense? Tuka says: God is won by just these things. No other elaborate scheme is needed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips religion down to what anyone can do, and keeps asking the same disarming question: what does it cost you? Respect another's wife as a mother, refuse slander and envy, say God's name where you sit, trust the saints, tell the truth. None of these demands money, ritual, or special status; each is simply a choice. His point is that the whole path to God is built of such free and ordinary acts, and that the elaborate machinery people think they need is beside the point. Goodness is cheap; we only pretend it is hard.

GATHA 0062 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, the pure seed

मराठी मूळ

शुद्धबीजा पोटीं । फळें रसाळ गोमटीं ॥१॥

तुका म्हणे जाती । ताप दर्शनें विश्रांती ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

From a pure seed come fruits that are lush and beautiful. On the lips, nectar-words; the body should be spent for the cause. Pure in every limb, the chitta like Ganga-water. Says Tuka, the burning departs; by their very sight, repose.

IN PLAIN WORDS

From a pure seed come fruits that are sweet and lovely to look at. On such a person's lips are words like nectar, and the body itself is spent in good work. Pure through and through, the heart clear as the water of the Ganga. Tuka says: the fever leaves you; just the sight of such a one brings rest.

WHAT IT MEANS

A portrait of the good person as a fruit-bearing tree. The inner purity is the seed, and everything that grows from it is sweet: nectar-like speech, a life spent in service, a heart clear as Ganga-water. Tukaram is not listing rules but describing a quality of being, one so settled that it heals others without trying. The last line is the test and the gift together: in the presence of such a person the inner fever of craving and unrest simply leaves you, and you come to rest. Their very sight is medicine.

GATHA 0063 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, the mind decides

मराठी मूळ

चित्त समाधानें । तरी विष वाटे सोनें ॥१॥
बहु खोटा अतिशय । जाणां भले सांगों काय ॥ध्रु.॥
मनाच्या तळमळें । चंदनें ही अंग पोळे ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे दुजा । उपचार पीडा पूजा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When chitta rests in contentment, even poison seems as gold. How very false is all of this, what shall I tell the good people? When chitta is in turmoil, even sandalwood scorches the body. Says Tuka, any other remedy is torment; even worship becomes affliction.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the heart rests in contentment, even poison seems like gold. How utterly false everything looks then; what can I tell the good people? But when the mind is in turmoil, even sandalwood paste scorches the skin. Tuka says: to a mind like that, every other remedy is torment, and even worship becomes one more affliction.

WHAT IT MEANS

Everything depends on the state of the mind, Tukaram says, not on the thing itself. A contented heart can take even poison as gold, while a mind in turmoil is burned even by cooling sandalwood. The lesson is aimed at people who pile up remedies and rituals to fix their distress: if the inner unrest is not addressed, every cure becomes a new torment, and even worship turns into a burden. Peace is not something added from outside. It is the condition that makes everything else taste sweet or bitter.

GATHA 0064 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, do not crush the flower

मराठी मूळ

परिमळ म्हणूनी चोळूं नये फूल । खाऊं नये मूल आवडतें ॥१॥
मोतियाचें पाणी चाखूं नये स्वाद । यंत्र भेदुनि नाद पाहूं नये ॥२॥
कर्मफळ म्हणुनी इच्छूं नये काम । तुका म्हणे वर्म दावूं लोकां ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One should not crush a flower for the sake of its fragrance, nor eat the root of a plant one loves. One should not taste the lustre of a pearl, nor break open an instrument to find the sound. One should not desire action for the sake of its fruit. Tuka says, this is the crux I would show the world.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not crush a flower just to get at its scent. Do not eat the root of the plant you love. Do not taste a pearl to sample its lustre. Do not break open the instrument to find where the sound lives. And do not perform an action only to seize its fruit. Tuka says: this is the secret I would show the world.

WHAT IT MEANS

A chain of images for a single teaching: do not destroy the living thing to grasp the quality you want from it. Crush the flower and the fragrance is gone; eat the root and the plant dies; break the instrument and the music is lost. Then he lands the point he has been circling: do not do an action merely to seize its fruit, for grasping at the result spoils the act, the way crushing spoils the flower. This is the Gita's teaching of desireless action, put in homely pictures, and he calls it the secret, the crux, he most wants the world to see.

GATHA 0065 The Nature of God

Nature of God, body and shadow

मराठी मूळ

माया तें चि ब्रम्ह ब्रम्ह तेंचि माया । अंग आणि छाया तया परी ॥१॥
तोडितां न तुटे सारितां निराळी । लोटांगणांतळीं हारपते ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका म्हणे उंच वाढे उंचपणें । ठेंगणीं लवणें जैसीं तैसीं ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Maya is Brahman, Brahman is Maya, as the body and its shadow. You cannot cut it, cannot push it aside; it vanishes beneath prostrations. Where there is no second, force for whom? The exertion of deliberation is futile. Tuka says: the tall grow taller by their tallness, and the short bow just as they are.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Maya is itself Brahman, and Brahman is itself Maya, the way a body and its shadow are not two things. You cannot cut it away, you cannot push it aside; it disappears the moment you fall flat in surrender. Where there is no second thing, against whom would you use force? The labor of reasoning it out is wasted. Tuka says: the tall grow taller by their own height, and the short bow low just as they are.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram refuses the long argument over whether maya, the world-appearance, is separate from Brahman. They are one, he says, like a body and the shadow it casts; you cannot split them. So you cannot fight maya or push it away by effort, and reasoning about it goes nowhere. What dissolves it is not force but surrender: it vanishes the moment you fall flat in prostration, because there was never a second thing to struggle against. The closing image is gentle: each is simply what it is, the tall tall and the low bowed low, and grace meets each as it is.

GATHA 0066 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, the company of the false

मराठी मूळ

दुर्जनासि करी साहे । तो ही दंड हे लाहे ॥१॥
शिंदळीच्या कुंटणी वाटा । संग खोटा खोट्याचा ॥ध्रु.॥
येर येरा कांचणी भेटे । आगी उठे तेथूनी ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे कापूं नाकें । पुढें आणिकें शिकविती ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He who tolerates a wicked person, he too earns the punishment. The lanes of the brothel belong to the faithless; the company of the false is with the false. When one trickster meets another, fire springs up between them. Says Tuka, cut off their noses, and they only teach others to do worse.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whoever shields a wicked person shares in his punishment too. The brothel lanes belong to the faithless; the false keep company only with the false. When one cheat meets another, fire breaks out between them. Tuka says: cut off their noses to shame them, and they will only teach the next person to do worse.

WHAT IT MEANS

A hard-eyed look at complicity and bad company. To protect a wicked person, Tukaram says, is to earn a share of his guilt; the false naturally gather with the false, and when two cheats meet, the result is destruction. The grim final image is about the limits of punishment: shame a shameless person, even brutally, and he does not reform; he simply passes the cunning on. The teaching underneath is to be careful whose company you keep, inwardly and outwardly, because association is never neutral. You take on what you tolerate.

GATHA 0067 Social Criticism

Social criticism, religion for gain

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who earn livelihood, land, kingdom, and wealth through religion, know for certain that God is not with them. A hired tenant carries the load on his back, but the inner essence yields him no gain. Setting their minds on worship of God, out of greed they worship stone with stone. Says Tuka, they fixate on material fruit with eagerness; these are the four deft arts of a temptress.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those who use religion to earn a living, land, power, and wealth, know for certain that God is not with them. They are like a hired porter carrying a load on his back: the weight is borne, but none of the inner treasure becomes his. They fix their minds on worship, but out of greed it is only stone worshipping stone. Tuka says: they hunger eagerly for material rewards. These are the four practiced tricks of a temptress.

WHAT IT MEANS

A sharp attack on religion practiced for gain. The person who turns worship into a way to get money, land, or power, Tukaram says, has lost the very thing religion is for; God is simply not present in it. He is a paid porter who carries the sacred load but keeps none of its wealth. Worse, when the heart is greedy, the worshipper is just stone bowing to stone, lifeless before the lifeless. Chasing material fruit through devotion, he says, is no better than a temptress's calculated charm: an act put on to extract something, with nothing real behind it.

GATHA 0068 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the only purity

मराठी मूळ

पवित्र सोंवळीं । एक तीं च भूमंडळीं ॥१॥
ज्यांचा आवडता देव । अखंडित प्रेमभाव ॥ध्रु.॥
तीं च भाग्यवंतें । सरतीं पुरतीं धनवित्तें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे देवा । त्यांची केल्या पावे सेवा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Ritually pure in all the earth are they alone whose beloved is God and whose love-feeling is unbroken. They alone are the fortunate ones, sufficient and complete in wealth. Tuka says: service done to them reaches God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Truly pure, in all the wide earth, are only those whose beloved is God and whose love for him never breaks. They alone are the fortunate ones, rich and complete and wanting nothing. Tuka says: any service done to them reaches God himself.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram redefines purity and wealth at once. The only truly pure people, he says, are not the ritually clean but those who love God without a break; and the only truly rich are these same lovers, complete and lacking nothing because their wanting has been answered. The closing line, which he repeats elsewhere, gives the practical upshot: you reach God by serving such people, for service done to a true devotee arrives at God directly. Devotion, not status or money, is what makes a person both clean and full.

GATHA 0069 Worldly Life

Worldly life, food ruined by poison

मराठी मूळ

आशाबद्ध जन । काय जाणे नारायण ॥१॥

भ्रमलें चावळे । तैसें उचित न कळे ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे विषें । अन्न नाशियलें जैसें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A person bound by hope can never know Narayana. Such a one serves only the senses and covets what others possess. Bewildered and babbling, that person cannot discern what is proper. Says Tuka, it is like food destroyed by poison.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A person bound by craving can never know Narayana. He spends himself serving his senses and eyeing what others have. Bewildered, babbling, he cannot tell what is right to do. Tuka says: it is like good food that has been ruined by poison.

WHAT IT MEANS

Craving, for Tukaram, is the thing that blocks the knowing of God. The person tied to his wants lives as a servant of his own senses and a coveter of others' goods, and in that fever he loses the simple power to tell right from wrong. The closing image is exact: such a life is good food spoiled by poison. The capacity was there, the human life could have nourished, but desire has tainted the whole dish. It is not that the man is incapable; it is that craving has poisoned the meal.

GATHA 0070 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, the proof is the fullness

मराठी मूळ

तुकां म्हणे असे हातींचें कांकण । तयासी दर्पण विल्हाळक ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By the belch, the eating is seen to be genuine. Otherwise it is straining and straining, dry chaff without taste. It may look like wheat, but do not eat mere husks. Tuka says: when the bangle is on your wrist, a mirror is foolish indulgence.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You can tell a real meal by the satisfied belch that follows; without that, it is only straining and effort, dry chaff with no taste. A thing may look like wheat, but do not eat mere husks. Tuka says: when the bangle is already on your wrist, holding up a mirror to check is a foolish indulgence.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram insists on the proof of real experience over the appearance of it. A true meal leaves you satisfied; talk and effort without that fullness are just dry husks dressed up as grain. The wonderful last image makes it personal: if the bangle is on your wrist, you do not need a mirror to know it is there; you feel it directly. So with God. Once the inner experience is real, you no longer need outer confirmation or display. The husk-eaters and the mirror-checkers are those who have the form of devotion but have not tasted the thing itself.

GATHA 0071 True Worship

True worship, the heart God reads

मराठी मूळ

करावी ते पूजा मनें चि उत्तम । लौकिकाचें काम काय असे ॥१॥

तुका म्हणे जेणें राहे समाधान । ऐसें तें भजन पार पावी ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Worship should be done with an excellent chitta; what is the use of work done for worldly show? What is to be known, that One knows what lies within; truth in the body is the cause that reaches the True One. Excess in the end brings either gain or ruin, for chitta yields fruit true to the seed. Says Tuka, the devotion by which contentment abides, that is the devotion that carries one across.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Worship should be done with a fine and willing heart; what is the worth of anything done for public show? The thing to understand is that the One sees what is inside you; only truth carried in the body reaches the True One. Pushed to an extreme, anything ends in gain or in ruin, for the heart yields a fruit exactly true to its seed. Tuka says: the devotion that leaves you in deep contentment, that is the devotion which carries you across.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram moves worship from the outside to the inside. What counts is not the performance others can see but the quality of the heart, because God reads the within, and only truth actually lived in the body reaches him. He adds a law of the inner life: the heart yields fruit true to its seed, so what you sow inwardly is what you reap. The test he offers is simple and usable: real devotion leaves you in settled contentment. If a practice does not bring that peace, it is not yet carrying you across; if it does, it is.

True worship, who can tell their fate

मराठी मूळ

एकादशीव्रत सोमवार न करिती । कोण त्यांची गति होइल नेणों ॥१॥
काय करूं बहु वाटे तळमळ । आंधळीं सकळ बहिर्मुख ॥ध्रु.॥
हरिहरां नाहीं बोटभरी वाती । कोण त्यांची गति होईल नेणों ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे नाहीं नारायणीं प्रीति । कोण त्यांची गति होइल नेणों ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who do not keep the Ekadashi vow or observe the Monday fast, who can tell their fate? What can I do? The anguish is great, for all are blind and outward-facing. Those who will not light even a wick a finger's length for Hari and Hara, who can tell their fate? Says Tuka, those who have no love for Narayana, who can tell their fate?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those who keep no Ekadashi vow, who do not observe the Monday fast, what will become of them? I cannot tell. What am I to do? My heart aches, for they are all blind, all turned the wrong way. Those who will not light even a finger-length wick for Hari and Hara, what will become of them? I cannot tell. Tuka says: those who have no love for Narayana, what will become of them? I cannot tell.

WHAT IT MEANS

An abhanga built on a single anguished refrain: who can tell their fate? Tukaram looks at people who keep none of the simple devotions, no Ekadashi fast, no Monday observance, not even a small lamp lit for God, and above all no love for Narayana, and he is genuinely distressed, not superior. He calls them blind and turned outward, away from the one thing that would save them. The repeated I cannot tell is not a threat but a grief; he does not know what becomes of a life with no love of God in it, and the not-knowing pains him.

Worldly life, the crevice

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे आत्महत्या रे घातकी । थोर होते चुकी नारायणीं ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There is no ease once fallen into the crevice of worldly life; the chitta churns with this one hustle at all hours. Devotion and righteousness have fallen into a crack while the uproar of sense-objects thunders on. Day and night are not enough for the family; the darshan of God becomes rare. Tuka says: O killers of the Self, you commit a great error regarding Narayana.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Once you have slipped into the crevice of worldly life, there is no rest; the mind churns all day long with this one hustle. Devotion and right living get shoved into a corner while the racket of the senses thunders on. Day and night are never enough to satisfy the family, and the sight of God grows rare. Tuka says: this is to murder your own self, and it is a grave wrong against Narayana.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the trap of a life swallowed by getting and spending. Once in it, the mind never rests; the endless business of provision drowns out devotion, and however hard one works the family's wants are never filled, while time for God simply runs out. His sharp last line is not against family or work as such, but against letting them consume the whole of a life: to live with no room left for God is, he says, a slow kind of self-murder, and a wrong done to the God within. The warning is meant to wake, not to condemn.

Exhortation, the village of corpses

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे नाहीं ठावी स्थिति मती । यमाची निश्चिती कुळवाडी ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

That land is a cremation ground, its people corpse-formed, where no service or devotion is found among the inhabitants. They fill their bellies like dogs and have given Yama's messengers lodging in the house. The sacred image there is unhonored; no pilgrim takes shelter. Such a place is a den of thieves and thorns. Tuka says: those who have neither steadiness nor intelligence are the tenant-farmers of Yama.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A village where no one serves or loves God is a cremation ground, and its people are walking corpses. They fill their bellies like dogs, and they have given the messengers of Death a room in the house. The sacred image goes unhonored there, no wandering pilgrim finds shelter, and the place becomes a den of thieves and thorns. Tuka says: those with no steadiness and no sense are simply Death's tenant-farmers.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures a place not by its prosperity but by whether God is loved in it. Where devotion is absent, the living are as good as dead and the village is a burning-ground; people eat and survive like animals, and by their forgetting they have housed Death itself. He is not so much cursing these neighbors as showing them what their life amounts to: those who drift without steadiness or sense are, in his blunt image, tenant-farmers working land that belongs to Death. The harshness is a mirror held up to wake the sleeper.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Alas for the ancestors of that family in which a wicked son is born. Would the pregnancy not have miscarried? Why was the mother not barren? She is disgraced, that sinful one. He is ever alert to tormenting others and haunting others' doorsteps, with a mind always ready for mischief. Without even trying, slander, gossip, and fasting from virtue come to him; he hoards every fault. Merit and kindness are alien to him; a worm of poison, he dies when placed in milk. Tuka says: he is a murti of defilement itself; compassion, forgiveness, and peace will not touch him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Pity the ancestors of a family in which a wicked son is born. Better the pregnancy had failed, or the mother been barren; she is left disgraced. He is always alert to hurt others and to haunt their doorways, his mind forever set on mischief. Without any effort, slander and gossip and a starving of all virtue come naturally to him; he hoards every fault there is. Kindness and merit blow away from him; he is a worm bred in poison that dies the moment it is dropped in milk. Tuka says: he is defilement given a body, and compassion, forgiveness, and peace will not come near him.

WHAT IT MEANS

One of Tukaram's harshest portraits, of a person so given over to malice that goodness cannot take root in him. The poison-worm is the key image: a creature so adapted to corruption that pure milk kills it. Tukaram is not gloating; he is drawing the full negative of his saint, the heart in which compassion, forgiveness, and peace can find no place. The point for the listener is self-examination, not contempt for a stranger. He is naming a pattern, the hardening of a heart around its own faults, as the thing to fear becoming, in oneself first of all.

GATHA 0076 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the angry dog

मराठी मूळ

श्वान शीघ्रकोपी । आपणा घातकर पापी ॥१॥

माणसांसि भुंके । विजातीनें द्यावे थुंके ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे चित्त । मळिण करा तें फजित ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The dog is quick to anger. The sinful creature strikes itself. It has no sense of shame, no patience. The milk of instruction it cannot digest. It barks at human beings. Those of a different species spit upon it. Says Tuka, one whose chitta is soiled brings disgrace upon himself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The dog is quick to anger, a wretched thing that harms itself. It has no shame and no patience; the milk of good advice it cannot keep down. It barks at people, and creatures of another kind only spit on it. Tuka says: in the same way, whoever lets his heart grow soiled brings disgrace on himself.

WHAT IT MEANS

A small, sharp parable. The bad-tempered dog is the image of an unrestrained, soiled mind: quick to rage, shameless, unable to absorb good counsel the way a sick stomach cannot keep down milk, snapping at everyone and earning only contempt in return. Tukaram's point lands in the last line, and it turns the gaze inward: a mind let go to bitterness disgraces no one but its owner. The animal is not the target; it is a warning picture of what an ungoverned heart becomes.

GATHA 0077 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the ruined son

मराठी मूळ

दुराचारी तो चांडाळ । पाप सांगातें विटाळ ॥ तुका म्हणे खळ । म्हणोनियां निषद्धि तो ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

At the birth, the mother rejoiced: a son is born! But the son turned out a wretch, a buffoon, a betrayer, dissolute. Wherever he goes he torments people and earns nothing but spit. What a dire blunder; why was a noose not placed at birth? The earth groans under his weight; his body is fit for Kumbhipaka. His words are cruel, his gaze sinful, his chitta soiled. Says Tuka, such a vile one is truly fallen; sin and defilement walk at his side. He is forbidden.

IN PLAIN WORDS

At his birth the mother rejoiced, a son is born. But the son grew up a wretch and a clown, a betrayer, a debauchee. Wherever he goes he torments people and earns nothing but their spit. What a ruinous mistake, the family thinks; why was a noose not put at his birth? The earth groans under his weight; his body is fit only for the hell of boiling cauldrons. His words are cruel, his look is sinful, his heart is soiled. Tuka says: a vile man like this is truly fallen, sin and defilement walk beside him, and he is to be shunned.

WHAT IT MEANS

Another full portrait of corruption, deliberately unsparing. Tukaram traces the arc from a mother's joy at a birth to the grief of a family wishing the child had never lived, because the man became a source of harm to everyone around him. The violent images, the noose, the boiling hell, the groaning earth, are the felt weight of a life spent injuring others. As with his other dark portraits, the function is moral warning, not relish: he is mapping where cruelty and a soiled heart finally lead, so the listener will not walk that road. The sin is the target, never a person to be enjoyed.

GATHA 0078 Confession and Sin

Confession, no voice, only the heart

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे मज चाड नाहीं जना । तुज नारायणा वांचूनिया ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I do not know how to sing, and my voice is not sweet. I place the whole burden upon You, O Panduranga. I do not know ragas, timing, rhythmic cycles, or techniques of melody. I simply place my chitta at Your feet, O God. Says Tuka, I have no concern for people; I care for no one but You, O Narayana.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I do not know how to sing, and my voice has no sweetness. So I lay the whole burden on you, Panduranga. I know nothing of ragas, of timing, of rhythm or the arts of melody. I only set my heart down at your feet, God. Tuka says: I have no use for the approval of people. I care for no one but you, Narayana.

WHAT IT MEANS

A confession that doubles as a teaching, close kin to his earlier word that Vitthal is not hungry for a fine voice. Here he makes it personal: he lacks the singer's skill entirely, so he simply hands the whole performance over to God and lays his heart at God's feet. The freedom is in the last line. Because he is singing for God and not for people, he is released from needing anyone's approval. Devotion without craft is enough, once you stop performing for the crowd and sing only for the One.

GATHA 0079 Autobiography

Autobiography, the peddlers of my verses

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे बाहेरमुदी । आहा च गोविंदीं न सरती ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Some memorize my verses and peddle them door to door. But when an assayer touches the work, the pretender is shamed and abandons the very place. He gathers defiled remnants and strains to produce feeling from them. Tuka says: these outwardly sealed frauds will never be accepted by Govinda.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Some people memorize my verses and hawk them door to door. But the moment a true judge tests the work, the pretender is shamed and slinks away from the spot. He scrapes together leftover scraps and strains and grunts to fake real feeling. Tuka says: these frauds, sealed shut on the outside and empty within, will never be accepted by Govinda.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns on those who use his poems as a trade, reciting them for gain or repute without the love that made them. The assayer is his test: bring such a performer before someone who can tell real from counterfeit, and the act collapses. The cutting image is of a man straining to manufacture devotional emotion out of borrowed scraps. His verdict is that God is not fooled by polish; the outwardly impressive but inwardly empty will not be received. What cannot be faked is the feeling, and only the feeling counts.

GATHA 0080 Renunciation

Renunciation, dropping the trappings

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे जेव्हां गेला अहंकार । तेव्हां आपपर बोळविले ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Against upadhi I have taken a hardened resolve; I will not let its torment touch me. Why soil your hands only to have to wash them? Why lay traps across a clear road? Has God not already provided what is needed? What is ours awaits us in its place. Tuka says: when the ego departed, self and other were sent away.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have set a firm resolve against all the false trappings of identity; I will not let their torment touch me again. Why dirty your hands only to have to wash them? Why lay obstacles across a road that is already clear? Has God not already arranged whatever is needed? What is truly yours is waiting for you in its own place. Tuka says: when the ego left, the whole division of self and other was shown the door along with it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram resolves to be done with upadhi, the false add-ons and conditionings the self mistakes for itself. Two homely questions carry the argument: why create a mess just to clean it up, why block a road that is already open? Anxious striving and self-importance are exactly such needless mess-making, since God has already provided, and what is genuinely ours will reach us in its time. The release comes in the last line: when the ego finally departed, it took with it the very split between self and other. Drop the I, and there is no other left to manage.

GATHA 0081 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, grace and effort

मराठी मूळ

योगाचें तें भाग्य क्षमा । आधीं दमा इंद्रियें ॥१॥
अवघीं भाग्यें येती घरा । देव सोयरा जालिया ॥ध्रु.॥
मिरासीचें म्हूण सेत । नाहीं देत पीक उगें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे उचित जाणां । उगीं सिणा काशाला ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The fortune of yoga is forbearance; first subdue the senses. When God becomes your kinsman, all blessings come to your door of their own accord. Just because a field is inherited does not mean the harvest springs up effortlessly. Says Tuka, know what is fitting and do not exhaust yourself for nothing.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The real fortune of yoga is forbearance; but first you must master the senses. Once God has become your kinsman, every blessing comes to your door on its own. Yet an inherited field does not yield a harvest just because you own it; you still have to work it. Tuka says: understand what is fitting to do, and do not wear yourself out for nothing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram balances grace and effort. The crown of yoga, he says, is patient forbearance, and it rests on first reining in the senses; and when God has become your own kin, blessings simply arrive. But he guards against the laziness that grace can excuse. Owning an ancestral field does not make the crop grow by itself; the ground must still be tilled. Devotion is no excuse for idleness. Know what is genuinely yours to do, do that, and do not exhaust yourself in pointless striving over the rest. Effort and surrender each have their place.

GATHA 0082 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, until sight meets sight

मराठी मूळ

न फळे उत्तर । नाहीं स्वामी जों सादर ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे भेटी । जंव नाहीं दृष्टादृष्टी ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When tears do not come to the eyes and there is no deep churning of compassion within, then these are vulgar, cheap words, chaff thrown to amuse the crowd. Words bear no fruit so long as the Lord is not attentive. Says Tuka, there is no true meeting until sight meets sight.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When no tears come to the eyes and no compassion churns inside, then all these are just vulgar, cheap words, chaff thrown out to amuse the crowd. Words bear no fruit as long as the Lord is not attentive to them. Tuka says: there is no true meeting until sight has actually met sight.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tests devotional speech by what it does to the body and the heart. If the words bring no tears, no inner stirring of compassion, they are mere entertainment, husks tossed to please listeners. And no words bear fruit unless God himself is turned toward them. The closing standard is uncompromising: there is no real meeting with God until sight meets sight, until the encounter is direct and mutual. Eloquence about God is nothing; being seen by God, and undone by it, is everything.

GATHA 0083 Social Criticism

Social criticism, a life through the sieve

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

His wife, once a woman of auspicious fortune, becomes a widow; his mother joins the ancestors; he himself heads for hell. What a great expenditure this wretch has made; all his deeds have been perverse. He has strained his lifespan through the sieve of sense-pleasures, grazing in their field. Says Tuka, such a shameless one has no compassion; to him God is a stone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

His wife is widowed, his mother joins the ancestors, and he himself is bound for hell. What a ruinous spending of a life this wretch has made; every one of his deeds has gone crosswise. He has strained his whole lifespan through the sieve of sense-pleasure, grazing that field till nothing is left. Tuka says: such a shameless man has no compassion in him, and to him God is just a stone.

WHAT IT MEANS

A portrait of a life poured out on the senses until everyone around it suffers and the man himself is ruined. The grim opening lists the wreckage left in his wake. The sieve is the central image: he has let his entire allotted life run out through the holes of sense-pleasure, keeping nothing. The mark of his condition is the closing line: with no compassion left, even God is to him no more than a lump of stone, an idol he cannot feel. Tukaram names the waste so the listener will not make it. The pleasure-grazing, not the man, is the thing condemned.

GATHA 0084 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the boasting miser

मराठी मूळ

दानें कांपे हात । नाव तेविशीं मात ॥१॥
कथी चावटीचे बोल । हिंग क्षीरीं मिथ्या फोल ॥ध्रु.॥
न वजती पाप । तीर्था म्हणे वेचूं काय ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे मनीं नाहीं । न ये आकारातें कांहीं ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

His hand trembles from giving, yet he boasts on that very subject. In holy gatherings he speaks loose words; asafoetida mixed into milk, a false froth. His sins do not depart, yet he says of pilgrimage, "Why should I spend?" Says Tuka, when there is nothing in the mind, nothing comes to form.

IN PLAIN WORDS

His hand shakes when it comes to giving, yet on that very subject he boasts the loudest. In holy gatherings he spouts loose talk, asafoetida stirred into milk, a false froth. His sins do not leave him, and still he says of pilgrimage, why should I spend the money? Tuka says: when there is nothing in the heart, nothing takes shape in the act.

WHAT IT MEANS

A quick, exact sketch of the stingy hypocrite. He cannot bear to give, yet talks endlessly about generosity; he pollutes holy company with empty chatter, like a pinch of asafoetida ruining good milk. He will not spend on anything that might actually cleanse him, and so his faults stay with him. Tukaram's closing line is the principle behind the portrait: action follows the heart, and where the heart is empty, no real deed can take form. The outer meanness is only the shape of an inner emptiness.

GATHA 0085 True Worship

True worship, the willing cow

मराठी मूळ

वळितें जें गाई । त्यासि फार लागे काई ॥१॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A cow that turns of her own accord needs very little coaxing. God is satisfied by the response born of bhava; one heartfelt offering is enough. No ceremony of rank is needed. Says Tuka, God casts off greatness and walks alongside the lowly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A cow that comes to be milked of her own accord needs hardly any coaxing. Just so, God is satisfied by an answer that comes from real feeling; one heartfelt offering is enough for him. No ceremony of rank or status is needed. Tuka says: God sets his own greatness aside and walks beside the lowly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures worship by willingness, not by grandeur. The cow that gives milk freely needs no forcing, and God is content the same way, with a response that rises from genuine feeling; a single offering made in love is enough. None of the apparatus of status matters to him. The closing image is the whole of Tukaram's God: not a king demanding ceremony, but one who lays his greatness down and comes to walk at the side of the poor and lowly. The feeling is the only coin he accepts.

GATHA 0086 The Power of the Name

The Name, the only provision

मराठी मूळ

मैत्र केले महा बळी । कामा न येती अंतकाळीं ॥१॥
आधीं घे रे रामनाम । सामा भरीं हा उत्तम ॥ध्रु.॥
नाहीं तरी यम । दांत खातो करकरा ॥२॥

तंववरि मिरविसी बळ । जंव आला नाहीं काळ ॥५॥
तुका म्हणे बापा । चुकवीं चौऱ्याशींच्या खेपा ॥६॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You made friends with the mighty, but they are of no use at the hour of death. Take the name of Rama now; fill your store with this best of provisions. Otherwise Yama grinds his teeth, waiting. You amassed millions in wealth, but Kala will not release what it has seized. Your retinue and armies are of no help at that moment. You parade your strength only until Kala arrives. Says Tuka, O father, escape the rounds of eighty-four lakh births.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You made friends with the powerful, but they are no use at the hour of death. Take the name of Rama now; fill your stores with that, the best of all provisions. Otherwise Death stands grinding his teeth, waiting. You piled up millions, but Time will not give back what it has seized. Your retinue and your armies are no help in that moment. You can parade your strength only until Death arrives. Tuka says: my friend, slip free of the eighty-four lakh rounds of birth.

WHAT IT MEANS

A plain reckoning with death. All the things a person banks on, powerful friends, amassed wealth, retinue, armies, strength, are worthless at the one moment that matters, the hour of dying, when Death takes and does not return. Against that, Tukaram urges the one provision that travels: the name of Rama, gathered now, while there is time. He calls the listener affectionately, my friend, not to frighten but to rouse. The aim is to escape the vast wheel of rebirths, and the ticket, he says, is the Name laid up in advance.

GATHA 0087 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the mismatched marriage

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे येर येरा जें विच्छिन्न । तेथें वाढे सीण सुखा पोटीं ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A Kannada woman took a Marathi husband; neither one can grasp the other's words. Do not let my fate be like theirs, O Kamalapati; give me the company of the saints. She called to him tenderly, "il ba," and he fled, certain she had cursed him. Says Tuka, where one is estranged from the other, sorrow grows in the very belly of happiness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A Kannada woman married a Marathi husband, and neither could understand a word the other said. Do not let my life be like that, Lord of Lakshmi; give me instead the company of the saints. She called to him tenderly, il ba, and he ran off, certain she had cursed him. Tuka says: where two are strangers to each other, sorrow grows in the very belly of their happiness.

WHAT IT MEANS

A homely, almost comic parable about estrangement. A husband and wife who do not share a language cannot reach each other; her word of endearment sounds to him like a curse, and he flees. Tukaram prays not to live like that, cut off and misunderstanding, and asks instead for the company of the saints, where hearts actually meet. The closing line is the teaching: where there is no real understanding between people, sorrow breeds inside the very thing that should be joy. He wants company that speaks his soul's own language.

GATHA 0088 Worldly Life

Worldly life, a grain of pleasure

मराठी मूळ

सुख पाहतां जवापाडें । दुःख पर्वता एवढें ॥१॥
धरीं धरीं आठवण । मानीं संताचें वचन ॥ध्रु.॥
नेलें रात्रीनें तें अर्धें । बाळपण जराव्याधें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे पुढा । घाणा जुंती जसी मूढा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Pleasure is the size of a barley grain; suffering is as vast as a mountain. Hold this remembrance firmly; trust the word of the saints. Half of life is stolen by the night; childhood and old-age-disease claim the rest. Says Tuka, ahead, the fool is yoked to the oil-press and driven round and round.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Weigh it honestly: the pleasure is the size of a barley grain, the suffering as big as a mountain. Hold this firmly in memory; trust what the saints have told you. Half of your life is carried off by the night and sleep, and childhood at one end and old age and sickness at the other take most of the rest. Tuka says: and ahead, the fool is yoked like an ox to the oil-press, driven round and round.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram does the arithmetic of a human life and finds the balance grim. Set against a mountain of suffering, the pleasure amounts to a single barley grain. And the time itself is mostly spent before you notice: half lost to sleep, the rest eaten by helpless childhood and by the decay of age and illness. What is left, for the person who never wakes up, is the oil-press: the ox walking in endless circles, blindfolded, going nowhere. He lays it out this starkly so the listener will value the little waking time he has and turn it toward God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not keep any connection, even in the mind, with one who has slandered the saints and forgotten You, O Govinda. Let his mouth burn. Keep that quarrelsome wretch out of my sight. Says Tuka, O God, keep me far from such a one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not keep any tie, even in your mind, with someone who slanders the saints and has forgotten you, Govinda. Let such a mouth burn. Keep that quarrelsome wretch out of my sight. Tuka says: O God, keep me far away from a person like that.

WHAT IT MEANS

A blunt prayer about company. For Tukaram, contempt for the saints and forgetfulness of God are a contagion, so he asks not merely to avoid such a person in the flesh but to keep no connection with him even inwardly, in the mind. The harsh words, let his mouth burn, are aimed at the slander itself, and the prayer is protective rather than vengeful: keep me far from this, lest it touch me. He guards the heart's company as carefully as the body's, knowing we slowly become what we keep near.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sesame and rice are scorched; by lust and anger, just so, the wicked are ruined. Why do you exhaust yourself in vain, not worshipping Panduranga? For the sake of pride and pretense you toiled over letters and learning. You performed austerities and pilgrimages, but only swelled your self-importance. You gave away wealth, yet carefully nurtured your ego-sense. Says Tuka, you have missed the crux entirely; all you have done is adharma.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sesame and rice can be scorched in the roasting; lust and anger scorch the foolish in just the same way. Why wear yourself out for nothing, never worshipping Panduranga? For the sake of pride and show you slaved over learning and letters. You did austerities and made pilgrimages, and only swelled your self-importance. You gave wealth away, and carefully nursed your ego the whole time. Tuka says: you have missed the crux entirely, and turned all of it into adharma.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks religion practiced for the ego. Learning, austerity, pilgrimage, even charity, all the things that look pious, become worthless, even adharma, when they are done to feed pride and self-importance rather than to love God. The roasted grain is his image: lust and anger burn the foolish the way fire scorches sesame and rice. The sharp point is that effort itself is not enough; effort aimed at the self only enlarges the self. To miss God in the middle of all that religious labor is to miss the entire crux, and to turn worship into its opposite.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am scorched, O God, by the fire of worldly life, worn out from serving this household. And so I have remembered Your feet; come to me, O my mother Panduranga. Through countless births I have been a beast of burden, yet the crux of release remains unknown to me. Thieves have surrounded me inside and out, and no one shows me any mercy. I have been scattered in every direction, stripped naked, writhing in agony for so many days. Says Tuka, rush to me now, O Lord of the lowly; Your renown in the world is the refuge of the destitute.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am scorched, O God, by the fire of worldly life, worn out from serving this household. So I have remembered your feet at last; come to me, my mother Panduranga. For many births I have been a beast of burden, and I still do not know the secret of how to be set free. Thieves have surrounded me, inside and out, and not one person shows me any mercy. I have been scattered, stripped bare, writhing for days on end. Tuka says: come running now, quickly, Lord of the lowly; your very name in the world is the refuge of the destitute.

WHAT IT MEANS

One of Tukaram's most heartfelt cries, the prayer of a man at the end of his strength. Burned out by the demands of household life and lost through many births like a yoked animal, he confesses he does not even know how release is found. The thieves inside and out are his own passions and the world's pressures, and no human help comes. So he throws himself entirely on God, whom he calls mother and Lord of the lowly, and reminds God of his own reputation: if you are known in the world as the refuge of the destitute, then here is a destitute man, come quickly. It is surrender born of exhaustion, and it is complete.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The scriptures declare that God is a cosmic debtor to his devotees; make those words come true with unwavering resolve. I have heard the old story of how Kabir was given a gold coin each step of the way. When someone brought the gold to Kabir's house, he refused it, having renounced all wealth. When it was brought to Namdev's house, he had it plundered at the hands of the Brahmins. Need any proof be given of what is obvious? The Lord repaid even Vyankatesh's debt. When the seed was ground to flour as an offering, Narayana himself had to sow it again. Says Tuka, the one who lacks such unwavering resolve is the only one who is truly deceived and ruined.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The old scriptures say that God makes himself a debtor to his devotees; hold those words as true with unshaken resolve. Remember the stories: Kabir was given a gold coin at every step; when someone carried the gold to his house he refused it, having renounced all wealth, and when it was brought to Namdev's house he had it given away to the Brahmins. What proof does the obvious need? The Lord even paid off Vyankatesh's debt. When the seed-grain was ground up for an offering, Narayana himself had to come and sow the field again. Tuka says: the only one who is truly cheated is the one who lacks this firm faith.

WHAT IT MEANS

An abhanga in praise of faith, built on the saints' stories. Scripture promises that God becomes a debtor to those who love him, and Tukaram says: take that literally, with full resolve. He stacks up the evidence, Kabir and Namdev and the gold, the Lord settling a devotee's debt, God himself re-sowing a field whose seed had been given away in worship, to show that the promise has always held. His conclusion turns it around: God never fails the devotee, so the only person ever deceived is the one whose faith was not firm enough to trust him. The lack is never on God's side.

Worldly life, adharma inside dharma

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Through indulgence comes renunciation; through renunciation, pleasures return. The workings run contrary: adharma dwells in the very body of dharma. Whatever distances God, that is sin; abandon all false resolutions. Says Tuka, false shame is worthless; examine the profit in your own gut.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Through indulgence comes the urge to renounce; and through renunciation the pleasures creep back again. The mechanism runs backwards like that, and adharma can hide inside the very body of dharma. Whatever pushes God further away, that is sin; give up your false resolutions. Tuka says: false shame is worthless. Work out, honestly, in your own gut, where the real profit lies.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram warns that the inner life is tricky, full of reversals. Indulgence can breed a reaction of renunciation, and renunciation can quietly invite the old pleasures back; even apparent dharma can carry adharma hidden inside it. So he gives one clear measuring stick that cuts through the confusion: whatever distances you from God is sin, whatever its label. Drop the false resolves and the false shame that keep you performing, and instead reckon honestly, in your own gut, what truly profits the soul. The test is not the outward form but the direction: toward God, or away.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The charlatan changes his outward form while keeping his dhyana fixed on the fish. He wears tilak, rosaries, insignia, and sacred marks, hiding his snares from the world. As the fisherman baits the hook and conceals the barb, the butcher lovingly raises the animal only to cut its throat. Says Tuka, I am just such a one among the people, yet You, O Panduranga, are gracious.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The fraud changes his outward costume while his attention stays fixed on the catch, the way a heron stands still eyeing the fish. He puts on the tilak, the rosaries, the holy marks and insignia, and hides his snares from everyone. As the fisherman baits the hook and keeps the barb out of sight, as the butcher fattens the animal with kindness only to cut its throat, so does he. Tuka says: I am just such a counterfeit among people, and yet you, Panduranga, are gracious to me anyway.

WHAT IT MEANS

A merciless picture of the false holy man, the one who wears every outward sign of devotion while his mind is fixed, like a hunting heron, on what he can take. The fisherman's hidden barb and the butcher's affectionate fattening are images of betrayal dressed as care. Then Tukaram does something striking: he turns the accusation on himself, confessing that he too is such a counterfeit among people. It is not false modesty but the saint's habit of self-suspicion, and it opens into grace: knowing his own fraudulence, he can only marvel that Panduranga is kind to him regardless. The harshest light, turned inward, becomes humility.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When valor departs, even a woman can beat you. Once gone, that former strength cannot be recovered. A chitta once shattered cannot be mended by any means. Says Tuka, once fortitude breaks, ruin follows close behind. In this age of Kali, one should practice kirtan; through it Narayana will grant his presence. There is no need to abandon worldly duties, retire to the forest, or take up ash and staff. Says Tuka, all other remedies are hollow beside the Name.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When valor leaves a man, even a woman can beat him; and once that strength is gone, it cannot be brought back. A heart once shattered cannot be pieced together again by any means. Tuka says: once fortitude breaks, ruin follows close behind. In this age of Kali, the practice to keep is kirtan, the singing of God's name, and through it Narayana will grant his presence. There is no need to give up your worldly duties, or flee to the forest, or take up ashes and a staff. Tuka says: beside the Name, every other remedy I can see is hollow.

WHAT IT MEANS

Two short teachings stand together here. The first is sober: some things, once broken, do not return, lost courage, a shattered heart, so guard your fortitude, because its loss opens the door to ruin. The second is Tukaram's great good news for ordinary people, and one of his best-known teachings: in this fallen age, the whole of religion can be carried by kirtan, the communal singing of God's name. You do not have to renounce your work, abandon your family for the forest, or take up the ascetic's ash and staff. Stay where you are and sing. Beside the living Name, he says, every other elaborate method is empty.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

No Krishna-mani at the throat, no auspicious word on the tongue. Whether man or woman, such a one is truly a wretch by name. No generosity in the hand, no bangle of heroism. The saints have cast such a one out, shaved bald in disgrace. Says Tuka, one who has no balance within, his is only degradation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

No Krishna-bead at the throat, no auspicious word on the tongue: whether the person is a man or a woman, the only true name for such a one is wretch. No giving in the hand, no bangle of courage on the wrist. The saints have cast such a person out and shamed him. Tuka says: one who has no inner balance has nothing but degradation.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lists the marks of a life with no devotion in it: no sign of God worn or remembered, no good word on the lips, no generosity, no courage. Man or woman, he says, such a person has earned only a hard name. The harshness is his usual shock-treatment, but the real point is in the last line: the missing thing is inner balance, the steadiness that comes from a life oriented toward God. Without it, whatever the outward circumstances, the result is only degradation. The ornaments he names, bead, word, gift, courage, are all the outward signs of an inward orientation that is simply not there.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those religious impostors who say "Maya is Brahman" have led others astray along with themselves. Wallowing in sensual pleasures, they teach corrupted knowledge, becoming like the drummer trailing behind the mind's procession. They cook and eat elephant yam and mustard freely enough, but when called upon to be generous, they suffer greatly. To give medicine to a child, one coaxes him by holding a lump of sugar before his eyes. If you wish to cross, first examine the words of the Vedas; put a stop to barren speech. Says Tuka, for those whose life is the nurturing of the body-lump, meeting with Narayana will never come to pass.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those religious frauds who go about saying Maya is Brahman have led others to ruin along with themselves. Steeped in their own pleasures, they teach corrupted knowledge, trailing behind the mind like a drummer behind a procession. They will happily cook and eat rich food, but the moment they are asked to give, they are in agony. To get a child to take medicine, you hold a lump of sugar before his eyes. If you truly want to cross over, first search the words of the Vedas, and put a stop to all this barren talk. Tuka says: for those whose whole life is the feeding of this lump of flesh, the meeting with Narayana will never come.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks the glib nondualist who recites Maya is Brahman while living for his own appetites. Their fine philosophy, he says, is corrupted knowledge dressed as wisdom; the proof is in their conduct, generous at the table, stingy when asked to give. He grants that hard truth must sometimes be sweetened, the way a child is coaxed to swallow medicine with a sugar lump, but the medicine itself must be real. The test is not the slogan but the life: anyone whose whole existence is spent pampering the body will never actually meet God, however impressive his talk.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A mirage appears as genuineness itself; the mania of the false breaks its own heart in pursuit. Knowing all this, why do you still destroy yourself? Think about your welfare right now, without delay. Only stored merit accompanies you as escort; your conduct alone gives its fruit. Says Tuka, in the end the procession goes only as far as the cremation ground, and the consequences of your deeds cling to you like measles erupting on the skin.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A mirage looks exactly like real water, and the deluded man bursts his own heart chasing it. Knowing all this, why do you keep destroying yourself? Think about your real welfare now, without losing a moment. Only your stored-up merit goes with you as escort, and only what you actually did bears fruit. Tuka says: in the end the procession carries you no further than the cremation ground, while the results of your deeds cling to you like measles breaking out on the skin.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses the urgency of waking up. The world's goods are a mirage that looks like water and breaks the heart of whoever runs after it. He asks the listener to stop the self-destruction and reckon, right now, what truly profits the soul. Two sober facts frame the choice: at death only one's accumulated merit and deeds travel on, and the funeral procession itself goes only as far as the burning-ground. What you cannot leave behind is the fruit of your actions, which clings like an eruption on the skin. So choose your deeds while there is still time.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What were the milkmaids but women with buttermilk vessels, and what were their children but ordinary ones? Yet what an obsessive passion they had for God; what great devotion did they perform? What feast had Vidura prepared? Just coarse grain and husks. Says Tuka, and Kubja was a hunchbacked maidservant, devoid of beauty or art, yet the Lord gave himself to her.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What were the cowherd women but ordinary milkmaids with their pots of buttermilk, and their children but ordinary children? Yet what a wild passion for God they had; and what formal worship did they ever perform? What feast did Vidura set before the Lord? Only coarse grain and husks. Tuka says: and Kubja was a hunchbacked servant girl, plain and without grace, yet the Lord gave himself to her.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram piles up examples to make one point: God is won by love, not by qualification. The cowherd women were unlettered milkmaids, Vidura offered the Lord nothing but coarse grain, Kubja was a deformed servant with neither beauty nor accomplishment, and yet each received God fully. None of them had status, learning, or correct ritual; all of them had overwhelming devotion. The lesson is aimed straight at anyone who feels too low or too unqualified to approach God. The only credential that has ever mattered is the heart's passion.

GATHA 0100 Appeals and Exhortations

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let this at least be my counsel going forward: do not waste your lifespan. I fall in full prostration at the feet of all; purify your chitta. The best thing you can do is contemplate God, making the mind undivided. Says Tuka, pursue the trade that is profitable. How much more should I teach?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let this much, at least, be my counsel from here on: do not throw your life away. I bow in full prostration at everyone's feet, only purify your own heart. The best thing you can do is to keep your thoughts on God, with the mind made single. Tuka says: take up the trade that actually turns a profit. How much more do I need to teach you?

WHAT IT MEANS

One of Tukaram's gentlest and most quoted exhortations, offered with humility rather than rebuke. He bows to all, claims no authority over anyone, and asks only one thing: do not waste the life you have. The whole of his advice fits in a line, purify the heart, keep the mind single on God, and he frames it, as he so often does, in the merchant's language of profit and loss: this is simply the trade that pays. The closing question is almost tender. The path is so plain that there is really nothing more to explain.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Without a devotee, how can God's form take shape, and how can service be rendered? They adorn each other, like gold set with a diamond. Without God, who can grant the devotee desirelessness? Says Tuka, the bond between mother and child is a net of affection. God is so branded by His devotees that He loves them in whatever way they need. Desireless and separate, He yet drew the gopis into His antics. Says Tuka, the unmanifest has come to beautiful form.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Without a devotee, how would God's form even take shape, and who would there be to serve him? The two set each other off, like gold mounted with a diamond. And without God, who could ever give the devotee his freedom from desire? Tuka says: it is like the bond between mother and child, a whole net woven of affection. God is so claimed by his devotees that he loves each one exactly as that one needs. Desireless and apart, he still let himself be drawn into the gopis' games. Tuka says: the unmanifest has come into beautiful form.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the love between God and devotee as a true mutuality, each completing the other. Without devotees there would be no one for God to take form before or to be served by; without God the devotee could never reach desirelessness. Like gold and the diamond set in it, each makes the other shine. The astonishing claim is that God lets himself be owned by his lovers, loving each in the very shape that one needs, and that the formless Absolute, who needs nothing, allowed himself to be pulled into the play of the cowherd girls. Love draws the unmanifest into form.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Was the sun made genuine by the rooster's crow? Why then, O God, place this precious treasure of sainthood as a weight upon my head? If maidservants could obstruct You, then why would people die of fasting? Says Tuka, all arts and skills rest in the hands of Ananta.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Was the sun made real by the rooster's crowing? Then why, O God, do you lay this heavy treasure of sainthood on my head? If a few maidservants could really block your will, then why would anyone die of fasting and penance? Tuka says: every power and every skill rests in the hands of Ananta, the endless one.

WHAT IT MEANS

A wry protest from a reluctant saint. The rooster crows at dawn, but the sun rises by its own power, not because the rooster called it; so too, Tukaram says, his own reputation for holiness adds nothing to God and only burdens him. He waves off the idea that any human effort, a servant's interference, a faster's austerity, controls divine outcomes. Everything is already in God's hands. Underneath the humility is a deep trust: he refuses the weight of being thought a saint because he knows all the doing is God's, never his own.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He dines in the house, yet defecates right where he eats. One who carries on like this brings only degradation upon himself. What to discard and what to keep, does he not even know this much? Says Tuka, he treats buttermilk and milk as one and the same.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He eats his meal in the house and then fouls the very spot where he ate. Anyone who behaves like that brings disgrace only on himself. What should be kept and what thrown away, does he not know even this much? Tuka says: he treats buttermilk and milk as if they were one and the same.

WHAT IT MEANS

A blunt little satire on the person who has no power of discrimination, who cannot tell the worthy from the worthless and so spoils his own life. Fouling the place where you eat is Tukaram's crude, memorable image for ruining the good that sustains you. The failure is basic: not knowing what to hold onto and what to discard, treating milk and buttermilk as equal. The point underneath is that the spiritual life depends on this power of discernment, the ability to value rightly, and that without it a person degrades himself no matter what else he does.

Be it son, wife, or brother, sever ties with those who are treacherous. Once their scheming is clear, do not touch them, lest their sins smear you. Shatter that pot. Count it dead with a single blow. Says Tuka, without renunciation, suffering cannot be escaped.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Be it your son, your wife, or your brother, cut your ties with anyone who proves truly treacherous. Once their scheming is plain, do not even touch them, or their wrongs will smear off onto you. Shatter that pot; count it dead, and finish it with a single blow. Tuka says: without renunciation, there is no escaping the suffering such a tie brings.

WHAT IT MEANS

A hard teaching about poisonous relationships, and Tukaram does not soften it. Even the closest kin, he says, must be let go if they are genuinely treacherous, because corruption rubs off; staying close means sharing in the harm. The image of shattering a cracked pot with one clean blow is deliberately decisive: no lingering, no half-measures. This is not cruelty but protection of the soul. Where a bond reliably drags you toward ruin, only renouncing that bond ends the suffering. He places the welfare of the spiritual life above even family loyalty when the two genuinely collide.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Without having delivered, the she-donkey rushes through the naming ceremony. Why all this fuss, looking at what others do? Sugar cannot be made happy by telling it so. A belch from straining gives no nourishment; it only leaves the face looking grimy.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The she-donkey rushes to hold the naming ceremony before she has even given birth. Why all this fuss, just from watching what others do? You cannot make sugar sweet by announcing that it is sweet. A belch forced out by straining brings no real nourishment; it only leaves the face looking grubby.

WHAT IT MEANS

A string of mocking images aimed at empty show and premature claiming. Holding the baby's naming feast before the birth, declaring sugar sweet as if the word added anything, forcing a satisfied belch with no meal behind it, each is a picture of pretending to a result you have not actually reached. Tukaram's target is the person who imitates the outward signs of attainment, often just from copying others, while the substance is missing. The real thing announces itself; it does not need to be performed. Forced display only exposes the emptiness it tries to hide.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whatever creates a barrier between you and Narayana must be shunned, even if it be your own father or mother. Beloved, children, wealth: these become the very vessels of enmity that make you a receptacle of sorrow. Prahlad renounced his father, Vibhishana his brother, and Bharata rejected the kingdom and condemned his own mother. Says Tuka, all dharma is Hari's feet; all other remedies are the root of suffering.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever comes between you and Narayana must be shunned, even if it is your own father or mother. Spouse, children, wealth, what are they worth, when they so easily become the very vessels of enmity that fill you with sorrow? Prahlad set aside his father, Vibhishana his brother, and Bharata refused the kingdom and even condemned his own mother's deed. Tuka says: the whole of dharma is the feet of Hari; every other remedy is the root of suffering.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram states the absolute priority of God over every other tie. Anything that blocks the way to God, even parents, even spouse and children and wealth, must be set aside, because these attachments so readily turn into sources of conflict and grief. He summons the great scriptural examples of devotees who chose God over family: Prahlad against his demon father, Vibhishana leaving his brother Ravana, Bharata rejecting the throne and his mother's scheme. The conclusion is his creed in one line: the whole of religion is simply the feet of Hari, and every substitute for that is where suffering begins.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Bundle up all honor and insult together and set them aside. This itself is the darshan of God: that contentment may abide. Where peace dwells, the march of Kala is halted. Says Tuka, whatever wave arises, bear it; only a little remains.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Take honor and insult, bundle them up together, and set the whole bundle aside. This itself is the sight of God: that contentment stays with you, always. Where peace has made its home, the march of Death itself comes to a halt. Tuka says: whatever wave rises up in you, just bear it. Only a little is left now.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes equanimity the very form of seeing God. Honor and insult, the two things that most toss the heart about, are to be tied up together and dropped, treated as one and the same. When that is done, an unbroken contentment remains, and that contentment, he says, is itself the darshan of God. Where such peace dwells, even Time and Death lose their power to hurry you along. His closing encouragement is practical and warm: when a wave of feeling rises, simply endure it without acting on it. You are nearly through; only a little remains.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Only a little remains, only a little, once the chitta endures. When neither elation nor resentment touch you, you are finished in Panduranga. This is the essence of all sadhana; no great search is needed. Says Tuka, see the world as unreal and abandon body-pride.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Only a little remains, only a little, once the mind has learned to endure. When neither elation nor resentment can touch you any longer, you are complete in Panduranga. This is the essence of all spiritual practice; there is no need to go searching far and wide. Tuka says: see the passing world for the unreal thing it is, and let go of pride in the body.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram distills the whole of sadhana into one quiet instruction. Once the mind can simply bear what comes, the journey is almost over; and the sign of arrival is that the great pair, elation and resentment, no longer move you. To be untouched by both is to be complete in God. He insists there is no need for elaborate seeking after that: the essence is this evenness, plus two things to release, the belief that the changing world is finally real, and pride in the body. Drop those, steady the mind, and the little that remains takes care of itself.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Open your eyes now; if you still do not understand, then a stone came wrapped in your mother's membrane. A treasure like this human body can fulfill all attainments; the saints, having awakened, crossed to the other shore. The boat stands at the bank of the Chandrabhaga, at Pundalik's door; with hands on His hips, He calls out urgently: come! Says Tuka, for nothing at all, clasp His feet; the crossing happens instantly, right then and there.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Open your eyes now. If you still do not understand, then it was a stone that came wrapped in your mother's womb, not a child. A human body like this is a treasure that can win every attainment; the saints, once awakened, used it to cross to the far shore. The boat is waiting on the bank of the Chandrabhaga, right at Pundalik's door, and God stands there, hands on his hips, calling out, come, come quickly. Tuka says: for no price at all, throw your arms around his feet. The crossing happens at once, right then and there.

WHAT IT MEANS

An urgent call to wake up while the chance is here. The harsh opening, that a person who still will not see is a stone and not a child, is meant to jolt. Tukaram prizes the human birth as a rare treasure, the one form in which liberation can actually be won, and the proof is the saints who used it to cross over. Then he paints Pandharpur as the waiting boat: God himself stands at the river, hands on hips, urgently waving the soul aboard. And the fare is nothing. Simply cling to his feet, and the crossing is not delayed for some future life; it is instant, here and now.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not cling; remain steady and still. Do not let the stain of mine-ness touch you. This is what is called true advaita, true knowledge of Brahman; without anubhava, all talk is mere babbling. Conquer the senses, destroy the vasanas, and let not even a sankalpa rise in the mind. Says Tuka, let no sense of separateness enter within; within, let there be the dwelling-place of bliss.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not cling. Stay steady and still. Do not let the stain of mine-ness touch you. This, and only this, is true advaita, the real knowledge of Brahman; without direct experience, all the rest is just babbling. Win mastery over the senses, let the deep cravings wear away, and do not let even a single wish rise up in the mind. Tuka says: let no sense of being separate enter the heart, and within, let bliss itself take up residence.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram defines genuine nonduality, and the definition is lived, not spoken. Real advaita is not a doctrine you can recite; it is non-clinging, stillness, and freedom from mine-ness, verified in direct experience. Without that experience, he says flatly, the grandest philosophy is mere babbling. He lists what it actually takes: mastery of the senses, the wearing-away of deep-seated cravings, a mind so quiet that not even a wish stirs in it. The goal is a heart with no trace of separateness left, in which bliss has simply moved in to stay. Knowledge that does not change the heart is only noise.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The glory of Pandhari is beyond all comparison. There is no place like it, where God meets you standing face to face. All other sacred places yield their fruit through time. Says Tuka, this is the marketplace of Vaikuntha, here upon the earth.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The glory of Pandhari is beyond anything you could compare it to. There is no other place like it, where God meets you standing right there, face to face. Every other holy place yields its fruit only slowly, over time. Tuka says: this is the marketplace of Vaikuntha, set down here on the earth.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram exalts Pandharpur above every other sacred place. Elsewhere the holy sites grant their blessings slowly, made to wait on time and merit; but here, he says, God stands openly and meets the devotee face to face, with nothing in between. His final image is characteristically down-to-earth: Pandhari is Vaikuntha, God's own heaven, set up as a marketplace on the ground, where the highest thing is available in the open, to anyone who comes. Heaven is not far off; it has set up shop where the poor can reach it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

At pilgrimage sites, stone and water. Among the saintly, God is ready cash. When you find the company of saints, offer your body to them wholly. At sacred places, faith alone bears fruit. Here, even the wayward is turned back to the path. Says Tuka, when sin departs, only then is the fever known.

IN PLAIN WORDS

At the pilgrimage places there is only stone and water. Among the saints, God is ready cash, here in your hand. When you find the company of the holy, give your whole self over to them. At the sacred sites, faith bears fruit only slowly; here, even the wayward person is turned back to the path. Tuka says: only once your sin has actually left you do you realize the fever it had been.

WHAT IT MEANS

One of Tukaram's most famous lines, and a quiet revolution in where God is found. The river-shrines, he says, hold only stone and water; the living God is found among the saints, and there he is not a distant promise but cash in hand, immediately spendable. So when you find such company, hold nothing back; give your whole self. Unlike the pilgrimage sites, where blessing comes slowly and only to the faithful, the company of the saints can turn even a wayward person around on the spot. And the proof is felt afterward: only when the fever of sin has lifted do you understand how sick you had been.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Wielding discus and mace, this alone is His hustle. He keeps His devotees close to His feet; the wicked He annihilates. The unmanifest took form, endowed with qualities. Says Tuka, to each as they are, Vitthal becomes.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Discus and mace in hand, this is the work he keeps busy with: he holds his devotees close at his feet, and he destroys the wicked. The unmanifest took on a shape, came into form with qualities you could see. Tuka says: to each person, just as they are, Vitthal becomes whatever they need.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes God as both protector and destroyer, and above all as endlessly adaptable to the devotee. Armed with discus and mace, the Lord's whole occupation is to shelter those who love him and to put down the cruel. The deeper wonder is that the formless Absolute consented to take a visible form, with attributes one could love and serve. And the closing line is the heart of it: Vitthal meets each person exactly where they are, becoming for each devotee whatever that devotee needs him to be. God is not a fixed remoteness but a presence shaped by love.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Seeing the preacher's beard, she weeps and sobs and wipes her nose. Her devotion seems genuine to onlookers, yet her inner feelings are entirely different. She cannot restrain herself; her mind keeps recalling the goat's hooves like anklets. What she cannot speak aloud: she fears a shortage of goats. Two horns, four legs: these are the signs she knows, nodding eagerly. When the goat comes to mind, she dies of restless craving. What was hidden in the heart has come to the lips at last. Says Tuka, crookedness always shows up plain as day.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Seeing the preacher's beard, she weeps and sobs and wipes her nose, and to everyone watching her devotion looks completely genuine. But inside, her feeling is something else entirely. She cannot help herself; the beard keeps reminding her of a goat's hooves. What she dare not say aloud is that she is worried there will be a shortage of goats to eat. Two horns, four legs, those are the signs she knows, and she nods along eagerly. The moment the goat comes to mind she is half-dead with craving. What was hidden in the heart has come out at the lips in the end. Tuka says: crookedness always shows itself plainly, sooner or later.

WHAT IT MEANS

A comic, merciless satire on counterfeit devotion. A woman at a religious discourse weeps so convincingly that everyone takes her for a great devotee, but the preacher's beard has only set her thinking of a goat, and the goat of dinner. Her tears are real; their cause is appetite, not love. Tukaram's point lands in the final line, one of his favorite themes: what is truly in the heart will eventually surface at the lips, and crookedness, however well performed, gives itself away in the end. He laughs, but the warning is serious. Display is no proof; only the heart's real object counts.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The stench of the wicked is like excrement; seeing them, keep far away. Listen, O good people: do not engage or quarrel with them. The wicked carry permanent ritual defilement; their speech flows like menstrual discharge. Fear the wicked as you would a rabid dog that lunges at anyone in sight. Keeping company with the wicked brings no good; exile from the very land is prescribed. Says Tuka, how much more can be said? The wicked person's very body is Kumbhipaka.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The stench of a wicked person is like the stench of excrement; the moment you see such a one, keep your distance. Listen, good people: do not get drawn into argument or quarrel with them. A constant defilement hangs about the wicked, and a ceaseless foulness pours out in their speech. Fear them the way you would fear a rabid dog that lunges at anyone in its path. No good ever comes of keeping their company; the old rule even prescribed banishing them from the land. Tuka says: what more is there to say? The very body of a wicked person is a hell.

WHAT IT MEANS

A strong warning about toxic company. Tukaram heaps up images of contamination, stench, foulness, a hell carried in the body, to make a single practical point: stay away. He is especially wary of argument; do not even engage, because the quarrel itself drags you down to their level. The rabid dog is the operative comparison: the danger is not that the wicked are evil in the abstract but that they lunge and infect indiscriminately, so distance is the only safety. The harshness is protective, aimed at the corrupting pattern. Guard your company, he says, as you would guard your health.

GATHA 0116 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the true outcaste

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He is no pure seed, that loud-mouth; know him as one cast out in spirit. The Vedas, the scriptures, the words of the wise, he holds none as authority. Says Tuka, like a sweet dish served with liquor, such a wretch is not to be touched.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The argumentative loudmouth is no pure seed; recognize him for what he is, an outcaste in spirit, whatever his birth. He treats neither the Vedas, nor the scriptures, nor the words of the wise as having any authority over him. Tuka says: he is like a sweet dish served alongside liquor. Do not touch him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns his definition of caste inward again. The real outcaste is not the low-born but the contentious man who recognizes no authority above his own opinion, not scripture, not the wise. Such a person is from a corrupt seed in spirit. The closing image is precise: a sweet dish set out with liquor is spoiled by the company it keeps, however good it looks; so the loudmouth's cleverness is poisoned by his refusal of all guidance. Stay away, not from his birth, but from his arrogance, which contaminates whatever it touches.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One whose words lack steadiness, whose resolve is never firm.

Do not seek the sight of such a one. Do not share the meal-row with the wicked.

One who slanders the saints and bows to the base out of greed.

Says Tuka, one thing in the belly, another on the lips.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A person whose words have no steadiness, whose resolve is never firm: do not seek out his company, and do not sit in the same meal-row with the wicked. He slanders the saints, and bows low to the base out of plain greed. Tuka says: one thing in his belly, and another thing altogether on his lips.

WHAT IT MEANS

A portrait of the double-minded man, and a warning to keep clear of him. His words are unreliable because his resolve is unsteady; his behavior is governed by appetite, so he will run down the genuinely holy while fawning on the powerful when there is something to gain. The mark Tukaram fixes on is the split between inside and outside, one thing in the belly, another on the lips, the very hypocrisy he hates most. To share even a meal-row with such a person, he suggests, is to absorb a little of that doubleness.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A thief teaches a thief only what he himself practices. Waste your steps trailing a wayward woman, you will become like her. Says Tuka, I fear what is already assigned ahead, and so this anxiety has arisen.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A thief can only teach another thief the trade he himself practices. Wear out your feet following after a wayward woman, and you will end up just like her. Tuka says: I am afraid of what lies ahead for me, and that is exactly why this anxiety has risen up in me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Two plain truths about influence, and then a startling turn inward. You become what you follow: a thief passes on only thievery, and trailing after the corrupt makes you corrupt. So far it is a warning about company. But the last line is pure Tukaram, the saint suspicious of himself: rather than congratulate himself for knowing better, he confesses that he too fears where his own steps might lead, and that this honest fear is the very source of his vigilance. The teaching about others becomes a reason for self-watchfulness.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

An old man was brought before the wedding canopy. He says, "Bring the whore! Burn the groom's face!" He does not know the occasion, or what serves this moment. Says Tuka, he is a genuine one, all right. Remove him from here.

IN PLAIN WORDS

An old man was led up to the wedding canopy, and he blurts out, bring the whore, set fire to the bridegroom's face. He has no idea what the occasion is, or what is fitting to say at this moment. Tuka says: he is a real specimen, this one. Take him away from here.

WHAT IT MEANS

A short, broad comedy about a man hopelessly out of step with the moment. Brought to a wedding, he shouts curses fit for nowhere, blind to where he is and what the hour calls for. Tukaram's eye is on the deeper failing: not knowing the samaya, the right thing for the right time. Wisdom is not only saying true things but saying the fitting thing in its proper place. The man who has lost that sense, however loud, only needs to be quietly removed. Behind the joke is a teaching about the discernment of the moment.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who eats without any daily discipline, he is a dog. One who wastes his humanness carrying burdens for nothing, he is an ox.

Such a one is a burden upon the earth, ignorant of the conduct his station demands. Having become a claimant to the family line, he sends his ancestors into terrible suffering.

One whose speech is forever inauspicious, who cannot speak truth even in a dream. There is no greater sinner than he; there is no other worse.

One who feeds only his own belly, who has no compassion for any living being, and who hounds the guest that comes to his door.

One who never worships the saints, for whom no pilgrimage ever comes to pass. He becomes an offering to Yama; great suffering he shall receive.

Says Tuka, such people have squandered their humanness. Forgetting God, they were lost the moment they clung to "I" and "mine."

IN PLAIN WORDS

A man who eats with no daily discipline at all is a dog. One who wastes his human birth hauling burdens for nothing is an ox. He is a weight on the earth, ignorant of how a human life should be lived, and by his conduct he drags even his ancestors into torment. His speech is forever foul; he cannot tell the truth even in a dream. There is no greater sinner anywhere. He feeds only his own belly, has no pity for any creature, and harasses the very guest who comes to his door. He never honors the saints, no pilgrimage is ever made. He becomes Death's own property, and great suffering awaits him. Tuka says: such people have thrown their humanness away. Forgetting God, they were lost the very moment they began to say, I and mine.

WHAT IT MEANS

A full catalogue of the wasted human life, building to its single root cause. Tukaram runs through the signs, no discipline, no compassion, foul speech, inhospitality, neglect of saints and of God, and at each step strips away the dignity of the human birth: such a person is a dog, an ox, a mere weight on the earth, Death's property. But the last line names the source of it all. Every item on the list flows from one thing: forgetting God and clinging to I and mine. The moment the self becomes the center, the humanness is already squandered. The whole portrait is the cost of that one forgetting.

आशाबद्ध नये करूं तें करिती । तुका म्हणे जाती नरकामधीं ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who sells daughters, cows, and sacred stories. He is the truly fallen one, that is his name. Virtue and vice are the only true measures; caste has nothing to do with God. Says Tuka, those bound by desire do what should never be done. They fall into hell.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who is the truly low one? Not the man born low. It is the man who sells what is holy: his daughter, his cow, even the telling of God's story. Your birth does not make you low. What you do makes you low. Good and bad are the only measure. Before God, caste counts for nothing. People ruled by their wants do what should never be done. Tuka says: they are the ones who fall.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram moves the idea of pollution off birth and onto conduct, keeping the harshest word in the language to do it. The truly defiled one, the real outcaste, is not the person born low but the one who turns sacred things into merchandise. What makes you low is what you do. Good and bad are the only measure, and before God a person's birth counts for nothing at all. Coming from a man whose own right to sing of God was attacked over his birth, this is less a tidy reform than a testimony; and his anger lands not on the low-born but on the desire-bound who know better and do worse.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Between Hari and Hara there is no difference; do not quarrel over this. Each dwells in the heart of the other, like sweetness within sugar. For the one who insists on division, even a single vowel mark brings ruin. Says Tuka, left side and right side are still one body.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Between Hari and Hara there is no real difference; do not waste breath quarreling over it. Each lives in the heart of the other, the way sweetness lives inside sugar. For the man who insists on dividing them, even a single vowel mark becomes a stumbling-block. Tuka says: the left side and the right side are still one body.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram steps into the old sectarian quarrel between the followers of Vishnu, called Hari, and Shiva, called Hara, and dismisses it. The two are not two; each dwells in the other as sweetness dwells in sugar, inseparable. The person who insists on a difference trips over the smallest thing, a single vowel mark, because his whole project is division for its own sake. The closing image settles it: left and right are different sides, but one body. To set the gods against each other is to fight one's own limbs.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

First, honor the speaker with sandalwood paste, flowers, and worship. Even if the listener be a renunciant, he does not deserve that same honor.

The head governs the whole body. As hands and feet serve their proper duty, so let all uphold the law of dharma in truth.

The anointed heir is cherished by all, yet even his father obeys the throne's command. Let everyone observe that rightful order.

A stone seated on the high altar must not be treated as ordinary. Other implements, even if made of gold, remain lowly beside it.

A golden anklet, however precious, is counted less than the jewel in the crown. Each ornament belongs to its own rightful place.

The servant earns honor for the sake of the master. The master's name is the servant's true wealth. Says Tuka: know this, O saints, and live accordingly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Honor the one who speaks of God first, with sandal paste and flowers and worship; even a renunciant in the audience does not claim that same honor. The head governs the whole body, and as the hands and feet each keep to their task, so let everyone uphold dharma in truth. The crown prince is cherished by all, yet even his father bows to the throne; let everyone keep that rightful order. A plain stone set on the high altar is no ordinary stone; beside it, even implements of gold rank lower. A golden anklet, precious as it is, counts for less than the jewel in the crown; each ornament has its own rightful place. A servant is honored for his master's sake; the master's name is the servant's true wealth. Tuka says: understand this, O saints, and live by it.

WHAT IT MEANS

An abhanga about rightful order and where honor truly belongs. Tukaram argues by a series of proportions: the speaker of God's word outranks even a renunciant listener; the head governs the limbs; the throne outranks even the prince's father; a stone on the altar outranks golden tools; the crown-jewel outranks the golden anklet. In each case worth is set not by the material but by relation to the sacred center. The conclusion ties it to devotion: a servant's dignity comes entirely from his master, and the master's name is his real wealth. Honor flows from nearness to God, and the saint who grasps this keeps everything in its proper place.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

His wife and children starve at home, yet he boasts of his greatness before the public.

If someone were taken to his house, what would they see? The shame-faced one would slip away to avoid them.

Says Tuka, we know the true measure of such a one. We are not the sort who can be deceived.

IN PLAIN WORDS

His wife and children are starving at home, and yet he goes about boasting of his greatness in public. Take someone back to his house and what would they find? The shame-faced man would slip away to avoid being seen. Tuka says: we know exactly what such a person is worth. We are not the kind who can be fooled.

WHAT IT MEANS

A short, sharp portrait of the hollow boaster, the man who performs importance abroad while his own family goes hungry at home. The test Tukaram applies is simple and merciless: would his public face survive a visit to his actual house? It would not, and so he avoids being seen there. The closing note is the satirist's confidence: such pretense fools the crowd but not the discerning, and Tukaram counts himself among those who can read the true worth behind the show. The gap between the public boast and the private reality is the whole of the man.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Johar, my lords and patrons! I have come as the village watchman to settle all accounts.

Clear your debts, past and future, or they will throw you in the stocks.

Do not slip away without presenting yourself. Tell me, master, who is the true owner of this house?

Today, patrons, break it all and settle it. Tomorrow, not a single moment is promised.

Says Tuka: empty words will not work here. At the end, they strip even the husk in the reckoning.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Johar, my lords and patrons. I have come, the village watchman, to settle all the accounts. Clear your debts, the old ones and the ones still to come, or you will be put in the stocks. Do not slip off without showing yourself; tell me, master, who is the real owner of this house? Settle it all today, my patrons, break it open and reckon it now, for tomorrow not a single moment is promised to you. Tuka says: empty words will not pass here. In the end they strip away even the husk in the reckoning.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes on the voice of the vesakar, the village watchman who calls out johar and comes to collect what is owed, and behind that voice stands Death and the final reckoning. The debts to be cleared are a life's deeds; the stocks are the consequence; the unanswerable question, who really owns this house, exposes how little of what we call ours is truly ours. The urgency is the heart of it: settle today, because tomorrow is not promised, and at the end the accounting is total, stripping away even the husk. He uses the lowly servant's role to deliver the highest warning.

Reckoning, the watchman's due

मराठी मूळ

येऊं द्या जी कांहीं वेसकरास । आंतून बाहेर वोजेचा घास ॥१॥

तुका म्हणे उद्यां लावीन म्हनेरा । जे हे दारोदारांभोंवतीं फिरा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let whatever comes be given to the watchman. A share of every load passing in and out is his due.

Whoever enters must not come empty-handed. Something given, something taken, every single time.

Says Tuka, tomorrow I will levy the fine on all of you who wander door to door.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let the watchman be given his share, a mouthful from every load that passes in or out. Whoever comes through must not arrive empty-handed; something given, something taken, every single time. Tuka says: tomorrow I will levy the fine on all of you who go wandering from door to door.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram stays in the watchman's voice. The watchman's customary due, a share of everything that moves through the village gate, becomes an image of the toll that life and death exact on all our comings and goings. No one passes free; every transaction carries its levy. And the closing line keeps the threat of the reckoning hanging over those who drift from door to door, busy with the world. Under the homely custom is the same teaching as the verse before it: an account is being kept, and a fine will be paid, on everything you do.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

While giving and taking went on, what was held in trust slipped away. The house was stripped bare.

What the raid seized cannot be recovered. A dark night swallowed it whole.

The thieves took everything. Not a thing was left behind.

They played their part in disguise, showed devotion on the surface, but the illusion had already departed from within.

One cannot even bear to look at the house now. It has all been deposited in the court.

Says Tuka, now no one can lay hands on it. What has come to pass is certain, and of it nothing more should be spoken.

IN PLAIN WORDS

While the buying and selling went on, the thing held in trust quietly slipped away, and the house was left stripped bare. What the raid carried off cannot be recovered; a dark night swallowed it whole. The thieves took everything and left nothing behind. They had played their parts in costume, showing devotion on the surface, but the substance had already gone from within. One cannot even bear to look at the house now; the whole matter has been deposited with the court. Tuka says: now it is in no one's hands to seize. What has happened is settled, and of it nothing more need be said.

WHAT IT MEANS

A dark, riddling poem about dispossession. On the surface it is a house emptied by thieves in the night while its keeper was busy trading; what was held in trust is gone, and only bare walls remain. Read inwardly, it is the stripping-away of everything the self falsely held, including a devotion that was all surface, costume without substance. The turn comes at the end: the emptied matter has been handed over to the court, deposited where no thief and no claimant can reach it. Whatever exactly was lost, it is now beyond anyone's grasp, settled and final, and Tukaram lets it rest in silence.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sages like Shuka and Sanaka raised their arms in triumph at what God did for Parikshit in seven days.

At the first cry of remembrance, God breaks into a run. He cannot hold His patience, not for a moment.

Such was His haste that He left Garuda behind, racing on foot to reach Draupadi in her hour of need.

Says Tuka, He is in a great rush always. His love for the devotee's love is deep, His greed for it boundless.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sages like Shuka and Sanaka raised their arms in wonder at what God did for Parikshit in just seven days. At the very first cry of remembrance, God breaks into a run; he cannot hold his patience even for a moment. So great was his haste once that he left his eagle Garuda behind and ran on foot to reach Draupadi in her hour of need. Tuka says: he is always in a great hurry. His love for the devotee's love runs deep, and his hunger for it knows no bound.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram celebrates God's sheer eagerness to come to those who call him. He gathers the famous stories, Parikshit saved in seven days, Draupadi rescued in the open assembly, to make one point: God does not wait to be coaxed. At the first remembrance he comes running, too impatient even to mount his eagle. The lovely reversal in the last line is that the God who needs nothing is pictured here as greedy, hungry for the devotee's love, in a hurry to receive it. The image turns the whole transaction of grace around: the Lord wants us more than we want him.

GATHA 0129 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the bitter neem

मराठी मूळ

बोललों तें कांहीं तुमचिया हिता । वचन नेणतां क्षमा कीजे ॥१॥
वाट दावी तया न लगे रुसावें । अतित्याई जीवें नाश पावे ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका म्हणे हित देखण्यासि कळे । पडती आंधळे कूपा माजी ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whatever I have spoken was only for your benefit. If my words fall short, please forgive me.

Do not resent the one who shows you the way. The transgressor perishes by his own willfulness.

Neem is given to cut the disease within. If you merely pamper and fondle the surface, the rot keeps spreading inside.

Says Tuka: only those with eyes can recognize what is truly good for them. The blind fall straight into the well.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever I have said was only for your good; if my words came out clumsily, please forgive them. Do not resent the one who shows you the road. The willful man destroys himself by his own stubbornness. Neem is given, bitter, to cut a disease at its root; pamper only the surface and the rot goes on spreading inside. Tuka says: only the one with eyes can see what is truly good for him. The blind walk straight into the well.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as the reluctant truth-teller, and asks not to be hated for it. Hard words, like bitter neem, are medicine meant to cut a disease at the root; soothing flattery only lets the rot spread unseen. So he begs forgiveness for any clumsiness even as he refuses to soften the substance, and warns that resenting the one who shows the way is self-destruction. The closing image is stark: real good can only be recognized by those willing to see, while the blind, those who will not, walk straight into the well. To accept correction is to have eyes.

GATHA 0130 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the monkey's fist

मराठी मूळ

माकडें मुठीं धरिलें फुटाणे । गुंतले ते नेणे हात तेथें ॥१॥
काय तो तयाचा लेखावा अन्याय । हित नेणे काय आपुलें तें ॥ध्रु.॥
शुकें नळिकेशीं गोवियेले पाय । विसरोनि जाय पक्ष दोन्ही ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे एक ऐसे पशुजीव । न चले उपाव कांहीं तेथें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A monkey grabs roasted grain in its fist. Its hand is stuck there, and it does not know it.

What fault can be laid upon it? It does not know its own good.

A parrot's feet are caught in a hollow stick. It forgets both its wings.

Says Tuka, some are animal-souled like this. No remedy avails them.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A monkey closes its fist around the roasted grain inside the trap, and then cannot pull its hand free, and does not even realize that it is its own grip that holds it. What blame can you lay on it? It simply does not know its own good. A parrot's feet catch on the little rolling perch, and in its panic it forgets it has two wings to fly with. Tuka says: some creatures are animal-souled like this, and for them no remedy works at all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Two famous images of self-made captivity. The monkey is trapped only by its own refusal to open its fist; let go of the grain and it is free, but it will not, and does not even see that the prison is its own grip. The parrot, feet caught on a spinning perch, forgets that its wings could lift it away at any moment. Both are pictures of the soul held not by the world but by its own clinging and its own forgetting. Tukaram's sober close admits a limit: some are so identified with the trap that no help reaches them. The only key was always to open the hand, or to remember the wings.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Hari, you are truly without attributes, and yet your Maya is exceedingly harsh. You do what has never been done, what no one else would dare.

You took Harishchandra's kingdom, his horses, all his glory, and delivered his wife and son to the house of the Domb.

You tore Nala from Damayanti and ruined their union. So the world knows, and so the Puranas attest.

King Shibi, compassionate to all creatures, you made him weigh his own flesh upon the scales.

Karna, bold on the battlefield, pierced by arrows in the fray, you knocked out even his teeth, demanding still more.

Bali, generous with everything he had, who raised his hand to give it all, you forced him into servitude and cast him into the netherworld.

At Shriyala's house, O Murari, you staged a sit-in and had his own child slain by his own hand.

Says Tuka, this is the fate of those who love you with all their being. There is no knowing what you will do next.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O Hari, you are truly beyond all qualities, and yet your Maya can be terribly hard; you do what has never been done, what no one else would dare. You took everything Harishchandra had, his kingdom, his horses, all his fortune, and set his wife and son to labor in an outcaste's house. You broke Nala and Damayanti apart and ruined their life together; the world knows it, and the Puranas say so. King Shibi, who was merciful to every creature, you made weigh his own flesh on the scales. Karna, brave on the battlefield, riddled with arrows, you knocked out even his teeth and still demanded more. Bali, who gave away everything he had with an open hand, you forced into servitude and pushed down into the netherworld. At Shriyala's house, Murari, you staged your sit-in and had the father slay his own child with his own hands. Tuka says: this is what becomes of those who love you with their whole being. There is no telling what you will do next.

WHAT IT MEANS

One of Tukaram's boldest and most unsettling abhangas, spoken with a lover's audacity. He recites the catalogue of God's greatest devotees, Harishchandra, Nala, Shibi, Karna, Bali, Shriyala, and points out that each was put through annihilating trial precisely because he loved God so completely. The formless, attribute-less Lord, he says, wields a Maya that can be merciless, doing to his closest ones what no one else would dare. It is not a complaint that turns away but a complaint that clings: he names the terror of the path honestly, that to love God wholly is to be tested past all bearing, and ends not in doctrine but in awe, there is no knowing what you will do next. Faith here includes the courage to say this aloud.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You have been set free. Now walk freely, and speak Vitthal's name at every turn.

You carry no sin whatsoever. When you take the Name, He comes to dwell beside you.

Ten million mortal sins, crores upon crores. The Name burns them all; it does not take even a moment.

What was done before, do not dwell on it. We stand surety for you.

Whatever deeds you are made to do, and however many Names you are asked to take.

Says Tuka: Death has no entry here. Flames issue forth and bar the way.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You have been set free; now walk loose and easy, and say Vitthal's name at every turn. It is as if you never had any sin at all: the moment you take the Name, he comes and lives beside you. Ten million deadly sins, crores upon crores of them, the Name burns the whole heap in less than an instant. Do not stay stuck on what you did before; we ourselves stand surety for you. Whatever deeds you are set to do, however many Names you are asked to take, take them. Tuka says: into this, Death has no entrance; flames leap up and bar his way.

WHAT IT MEANS

A poem of total reassurance built on the power of the Name. Tukaram tells the burdened soul it is already free: take Vitthal's name and God himself moves in beside you, so completely that it is as though no sin had ever been. Even an unimaginable mass of sins is burned away in a moment by the Name. He meets the one obstacle, guilt over the past, head on: do not dwell there, for we, the saints, stand surety for you. And he ends with a guarantee of safety: where the Name is, Death cannot enter, turned back by a wall of flame. The Name does not merely cleanse; it stands guard.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If a child calls its father "uncle," is the child not blameless?

Whatever the feeling, if it is sweet, Vitthal fulfills that wish.

If you call sugar a stone, does it not still taste sweet on the tongue?

Says Tuka: rough words, spoken truly, are no hollow husk.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When a small child calls its father uncle, is the child to blame for it? Whatever the feeling is, so long as it is sweet, Vitthal grants the wish behind it. If you call sugar a stone, does it stop tasting sweet on your tongue? Tuka says: rough, clumsy words, if they are spoken truly, are no empty husk.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reassures the unlearned and the inarticulate. A toddler who muddles its words and calls father uncle is innocent; the love is real even when the speech is wrong. So too with God: Vitthal answers the feeling, not the correctness of the address. Sugar stays sweet whatever you call it, and plain, rough words carry real substance when the heart behind them is true. The teaching guards devotion from the tyranny of correctness. God listens past the grammar to the love.

GATHA 0134 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, feeling is the salt

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे अवघें फिकें भावाविण । मीठ नाहीं अन्न तेणें न्यायें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What good is nearness if the chitta is not in it? By that same logic, a mother cow abandons her calf.

Sweet feels the talk of love, the breeze of affection, when the chitta merges wholly.

Says Tuka, without bhava all is tasteless. By that same logic, food without salt.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What is the use of being near someone if your heart is not in it? By that same logic, a mother cow would simply walk away from her calf. The talk of love is sweet, and the very breeze of affection is sweet, but only when one heart has merged into the other. Tuka says: without real feeling everything is flat and tasteless, the way food is when there is no salt in it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes feeling, bhava, the one thing that gives devotion its savor. Physical nearness is empty if the heart is absent; presence without love is like a mother who feels nothing for the calf at her side. What makes the language of love sweet is not the words but the merging of one heart into another. And the homely closing image fixes it: bhava is the salt of the spiritual life. Without it, every practice, however correct, is bland and lifeless. With it, even simple things become delicious.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What good are baths in the Ganga for one who is not pure within?

Like something half-cooked and spoiled inside, it yields no flavour in the cooking.

What good are tilak-marks and rosaries for one whose feeling is crooked?

Says Tuka, without love, all speaking is barking, all of it only weariness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What good are baths in the Ganga to a person who is not clean within? He is like food half-cooked and already spoiled inside, which yields no flavor however you cook it. What good are the tilak marks and the rosaries to someone whose heart is crooked? Tuka says: without love, all the talking is just barking, and the whole of it only wearies you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Another of Tukaram's attacks on outward religion empty of the inner thing. Sacred baths, forehead marks, prayer beads, all the visible apparatus, are worthless if the heart is impure or crooked; the spoiled ingredient cannot be saved by cooking. The standard, as always, is love. Without it, religious speech is mere noise, the barking of a dog, and it leaves you only tired. He is not against the outward forms as such; he is against mistaking them for the substance they are meant to express.

दुष्ट बुद्धि चोरी करी निरंतर । तो म्हणे इतर लोक तैसे ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे जया चित्तीं जे वासना । तयाची भावना तयापरी ॥३॥
काला चेंडुफळी - अभंग १००

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The scoundrel, that son of a whore, trusts no one. He cannot let his own wife out of sight.

The wicked mind steals constantly. He insists all other people do the same.

Says Tuka, whatever desire sits in one's chitta, one's perception is shaped accordingly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The scoundrel trusts no one at all; he cannot even let his own wife out of his sight. The thieving mind steals without pause, and then assumes that everyone else is stealing too. Tuka says: whatever desire is sitting in a person's heart, his whole way of seeing the world is shaped to match it.

WHAT IT MEANS

A sharp piece of psychology. The faithless man suspects everyone of faithlessness, the thief assumes all others are thieves, because each person reads the world through the desires that fill his own heart. Tukaram states the principle plainly: perception follows inner craving. We do not see the world as it is; we see it as we are. The unsettling corollary is that your suspicions and assumptions about others are a confession about yourself. To purify the seeing, you have to purify the heart behind the eyes.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Catch it! Catch it! Keep catching, over and over! Lose what is in your hand, and you pay with a blow to the back.

The ball of the three gunas, the hand flings it aside; whatever face lands up, the mind fixes its eye right there.

The bold one leaps and grabs it again and again from above; the quick one wins, the coward stumbles back and forth, bewildered.

What falls into the hand, no one lets you sit still with it; turn after turn they seize it, bending you forward as they go.

When the bad throw lands, you endure mountains of sorrow; a load rides your back, and the whole circle stands spinning around you.

Says Tuka: look at the joy of that rare one who breaks free. The one who wins today, time strips bare at one turn or another.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Catch it, catch it, keep catching it, throw after throw. Drop what is in your hand, and you take a blow on the back. The ball is made of the three gunas; the hand flings it up, and wherever its face lands, the mind fixes its eye right there. The bold one leaps and seizes it again and again from above; the quick player wins, the timid one stumbles back and forth, bewildered. Whatever you catch, no one lets you sit still and keep it; turn after turn they snatch it away, bending you double as they go. When the bad throw lands on you, you bear mountains of sorrow, a weight on your back and the whole ring spinning around you. Tuka says: look at the joy of that rare one who breaks free of the game. The one who wins today, time will strip bare at some turn or other.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns a children's ball-game into an image of life in the world. The ball is the play of the three gunas, the qualities that make up nature; the players scramble to catch and hold, but no one is allowed to keep anything, for the next turn snatches it away. Skill and boldness win a round, but every winner is eventually stripped by time. To be in the game at all is to be bent double under its weight and dizzied by its spinning. The one note of joy is reserved for the rare player who steps out of the game entirely. Worldly success is real but temporary; only escape from the whole contest is freedom.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Child, why won't you stand still and call out "I quit!"? Summon your nerve. Ashamed, you ducked and went under.

You were free and clear, so why did you fall on a bad throw? Now the weight of those on top will not come off.

Gathering the whole crowd, they seized each other all at once. One was grabbed while many more climbed on his back.

The one below comes up, the one on top goes down. Until you break free, you are tangled in this game.

Leave your spot and the next player grabs your hand. Whoever climbs will fall. Listen to these words.

Says Tuka: how long can you restrain your hands and feet? Better not to have played at all than end up under the pile.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Child, why will you still not stand still and call out, I quit? Find your nerve. Out of shame you ducked your head and went under. You were free and clear, so why did you let the bad throw catch you? Now the weight of all the players piled on top will not lift off you. They gathered the whole crowd and grabbed each other all at once; one was seized while many more climbed onto his back. The one underneath rises, the one on top sinks, and until you break loose you stay tangled in the game. Leave your place and the next player grabs your hand; whoever climbs will surely fall. Hear these words. Tuka says: how long can you keep your hands and feet under control in there? It would have been better never to have played than to end up crushed at the bottom of the pile.

WHAT IT MEANS

A companion to the ball-game poem, drawn from the rough children's game of climbing and pile-on. The world is that game: you were free, but shame and hesitation drew you in, and now you are pinned under the weight of everyone else's scrambling. The cruel logic of it is that positions constantly reverse, the one on top sinks, the one below rises, so there is no winning, only endless entanglement until you break free. Tukaram's blunt counsel: the wise move is to quit, to stand still and say I am out, and better still never to have joined the scramble at all. The only victory is non-participation.

Metaphor, the riddle of I and mine

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A riddle, a riddle, hear this riddle: so much is solved, yet tangled over a trifle.

I ask you, tell me: is this "I" and "mine" truly real? Do not be cross; if you cannot solve it, go ask your own mother.

I tell you the root of it: hold no grief in your heart. What lives, let it live; what dies, let it die. All is in the hands of destiny.

Says Tuka: let everyone abandon pride. Do not invite strife upon yourself for nothing.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A riddle, a riddle, listen to this riddle: so much of it gets solved, and then you stay tangled over one small thing. I ask you, tell me plainly: is this I and this mine actually real? Do not take offense; if you cannot work it out, go and ask your own mother. I will tell you the root of the matter, so hold no grief in your heart: let what lives go on living, let what dies die; it is all in the hands of destiny. Tuka says: let everyone set pride aside, and do not go inviting strife down on yourself for nothing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram poses the whole human problem as a riddle with one stubborn knot. A person may untangle a great deal and still stay caught on a single small thing, and that thing is the assumption I and mine. He asks, almost teasingly, whether that I and mine were ever real at all. His answer, the root of the riddle, is the counsel of equanimity and surrender: grieve over nothing, let living things live and dying things die, since all of it rests with destiny, not with you. And the practical key is to drop pride, the great defender of I and mine, and stop manufacturing conflict over what was never yours to control.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

That which never arose, I have revealed it, brothers. Now bolt the door and keep it pure with urgency.

Nothing remains now. I have seen myself, by myself.

Do not resent the price this earning commands here. None should sort or describe me against another.

Says Tuka: at every step, Krishna, wearer of the forest garland, victory to Him, and at the last, all at once.

Much merit is needed for this, the accumulated treasure of past births. When the worthy one arrives, it simply happens.

What are you waiting for, brothers? Dance with joy, seize this chance. Eat your fill and set something aside.

The happiness the eyes behold, let the chitta receive it too. Says Tuka, what then can poor Death do?

All the cowherd boys call out: come, let us share the feast! Let me see what provisions each of you has brought.

IN PLAIN WORDS

That which never came into being, brothers, I have shown it to you plainly; now bolt the door, and keep what you have found pure and unspilled. Nothing is left for me to do now. By myself, I have seen my own self. Do not resent the price this earning costs; do not measure me or rank me against anyone. Tuka says: at every step, Krishna, wearer of the forest garland, victory to him, and at the last, all at once. Much merit is needed for this, the saved-up treasure of many past lives; when the worthy one arrives, it simply happens of itself. What are you waiting for, brothers? Dance for joy and seize the moment. Eat your fill, and set something by. Let the heart receive the very happiness the eyes behold. Tuka says: then what can poor Death do to you? All the cowherd boys are calling, come, let us make the feast; let me see what provisions each of you has brought.

WHAT IT MEANS

A poem of arrival that opens into the cowherds' feast. Tukaram announces that he has realized and revealed the unborn reality, that there is nothing left for him to accomplish, and that he has seen his own true self by himself, needing no external measure or rank. Such realization, he adds, is not cheap; it rests on the merit of many lives, and ripens of itself when the soul is ready. Then the tone turns to celebration: dance, seize the moment, let the inner heart receive the joy the senses glimpse, and Death is left helpless. The closing call to bring provisions for the shared feast carries it into the kala, the communal mixing of all the cowherds' food, his image for the gathered devotees' joy.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not hold anything back, speak only the truth. Whoever cheats will himself be cheated; spin him around and let him face the consequences.

Without a full accounting, no one gives up what is theirs; everyone testifies against one another, and nothing is left free. Set aside the buttermilk and everything else: rice, bread, and curd. He who sits in the middle takes whatever comes and does not even have to ask for it to be brought.

One is in a hurry and opens his bundle too soon. Another is untying his knots while yet another is already walking away. One stands bearing a load and watches foolishly while accomplishing nothing. Some have already made up their minds and settled into their positions.

Some have tethered their cows, while others drive the strays. Some chase the wandering cattle, circling round and round. Some are so absorbed in grazing and fodder that they have forgotten to drink. One calls to another saying, let us go, while another lows like a longing cow.

Some have set the simple, innocent children on distant paths while they themselves are tangled at home, ruining garlands of flowers. They will not spend what they have tied up in their own knots but gladly consume whatever is served to them freely. Whatever is seized by force they drag along; the beast of burden dies under the load it is made to carry.

Some are entangled in the household by the snares of illusion and attachment, completely oblivious to any higher calling. Whatever stale provisions they had stored up from before, that is what they are now forced to eat. What was spent hand over hand is now gone, and only then does the loss become clear.

Some have tied cloths on hands and feet and smeared ash on their bodies. Some are shaven and shorn, their tuft of hair cleanly removed. Some are lazy, lying below while their armpits spread above. Without any real provisions, their cleverness has become a joke to everyone.

Says Tuka, now, O Krishna, distribute the shares among us all. You know well what each of us has and does not have. If you let us go, to whom shall we, your dependents, turn? O compassionate Lord, you have shown your grace; let us eat until our bellies are full.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hold nothing back, and speak only the truth: whoever cheats here will himself be cheated, and be spun round to face it. Until everyone gives a full account, no one will surrender what is his; each testifies against the other, and nothing passes free. Set out all of it, the buttermilk, the rice, the bread, the curd; the one who sits in the middle takes whatever comes, and need not even ask for it. One is in too much of a hurry and opens his bundle too soon; one is still untying his knots while another has already walked off; one just stands there bearing a load and accomplishing nothing; some have already settled smugly into their places. Some have tethered their cows while others chase the strays in circles; some are so lost in grazing they forget to drink. Some send the simple, trusting children off down distant roads while they themselves stay tangled at home, spoiling the very garlands of flowers; they will not spend what they have knotted away, but gladly eat whatever is served them free. Some are so caught in the snares of attachment that they never hear the higher call at all, and are left chewing the stale provisions they had stored; what was spent hand to hand is gone, and only then do they feel the loss. Some have tied cloths on their limbs and smeared their bodies with ash, some are shaven and shorn; the lazy lie about idle; and with no real provisions of their own, all their cleverness has become a joke. Tuka says: now, Krishna, divide the shares among us all. You know exactly what each of us has and has not. If you abandon us, where are we, your dependents, to go? You have shown your grace, O compassionate one; now let us eat until our bellies are full.

WHAT IT MEANS

A long, affectionate, satirical allegory of the spiritual community gathered for the kala, the cowherds' shared feast on the riverbank, with Krishna seated in the middle. Tukaram parades the types we all recognize: the hasty, the dawdling, the smug, the distracted, the miser who hoards his own and eats others' freely, the householder lost in attachment, the showy ascetic with ash and shaven head but no real substance. The demand at the start, hold nothing back, tell the truth, sets the terms: the feast is honest sharing, and cheating only cheats oneself. After all the human comedy, the poem ends in pure surrender: Krishna alone knows what each truly has, Krishna must apportion the shares, and his dependents have nowhere else to turn. The satire dissolves into trust, and everyone is fed by grace.

Seating them in a circle, Hari at the centre, He satisfies every one of them equally.

Whoever looks sees Him directly before them. He savours every kind of offering. With delight He catches in His hands the morsels they place at His mouth.

He speaks along with each one speaking, accepts whatever each one gives. Each knows only their own exchange; to all others, it remains unseen.

Says Tuka: God is jealous of His love for each. He lets no soul feel the slightest inequality.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He seats them all in a circle with Hari himself at the center, and he satisfies every one of them just the same. Whoever looks up sees him directly in front of their own face. He relishes every kind of offering, and delightedly catches in his hands the morsels they lift to his mouth. He talks with each one as they talk to him, and takes whatever each one gives; each knows only his own exchange with the Lord, and to all the others it stays unseen. Tuka says: God is jealous in his love for each one, and he lets not a single soul feel even the smallest inequality.

WHAT IT MEANS

A tender picture of God among his devotees at the feast, and a quiet resolution of a hard question: how can God love everyone fully at once? Tukaram shows him seated at the center of the circle, yet directly facing each devotee, talking privately with each, accepting each one's offering, so that every devotee has God wholly to himself and never sees the others' share. The lovely phrase is that God is jealous of his love for each, guarding it so that no one ever feels less loved than another. Divine love is not divided among many; it is given whole to each, all at the same time.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Living so close to Him, we have come to know things just as they are. Nothing is hidden in Kanhoba's heart.

Their own desires torment them, each according to their longing. The witness of karma watches this play with wonder.

He plays the game yet never falls into penalty. The burden rests where it belongs. Some fall into penalty; some solve the riddle.

Says Tuka: the cowherd holds the morsel in His hand and gives to each a share matching their strength.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Living so close to him, we have come to see things just as they truly are: there is nothing hidden in Kanhoba's heart. People are tormented by their own feelings, each according to his own craving, while the one who witnesses all action looks on at the play with delight. He plays the game himself and yet never takes a penalty; the burden always rests exactly where it belongs. Some fall into the penalty, and some solve the riddle and go free. Tuka says: the cowherd holds the morsel in his hand and gives to each one a share that matches his strength.

WHAT IT MEANS

From the intimacy of the feast, Tukaram reports what closeness to God reveals: God hides nothing, and the suffering people feel is produced by their own cravings, not imposed from outside. God himself is the witness who plays in the game of the world yet never incurs its penalties, because the weight of each action stays with the one who did it. So in the game some are caught and some win through, strictly by their own doing. And the feast-image makes the justice gentle as well as exact: like the cowherd handing out food, God gives each soul a portion matched to its capacity. The system is fair, and it is also kind.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Having finished all their tasks, the cowherd boys gathered together. The hour had come, and they said, bring out the provisions.

They gave their accounting of the day, and the cows were settled in the enclosures. The pot-bellied, lisping, bent one, Hari himself, joins the circle.

Each one, according to his own liking, had bound up his bundle; Krishna sorted through them and mixed the sweetest portions into the common pile.

They had carried the weight on their shoulders all morning, and now that the group had finally assembled, every burden was set down.

The one who is too eager draws the anger of his friends: why this crooked pretense of yours here?

Through the exchange of words between one and another, they were all filled with the bliss of Brahman. Says Tuka, come, let us bow to these songs of Hari.

On the banks of the Yamuna, among the cowherd boys, the wearer of the forest garland says: bring all your provisions, let us feast together today.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Their work all finished, the cowherd boys gathered together, and when the hour came they called out, bring out the provisions. They gave their account of the day, and the cows were settled in their pens; and the pot-bellied, lisping, slightly bent little one, Hari himself, joined the circle. Each boy had tied up his bundle to his own taste, and Krishna sorted through them all and mixed the sweetest portions into the common heap. They had carried their loads on their shoulders all morning, and now that the whole company had assembled, every burden was set down. Anyone too greedy and grasping draws his friends' annoyance: why this crooked pretending here? And simply through their talk with one another they were all filled with the bliss of Brahman. Tuka says: come, let us bow to these songs of Hari. On the bank of the Yamuna, among the cowherd boys, the garlanded Lord says: bring all your bundles, and today let us make the feast together.

WHAT IT MEANS

The kala itself, the scene Tukaram loves: Krishna as one of the cowherd boys, pot-bellied and lisping and crooked-limbed, sitting in the ring while everyone pools the food they carried all morning. The detail that matters is what Krishna does with the bundles: he mixes them, drawing the sweetest from each into one common heap, so that the feast belongs to all and to no one alone. Burdens carried in isolation are set down once the company gathers; grasping and pretense are gently mocked; and ordinary fellowship, just the boys talking together, becomes the bliss of Brahman. It is Tukaram's picture of the sangha, the company of devotees, where what each brings is shared, sweetened, and turned into joy by the Lord in their midst.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Gather everything into one place, and let me taste it all. What I have with me, I will also put in among yours.

The cowherd boys say, wonderful, wonderful, and they blow their shehnais and flutes in delight. The bundles tied to sticks are all opened up and merged into one heap. Krishna makes the feast and distributes the shares to his friends.

One after another, each stretches out his hand and opens his mouth. The round morsel of food, the flute's note, each brings a joy that seems to grow ever greater. They say, how delicious this has become, give us more, our bellies are not yet full.

He brings a morsel toward his own mouth, and others gape with longing. He eats it himself and teases them with playful gestures. They seize him in an embrace, and he runs; they chase him, catch him, and pull the food from his very lips and eat it.

They say, what a trickster you are, Krishna. He stuffs a bite into someone's mouth and fills another's cheeks, then the clever one runs and they all chase after him. He eats from everyone's share, and they cry, O Krishna, my dear mother. The gods above sigh with longing, saying, alas, we are denied this joy.

One slaps another on the back, the rump, the face. The commotion is too much for Hari; he says, enough now. He comes pleading, for even the Lord cannot bear so much roughhousing; he says, let us now play properly and tells them the rules.

In circles of joy they place Hari in the center. Some blow shehnais, some low like calves, some stamp and clap. The crooked, the lisping, the stumpy, the lame, the stumbling ones, all are beloved to Krishna, for they are the most devoted.

He delights in seeing their faces and feels such happiness that he laughs out loud. Each eats from the other's leftovers without any disgust; even the shy ones He has made bold through His own company.

Whoever is still hungry, He opens their mouth and feeds them. Hari gives equal joy to everyone. They say, well done, well done, Hari. Your company is truly the best. Even if you try to lead us astray now, we will not go with anyone else.

The cows forget their grazing, the birds and beasts grow still. The waters of the Yamuna stop flowing and stand motionless. All the gods watch from above, swallowing their saliva, saying, blessed are these cowherd boys; shame upon us.

They say, what shall we do? Let us become fish in the Yamuna to receive the remnants. The heavenly hosts crowd the banks of the Yamuna, and all the while, Krishna smacks his lips all the more.

In bliss, the Lord of the Gopis plays on. They say, let no one wash their hands in the Yamuna. They say, He knows the heart's secret; shame has no place here. The remnants of Krishna are a gain of the highest honor.

Blessed is this day and hour; the cowherd boy has graced us. They say, we are satisfied, fulfilled by your own hand. The friends are delighted in one another's love. Today we have eaten our fill of curd and rice in abundance.

Your company is the best; grant it to us every day. Let us live this way forever, O God. Then the wearer of the forest garland says, pick up your sticks and blankets. Now let us go merrily together to graze the cows.

Says Tuka, they were so full of love that none could bear to walk. The cows and the cowherd boys were made equal to God Himself. Today there is pure bliss. Today there is pure bliss. The supreme joy walks along with us.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Gather it all into one place, Krishna says, and let me taste it; and what I have brought, I will put in among yours too. Wonderful, wonderful, cry the cowherd boys, blowing their flutes and horns in delight. The bundles tied to their sticks are all opened and poured into one heap, and Krishna makes the kala and hands out the shares to his friends. One after another they stretch out a hand and open a mouth; each morsel, each note of the flute, seems sweeter than the last. Delicious, they cry, give us more, our bellies are not full yet. He carries a morsel toward one mouth and teasingly eats it himself, pulling faces; he hugs one boy and runs, and they chase and catch him and feed him from their own lips. Rascal Kanha, they laugh, and he eats from every hand. The gods looking down sigh, alas, we have missed this joy. The cows forget to graze, the birds and beasts go still, even the Yamuna stops flowing to watch. Blessed are we, the cowherds say, fed today by your own hand; today there is joy, today there is joy, and the highest bliss itself walks home with us. Tuka says: so filled with love they can barely walk, the cowherds, and God among them, turn back at last to tend the cattle.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram's fullest painting of the kala, the cowherds' shared meal on the riverbank, and his image of the saints' fellowship with God. The heart of it is the mixing: every boy's bundle is poured into one heap, and Krishna both serves the feast and joins it, eating from each hand, teasing, chased and caught and fed in turn. There is no rank and no leftover too low to eat; the sharing itself is the bliss. Even the gods envy it, and nature holds still to watch. What he celebrates is not a solemn rite but a romp of love, in which God is not the honored guest at the head of the table but a playmate in the middle of the ring, and the joy of the company is itself the highest bliss, walking home with them at dusk.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Come, come, let us all go and see the celebration in Vrindavan today.

The cowherd boy has played His flute and that sound falls upon our ears; the chitta cannot hold still, the mind has grown restless.

Set aside whatever work remains; do not let anything delay you. This is the very moment I know, the time for meeting Krishna.

My eyes will be cooled just by gazing upon His blessed face. Let the household scold as they will; we shall endure the harsh words.

Nothing that stands between us and meeting Krishna holds any appeal. Let the world talk, let shame be what it may; the chitta has grown utterly indifferent to it all.

One by one they set out, calling to others to join them. Says Tuka, the Lord, through His beauty, has made them all absorbed in Him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Come, come, all of you, let us go and see the festival in Vrindavan today. The cowherd has played his flute, and the sound has fallen on our ears; the heart will not stay still, the mind has gone restless. Drop whatever work is left, let nothing hold you back: this is the very hour I have been waiting for, the time to meet Krishna. My eyes will be cooled just by looking on his face; let the people at home scold me, I will bear their hard words. Nothing that stands in the way of meeting Krishna holds any charm for me now; let the world talk, let shame be what it will, my heart has turned away from all of it. Tuka says: all at once they set off, calling to one another, and God made them one with his own form.

WHAT IT MEANS

The gopis hearing Krishna's flute, which is Tukaram's image for the irresistible call of God. The sound makes the heart unable to keep still; work, propriety, the family's scolding, the world's opinion, all of it suddenly weighs nothing against the one chance to meet the beloved. He captures the moment devotion crosses a threshold: the seeker stops counting the cost and simply goes. And the close names the result, the gopis became one with God's own form. To answer the flute completely is not merely to reach God but to be made into him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Fugadi, fu! Fugadi! When you play it openly, all is laid bare. Cast off shame and look each other straight in the eye.

Fugadi breaks everything, breaks it all; only then does the sweetness come; only then is the bond of worldly life truly severed.

Whatever you learned before and stored in your belly, bring it now to your lips and speak it aloud.

The braid of the three gunas flies loose behind you; gather it up and tie it firm at the mulabandha, the root-lock.

The one who takes the bolder step wins outright and earns the respect of all three worlds.

Says Tuka, let there be one bhava between you and me; with equal and balanced steps, let us together reach the highest place.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Fugadi, fu! When you whirl the fugadi out in the open, everything is laid bare; cast off shame, and look each other straight in the eye. The fugadi breaks everything, breaks it all to pieces, and only then does the sweetness come, only then is the knot of worldly life cut through. Whatever you learned long ago and stored away inside, bring it now to your lips and say it aloud. The braid of the three gunas flies loose behind you; gather it up and tie it tight at the root-lock. Whoever takes the bolder step wins outright and earns the honor of all three worlds. Tuka says: let there be one single feeling between you and me, and balanced, matched together, we will rise to the high place.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the fugadi, the women's spinning game where two clasp hands and whirl until dizzy, into an image of ecstatic devotion. The whirl strips away shame and pretense, breaks the ordinary world to pieces, and only in that breaking does the sweetness come and the bond of samsara snap. He weaves in the language of yoga, the loosened braid of the three gunas tied off at the root-lock, the mulabandha, so the spinning is also a discipline. And the goal is union: one shared feeling between the two players, perfectly matched, lifting both to the highest place. The game is the path: let go, whirl, break, and rise together.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Fugadi, fu! You are my co-wife, O rival. You have defecated on yourself; wash your face and your backside.

As she played the fugadi, Hari came along; rise now, O bride of the Lord of the world.

Hands and legs go limp, and as the backside drags, it gathers dust.

Five and seven more were brought along by Hari; how long can you last without them, girl?

Your breath is spent, your legs have given way; why do you still try to spin around?

Says Tuka, even now, do what you have been told, you she-donkey.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Fugadi, fu! You are my co-wife and my rival. You have fouled yourself; go and wash your face and clean up. As she spun the fugadi, Hari came along: rise now, bride of the Lord of the world. Her hands and legs go limp, and her dragging body gathers dust. Hari has brought five or seven others along; how long can you hold out without them, girl? Your breath is spent, your legs have given way; why do you still go on spinning? Tuka says: even now, do the thing you were told to do, you stubborn fool.

WHAT IT MEANS

A rough, comic fugadi-taunt in the idiom of village women's games, where rivals jeer at each other across the spinning. Read as allegory, it is the contest between the soul's flagging lower nature and the resolve that would hand it over to God: the exhausted, soiled, stubborn player is the worldly self, spun out and unable to keep up, taunted to give in and do at last what it was told. Hari arriving in the middle of the game changes everything; the only sane move left is surrender. Tukaram keeps the coarse playground voice on purpose; the teaching wears motley, but it is the familiar one, stop your futile spinning and obey.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Toss, toss the ball! The root-lock is the waistband, and bhava is the wager. Now watch my turn.

Hand to hand she was caught and lost her sense of self. My resolve is firm; drop your feeble words.

Let Hari accept you; do not fall into the cycle again. Hold your dignity, you shameless one; the world will beat a shameless woman.

Sit behind your bhava and listen to my counsel. Give up the commotion you have made; fix your longing here instead.

Turn your back on the world's sway and restrain your speech. You have scattered yourself, child; ahead lies only ruin.

Now stand firm in your place and look straight ahead. Do not become a sow, or next a donkey, or a bitch.

Nama proved himself true, and I did well for myself. Says Tuka, the rest of the girls were scattered and lost.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Toss it, toss the ball! The root-lock is your waistband, and your wager is bhava itself. Now watch how I take my turn. Hand to hand she was caught, and she lost her sense of being a separate self. My resolve is firm; drop your feeble talk. Let Hari take you up; do not fall back into the cycle again. Hold your dignity, you brazen one, for the world beats down the shameless. Sit close behind your bhava and listen to my counsel: give up the uproar you have raised, and fix your longing here instead. Turn your back on the world's pull and rein in your speech; you have scattered yourself, child, and ahead lies only ruin. Now stand firm in your place. Do not make yourself a pig, a donkey, a stray dog. Nama made his own portion good and true. Tuka says: the others only scattered the girls and lost them.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram coaches the soul as a player being taught the game, with the ball-toss as the discipline and bhava, devotion, as the stake. The instruction is concrete: bind yourself at the root-lock, wager your feeling, and in the catching lose the sense of a separate self. He urges the wavering player to let Hari take her up rather than fall back into the round of births, to drop the noise and fix her longing in one place, to stand firm and not degrade herself. He names Namdev as the one who played his turn truly and well, against the many who only scattered and lost. The game is salvation, and it rewards firmness, single feeling, and surrender.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even with a thousand mouths, Hari exhausted Shesha in the telling.

He leapt with the ball into the Yamuna and subdued the serpent Kaliya by pushing him under.

Drinking the impure without a trace of pity, you even killed your own maternal aunt Putana.

You destroyed the entire house of Ravana and slew his wives and children.

We know your ways well; you even killed your own maternal uncle Kamsa.

Whoever plays with you meets great destruction; Tuka's Lord is Sarangadhara, the bearer of the bow.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even with a thousand mouths, the serpent Shesha wore himself out trying to tell it all. You leapt into the Yamuna after the ball and forced the serpent Kaliya under. You drank the poisoned milk without a flicker of pity and killed even Putana, who came to you as an aunt. You sank the whole house of Ravana and slew his wives and children. We know your ways well enough: you killed even Kamsa, your own mother's brother. Whoever plays this game with you meets great destruction. Tuka's Lord is Sarangadhara, who bears the bow.

WHAT IT MEANS

A teasing, almost alarmed recital of Krishna's destructive feats, framed as a warning to anyone who would wrestle with God. Kaliya subdued, Putana killed, Ravana's house sunk, Kamsa slain, even kin not spared: to play with this Lord is to be undone. But the destruction Tukaram means is the annihilation of the ego, the false self that cannot survive contact with God. The poem belongs with the wrestling abhangas: it sounds like a list of dangers, and it is, for the separate I. To take God on is to lose, and the losing is the liberation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Take a turn with me, boy; I will seize your lower gate. Boy, let us wrestle, let us wrestle. Take the match with me, and guard yourself above and below. Only then may you challenge me, boy, if there is real warmth of kinship between us. When we wrestle together, the sense of I and you is destroyed. Tuka says: those who keep company with Tuka, Hari moves into their life and annihilates the separateness in their soul.

WHAT IT MEANS

The wrestling match as union with God, and the destruction it requires. To grapple with God is to put your whole self in his grip, above and below, and the only ones who dare are those bound to him by real kinship-love. The outcome is stated plainly: in the wrestling, the sense of I and you is destroyed, and whoever truly engages can never go back to his old separate life, because nothing of the separate self survives the contact. Tukaram extends the promise to his own company: keep company with him, and Hari enters and annihilates the last separateness in the soul. Love is not safe; it is a grip that ends the self.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let us wrestle, boy, let us wrestle! In wrestling, the child was thrown and now wanders through eighty-four lakh births.

In the first watch, it entered the arena of form, taking its turn with the chant "Soham, Soham." But seeing its companions, it forgot everything and fell under the throw of its own doing.

In the second watch, it wrestled with great delight, following one rhythm after another. As the day grew long, everything seemed sweet, but the child did not know what lay ahead.

In the third watch, it took its turn, and pride made its footing unsteady. Strain as you will, you shall fall; know this to be the certain truth.

In the fourth watch, you wrestle with trembling hands and feet. The son of Surya the village headman, Yama, has caught you in his throw.

Says Tuka, the wrestling frightened me, and so I abandoned the way of my companions. There is one boy of the Yadava clan, Vithoba, and I tend the cows in His company.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let us wrestle, boy, let us wrestle. In the wrestling the child was thrown, and now it wanders through the eighty-four lakh births. In the first watch it stepped into the ring and took its turn with the chant Soham, Soham; but the moment it saw its playmates it forgot everything and was thrown by its own move. In the second watch it wrestled with great delight, in one rhythm after another; as the day lengthened it all seemed sweet, but the child had no idea what was coming. In the third watch it took its turn, and pride made its feet unsteady; strain as you will, you are going to fall, know this for certain. In the fourth watch, as it wrestles, its hands and feet begin to tremble; the son of the Sun, Yama himself, throws it to the ground. Tuka grew afraid of this wrestling and let go of the players' company; and Vithoba, one child of the Yadava clan, grazes the cattle at his side.

WHAT IT MEANS

The wrestling match stretched across the four watches of a day, which are the four ages of a life. The soul enters awake, chanting Soham, I am That, but is distracted by its playmates, the world, and thrown by its own doing; the middle of life feels sweet and goes on heedless; pride unsteadies it; and in the last watch, with the body trembling, Yama, son of the Sun, throws it down. The whole game ends in the wheel of rebirth. Tukaram's escape is the telling detail: frightened by the match, he simply left the company of the players, and found Vitthal, one of the cowherds, grazing cattle apart from the game. The way out of the contest is to leave it for God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In our house there is one milch cow whose yield overflows beyond the three worlds.

Her hide is dark; her name is Shridhara. She grazes across all fourteen realms.

She has no calf, yet she follows anyone at all; whoever caresses her with devotion receives her nourishing abundance.

From her four teats flows immeasurable milk that has satisfied Sanaka and all the sages and perfected beings.

Says Tuka, what is my hunger before her? This mother cow nourishes all three worlds.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In our house there is a single milch cow whose flow of milk cannot be contained by the three worlds. Her color is dark, and her name is Shridhara; she grazes across all fourteen realms. She has no calf of her own, yet she follows anyone at all, and whoever strokes her with devotion receives her overflowing nourishment. From her four teats pours immeasurable milk that has fed Sanaka and all the sages and perfected ones. Tuka says: what is my small hunger before her? This mother nourishes all three worlds.

WHAT IT MEANS

A riddling poem of pure abundance. The dark milch cow whose milk overflows the worlds is God himself, named Shridhara, the dark Krishna; she belongs to no one and follows anyone who strokes her with love, giving without limit. The four teats suggest the inexhaustible sources of grace, enough to have fed the greatest sages. Against such overflow, Tukaram says, his own hunger is nothing; the mother who nourishes all three worlds will hardly be troubled to feed one more. The image turns God from a distant lord into a homely, generous mother-cow in the devotee's own yard, whose only condition is a loving touch.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have made the grain ready for pounding, and pure understanding is my companion at the stone. Keep this in mind, and wake me in the last watch of the night. Strike even, balanced blows, my friend, until I have merged completely into you. One sifts, another winnows, and the third picks out the pure essence with nothing left over. When the pounding is finished, prepare the sacred dish, and let the seasoning be milk and sugar together. Uddhava and Akrura, the two brothers, will wait at table, and the father, Narayana, is the one who will eat. Tuka says: I long so for my mother's home that I have hurried to send for it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes the women's grindstone-song, sung in pairs before dawn, and makes the whole chore a figure for spiritual practice. The grain is the self; pure understanding is the working partner; the even, balanced blows are steady discipline, continued until the grinder merges into the one she works with. The threefold sifting, winnowing, and separating is discernment, parting the pure essence from the chaff. The end is a dish cooked for God: Narayana himself is the diner, attended by his devotees. And the longing that drives the whole pre-dawn labor is the soul's homesickness for its true home, the mother's house, which here is God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the quiet hours, pound the grain while singing the ovi of Narayana, and the chaff will separate from the grain on its own.

Grip the pestle firmly and steady yourself; then strike measured blows.

The bangles ring out in the anahata, the unstruck celestial sound; let us sing the songs of our mother's home.

While pounding the grain, no share of the labor feels like weariness, not until the sense of "you" and "I" is completely winnowed away.

Says Tuka, the form appears in the mirror, and the cooking is done as pure as that reflection.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the quiet hours, pound the grain while singing the ovi of Narayana, and the chaff will fall away from the grain on its own. Grip the pestle firmly, steady yourself, and bring the blows down measured and even. The bangles ring out as the anahata, the unstruck celestial sound, and we sing the songs of our mother's home. While the grain is being pounded, no part of the labor feels like weariness, not until the sense of you and I has been completely winnowed away. Tuka says: the form appears clear in the mirror, and the cooking comes out as pure as that reflection.

WHAT IT MEANS

Another grindstone allegory, this one fixed on sound and effortlessness. To pound the grain while singing God's name turns the chore into japa, and then the chaff, the impurity, separates by itself, without forcing. The ringing of the worker's bangles becomes the anahata, the unstruck inner sound heard in deep meditation. The remarkable claim is that the labor stops feeling like labor; it is weariless right up to the moment the sense of you-and-I is winnowed out, which is the goal. And when the heart is clear as a mirror, the result, the cooked dish, the finished self, comes out pure. Work done as remembrance ceases to tire and ends in clarity.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Having sifted the pure portion, you filled the tray. But then you ground everything coarsely and ruined the Name.

Sift it clean, O my friend; why, O sinful one, have you spoiled the preparation?

Look carefully into the winnowing tray at what has been opened; what was whole has been destroyed by the storm of worldliness.

All is still there in the tray, and it is in your hands alone. Whether the flour is fine or coarse depends on how you grind.

Look into the tray and pick out the firm, whole grains. By mixing everything together like a she-donkey, you have ruined it all.

While grinding, the stones clash; can you not see or hear what is happening?

Says Tuka, just look carefully into the tray; without effort, the result is there, or else you will slip into the crack and be lost.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You had sifted out the pure portion and filled the tray, and then you ground it all coarsely and ruined the Name. Sift it clean, my friend; why, you foolish one, have you spoiled the whole preparation? Look hard into the winnowing tray at what has been opened up: what was whole has been wrecked by the storm of worldliness. It is all still there in the tray, and it is entirely in your own hands; whether the flour comes out fine or coarse depends only on how you grind. Look into the tray and pick out the firm, whole grains; by mixing everything together like a fool you have ruined the lot. It strikes against you as you grind, so why can you not see it? Have your eyes and ears gone? Tuka says: handle the tray with care, take the trouble, or you will fall straight into the crack.

WHAT IT MEANS

A scolding grindstone-allegory about the work of discernment. The pure grain carefully sifted is the truth, or the Name, already grasped; grinding it carelessly, mixing whole and broken together, ruins it, and the storm of worldliness is what wrecks what was once whole. Tukaram's insistence is that the outcome is entirely in your own hands: fine flour or coarse, a saved life or a spoiled one, depends only on how attentively you do the work. Pick out the sound grains; do not lump everything together in a hurry. The error keeps knocking against you as you go, so the only excuse for missing it is willful blindness. Do the work of discrimination with care, or fall through the gap.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How shall I tell you the joy of pure grinding, dear sister? Let me satisfy you with this.

Pure flour, well ground, is quickly ready; when all eight limbs turn with the quern, the whole being is cooled.

When you eat what is pure, both body and mind are nourished; only a little fuel is needed for such a fire.

The cooking of the pure is well seasoned and excellent; it never grows stale and knows no destruction.

Says Tuka, purity is loved by all, and the Beloved never separates Himself from such a soul.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Dear sister, how can I tell you the joy of pure grinding? Let me satisfy you with it. Flour ground clean is ready quickly; when all eight limbs sway with the quern, the whole body grows cool. Eat what is pure, and both body and mind are nourished; such a fire needs only a little fuel. The cooking of the pure is well seasoned and good; it never goes stale, and it never perishes. Tuka says: everyone loves what is pure, and the Beloved never parts from such a soul, not for the life of him.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a grinding song, the kind women sang at the quern, but Tukaram makes the grindstone an image of inner work. "Pure grinding" is purity of effort and devotion: when the whole body bends to it, the eight limbs all engaged, the result is cooling, nourishing, and lasting. The fire of such purity needs little fuel and its food never goes stale, unlike worldly things that spoil. The poet's claim lands in the last line: God himself will not separate from a soul that is pure, so the work at the stone is really the work of becoming someone the Beloved will never leave.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let us be born again and again, so that we may share the feast of curd and rice together.

In Vaikuntha there is nothing like the morsel of this communal meal.

Let us feed one another mouth to mouth and play together with joyful cries.

Says Tuka, the sandy riverbank of Pandharpur is beautiful, level, and perfect.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let us be born again and again, so we can eat the shared meal of curd and rice together. There is nothing like this in Vaikuntha, not a single morsel of the communal feast. Let us feed one another, mouth to mouth, and call out together with joyful cries. Tuka says: the sandy bank of Pandharpur is lovely, level, and the best place of all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks in the voice of Krishna's cowherd companions, sharing the simple kālā, the mixed meal of curd and rice eaten together on the riverbank. The startling wish is to be reborn over and over, not to escape rebirth, just to keep this fellowship of feeding and laughter with Krishna. Against that, even Vaikuntha, the highest heaven, has nothing to offer: liberation itself is less sweet than this shared morsel. The closing line transfers the scene to Pandharpur's sandbank, telling the listener that the same companionship with God is available right here, on this earth, among devotees.

If you wish to come, then come along, all of you, follow close behind me.

Today I will feed you to your heart's content, until you yourselves say, enough.

Walk softly, softly, and let no one speak a word to anyone.

Says Tuka, abandon your scheming and do not stuff your bellies with that.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If you want to come, then come, all of you, follow close behind me. Today I will feed you to the full, until you yourselves say enough. Walk softly, softly; let no one speak to anyone. Tuka says: drop your scheming, and do not fill your bellies with that.

WHAT IT MEANS

Krishna calls his cowherd friends to follow him to a hidden feast where he will satisfy them completely, until they themselves cry enough. The conditions are simple: come close behind him, move quietly, and stop talking among yourselves. The final line names the catch. "Filling the belly with scheming" is the trap; if you come stuffed with your own clever plans, there is no room for what he wants to give. Read inwardly, this is the call to follow God in silence and self-emptying, dropping the calculating mind so that grace can fill you instead.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He hung the swing up high, and I climbed above the other three.

You two, stand on either side with your mouths open wide, O friends.

The streams of milk are flowing; catch them at both ends.

Says Tuka, He holds the rope-end in His hand and does not let anyone receive more or less than their share.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He hung the swing up high, and I climbed above the other three. You two, stand on either side, and open your mouths wide, friends. The streams of milk are flowing; catch them at both ends. Tuka says: he holds the rope-end in his hand, and gives no one more or less than their share.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the cowherds' game, with a high swing and streams of milk caught in open mouths, a scene of play that is also a parable of grace. The speaker climbs above the others, and friends are placed on either side to receive the flow. The point arrives in the signature line: Krishna himself holds the rope-end, and he portions out the bounty so that no one gets more or less than their due. The play conceals a teaching about divine fairness, that the giver controls the measure and gives each soul exactly its share, no favoritism, no shortfall.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The cowards who fled have met with ruin. The bold ones take their fill, for Hari lowers the bounty from above for them.

Those who deliberated on their own, empty of conviction, were left behind.

Says Tuka, fall at His feet; only then will you ever reach this place.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The cowards who ran away met with ruin here. The bold ones take their fill, for Hari lowers the bounty to them. Those who reasoned it out on their own were left empty, with nothing. Tuka says: fall at his feet; only then will you ever reach this place.

WHAT IT MEANS

In the game of reaching the hung-up bounty, the timid who flee lose out, while the bold who press in are fed, because Hari himself lowers the prize to them. The middle line sharpens it: those who trusted only their own reasoning, calculating instead of committing, came away empty. The poem is contrasting cautious self-reliance with daring surrender. Tukaram's close makes the lesson plain: the bounty is not seized by cleverness but received by falling at God's feet, and only that humble boldness brings you to the place where you are filled.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Their bellies are full, and now the friends raise a joyful clamor.

Come, come, O Narayana, let us speak in signs beyond all words.

They carry burdens on their shoulders and have grown weary beyond measure.

Tuka's generous Lord has taken the children and filled them with joy.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Their bellies are full now, and the friends raise a joyful clamor. Come, come, O Narayana; let us speak in signs, without words. They carry burdens on their shoulders, and they are worn out, very worn out. Tuka says: Tuka's generous Lord has taken the children and made them glad.

WHAT IT MEANS

The cowherd children have eaten their fill and break into happy noise, calling Narayana to join them in a wordless language of signs, the intimacy that needs no speech. There is a tender notice of their tiredness, the burdens on their small shoulders, the weariness of the day. The last line resolves it all: Tuka's open-handed Lord gathers up the worn-out children and fills them with joy. As an inner reading, those who give themselves to God, however small and tired, are taken up and made glad by his generosity, which asks no words, only nearness.

Says Tuka, I was right there in his company; they dragged the guiltless one into it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The milkmaids look, and find the milk pots overturned. They say, the son of Nanda has surely stolen the butter today. No one else makes mischief like this. Tuka says: I was right there with him; they dragged the guiltless one into it.

WHAT IT MEANS

The gopis discover their pots upended and at once blame Nanda's boy, Krishna the butter thief, since no one else gets up to such mischief. Tukaram then slips himself into the scene: he was right beside Krishna, and the milkmaids dragged the innocent one in along with the culprit. The charm of the poem is the devotee claiming a place inside the divine play, even sharing in the blame. Inwardly, to be "caught with" God, swept up in his lila and accused alongside him, is itself the closeness the bhakta longs for; the guiltless one he names is finally Krishna, who steals hearts and bears the charge.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now let us do this: catch those two and beat them. Only then will they drop this trick, for they have got a taste for it in their mouths. Lock them inside the house, and keep silent watch with our wits awake. Tuka says: he calls out to God, gathering his band of friends.

WHAT IT MEANS

The villagers, exasperated by the butter thieving, plot to catch the two culprits, give them a beating, and shut them in, because the boys have grown too fond of the mischief to stop on their own. The scolding is a thin cover for affection; everyone is really delighting in Krishna's pranks. The signature line turns it: even as the plan to trap him is laid, the speaker is calling out to God and gathering companions. The deeper note is that the longing to "catch" and hold Krishna, to keep him close behind locked doors, is the devotee's own desire to seize and never lose the playful Lord.

WHAT IT MEANS

Krishna's playmates are sulking: he always climbs up first and lets no one else take a turn, so they go off in tears, swearing they will not play and claiming they have seen through his tricks. It is the small drama of children with a domineering favorite, here the Lord himself. Tukaram adds that Krishna comes back in a temper and will not let anyone trail behind him. Beneath the quarrel lies a gentle truth about devotion: the soul protests God's seeming favoritism and delay, his refusal to let us keep pace on our terms, yet the relationship holds, sulking and all, within the larger play.

On the bank of the Yamuna the game of Hal is set up. The cowherd boy says to his friends: play the great game of Hal; cast off all needless show. Divide into teams by name, so that afterward no one goes away crying. Tuka says: Krishna plays the sesame-and-rice game; the one who wins makes the loser his own.

WHAT IT MEANS

By the Yamuna, Krishna sets up the game and lays down its rules to his friends: play it fully and seriously, drop all empty show, and divide fairly into named teams so no one ends up cheated and weeping. The closing image gives the game its meaning. In Krishna's version the prize is reversed: the winner does not crush the loser but takes him in as his own. As a spiritual reading, this is how God plays with souls. To be "defeated" by him, caught and overcome, is not to lose but to be claimed and made his, which is the whole point of entering the game.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hari does not fall by force; the wise one uses his wits. Let God play freely, so he can be caught with even, equal feeling. He comes and goes, again and again; his arts stay hidden until the moment he is caught. Tuka says: seize him right where he stands, throwing your arms around his feet with all your life.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out the strategy for catching God, who cannot be taken by force, only by wisdom. You must let him play freely and meet him with steady, even-tempered devotion, sama bhāva, rather than grasping. He keeps coming and going, his arts concealed, until the very instant he is caught. The closing instruction is the heart of it: do not chase him about; seize him right where he stands by throwing your arms around his feet with your whole life. The teaching is that God is held not by effort or cleverness but by total, loving surrender at his feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The game of Hal is set between the soul and Shiva; "I" and "I am That" charge at each other like rams. One rushes across the line playing hututu and looks back at himself; the stronger one breaks through the rear to reach the one ahead. The skilled player holds the line and guards the game, while the one who charges recklessly falls into the depths. Strong or coward, only the one whose breath lasts plays round after round. The one who gets a handhold makes the leap; the player with stamina is the true champion. The one who watches both front and back wins, while the one who is caught finds his support crumble. Play on your own strength, brother; abandon the crutch of others. Tuka says: I am no player in this game; whichever side I fall on, I stay with them.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the village game of hututu into the contest between the individual soul and the absolute. "I" (ahaṃ) and "I am That" (sohaṃ) charge at each other like rams, the sense of separate self against the knowledge of oneness. The poem is a coach's running commentary: hold the line, do not charge recklessly, keep your breath, watch both ahead and behind, and above all play on your own strength rather than leaning on others. In the spiritual reading, the realization has to be won by one's own sustained effort, not borrowed. The closing turn is the surprise: Tuka steps out of the role of player and says he simply belongs to whichever side he lands on, surrendering the whole contest of self rather than trying to win it.

Infinite universes dwell within His belly, yet Hari lives as a small child in Nanda's house.

How great is this wonder, how vast! The mystery of Krishna cannot be fathomed.

He who nourished the whole earth, Yashoda now serves Him a meal.

The all-pervading Lord of Lakshmi is carried on the hips of the milkmaids.

Says Tuka, He is the great actor in disguise; He moves in Brahman yet plays as if He has never tasted the world.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Endless universes lie in his belly, and yet Hari is a small child in Nanda's house. How great this wonder is, how great. No one can fathom Krishna's riddle. He fed the whole earth; now Yashoda sets a meal before him. He fills all the worlds, he is the lord of Lakshmi; and the milkmaids carry him on their hips. Tuka says: he is the actor in disguise. He tastes every pleasure and stays untouched, a chaste one through it all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is holding two facts together that should not fit: the formless Brahman, who contains and sustains everything, has become a little boy in a cowherd's house. The wonder he keeps naming is exactly this scandal of scale, the infinite eating from Yashoda's hand, the all-pervading one carried on a hip. He calls Krishna an actor in disguise to say the smallness is real play, not a loss of greatness. The closing claim is the sharpest: the Lord enjoys the whole world yet remains untouched by it, present in it without being caught by it. The poem points the listener toward that same freedom inside engagement.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Krishna was born in Gokul, and a trembling terror seized the wicked.

With the advent of Krishna, joy arose in every household.

They sing His blessed name with love and dance in constant bliss.

Says Tuka, their sins are carried away as they celebrate with joyful cries.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Krishna was born in Gokul, and the wicked were seized with trembling fear. When Krishna came down as the avatar, joy rose in house after house. They sing his name of love with their mouths; they dance in endless bliss. Tuka says: their sins are carried away as they cry out in joy.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets two responses side by side at the birth of Krishna: terror in the wicked, joy in every household. The trembling is not random cruelty; the coming of the divine simply unsettles whatever is built on harm. For the rest, the response is singing and dancing, the name spoken aloud with love. The last line names the stake plainly: it is this joyful, vocal celebration of the Name that carries sins away, not penance or fear. The poem holds out praise itself as the cleansing.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Gathering all the cowherd boys together, they hatched a plan.

Come, let us go steal the butter; today we shall have our fill. The delay has been long enough on account of one person, O friends.

Govinda led the way, and behind him followed the whole throng of cowherd boys.

He roams about everywhere yet lets no one catch on to his movements.

He finds a house that is secluded, full of nine kinds of fresh butter.

He slips inside himself and fills the laps of the cowherd boys.

He tells them not to speak, signaling with his hands: be still, just eat the cream.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Gathering all the cowherd boys, they make a plan. Come, let us go steal the butter; today we will take our fill. The wait has gone on long enough because of one of us, friends. Govinda leads the way, and behind him the whole crowd of cowherd boys. He moves about everywhere yet lets no one catch his movements. He finds a house that is empty, full of nine kinds of fresh butter. He slips inside himself and fills the laps of the cowherd boys. He tells them not to speak; he signals with his hand: be still, just eat the cream.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells the butter theft with Krishna as the ringleader, not a bystander. The same Govinda who pervades everything is the one scouting the empty house, slipping in, filling the boys' laps and signaling them to stay quiet. The point of the play is intimacy: the Lord plots and shares and hushes like one of the gang. By making God the thief who feeds his friends first, the poem turns a child's prank into a picture of grace that comes uninvited and serves before it is asked. The hiddenness, moving unseen, lets no one catch him, is the same divine elusiveness made playful.

Krishna's mischief, the offering eaten

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे देव दाखवी विंदान । नैवेद्य खाऊन हासों लागे ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Blessed are those milkmaids! When the offerings were laid out for Indra's worship, Krishna stole them and ate them himself.

O Krishna, even the immortal gods long for Indra's favor; who will dare challenge them now?

Says Tuka, the Lord reveals His wondrous play, eating the offerings and then bursting into laughter.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Blessed are those milkmaids. When the offerings were set out for Indra's worship, Krishna snatched them and ate them himself. O Krishna, even the immortal gods long for Indra's favor; who will dare go against them now? Tuka says: the Lord shows his wondrous play. He eats the offering and then begins to laugh.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram retells the moment Krishna eats the food meant for Indra's worship, and he calls the milkmaids who witnessed it blessed. The middle line names the stakes as the world sees them: Indra is the king the gods themselves court, so to seize his offering should be unthinkable. Krishna does it anyway and then laughs, untroubled by the rank everyone else fears. The laughter is the teaching: the highest celestial authority is a small thing before the one who is its source. The poem invites delight in a God who is not bound by the ceremonies built around lesser powers.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You gopis treat me like an ordinary child, as though you do not know me. I am the one who made Indra the king of the gods.

Indra, the moon, the sun, Brahma, all three worlds, Yama and Dharma: they are all mine.

From me have arisen all souls and Shiva himself; I, Krishna, am the God of gods.

Says Tuka, thus spoke Narayana to them, and I, a mere stone, was born in vain.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You gopis treat me like an ordinary child, as if you do not know me. I am the one who made Indra king of the gods. Indra, the moon, the sun, Brahma, all three worlds, Yama and Dharma: all of them are mine. From me arose every soul, and Shiva himself. I, Krishna, am the God of gods. Tuka says: thus Narayana spoke to them; and I, a mere stone, was born in vain.

WHAT IT MEANS

Krishna drops the disguise for a moment and tells the gopis plainly who the child in front of them is: the maker of Indra, the source of sun and moon and Brahma, of every soul and even Shiva, the God of all gods. Tukaram lets the full claim stand at its sharpest, no softening. Then he turns it on himself with the closing line, calling himself a mere stone born in vain. The contrast is the point: set beside the one who is the source of everything, the poet measures his own dull unresponsiveness and grieves it. The verse uses Krishna's self-declaration to expose how little the speaker has woken to it.

Teasing the wanderer, the cows lost again

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why have you lost the cows again? Your mother has come looking for you. Do you not know what happened the last time?

You have been made a fool, again and again, and yet you feel no shame at being punished day after day.

Your habit of mischief is deeply rooted; who can cure it? Will anyone restrain this wandering one?

Come, run, I will come with you. Says Tuka, let us hurry before she arrives there.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why have you lost the cows again? Your mother has come looking for you. Do you not know what happened last time? You have been made a fool, before and after, many times over, and still you feel no shame though you are punished day after day. Your mischief is a stubborn, deep-set habit; who can pull it out? Will anyone hold back this wandering one of yours? Come, run; I will come with you too. Tuka says: let us hurry, before she gets there.

WHAT IT MEANS

On the surface this is a friend scolding little Krishna, who has wandered off and lost the cows yet again and will catch it from his mother. Tukaram lets the teasing carry a second sense about habit: a pattern of straying so deep-rooted that punishment never cures it, and no one can pull it out. Read on oneself, the wandering one is the restless mind that strays again and again and feels no shame at the repeated cost. The tenderness is that the speaker does not abandon the wanderer; he runs alongside, racing to soften the reckoning. The poem holds both the affection for Krishna and a quiet mirror for our own incurable straying.

तुका म्हणे वत्स धेनुचिया चित्तीं । तैसें मज येती सांभाळित ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How can I repay the debt I owe to the saints? They keep me awake and watchful at all times.

How can one ever become free of this obligation to God? Even if I lay my life at their feet, it seems too little.

Their ordinary conversation is itself a teaching for my benefit; they take great pains to instruct me.

Says Tuka, as a cow's chitta is always fixed on her calf, so do the saints tend to me with ceaseless care.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How can I count the kindness of these saints? They keep me awake at all hours. How, my God, can I ever repay them? To lay my life at their feet is too small a thing. Their ordinary talk is itself good counsel for me; they take great pains to teach me. Tuka says: as a cow's heart stays fixed on her calf, so they come to watch over me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming a debt he says he can never clear: the saints keep him spiritually awake, and even laying down his life would not repay it. The work they do for him is quiet, their plain conversation is already instruction, and they labor over him on purpose. The cow-and-calf image lands the claim: their attention to him is not duty but the helpless, constant love of a mother for her young. The poem points the listener to value such company rightly, as the very means by which one is kept from sleep and steadily taught.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We have fastened the Krishna-jewel at our throats, and its light plays everywhere among the people.

Let us share the feast with one another; what a splendid gathering of Vaishnavas this is.

We shall show playful gestures even to Brahma and the highest beings.

Says Tuka, upon the face of this earth, we are mighty warriors, strong and invincible.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We have worn the Krishna-jewel at our throats, and its light is everywhere among people. Let us share the feast with one another; what a fine, glad gathering of Vaishnavas. We will make playful faces even at Brahma and the highest beings. Tuka says: on the whole face of the earth, we are mighty warriors, strong and unbeatable.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks for the band of devotees who carry the Name like a jewel at the throat, and whose shared joy lights up everyone around them. The shared feast is the kala, the cowherds' mingled food, and the gathering of Vaishnavas is its own delight. The boldness is deliberate: those who hold Krishna can make light even of Brahma and the lofty gods, because the Name outranks all heavenly station. The closing boast is not worldly conquest but spiritual fearlessness; devotion makes these unarmed singers the truly invincible ones on earth.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For the joy of a single morsel, the Supreme Brahman itself became a cowherd boy. He eats with both hands and tucks a bit of pickle between his fingers.

Who can know what gain is found there, a thing unattainable even to Brahma and the gods?

He wrestles, he plays, he blows the flute and the shehnai and dances to their rhythm. In circles of cowherd boys, Hari dances to their beat.

What was lacking in that house that He had to sneak in and steal the butter? Says Tuka, we too have been enticed and swept along in His company.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For the joy of one mouthful, the Supreme Brahman became a cowherd boy. He eats with cupped hands, mouth full, a little pickle tucked between his fingers. Who can know what gain is there, what it is, a thing hard even for Brahma and the gods. He wrestles, he calls out, he blows the flute and the pipe to his own tune. In rings of cowherd boys, Hari dances to their beat. What was there lacking to eat in that house, that he had to slip in and steal the butter? Tuka says: along with him, we too have been enticed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram dwells on the same scandal of scale: Brahman itself takes a cowherd's body for the plain joy of eating with his hands among friends. He insists that what is gained in that ordinary play is hidden even from Brahma and the gods, a sweetness the lofty cannot reach. The wrestling, the flute, the dancing in the boys' circle all show a God who keeps their rhythm rather than imposing his own. The butter theft is examined and found needless, he wanted for nothing, which makes it pure play and pure love. The last line draws the poet in: this is a delight that catches and carries you along once you come near it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Krishna, from now on, you and we are inseparable friends. We will not let you go to anyone else.

I will carry your bundle and your provisions and will not let you wander off on your own.

Let us milk the white cow together and thump the loners who stand apart.

Says Tuka, we will poke and prod those who refuse to heed your word.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Krishna, from now on it is just you and us, friends. We will not let you go to anyone else. I will carry your bundle and your provisions, and will not let you wander off up the path. Let us milk the white cow together and thump the ones who stand off alone. Tuka says: we will poke and prod those who will not heed your word.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks in the voice of the cowherd boys laying a fond, total claim on Krishna: from now on he belongs to them and goes to no one else. They will carry his load and block his straying, keeping him close on purpose. The play turns mock-fierce in the end, milking the cow together, thumping the loners, prodding those who will not listen to Krishna. Read past the game, the ones who stand apart and ignore his word are the souls who keep their distance from God, and the friends mean to draw them in. The poem holds out belonging to Krishna as something to seize and guard, not let drift.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

So dark, so dark He is. We are the cowherds of the Lord.

He never lets us go hungry; He seats us beside Him and shares His rice.

So dark, so dark. My blanket is the one He wraps around me.

Says Tuka, there is no difference at all between what is His and what is ours.

IN PLAIN WORDS

So dark, so dark he is. We are the cowherds of the Lord. He never lets the rice go cold or lets us go hungry; he seats us beside him to eat. So dark, so dark. The blanket I wrap myself in is his. Tuka says: there is nothing at all, nothing, that is his and not also ours.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sings as one of the Lord's own cowherds, fixing on Krishna's dark beauty and on the simple intimacies of his care: he feeds them, will not let them go hungry, seats them at his own side. The detail of the borrowed blanket says the closeness reaches into ordinary belongings. The last line lands the whole point: between Krishna and his devotee there is finally no line of mine and yours. The poem offers that erasure of separation, his is ours, as the real gift of belonging to God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

So good, so good he is. In his company even the dull pasture is sweet. That is why, with my whole life, I have taken hold of Krishna's back. His company looks beautiful every single moment. Tuka says: again and again, I was enticed by him, and now I entice others.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is confessing a happy capture: Krishna's company is so good that even tending cattle in a plain field turns sweet, so he has clung to him with his whole life. Every moment beside him looks beautiful, with no fading. The final line names how this works and what it costs others nothing: having been lured in himself, he now lures others the same way. The poem treats the spread of devotion not as preaching but as enticement, one swept-up soul drawing the next into the same delight.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the boys play at lowing like calves by the water, He joins right in and satisfies them all.

Wherever the cowherd boys go, He runs behind them.

Even the Ganga stood still, and He calmed her, saying, be at peace.

Says Tuka, the shehnai, the flute, the stick: all these are just excuses to be with them.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The boys play at lowing like calves by the water. He joins them and makes them all content. Wherever the cowherd boys go, He runs along behind. Even the Ganga stood still; He calmed her, saying, be at peace. Tuka says: the shehnai, the flute, the stick, all of these are only excuses to be with them.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures Krishna not as a distant lord but as one boy among the cowherds, lowing like a calf with them by the water and chasing after them wherever they go. The point of the closing line is the upturning: the flute and the staff and the music are not the reason He is there; they are only the pretext. What He actually wants is the company of His devotees. Even the Ganga, a river that should command worship, falls quiet and is comforted by Him. The whole abhanga lowers God into the game so that nearness, not majesty, becomes the measure of love.

He never lets anything fall short or go to excess; He says, everything is just fine.

Says Tuka, the chitta feels one thing alone: may He never turn away.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He rounds up the cows and runs home, going back and forth for our sake. The moment you say His name, He is right beside you. How good and strong is our Krishna. He lets nothing fall short and nothing run to excess; He says, everything is just right. Tuka says: the heart wants one thing only. May He never turn away.

WHAT IT MEANS

The claim that carries this abhanga is in the second line: speak the Name and He is already there. Tukaram makes God's care ordinary and tireless, a cowherd going back and forth, never letting things tip into too little or too much, always saying it is well. Against that steady tending, the devotee asks for only one thing, the same thing a child fears most: that the beloved might one day turn away. The prayer is not for gifts but for the presence itself never to be withdrawn.

Says Tuka, the belly is full; what is there to cry about now? The road we once watched for, ahead and behind, has simply fallen away.

IN PLAIN WORDS

They say: we are full to the brim. We need no more provisions now. We cannot bear to be apart from Him even for a moment. Come, come, Krishna; let us set up our games in the forest and settle the cows in the fold. We need not go home anymore; all that coming and going is finished. You are our true friend, our kin, our mother and father. Tuka says: the belly is full. What is there to cry about now? The road we watched, ahead and behind, has fallen away.

WHAT IT MEANS

The cowherds speak with the voice of a soul that has finally had enough of seeking. Being filled here is not about food; it is the end of restlessness, of provisioning for the next stretch of journey. When they say all coming and going is finished and the road ahead and behind has fallen away, Tukaram names the stakes plainly: the whole anxious traffic of getting somewhere stops once God is present as friend, kin, mother and father all at once. There is nowhere left to go because the one who is sought is already here, in the forest, in the game.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In your company our minds are settled at last. We have known joys and delights we never saw before. At home there were only ponds of buttermilk; here there are floods of fresh butter. Tuka says: now we will not go, even if you drive us away.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures the difference God's company makes by a homely image: thin buttermilk at home, oceans of fresh butter here. The contrast says that ordinary life offered only a watered-down satisfaction, while nearness to God is the rich thing itself. Once a soul has tasted that, the old wandering mind comes to rest. The closing line names the new stubbornness of love: having found this, the devotee refuses to be sent away even if God Himself tries to drive him off.

Desire has tormented me; illusion beats me without mercy. I have stayed alive only by leaning on you; through you everything has turned out well. Now that I have your company, I come to you pleading. Tuka says: Krishna, by the pressing of your grace this suffering has gone.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a prayer spoken from inside affliction, not after it. Tukaram does not soften how hard desire and illusion strike; they beat him without mercy. What keeps him standing is not his own strength but leaning on Krishna, and he comes openly as a beggar with folded hands rather than as a master of himself. The relief, when it comes, is credited entirely to grace that presses in and drives the suffering out. The stakes are survival: he says plainly that this leaning is the only reason he is still here.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The game has been set up on the open sands with great fervor. The Vaishnava brothers dance, trampling anger and pride underfoot, bowing at one another's feet.

They dance in waves of bliss, singing the holy litany of the Name. They have girded themselves against the power of time itself, each one mightier than the last.

Sandalwood paste, tulsi garlands, and flower necklaces adorn their throats. Cymbals and drums beat in a shower of blossoms, an incomparable festival of joy.

The sound draws everyone into a trance: the dull, the common folk, men and women, the learned, the yogis, and the great souls, all are made equal in that one devotion.

They have forgotten the pride of caste and birth; they prostrate before one another. Their chittas have turned soft as fresh butter, and even stones begin to melt.

The cry of victory resounds and the sky trembles; these Vaishnava warriors are intoxicated. Says Tuka, they have made the path simple and easy for crossing the ocean of worldly existence.

Play with a single-minded stroke and you will never fall; the double-minded one will be defeated, O brother.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The game is set up on the open sands with full force. The Vaishnava brothers dance, trampling anger and pride underfoot, bowing at one another's feet. They dance in waves of bliss, singing the holy litany of the Name. They have girded themselves against the power of time itself, each one mightier than the last. Sandalwood paste, tulsi garlands, flower wreaths around their throats. Cymbals and drums beat in a shower of blossoms, a joy beyond compare. The sound draws everyone into a trance: the dull, the common folk, men and women, the learned, the yogis, the great souls, all made one in this devotion. They forget the pride of caste and birth; they fall flat before one another. Their hearts turn soft as fresh butter, and even stones begin to melt. The cry of victory rings out and the sky shakes; these Vaishnava warriors are drunk with it. Tuka says: they have made the path simple, the way to cross the ocean of this world. Play with one undivided stroke and you will never fall; the double-minded one is the one who is beaten, brother.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the communal singing on the riverbank sands as a kind of war fought against time and ego, and won by bowing rather than striking. The radical claim is social as much as devotional: in the dance the proud rankings of caste and birth simply dissolve, the learned and the simple, men and women, all leveled into one body of worshippers prostrating to each other. The image of hearts softening like butter and stones melting names what bhakti does that nothing else can. The closing turn warns where the danger lies: salvation is for the single-minded, and only the divided heart, hedging its devotion, loses the game.

Caught in the cycles of the three gunas, you suffer greatly. Hold fast to these four companions and maintain your course.

Play the game and then stand apart, untouched. Give up this frenzy of sensory indulgence. By that very play you will become the champion; know this to be true, my brother.

The tailor's son Nama was one such player who made Vitthal his champion. He taught his companions the moves with great urgency and kept the arena alive at all times. Playing with a single stroke, he never faltered anywhere, and the saints and people were all won over by him.

Jnaneshwar, Muktabai, Vateshwar, Changa, and Sopan played together in bliss. They made the cowherd Krishna their champion and danced around Him in circles. When all of them joined in a single stroke, even Brahma and the gods bowed at their feet.

Rama was the champion and Kabir the player; what a fine pair they made. Five companions played with a single stroke, and from that union arose a beautiful resonance. Even Brahma and all the gods together could not surpass that game.

Eknath, the Brahmin's son, was one fine player who made the whole world into players. He made Janardan the champion and gathered together the fellowship of Vaishnavas. Playing with a single stroke, he played and played until he himself became the champion.

Whoever follows the course of those who went before succeeds. Whoever falters in that single stroke falls into the throw of worldly bondage. Twelve and sixteen players form the group, and the seventeenth is the champion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Caught in the turning of the three gunas you suffer greatly. Hold fast to these four companions and keep your course. Play the game, then stay apart from it, untouched. Give up this frenzy for the senses. By that very play you become the champion; know this is true, brother. The tailor's son Nama was such a player; he made Vitthal his champion. He taught his companions the moves with urgency and kept the arena awake at all hours. Playing with one stroke, he never faltered anywhere, and the saints and the people were won. Whoever falters in that one stroke falls into the throw of worldly bondage. Twelve and sixteen players make up the band, and the seventeenth is the champion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the village stick-dance into a teaching about how devotion is actually practiced and passed down. The instruction at the start is the heart of it: play the game wholeheartedly and yet stand apart from it, untouched, refusing to be ruled by the senses, and that very detachment-in-action makes you the champion. He then names a lineage of bhaktas, Namdev, Jnaneshwar and his family, Kabir, Eknath, to show this is not theory but a path many have walked, each making God Himself the champion at the center. The recurring phrase about one undivided stroke is the moral: single-mindedness wins, and the one who falters at it falls back into bondage. Devotion here is both a discipline you learn from those before you and a fellowship you join.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Keep the rhythm and guard the beat of the wooden clappers while the anahata, the unstruck sound, plays upon the drum.

Let us dance our way to Pandhari, O players, and behold Vitthal and Rakhumai.

Separate from the six, distinct from the eighteen, we shall sing and play as one single act of devotion. Even the birds forget their food and water; youth, bodily pride, and childhood all dissolve.

The blind receive eyes, the lame receive feet, and the old become young again. Says Tuka, both clappers strike as one sound; between saguna and nirguna there is no difference at all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Keep the steps in time, hold the beat of the wooden clappers, while the unstruck sound plays upon the drum. Let us dance our way to Pandhari, players, and look upon Vitthal and Rakhumai. Apart from the six, separate from the eighteen, we will sing and play as one single act. The birds forget to take their food and water; youth, bodily pride, and childhood all melt away. The blind are given eyes, the lame are given feet. Tuka says: the old grow young again. The two clappers strike one sound; between saguna and nirguna there is no difference at all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram joins the outer rhythm of the dance to an inner one: the wooden clappers keep human time while the anahata, the unstruck sound heard within, beats on the drum. The pilgrimage to Pandhari to see Vitthal and Rakhumai is set apart from the usual reckonings of philosophy, the six systems and the eighteen branches, because what moves here is love, not analysis. The images of the blind seeing, the lame walking, the old made young say that this devotion overturns every fixed limit. The closing line lands the deepest claim: the two clappers ring as one note, and so the God with form and the formless absolute are not two things but one.

With skillful twists of the body they move in every fashion, yet they bring all together in one single rhythm. Nothing at all goes to waste; there is one champion for everyone.

Where there is one who knows the art, no unevenness is allowed; balance is maintained throughout. The saints and the great ones play their round in one shared stroke; guard that same stroke, O my brother. They strike the clappers with controlled hands, and the clappers meet in perfect unison.

All that is impure will be cast away; what is the use of decorating the body if the inside is rotten? The one who does not join the saints' round is singled out and removed.

There is no need for ceremony; cast off shame and play with utter freedom. Even the ignorant, through nothing but innocence, have earned great honor by the power of Vitthal's name.

Goosebumps rise like festival pennants on their bodies, and they sway with the force of pure devotion. Says Tuka, the throat chokes with emotion in the company of Vithoba.

IN PLAIN WORDS

With skillful turns they bend their bodies every way, yet they bring it all together in one rhythm. Nothing is wasted; there is one champion for everyone. Where someone knows the art, no unevenness is allowed; he keeps it balanced, knowing more than the rest. The saints and the great ones play their round in one shared stroke; guard that same stroke, my brother. They strike the clappers with controlled hands, and the clappers meet in unison. All that is impure will fall away; what use is it to decorate the body? The one who does not join the saints' round is picked out and set aside. There is no need for ceremony; drop your shame and play freely. Even the ignorant, by sheer innocence, have won honor through the power of Vitthal's name. Goosebumps rise like festival flags on their bodies; they sway with the force of devotion. Tuka says: the throat chokes with feeling in the company of Vithoba.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses the dance image further, into a winnowing. In the saints' shared round every move is brought into one rhythm and nothing is wasted, but the same gathering that includes also sorts: whoever cannot fall into step with the saints is quietly singled out and removed. He names what does not survive this test, outward show and a decorated body over a rotten inside, and what does, the artless innocence of the ignorant who simply trust the Name. The instruction to drop shame and play freely is the door in; pretension is the thing kept out. The closing image of goosebumps and a choked throat shows the only credential that counts here is genuine feeling in God's company.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Come, friends, let us take up the game together, the knowing and the unknowing alike. Let us sing the Name and clap our hands for our own true good.

Seize what is freely offered now, for the giver of love is Panduranga. Today is a golden day; a golden color has dawned upon us.

Those who wander through forests and thorny thickets suffer, while we know greater happiness simply by singing and dancing.

Says Tuka, this dark-complexioned joy is hard to attain even for Brahma and the gods, yet today it has come freely into our mouths in this kirtan.

On the banks of the Bhima stands a city; its name is Pandharpur.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Come, friends, let us take up the game together, the knowing and the unknowing alike. Let us sing the Name and clap our hands for our own good. Seize what is freely offered now, for Panduranga is the giver of love. Today is a golden day; a golden color has dawned on us. Those who wander through forests and thorny thickets suffer, while we know greater happiness simply by singing and dancing. Tuka says: this dark-hued joy is hard for even Brahma and the gods to reach, yet today it has come to our mouths for nothing, in this kirtan. On the bank of the Bhima stands a city; its name is Pandharpur.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is an open invitation that deliberately makes no distinction between the learned and the simple; both are called to the same singing. Tukaram's urgency is in the word seize: love is being given away free right now, so take it while the golden day lasts. He sets the kirtan against the harder roads to God, the wandering ascetics among thorns, and claims the singers have the better portion with far less pain. The sharp turn is that the dark-complexioned joy of Krishna, which even Brahma and the gods strain to reach, arrives in an ordinary devotee's mouth for nothing at all, simply by chanting. Grace, not effort, is the giver.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Its lord has four arms and sixteen thousand wives. Let us dance our way to His town, players; He will give us rest and joy. Those who went ahead became treasures beyond measure; no one can describe their glory. Mightier than the mighty, He sustains the guardians of the world, and Death has no way in. Pundalik the headman tilled the field of devotion and became free of the sorrow of this world. The saints and the good have set up their shops there; whatever you need is to be had. Liberation and worldly enjoyment are given away for nothing, and yet no one even glances at them. Both market days are packed thick; countless pilgrims have gathered. Those who have seen Pandhari say, we will not go to Vaikuntha. For many days I held this longing; today, with great effort, it is fulfilled. Tuka says: by the merit of your company, I have touched those holy feet. On the crossroads of Pandhari the game is set up; all the Vaishnavas have gathered.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes Pandharpur as a city run by God Himself, where Death cannot enter and the saints keep open shops stocked with everything a soul could want. The startling line is that liberation and worldly enjoyment, the two great prizes people chase, are handed out for free here and no one bothers to look at them, because the pilgrims want only the feet of God. Pundalik, the devotee whose love drew Vitthal to Pandhari, is named as the one who plowed devotion into freedom. The claim at the center is a refusal: those who have seen Pandhari say they will not even go to Vaikuntha, heaven itself, because the company of saints on this earth is the higher thing. Tukaram closes by crediting his own arrival not to his effort but to the merit of that very company.

Cymbals, clappers, and drums sound as one; the son of Devaki has become the champion of the arena.

Come, let us see this wonder, O brothers. Why are you entangled in worldly affairs? Some fortunate ones have gone ahead as companions; such bliss is not found in all three worlds.

There are debates of joy and dialogues of happiness; each shows the other his delight. With all six, eighteen, and four playing in unison, they dance in circles to the pure beat of the cymbals.

The devotees are adorned with their sacred marks and ornaments, shining with sandalwood paste. Girded with strength and beauty, they roar the Name aloud.

Hari, Hara, Brahma, the river Bhima with all its sacred sites, thirty-three crore gods, all stand amazed and spellbound. Even the city of the gods, Amaravati, was left deserted.

They speak of the glory of Vaikuntha, yet none can match the splendor of Pandhari. Says the servant of Tuka, do not be lazy; I am telling this to all men and women.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Cymbals, clappers, and drums sound as one; the son of Devaki has become the champion of the arena. Come, let us see this wonder, brothers. Why are you tangled in worldly affairs? Some fortunate ones have gone ahead as companions; such bliss is not found in the three worlds. There are contests of joy and exchanges of delight; each shows the other his gladness. With the six, the eighteen, and the four all playing in unison, they dance in circles to the pure beat of the cymbals. The devotees are adorned with sacred marks and ornaments, shining with sandalwood paste. Girded with strength and beauty, they roar the Name aloud. Hari, Hara, Brahma, the river Bhima with all its holy places, thirty-three crore gods, all stand amazed and spellbound. Even Amaravati, the city of the gods, was left deserted. They praise the glory of Vaikuntha, yet none can match the splendor of Pandhari. The servant of Tuka says: do not be lazy. I am telling this to all men and women.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the singing of the Name at the center and makes Krishna, the son of Devaki, the champion of the whole dance. The frame the poem builds is a reversal of the usual order of things: the gods themselves, Hari, Hara, Brahma, all thirty-three crore of them, are not the spectacle but the spectators, standing amazed at what mere devotees are doing. He pushes the claim to its edge by saying Amaravati, the gods' own city, stood empty, as if even the heavens had emptied out to watch. The verse insists that Pandhari outshines Vaikuntha, that this earthly festival of the Name surpasses paradise. The closing call is practical and urgent: do not be lazy, this is offered to everyone, women and men alike, so come.

The form that even Brahma and the gods could not grasp has been seized and held right here.

He carries a shehnai and a flute and a stick and runs after the cows.

The leftovers that even the gods in heaven cannot obtain are freely available to the fortunate cowherds.

Says Tuka, this wealth has come to us; this is our own Mauli, our mother.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The form that Brahma and the gods could not grasp is held right here. He carries a reed pipe and a flute and a stick, and he runs behind the cows. The leftovers that the gods in heaven cannot get, the fortunate cowherds eat freely. Tuka says: this wealth has come to us; this is our own Mauli, our mother.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the highest reach of the gods against what the cowherds already have in their hands. The God whose form even Brahma cannot lay hold of walks among them with a stick, herding cattle. What the heavens cannot obtain, the cowherds get as scraps. The point is the reversal: nearness to God in love outranks every exalted station, and the simple cowherds are the truly fortunate ones because to them this God is as close and familiar as a mother.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Krishna, you are shameless and brazen; you have no modesty at all. You have been caught doing wrong and speaking lies.

Yet you never give up your mischief; you repeat it again and again. You create a direct rift between yourself and us, your own mothers.

You are a born cowherd, reckless and wild, a thief and a rogue. We shall proclaim it far and wide.

Even if we complain to your mother, we will tell everyone everywhere. Says Tuka, even that you would wear as an ornament.

At mealtime, Krishna throws a tantrum. The wearer of the forest garland wants all the food gathered into one pile for a communal feast.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Krishna, you are shameless and brazen; you have no shame, you are too bold. You were caught doing wrong and telling lies. Yet you never drop your mischief; you do it again and again. You make a clean break between yourself and us, your own mothers. You are a born cowherd, reckless and wild, a thief and a rogue; we will proclaim it everywhere. Even if we complain to your mother, even if we tell everyone, Tuka says: you would wear that too as an ornament. At mealtime Krishna throws a tantrum. Vanamali wants all the food gathered into one pile for a shared feast.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram voices the cowherd mothers scolding Krishna, and the scolding is itself a form of intimacy. They list every charge, shameless, lying, thieving, incorrigible, and threaten to spread word of it far and wide. The turn comes in the third verse: even public shaming would only become an ornament on him, because nothing diminishes him. The closing scene shows what the fuss is really about: he insists their separate portions be mixed into one pile and eaten together, turning a tantrum into the kala, the communal meal where all distinctions dissolve.

He says to his mother, sort it out and give it to me separately. He beats the ground with his hands and throws himself down upon it.

What a false accusation you make; you demand what cannot be done. She offers him something else, but he says no, I do not want that.

What shall I do now? I cannot strike or scold him, and he will not be consoled. He refuses to do anything I say. Then suddenly she piles it all together and says, now pick through it and eat as you please. Why do you torment us, says the mother to Hari.

When He is allowed to sort things out on His own terms, His agitation ceases. Then He is satisfied and sits up calmly. Mother, you have done well to make it clear. He hid His own intent and, with a single word, severed the knot of pleasure and pain.

The plate was covered with the end of a cloth. All was done just as it had been before: the different foods were separated into their distinct portions. The mother was astonished, seeing the depth of His feeling, and said, there is no one else like you.

The mother was overjoyed, unable to contain her happiness. She took Him in her arms and embraced Him. The bliss of that meal was complete, and all longing was satisfied. Says Tuka, will someone please leave the remnants for me?

He says to his mother, sort it out and give it to me. He beats the ground with his hands and throws himself down on it. What a false charge you make; you ask for what cannot be done. She offers him something else, but he says no, I do not want that. What shall I do now? I cannot strike him or scold him, and he will not be calmed; he does nothing I say. Then she piles it all in one place and says, now pick through it and eat as you please. Why do you torment us, the mother says to Hari. When he is let to sort it on his own, his upset stops; he grows calm and sits up. Mother, you have made it clear; he hid his own intent, and with a single word he cut the knot of pleasure and pain. The plate was covered with the end of a cloth, and it was all as it had been before: the different foods stood apart in their own portions. The mother was astonished, seeing the depth of his feeling, and said, there is no one like you. The mother was overjoyed; her happiness would not stay inside her. She took him in her arms and embraced him; the joy of that meal was full, and all longing was satisfied. Tuka says: will someone please leave the remnants for me?

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a long domestic scene that turns into a teaching. Krishna refuses to eat unless his portions are sorted out, throws himself on the ground, and will not be consoled until his mother gives up and piles everything together for him to sort himself. The moment she lets him do it his own way, his agitation ends, and the poem reads this as cutting the knot of pleasure and pain: the foods are separated yet undivided, just as they were. The mother is astonished at the depth behind a child's tantrum. Tukaram ends not as a narrator but as a devotee at the edge of the meal, begging for the leftovers, the scraps from God's plate that the earlier poems called the cowherds' greatest fortune.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Come, let us round up the cows and sit down together to eat in one place.

We have wandered far too much; our feet are sore and our bodies are weary.

The load is heavy on our shoulders and hunger gnaws at our bellies; what joy is there in play on an empty stomach?

Says Tuka, run now, and then everything will be well.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The load is heavy on our shoulders and hunger gnaws at our bellies; what joy is there in play on an empty stomach? Tuka says: run now, and then everything will be well.

WHAT IT MEANS

The cowherd boys are worn out from a long day of herding and want to gather for the shared meal. They name plainly what has drained them: endless wandering, sore feet, heavy loads, gnawing hunger, and they confess that play brings no joy while the stomach is empty. The closing line points the whole weariness toward Krishna: run to him, and then all is well. Tukaram lets the simple bodily tiredness stand for the soul that finds rest only when it turns to God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We know neither time nor occasion; through you we are satisfied in every way.

There is no fear at all with us, O Krishna. You round up the cows and fill our bellies with everything to eat.

To say we are afraid of you, that is true, but it would not be right to speak of it openly.

Says Tuka, our experience has shown that your words proved hollow.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We know neither the hour nor the time; through you we are satisfied in every way. There is no fear at all with us, Krishna; you round up the cows and fill our bellies with food. To say we fear you, that is true, but it would not be right to speak it openly. Tuka says: by our own experience your words proved hollow.

WHAT IT MEANS

The cowherds tell Krishna that in his company they lose all sense of time and want for nothing; he tends the cattle and feeds them, so no fear remains. Then comes a tender, teasing admission: there is one fear they hold about him, but it is not the kind that can be spoken aloud. The closing line lands the play, his warnings or threats came to nothing in their actual experience, so they have learned not to be afraid of him. Beneath the affectionate banter is the deeper claim that nearness to God dissolves fear and need alike.

Set down the gilli-danda; let us start some other game.

We have had too many turns, and no foot can find steady ground.

When a name is called out, no one can escape the running. Ahead stands one panel; one takes on two in a contest.

One is full of longing, while another runs around slapping his hands.

Says Tuka, now it is time to end this game and step aside.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem paints the cowherd boys at play, restless games that keep changing, full of running, calling out, catching, and chasing, with no firm footing anywhere. The picture is of motion that never settles. The closing line is the quiet turn: it is time to break off the game and step away. Tukaram lets the boys' endless play stand for the restless activity of life, and the call to stop is the call to leave it for what lies beyond the playing.

When the throw falls against them, he runs behind the straying cows to bring them back. Tuka says: they sit together in one place for the sacred feast; this is the communion of the devoted.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram shows the strange order of love between Krishna and the cowherds. God himself eats their leftover scraps, while they keep him in mind by chanting the Name and dwelling on him as their playmate. When the game goes against them, he is the one who runs to fetch their straying cattle, serving those who adore him. The closing line names what the whole scene is: the kala, all of them eating together in one place, which Tukaram calls the true communion of devotees, where love overturns rank and God serves his own.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Look, a fire is coming, O Krishna, what shall we do? We do not know how we will survive today.

Run, O Hari, we are trapped; the wildfire surrounds us, and some plan must be made.

Suddenly the blaze appeared above us, and when we turned to look back, we found we had already been facing away from it.

The flames circle us on all sides; there is no path to run. Says Tuka, O Ananta, you know what must be done; do whatever it takes.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Look, a fire is coming, Krishna, what shall we do? We do not know how we will live through today. Run, Hari, we are trapped; the wildfire is all around us, some plan must be made. Suddenly the blaze appeared above us, and when we turned to look, we found we were already facing away from it. The flames circle us on every side; there is no way to run. Tuka says: Ananta, you know what must be done; do whatever it takes.

WHAT IT MEANS

The cowherds are caught in a wildfire with no escape, and the poem is their cry of helplessness. They see the blaze close in on all sides and confess they cannot save themselves; there is no path out. The last verse hands the whole crisis over to Krishna: addressing him as Ananta, the endless one, they stop trying to plan and simply trust that he knows what to do. Tukaram makes the trapped cowherds a picture of the soul surrounded by danger it cannot master, whose only refuge is to throw itself wholly on God.

This is the God of gods, whose power none can fathom.

He spread his mouth wide and swallowed the forest fire in his cosmic form, and when the danger passed, all the cowherd boys simply watched.

Says Tuka, we were afraid before for no reason; now that we are in his company, there is no weariness at all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not be afraid, he says; do not hide your eyes. God will manage everything; there is no danger this time. This one is the God of gods; none can fathom his power, none can know what he does or how. He opened his mouth wide and in his cosmic form swallowed the fire, and when the danger had passed, all the cowherd boys simply watched. Tuka says: we were afraid before for nothing; now that we are in his company, there is no weariness at all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Krishna answers the cowherds' terror by telling them not to hide their eyes but to look, because God will handle it. The poem names him the God of gods whose power and ways no one can measure. Then the rescue: in his cosmic form he opens his mouth and swallows the whole forest fire, and the boys watch the danger end. Tukaram draws the lesson in the last line, the earlier fear was wasted, for in God's company there is no danger and no weariness; the soul that stays near him is kept safe.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To the innocent, Hari reveals his true nature. He dances shamelessly and plays the shehnai without a care.

Come, let us fall at his feet now, for he saved us from the great fire.

How did you swallow such a blaze, Kanho, yet we see no burn upon your mouth or body?

Says Tuka, why do you marvel? He eats our humble lunch, and from that comes all his strength.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To the innocent, Hari shows his true nature. He dances without shame and plays the reed pipe with no care. Come, let us fall at his feet now, for he saved us from the great fire. How did you swallow so great a blaze, Kanho, and yet we see no burn on your mouth or your body? Tuka says: why do you marvel? He eats our humble lunch, and from that comes all his strength.

WHAT IT MEANS

After the rescue the cowherds want to fall at Krishna's feet, marveling that he swallowed the whole fire without a single burn. He, meanwhile, simply dances and plays his pipe as if nothing happened, showing his true self to those innocent enough to receive it. Tukaram caps it with a wry, tender claim in the last line: do not be amazed, for his strength comes from eating their plain shared lunch. The point is that God's power is fed by the simple love of his devotees; what looks like a miracle rests on their humble offering.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those cowherd boys kept Hari's company to their heart's content; they gave him their food and ate whatever he gave in return.

He holds no sense of obligation, for he is hungry only for love; after many days together, this alone is their firm resolve.

The cowherd boys say with rough, artless speech, eat Kanho, eat every morsel, for their love for God is immense.

Says Tuka, now let us go home and tell the generous Lord how he saved us from the waters.

IN PLAIN WORDS

They kept Hari's company to their heart's content; they gave him their food and ate whatever he gave back. He keeps no sense of debt, for he hungers only for love; after many days together, this alone is their firm resolve. They say with rough, plain speech, eat, Kanho, eat every morsel, for their love for God is great. Tuka says: now let us go home and tell the generous Lord how he saved us from the waters.

WHAT IT MEANS

The cowherds share everything with Krishna, giving him their food and eating what he hands back, in a fellowship that asks for nothing in return. The poem says he keeps no account of favors because the only thing he hungers for is love, and that mutual love is the one settled resolve between them. Their devotion shows in plain, unpolished words, pressing him to eat every bite. Tukaram closes by turning homeward to thank the generous Lord for saving them, fixing the whole episode as gratitude offered back to the God who wanted nothing but their hearts.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Take these flatbreads and the packed lunch of curd-rice; pour the buttermilk away, bring whatever you have. Here we give as we receive; even if it is little, let it be honest. I say this plainly; let everyone know it. Look at what I have as it is; if you have nothing, go home and quietly bring some fresh butter from your mother. Tuka says: at home I have no one, Hari. Do not keep me away; do not set me apart from your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem opens with the cowherds pooling their meal, flatbreads, curd-rice, butter, on a single rule: give as you receive, and let even a small share be honest and shared openly. Those with nothing are told to fetch a little butter from home so all may join. The last verse drops the play and becomes Tukaram's own prayer: he has no one of his own, so he begs Hari not to push him away or separate him from his feet. The shared meal of the cowherds becomes the orphaned soul's plea to belong to God, who is the only family it has.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Craving the communal meal, God entered the water and became a fish. He wipes his hands and laughs, playing pranks along the riverbank.

He knows no shame about taking his share; he sees what is within every heart. When someone becomes meek, he never lets them feel separate.

Before him, all schemes and strategies prove false and hollow. Those who stand with folded hands, he never neglects.

Says Tuka, take this at your ease; let each enjoy as they can, savoring the nectar of love and delight.

The cowherd boys say, come Kanho, let us ask for something, let us tell him the longing that dwells in our hearts.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wanting the feast, God went into the water and became a fish. He wipes his hands and laughs, slapping his thigh, playing along the riverbank. He feels no shame about taking his share; he knows what is inside every heart. When someone grows meek, he never lets them feel set apart. Before him every scheme and strategy is shown to be false and hollow. Those who stand with folded hands, he never neglects. Tuka says: take this at your ease; let each one enjoy as he can, savoring the nectar of love and delight. The cowherd boys say, come Kanho, let us ask for something; let us each tell him the longing in our hearts.

WHAT IT MEANS

This opens the cycle of the gopala-kala, the cowherd boys' shared meal, with Krishna in the middle of it. Tukaram paints God as one who joins the play without dignity or distance: he becomes a fish for a feast, laughs, plays pranks, takes his portion unashamed. The point of the praise is in the second half: this same God reads every heart and refuses to let the lowly feel separate from him. All clever maneuvering collapses before him; only folded hands, simple surrender, are never turned away. The boys' request at the end sets up the whole sequence that follows, where each one will name what he wants.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One says, hush, stay quiet, just follow behind. Let none sleep at home tonight; let us all stay awake.

Hari, the all-knowing, sits silently in their midst, hearing without seeming to hear, knowing who says what and how. He draws out from the belly what lies on the lips and gives each one accordingly.

One says, we are greatly tormented by our mothers; she will not give us curd-rice lunch and pours buttermilk for others to drink. We are scorched herding cattle with no water or shade; let us now beg at his feet for a full belly.

Another says, how much can your belly hold? Let us ask for cows, buffaloes, horses, wealth, and fortune. Kanho is our friend and our God; what do we not have at hand? Let us ask for daughters, sons, maidservants, and fine beds.

Another says, fools, who will look after all that? A donkey is the same as a horse; who will honor it? Carrying four people on your shoulders brings the disease of worldly life. Better to wander free in the open with sticks and shaved heads.

Another says, the forest is full of wild beasts that tear out eyes and carry off hands and feet. One who cannot even protect himself, what kind of warrior is he? Better to sit at home; who would choose this wandering life?

But if you sit at home, they pile on endless chores; nobody likes an idle person, as we well know. One must look proper among people, and it is best to play secretly with our friend.

Another says, good companions are those who agree with you and let you have your way. Those who do not belong there kick and quarrel; when one runs off crying, chaos breaks out.

Another says, can all the children really stay quiet while playing? How can that happen among the young and old? Everyone gets angry if you call one of them good; quarrels grow in company, and the truth is won only alone.

Another says, where will you go all by yourself? Drop this useless talk; your words are all false. Stay put right where you are; why tire yourself on the road? Everyone's packed lunch is stuffed in your bundle anyway.

Says Tuka, why do you keep telling stories and tales? Your words cannot be licked clean when hunger strikes the belly. Let us wake up Kanho and ask for a morsel at his plate. The friends are full, and Tuka belches with Vitthal's name on his lips.

The friends are full, and Tuka belches with Vitthal's name in his throat.

WHAT IT MEANS

This long abhanga stages the boys arguing over what to beg from Krishna, and lets the argument expose every wrong thing a soul asks God for. Krishna sits silent in the middle, the knower of hearts who draws what is hidden in the belly up onto the lips: the asking itself is the test. Each voice wants something else, more food, then wealth and cattle, then renunciation, then safety, then approval, then easy company, and each is shown to tangle the asker further in the world. Tukaram cuts through the whole debate at the end: stories do not feed hunger, so stop talking and simply ask God for a mouthful at his own plate. The closing image is the only thing that satisfies, the friends made full and Tuka belching contentedly with the Name in his throat, the point being that what fills the heart is God himself, not the things we plot to request.

Today even the heavenly city stands empty, for the gods have come to witness the communal feast. The gods themselves forget their divine nature at the sight.

Joy overflows across the earth; the cows have forgotten their fodder and water. Beasts and cattle stand transfixed in meditation.

The very deity of the gods stands here in this arena, playing with the cowherd boys. Kanho sports in their company.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Today the city of the immortals stands empty, for the gods have come to watch the feast. The gods forget their own divine nature at the sight. Joy cannot fit on the earth; the cows have forgotten their fodder and water. Cattle and beasts stand transfixed as if in meditation. The very deity that the gods worship is standing here in this arena, playing with the cowherd boys. Kanho sports in their company.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures the worth of Krishna's simple play by who is drawn to it. Heaven empties out, because the gods themselves leave their thrones to watch the cowherd feast. They lose track of their own godhood at the sight; even animals stand still as if absorbed in meditation. The hidden claim is the last line: the God whom the gods themselves worship is the very boy playing here among cowherds. The exalted and the lowly are reversed, and the highest reality is found not in heaven but in this plain, joyful scene by the river.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Come, women, let us go see Panduranga at the sandy riverbank, where the communal feast is spread and the cowherd boys crowd all around.

In delight they share morsels from each other's mouths, without regard for young or old, all of them together.

They shout and wrestle, blowing flutes and shehnais, placing Hari in the center of their circle.

Men and women and all creatures are enchanted, forgetting their bodily awareness with no doubt in their chitta.

A rain of flowers falls, a throng of lamps is waved, and garlands of tulsi are placed around his neck.

Says Tuka, he is the king of the Yadavas, Kanho who steals the hearts of the gopis, and the mind rejoices at the sight of him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Come, women, let us go see Panduranga on the sandy bank, where the feast is spread and the cowherd boys crowd all around. In delight they feed morsels from one mouth to another, not minding young or old, all of them together. They shout and wrestle, blowing flutes and pipes, with Hari taken into the center of their circle. Men and women and all the creatures are enchanted, forgetting their bodies, with no doubt in their minds. A rain of flowers falls, a throng of lamps is waved, and they tie garlands of tulsi around his neck. Tuka says: he is the king of the Yadavas, Kanho who steals the hearts of the gopis, and the mind rejoices to see him.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a vision of the kala feast as worship made joyful and equal. The poet calls everyone out to the riverbank to see Panduranga in the thick of it, where the boys feed each other without rank, young and old sharing from one another's mouths. Around Krishna in the center, the line between play and worship dissolves: shouting and wrestling and flute-playing become flowers, waved lamps, and tulsi garlands. All beings, human and animal, lose their body-bound separateness and their doubt in the rapture of his presence. Tuka names him at the end as the Lord of the Yadavas and heart-stealer of the gopis, and the final note is the plain happiness of simply looking at him.

Krishna's play, no impurity near God

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who are my true companions? Sort them out from this group.

Let those who are alike come together; let us play among our own.

Break the sticks of the cowardly and send the timid hirelings away to tend the herds.

Says Tuka, in the presence of God, there should be no impurity of heart.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who are my true companions? Sort them out from the rest. Let those who are alike come together; let us play among our own. Break the sticks of the cowardly, and send the timid hirelings off to tend the herds. Tuka says: in the presence of God there should be no impurity of heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Spoken in the voice of the play, this sorts the company that may come close to God. It asks who the real companions are and gathers like with like, those fit for the play set apart from those who are not. The cowardly and the merely hired, who serve for wages and not from love, are turned away to the cattle work. Tukaram lands the meaning in the last line: nearness to God is not a matter of standing or skill but of a clean heart. The sorting is inward, an examination of one's own motive, not contempt for any person.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let this be our practice at all times: to partake of the cowherd feast and serve it with devotion.

The wish-fulfilling cow has yielded her milk in abundance, filling the sky with its fullness.

The saints like Sanaka and others form a fine assembly, each receiving a share according to their heart's desire.

Says Tuka, let us place Narayana in our midst, and then no one shall feel weary in this play.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let this be our practice always: to share the cowherd feast and serve it with love. The wish-granting cow has poured out her milk in plenty, ready and filling the whole sky. The saints, Sanaka and the others, make a fine gathering, each taking the share his heart desires. Tuka says: let us place Narayana in the middle, and then no one will grow weary in the play.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the kala into a rule for the whole spiritual life: make the shared feast of devotion your constant work. The provision is endless, for the wish-fulfilling cow fills the very sky, so there is enough for every desire; the great sages gather and each receives according to his longing. The decisive instruction is the last line: put Narayana, God, in the center of the play. With God at the middle of everything shared, the play never tires anyone out, because the joy is not in the things passed around but in the presence they circle.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have grown weary of those with high status; I prefer the company of you cowherd boys.

What do you lack? You are rich in everything.

I do not wish to carry the burden of worldly enterprise; what comes along is enough.

Says Tuka, one should not let life become restless. Narayana himself does not wish it so.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am tired of those of high rank; I would rather keep the company of you cowherd boys. What do you lack? You are rich in everything. I will not carry the burden of worldly striving; whatever comes along is enough. Tuka says: one should not make life restless. Narayana himself does not want it so.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a quiet choice between two kinds of company. The speaker is weary of the great and the high-placed and prefers the plain cowherd boys, who he insists lack nothing and are rich in all that matters. He refuses to shoulder the load of ambition and worldly enterprise, content with whatever comes unsought. Tukaram closes by naming the principle: a grasping, restless life is wrong, and God himself does not wish his own to live that way. Sufficiency and lowly company are held up as the truer wealth.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now we have all come together in one place; let us not deceive one another.

We have settled the account by giving up our bundles; what quarrel remains?

Open your knots and see what is inside.

Says Tuka, I have become free of all burdens; now let us call out to our dear cowherd companion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now we have all come together in one place; let us not cheat one another. We have settled the account by handing over our bundles; what quarrel is left? Open your knots and look at what is inside. Tuka says: I have become free; now let us call out to our dear cowherd friend.

WHAT IT MEANS

The feast image becomes a picture of full honesty and surrender. The boys are gathered in one place and pledge not to hold anything back from each other; they hand over their bundles and so the account between them is settled, leaving nothing to fight about. To open your knots and show what is inside is to hide nothing, to keep no private store. Tukaram says that once he is emptied out in this way he has become free, unburdened, and only then is he ready to call out to Krishna. The teaching is that calling on God comes after letting go of what we secretly clutch.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Come, let us gather the cows. Why do they lie sleeping? If we arrive home late making a commotion, our mothers will beat us.

Drive them, drive them with shouts; let each one lead his own. This much effort will be enough to rouse them.

Lost in play, they forgot the proper times and seasons. The careless ones gathered only more carelessness around them.

Says Tuka, if you do not learn discipline, you will have to beg. Everyone, hold your minds steady and run after the straying cattle.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Come, let us gather the cows. Why are they lying asleep? If we get home late with a great noise, our mothers will beat us. Drive them, drive them with shouts; let each one round up his own. That much effort will be enough to rouse them. Lost in their play, they forgot the right time and season. The careless ones only gathered more carelessness around them. Tuka says: if you will not learn discipline, you will end up begging. Everyone, hold your minds steady and run after the straying cattle.

WHAT IT MEANS

On the surface this is the boys hurrying to round up scattered, sleeping cows before dark, afraid of a beating at home. Underneath, the cattle and the late hour stand for a life let slide. Those who lose themselves in play forget the right times, and carelessness only breeds more carelessness, gathering around the careless one. Tukaram names the stakes plainly: without discipline you will be reduced to begging. The closing call to hold the mind steady and run after the strays is the real instruction, aimed at one's own scattered attention rather than at any actual herd.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The newly calved cow has let down her milk. Kanho himself told me about it.

Take this milk in your hands and serve it carefully.

A task done because one is told is not the same as true duty done from the heart.

Says Tuka, who should bear the burden of the old being treated as new and the new as old?

IN PLAIN WORDS

The newly calved cow has let down her milk. Kanho himself told me of it. Take this milk in your hands and serve it carefully. A task done because you were told to is not the same as true duty done from the heart. Tuka says: who should have to bear the old being passed off as new, and the new as old?

WHAT IT MEANS

A small scene of serving milk at the feast carries a teaching about the spirit of service. The fresh milk comes on Krishna's own word, and the instruction is to take it and serve it with care. The turn is the third line: doing something merely because you were ordered to is not the same as true duty offered from the heart. Tukaram then protests the mixing up of true and false, the old being passed off as new, asking who should have to put up with such substitution. The point is that God is not satisfied by outward, grudging compliance; only sincere, heartfelt service counts.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I will accept whatever share comes my way; I am not fit for anything more.

You know the love that suits each one's many qualities.

Without Hari by my side, they beat me with sticks.

Says Tuka, put God to work; I will do whatever service I am told.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will take whatever share comes to me; I am not fit for any more. You know the love that suits each one's many qualities. When Hari is not beside me, they beat me with sticks. Tuka says: put me to work, God; I will do whatever service you tell me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Spoken in the voice of a humble cowherd, this is a prayer of contentment and dependence. The speaker accepts whatever portion falls to him and calls himself unfit for more, leaving it to God, who knows what love and share each person's nature deserves. The middle line is stark: without Hari at his side he is beaten, that is, left exposed and helpless when God's presence is withdrawn. Tukaram ends by offering himself for any task God assigns. The whole posture is one of surrender: take the small share gladly, stay close to God, and ask only to be set to service.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When all tricks and shelters fail and fear fills the belly, simply calling out to the Lord of the world brings his merciful response rushing forth.

The Father, the mighty one, the supreme jewel, is eager at the sound of such words; when they reach his ears, he does not delay in coming to the rescue.

He gives strength and protection to those who surrender; the Master does not let them carry any worry. The generous Lord seats them at his ready table.

He carries them on his shoulders, brings them home, and paces back and forth attending to them. The Lord is pleased even by Tuka's babbling words.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When every trick and shelter has failed and fear fills the belly, just calling out to the Lord of the world brings his merciful answer rushing in. The Father, the mighty one, the crown of all, is quick at such words; the moment they reach his ears he runs to the rescue without delay. He doubles the strength of the one who surrenders; the Master lets him carry no worry, and the giver seats him, food ready, at his own row. He carries him on his shoulders and brings him home; he paces back and forth tending to him. Tuka says: the Master is pleased even by Tuka's babbling words.

WHAT IT MEANS

This abhanga is about what happens when human resources run out. When all schemes and refuges fail and fear takes hold, the one act that works is simply to cry out God's name; he answers with mercy at once. Tukaram piles up the response: the mighty Father runs without delay, doubles the strength of whoever surrenders, lifts away all worry, and seats the helpless one at his own table with food already prepared. The images of God carrying him on his shoulders and pacing in care reverse every expectation of distance between Lord and devotee. The last line is the consolation: God is moved not by polished prayer but by even the broken, babbling words of one who turns to him.

Blessed are Devaki and Yashoda both, and blessed is the fortune of Vasudeva and Nanda.

Blessed are those gopis and the sixteen thousand maidens. Blessed are all the Yadavas.

Says Tuka, blessed indeed are those who were born to be drenched in the color of Hari with their whole being.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Blessed are the cattle, the blanket, the staff. Blessed are the shehnai, the flute, the curved horn. Blessed is Gokul. Blessed are its cowherd boys. All the men and women there are blessed. Blessed are Devaki and Yashoda, both of them. Blessed is the good fortune of Vasudeva and Nanda. Blessed are those gopis and the sixteen thousand maidens. Blessed are all the Yadavas. Tuka says: blessed indeed were those who were born for this, who steeped their whole being in the color of Hari.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pours out a litany of blessing over everything that touched Krishna's life at Gokul. He begins low, with the cattle and the herdsman's plain things, the blanket and staff and flute, and rises through the village, its boys, its women, its parents, to the gopis and the whole Yadava clan. Nothing is too small to be holy once it has been near God. The last line names what makes them blessed: not their birth or rank, but that they let their whole being be dyed in the color of Hari. The blessing is the nearness, and the dye is total love.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The milkmaids tie a rope around his neck to restrain him, yet it is Brahman itself that plays among the cowherd boys.

He runs after Yashoda begging for food and wanders from forest to forest following the cows.

Says Tuka, he who holds all powers within him begs like a simple innocent, drawn by the force of devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The milkmaids tie a rope around his neck to hold him still. Yet it is Brahman itself that plays there among the cowherd boys. He runs after Yashoda begging for food. He wanders from forest to forest behind the cows. Tuka says: he who holds every power within him begs like a simple, innocent child, drawn on by devotion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the smallness of the scene against the vastness of who is in it. A few milkmaids tie a rope on a little boy's neck, and Tukaram says plainly that the one they bind is Brahman, the absolute. He runs begging for food, he trails the cows through the forests, doing everything a small herd-boy does. The point is the willing reversal: the one who contains all powers makes himself this helpless and this hungry. He does it for love, letting devotion pull the infinite down into a child's body.

Yet he takes the blanket and the staff, herds the cows, and carries the flute on his back.

Great is the power of devotion; God himself became her child.

Says Tuka, for the sake of his devotee, God runs along every path.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He was caught eating mud. When the proof was shown, his mother tied him up. Still he takes the blanket and the staff, herds the cows, carries the flute on his back. Great is the power of true feeling. God himself became her child. Tuka says: for the sake of his devotee, God runs along behind him on every path.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at the ordinary stories of child Krishna and reads the secret in them. The mud-eating, the scolding, the mother tying him to a post, the daily herding: each is something only a real child does, and God consents to all of it. The hinge is the third line, the power of bhava, of true feeling. It is devotion that pulled God into Yashoda's lap as her own son. Tuka lands it as a promise: God is not aloof. For the one who loves him he comes running, staying close on every path the devotee walks.

Look here, mother. See this morsel in my hand, and this friend beside me. God himself gave me this share. Do what you like about it. My belly is so full I can point to it and show you. Tuka says: at home, when would I ever get plenty like this?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks in the voice of the herd-boy Krishna come back from the fields, showing his mother what he has. The food in his hand is not stolen or earned; he says God himself gave it, so let her make of that what she will. The full belly he points to is proof. The closing line carries the real point: out there in the open, in company, sharing the common meal, there is an abundance that home alone never gives. For Tukaram the field of the saints and the shared portion is where one is truly fed.

Says Tuka, he pleads with Hari, who glances over and tosses him a morsel. Taking it, Tuka grows content and quietly shares it among the others.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He gave to everyone on every side, then just looks at me. Why have you gone silent with me? Give me my share. The lunch packs are all cleared out now; there is nothing left to sort through. I am hungry, Ananta. Why do you pretend not to know, when you know everything? I am worn out from herding these wild, straying cows. Tuka says: he pleads with Hari, who glances over and tosses him a morsel. Taking it, he grows content, and quietly shares it among the others.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the prayer of one who feels passed over while everyone else is fed. In the cowherd setting Tukaram complains that Krishna fed all the others and then fell silent toward him, so he asks outright for his portion before the meal is gone. He names his exhaustion: he is the one who has been chasing the wild, straying cows. The cows are the restless senses and the herding is the spiritual labor that tires him. Then the turn comes. Hari finally looks his way and tosses him even a single morsel, and that one glance and crumb of grace is enough to fill him. Received, it overflows: he hands it on to the others rather than hoarding it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as one of the rough country herd-boys and sets them against the clever, self-assured townspeople. They have no polish; they are simple forest folk, and they say so without shame. Their way is the shared meal, the kala, where everyone's lunch is pooled and passed hand to hand, and their play stays among their own. The last line names what they are circled around: Kanho, Krishna himself. For Tukaram this is the company of the saints, unsophisticated and open-hearted, whose only wealth is being gathered as innocents around their Lord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He gave sweets to everyone but would not even look my way. The cowherd boy sulks, rubs his eyes, slaps his thigh, beats his own face in protest. He loves only the big and important ones. I am just a poor little child. Tuka says: God knows the true feeling of the heart, and he gently consoles the one who is hurt.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram stages the ache of the small and overlooked. A child watches God hand out sweets to everyone else and pass him by, and breaks down in furious tears, certain he is too lowly to be loved, that only the great and important matter. The complaint is real and Tukaram does not scold it. The resolution is in the last line. God is not moved by who is big or important; he reads the heart's true feeling. So it is exactly the distressed, slighted one whom he turns to and consoles. The lowly self that fears it counts for nothing is the one God comes to comfort.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Look ahead and behind, guarding both sides; dodge cleverly and protect your teammates.

Swing the stick from both ends to keep your friends alert; if someone gets caught, the trouble falls on you.

Divide the friends into teams and release each where they stand.

What can a lone player do with brute force? You will have to give up your turn.

Set foot in new territory and catch whoever you find there.

Win the round and claim your authority over the rest.

You got caught in a trap and wasted so much time. The strong player breaks through the line when it is not held firmly.

Says Tuka, when the blow lands and strikes your body, why are you still tangled in this game?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Look ahead and behind; guard both sides. Dodge cleverly and protect your teammates. Swing the stick at both ends to keep your friends alert. If one of them is caught, the trouble falls on you. Divide the players into teams; release each one where they stand. What can a single player do by brute force? You will have to give up your turn. Step into new ground and catch whoever you find there. Win the round and claim your rule over the rest. You got caught in the trap and wasted so much time. The strong player breaks through the line when it is not held firmly. Tuka says: when the blow lands and strikes your body, why are you still tangled in this game?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes a children's catching game and makes it the whole game of worldly life. The instructions sound like ordinary play: watch both sides, guard your team, divide into sides, win the round and lord it over the others. But running underneath is a warning about how the game catches you. Brute force gets you nowhere; you forfeit your turn; you get trapped and squander long stretches of time. The line, the defended boundary, is broken by the strong precisely where it is held loosely. The closing question is the real address to the soul: now that the blows are actually landing on your own body, why are you still caught up in playing? It is time to step out of the game.

Watch this sport; your tricks will not work here. I will give a share to whoever comes and send them out.

Wake up, cowherd boys, stay alert in your positions. When you hear a footstep, scatter far from me.

Without entering the guarded space, we watchful ones know the terrain; there is no point fumbling around in fear.

Says Tuka, what falls into your hands is won at the cost of your very life. Snap your fingers in delight, for the sweetness comes at the very end.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Watch this sport. Your tricks will not work here. Whoever comes, I will give him his share and send him out. Wake up, cowherd boys; stay alert at your posts. When you hear a footstep, scatter far from me. Without entering the guarded ground, we who keep watch already know the field. There is no use fumbling about in fear. Tuka says: what falls into your hands is won at the cost of your very life. Snap your fingers in delight, for the sweetness comes only at the very end.

WHAT IT MEANS

Again Tukaram uses the herd-boys' game to teach the inner contest. The keeper of the field warns that clever tricks are useless here; each one who comes gets his exact due and is sent off, and the players must stay awake at their posts and scatter at the first footstep. The watchful ones do not need to blunder into the guarded ground in fear, because they already know its lie. Then the stakes are named without softening: the prize is won at the cost of your very life. Nothing real is gained cheaply. And the last note is patience, the sweetness does not come early; it arrives only at the very end, so keep going to the finish.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By cheating in the game, the boy caused others to lose track of their cattle.

While playing, he cracked heads open and then stood aside as though he were innocent.

The mothers punish and scold, taking the life out of the child, showing no mercy for the mischief.

Says Tuka, Kanho was behind it all, and eventually it became clear from his own conduct.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By cheating in the game, the boy made the others lose track of their cattle. While they played he cracked their heads open, then stood aside as if he had done nothing. The mothers punish and scold and take the life out of the child, showing no mercy for the mischief. Tuka says: Kanho was behind it all, and in the end it showed in his own conduct.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells the game as a parable of how the world's confusions are arranged. A player cheats, the others lose their cattle, heads get broken, and the one who caused it slips aside wearing an innocent face while the blame and beating land on someone else. The pointed truth is in the last verse: Kanho, Krishna himself, was behind the whole thing. The Lord is the hidden author of the play, and eventually his hand becomes visible in how it all unfolds. Read inward, it asks us to suspect the seemingly innocent cause of our troubles and to recognize that the divine lila is running underneath the tangle, not chance and not only our fellow players.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now let us eat this, only this; let us take this packed lunch together.

Let us savor each morsel with the taste of Brahman, the divine nectar of delight.

Says Tuka, as long as it tastes sweet, the tongue keeps asking for more.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now let us eat just this, only this. Let us take this packed lunch along. Let us savor each mouthful. This is the taste of Brahman, the love we long for. Tuka says: as long as it tastes sweet, the tongue keeps asking for more.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the shared field-meal into a figure for tasting God. He resolves to eat this and nothing else and to carry this food with him everywhere, savoring each mouthful slowly. He says outright what the food is: brahmaras, the taste of Brahman itself, the sweetness the heart most wants. The closing line is the joy of it. Unlike ordinary food that cloys, this sweetness only deepens the appetite; the more the tongue tastes it the more it asks. For Tukaram that endless hunger for God is not a lack but the mark of the real thing.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Everything has become sweet, for the old account of grace has been filled to the brim.

Panduranga has come to my aid and given me his company deep within.

When you reach the bank, the current becomes gentle; when you were drowning before, there was no ground beneath your feet.

Says Tuka, all that was a dream has now dissolved, and I have awakened.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Everything has turned sweet. The old account has been filled to the brim. Panduranga has come to my aid. He has given me his company deep within. When you reach the bank, the current goes gentle. Before, when you were drowning, there was no ground beneath you. Tuka says: it is all gone now. The dream is over, and I have woken.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the moment of rescue from inside, after it has happened. Everything has turned sweet and the long-standing arrears of grace are paid in full at last. The cause is plain: Panduranga came to help and gave his own company, not outwardly but deep within. Then the river image carries the whole change. While he was drowning there was no footing anywhere, but once he reaches the bank the fierce current loses its power over him. The closing line settles it: all of that was a dream, and he has now awakened. The terror was real while it lasted, yet from the far bank it is seen for what it was, and only the sweetness remains.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We come with you, Hari, for we have no shame in following you. You lifted the mountain, and that is how we were saved.

End this game now; the cows have wandered and it is getting late. The wild ones have scattered, and there is no one to gather them.

By good fortune we survived the Yamuna when we were drowning. We are shameless and have no fear or hesitation before you, Ananta.

We eat fire and mud; enough of this companionship, for we suspect in our chitta that wandering with you only leads to more wandering.

Says Tuka, there is no reserve left with you; the clever ones keep their distance, while we simple ones stay close to your play.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We come with you, Hari. We have no shame about following you. You lifted the mountain, and that is how we were saved that time. Stop the game now. The cows have wandered off; it is getting late. The wild ones have scattered, and there is no one to gather them. By good luck we survived the Yamuna when we were drowning. We are shameless; we have no fear of you, Ananta. We eat fire and mud. Enough of this companionship now. We feel in our hearts that wandering with you only leads to more wandering. Tuka says: there is no holding back left with you. The clever ones keep their distance; we simple ones stay close to your play.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks in the voice of the cowherd boys who run with Krishna, and their grumbling is really a confession of love. They list the dangers he has dragged them through, the lifted mountain, the drowning in the Yamuna, and pretend to call it quits: enough, the cows are scattered, stop the game. But the refusal is hollow, and they know it. The poem's edge lands in the last line: the clever calculate the cost and keep their distance, while the simple ones, who have given up all reserve, stay close to the play no matter where it leads. Tukaram counts himself among the shameless simple, and offers that as the higher wisdom.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not come along with us, cowherd boy, for your cows are wild and unruly.

Who will run after them, going back and forth endlessly?

They will not sit still in one place; they run off in ten different directions.

Says Tuka, you just herd them with your mind, and then we will know how to manage the rest.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not come with us, cowherd boy. Your cows are wild and will not be controlled. Who will run after them, going back and forth without end? They will not sit still in one place. They run off in ten different directions. Tuka says: you herd them with your mind, and then we will know how to manage the rest.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram keeps to the cowherds' teasing voice, but underneath the cows are the restless senses and thoughts that scatter in every direction. The boys protest that they cannot keep the wild herd together; chasing them is endless and useless labor. The turn comes at the end: only Krishna himself can hold them, herding them with his mind rather than their feet. The plea is that grace, not the devotee's effort, is what finally gathers the scattered, and once he does that, the rest becomes easy.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I went to ask for a packed lunch at your mother's house and was harassed there.

Without you, she would not give it to anyone. When I tried to explain the situation, I nearly lost my life.

This back and forth was all in vain; enough of your mother's home and your Maya's ways.

Says Tuka, you stay separate from us, cowherd boy, and that is that.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I went to ask for a packed lunch at your mother's house, and I was tormented there. Without you she would not give it to anyone. When I tried to explain, I nearly lost my life. This back and forth was all for nothing. Enough now of your home and your Maya. Tuka says: you stay separate from us, cowherd boy, and that is that.

WHAT IT MEANS

In the cowherds' aggrieved voice, Tukaram tells of being sent on an errand and meeting only obstruction, then pretends to wash his hands of the whole household. The double meaning sits in the word Maya: the mother's house that turns him away is also the world's enchantment that exhausts the seeker with fruitless coming and going. The boy threatens to break off and keep Krishna at arm's length. But the threat is theater, the lover's bluff; the very heat of the complaint betrays how bound he still is.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hari pleads with folded hands, unable to bear even a moment of separation.

I have grown so accustomed to your company; I am not a new friend who just arrived.

Many great ones call to me, but I do not find them appealing.

Says Tuka, so deep is his love for the devoted ones that he clings to them with his very life.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hari pleads with folded hands; he cannot bear even a moment apart. I have grown used to your company. I am not some new friend who just arrived. Many great ones call to me, but I do not care for them. Tuka says: so deep is his love for the devoted ones that he clings to them with his very life.

WHAT IT MEANS

Here Tukaram turns the picture around: it is God, not the devotee, who is the desperate lover. Hari begs with folded hands and will not endure a moment of separation, reminding the devotee that theirs is no new acquaintance. The radical claim is in the middle: the great and powerful call to God and he is unmoved, but to the one who simply loves him he clings as if his own life depended on it. The point is that devotion, not greatness, is what binds the Lord; he holds on harder than the devotee does.

Hari has drowned, cry out for help! His own family does not know his whereabouts.

The river of existence is fathomless, and the serpent Kaliya within it is terribly venomous.

Says Tuka, why raise vain cries when the one you held in your hands has slipped away?

IN PLAIN WORDS

He climbed up and leaped from the kadamba tree into the depths of the Yamuna. Hari has drowned. Cry out for help. His own family does not even know where he is. The river of existence has no far shore that you can see, and the serpent Kaliya in it is terribly venomous. Tuka says: what use are these empty cries, once the one you held in your hands has slipped away?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram retells Krishna's leap into the Yamuna to subdue the serpent Kaliya, but reads it as the soul's danger. The river is existence itself, fathomless, and the venom in it is the poison of the world. The cries of the watchers are vain because shouting from the bank saves no one. The blow lands in the last line and points back at the listener: while you had him in your hands you did not value him, and now that he has slipped from your grasp, no amount of noise will bring him back. The poem asks whether you are clutching God now, while you still can.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All the boys gathered and raised a great clamor, saying, the one who was just with us is now gone.

Each weeps according to his own bond and feeling.

We were lost in play and let our cowherd friend slip from our hands.

Says Tuka, they all rush to the riverbank, but no one dares leap into the water.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All the boys gathered together and raised a great outcry, saying the one who was just here is now gone. Each one weeps in his own way, by the bond he had. We were lost in the game, and our cowherd friend slipped from our hands. Tuka says: they all run to the riverbank, but no one dares to leap into the water.

WHAT IT MEANS

The cowherds wail at the bank because Krishna has vanished into the Yamuna, and each grieves to the measure of his own love. Tukaram catches the half-truth in their sorrow: they were absorbed in the game and let him go, and now they mourn. The sharp final image turns on the listener: everyone crowds the edge and cries, but no one is willing to jump in after him. Lament is cheap; only the one ready to risk everything, to leap into the depths, actually seeks God. Tukaram leaves us measuring our own grief against that test.

They cry out in anguish, beating their hands, heads, and feet.

When he was close, they did not know his worth; now that he is gone, their grief knows no bounds.

Says Tuka, this great trickster tests who is truly sincere and who is false.

IN PLAIN WORDS

They are terrified for their lives. They have lost God. He is no longer near them. They cry out in anguish, beating their hands, their heads, their feet. While he was close we did not know his worth; now that he is gone, our grief has no limit. Tuka says: this great trickster is watching, to see whose love is real and whose is false.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram shows the cowherds discovering, only in his absence, what Krishna was worth to them. While he stood beside them they took him for granted; the moment he is gone their grief is boundless. Then comes the turn that reframes the whole scene: the disappearance was no accident but a deliberate test. The trickster Lord hides himself to see who truly loves him and who only loved his presence. The poem holds up a mirror, asking whether our devotion is for God or merely for the comfort of having him near.

In their confusion, no one can tell what is real; the mind wavers between belief and doubt.

His form has changed; they see him looking different, both fair and dark at once.

He comes reassuring them with outstretched hands. Says Tuka, this is the true God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Having subdued Kaliya, Hari comes up out of the water, and they point to him far off. In their confusion no one can tell for sure; the mind swings between yes and no. His form looks changed; they see him both fair and dark at once. He comes toward them, reassuring them with his outstretched hands. Tuka says: this is the true God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Krishna rises from the Yamuna after defeating the serpent, but the watchers cannot be certain it is really him; his form looks altered, fair and dark together, and their minds waver between belief and doubt. Tukaram captures the moment recognition struggles to keep up with grace. The God who returns from the depths is not quite the playmate they lost; he comes back larger and stranger. The doubt is resolved not by proof but by his own reaching hands, and Tukaram cuts through it with a flat declaration: this, the one who descended into the poison and rose again, is the true God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hari embraces all the cowherd boys, pressing neck to neck in a warm gathering. His love for the devoted ones is great, and he tells them the secrets of his heart. The one whom yogis cannot reach in their deepest meditation goes begging for bread among these friends. Tuka says: he stays far from the clever and the wise, and becomes the servant and attendant of those who call him in stammering words.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram draws the contrast the whole cluster has been building toward. The same Krishna the yogis cannot grasp in profound meditation freely begs bread from his cowherd friends and pours out his heart to them. The radical reversal is stated plainly: he keeps his distance from the learned and the clever, and makes himself the servant of those who call him in broken, stammering words. The poem overturns the usual ranking of seekers. Simple love reaches God where mastery and intellect cannot, and he answers it not as a master but as a servant.

He sweetly fulfills the words of his own people as a loving act of service.

If someone asks, he gives them the first turn, never claiming that he is the mightier one.

Says Tuka, one should follow such a Lord with all one's heart and soul.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Run, Kanho, the cows have strayed. He does not stop to ask who he is or what he is. He sweetly carries out the word of his own people, as a loving act of service. If someone asks, he gives them the first turn; he never claims to be the stronger one. Tuka says: such a Lord is the one to follow with all your heart and soul.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram watches Krishna obey his playmates without a thought for his own rank. Told to run after the strayed cows, he does not pause to remember that he is God; he simply does what his people ask, gladly, as service. In their games he yields the first turn and never throws his weight around, though he is the mighty one. The poem makes this self-forgetting humility the very ground of devotion: a Lord who serves and steps aside out of love is the one worth following completely, body and soul.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A mother places food in the mouth of the younger child while she exercises authority over the older, wiser ones.

Through such knowing, a deliberate distance has crept in; the more one grows, the greater the gap becomes.

She gave birth to both from her own body, yet her affection runs along separate paths.

Says Tuka, she separates from her own body what is still crying at the breast, doing so by the force of discernment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A mother puts the food into the mouth of the younger child, while over the older, wiser ones she exercises authority. Through such knowing, a gap has opened up; the more a child grows, the wider the distance becomes. She bore both of them from her own body, yet her affection runs along separate paths. Tuka says: she pushes away from her own body, by sheer force of judgment, the one who is still crying at her breast.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses a mother's two children to picture how God treats the simple and the clever. The little one she feeds with her own hand and holds at the breast; the grown, knowing child she keeps at arm's length and merely commands. Both came from the same body, but their cleverness has put distance between them and her tenderness. The lesson, consistent with this whole cluster, is that knowingness, the pride of being wise, separates us from God's intimate care, while the helpless, dependent one is fed directly. Wisdom that puffs us up is exactly what opens the gap.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It is astonishing that the gods themselves neglect what belongs to God.

What then can be said of ordinary people, who carry the burden of worldly life upon their heads?

Renouncing the world while hoarding pride seems like a great tyranny.

Says Tuka, see how they waste themselves through laziness, letting their strength drain away for nothing.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those who call themselves God's own, yet the gods themselves treat what belongs to God with neglect. This strikes me as a great wonder. If even they do this, what is there to say about ordinary people, who carry the load of worldly life on their heads? To renounce the world and still hoard your pride looks like a great tyranny. Tuka says: see how, through laziness, they let themselves be wasted; see how their strength drains away for nothing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is astonished at religion that goes through the motions while neglecting the very God it claims. If even those reckoned holy are careless toward what is God's, ordinary people, bent under the weight of worldly life, are hardly to be blamed. He names a particular hypocrisy: people make a show of renouncing the world while quietly clinging to their pride, and he calls that a kind of violence, a fraud against the self. The closing lines point at sloth, the half-hearted seeking that lets a life and its strength bleed away for nothing. The poem turns the listener toward self-examination: is my own renunciation real, or just pride in a new costume?

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Accept instruction from any hand that offers it; hold it in your chitta once it is given.

One should not judge the vessel; a coconut shell can serve as well as a silver plate.

Wife, son, and household servants all prompt you to remember Narayana.

Says Tuka, the gem is precious, yet the credit goes to the rag that wraps it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Take instruction from any hand that gives it. Once it is given, hold it in your mind. Do not judge the dish it comes on. A coconut shell will serve as well as a silver plate. Your wife, your son, the servants of the house, all of them make you remember Narayana. Tuka says: the gem is what is precious; yet the credit goes to the rag that wraps it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells you to receive truth from wherever it comes and to keep it, instead of measuring the worth of the one who hands it over. He drives the point home with the coconut shell against the silver plate: the value is in what is offered, not in the vessel. Even ordinary household life, wife and son and servants, can turn your mind toward Narayana. His last image keeps you humble: the jewel is the thing of worth, but it is the plain rag wrapping it that earns the thanks, so do not despise the lowly carrier of a great gift.

Do not judge the saints

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When one tries to weigh the virtues and faults of saints in the mind, one only exhausts one's own merit.

It is like someone who squeezes a flower to find its fragrance, or a fool who slices open a banana tree to examine it.

Says Tuka, whoever tries to taint the Ganga or the sacred fire with impurity is a wretch who brings suffering upon himself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When you bring the virtues and faults of the saints into your mind to weigh them, you only burn up your own good merit. It is like squeezing a flower to find its fragrance. It is like a donkey slicing open a banana tree to inspect it. Tuka says: whoever tries to stain the Ganga or the sacred fire with impurity is a wretch, and he brings the suffering down on himself.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram warns against the habit of sitting in judgment over holy people, tallying their good points and bad. The cost is not theirs but yours: the very act spends down your own merit. The flower crushed for its scent and the banana tree hacked apart by a fool show how the inspecting mind destroys the thing it claims to examine. The Ganga and the fire cannot actually be defiled; the one who tries only proves himself the wretch and reaps his own grief. The teaching points at the impulse to appraise the pure, and at where that impulse lands.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A man of worthless company keeps the company of the worthless; though devoid of practice, he wears the color of piety on his body.

The fruit reveals itself at harvest to be of the same nature as its seed; its reputation in the world goes just as it deserves.

It is like hanging a jewel around a monkey's neck while he abandons a noble bride and roams the alleys.

Says Tuka, such a one was born of a she-donkey, and the disgrace that awaits him still lies ahead.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A worthless man keeps worthless company. He wears the color of piety on his body, but the practice is not in him. At harvest the fruit shows itself the same as its seed. So his reputation in the world goes exactly as he has earned it. It is a jewel hung round a monkey's neck. It is a man who abandons a noble bride and goes prowling the alleys. Tuka says: such a one was born of a she-donkey, and the disgrace ahead of him is still to come.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is exposing the man who carries the outward color of devotion while the inner discipline is missing. Like keeps to like, and at the harvest the fruit cannot lie about the seed it grew from; the world's verdict on him will match what he actually is. The jewel on the monkey and the man who leaves a worthy wife to roam back streets name the same waste: real worth handed to one who cannot value it, and the good abandoned for the cheap. The harsh closing line and the warning of disgrace still ahead are aimed at the pattern of empty show, urging you to check whether your own practice matches your appearance.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When caught in the snare of circumstance, even the mighty fall into confusion.

Who can hold off time? All are in the hands of Death.

The generous giver may one day have to beg, and the benefactor may need to seek refuge from a beggar.

Says Tuka, what can I say to Narayana? He alone knows the mystery of it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Once you are caught in the snare of circumstance, even the strong fall into the trap. Who can hold off the hour? All of us are in the hands of Death. The giver who once handed out gifts may himself come begging. The one who helped may have to take refuge with a beggar. Tuka says: you do not understand it. What can I say to Narayana?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming how completely reversal owns our affairs. Caught in circumstance, even the mighty are undone, and no one can push back the appointed hour, since everyone alike is held in the grip of Death. He turns the wheel to show the giver reduced to begging and the benefactor forced to seek shelter from the very poor he once helped. The point is that worldly standing is on loan and can flip without warning. His closing turn to Narayana sets the whole unstable scene against the one who actually holds it, the only refuge the verse leaves standing.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To the unlucky man, treasure appears as serpents, scorpions, and lumps of coal.

A film has covered his eyes, and what was bright now seems smeared and dim.

The ground, the trees, and the very stones seem to spin around his body.

Says Tuka, ruin is the force that blocks the path to one's own good.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To the unlucky man, treasure looks like snakes and scorpions and lumps of coal. A film has come over his eyes, and what was bright now looks smeared and dirty. The ground, the trees, the very stones seem to spin around his body. Tuka says: this ruin is the thing that stands across the path to your own good. The sin blocks the way.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes how misfortune corrupts perception itself. To the ill-fated, real treasure appears as serpents, scorpions, and coal: the same good that would bless another reads as menace and worthlessness to him. The film over the eyes and the spinning ground and stones show that the distortion is in the seer, not in the world. The closing line gives the diagnosis: it is sin, the accumulated wrong, that plants itself across the road and keeps a person from his own good. The poem points at the inner blockage, urging you to see that the smeared vision is the symptom, not the world's true face.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Without seeing anything, I have seen everything.

I became one with all things, and the sense of me and mine fell away.

Without taking, I have received; my hands and feet are at rest.

Without eating, I have tasted; the tongue has become the very flavor.

Without speaking, I have spoken; what was hidden has been made plain.

Says Tuka, without hearing through the ears, it all entered the mind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Without seeing anything, I have seen it all. I became one with everything, and the sense of me and mine fell far away. Without taking, I have received; my hands and feet have come to rest. Without eating, I have tasted; the tongue itself became the flavor. Without speaking, I have spoken; what was hidden has been shown. Tuka says: without hearing it through the ears, it has all come into the mind.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is reporting a state where every sense works without its ordinary object. He sees with no thing to see, possesses with no act of taking, tastes with nothing eaten, speaks without speech, knows without hearing: each line cancels the usual outward path of the sense and finds the experience complete within. The pivot is the second line, where me and mine fall away and he becomes one with all; once the separate self drops, the senses no longer need to reach out to grasp anything. This is the language of nondual realization stated as plain fact, the whole gathered inward where there is nothing left outside to acquire.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

With a seat-cloth tucked under his arm, he stumbles and makes a commotion.

The shameless disgrace cries out, help, help! He has no dignity at all.

Everywhere it is all Ram Ram on the lips, but no one truly practices the discipline.

They fall at the feet of the devout only to strip them bare.

In both worlds they have been disgraced, and their observances have gone to ruin.

Says Tuka, they have destroyed themselves by corrupting the very garb of devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A seat-cloth tucked under his arm, he stumbles and makes a clatter. Help, help, the shameless cheat cries out; he has no dignity at all. Everywhere it is Ram Ram on the lips, but no one actually does the discipline. They fall at the feet of God's devotees only to strip them bare. In both worlds they are disgraced, and their observances have come to ruin. Tuka says: they have destroyed themselves, these who corrupted the very garb of devotion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is attacking the counterfeit holy man, all show and noise with nothing behind it. The name of Ram is on every tongue while the actual practice is nowhere; reverence for true devotees is faked as a way to rob them. The verse names the stakes plainly: such people are disgraced in this world and the next, and their religious observances yield nothing. The closing line locates the real harm. By wearing the garb of devotion as a mask, they corrupt the garb itself and bring ruin on no one so much as themselves. The poem points at the hypocrisy, not at any single soul, asking you to weigh whether your own outward religion has any inward discipline under it.

GATHA 0248 Social Criticism

Social criticism, renouncing the wrong thing

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If one has renounced family but not renounced anger, that devotion is filthy and will not save one from hell.

If one has mastered the letters of scripture yet harbors contempt for saints within, it is all futile.

Says Tuka, such a person's steps lead backward, returning to the very place from which he tried to escape.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He renounced his family, but the anger never went. So his worship is filthy, and the road to hell is not avoided. He drilled himself in the letters of scripture, but inside he carries contempt for the saints. Tuka says: such a person's feet go backward; he returns to the very place he tried to leave.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is exposing renunciation that drops the easy thing and keeps the deadly one. A man can leave wife and household and still carry his anger intact; with that left in place his devotion is fouled and hell is not escaped. Likewise scriptural learning is wasted if it sits over a hidden contempt for holy people. The closing image is the verdict: his steps lead backward, depositing him right where he started, because he renounced the outer ties and never touched the inner faults. The poem points at the pattern of outward sacrifice masking inward corruption, asking you to look at what you are actually willing to give up.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Everything appears in proper order and the words sound correct, but what lies within eventually rises to the surface.

How can such trickery truly pass for the real thing, appearing in the world as if it were truth?

It is like mixing poison into a fine meal, using sweet enticement to harm.

Says Tuka, the deceiver never lets his crookedness show; he puts forward only the mask of welcome and respect.

IN PLAIN WORDS

On the surface everything is in order and the words sound right; but what is inside comes up to the top in the end. How can such trickery really pass for the true thing, looking in the world as if it were truth? It is poison stirred into a good meal, sweet enticement used to kill. Tuka says: the cheat never lets his crookedness show; he puts only the mask of welcome and respect out in front.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing the deceiver whose outside is flawless and whose inside is rotten. The order and the correct words are a surface; given time, what is truly within rises and shows itself. He names the deception sharply: it is poison mixed into a fine meal, sweetness used as the very means of harm, so the danger is greater for being pleasant. The closing line shows the method. The cheat keeps the crookedness perfectly hidden and leads with courtesy and respect. The poem points at the pattern of concealed ill will behind a kind face, urging you to trust what eventually surfaces over what is first served up.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If one established in Brahman breaks even a twig of a living being's life, he has committed the sin of killing his own guru, and all the teachings he received are rendered false.

He was told in initiation to behold his own true Self, yet he spends his time praising his own image.

Through envy toward other beings, his knowledge of Brahman has been stolen by a thief.

He tells others the lessons he has memorized while harboring division and anger in his belly.

Says Tuka, he wastes his speech in both slander and flattery.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If one settled in Brahman snaps even a twig of a living thing's life, he has done the sin of killing his own guru, and the teaching he received is made false. He was told at initiation to behold his own Self; instead he spends his time praising his own image. Through envy of other creatures, his knowledge of Brahman is stolen away by a thief. He recites the lessons he memorized while carrying division and anger in his belly. Tuka says: he wastes his speech on slander and on flattery alike.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures so-called spiritual knowledge against the way it treats living beings. To call oneself established in Brahman and yet harm even a twig of life betrays the teaching so deeply that he equates it with killing the guru and voiding the whole instruction. The man was told to see the one Self in all; instead he worships his own image, and his envy of other creatures lets the real knowledge be quietly robbed from him. He repeats memorized doctrine while harboring division and anger, and spends his tongue on slander and flattery by turns. The poem points at the gap between recited Vedanta and an unchanged, divided heart, asking you to test knowledge by its conduct.

GATHA 0251 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, blessed to be born a servant

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even the gods look upon this human body with longing.

How blessed we are to have been born and become servants of Vitthal.

Says Tuka, let us make this life a stepping stone and plant the flag upon heaven itself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even the gods look on this human body with longing. How blessed we are to have been born and to have become servants of Vithoba. Tuka says: we will make this life a stepping stone, and plant our flag on heaven itself.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praising the rare gift of the human birth as the very thing the gods themselves envy, because only in it can one love and serve God. He counts himself blessed not for power or pleasure but for becoming a servant of Vithoba; the servitude is the fortune. The closing line turns the body into a means rather than an end: this life is a stepping stone, and from it he means to plant his flag even over heaven. The poem names the stakes of a human life and points it wholly toward devotion.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if a scholar has mastered all learning, he should listen to the stories of Krishna with devotion.

When milk, ghee, and sugar meet together, they embrace in a sweetness that is beyond description.

Knowing this profit, take it into your lap; savor the sweet upon the sweet, dear one.

Uproot the very sprout of intellectual pride if you truly care about your own liberation.

All the fragrant substances and fine remedies, the sandalwood paste applied upon the body, are nothing; without having eaten, all adornment is hollow, and so is life without the taste of Hari's story.

The Vedas, the scriptures, and the Puranas all exist for this alone: that same Vitthal stands present like true coin in the gathering of devotion.

Says Tuka, everything else is but heaps of stone; all the turmoil of the world has its root right there.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even if a scholar has finished all his learning, let him still listen to the stories of Krishna with love. When milk and ghee and sugar meet, they fold together in a sweetness beyond telling. Knowing this gain, take it into your lap; taste sweet upon sweet, dear one. Uproot the very sprout of cleverness, root and stem, if you truly care for your own freedom. All the fragrant powders, the fine remedies, the sandalwood paste on the body are nothing. Without having eaten, all the adornment is empty; and so is life without the taste of Hari's story. The Vedas, the scriptures, the Puranas all exist for this one thing: that same Vitthal stands present, like true coin, in the telling of the story. Tuka says: everything else is heaps of stone, and all the world's noise has its root right there.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets loving attention to Krishna's story above the highest scholarship. Even the finished scholar should still listen with devotion, for the story mixed with love is like milk, ghee, and sugar coming together into an indescribable sweetness. The hard demand is the third stanza: uproot intellectual pride at the root if you actually want liberation, because cleverness is what blocks the taste. He grants that ornament and fragrance and learning have their place, then strips it away. Without the meal itself the adornment is hollow, and a life without Hari's story is exactly that. He gives scripture its true purpose: the Vedas and Puranas all point to this, where Vitthal himself stands present like genuine coin in the gathering. Everything outside that, he says, is only heaps of stone, and the world's whole clamor traces back to missing this one center.

GATHA 0253 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the cruel idol-monger

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

They sever the heads of others and know no limit to their cruelty.

These wretches borrow sins on credit only to suffer in the city of Yama.

They have made a god of a smear of vermilion and make vows to it.

Says Tuka, while the children dance in foolish worship, they cry out in pain when someone scratches them.

IN PLAIN WORDS

They cut off the heads of others, and there is no end to their hardness. These wretches borrow sins on credit, only to pay for it in the city of Yama. They take a smear of vermilion and make a god of it, and they speak their vows to that. Tuka says: the children dance in their foolish worship, but when someone scratches the idol, it is their own bodies that ache.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is attacking a hollow, cruel kind of religion, not the worshipers' helplessness. He sees people who are merciless toward others while running up a debt of sin they imagine they can defer, as if the reckoning in Yama's realm were on credit. He mocks the manufactured god: a smudge of vermilion turned into a deity, vowed to as if it could deliver. The closing image cuts deepest: the worshipers behave like children playing at devotion, so identified with their lump of an idol that an injury to it is felt as a hurt in their own flesh. The point is the emptiness of worship aimed at a thing of one's own making.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Gandharvas, Agni, and Soma all partake of the virgin bride; where in all creation was desire ever renounced?

Gayatri herself consumes impurities from her own mouth, and the streams that join the Ganga become the Ganga.

The holy peepal tree was born from a crow's droppings, and even the Pandava lineage is not without blemish.

Shakuntala, Suta, Karna, Shringi, and Vyasa: their very names destroy all sins.

Ganika, Ajamila, Kubja, Vidura, and the courtesan Pingala all show this truth upon reflection.

Valmiki the robber, Vishwamitra, Vasishtha, and Narada: their pasts were far from pure.

Deeds done by men and women that should never have been done are wiped away when, in remorse, one remembers Hari.

Says Tuka, Shri Hari does not even recall the past; whoever digs up those old roots falls into hell.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Gandharvas, Agni, and Soma all enjoy the virgin bride; where in all creation has desire been renounced? Gayatri eats impurities with her own mouth, and the streams that fall into the Ganga become the Ganga. The peepal tree is born from a crow's droppings, and even the Pandava line, looked at closely, carries blemish. Shakuntala, Suta, Karna, Shringi, Vyasa: their very names burn away sins. The courtesan, Ajamila, Kubja, Vidura, and Pingala the harlot, consider them and see. Valmiki the robber, Vishwamitra, Vasishtha, Narada: what pure past did any of them have? Men and women have done deeds that should never have been done, and remembering Hari in remorse, they are set free. Tuka says: Shri Hari does not call the past to mind; the one who digs up the old roots, hell is for him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is overturning the idea that a tainted past disqualifies anyone from grace. He stacks up case after case from the old stories, gods, sages, rivers, sacred trees, where the origin or conduct was impure, yet the holiness stands. The pivot is mercy: deeds that should never have been done are wiped clean when one turns back in genuine remorse and remembers Hari. He goes further than forgiveness, saying God does not even keep the memory of the past. The sting falls on the one who insists on excavating those old roots; that digging, not the old sin, is what earns hell.

You may recite the Vedas to a deaf man, but how will he grasp what they mean? Tuka says: only the one to whom a thing belongs truly knows its worth. Only the saintly know the greatness of devotion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is saying that the value of a precious thing depends on the one who receives it. Milk-rice on a golden plate, a pearl necklace, musk, the Vedas: each is beyond price, yet wasted on a dog, a donkey, a pig, a deaf man, who cannot register what they hold. He is not sneering at people so much as naming a hard fact of fitness: devotion is just such a treasure, and its glory is visible only to those who have the heart to know it. The worth is real either way; what changes is whether the receiver can recognize it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It is impossible to satisfy the world's opinion, O Lord, Redeemer of the fallen.

If you engage in worldly life, they call you sinful; if you renounce, they call you a lazy parasite.

If you follow rituals, they say it is mere show; if you do not, they condemn you.

If you keep the company of saints, they call you a preacher; if you do not, they say you lack wisdom.

If you have no wealth, you are a born wretch; if you are prosperous, they mock your pride.

If you do not visit others, they call you arrogant; if you do, they say you are a pest who ruins homes.

If you marry, they say you have gone wild; if you do not, they call you impotent.

If you have no children, they call you accursed; if you have many, they call them a burden of sin.

The ways of the world can never be satisfied, and the company of saints cannot be digested by the faithless.

Says Tuka, listen now to this counsel: abandon the world's opinion and simply practice devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This worldly opinion can never be kept satisfied, O Redeemer of the fallen, my Lord. Live a household life and they call you a sinner; give it up and they call you a lazy belly-filler. Keep the rituals and they say it is all show; drop them and they condemn you. Keep the company of saints and they call you a preacher; stay away and they say you have no wisdom. Have no wealth and you are a born wretch; be rich and they mock your pride. Stay away from people and they call you cold; come and go and they say you are ruining homes. Marry and they say you have gone wild; do not, and they call you impotent. Have no children and they call you accursed; have many and they call them a brood of sin. The world's way can never be pinned down, and the company of saints cannot be stomached by the faithless. Tuka says: now hear this counsel. Leave the world's opinion behind and simply do devotion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out the trap of living for other people's verdict: whatever you do, the opposite is held against you. He runs through the whole list, household and renunciation, ritual and no ritual, poverty and wealth, marriage and celibacy, children and none, to show there is no posture that escapes blame. The lesson is not bitterness but release: since the world can never be satisfied, trying to satisfy it is wasted life. He notes too that those without faith simply cannot digest the company of saints, so their judgment is no measure at all. The counsel that lands is plain: stop managing opinion, and put that energy into devotion.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We must make every effort to protect righteousness.

One who abandons prescribed duties before attaining the state of inner realization is merely a fraud.

Says Tuka, the worst of all is the one who brings dishonor to the devotion of Hari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For the sake of guarding dharma, we must take the trouble and make the effort. One who throws off his duties before that settled state is fixed in him is only a fraud. Tuka says: the lowest of all is the one who brings dishonor to the devotion of Hari.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram defends active duty against a counterfeit version of renunciation. Protecting dharma takes real effort, and he accepts that labor as ours to do. He warns against the man who drops his prescribed duties before inner realization has actually taken root in him; such early abandonment is not freedom but fraud, a posture without the substance behind it. The sharpest condemnation is saved for the one who disgraces the devotion of Hari, whom he calls the lowest of all. The pattern under examination is using high spiritual language to excuse skipping the work.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He who contains the fourteen worlds within his belly, that very one we have enshrined in our hearts.

What could possibly be lacking in our home? Wealth and miraculous powers attend our door.

He who shackled demons in anklets now joins his own two palms before us.

He who has no form, no outline, no shape, we have made manifest through devotion.

He in whose body rest countless universes becomes as small as an ant for our sake.

Wealth and supernatural powers have been kicked away with joy; who then would honor these worldly trifles?

Says Tuka, we have become mightier than God himself by setting aside all desire.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He who holds the fourteen worlds inside his belly, that very one we have stored in our throat. What is lacking in our home? Wealth and miraculous powers wait at our door. He who shackled demons in anklets now folds both his palms before us. He who has no form, no line, no shape, we have made him take form through devotion. He in whose body countless universes rest becomes small as an ant for our sake. Wealth and powers we have kicked away in joy; who here would honor such common trifles? Tuka says: we have become mightier than God himself, by setting our every desire aside.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes the startling claim that the devotee becomes greater than God. The logic is love's reversal: the One who contains all worlds is held in the devotee's throat, the formless is given a form by devotion, the infinite shrinks to ant-size out of love for His own. Because the devotee wants nothing, not wealth, not the siddhis that line up at the door, he has nothing left to be ruled by, and so he stands above even the Lord. The boast is not arrogance but the math of surrender: the one who has emptied himself of desire holds the only real power. Desirelessness, not might, is what makes him mightier than God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

They make Shiva's image out of clay, but can clay be called Shiva? The worship of Shiva reaches Shiva, while the clay returns to clay.

In the same way, when saints are worshipped, it is God who receives that worship. We are mere servants and attendants of the saints; we do not seek the status of sainthood for ourselves.

They make Vishnu's image out of stone, but the stone is not Vishnu. The worship of Vishnu reaches Vishnu, and the stone remains as stone.

They make the image of the Goddess from bronze, but bronze is not the Goddess. The worship of the Goddess reaches the Goddess, and bronze remains as bronze.

Says Tuka, in the fullness of Brahman's bliss, all this is like diluted gruel. The worship belongs to the one who is worshipped; we remain as we are, like stone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

They make Shiva from clay, but who calls the clay Shiva? The worship of Shiva reaches Shiva; the clay sinks back into clay. In the same way the saints are worshipped, and it is God who receives that worship. We are servants, the slaves of the saints; we do not want the rank of sainthood for ourselves. They make Vishnu from stone, but the stone is not Vishnu. The worship of Vishnu reaches Vishnu; the stone stays as stone. They make the Goddess Jagadamba from bronze, but the bronze is not the Goddess. The worship of the Goddess reaches the Goddess; the bronze stays as bronze. Tuka says: in the fullness of Brahman's bliss, all of this is thin gruel. The worship belongs to the one worshipped; we stay as we are, like stone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram separates the image from the one it points to. Clay, stone, and bronze are only the form a worshiper happens to use; the worship itself travels through to Shiva, Vishnu, or the Goddess, while the material stays exactly what it was. He turns this on himself and his fellow saints: when people honor them, it is God who actually receives it, so he refuses any claim to sainthood and keeps the place of a servant. Measured against the fullness of Brahman, all these honors are watered-down gruel, not the real thing. The humility is precise: he chooses to remain inert as stone and let the worship pass on to the one it truly belongs to.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those are my true kin, my noble companions, who remember the feet of Vitthal.

As for the others, I regard them only as much as one must; they are God's creatures, after all.

With my whole being, I have become a servant of the Vaishnavas; I long even for their leftovers.

Says Tuka, I hold no desire for anyone else the way I cherish the devotees of Hari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those are my true kin, my noble companions, who keep remembering the feet of Vithoba. The rest I regard only as far as duty asks, since they too are God's creatures. With my whole heart I have become a servant of the Vaishnavas; I long even for the food they leave behind. Tuka says: I hold no desire for anyone else the way I cherish the servants of Hari.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram redraws kinship around devotion rather than blood. The people who remember Vithoba's feet are his real family and friends; everyone else he treats with the bare courtesy duty requires, honoring them only as fellow creatures of God. His longing runs the other way entirely, toward the Vaishnavas, to whom he gives himself so completely that he craves even their leftovers as a kind of grace. The claim is that no ordinary attachment can match the love he holds for the servants of Hari. The verse names where his heart actually lives.

Moral ideal, compassion and the protection of dharma

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Compassion means the nurturing of all beings and the destruction of those who cause harm.

Sin is acting without considering what is right, behaving recklessly at all times.

Says Tuka, to protect righteousness, even God must take the trouble of being born.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Compassion, that is its name: the nurturing of all beings, and along with it the cutting down of those who do harm. Sin, that is its name: acting without ever asking what is right, behaving wildly all the time. Tuka says: to guard dharma, even God takes the trouble to be born.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram defines compassion as having two edges, not one. True mercy nurtures every living being, and the same mercy uproots those who prey on the helpless; sparing the harmful would not be kindness but neglect of the vulnerable. He sets sin opposite this: living recklessly, never pausing to ask what is right. To make the stakes clear he points to God's own descents, saying that even the Lord takes on birth for the sake of guarding dharma. The pattern he calls out is mistaking softness toward cruelty for compassion.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A mother wishes to do good for her child, and the child reflects that goodness back.

She holds the child dearer than her own life.

Separation from the child is poison to her, even if it comes in the guise of comfort and care.

Says Tuka, just as the foot delights the eye that beholds it, so is this principle of love.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A mother wishes good for her child, and that good rises up again in the child. She holds it dearer than her own life. Separation from it is poison to her, even when it comes dressed as care and comfort. Tuka says: just as the foot gives delight to the eye that looks on it, so it is with this love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses a mother's love to describe how God and the devotee hold each other. The mother wills only good for her child, and that good comes back reflected; she values the child above her own life, so that any separation is poison even if it wears the mask of comfort. His closing image, the eye delighting in the foot, points to a love that does not climb or rank, in which the lowest part gives joy to the highest. The verse is naming the quality of true devotional love: protective, self-forgetting, and pained by any distance. It reads as a longing for that same closeness with the Lord.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the daughter leaves for her husband's home, she keeps turning back to look.

My soul feels just the same: when will you meet me again, Keshava?

Like a child separated from its mother, who looks around in every direction with anxious eyes.

Says Tuka, like a fish taken out of water, I writhe in longing.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A daughter goes off to her husband's home, and keeps turning back to look. My soul has become just like that: when will you meet me again, Keshava? Like a child who has lost its mother, looking this way and that with frightened eyes. Tuka says: like a fish lifted out of the water, I writhe and burn.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pours the pain of separation from God into three plain images. The bride leaving her childhood home keeps glancing back, unable to let go; the lost child searches every direction in fear; the fish out of water thrashes and cannot breathe. Each picture sharpens the same ache, his soul cut off from Keshava and unable to rest until they meet again. The cry, when will you meet me, is the heart of the verse. It is the language of viraha, the longing of one who knows where life is and cannot reach it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

They hold gold coins in hand and bargain for a bride, making settlements over the daughter's future.

Such are the ways of this dark age, where merit is impoverished and sin grows strong.

The twice-born have abandoned their rituals and become informers and thieves.

They hide their sacred marks in folds of cloth and wear leather trousers.

Sitting upon their thrones, they torment the people without offering food.

They live off writing decrees, skimming oil and ghee.

They serve the lowly and, if they stumble, are beaten for it.

The king oppresses his subjects, and the warrior cuts down the uncertain.

As for the merchants, laborers, and all the rest, what more need be said of them?

All is outward decoration; inside it is raw, with only a mask on top.

Says Tuka, O God, have you fallen asleep? Wake up and come to our rescue.

IN PLAIN WORDS

They flash gold coins in hand and bargain over the daughter, setting a price on her. Such is the dharma of this dark age: merit goes begging, sin grows strong. The twice-born have thrown off their conduct and become informers and thieves. They hide their sacred marks in the folds of their clothes and wear leather trousers. Seated on their thrones, they torment the people and keep food from them. They live by writing out decrees, getting by on skimmed oil and ghee. They serve the base, and when they slip they are beaten for it. The king oppresses his subjects; the warrior cuts down the defenseless. As for the merchants, the laborers, and the rest, they are simply low by nature. It is all outward color: raw inside, a costume on top. Tuka says: O God, have you gone to sleep? Come running.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram surveys a society he sees rotting in the Kali age, where worth is poor and wickedness is powerful. He moves down the ranks: brahmins who sell daughters and turn informer, hiding their sacred marks while taking on alien dress; officials who tax and starve the people from their seats of power; kings who crush their subjects and warriors who strike the helpless. His verdict is that the whole order has become surface, bright paint over something raw, a mask with nothing behind it. The closing line turns the criticism into a prayer, calling on a God who seems asleep to wake and come. The aim is to hold up the pattern of hollow, self-serving authority, not any single person.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Giving away a well-adorned daughter in marriage is considered equal to giving away the earth itself.

But this does not dawn upon the fool; he will come to understand only when he faces the consequences ahead.

If one performs one's duties properly, the belly is filled and righteousness is upheld.

God supports the truthful; put this to the test and see.

Food, honor, and wealth are all subject to destiny.

Says Tuka, after toil comes sorrow, and in the end, ruin.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To give away a daughter, well adorned, in marriage is as great a gift as giving away the whole earth. But the fool does not see this. He will see it later, when the consequences come. Do your duty rightly; the belly is filled and dharma stands. God upholds the truthful. Try it, and see for yourself. Food, honor, wealth: these are all in the hands of destiny. Tuka says: this greed brings sorrow now, and ruin ahead.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is contrasting two ways of giving a daughter in marriage. To give her freely and well prepared is the highest gift, on a par with giving away the earth itself; to sell her for gain is the act of a fool who cannot yet see what he is doing. He insists that an honest livelihood already feeds the belly and keeps dharma intact, and that God himself stands behind the truthful, a thing one can test. Food, honor, and wealth come by destiny anyway, so grasping for them this way is needless. The warning lands at the end: the greed looks like profit now, but its end is sorrow and ruin.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

With torches and music and a feast laid out, they prepare the bride in all her finery and place her hand in the groom's.

The groom takes the bride home, and the priest receives his ritual offering.

The bride's family and the groom's family are honored; do not hold back anything that has been pledged.

Let the couple bathe and prepare properly; can they not understand what is fitting?

The wedding guests follow behind, squeezed like oil from sesame.

Says Tuka, all this accumulated show is merely spit, preparation for hell.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Torches and music, a feast laid out, the bride dressed in all her finery, her hand placed in the groom's. The groom takes the bride to his house; the priest is paid his offering. The two families are honored; hold back nothing that was pledged. Let the couple be bathed and made ready. Can they not see what is fitting? The wedding guests trail behind, pressed like oil squeezed from sesame. Tuka says: all this heaped-up display is only spit. It is provisions for hell.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram walks through a grand wedding step by step, the torches, the music, the feast, the dressed bride, the paid priest, the honored families, the trailing guests, and lets the show build to its full size. He is not praising any of it. The squeezed guests and the long list of obligations expose how much vanity and expense are demanded of everyone. The verdict cuts through the whole spectacle: all this accumulated splendor amounts to no more than spit, and far from earning merit it is provisions a person packs for hell. The point is not the ceremony itself but the hollow pride and waste that have taken it over.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if one has killed a Brahmin or slaughtered cows, even if one has committed every other sin, listen now to the infamy of the one who has sold his daughter for gold.

He has fed on human flesh, which is why he is called a demon.

All sin has been committed by the one who coveted gold.

Says Tuka, merely uttering this sin makes my tongue tremble. The wretch and the shameless rogue: why does he not simply beg for dry bread instead?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Killing a Brahmin, slaughtering cows, every other sin there is: listen now to the disgrace of the man who sold his daughter for gold. He has eaten human flesh; that is why he is called a demon. He who coveted the gold has committed every sin at once. Even to say this sin aloud sets my tongue trembling. Tuka says: you wretch, you shameless rogue, why not just beg for dry bread instead?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the worst sins he can name, killing a Brahmin, slaughtering cows, against the act of selling one's own daughter, and says the seller's infamy outweighs them all. Calling him a flesh-eater and a demon is moral horror, not literal report: a father who treats his child as goods has fed on his own kin. The trembling tongue shows how deeply the act revolts him. The closing taunt points at the real failure: poverty was no excuse, since honest begging for dry bread was always open to him. The contempt is aimed at the pattern of treating a person as merchandise, a warning to examine where one's own greed would lead.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whoever takes the side of such a person is equal to him in guilt.

For nothing, he earns a share of suffering, and his ancestors are cast into the torments of hell.

If the king hears of this and does not punish such a wicked scoundrel, then even the king's food is as impure as liquor.

Says Tuka, associating with such evil makes one equally corrupt.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whoever takes this man's side is just as guilty as he is. For nothing, he earns his share of the suffering, and his ancestors are dragged into the torments of hell. Listen: if the king hears of it and does not punish such a vile scoundrel, then even the king's food is as foul as liquor. Tuka says: to keep company with such evil is to become just as corrupt.

WHAT IT MEANS

Following the rebuke of the daughter-seller, Tukaram turns to everyone around him. To defend such a man is to share his guilt fully and to gain nothing but a portion of his suffering, dragging even one's forebears down. He then raises the stakes to those in power: a king who learns of the wrong and refuses to punish it is himself defiled, his very food made impure. The closing line states the principle plainly: corruption spreads by association, so silence and shelter are not neutral. The poem points the listener toward self-examination about whom they enable and excuse.

I have not set up a shop of worship or a deity to collect revenue.

I have no spirit or demon at my command to reveal secrets.

I am not a professional reciter who says one thing and does another.

I do not know the pot-and-cloth arguments that make a pedantic scholar into a pauper.

I do not go about beating drums with crowds shouting praises.

I do not turn a rosary surrounded by a throng of idle followers.

I know nothing of tantric tricks, of binding, enchanting, or banishing.

Says Tuka, I am none of these; I am just a hell-dwelling madman.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I know no cunning, no way to fool people. I only sing your kirtan and praise your good qualities. I cannot show off herbs and roots or work sudden miracles. I have no line of disciples; I speak freely to whoever comes. I am no head of a monastery, and I do not live off followers' offerings. I have set up no shop of worship, no deity to bring in money. I have no spirit at my command to reveal hidden things. I am no professional reciter who says one thing and does another. I do not know the pot-and-cloth wrangling that turns a scholar into a pauper. I do not march about beating drums in a shouting crowd. I do not rattle a rosary surrounded by a throng of idlers. I know nothing of the false arts of binding, enchanting, driving away. Tuka says: I am none of these. I am only a hell-dwelling madman.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram defines himself entirely by what he is not. One by one he strikes off the roles a holy man could exploit: the miracle-monger, the guru with a captive following, the abbot living on offerings, the priest running worship as a business, the spirit-conjurer, the hypocrite reciter, the showy debater, the drum-beating crowd-leader, the tantric trickster. Each of these is a way religion can be turned into power or income, and he refuses every one. All he claims is to sing God's praises and speak openly to anyone. The closing self-mockery, calling himself a hell-dwelling madman, is honest humility set against the proud pretenders he has just listed; it invites the listener to weigh real devotion against religious performance.

Faith, what God gives is sweet

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे धीरा । विण कैसा होतो हिरा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who ever gained honor by weeping and begging for it?

What God gives freely is truly sweet; both relish and delight remain with it.

If you cultivate a garden, it yields fruit you can sell, give away, or enjoy.

Says Tuka, without patience, how can a stone ever become a diamond?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who ever won an ornament by weeping and begging for it? What God gives freely is sweet; the taste and the delight of it stay. Tend a garden and it bears fruit you can sell, give away, or enjoy. Tuka says: without patience, how does a stone ever become a diamond?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is teaching how grace is actually received. Honor that is wrung out by complaint and pleading is worthless; what God grants freely carries a lasting sweetness and joy. He grounds this in plain images: a tended garden yields fruit you can use every way, and a stone becomes a diamond only through long pressure and time. The lesson is patience and trust rather than grasping demand. One waits on God's giving and does the steady work, and the reward, when it comes, is genuine and stays.

Conduct, one seat for the saints

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे एकाएकीं वरासनें । दुजें तेथें भिन्न अशोभ्य तें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When a seat of honor is prepared for the revered one, it is only fitting that one seat be occupied by one person, as a child sits in its mother's lap.

I speak of the principles of propriety and righteous conduct; may you heed them for your own good.

When saints vie for seats and positions of worship, they are already caught in a snare of worldly attachment.

Says Tuka, only one may sit upon the high seat; a second presence there would be unseemly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When a seat of honor is set out for the revered one, one seat should hold one person, the way a child sits in its mother's lap. I am telling you the rules of right conduct; heed them for your own good. When saints scramble for seats and honors of worship, they are already caught in worldly entanglement. Tuka says: only one belongs on the high seat. A second presence there is out of place and unseemly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is giving a quiet teaching on propriety among the devout. The image of one seat for one person, like a child in its mother's lap, is about fittingness and undivided place. His real concern surfaces in the middle: the moment saints compete for seats and honors of worship, they have already fallen into the very worldly attachment they are supposed to have left. The high seat is meant for one, and crowding it is unseemly. The poem warns that the appetite for status can creep in even among holy people, and asks them to watch for it in themselves.

Social criticism, the two-faced flatterer

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The same mouth that praises to one's face turns around and slanders behind one's back.

Such is the breed of the base; they swallow gold and eat dirt.

Just as fine sweets turn to filth when they exit through the anus, so does the base man reduce all that is good to waste.

Says Tuka, like a scorpion that stings for no profit, such a person toils only in vain.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The same mouth that praises you to your face turns and slanders you behind your back. Such is the breed of the base: they let gold slip away and eat dirt. Fine sweets, passing out through the body, turn into filth; just so the base man turns all that is good to waste. Tuka says: like a scorpion that stings for no gain, such a person only wears himself out.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram exposes the two-faced flatterer, the one whose praise to your face is reversed into slander the moment your back is turned. He calls this a base disposition that throws away what is precious and feeds on what is worthless, gold let go, dirt eaten. The blunt image of sweets turning to filth as they pass through the body shows how such a person degrades whatever good comes near them. The scorpion that stings without profit names the futility: this malice gains nothing, it only exhausts the one who carries it. The poem points at the pattern of duplicity, inviting the listener to test their own tongue against it.

Moral warning, friendship with the base

मराठी मूळ

सर्पाचिया परी । विषें भरला कल्हारीं ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे देवा । मज झणी ऐसे दावा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Friendship with the base is like the color of a lac dye: it fades before the moment is over, and its value goes to waste for nothing.

Like a serpent, such a person is full of venom even amid a bed of lotuses.

Says Tuka, O God, never let me encounter such people.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Friendship with the base is like the color of a lac dye: it fades before the moment is out, and its worth is wasted for nothing. Like a serpent, such a person is full of venom even among a bed of lotuses. Tuka says: O God, never let me meet such people.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures the worth of bad company through two sharp images. The friendship of base people is like a cheap dye that loses its color almost at once, promising much and holding nothing. Worse, such a person is like a snake whose poison stays in it even when it lies among lotuses; no fair surroundings can sweeten a venomous nature. The poem ends not in scorn but in prayer: he asks God simply to keep him clear of such company. The teaching is about guarding one's own heart by being careful whom one binds oneself to.

Devotion, only Panduranga

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे मज आणिका संकल्पें । अवघीं च पापें घडतील ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To praise anyone other than Panduranga is, for us, as grave as killing a Brahmin.

We devotees of Vishnu hold a single-pointed faith; we do not call any other being God.

Let my tongue be split into a hundred pieces if I ever waver from this vow.

Says Tuka, even the thought of turning to another would heap upon me every sin.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To praise anyone but Panduranga is, for us, as grave as killing a Brahmin. We servants of Vishnu hold a single faith; we call no other being God. Let my tongue be split into a hundred pieces if I ever turn from this vow. Tuka says: even the thought of turning to another would heap every sin upon me.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is Tukaram's vow of single-pointed devotion. For him and his fellow devotees of Vishnu, to give praise meant for God to anyone else is no small lapse; he measures it against the gravest of sins. The wish that his tongue be torn to pieces if he ever wavers is the language of an oath, the full weight he places on faithfulness to Panduranga alone. He goes further: not even the act, but the mere thought of turning elsewhere would, for him, gather every sin. The poem names the cost of undivided devotion and his refusal to divide it.

GATHA 0275 Prayers

Prayer, the small wish, the boundless giver

मराठी मूळ

तान्हेल्याची धणी । फिटे गंगा नव्हे उणी ॥१॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The thirst of the thirsty is quenched at the Ganga, and the Ganga is not diminished by it.

O treasury of mercy, bring my heart's wishes to fulfillment.

You are the king of the generous; my desires are but small.

Says Tuka, look upon me with the eye of grace and be my support.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The thirsty drink their fill at the Ganga, and the Ganga is not made less. O treasury of mercy, bring my heart's wishes to fulfillment. You are the king of the generous; my desires are only small. Look on me with the eye of grace. Tuka says: be my support.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays from the logic of God's abundance. The Ganga quenches every thirst yet loses nothing, so granting his wish costs the giver nothing at all. He addresses God as a treasury of mercy and the king of the generous, then makes himself small against that vastness: his desires are slight, easily met by such a one. The request is simple, a glance of grace and God's support. The poem is a model of humble asking that leans wholly on the giver's bounty rather than on its own worth.

GATHA 0276 The Saints

Saints, worship without love is empty

मराठी मूळ

संताचा अतिक्रम । देवपूजा तो अधर्म ॥१॥

तुका म्हणे देवा । ताडण भेदकांची सेवा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To mistreat a saint while worshipping God is itself unrighteousness.

The flowers and mantras offered upon God's head return like stones thrown upward.

One abuses the guest and then offers a fine bread to the deity.

Says Tuka, the service of one who injures devotees is but a beating upon God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To wrong a saint while worshipping God is itself unrighteous. The mantras and flowers set on God's head come back like stones flung upward. You abuse the guest, then offer fine bread to the deity. Tuka says: the service of one who injures devotees is only a beating laid on God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tests temple worship against how a person treats God's own people. To honor the deity while mistreating a saint is not piety but its opposite; the offerings of mantra and flower rebound like stones thrown into the air, returning harm to the worshipper. The picture of abusing a guest and then presenting fine bread to the idol shows the contradiction at the heart of such worship. The closing line is severe: to hurt a devotee is to strike God himself, however lavish the ritual. The poem insists that real worship is inseparable from love and respect for the living, not confined to the altar.

GATHA 0277 The Saints

The saints, the one true service

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The one service that truly reaches God is this: serve his devotees, for the devotee is God's own body, and through this alone everything is accomplished.

Says Tuka, this is the essential secret; this is what all scriptures call dharma.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There is one thing to do for God; only this reaches him as service. Through it everything gets done. Serve his devotees, for the devotee is God's own body. This is the one secret. This is what dharma always said. Tuka says: this is the heart of it all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram collapses all of religion into a single act and tells you why it works. The one service that reaches God is to serve his devotees, because the devotee is not separate from God but is God's own body. So when you honor the bhakta you are touching God directly, and through this alone everything else gets accomplished. Tukaram does not present this as one practice among many; he calls it the single secret, and he says this is what dharma was pointing at all along.

Moral vow, the firm boundary

मराठी मूळ

मागें नेणपणें घडलें तें क्षमा । आतां देतों सीमा करूनियां ॥१॥
परनारीचें जया घडलें गमन । दावीतो वदन जननीरत ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका म्हणे साक्षी असों द्यावें मन । घातली ते आण पाळावया ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What was done in the past through ignorance, let it be forgiven. From now on, I set a firm boundary.

Whoever has committed adultery with another's wife, I show his face for what it is: defiled by incest.

One whose mind remains out of control even after receiving instruction should never be allowed before us again.

Says Tuka, let the conscience be witness; the vow that has been taken must be kept.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What I did in the past out of not knowing, let that be forgiven. From now I draw a firm line. The man who has gone to another man's wife shows the face of one who lies with his own mother. The man whose mind stays out of his hands even after he is taught, let him never come before us again. Tuka says: let the conscience stand as witness; the vow that is taken must be kept.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram forgives the past but slams a door on the future, and he names the line in the harshest terms he can find. Adultery with another's wife, he says, has the face of incest with one's own mother; he refuses to let it look small. He sets a second line for the person who keeps offending even after being instructed: such a one is no longer welcome among them. The point is not to crush a sinner but to make the boundary unmistakable and self-binding, so he calls his own conscience as witness that the vow he has just sworn will be kept.

GATHA 0279 The Moral Ideal

Social criticism, the malicious heart

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those whose hearts find satisfaction in the harm done to others, know them as sinners, dwellers in hell, quick to anger.

They stretch their ears to listen and then speak vile words.

Says Tuka, the quarrelsome one has no patience upon his tongue.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those whose minds grow calm and pleased when others are harmed: know them as the sinners. They live in hell already; they flare into anger fast. They open their ears wide to hear, and then their mouths speak evil words. Tuka says: the quarrelsome one has no patience on his tongue.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram gives a plain test for recognizing a corrupt heart: watch what gives it peace. The one who feels satisfied when another person is hurt is the real sinner, already a dweller in hell, quick to rage. He notices the small mechanics of it too, the ears that strain to catch bad news and the mouth that rushes to spread it. The warning points at a pattern any of us can fall into, the appetite for others' ruin and the tongue that cannot hold itself back, rather than at one named enemy.

Bhakti to Hanuman, surrender

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I surrender to you again and again, O Hanuman; I have come to you, messenger of Rama.

Show me the path of devotion, O great warrior.

You are brave and steadfast, ever ready in the service of your master.

Says Tuka, O Rudra, O son of Anjani, I bow to you.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I surrender, I surrender, O Hanuman; I have come to you, messenger of Rama. Show me the paths of devotion, O great warrior. You are brave and steadfast, ever ready in your master's work. Tuka says: O Rudra, O son of Anjani, I bow.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram comes to Hanuman not for power but for instruction in devotion itself. He repeats the word of surrender and names Hanuman as Rama's messenger, then asks the one thing he wants: show me the ways of bhakti. His reason is in the praise that follows. Hanuman is brave, steadfast, and always ready in his master's service, so he is the perfect teacher of how to love and serve. The closing names, Rudra and son of Anjani, set the bow inside Hanuman's own lineage and glory.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He accomplished the search for Sita even before the Ramayana's great events unfolded.

Such is his glory, profound and mighty; he is the ornament of all gods and devotees.

Going down into the netherworld, he humbled the demons.

Rama and Lakshmana were secretly taken there, and he brought them back.

He stands before his Lord with palms joined in reverence.

Says Tuka, by chanting the name of the Son of the Wind, all sins are destroyed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He found Sita; this was set before the great events of the Ramayana unfolded. Such is his glory, deep and mighty; he is the ornament of all gods and all devotees. He went down into the netherworld and humbled its demons. Rama and Lakshmana were carried off there by stealth, and he brought them back. He stands before his Lord with palms joined. Tuka says: chant the name of the Son of the Wind, and your sins go.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strings together Hanuman's deeds to show a power that is total and a heart that is humble. He recalls the search for Sita and the descent into the netherworld, where Hanuman humbled the demons and recovered Rama and Lakshmana after they were carried off by stealth. Yet for all this might, the image he leaves us with is Hanuman standing before his Lord with folded palms, glory bent into service. The turn at the end is the practical claim: simply chanting the name of the Son of the Wind destroys sins, so the listener is handed a path, not just a story.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He bound Desire and banished Death from the land.

I bow before him, Hanuman of the clan of apes.

His body is hard as a thunderbolt, and with his tail he can encircle the entire universe.

Says Tuka, I have come in surrender to this servant of Rama.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He put Desire in chains; he drove Death out of the land. To him I bow down, Hanuman of the clan of apes. His body is hard as a thunderbolt; with his tail he encircles the whole universe. Tuka says: I have come in surrender to this servant of Rama.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram praises Hanuman as the one who masters the very forces that master us. He says Hanuman bound Desire and banished Death, the two powers no ordinary person can overcome, so bowing to him is bowing to that mastery. The body hard as a thunderbolt and the tail that wraps the whole universe show a strength without limit. But Tukaram's surrender is aimed precisely: he comes not to a free lord but to the servant of Rama, since for him Hanuman's greatness is finally the greatness of perfect service.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hanuman, the supremely mighty, singed the beard of Ravana.

To him I offer my salutations again and again, without end.

Leaping into the sky, he set Lanka ablaze.

Says Tuka, blessed, blessed is he who burned Lanka to the ground.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hanuman, the mighty one, scorched Ravana's beard. To him I bow again and again, without end. He leaped into the sky and set Lanka on fire. He burned Lanka down. Tuka says: blessed, blessed is he.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram celebrates the moment Hanuman humbled Ravana and burned his city. The singed beard is the small, almost mocking detail of the demon-king's defeat, and the leap into the sky and the burning of Lanka are the larger act. Against this Tukaram sets his own response, salutations offered again and again without end, and the cry blessed, blessed. The abhanga is pure adoration: it does not argue or instruct, it simply bows before the deed and calls Hanuman fortunate beyond measure.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All pots come from the same kiln of clay, yet some are baked to strength while others crumble in the fire.

So has destiny made distinct portions from the same source.

Diamonds and common stones come from the same mine, yet water will never be found in the foreign rock.

Says Tuka, each one serves as a stepping stone upon the head of another.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All the pots come from one kiln. In the firing, some hold and some are spoiled. So destiny makes different lots out of the same source. Diamonds and plain stones come from one mine; the foreign rock yields no water. Tuka says: on one head rests the step of another.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at how lives come out unequal from what seems a single origin. The pots are all formed from one kiln of clay, yet the same fire leaves some sound and some ruined, and he names this the work of destiny dividing one source into different lots. The diamond and the common stone share one mine, but worth is not evenly spread, and water is not drawn from the wrong rock. The closing image holds the order this makes: lives are ranked like steps, each one a stair beneath another, so the poem sits with difference as a fact rather than protesting it.

GATHA 0285 The Necessity of Experience

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One can describe fine breads and pastries with the mouth, but the tongue only salivates while the hands remain empty.

Such stories without substance are tasteless, like food without salt; they give no nourishment and have no flavor.

One who boasts of valor but has no courage in the body: such words, says Tuka, ought to be burned.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He can describe sweet breads and pastries with his mouth, but his tongue only waters while his hands stay empty. Such talk is flat, like food with no salt; it gives no taste, no nourishment. He knows how to talk, but there is no courage in his body. Tuka says: such words should be burned.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram skewers the gap between fine words and real substance. A man can name every delicacy, but naming them feeds no one; the tongue waters while the hands stay empty, and talk without backing is food without salt, all noise and no nourishment. He turns the same blade on boasting: the one who speaks of valor but has no courage in his body produces words that deserve to be burned. The target is the pattern of mistaking eloquence for action, an honest mirror for anyone whose speech outruns their deeds.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sandalwood need not announce its fragrance by summoning all the plants of the forest.

What is within naturally flows outward; even if one tries, it cannot be contained.

The sun does not go about waking each person; its light simply radiates through its rays.

Says Tuka, the clouds make the peacock dance. What is true can never be hidden.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sandalwood need not call the forest to announce its scent. What is inside flows out on its own; try to hold it, and it will not be held. The sun does not go around waking each person; its rays simply shine. Tuka says: the cloud sets the peacock dancing. What is true cannot be hidden.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says real virtue does not advertise; it shows itself by its nature. Sandalwood does not summon the forest to smell it, the sun does not knock on each sleeper to wake him, and the cloud does not instruct the peacock to dance; each simply gives off what it is. So with a true saint: what lives inside flows out on its own, and the effort to contain it fails. The closing line is the whole point, that what is genuine cannot stay concealed, which means goodness needs no announcement and pretense will not pass for it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The hands and feet of a sandalwood tree are all sandalwood. No limb of the philosopher's stone is inferior to any other.

A lamp has no darkness on its front or back; sugar is entirely sweet throughout.

Says Tuka, in the same way, if you look closely at a noble person, you will never find a single flaw.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The hands and feet of sandalwood are also sandalwood. No part of the philosopher's stone is lesser than another. A lamp has no darkness in front or behind. Sugar is sweet through and through. Tuka says: look closely at a good person and you will not find one fault.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram piles up images of things that are the same all the way through to describe the goodness of a true saint. Sandalwood is fragrant in every limb, the philosopher's stone has no inferior part, a lamp carries no darkness on any side, and sugar is sweet in every grain. The point is wholeness: there is no hidden bad patch, no back side that betrays the front. Applied to the sajjana, the noble soul, it means that close inspection turns up no flaw, because the virtue goes all the way down rather than being a surface.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Make the mind serene, for it is the cause of all attainment. Whether it be liberation or bondage, happiness or contentment, all depends on the mind's desire.

The mind installs the deity, the mind worships the mind, the mind fulfills its own wishes; the mind is the mother of all.

The mind is both guru and disciple, serving itself; when pleased with itself, it leads upward, and when displeased, it leads downward.

Says Tuka, hear this, O seekers, scholars, listeners, and speakers: there is no other deity besides the mind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Make the mind glad, for it is the cause of every attainment. Liberation or bondage, happiness or peace, all of it follows the mind's wish. The mind sets up the image; the mind worships the mind; the mind grants its own desire; the mind is mother of all. The mind is both guru and disciple, serving only itself. Pleased with itself, it rises; displeased, it falls. Seekers, readers, scholars, listeners, speakers, hear this. Tuka says: there is no other deity, none, but this.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram puts the whole weight of the spiritual life on the mind itself. Liberation and bondage, joy and peace, every attainment, all of it turns on what the mind wishes, so the first instruction is simply to make the mind serene. He drives the point home by showing the mind doing every role at once: it installs the deity, it is both the worshipper and the worshipped, it grants its own desires, it is mother, guru, and disciple in one. Its own state decides its fate, rising when pleased with itself and sinking when not. The closing address to seekers and scholars carries the radical claim he refuses to soften: there is no other deity to seek but this very mind.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If one's parents are like a serpent or a cat, the child will find no happiness in their company.

A stake made of sandalwood or a chain made of gold will still take your life and never give comfort.

Says Tuka, pride casts one into hell, even if it is dressed up as knowledge and rigid resolve.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If a child's own parents are a serpent and a cat, the child finds no happiness near them. A stake can be carved from sandalwood, a chain can be made of gold; they still pierce you, still kill you, and give no comfort. Tuka says: pride throws you into hell, even when it is dressed up as knowledge and stiff resolve.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is warning that what looks fine on the surface can still destroy you. A sandalwood stake and a golden chain are precious things, yet a stake is still a stake and a chain is still a chain; the beauty does not change what they do. So it is with pride. Pride that wears the costume of spiritual knowledge and firm willpower looks respectable, but it still casts you into hell. The poem asks you to examine the part of yourself that feels learned and unbendable, because that is exactly where this golden chain hides.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who have learned arguments from books will debate endlessly, yet none of them has the direct experience of truth.

Scholars and so-called wise ones give discourses, but they never touch the substance of inner bliss.

Says Tuka, they are like false witnesses who testify for a bribe, knowing nothing of the real matter.

IN PLAIN WORDS

People repeat the arguments they learned from books and debate them endlessly. None of them has the direct experience. Scholars and the so-called wise give discourses, but they never touch the real substance, the bliss that is their own. Tuka says: they are like witnesses who testify for a bribe, speaking about a thing they have never known.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is drawing a hard line between borrowed words and direct experience. The learned can argue all day from what they have read, but argument is not the same as having tasted the truth, and discourse is not the same as the inner bliss it describes. His sharpest stroke is the image of the false witness: someone paid to testify about a matter he knows nothing about. The poem turns this on the reader's own talk; it asks whether your spiritual speech is testimony from experience or just a bribed witness reciting lines.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For devotees, there is destiny and present action, but know that accumulated karma no longer exists for them.

God himself has become everything, filling both inner and outer.

The bonds of the three qualities no longer afflict the devotees of Hari.

Whatever they eat, speak, or do, it is all Hari acting through their bodies.

Says Tuka, between God and his devotee, there is no separation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For devotees there is still destiny and present action, but know this: their stored-up karma is gone. Look, God himself has become everything, filling them within and without. The three qualities no longer bind the devotees of Hari. Whatever they eat or speak or do, it is all Hari acting through their bodies. Tuka says: between God and his devotee there is no separation.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes what happens to a soul wholly given to Hari. The old accumulated karma that drives rebirth is dissolved; what remains plays out as present life, but its grip is broken. He says God has filled the devotee inside and out, so the three gunas that bind ordinary action no longer touch them. From there he makes the radical claim: their eating, speaking, and doing are Hari acting through them. The point lands in the last line, that for such a devotee there is no gap left between God and the one who loves God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He who is the essence of all scriptures and the living form of the Vedas, he is my companion and my dearest friend.

Therefore I have no dependence on anyone else; through his Name alone, everything is complete.

Both the manifest and the formless are aspects of his being, and it is he who plays and sports in our company.

Says Tuka, we are the parents of Brahma himself; we are not self-made or ready-made, but fashioned by devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He who is the essence of all the scriptures, the living form of the Vedas, is my companion, the friend of my very life. So I depend on no one else; through his one Name alone, everything is complete. The manifest and the formless are both his body, and it is he who plays with us. Tuka says: we are the parents of Brahma the creator; we are not self-made nor ready-made, but fashioned by devotion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is saying that having the Lord as his closest friend ends every other dependence. The being who is the heart of all scripture and the Vedas made flesh is the friend of his life, and through that one Name nothing is lacking. He adds that this Lord is both the form-having and the formless, and he is the one who comes and plays with his devotees. The closing line is the bold one: through devotion the devotee becomes parent even to the creator. He insists devotees are not self-existent or born ready, but shaped into what they are by bhakti itself.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hear the glory of pure love: the Lord eats the wild berries offered by the tribal woman Shabari.

Such is his hunger for devotion; this is the only famine he knows. He does not regard the eight supernatural powers or the ocean of milk.

He devours the dry, flattened rice of his friend Sudama, eating it by the fistful.

Says Tuka, he does not consider whether it is leftover or too little; before true devotion, nothing else matters.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hear the glory of pure love. The Lord eats the wild berries the tribal woman Shabari offers him. He is hungry for great love, and this is the only famine he knows. He pays no heed to the eight powers or to the ocean of milk. He eats Sudama's dry flattened rice, taking it by the fistful. He does not ask if it is leftover or too little. Tuka says: before true devotion, nothing else counts.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming what God actually wants. He recalls two well-known acts: the Lord eating Shabari's tasted wild berries and devouring Sudama's poor handful of dry rice. The point is that God is not drawn by the eight siddhis or by the ocean of milk, the grand and the luxurious; his one hunger is for love, the only thing he ever lacks. So he never weighs whether an offering is leftover, impure, or small. The poem says plainly that before real devotion, all the powers and riches a person could offer mean nothing.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Tell me, who has taken you under their care? In whom have you placed such great confidence?

Who gave you the advice not to surrender to Vitthal?

When the time comes, who will stand behind you? Yama will grind your face into the earth.

Why do you cheat yourself? Time is devouring your lifespan; day by day your strength is wasting away.

Says Tuka, somebody tell this person, for he has forgotten Hari, his own mother and father.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Tell me, who has taken you into their care, that you are so sure of yourself? Who gave you this advice, not to take refuge in Vitthal? When the end comes, who will stand behind you? Yama will grind your face into the ground. Why do you rob yourself? Time is eating your life; day by day your strength drains away. Tuka says: somebody, please tell this person, for he has forgotten Hari, his own mother and father.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is shaking awake someone who refuses to surrender to God. He presses with questions: who has promised to protect you, that you can afford such confidence, and who taught you to keep away from Vitthal. Then he names the stakes; at death no one will shield you, and Yama will press your face into the dust. Meanwhile time is quietly devouring your lifespan and your strength fades each day. The plea is aimed at self-examination: the person has forgotten that Hari is his true mother and father, the one refuge worth having, and someone needs to say so before it is too late.

GATHA 0295 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, practice makes the impossible possible

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who have practiced can swallow deadly poison by the measure and remain unharmed, while others cannot even bear to look at it.

Those who have trained can hold serpents in their hands, while others tremble merely at the sight.

Says Tuka, what seems impossible becomes possible through effort; the secret is practice.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those who have practiced can swallow deadly poison by the measure and stay unharmed, while others cannot even bear to look at it. Those who have trained can hold serpents in their hands, while others shake at the mere sight. What seems impossible is made possible by hard effort. Tuka says: the reason is practice.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses two extreme images to teach one thing about the spiritual path. A trained person can eat poison by the dose and handle live snakes, things that make ordinary people recoil or tremble. The difference is not magic; it is disciplined practice. The poem then turns the figures into a principle: what looks impossible becomes possible through sustained effort. He names the cause directly, that the secret is abhyasa, steady repeated practice, and so the inner work too is learned the same way.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Our so-called masters live on unsolicited charity and have their disciples do the teaching on their behalf.

A boat made of stone is heavy from the start; how can a stone boat carry anyone across?

Says Tuka, they have disgraced the very garb of renunciation, performing only the outward show of holiness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Our so-called holy men live on charity they pretend not to seek, and they make their own disciples do the teaching for them. A boat made of stone is heavy from the start; how can a stone boat carry anyone across? Tuka says: they have disgraced the very garb they wear, keeping up nothing but the costume of holiness.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is exposing a hollow kind of guru. These figures take charity while pretending to want nothing, and they push the actual teaching onto their disciples, having not made the crossing themselves. His image is exact: a stone boat is dead weight from the start, so it cannot ferry anyone, and a guru with no inner realization cannot carry a seeker across. The point is aimed at the pattern, not at robes themselves; he says such men have shamed the renouncer's dress, turning a sacred sign into mere costume and performance. It is a call to look past the outward show to whether anything real is there.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why build a crossing over a mirage when there is no far shore to reach?

Children play with broken pottery as if it were gold coins; who gains or loses in such a trade?

Young girls play at auspicious wedding ceremonies, but what real bond of kinship is formed there?

Whatever joy or sorrow appeared in a dream has no substance when one wakes.

Says Tuka, all that was born and died was but false speech; bondage and liberation and all this weariness are nothing.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why build a crossing over a mirage, when there is no far shore to reach? Children play with bits of broken pottery as if they were gold coins; who really gains or loses in that trade? Little girls play at performing weddings; what real kinship is ever made there? Whatever joy or sorrow came to you in a dream is not true once you wake. Tuka says: all that is born and dies is false speech; bondage, liberation, all this struggle, it is nothing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram piles up images of things that look real but are not, to question the substance of the whole world. A mirage has no far bank, so building a ford across it is pointless; broken pottery traded as gold makes no one richer or poorer; children's pretend weddings forge no actual kinship; dream pleasure and pain vanish on waking. Each picture says the same thing about appearances that do not hold up when looked at closely. He pushes the claim to its edge: birth and death themselves are like empty words, and even bondage and liberation, the very terms of the spiritual struggle, are finally nothing at this depth of seeing.

GATHA 0301 Worldly Life

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why is this person not ashamed to call daughters, sons, and wealth his own?

No one can free him from the hands of Death except the one Narayana.

Says Tuka, how many times must one tell this wretch? He does not even know by what life-force he lives.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why is this person not ashamed to call them his own, the daughter, the son, the wife, the money, the wealth? No one can free him from the hands of Death, no one except the one Narayana. Tuka says: how many times must I tell this wretch? He does not even know by what life-force he himself is alive.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram confronts the easy habit of calling people and possessions mine. Children, spouse, and wealth are claimed as one's own, yet none of them, and nothing the person owns, can save him when Death's hand closes; only Narayana can. The harshness in calling him a wretch is aimed at the blindness, not the man: he clings to ownership while not even knowing the life-force that keeps him breathing. The poem asks for self-examination, that if you cannot account for the life within you, your claim to own anything outside you is hollow.

GATHA 0302 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the world mirrors your own state

मराठी मूळ

आंधळ्यासि जन अवघे चि आंधळे । आपणासि डोळे दृष्टी नाहीं ॥१॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To a blind man, all the world appears blind, for he has no sight of his own.

To the sick man, even a delicious meal tastes like poison, for his tongue has lost all flavor.

Says Tuka, one who is not pure within will find all three worlds to be false.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To a blind man, the whole world looks blind, because he himself has no sight. To a sick man, even sweet, rich food tastes like poison, because his mouth has lost its sense of taste. Tuka says: the one who is not pure within finds all three worlds false.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram teaches that what you see outside is colored by your own condition. The blind man assumes everyone is blind, and the sick man finds delicious food bitter as poison; in each case the fault is in the perceiver, not in the world or the food. He turns this into a mirror for the inner life: a person who is impure within will find the whole of the three worlds false and tainted. The poem points the reader back at himself, that the flaw he keeps seeing everywhere may be the report of his own unpurified heart.

GATHA 0303 The Saints

Saints, do not torment a devotee

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whoever torments a devotee of Vishnu, his very speech is polluted.

Such a wretch of evil conduct should never be allowed to come near.

One who has no love for Hari's story, his mother is no better than an adulteress.

Says Tuka, such a one is corrupt in birth and fallen in understanding.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whoever torments a servant of Vishnu, his speech itself is foul. Do not let such a one come in front of you; that wretch is unlucky and corrupt in conduct. The one who has no love for the story of Hari, his mother is no better than an adulteress. Tuka says: such a one is base in birth and his mind is fallen.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram defends the devotee and condemns the impulse to harass one. He says the very speech of a person who torments a servant of Vishnu is polluted, and he would keep such conduct at a distance. His harshest lines fall on the one who feels no love for hearing about Hari, calling his birth and his understanding corrupt. The fierceness is aimed at the pattern of contempt for the sacred and for those who love God, not at writing off a soul; the abhanga measures a person's true state by whether the story of Hari draws them or repels them, and asks the listener which way it pulls in their own heart.

GATHA 0304 Prayers

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O God, bring what you speak of into actual experience, otherwise it is only humiliation.

What good is a feast without salt? What use adorning a corpse without life?

Without fulfillment the whole display is wasted, like spending wealth on celebrations when there is no son or daughter to bless.

Says Tuka, such is my own condition: I find no love within.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O God, bring what you speak of into real experience. If you do not, then it is only mockery. What is a feast worth without salt? It is like dressing up a corpse that has no life. Without the real thing, the whole show is wasted. Beauty with no goodness in it is no beauty. It is like blessings for a wedding when there is no son or daughter to receive them, like spending money that tastes of nothing. Tuka says: this is exactly my state. I look inside and find no love there.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praying for the inner reality behind the words, and he is honest that he does not yet have it. He asks God to turn the promise into lived experience, because devotion that stays on the surface is, he says, a kind of mockery. He piles up images of empty forms: a feast with no salt, a corpse dressed in finery, a wedding blessing with no child to bless, money spent that brings no taste. Each one is right on the outside and dead on the inside. Then he turns the test on himself: he looks into his own heart and finds the love is not there, and that absence is the very thing he is begging God to fill.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who has fever finds no sweetness in sugar, while others savor its taste freely.

What falls as dirt in one person's mouth, others eat to their fill.

The fortunate beg for what the reluctant must be forced to take.

Says Tuka, when past merit is lacking, what can anyone else do for you?

IN PLAIN WORDS

A man with fever finds no sweetness in sugar, while everyone else tastes how sweet it is. What falls like dirt in one man's mouth, others eat and fill their bellies with. When some are fed by force it sticks in their teeth, yet the fortunate beg to be given it. Tuka says: when a man's stored merit is not good, what can anyone else do for him?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is explaining why the same thing, the Name and grace of God, tastes like nectar to one person and like nothing to another. The fault is not in the sugar; it is in the fever. The teaching and the company of God are offered to all alike, but a sick inner condition cannot taste their sweetness, while the ready soul begs for what the unready spits out. He calls this difference sanchita, the merit a soul carries from before. The hard close is not contempt but a sober limit: where the inner readiness is missing, no outside help can force the taste, which is itself a call to examine and ripen one's own heart.

Shame on the life of one enslaved to his wife; he loses both the next world and his honor.

Shame on the life of one whose mind is set on greed; honoring a guest never comes to pass.

Shame on the life of one given to sloth and excess sleep; boundless appetite, a wretched glutton.

Shame on the life without discernment or renunciation; he pines for the mere reputation of saintliness.

Says Tuka, shame on such people as these: slanderers and quarrelers, they go to hell.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Shame on the life of a man ruled by his wife. He loses both the next world and his honor. Shame on the life of a man whose mind is fixed on greed. He never once honors a guest. Shame on the life of a man full of laziness and too much sleep, eating without limit, a foul glutton. Shame on the life with no discernment and no renunciation, that pines only for the name of holiness. Tuka says: shame on people who have become like this. Slanderers and quarrelers, they go to hell.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out a list of lives he calls disgraceful, and the thread running through them is appetite mistaken for living. The man who is ruled by craving, by greed, by sleep and food, by the wish to look holy without doing the work, has handed his life to the body and lost both worlds. The sharpest line is the fourth: someone with no discernment and no detachment who still hungers for the reputation of a saint, holiness as a costume. He closes by naming where slander and quarrel lead. The poem is meant to be held up as a mirror to the listener's own patterns, not used to despise any particular person.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If you wish this body to go to waste, then play board-games and gamble with full devotion.

Then where will you find the name of Hari? Even in sleep, Rama is awake for the wise, but one who is base birth after birth has earned only great sorrow.

The one addicted to sensual pleasure and shameless in going to maidservants walks the path straight to the lowest hell.

And if you have yet another longing to reach hell, then make a sweet habit of slandering the saints.

Says Tuka, let your mind catch the madness of Rama; otherwise, having come here with such effort, you will depart empty-handed and deceived.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Listen: if you want this body to go to waste, then sit down and gamble and play your board games with all your heart. Then where will the Name of Hari be? For the wise, Rama stays awake even in sleep, but the man who is base birth after birth has earned only great sorrow. The one greedy for sense pleasure, bold in going to servant women, walks the very road down to the lowest place. And if you have one more craving, a craving to reach hell, then make slandering the saints your sweet daily sport. Tuka says: let your mind catch the madness of Rama. If not, then having come here with such effort, you will go empty-handed and cheated.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram preaches by daring the listener, listing the exact habits that throw a human life away as if recommending them. Gambling, slavery to sense pleasure, and above all slander of the saints are each named as a sure road downward, and the irony is the whip: if ruin is what you want, here is how to get it. Against this he sets the one thing that redeems the life, the Name, Rama who stays awake in the heart even when the body sleeps. The stakes he names are the human birth itself, won with great effort and easily squandered. The final plea is to let the mind go mad with Rama, because the only alternative is to leave this life robbed and deceived.

GATHA 0308 The Nature of God

Nondual devotion, defense of the image

मराठी मूळ

अवघें ब्रम्हरूप रिता नाहीं ठाव । प्रतिमा तो देव कैसा नव्हे ॥१॥
नाहीं भाव तया सांगावें तें किती । आपुल्याला मतीं पाषांडिया ॥ध्रु.॥
जया भावें संत बोलिले वचन । नाहीं अनुमोदन शाब्दिकांसि ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे संतीं भाव केला बळी । न कळतां खळीं दूषिला देव ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Everything is the form of Brahman; there is no empty place. How then can an image not be God?

Those without faith cannot be told enough; the heretic clings to his own opinion.

The words the saints have spoken with true feeling find no acceptance among mere word-jugglers.

Says Tuka, the saints made devotion itself the sacrificial offering, but the wicked, not understanding, found fault with God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Everything is the form of Brahman; there is no empty place anywhere. So how can the image not be God? Those who have no inner feeling, how much can you tell them? The heretic clings to his own opinion. The words the saints spoke out of true feeling find no agreement from mere jugglers of words. Tuka says: the saints made their own devotion the offering they gave. The wicked, not understanding, found fault with God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers those who scorn worship of the murti, the sacred image, by pressing their own logic against them. If all that exists is the form of Brahman and no spot is empty of God, then the image too cannot be other than God. The split he draws is not between idol and spirit but between bhava and its absence: the saints speak from real inner feeling, while the word-jugglers and heretics argue from dry opinion and never reach acceptance. The saints' offering was devotion itself, faith laid on the altar. He ends by naming the real error of the mockers: in faulting the worshipped image they were finding fault with God, blind to what the devotee's heart had already made true.

The Necessity of Experience

Discernment, the same outside, two fruits

मराठी मूळ

एक तटस्थ मानसीं । एक सहज चि आळसी ॥१॥
दोन्ही दिसती सारिखीं । वर्म जाणे तो पारखी ॥ध्रु.॥
एक ध्यानीं करिती जप । एक बैसुनि घेती झोप ॥२॥
एकां भक्ति पोटासाठीं । एकां देवासवें गांठी ॥४॥
वर्म पोटीं एका । फळें दोन म्हणे तुका ॥५॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One sits poised as a witness within the mind; another is simply lazy.

Both appear the same outwardly, but only a true discerner knows the difference.

One does japa in deep meditation; another just sits and sleeps.

For some, devotion is only for filling the belly; for others, there is a true bond with God.

Says Tuka, the secret lies hidden in the belly of each; the fruits of the two are entirely different.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One man sits still as a witness in the mind. Another is simply lazy. The two look the same. Only one who can tell true from false knows the difference. One does his japa deep in meditation. Another just sits and falls asleep. For some, devotion is only to fill the belly. For others, it is a real bond with God. Tuka says: the secret lies hidden inside each one, and the fruit of the two is wholly different.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram points at how easily the outward look of holiness hides two opposite inner states. The stillness of a true witness and plain laziness can sit in the same posture; meditation and dozing can wear the same face; and devotion done for a full belly looks much like devotion that is a genuine bond with God. From the outside they are indistinguishable, and only a real discerner can tell which is which. The whole weight rests on the inner motive, the varma hidden in the heart, because that is what decides the fruit. The poem turns the reader inward to ask which of the two is actually happening in his own sitting.

Trust, the child and the father

मराठी मूळ

काय कळे बाळा । बाप सदैव दुबळा ॥१॥

देखिलें तें दृष्टी । मागे घालूनियां मिठी ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे भावें । माझ्या मज समजावें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What does a child know of whether its father is forever poor?

It cannot tell what is and what is not, or what will come into its hands and when.

Whatever it sees, it runs and clings to.

Says Tuka, through my devotion, may You console me and make me understand.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What does a small child know? It does not know whether its father is poor for good. It cannot tell what there is and what there is not, or what will come into the father's hands and when. Whatever it sees in front of it, it runs and throws its arms around. Tuka says: with love, make my own self clear to me; help me understand.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes himself the small child and God the father, and the point is the child's complete unknowing. A child has no idea whether the family is poor or provided for, what is coming or when; it simply grasps whatever is in front of it. That ignorance is offered not as a fault but as the very ground of trust: the child does not need to understand the household's accounts to belong to the father. Out of that helplessness Tukaram makes his request, asking God in love to make him understand his own true self and condition, since he cannot reach it on his own.

GATHA 0311 Social Criticism

Social criticism, devotion bent toward gain

मराठी मूळ

भजन घाली भोगावरी । अकर्तव्य मनीं धरी ॥१॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who uses devotion merely for worldly enjoyment, harboring improper desires in the mind: shame on such saintliness.

The mind moves steeped in impurity, without even a trace of dispassion, driven only by greed for wealth.

Says Tuka, being neither this nor that, it has all gone to waste.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A man who turns his worship toward enjoyment, who holds forbidden desires in his mind: shame on his saintliness. His mind moves about defiled. There is not a trace of dispassion in him, only craving for wealth and the hope of getting it. He has become neither this nor that. Tuka says: it has all gone to waste.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram exposes a religion practiced as a means to pleasure and gain. The man performs his bhajan, but he aims it at enjoyment and keeps improper longings alive in his mind, so the holiness he wears is shameful. There is no vairagya, no detachment, in him at all; what drives him is greed for wealth and the appetite to acquire. The killing phrase is that he ends up neither this nor that, neither a true worldly man nor a true renunciate, falling between both. The wreck is total: such a life, the poem says, goes wholly to waste, and the listener is left to check his own motive in worship.

GATHA 0312 True Worship

True worship, the vow of Ekadashi

मराठी मूळ

एकादशीस अन्न पान । जे नर करिती भोजन । श्वानविष्ठे समान । अधम जन तो एक ॥१॥
ऐका व्रताचें महिमान। नेमें आचरती जन । गाती ऐकतीं हरिकीर्तन । ते समान विष्णूशीं ॥ध्रु.॥
अशुद्ध विटाळसीचें खळ । विडा भिक्षतां तांबूल । सांपडे सबळ । काळाहातीं न सुटे ॥२॥
सेज बाज विलास भोग । करी कामिनीशीं संग । तया जोडे क्षयरोग । जन्मव्याधी बळिवंत ॥३॥
आपण न वजे हरिकीर्तना । अणिकां वारी जातां कोणा । त्याच्या पापें जाणा । ठेंगणा महा मेरु ॥४॥
तया दंडी यमदूत । जाले तयाचे अंकित । तुका म्हणे व्रत । एकादशी चुकलीया ॥५॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who eat food on Ekadashi are equal to dog's excrement, the lowest of people.

But hear the glory of this sacred vow: those who observe it with discipline, who sing and listen to the praises of Hari, become equal to Vishnu himself.

One who chews betel during the impure period falls into the grip of mighty Death and cannot escape.

One who indulges in luxurious beds and the company of women invites a wasting disease that persists through lifetimes.

One who neither goes to Hari's kirtan nor lets others go bears sins so heavy they would dwarf even Mount Meru.

Says Tuka, Yama's servants punish such a one who has broken the vow of Ekadashi.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those who eat and drink on Ekadashi are like the dung of a dog, the lowest of men. But hear the greatness of this vow: those who keep it faithfully, who sing and listen to the kirtan of Hari, become equal to Vishnu himself. One who takes betel and pan in the impure time is caught by mighty Death and does not get free of his hand. One who gives himself to soft beds and pleasures and the company of women earns a wasting disease, a strong sickness that follows through births. One who neither goes to Hari's kirtan himself nor lets anyone else go, know that his sin is so great it makes mighty Mount Meru look small. The servants of Yama punish such a man and make him their own. Tuka says: this is for one who has broken the vow of Ekadashi.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram praises the Ekadashi vow by setting its reward and its ruin side by side in stark terms. To keep the fast, and to spend the day singing and hearing the kirtan of Hari, lifts a person to the level of Vishnu; to break it for food, betel, beds, or company drags them down toward Death, disease that trails through lifetimes, and the punishments of Yama. The harshest line is reserved not for the one who merely lapses but for the one who blocks others from kirtan, whose sin is said to dwarf Mount Meru. The fierce images are aimed at the pattern of letting appetite override the day given to God, and at the worse pattern of standing between others and that day.

GATHA 0313 The Moral Ideal

Moral teaching, never break a vow

मराठी मूळ

शुद्धबुद्धि होय दोघां एक मान । चोरासवें कोण जिवें राखे ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका म्हणे तप तीर्थ व्रत याग । भक्ति हे मारग मोडूं नये ॥४॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By encouraging another's vow, you earn half the merit; by causing someone to break it, both go to hell.

When the intention is pure, both share equal honor, but who would protect a thief?

Do not knowingly bring about your own ruin by giving away your merit.

Send someone to Kashi at your expense, but do not lend strength to a thief.

Says Tuka, the paths of austerity, pilgrimage, vows, sacrifice, and devotion must never be obstructed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Help another keep a vow and you gain half its merit. Cause someone to break it and both of you go to hell. When the intention is pure, both share one honor; but who would keep a thief alive? Do not knowingly ruin yourself by giving your own merit away. Spend your money to send a man to Varanasi; do not lend your strength to a thief. Tuka says: the paths of austerity, pilgrimage, vows, sacrifice, and devotion must never be broken.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays down a plain rule about other people's spiritual practice: support it and you share its fruit, obstruct it and you share the punishment. To help someone hold a vow earns half its merit; to make them break it sends both to hell, because the helper of wrongdoing is no better than a thief. He sharpens it with a contrast: gladly spend your wealth to send someone on pilgrimage to Kashi, but never lend your strength to one who would rob another of merit. The closing line widens the rule to every sacred path, austerity, pilgrimage, vows, sacrifice, devotion, none of which a person should ever stand in the way of.

GATHA 0314 The Power of the Name

The Name, the marketplace of grace

मराठी मूळ

इनामाची भरली पेठ । वाहाती दाट मारग ॥१॥
अवघेची येती वाण । अवघे शकुन लाभाचे ॥ध्रु.॥
अडचणी त्या केल्या दुरी । देण्या उरी घेण्याच्या ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे जोडी जाली । ते आपुली आपणा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The marketplace of divine gifts is full to overflowing, and the roads are bustling with traffic.

Every kind of goods arrives, and every sign points to profit.

All obstacles have been cleared away; receiving far outweighs giving.

Says Tuka, the gain that has come is truly our own.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The marketplace of grace is full to overflowing, and the roads to it are packed and busy. Every kind of goods is coming in, and every sign points to profit. The obstacles have been cleared away; there is far more to receive than there is to give. Tuka says: the gain that has come is our very own.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures the Name and grace of God as a thriving market open for trade. The stalls overflow, the roads are crowded, every kind of merchandise has arrived, and every omen points to profit, his way of saying that the wealth of God is freely available right now to anyone who comes. The barriers that once stood in the way have been removed, and the bargain is lopsided in the buyer's favor: what you receive far outweighs the little you put in. The closing turn makes it personal and permanent. This gain is not borrowed or on loan; it has become our own.

GATHA 0315 The Power of the Name

The Name, the simple road across

मराठी मूळ

वेदाचें गव्हर न कळे पाठकां । अधिकार लोकां नाहीं येरां ॥१॥
विठोबाचें नाम सुलभ सोपारें । तारी एक सरे भवसिंधु ॥ध्रु.॥
जाणत्या असाध्य मंत्र तंत्र काळ । येर तो सकळ मूढ लोक ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे विधि निषेध लोपला । उच्छेद या जाला मारगाचा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The depths of the Vedas cannot be grasped by mere reciters, and ordinary people have no authority over them.

The name of Vitthal is easy and simple; it alone carries one across the ocean of worldly existence.

Mantras and rituals are difficult even for the learned, and the rest of the world is foolish.

Says Tuka, the path of scriptural rules has been lost, and the way itself has been destroyed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The deep meaning of the Vedas is beyond the reciters; ordinary people have no right to it at all. But the name of Vithoba is easy and simple. That alone carries you across the ocean of this world. Mantras and rituals and the right timings are hard even for the learned, and all the rest of the people are fools before them. Tuka says: the rules of what to do and what not to do have fallen away. The whole old path has been broken open.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the locked door of Vedic learning against the open door of the Name. The depths of the Vedas are beyond mere reciters, and most people were never granted the authority to approach them at all; even the learned struggle with the right mantras, rites, and astrological timings. Against this whole apparatus he holds up one thing: the name of Vithoba, easy, simple, available to anyone, and by itself enough to carry a soul across the ocean of worldly existence. The closing claim is deliberately radical. The old machinery of permitted and forbidden has collapsed and the gatekept path is broken open, because the Name has made it unnecessary.

GATHA 0316 Worldly Life

The one duty, against cleverness

मराठी मूळ

विधीनें सेवन । विषयत्यागातें समान ॥१॥
मुख्य धर्म देव चित्तीं । आदि अवसान अंतीं ॥ध्रु.॥
बहु अतिशय खोटा । तर्कें होती बहु वाटा ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे भावें । कृपा करीजेते देवें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Enjoying the senses according to scriptural injunction is equal to renouncing them.

The chief duty is to hold God in one's chitta, from beginning to end.

Excessive cleverness is false; logic only multiplies paths.

Says Tuka, through devotion, God bestows grace.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To enjoy the senses as the scriptures allow is the same as giving them up. The chief duty is to hold God in the mind, at the beginning, through the middle, and at the end. Too much cleverness is false; reasoning only opens many roads. Tuka says: God gives his grace to the one who has love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram cuts the knot between enjoying the world and renouncing it. If you receive what the senses bring as the scriptures permit, with God held in the mind, that holding is itself a renunciation; the one duty underneath every rule is to keep God in the heart from start to finish. He then names the false road: clever argument, which does not lead home but only forks into more and more paths. The one thing that draws grace is not sharpness of mind but love.

GATHA 0317 True Worship

True worship, treasure in Vaikuntha

मराठी मूळ

येथीचिया अळंकारें । काय खरें पूजन ॥१॥

येथीचिया नाशवंतें । काय रितें चाळवूं ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे वैष्णव जेन । माझे गण समुदाय ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What true worship can be done with the perishable ornaments of this world?

Let us set our sights on the path to Vaikuntha; all our real wealth lies there.

Why be deceived by these perishable things?

Says Tuka, the Vaishnavas are my people, my community.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What real worship can be done with the perishing ornaments of this world? Let us set out on the road to Vaikuntha; all our wealth is stored there. Why let these perishing things deceive us for nothing? Tuka says: the Vaishnavas are my people, my own company.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks what kind of worship can rest on things that rot, and answers that none can. Real worship and real wealth belong in Vaikuntha, God's own realm, so that is where the heart should travel. To be fooled by perishable goods is to be cheated of nothing for nothing. He closes by naming where he truly belongs: among the Vaishnavas, the devotees of God, who are his people and his company.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have come to illumine the path and distinguish the true from the false.

I speak only the words I am made to speak, for my master Vitthal stands near.

There is no doubt in my mind, for I have the strength of my one Lord.

Says Tuka, worthless things are of no use to us hereafter.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have come to light up the road and to settle what is true and what is false. I speak only the words I am made to speak, for my master Vitthal stands near. There is no doubt in my mind, for I have the strength of my one Lord. Tuka says: shoddy, worthless stuff will not serve us in what lies ahead.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes his own work and where its authority comes from. His task is to clear the path and to draw the line between the true and the false, but he insists the words are not his own invention: Vitthal stands near and puts them in his mouth. Because the strength is his one Lord's and not his own, there is no doubt left in him to argue with. The warning at the end is plain: anything cheap or impure will be useless when we face what comes after this life.

GATHA 0319 The Moral Ideal

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Speak that which adds to righteousness, with eyes wide open.

Why eat cow dung that makes everyone spit in disgust?

What else is so powerful that it burns away sin? Says Tuka, the tongue that speaks truth is the real fire.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Speak only what adds to righteousness; keep your eyes wide open. Why eat dung that makes everyone spit in disgust? What else is so strong that it can burn sin to ash? Tuka says: a man is a hero on the battlefield, but inside he trembles like a coward.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells the tongue to speak with open eyes and to say only what serves righteousness. He makes the alternative repulsive: foul, shameful speech is like eating dung, and it leaves everyone spitting in disgust, so why choose it. Truthful, righteous speech is named as the rare fire strong enough to burn sin away. The closing line turns the mirror inward: a person can look brave in the open while quietly cowering within, and the test is whether the heart matches the show.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It is good that I was made a simple farmer, otherwise I would have died of pride. You have done well, O God; Tuka dances and falls at your feet.

Had I possessed any learning, I would have fallen into ruin. I would have missed the service of the saints; that would have been a pointless loss.

With pride and arrogance, I would have walked the road to Yama's city. Says Tuka, through self-importance and ego, people earn themselves a place in hell.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It is good that I was made a simple farmer; otherwise I would have died in my own pride. You did well, O God; Tuka dances and falls at your feet. Had I owned any learning, I would have fallen into ruin. I would have missed the service of the saints, and that would have been a loss for nothing. With pride and stiffness I would have walked the road to Yama's city. Tuka says: through self-importance and ego, people make themselves a hell.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram thanks God for his low station, reading his poverty as a rescue rather than a misfortune. Had he been learned or grand, he is sure pride would have ruined him and pulled him away from serving the saints, which is the one gain worth having. He traces where that pride leads: down the road to Yama, the god of death, and into hell. So he dances and falls at God's feet, treating his humble life as the very mercy that kept his ego from destroying him.

GATHA 0321 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, all is Govinda

मराठी मूळ

दाता नारायण । स्वयें भोगिता आपण ॥१॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Narayana is the giver, and he himself is the enjoyer.

What words then remain for the tongue to speak?

The eyes that see are themselves God's guise.

Says Tuka, even these hands and feet are instruments of God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Narayana is the giver, and he himself is the one who enjoys. What is left now for the tongue to say? The eyes that see are his own form at play. Tuka says: the whole of sound has become Govinda.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lets the line between God and the self dissolve completely. If Narayana is both the one who gives and the one who receives and enjoys, then there is nothing left for the separate speaker to claim, and the tongue falls quiet. Even seeing is God's own form playing through the eyes. By the end every sound is Govinda himself, so worship and worshipper, word and listener, have collapsed into one.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O God, show me by your grace what is truly real.

Your honor will be lost if you abandon me, and ruin is written on my forehead.

Will you watch with open eyes as I drown?

Says Tuka, I place my head at your feet; now do as you will.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By your grace, O God, show me what is truly real. How merciful you are; your fame lives all through the world. Will you watch with open eyes while ruin drags me away by the hand? Tuka says: O God, make me wholly your own.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays to be shown what is real, and presses God with God's own reputation. The world calls you merciful, he says, so will you really stand and watch, eyes open, as I am dragged off to ruin. He puts God's honor on the line: to abandon him would stain the very fame for kindness that fills the world. The plea ends simply, asking God to claim him entirely as his own.

GATHA 0323 Prayers

Prayer, your honor is at stake

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If you recognize me as your own from the very beginning, then abandon me happily if you wish.

Your honor will be at stake, and ruin will be written on my forehead.

Whatever you have placed as my lot, let it remain.

Says Tuka, I leave all in your keeping.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You have known me as your own from the start; abandon me freely now if you like. But your honor will be the thing that goes, and ruin will be written on my forehead. Whatever lot you have placed on me, let it stay. Tuka says: do not turn it over in your mind, O giver.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram dares God with a kind of holy bluntness: you have recognized me as yours from the beginning, so go ahead and drop me if you wish. But he names the cost to God, not to himself: it is God's good name that would be lost, even as ruin lands on Tukaram's own head. He accepts whatever fate God has set for him without complaint. The last line asks the generous Lord not to deliberate or weigh the matter, but simply to hold him.

GATHA 0324 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, holding God within

मराठी मूळ

तुझें वर्म ठावें । माझ्या पाडियेलें भावें ॥१॥

नेदी होऊं तुटी । मेळवीन दृष्टादृष्टी ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे देवा । चिंतन ते तुझी सेवा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I know your weak point, and I have won you over through devotion.

Like a tortoise that withdraws its limbs, I will hold your form steadfastly within.

I will not let it become anything else; I will not release the grip.

Says Tuka, what can the world do now? I have seized the Lord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I know your weak point; I have brought you down by my love. Like a tortoise drawing in its limbs, I will hold your form and stay within. I will not let the bond break; I will keep our eyes meeting, sight to sight. Tuka says: O God, this remembering of you is itself my service to you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks with the boldness of a lover who has found God's one soft spot, and that weak point is devotion itself. Like a tortoise pulling its limbs inside, he draws God's form deep within and clamps down so the grip cannot loosen. He refuses to let the bond snap, keeping gaze locked on gaze. The final turn is gentle: simply holding God in remembrance, contemplating him without pause, is the whole of the worship he owes.

GATHA 0325 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, sift grain from grit

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Wheat is of one kind, yet stones mixed in ruin it.

Know the essential secret and discern where the impurity lies, however small.

By the quality of one's spiritual earnings, the whole harvest is judged.

Says Tuka, sift carefully; the pure and impure must be separated.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wheat is all one kind, yet the stones mixed in spoil it. Know the essential secret: see where the flaw lies, however small, and how much there is. By the quality of what one has earned, the whole grade is shown. Tuka says: it is worth that counts; false talk is flat and tasteless.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the threshing floor to talk about the inner life. Good wheat is ruined not by being a poor grain but by the grit mixed into it, so the secret is to find the flaw, however small, and measure it honestly. A person is graded by the real quality of what they have earned within, not by appearances. The closing line states the standard plainly: genuine worth is what counts, and hollow, boastful words are stale and have no taste.

GATHA 0326 The Power of the Name

The Name, the names of the good

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे जपें । संतांचिया जाती पापें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Simply by taking the names of the good, one becomes virtuous. My tongue will not cease from this; it is a great gain gotten free.

The feet of the saints are the resting place; devotion there brings peace. Says Tuka, by repeating the names of the saints, sins are destroyed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One becomes holy just by taking the names of the good. My tongue will not stop doing it; here is a great gain had for free. The feet of the saints are the resting place; put your trust there. Tuka says: by repeating the saints' names, sins fall away.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes the practice almost absurdly simple: merely speaking the names of holy people makes a person holy, and since it costs nothing, it is a great gain had for free. He vows his tongue will never cease the practice. The feet of the saints are the one true resting place, and faith should be set there. Repeating their names, he says, is enough to wear sins away.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the company of God one becomes godly; in the company of the world one falls.

Both paths lead in their own direction, each gathering its own kind.

Though it has been shown many times, what cannot be restrained floods the chitta with its own nature.

Says Tuka, the strength lies in one's own longing. Teaching is merely the root-seed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the company of God one becomes godly; in the company of the world one falls. The two roads run their own ways, each gathering its own kind. Though this has been shown again and again, what cannot be held back floods the mind with its own nature. Tuka says: the strength is in your own longing; teaching is only the root-seed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says the company you keep decides what you become: keep God's company and you grow godly, keep the world's and you sink. The two roads diverge and each one draws its own sort of person along it. The hard truth is that knowing this does not settle it; a person's own ingrained nature keeps flooding the mind no matter how often the lesson is taught. So the real power is the soul's own longing for God; instruction is only the seed, and longing is what must make it grow.

GATHA 0328 The Necessity of Experience

तुका म्हणे गुण । तुझा लागलिया शून्य ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When you search anything to its root, you destroy it utterly.

Such is the outcry of the saints: your shores of argument are too many.

You cast beyond all worldly convention whoever you seize.

Says Tuka, when Your nature touches anything, it becomes zero.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When you trace a thing down to its root, you break it apart completely. This is the saints' loud cry: your banks of argument are many. Whoever you take hold of, you cast outside all worldly custom. Tuka says: when your nature touches a thing, it turns to zero.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing what happens when God's reality is brought to bear on anything. Pressed to its root, a thing loses its standing; the saints cry out that there is no settling on the safe shore of argument, because every position breaks down. When God lays hold of a person, that person is thrown outside the ordinary rules of society. The poem names the stakes plainly: contact with God reduces every separate thing, every claim, every appearance, to nothing.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If physicians could truly save lives, who would then remember God?

Who knows in what manner destiny keeps something in reserve?

If vows alone could produce sons and daughters, why would a husband be needed?

He who knows this truth is Tuka's Lord, the generous giver.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If physicians could save lives, who would still meditate on God? Who knows in what way destiny holds something back? If vows alone made sons and daughters, why would a husband be needed? Tuka says: the one who knows this truth is Tuka's Lord, the generous giver.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tests the things people lean on instead of God. He notes that doctors do not finally save us and vows do not by themselves produce children, so the credit people give to human means is misplaced. Behind every outcome stands destiny, which keeps its own reserve no one can read. The poem lands on where real reliance belongs: the Lord, the generous giver, is the one who truly knows and holds these matters.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Many saints and holy ones have already traveled this road.

The scriptures declare aloud: do not wander off on side paths.

The way has already been cleared; there is no need to ask for the broad highway.

Banners flutter along the route. Says Tuka, it bears the stamp of the Garuda coin.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Many saints and holy ones have already gone this way. Do not wander off on side paths: so the scriptures cry aloud. The road has been swept clean; you need not ask for the broad highway. Banners flutter along it. Tuka says: it bears the stamp of the Garuda coin.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram urges the seeker to take the proven path of devotion rather than strike out alone. The saints have already walked this road, and the scriptures themselves warn against straying onto side tracks. Because the way has been cleared and marked, there is no need to hunt for some other route; the banners of the pilgrims show where it runs. He stamps it as genuine, like coin marked with Garuda, the trusted mark: this is the safe and tested way home.

Pilgrimage joy, Pandhari at Kartik

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Come, let us go see the festival of Kartik with our own eyes. Vaikuntha has come near, right here at Pandharpur.

The harvest of love is overflowing; even the sky cannot contain it. All of Pandhari is intoxicated, with abundance in every home.

Stately processions of Garuda banners move with a steady pace, and the deep sounds of cymbals, chanting, and drums resound. Noble elephants sway with joy, and heroes rise, each surpassing the other.

Waves of the nectar of the Name fill the air, and all the gatherings are brimming. The host of Vaishnavas has arrived, and even Death trembles before them.

Brahma and the other gods look on with longing at the joy on the sands and say: blessed, blessed are these mortals, how fortunate they are. Kashi grants liberation at death, Gaya frees one from ancestral debts, but at Pandharpur, at Vitthoba's feet, there is no such delay.

Says Tuka, what worry remains for us now? The giver of all accomplishments will never forsake us.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Come, let us go see the Kartik festival with our own eyes. Vaikuntha has come near, right here at Pandhari. The harvest of love has ripened and overflows; the sky cannot hold it. All of Pandhari is drunk with joy, and there is abundance in every home. The processions of Garuda banners move at a steady pace, and cymbals, chanting, and drums sound deep. Noble elephants sway with joy, and heroes rise, each greater than the last. Waves of the nectar of the Name fill the air, and all the gatherings are brimming. The host of Vaishnavas has come, and Death itself trembles. Brahma and the other gods look on with longing at the joy on the sands and say: blessed, blessed are these mortals, how fortunate they are. Kashi grants release at death, Gaya frees one from the debt to the ancestors, but at Pandhari, at Vithoba's feet, there is no waiting. Tuka says: what worry is left for us now? The giver of all that is sought will never forsake us.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram calls everyone to the great Kartik gathering at Pandharpur and tells them that heaven is not somewhere else: Vaikuntha has come down to the riverbank here. He paints the festival as a ripened harvest of love so full it spills past the sky, with processions, drums, and the Name sounding everywhere until even Death shakes. He raises the stakes by comparing Pandhari to the famous holy cities: Kashi gives liberation only at death and Gaya pays off the ancestral debt, but at Vithoba's feet the gift comes now, with no delay. The closing turn is the point: when the giver of everything is this near and this generous, the devotee has nothing left to fear.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those sins for which no remedy can be found even after searching all the scriptures are destroyed simply by seeing Pandharpur. Blessed, blessed is the bank of the Bhima, the lake of the Chandrabhaga.

Vitthal, the hero, stands at Padmatirtha, his playground of the flute's melody. Pandharpur is the mother-home of all sacred places, the Vaikuntha on earth, beyond all duality.

The chanting of the Name resounds there, and demons and Death tremble. There is no comparison to be given; no other place is its equal.

Blessed is the fortune of those who behold Pandharpur. If you are born in this world, see Pandhari just once.

When you behold God and his devotees, even the greatest sins cannot survive. Such is Vishnu's city, where men and women bear four-armed forms, where the Sudarshana discus makes its nest, and where Death itself cannot enter.

The bliss of that place is beyond my capacity to describe. Says Tuka, those who go to Pandharpur attain Vaikuntha, and whoever does not trust these words is a wretch of many lifetimes; he will find no love for Pandhari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The sins for which no remedy can be found, search the scriptures as you will, are destroyed past counting simply by seeing Pandharpur. Blessed, blessed is the bank of the Bhima, the lake of the Chandrabhaga. Vitthal the hero stands at Padmatirtha, his playground of the flute's song. Pandharpur is the mother-home of all holy places, the Vaikuntha on earth, beyond all change. The chanting of the Name resounds there, and demons and Death tremble. There is nothing to compare it to; no other place is its equal. Blessed is the fortune of those who behold Pandharpur. If you are born into this world, see Pandhari just once. When you behold God and his devotees, even the greatest sins cannot survive. Such is Vishnu's city: men and women bear four-armed forms, the Sudarshana discus makes its nest there, and Death cannot enter. The bliss of that place is beyond my power to describe. Tuka says: those who go to Pandharpur reach Vaikuntha; whoever does not truly trust these words is a wretch of many lifetimes, and Pandhari will hold no love for him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a sweeping claim: sins that no rite or scripture can wipe away are burned up just by the sight of Pandharpur. He praises the river Bhima, the Chandrabhaga, and Padmatirtha where Vitthal plays his flute, calling the town the source and mother of every holy place, a Vaikuntha set on earth. The stakes are framed against the other great pilgrimages and against death itself: this is Vishnu's own city, where Death cannot pass the gate. He ends with a sharp edge that the poem does not soften: to behold God and his devotees is to outlive every sin, and the one who will not trust this is named a soul wretched across many births, for whom even Pandhari holds no welcome.

Worldly life, the two ditches

मराठी मूळ

एक नेणतां नाडली । एकां जाणिवेची भुली ॥१॥
दोहीं सवा नाड । विहीर एकीकडे आड ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे कर्म । तुझें कळों नेदी वर्म ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Some are ruined by ignorance; others are deluded by their own cleverness.

Both paths lead to trouble, like a well on either side of the road.

Says Tuka, your karma is such that it never lets you see the essential secret.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Some are ruined by not knowing; some are fooled by their own cleverness. Both ways lead to harm, like a well on one side of the road and a pit on the other. Tuka says: your karma is such that it never lets you see the heart of the matter.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names two ways a person comes to grief, and they look like opposites: blank ignorance on one side, proud cleverness on the other. He gives the image of a road with a well on one edge and a hole on the other, so that veering either way ends in a fall. The trap is that knowing too little and thinking you know too much are both dead ends. He lays the cause at the door of karma, which keeps a person from ever seeing the secret that would let them walk straight between the two.

GATHA 0334 Prayers

Prayer, the confession of an empty show

मराठी मूळ

म्हणवितों दास । मज एवढी च आस ॥१॥
परी ते अंगीं नाहीं वर्म । करीं आपुला तूं धर्म ॥ध्रु.॥
बडबडितों तोंडें । रितें भावेंविण धेंडें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे बरा । दावूं जाणतों पसारा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I wish to be called your servant; that is my only desire.

But I lack the true quality within me, so please fulfill your own nature, O Lord.

My mouth babbles on, but without genuine feeling it is an empty stump.

Says Tuka, I am good at putting on a show, nothing more.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I want to be called your servant; that is my only wish. But the real thing is not in me, so do your own work, Lord, and make me yours. My mouth babbles on, an empty stump with no true feeling behind it. Tuka says: I am good at putting on a show, nothing more.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays for one thing, to be counted God's servant, and in the same breath admits he has not earned the name. He confesses that the inner quality is missing: his worship is talk without feeling, a hollow stump making noise. Rather than hide this, he hands the work back to God, asking the Lord to supply by grace what he cannot supply himself. The honesty is the prayer: he turns his own emptiness and his skill at mere display into a reason for God to act.

GATHA 0335 True Worship

True worship, contentment over strain

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

True worship lies in contentment; excessive effort only increases suffering.

You saints know this well; what has been spoken is the right way.

Whatever was needed was done; it happened naturally as the occasion arose.

Says Tuka, I place my head at the feet of you saints.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Worship rests in contentment; too much effort only swells the weariness. You saints know this; what has been said is the right way. Whatever was needed was done; it happened of itself as the moment came. Tuka says: I lay my head at your feet, you saints.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says that real worship lives in a settled, contented heart, not in piling on more and more strenuous ritual, which only adds exhaustion. He appeals to the saints as those who already know this to be true. The right things, he notes, got done on their own when the occasion arose, without his forcing them. He closes by bowing his head at the saints' feet, placing himself under those who understand that ease and trust, not anxious effort, are the heart of devotion.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The affairs of a dream had pressed me into bonded labor, but when it ended, everything was revealed as false. In vain I had cried out for mercy, laboring to reach the root of my suffering.

King, beggar, or queen: none remain where they were. What I endured in the body felt real only until I awoke; experience itself opened my eyes through pain.

Says Tuka, the saints finally made me alert; otherwise I would have sat there forever, hands folded, lost in delusion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The affairs of a dream had pressed me into forced labor; when it ended, all of it was shown to be false. I had cried out for mercy in vain, laboring to reach the root of my suffering. King, beggar, queen: none stay where they stood. What I endured felt real only while I was not awake; experience itself opened my eyes through pain. Tuka says: at the end the saints made me alert; otherwise I would have stayed sitting there forever, hands folded, lost.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram treats this whole worldly life as a dream that held him in bonded labor, suffering and begging for mercy over things that proved false the moment he woke. He shows that the roles we cling to, king, beggar, queen, are all temporary; none holds its place. The pain itself was instructive, since it was through suffering that his eyes finally opened to the unreality of it all. The decisive turn is that he did not wake on his own: the saints roused him at last, and without them he would have sat on in the dream forever, hands folded in helpless delusion.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A demonic temperament is merciless at heart, obstinate in mind, given to excessive argument. Caste and lineage count for nothing here; what matters is the quality within.

Poison, brass, and pure gold each reveal their nature by their own substance. Says Tuka, a true meeting is one with genuine goodness; like butter hidden in milk, it is stored within the heart.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A demonic nature is merciless within, hard in mind, given to endless argument. Caste and birth count for nothing here; what matters is the quality in a person. Poison, brass, pure gold: each shows its nature by its own substance. Tuka says: a true meeting is one with real goodness, like butter stored hidden inside the milk.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures a person by inner character, not by birth. He marks the cruel, stubborn, endlessly quarrelsome temperament as the demonic one, and says plainly that caste and lineage prove nothing about a person's worth. Like poison, brass, and gold, each thing declares what it really is by its own substance, not by its label. He keeps the edge on the pattern of cruelty itself: the meeting worth having is with genuine goodness, the butter quietly held inside the milk, which is found in the heart and not in the rank.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The mother gazes at the child's face, unable to contain the joy in her chitta. Blessed is the merit that has ripened today.

What a beautiful child, what a beautiful child! One could go on saying it forever; it is dearer to me than life itself. Women and girls gather from every clan, forgetting all sense of the body.

They forget their homes, their hungry and thirsty little ones; fear, thirst, and hunger all vanish. Even those who remain at home have their hearts drawn there, making excuses to rush to that place.

They abandon all modesty, leaving the comfort of their beds, and run. Young and old, men and women, all are enchanted by this child.

The women play with him and forget themselves. Boys and girls lose all bodily awareness; their gaze will not turn away once it falls upon him.

There is no enmity, no sense of mine and yours; sorrow, delusion, and suffering all dissolve. Says Tuka, my Lord has made everyone as joyful as himself, playing in the guise of a child for his own delight.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The mother gazes at the child's face, and the joy will not fit inside her heart. Blessed is the merit that has ripened today. What a beautiful child, what a beautiful child! You could say it forever; he is dearer to me than my own life. Women and girls gather from every clan and forget all sense of the body. They forget their homes, their hungry and thirsty little ones; fear, thirst, and hunger all vanish. Even those who stay home have their hearts pulled there, and make excuses to rush to that place. They drop all modesty, leave the comfort of their beds, and run. Young and old, men and women, all are enchanted by this child. The women play with him and forget themselves. Boys and girls lose all awareness of the body; once the gaze falls on him it will not turn back. There is no enmity, no sense of mine and yours; sorrow, delusion, and suffering all dissolve. Tuka says: my Lord has made everyone as joyful as himself, playing in the guise of a child for his own delight.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures the child Krishna at play in Mathura and the helpless love he draws from everyone who sees him. The mother cannot contain her joy, and women and girls leave homes, beds, modesty, even their own crying children, to come and gaze at him, forgetting hunger, fear, and the body itself. The point under the scene is the power of God's beauty: once the eyes fall on him the gaze will not turn back, and in his presence the old divisions of mine and yours, along with sorrow and delusion, simply dissolve. Tukaram names the final stakes: the Lord takes the form of a playful child on purpose, and by it he makes everyone share in his own joy.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sita laments in the Ashoka grove: the wicked stole me away by stealth and brought me to this perilous Lanka. Why, O Rama, have you gone so far from me? Tell me, dear Trijata, my friend, will Raghunath grant me his sight or not? My heart is desperate, the distance is vast, and my life can scarcely remain in this body.

What evil did I commit? Whose pilgrimage or vow did I obsture? Did I separate a cow from its calf or a wife from her husband? I cannot fathom what past deed has caused these feet to be taken from me. I was deceived by the illusion of a golden deer; Raghunath was sent chasing after it.

I violated his command, but what could I know of such sorcery? Seeing the place deserted, a demon carried me away. There is no path, no trail, no other recourse except the name of Raghunath alone.

A bird gave his life fighting with his wings; and I am trapped here, surrounded by water, unable to move. Janaka's daughter is overwhelmed with grief, like a doe separated from the herd.

Trijata consoles her: be steady, be steady; Says Tuka, my Lord Rama will come and reclaim Lanka.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sita laments in the Ashoka grove: the wicked one stole me away by stealth; why was I brought to this dreadful Lanka? Why, O Rama, have you gone so far from me? Tell me, dear Trijata, my friend: will Raghunath grant me his sight or not? My heart is desperate, the road is long, and my life can hardly stay in this body. What wrong did I do? Whose pilgrimage or vow did I spoil? Did I part a cow from its calf, or a wife from her husband? I cannot tell what past deed has taken these feet from me. I was deceived by the longing for the golden deer; Raghunath was sent chasing after it. I broke his command, but what could I know of such sorcery? Seeing the place empty, a demon carried me off. There is no path, no trail, no other recourse, only the name of Raghunath. A bird gave his life fighting with his wings; and I am trapped here, ringed by water, unable to move. Janaka's daughter is overcome with grief, like a doe cut off from the herd. Trijata comforts her: be steady, be steady. Tuka says: my Lord Rama will come and reclaim Lanka.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram voices Sita in captivity, mourning in the Ashoka grove after Ravana's theft and crying out for the distant Rama. She searches her own conscience for what sin could have cost her his feet, and traces her plight back to her longing for the golden deer and her breaking of the protective command. Hemmed in by water with no path out, she has only one resource left, the name of Raghunath, the very thing the poem holds up as the refuge in despair. The closing turn shifts from her grief to assurance: through Trijata's steadying words and Tuka's own voice, the promise lands that Rama will come, take Lanka, and reclaim her.

The pure heart, naturally sweet

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे शुद्ध जाती । ते मागुती परतेना ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Cook in such a way that no one feels disgust with the food and no harm arises from it. Only then does it remain sweet, naturally and of its own accord.

Other qualities have emptiness at their core and merely display their nature outwardly. Says Tuka, what is pure by its very nature never turns back.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Cook so that the food takes no taint, so that no harm comes from it. Then it stays sweet, on its own, pure of itself. Other qualities are hollow at the core; they only show off what they are. Tuka says: what is pure by birth never turns back.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses cooking as the figure for a life and a heart. Food prepared cleanly, with nothing rotten worked into it, stays sweet of its own accord; nothing has to be added to make it good. He sets this against qualities that are empty inside and only display themselves outwardly, all surface and no substance. The point lands on inward purity: what is genuinely pure does not need to perform, and it does not lapse or turn back from itself.

Confession, finding the boat

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I was not vigilant, and so my own welfare slipped away. I forgot the Name, and worldly life kept growing.

Carried far away on the current of falsehood, I drifted into the distance. Says Tuka, now I have found the boat of true devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I was not watchful, and so my own good slipped away from me. I forgot the Name, and worldly life kept growing. On the flood of falsehood I was carried far off. Tuka says: now I have found the boat, true devotion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram traces a single failure to its root: he stopped paying attention. Because he was not vigilant, he forgot the Name, and the more he forgot it the more worldly life swelled around him. He pictures himself swept far downstream on a current of falsehood, carried away from his own welfare. The turn comes at the end: he has found the boat, devotion itself, the one thing that can carry him back across the same flood that took him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If the mere fragrance of food could satisfy hunger, why would anyone cook in every household? Seek your own highest good; let your tongue constantly repeat Rama, Rama. If merely seeing water could quench thirst, why would anyone store it at home? Just looking at the shade of a tree does not bring comfort until you actually sit beneath it.

Benefit comes from singing and hearing only when firm devotion takes root in the heart. Says Tuka, you become free through devotion alone; what use is the cleverness of mere knowledge?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If the smell of food could end hunger, why would anyone cook in house after house? See to your own good. With your tongue say always: Rama, Rama. If the sight of water could end thirst, why would anyone store it in house after house? Looking at the shade brings no rest until you sit down under it. Singing and hearing help only when firm devotion holds in the heart. Tuka says: by devotion alone you are free. What use is your clever knowing?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram piles up plain examples to attack a single evasion: mistaking the idea of a thing for the thing. The smell of food does not feed you, the sight of water does not slake thirst, looking at shade does not cool you until you sit in it; in the same way, merely singing and hearing the Name does no good unless firm devotion takes root in the heart. So he tells the listener to see to his own welfare and actually repeat Rama with the tongue, not just admire the practice. The closing line names the stake: freedom comes through devotion alone, and the cleverness of knowledge, by itself, buys nothing.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What is lacking at the feet of Vitthoba? Is there anything that cannot be found there? Why then should I scatter my mind in every direction, crying out from door to door? Who is mightier than my Vitthoba? Tell me, who else is greater? Says Tuka, liberation is found in Vitthoba's own village; those treasures may be plundered free of charge.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What is lacking for us at Vithoba's feet? Is there one thing not found here? Then why scatter my mind all around, begging door to door? Who is stronger than my Vithoba? Tell me, who else is greater? Tuka says: liberation is in Vithoba's own town; plunder those treasure houses, they cost nothing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks why a person who already stands at Vithoba's feet would go begging anywhere else. Nothing is missing there, so scattering the mind from door to door is folly. He challenges the listener to name anyone mightier or greater than his Vithoba, and lets the silence answer. The closing image is bold: liberation is not a far reward to be earned but a treasure house standing open in the god's own town, free for the taking, so why hold back.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I drink this nectar and distribute it to all. Take it, do not remain lost in worldly wandering.

He whose feet rest evenly upon the brick is the one true generous giver. He will fulfill every desire of the mind if the intellect remains fixed at his feet.

Says Tuka, he has sent me with this message: this path is easy and full of bliss.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I drink this nectar and share it out to all. Take it; do not stay lost in worldly wandering. He whose feet rest level on the brick is the one true open-handed giver. He will bring the mind's resolves to fulfillment, if the mind stays at his feet. Tuka says: he has sent me with this message. This road is easy; it is made of bliss. Going this way, you meet the saints, by whose sight the bond of birth and death is cut.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as one already drinking the nectar of the Name and handing it around freely, urging others not to waste themselves wandering in the world. He names Vithoba, whose feet stand even on the brick at Pandhari, as the only truly generous giver, and promises that he fulfills the heart's longings on one condition: that the mind stay fixed at his feet. He frames himself as a messenger sent to report that the road is easy and made of joy, not the hard climb people fear. The last line names the reward: walking this way you fall in with the saints, and the mere sight of them cuts the bond of birth and death.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let us bow to that eternal bliss which is pure being, consciousness, and joy, which is the liberation, the attainment, the holy place itself. Devotion is the root cause of everything; let us bow to that even-mindedness in which there is no division.

Cultivate compassion for all beings, uproot the root of hatred, and regard enemy, friend, and son alike. Embrace humility with your whole being; abandon all sense of "I" and "you," for that is true greatness.

Where there is no anxiety for wealth or desire, where honor, dishonor, attachment, and illusion are recognized as false, where one lives in contentment, knowing yet appearing unknowing, there the saints appear of their own accord. Hold firm faith in your heart without the strain of picking and choosing.

Says Tuka, the one who has grown weary of his own cleverness enjoys the constant sight of the saints.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Bow to that eternal joy which is being, awareness, and bliss; bow to it as liberation, as attainment, as the holy place itself. Devotion is the root cause of all; bow to that even mind in which there is no division. Have mercy on every creature; break the root of hatred; hold enemy, friend, and son the same. Take lowliness on with your whole being; let go of all I and you, for that is true greatness. Where there is no craving for wealth or pleasure, no worry, where honor and dishonor, attachment and illusion are seen as false, where one lives content, knowing yet seeming not to know, there the saints come of their own accord. Hold firm faith in the heart; have no struggle of picking and choosing. The one who has grown sick of his own cleverness, Tuka says, has the saints in sight always.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out the inner shape of a person the saints will seek out unbidden. It begins in worship of the one reality, being, awareness, bliss, and of the even mind that sees no division. Then it turns practical: mercy for every creature, the root of hatred pulled up, enemy and friend and son held alike, and the whole weight of I and mine set down, which he calls the real greatness. Such a person carries no craving for wealth or pleasure and no fear of honor or dishonor, living content and knowing while seeming to know nothing. The poem ends by naming who qualifies: the one who has grown weary of his own cleverness, who holds steady faith without the strain of constantly choosing, is the one the saints are always near.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why do you worry while crossing this ocean of worldly life? The Giver stands right there on the other shore, hands on his hips. Clasp his feet tightly; the Lord of the world asks no price.

For the sake of devotion alone, he will carry you on his own shoulders. Carry on your worldly duties happily, but do not neglect the two sacred days.

Mercy and forgiveness will come looking for you at your own home. Says Tuka, there is no anxiety about enjoyment or liberation, no poverty or want, once you have won the favor of Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Crossing the ocean of worldly life, why do you worry? The Giver stands on the far shore, his hands resting on his hips. Clasp his feet tight; the Lord of the world takes no payment. For devotion alone he carries you on his own shoulders. Carry on your worldly life gladly, but do not let the two sacred days go. Mercy and forgiveness will come seeking out your house. Tuka says: no worry over enjoyment or release, no want, no poverty, once you have served Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers the fear of life as a wide ocean to be crossed: there is no cause for worry, because the Giver already stands waiting on the far shore. Clasp his feet, and he asks no price; for devotion alone he will carry you across on his own shoulders. The instruction is gentle and ordinary, live your worldly life happily, only do not neglect the holy days, and the rest follows. Mercy and forgiveness will come looking for you at your own door, and once you have served Panduranga there is no anxiety left over enjoyment or liberation, and no poverty or want.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who claims the afflicted and oppressed as his own, that one alone should be recognized as a true saint; know that God dwells right there. The heart of a good person is like fresh butter, soft within and without.

One who embraces in the heart those who have no one else, who shows the same compassion to servants and maids as to one's own children: Says Tuka, how much more can I say? Such a one is the very form of God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The one who calls the broken and crushed his own, him alone know as the true saint; know that God is right there. The good person's heart is like fresh butter, soft within and without. The one who shelters in his heart those who have no one, who shows a child's mercy to servant and maid alike, Tuka says: how much can I tell? That one is the very form of God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram gives a single test for recognizing a true saint, and it is not learning or austerity but tenderness toward the abandoned. Whoever takes the afflicted and the crushed for his own is the genuine saint, and God is present exactly there. He likens such a heart to fresh butter, soft all the way through, the same on the outside as within.

The mark is concrete: sheltering those who have nobody, and giving servant and maid the same mercy one gives one's own child; a person like that, he says, is the very form of God in the world.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The purpose of devotion is to establish its glory in the world. Otherwise, where is any second thing to speak of? This is the test of service to the Lord: the honor it earns.

Says Tuka, in all the world, what truly shines is the bond between God and devotee.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It is for this that devotion exists: to spread its glory through the world. For otherwise, where is any second thing to speak of? This is its honor, the test of service to the Lord. Tuka says: in all the world, the true ornament is the bond of God and devotee.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks what devotion is finally for, and answers that its purpose is to make its own glory known in the world. Apart from this bond there is nothing else worth speaking of at all. He calls faithful service to the Lord the real test, the thing that earns true honor. The closing image is that across the whole world the one genuine ornament, the thing that actually shines, is the bond between God and devotee.

GATHA 0349 The Moral Ideal

Social criticism, the scorner of Hari

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे दंड । कैसा न पवे तो लंड ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Inauspicious speech should never be allowed to enter the ears. One who disparages the story of Hari will suffer the agony of wasting disease.

Even if born in the highest caste, such a person is a wretched sinner. Says Tuka, sin belongs to the one who has no love for mother and father. One whose tongue never utters the name of Govinda but always indulges in slandering others: such a person walks straight toward the city of hell and finds no rest.

Says Tuka, how will such a wretch escape punishment?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Foul speech should not be let into the ears. The one who reviles the story of Hari, his is the agony of wasting disease. Born in the highest caste, he is still a vile sinner. Tuka says: sin belongs to the one who has no love for his mother and father. The tongue that never says Govinda, that always slanders others, how will it reach any rest in the city of hell it is bound for? Tuka says: how will that scoundrel escape his punishment?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells the listener to keep foul speech out of the ears, then names the worst kind: reviling the story of Hari. He measures a person not by birth but by conduct; even the highest caste does not save the one who mocks the holy story or has no love for mother and father, who remains a sinner regardless. He sets the slanderer beside the one who never lets Govinda's name cross his tongue and instead spends it tearing others down. The warning is pointed at that pattern of contempt and slander itself: it leads only toward a place of no rest, and no punishment is escaped by it. Read it as a mirror for one's own speech, not as a license to despise the speaker.

GATHA 0350 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the hollow fault-finder

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He has no practice of virtue, no genuine devotion within himself. He finds faults in others and contrives their downfall.

Like a dog that defiles even fine food, he contaminates everything. Says Tuka, such a person does not survive even five days.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He has no ground of right conduct, no real devotion in him. He brings about the ruin of others, the learned man, picking out their faults. Like a dog, he defiles even fine food. Tuka says: such a one does not last even five days.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram draws the figure of the clever critic who has nothing under his cleverness, no practice of virtue, no devotion of his own. What he does have is an eye for other people's faults, which he uses to drag them down and ruin them. The harsh image is of a dog that fouls good food it cannot itself enjoy; the fault-finder spoils what is good simply by touching it with contempt. The closing line says such a way of living does not last, and the warning points at the pattern of cynical fault-finding, an invitation to check that impulse in oneself rather than to scorn the person.

GATHA 0351 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the axe-handle son

मराठी मूळ

गर्भाचें धारण । तिनें वागविला सिण ॥१॥

तुका म्हणे जाय । नरका अभक्ताची माय ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The mother bore the burden of the womb and endured all the pain of labor.

But she gave birth to an axe-handle; it will not even turn its face toward her.

Time itself was born, and defilement was brought upon the clan.

Says Tuka, the very tree gives birth to the wood that becomes the handle of the axe that fells it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

She carried the burden of the womb; she bore all the toil of it. But what she bore was an axe-handle; it will not even turn its face to her. Time itself was born, and defilement was laid on the family. Tuka says: the mother of the one without devotion goes to hell.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes the mother's labor, the carried weight of the womb, the pain endured, as the measure of what is owed, and then shows it betrayed. The child she bore turns out to be an axe-handle, the wood fitted into the tool that fells the very tree it came from; it will not so much as look back at her. He names the cost: such a birth brings death and defilement upon the whole family. The sharp closing claim is that the mother of a person without devotion shares his ruin; the weight falls not on her labor but on the godless ingratitude that turns a gift into a weapon, a pattern worth examining in oneself.

GATHA 0352 The Moral Ideal

Moral counsel, the friend who ruins you

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The affection of one who leads you to ruin is false love. Keep such a relationship to the bare minimum and restrain your speech.

Such a bond is a deceptive shackle that will cheat you of everything. Says Tuka, this one is fine only when kept at a distance.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The one who leads you to your fall: their fondness is false love, their affection a lie. Speak to them only as far as duty asks; cut the rest of your words short. Such a bond is a clever shackle that cheats you of everything you have. Tuka says: keep this one at a distance; that alone is good.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming a particular kind of relationship and telling you what to do with it. The person who draws you toward your own ruin wears the face of affection, but he calls it a counterfeit: false love, a lie. So he sets a limit. Speak to such a person only as much as obligation requires and no further, because the bond looks like friendship while it works like a shackle, quietly stripping you of all you have. The only safe handling is distance, and he says distance here is not coldness but good sense.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

God has interposed Himself as the doer; He is the experiencer, and I have gone silent. All the toil of good and evil has been removed.

The play of jiva and Shiva has been made into a child's toy, a plaything of wonder.

Says Tuka, what bondage, what liberation? It was all His game from the start.

IN PLAIN WORDS

God has stepped in as the doer. He is the one who experiences; I have gone quiet. All the strain of good and evil is gone. The play of jiva and Shiva was made into a toy, set up for sport and wonder. What people are there here? This appearance does not last. The world is truly full of Vishnu; this is where everything takes hold. The shares were handed out; caste and duty are his game. It is all woven of one thread. Where, then, is separate and not-separate? Narayana, the Person of the Vedas, made the decision. Tuka has tasted the sweet juice of grace. My place is at his feet, close, not apart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes what happens when God takes over as the one who acts. Once God is the doer and the experiencer, Tukaram himself falls silent, and the whole exhausting weight of weighing good against evil drops away. He calls the cosmic drama of jiva and Shiva a child's toy God set up for play, and warns that the people and the world we take so seriously are a passing appearance. Yet the world is real as Vishnu's own fullness; even caste and duty are moves in his single game, all woven from one thread, so the old quarrel of separate versus not-separate dissolves. Having tasted that grace, Tukaram says his place is simply at God's feet, close and never apart.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I will not let go, I will not let go, I will not let go of the feet of Vitthoba. Let any burden fall upon me, let any threat come upon my life.

Even if a hundred swords cut this body to pieces, I will not be afraid. Says Tuka, I made this firm resolve from the very start; my mind is alert and unshakable.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will not let go, I will not let go, I will not let go. Vithoba, I will not let go of your feet. Let any heavy burden fall on me, let the worst come upon my life. Even if swords cut this body into a hundred pieces, I will not be afraid. Tuka says: I made this resolve firm beforehand; my mind is awake.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is making a vow and showing how unconditional it is. The triple refusal, will not let go, will not let go, will not let go, fixes his grip on Vithoba's feet against everything that might pry it loose. Then he names the worst that could come: crushing burdens, threats to his very life, the body hacked into a hundred pieces, and meets each with no fear. The strength is not luck of the moment; he says he settled the resolve in advance and keeps his mind alert, so that when terror arrives the answer is already decided.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Well done, well done, Vitthoba, you have done well. Seeing the patience within me, you had me beaten on thorns.

Abuses and curses rained without end; I was thoroughly humiliated. Says Tuka, you rescued me from the hands of anger.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Well done, well done, Vithoba, you have done well. You looked at the patience inside me and had this body beaten on the thorns. Curses and abuse came without stop; I was disgraced again and again. Tuka says: you pulled me free from the hands of anger.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is thanking God for an ordeal, which is the strange turn of the poem. He praises Vithoba for what looks like cruelty: having seen the patience hidden in Tukaram, God put it to the test by letting him be beaten on thorns, cursed, and humiliated over and over. The point lands in the last line. The whole humiliation was a rescue, prying him loose from the grip of anger, the inner enemy that abuse usually feeds. Read as self-examination, it asks whether the insults we suffer might be the very thing that frees us from our own rage, rather than proof of how wronged we are.

Ecstasy, the thorny path made smooth

मराठी मूळ

पावलों पावलों । देवा पावलों रे ॥१॥
बरवें संचित होतें तैसें जालें रें । आतां काय बोलों रे ॥२॥
सोज्ज्वळ कंटकवाटा भावें करूं गेलों रे । तुका म्हणे करूनि वेगळा केलों रे ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have arrived, I have arrived, O God, I have arrived. My past merit was good, and so it has come to pass; what more can I say? The thorny path has become smooth through devotion.

Says Tuka, having been brought through it, I have been set apart and made free.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have arrived, I have arrived, O God, I have arrived. My past store of merit was good, and so it has turned out this way; what more can I say now? I set out in love to walk the bright thorny road. Tuka says: he carried me through it and set me apart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram cries out that he has reached the goal, and then refuses to take the credit. He traces the arrival back to good merit gathered long before, so the reaching feels less like an achievement than a gift come due, leaving him with nothing more to say. He recalls setting out in devotion onto a path that was at once shining and full of thorns. The closing line gives the resolution: God himself brought him through the thorns and set him apart, made free, so the whole journey is finally God's doing and not his own.

GATHA 0357 Confession and Sin

Confession, done with bad company

मराठी मूळ

कां होती कां होती । देवा एवढी फजीती ॥१॥
मुळीं वर्म नसतों चुकलों । तो मी ऐसें चित्तीं ॥ध्रु.॥
होणार होऊनि गेलें । मिथ्या आतां खंती रे ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे पुरे आतां । दुर्जनाची संगती रे ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O God, why was there such disgrace? In my chitta I know that I was at fault from the very root. What was destined to happen has happened; it is useless to grieve over it now.

Says Tuka, enough now; let the company of the wicked come to an end.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why was there, why was there, O God, such a disgrace? Deep in my mind I know I was at fault from the very root, that the error was mine. What was bound to happen has happened; it is empty to grieve over it now. Tuka says: enough now, enough of the company of the wicked.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is owning a humiliation instead of complaining about it. He asks God why such a disgrace fell on him, but does not stop at the question; in his own heart he admits the fault was his from the root, not someone else's doing. Then he refuses to wallow: what was destined has already happened, and grieving over it now is hollow. The resolve he draws is practical and aimed at himself. The disgrace grew out of keeping bad company, so he ends that company for good. The poem points at the pattern, the company we choose, rather than at any person to despise.

GATHA 0358 Prayers

Prayer, the only giver of life

मराठी मूळ

सोडवा सोडवा । सोडवा हो अनंता ॥१॥

कोणा लाज नेणां ऐसें । आणिकां शरण आम्ही जातां ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे सखया । माझ्या रखुमाईच्या कांता ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Save me, save me, save me, O Ananta. Who else but you is the giver of life? I know no one, and shame prevents me from taking refuge elsewhere.

Says Tuka, O my dear friend, O husband of Rukmini, save me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Save me, save me, save me, O Ananta. Who else but you is the giver of life? I know no other, and shame keeps me from going to anyone else for refuge. Tuka says: O dear friend, husband of Rakhumai, save me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is crying for rescue and closing off every other door as he does it. The threefold save me, save me, save me carries the urgency, and the address to Ananta, the endless one, names where he turns. His reasoning is exclusive: God alone gives life, so there is no second giver to run to, and he would feel shame even attempting to take refuge anywhere else. The plea ends in intimacy rather than dread, calling God his dear friend and the husband of Rakhumai, so the one he begs for help is also the one he loves and belongs to.

Devotion, the mind absorbed in Hari

मराठी मूळ

नादें लुब्ध जाला मृग । देह विसरला अंग ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे पाहे । कासवीचें पिलें माये ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

As a mother's heart overflows with joy upon hearing good news of her son, so let my mind remain absorbed in singing and hearing the qualities of Hari. The deer, captivated by music, forgets its very body.

Says Tuka, see how the baby tortoise gazes upon its mother with love.

IN PLAIN WORDS

As a mother takes in good news of her son, may my mind rest like that while singing and hearing the qualities of Hari. The deer is caught by the sound and forgets its own body. Tuka says: see how the baby tortoise watches its mother.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praying for a certain quality of attention and giving three pictures of it. He asks that his mind, while singing and hearing the praises of Hari, hold the way a mother's heart holds when she hears good news of her son: wholly, gladly, with nothing held back. The deer drawn by music until it forgets its own body shows attention so complete that self drops away. The baby tortoise gazing toward its mother, fed by that gaze alone in the old image, shows a love that lives by looking. Together they ask that devotion be absorbed, self-forgetting, and sustained by simple longing toward God.

Nature of God, grace turns poison to nectar

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे विष अमृता समान । कृपा नारायण करितां होय ॥४॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Great yogis sit in meditation behind closed doors, and God follows them even there. He tends to their hunger and thirst and watches over their hunger, thirst, heat, and cold, for they have become indifferent to the body.

Who else is their friend or relative besides Hari? What other joy gladdens their souls? They have no attachment to kingly power, not even for a moment. Says Tuka, when Narayana shows his grace, even poison becomes nectar.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Great yogis sit in meditation behind closed doors, and God follows close on their path. He keeps their hunger and thirst, watches over their cold and heat, for they have grown indifferent to the body. What friend, what kin, do they have other than Hari? They have no second one. What joy gladdens their souls? Not for a moment is there the pride of a kingdom in them. Tuka says: poison becomes the same as nectar when Narayana shows his grace.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the renunciate yogis and the God who tends them. They sit shut away in meditation, having grown indifferent to the body, and God does not leave them to fend for themselves: he follows behind and looks after their hunger, thirst, cold, and heat. Their company is narrowed to one. Hari is their only friend and only kin, and the pride of power or kingdom never touches them even for a moment. The final line names what makes this possible. When Narayana pours out grace, even poison turns into nectar, so what would harm anyone else becomes, for them, the very thing that sustains.

Ecstasy, cling to the hem and be ferried

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

That which was never meant to be has come to pass: I have beheld your feet. O God, shall I now turn back? For many days I held this longing, and today the fruit of that labor has come.

How long can one live on the hopes of worldly life? Let this noose be cut loose right here. Those who have drowned have no trace or path left behind; I must abandon the trail that pulls me back.

Ahead lie mountains of suffering, and the torment of the womb has no end. Says Tuka, I will cling to the hem of your yellow garment; you, O God, are my ferry across this ocean of existence.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What was never to be has happened: I have seen your feet. Now, O God, why would I turn back? For many days I carried this longing, and today, after much labor, the fruit has come. How long can one live on the hopes of worldly life? Let this noose be cut loose right here. Those who drowned left no root and no road behind; I must give up the trail that drags me back. Ahead lie mountains of suffering, and the womb's torment has no end. Tuka says: I will cling to the hem of your yellow garment. You, O God, are my ferry across the ocean of being.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram has reached the feet he longed for and now refuses to go backward. Seeing God's feet was something he thought could never be, and after many days of longing and hard effort the fruit has finally come, so turning back is unthinkable. He weighs the alternative coldly: worldly hope is a noose, the ones who drowned in it left no path worth following, and ahead of that road lie only mountains of pain and the endless torment of being born again. So he chooses the one hold that saves. He clings to the hem of God's yellow garment and trusts God as the ferry that carries him across the whole ocean of birth and death.

Devotion, Vaikuntha brought to earth

मराठी मूळ

वैकुंठा जावया तपाचे सायास । करणें जीवा नास न लगे कांहीं ॥१॥
तया पुंडलिकें केला उपकार । फेडावया भार पृथीवीचा ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे सोपी केली पायवाट । पंढरी वैकुंठ भूमीवरी ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To reach Vaikuntha there is no need for the ordeals of penance or for destroying one's body. Pundalik rendered that great service to relieve the burden of the earth.

Says Tuka, he made the footpath easy: Pandharpur is Vaikuntha right here on the ground.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To go to Vaikuntha there is no need for the strain of penance, no need to destroy the body. Pundalik did that great service, to lift the burden of the earth. Tuka says: he made the footpath easy. Pandhari is Vaikuntha here on the ground.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is saying the highest heaven has been moved within reach. The old route to Vaikuntha demanded harsh penance and the wearing down of the body, and he sets that aside as unnecessary. The reason is Pundalik, whose devotion drew God to stand on the brick at Pandharpur; Tukaram frames this as a service done to relieve the earth's burden. The payoff is the closing claim, and he does not soften it. Pandhari is not a road to Vaikuntha but Vaikuntha itself, laid down on the ground as an easy footpath that ordinary people can simply walk.

Faith, courage over cowardice

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Grief only multiplies grief, but the courageous remain steadfast in their resolve. Nothing can be accomplished here through cowardice, O brother.

Those who act with determination bring things into being, though no one else may come to help. Says Tuka, even one small moment, when seized with effort, is enough.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Grief only makes grief grow; the courageous stay firm in their resolve. What cannot be done here by such means? Cowardice is false, brother. Those who keep saying yes, yes bring things to pass, though no one comes to help them. Tuka says: even one small moment, when it is seized, is enough.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is rebuking despair and praising steady nerve. He observes that grief feeds on itself and only multiplies, while the courageous hold firm to their resolve and so get things done. Cowardice, he says plainly, is a lie, a false self-image that excuses inaction. He notes too that the determined act and bring things into being even when no one stands beside them to help. The closing turn is encouragement: you do not need endless time or perfect conditions, because even a single small moment, once it is truly seized, is enough to accomplish what matters.

GATHA 0364 The Necessity of Experience

Nondual sight, no second thing

मराठी मूळ

माझिया गोतें हें वसलें सकळ । न देखिजे मूळ विटाळाचें ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This is why such a game was set in motion: no direction has been left out. All that exists is my kin kin; the root of any impurity cannot be found.

Having been introduced and given over all at once, I see no second thing, no inequality. Says Tuka, there is no entanglement with Death; apart from God, there is neither condition nor understanding.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is why the whole game was set up like this: no direction was left out. Everything that exists is my own kin. I cannot find any root of impurity anywhere. He introduced me to it all at once, and now I see no second thing, no high and no low. Tuka says: there is no snare in Death for me. Apart from God there is no state and no mind.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing what the world looks like once the eye no longer divides it. The cosmos is a game God set in motion, and not one corner of it is left outside that play. So everything is his own family, and he can find no source for impurity anywhere, because impurity was only ever a way of cutting one thing off from another. Shown the whole at once, he sees no second thing and no ranking of higher over lower. With nothing held apart, death has no hook to catch him; only God remains, and there is no separate condition or mind left over.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A true Vaishnava is one whose entire love rests upon God alone. There is no other measure: body, wealth, reputation, and people are all as grass to him.

Even when the heaviest burden falls, his vow never wavers. Says Tuka, let his caste be whatever it may. We will not walk those other paths; we dance in the open square of Pandhari.

Let anyone attain the state of Self-realization; let them call it the highest liberation. Says Tuka, we who are servants of Hari find all such talk of no account.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A true Vaishnava is one whose whole love rests on God. There is no other measure. Body, wealth, reputation, people: all of it is grass to him. Even when the heaviest burden falls on him, his vow does not waver. Tuka says: let his caste be whatever it may. We will not walk those other paths; we dance in the open square of Pandhari. Let anyone reach the state of the Self; let them call it the highest liberation. Tuka says: we who are servants of Hari hold all such talk of no account.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is redefining who counts as a real devotee, and the test is love, not birth. The one mark of a Vaishnava is that his whole heart rests on God; body, wealth, name, and people weigh no more than grass against that. Such a one holds his vow steady under any burden, and his caste, high or low, is simply beside the point. Tukaram then sets devotion above the prize that most spiritual paths chase: even the state of Self-realization, even the highest liberation, does not interest the servant of Hari. He would rather dance in the open square at Pandhari than walk the road that ends in mukti.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The Sadguru showed me grace, though I had done no service to deserve it. He caught hold of me on the road as I was going for a bath in the Ganga and placed his hand upon my head.

He asked for a quarter-measure of ghee with his meal, but I forgot this in a dream. Some dispute arose as an obstacle, and therefore there was haste.

Raghava Chaitanya, Keshava Chaitanya, gave me the sign of the rosary. Babaji told me his own name and gave me the mantra: Rama, Krishna, Hari.

Says Tuka, on Thursday, the tenth day of the bright half of Magha, he accepted me as his own.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The Sadguru showed me grace, though I had done no service to earn it. He caught hold of me on the road as I was going to bathe in the Ganga, and placed his hand on my head. He asked for a quarter-measure of ghee with his meal, and I forgot it in a dream. Some quarrel arose as an obstacle, and so there was haste. Tuka says: on Thursday, the tenth day of the bright half of Magha, he accepted me as his own.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is telling the story of his own initiation and insisting it was pure gift. He had done nothing to deserve a teacher, yet the Sadguru stopped him on the road to the river and laid a hand on his head. The middle lines record the homely, dreamlike details around the event: a request for ghee forgotten in a dream, a dispute that hurried things along. Then comes the lineage and the heart of the gift: the names Raghava Chaitanya and Keshava Chaitanya, the sign of the rosary, the teacher Babaji, and the mantra Rama, Krishna, Hari. Tukaram dates the moment exactly, the way one remembers the turning point of a life.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Knowing the longing in my mind, my Guru devised a remedy. He gave me a beloved mantra, so easy that there is no obstacle anywhere.

Some go ahead and cross to the other shore: the saints are the way across this ocean of existence. For the knowing and the unknowing alike, whatever their heart desires, there are rafts, boats, and planks to carry them over.

Says Tuka, he showed me the vessel, the ocean of mercy, Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Knowing the longing in my mind, my Guru-king made a remedy. He gave me a beloved mantra, so easy that there is no snag anywhere. Some go ahead and cross to the far shore: the saints are the way across this ocean of being. For the wise and the simple alike, whatever each one's heart desires, there are rafts and boats and planks to carry them over the heat. Tuka says: he showed me the vessel, the ocean of mercy, Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praising the simplicity of the path his Guru handed him. The Guru read the exact longing in his heart and answered it with one easy mantra, a remedy with no catch in it. The world is an ocean to be crossed, and the saints are the crossing itself; whether a person is learned or unlettered, there is some craft fitted to them, a raft or plank for every kind of soul. The point is that the way over is not reserved for the clever. Tukaram ends by naming his own vessel: Panduranga, the very ocean of mercy that carries him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Having placed the entire burden upon him, I rest in certainty. The saints commended me to Vitthoba, stroking my head with their hands, and told me not to worry.

With hands on hips and beautiful even feet, he stands on the bank of the Bhima. All other efforts have ceased for this soul, for I have grasped your feet, O Keshava.

Says Tuka, do with me now as you please, O Ananta; the saints hold my honor in trust.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have laid the whole burden on him and now I rest in certainty. The saints handed me over to Vithoba. They stroked my head with their hands and told me not to worry. Hands on his hips, his lovely feet level, he stands on the bank of the Bhima. All other effort has stopped for this soul, for I have grasped your feet, O Keshava. Do now whatever you please, O Ananta. Tuka says: the saints hold my honor in their keeping.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is handing his whole life over and naming who arranged the handover. The saints themselves commended him to Vithoba, soothing him like a child, telling him to stop worrying. He pictures the Lord in the familiar Pandharpur stance, hands on hips, feet set even, standing by the river. With those feet gripped, every other striving falls away, and he tells God to do with him whatever God wills. The closing line carries the weight of the poem: he is not facing God alone, because the saints have pledged themselves as surety for his honor.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Know this to be the firm resolve of my mind: I have become reckless with my very life. I will hold no one but you; I have cast away fear, shame, and doubt.

The bond between you and me existed from the beginning, and the saints have strengthened it further. I have placed my entire being at your feet; now the responsibility is yours, not mine.

Says Tuka, the saints have vouched for me. I will not let go of your feet now, O Vitthal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Know this firm resolve of my mind: I have become reckless with my own life. I will hold no one but you. I have thrown away fear, shame, and doubt. The bond between you and me was there from the start, and the saints have made it stronger still. I have placed my whole being at your feet. Now the shame is yours, not mine. Tuka says: the saints have vouched for me. I will not let go of your feet now, O Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram declares a surrender that has burned away all caution. He has staked his life and will cling to no one but God, casting off the fear, shame, and doubt that hold most people back. He insists the bond is not new: it was there from the beginning, and the saints have only deepened it. Then he turns the responsibility around with a daring move. Having laid his whole self at God's feet, he says any disgrace now belongs to God, not to him, for it is God's name that suffers if a surrendered devotee is failed. With the saints standing as his guarantors, he refuses to release the feet he has grasped.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When God is your friend, the whole world treats you with kindness. Yet even with such experience at hand, why does the soul remain tormented? When God protects someone, even fire cannot harm them.

Says Tuka, Hari attends to the efforts of his devoted servant with great care.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When God is your friend, the whole world treats you with kindness. Even with such experience at hand, why does the soul still torment itself? When God guards someone, not even fire can harm them. Tuka says: Hari himself takes care of the efforts of his servant.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is steadying a frightened heart by pointing to plain experience. If God is truly your friend, the world itself softens toward you, and you have surely seen this happen. So why, he asks, does the soul keep wringing itself with anxiety? The answer he offers is that whatever God protects cannot be touched, and he reaches for the strongest image: even fire cannot burn it. The closing line names the reason for confidence: the servant does not have to manage everything, because Hari himself attends to the devotee's efforts.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Blessed are the servants of the saints: they receive ready-made nourishment of bliss. Much labor goes into shaping something, and a small mistake in the process can cause ruin.

A cooked meal requires all the right ingredients gathered beforehand; when everything comes together, it tastes sweet. Says Tuka, telling stories of war sounds fine, so long as the battlefield has not come into view.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Blessed are those who let themselves be called servants of the saints: theirs is ready-made bliss, asked for and given. To shape a thing yourself takes much labor, and one small slip in the method brings ruin. A cooked meal needs all the right things gathered first; when everything comes together, then it is sweet. Tuka says: telling stories of battle sounds fine, until the battlefield itself comes into view.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is comparing two ways of seeking God: leaning on the saints, or relying on one's own effort. To serve the saints and take the grace they offer is the easy way, ready-made bliss that costs only humility. Doing it yourself is like cooking or craft: it demands every ingredient in place and the right method, and a single mistake spoils the whole. The last line lands the warning with a soldier's bluntness. Boasting of one's own spiritual prowess is like swapping war stories; it is easy talk until the real battlefield appears and tests whether you can actually fight.

तुका म्हणे सर्व सुख त्या संगती । घडेल पंगती संतांचिया ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By any means, one should keep the company of saints. Even if you must linger at their door taking on the very station of a dog, do so.

There you will hear the name of Rama and partake of their blessed leftovers. Be a laborer, a servant, a menial in their service; lowliness and poverty are good there.

Says Tuka, all happiness lies in their company; you will have a place at the table of the saints.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By any means at all, keep the company of saints. Even if you must stay at their door taking the rank of a dog, do it. There you will hear the name of Rama, and you will eat their leftovers. Be a laborer, a servant, a menial in their service; to be lowly and poor is good there. Tuka says: all happiness is in that company. You will get a place at the saints' own table.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is urging the listener to pay any price in pride to be near the saints. He says: even if it means crouching at their door like a dog, do it, because what is gained there is worth more than dignity. At that door you hear the Name and live on the saints' leftovers, and the usual marks of shame, being a servant, a menial, poor and low, become good things rather than humiliations. The whole poem inverts the world's ranking of high and low. He promises that this self-chosen lowliness ends not in disgrace but at the table itself, in the full company and joy of the saints.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Alone in the wild, I went with Govinda, and what was hidden became known. Do not call me fallen; nothing impure came near me.

I had never seen this path before, and that is why I fearlessly kept his company. Out of fright I threw my arms around his neck and hid myself close beside him.

With tender boldness he held me. I am a married woman, and my condition speaks for itself; why should I need to explain? Says Tuka, he brought it all to completion, and both of us were fulfilled. This longing had dwelt in my heart for many, many days, and today all my prayers have borne fruit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Alone in the wild, I went with Govinda, and what was hidden became known. Do not call me, do not call me a fallen woman; nothing impure came near me. I had never seen this path before, so I boldly kept his company. Out of fright I threw my arms around his neck and hid close beside him. With tender boldness he held me. I am a married woman, and now I am with child; why must this even be told? Tuka says: he brought it all to completion, and both of us were fulfilled. This longing had been in my heart for many days, and today my prayer has borne fruit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sings in the voice of a woman to speak of the soul's secret union with God. She goes off alone with Govinda, and in that solitude what was hidden is finally known. She heads off the scandal at once: do not call her fallen, nothing impure touched her, because this love is not what the gossips imagine. The fright, the clinging to his neck, the hiding close beside him are the soul's first terror and surrender on an unknown path. The pregnancy is the sign that the union truly bore fruit, a thing too plain to need explaining; a longing carried for many days has at last been answered, and both lover and Beloved are fulfilled.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The meeting I longed for with Govinda has taken place. Now I will serve him with all certainty.

Be steady, be steady, and let me bear this quietly, for I have endured too many comings and goings. Let no wind of opposition blow against me here; I have shut the door against all else.

This union is the fruit of great effort; he will not let me be separated from him even for a moment. He has forgotten all social propriety for the sake of love; I have gone mad with devotion in this very moment.

Daybreak after daybreak the space was earned, and in utter peace there is leisure at last. Such sweetness has come, such abundant nectar.

Says Tuka, this day will never come again.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The meeting I longed for with Govinda has happened. Now I will serve him with full resolve. Be steady, be steady, only help me hold still; I have borne too many comings and goings. Let no wind of opposition blow against me here; I have shut the door against everything else. This union is the prize of great effort; he will not let me be parted from him for even one moment. He has forgotten all the world's propriety for love's sake, and in this very moment I have gone mad with longing. Daybreak after daybreak the chance was won, and in deep peace there is rest at last. Such sweetness has come, such abundant nectar. Tuka says: this day will never come again.

WHAT IT MEANS

Again in the bride's voice, Tukaram sings the moment the soul's long-sought meeting with God finally arrives. After endless comings and goings, she begs only to be held steady now, to let no opposing wind reach her, having shut the door on all else. The union is the fruit of hard striving, and now the Beloved will not allow even a moment's separation; for love's sake both of them have abandoned the world's sense of what is proper. She has gone mad with devotion, and what follows is deep peace and overflowing sweetness. The last line gives the ecstasy its edge: this day is unrepeatable, a grace that comes once and is never to be taken lightly.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How marvelous that the one who witnesses everything has his very life dwelling right there. Each one marvels to herself, yet the loving debate never ceases.

One dark-cloud-hued beloved, Hari, has drenched them all; their hearts overflow, eager and deep. The one object of love for all of them is Hari, and for his sake they love one another.

The four worlds of the blind, the deaf, and the lifeless have been redeemed, and their glory is sung in the ancient texts. Praise from another's lips is sweeter still; in honoring the beloved, there is great tenderness.

Each vies to please the other, and the joy of holy company knows no limit. The love of God pervades all movable and immovable creation, making no distinction between intimate and stranger.

Near and far are held according to past merit; one must become like Hari to reach Hari. Says Tuka, I have received the blessed leftovers of that feast. The love poured out of me, and when it fell upon my ears, my very life was guarded.

With single-minded devotion, I hold those feet within my heart.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How wonderful that the One who witnesses everything has his very life right there among them. Each one marvels to herself, yet the loving argument never stops. One dark-cloud-hued Beloved, Hari, has drenched them all; their hearts overflow, eager and deep. The one object of love for all of them is Hari, and for his sake they love one another. The blind, the deaf, the lifeless, the four kinds of beings have been redeemed, and their glory is sung in the old texts. Praise from another's lips tastes sweeter; honoring the beloved is done with great tenderness. Each one vies to please the other, and the joy of holy company has no end. The love of God runs through all that moves and stays still, making no difference between intimate and stranger. Near and far are held according to past merit; one must become like Hari to reach Hari. Tuka says: I have received the blessed leftovers of that feast. The love poured out of me, and when it fell on my ears my very life was guarded. With single heart I hold those feet within my heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is celebrating the fellowship of those who love God together. The wonder is that the witness of all things lives right among his devotees, who marvel at him and never tire of their loving back-and-forth. One dark-hued Hari has soaked them all, and because each loves him, they come to love one another too; their shared object turns into shared affection. He notes that even the most hopeless, the blind, the deaf, the lifeless across all kinds of creatures, are redeemed in this love, and that praising the Beloved through one another's mouths is sweeter than praising him alone. The closing turn is the key: God shows no preference between intimate and stranger, and to reach Hari one must become like Hari. Tukaram counts himself fed on the leftovers of that feast, his life guarded, his heart fixed on those feet.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You forget even what has been placed in your own hands. Who knows what Hari has settled into your chitta.

Go on, step back now, you fraud. How will you show your face to the world? A married woman has been shamed; you have no standing in either place.

What was hidden within has surfaced outwardly: a polished exterior hiding inner theft. She has lost all restraint, this bewildered one; her mind is in Govinda while the body goes through motions.

She makes no reply to anyone; she eats only what is given, like one not in her own keeping. We find her indifferent to everything, lost to bodily awareness.

Where she found this solitude no one knows, for crowds surround her always. The two of them share one path and one conversation; with no shame at all, she has given him her hand.

Says Tuka, Krishna plays his playful game, setting even mothers-in-law and daughters-in-law to quarreling. This is the highest devotion: pure.

May all the world come to know it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You forget even what was placed in your own hands. Who knows what Hari has settled into your mind. Step back now, you fraud. How will you show your face to the world? You have shamed the mother who bore you; you have no standing in either place. What was hidden inside has come out: a polished outside hiding theft within. She has lost all restraint, this bewildered one. Her mind is in Govinda while her body goes through the motions. She makes no reply to anyone. She eats only what is given, like one no longer her own. She holds nothing steady. We find her indifferent to everything, lost to the body. Where she found this solitude no one knows, for crowds are always around her. The two of them share one path and one talk. With no shame, she has given him her hand. Tuka says: Krishna plays his playful game; he even sets mothers and daughters quarreling. Know this for the highest devotion, pure. May the whole world come to know it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks in the voice of women scolding a girl who has fallen wholly into love for Krishna, and the scolding slowly turns into recognition. To the world she looks ruined: absent-minded, indifferent, lost to her duties, no longer keeping up appearances. The poem names the stakes by inverting the world's judgment. What looks like disgrace is her mind fixed on Govinda while the body merely moves, and the solitude she keeps in the middle of crowds is union with him. The harsh words land on the worldly habit of measuring devotion by reputation; the verse points instead at the pattern of being so taken by God that nothing of the self is held back. Tuka closes by naming it outright: this absorption past all shame is the purest devotion, and he wants everyone to see it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

She walks on briskly, pausing now and then, and he stands watching her, perfectly still. The Lord of the gopis has cast this spell: he knows the face of love wherever it appears.

He reveals himself in many guises through many paths, for the one beyond all qualities has set this game in motion here. If something pleases the mind, make it a reply; look for any excuse to speak.

Why do you stand there silently, or else throw pebbles at me? You build the conversation word upon word. She pretends to be offended and turns her back: this playful banter is no use to me.

I will seize you even at the cost of my life, for I know your disguises. The inner joy presses outward and will not be hidden.

She asks: what is this pretense for? What bond is there between you and me? O son of Nanda, you think too highly of yourself. He acts in secret so that no one sees, but the inner joy colors his every outward gesture.

Says Tuka, the mind has merged with the mind; the inner bliss reaches Narayana.

IN PLAIN WORDS

She walks on briskly, pausing now and then. He stands watching her, perfectly still. The Lord of the gopis has cast this spell. He knows the face of love wherever it appears. He shows himself in many guises along many paths, for the one beyond all qualities has set this game going here. If something pleases the mind, make it your reply; look for any excuse to speak. Why do you stand there silent, or throw pebbles at me? You build the talk word upon word. She pretends to take offense and turns her back. This banter is no use to me. I will hold you even if it costs my life, for I know your disguises. The inner joy presses outward and will not stay hidden. What is this pretending for? What bond is there between you and me? O son of Nanda, you think too highly of yourself. He acts in secret so no one sees, yet the inner joy colors his every outward move. Tuka says: mind has merged with mind; the inner bliss reaches Narayana.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram stages the play of teasing and pursuit between Krishna and a gopi as a picture of how love between the soul and God actually works. She walks ahead and he stands watching; he provokes, she protests, and the back-and-forth is itself the courtship. The frame the poem leaves unspoken is that this is no idle flirtation: the one beyond all qualities has deliberately set the game going, taking many forms to draw out love wherever he finds it. The claim it lands is that the joy inside cannot be hidden; it presses through every disguise and every gesture. When the two minds finally merge, that inner bliss reaches Narayana, which is the whole point of the chase.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Everyone tells me it was my own accumulated karma that brought this about. What is done is done, and now nothing else will serve.

When I call out, no second voice answers; he has become part of my very limbs, so what else remains? It is good now to quietly guard what I have, for I have many duties and no rest. I finish one task and the next stands waiting.

Today I left everything behind, and then he fashioned yet another wonder. Says Tuka, Narayana stole away my worries, and the two of us merged in intimate closeness. Made utterly content by his qualities, all my coming and going has ceased.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Everyone tells me it was my own stored-up karma that brought this about. What is done is done; nothing else will serve now. When I call out, no second voice answers. He has become part of my own limbs, so what else is left? It is good now to quietly guard what I have, for I have many duties and no rest. I finish one task and the next stands waiting. Today I left everything behind, and then he made yet another wonder. Tuka says: Narayana stole away my worries. The two of us merged in close embrace. Made utterly content by his qualities, all my coming and going has ceased.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as one whom God has overtaken so completely that there is no longer any distance to cross. The people around her read it as the ripening of past karma, and she does not argue: what is done is done, and nothing else can change it now. The poem names the union plainly. There is no second voice when she calls, because he has become part of her own body, and her worries have been carried off. The claim it lands is in the last line: when the soul and Narayana merge in this closeness, the restless coming and going of birth and longing simply ends, replaced by contentment in him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have forgotten the way home; I came to the marketplace to sell buttermilk. O Krishna, enchanter of the mind, beautiful one: seeing Gopala, I forget everything.

I cannot tell where to set my foot; everywhere I look, only he surrounds me. Says Tuka, I stand here astonished; all the mind's delusions have fled.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have forgotten the way home. I came to the market to sell buttermilk. O Krishna, enchanter of the mind, beautiful one: seeing Gopala, I forget everything. I cannot tell where to set my foot. Everywhere I look, only he surrounds me. Tuka says: I stand here astonished. All the mind's delusions have fled.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes the small scene of a milkmaid who went to market and lost her way home, and lets it carry the whole experience of being captured by God. She came on ordinary business, selling buttermilk, and one sight of Gopala emptied her of everything else, even the path back. The frame the poem leaves unspoken is that the world is the marketplace and the way home is the ordinary self she can no longer find. The claim it lands is double: she is so surrounded by him that she cannot move, yet in that very paralysis every delusion of the mind has fallen away. Losing the world's road is finding him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Without Hari, my heart cannot endure; how long must I stand here waiting? O my beloved, what fault have I committed? Why have you made me wait so long? If some friend would go and call Hari, I would sacrifice my body to that friend. Says Tuka, when will I see my Lord? Once I reach him, I will never go back.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Without Hari, my heart cannot bear it. How long must I stand here waiting? O my beloved, what fault have I done? Why have you made me wait so long? If some friend would go and call Hari, I would give my body to that friend. Tuka says: when will I see my Lord? Once I reach him, I will never go back.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks in the voice of one who cannot endure the absence of Hari and stands waiting, searching herself for the fault that keeps him away. The poem names the ache of separation and the helplessness of not knowing why the meeting is withheld. So great is the longing that she would surrender her own body to anyone who would simply go and call him. The claim it lands is the vow at the end: the meeting she begs for is not a passing visit but a final one. Once she reaches the Lord, she will never turn back to the life she came from.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Blessed is the son of Nanda; he has guarded my honor. Come forward, O divine Krishna. I have left my home for your sake. He is finer than the finest. My proud and arrogant husband cannot compare. Tuka says: Hari has accepted me. I am hidden from the world, set apart and his alone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as a woman who has left everything for Krishna and found in him the protector her own household could not be. She blesses the son of Nanda for guarding her honor and calls him finer than the finest, while the proud husband she left behind cannot stand the comparison. The frame the poem leaves unspoken is the gopi who abandons home and reputation for God, a figure for the soul that turns from worldly belonging to him alone. The claim it lands is in the close: Hari has accepted her, and now she lives hidden from the world, set apart and wholly his. What looks like loss to the world is the safest refuge there is.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The ache born of desire has pierced my innermost being. Bring me the son of Nanda, quickly.

O friends, O confidantes, you who are dear as life to me: I have laid bare my longing before you in this desperate love. A dark, beautiful radiance has appeared upon my body, and the truth of my condition is known to me through my own anguish.

Do not let this secret reach another's ears; may the meeting happen in solitude and longing. In this, my own heart alone is witness.

Who knows when that blessed day will dawn? Taste, exhaustion, body-awareness, and sleep have all been shattered. My eyes are fixed and unblinking, emptied of everything but those feet.

Says Tuka, with his vision came new life.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The ache born of desire has pierced my inmost being. Bring me the son of Nanda, quickly. O friends, you who are dear to me as life: I have laid my longing bare before you in this desperate love. A dark, beautiful glow has come over my body, and I know the truth of my state through my own anguish. Do not let this secret reach another's ears. Let the meeting happen in solitude and longing. In this, my own heart alone is the witness. Who knows when that blessed day will dawn. Taste, weariness, awareness of the body, sleep: all are shattered. My eyes are fixed and unblinking, emptied of everything but those feet. Tuka says: with his sight came new life.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram voices the soul as a woman pierced by longing for Krishna, confiding to trusted friends a love so intense it has changed her body and undone her ordinary life. She asks for the meeting to be kept secret and held in solitude, since her own heart is the only witness that can know what she feels. The poem names the cost of this longing without flinching: hunger, rest, sleep, even awareness of the body have been shattered, and her eyes rest on nothing but his feet. The claim it lands is the turn at the end. The very anguish that strips everything away is not death but the threshold of life, for the sight of him restores her.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Leaving behind all clamor, bow and place your forehead at his lotus feet. Has anyone news of Govinda? Before, he hid; now he has placed himself on my shoulders.

Where did this body-consciousness intrude? Call out, plead, invoke the treasury of mercy. Long ago, many companions were lost; the very one who caused the attachment also brought about the parting.

Looking back at the beginning, the body itself has vanished; the road ends, and the world disappears. Grief and separation from all have come upon me.

I surrendered and confessed my faults. When I cried out the wrongs I had committed, Says Tuka, my Lord appeared.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Leaving all clamor behind, bow and place your forehead at his lotus feet. Has anyone news of Govinda? Before, he hid; now he has set himself on my shoulders. Where did this body-consciousness get in the way? Call out, plead, invoke the treasury of mercy. Long ago many companions were lost; the very one who caused the attachment also brought the parting. Looking back to the beginning, the body itself has vanished. The road ends; the world disappears. Grief and separation from all have come upon me. I surrendered and confessed my faults. When I cried out the wrongs I had done, Tuka says: my Lord appeared.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram traces the path from hiddenness to revelation, and names body-consciousness as the one thing that stood in the way. God who once seemed absent is now carried on the very shoulders, and to reach this the seeker had to lose every other companion and attachment, including the sense of being a separate body. The poem names the stakes by describing the dissolution honestly: the road ends, the world disappears, and grief at the parting from all things comes first. The claim it lands is the order of events. It was surrender and the open confession of one's own faults, not any merit, that made the Lord appear. The crying out of the wrongs is what opens the door.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You keep running further and further away, beyond all worldly restraint. You show so much tenderness, yet how long must I endure the blows of this world? There is never enough time; this happens day after day.

You alone must steady my wavering mind. I am entangled in the many duties of the household, while you, Hari, slip away from my sight.

For all my effort, you will not stay even a moment; you have not left me even the comfort of my striving. I beg you, O Ananta, do not go beyond the reach of my eyes.

Without you, nothing else holds any value. Says Tuka, O Krishna, O son of delight, O generous Kanhoba, stay.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Without you nothing else holds any worth. Tuka says: O Krishna, O son of delight, O generous Kanhoba, stay.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as one caught between the pull of God and the grip of daily life, complaining that the Lord slips away just as the world keeps striking blows. The frame is the householder's struggle: tangled in endless duties, never enough time, the mind wavering and unable to hold steady on its own. The poem names the particular pain that the harder she tries to grasp him, the more he eludes her, leaving her not even the small comfort of feeling her effort was worth something. The claim it lands is the plea itself: only God can steady the mind that cannot steady itself, and so she begs Ananta not to pass beyond her sight, since without him nothing else has any value at all.

Whose fortunate hand has claimed him? Today the bed is empty; my husband is nowhere to be seen. Radha speaks to her confidante: Narayana is playing his tricks on me.

He appears gentle, but he is truly beyond all attributes. I have known him fully, and I will not speak to him again.

He sent for Garuda and summoned Hanuman. He called for Sita, and she came.

But his form would not change, so he could not disguise his waywardness. He became Bheemaki's husband, and he was Rama to Sita.

When Satyabhama donated him to Narada, that is when I truly understood Hrishikesha. When she placed him on the scales, mountains of gold could not match him; a single tulsi leaf tipped the balance.

How was I so deceived? He enjoys us and then calls himself a celibate. He parted the Yamuna's waters for the sage's wives, and to this day we cannot fathom it.

Says Tuka, Narayana knows the heart of every being. He pervades everything yet remains hidden.

He consoled Radha with a loving embrace, for devotion alone is the cause of everything.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lets Radha's playful complaint carry a teaching about who Krishna really is. She protests his tricks and his many faces, recalling how he answers every form of love, how he is Rama to Sita and husband to Rukmini, how no shape can disguise his true nature. The poem turns on the famous weighing: when Satyabhama tried to balance him with heaps of gold, only a single tulsi leaf offered in devotion could outweigh him. That image names the stakes. God cannot be bought or measured by wealth, only matched by love freely given. The claim it lands is in the close: Narayana knows every heart and pervades all things while staying hidden, and his loving embrace of Radha shows that devotion, and nothing else, is the cause of his coming.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He gathers the children, enters the house boldly, and quickly eats the butter right before everyone. Hari is caught, Hari is caught! Scold him if you have no shame; if we catch him, neither you nor we will be spared.

You think it is funny, and he finds it sweet. Why are you smiling? Have you gone mad? We will come to you directly; he has corrupted the boys and girls.

What can we say of his quarrelsome ways? We are ashamed to speak. His face is smeared, his nose is running, and Dasavanti says: bring him here, we will teach him a lesson.

He has caused great trouble in every home and neighborhood. He enters the churning place and eats the butter there.

They all gather, tie a rope around his neck, and bind him to the mortar: now stay still. They say: we have caught you at last, Hari; today you will not steal again.

But he glances mischievously from side to side and laughs. Then, having scattered them all, he uproots the mortar and topples the two Arjuna trees.

A great commotion arises. Dasavanti cannot hold herself back.

Says Tuka, the Lord, my benefactor, runs and embraces the child.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He gathers the children, walks in boldly, and quickly eats the butter in front of everyone. Hari is caught, Hari is caught! Scold him if you have no shame; but if we catch him, neither you nor we will be spared. You think it is funny, and he finds it sweet. Why are you smiling? Have you gone mad? We will come straight to you; he has led the boys and girls astray. What can we say of his quarrelsome ways. We are ashamed to speak. His face is smeared, his nose running, and Dasavanti says: bring him here, we will teach him a lesson. He has caused great trouble in every home and street. He gets into the churning pot and eats the butter there. They all gather, tie a rope around his neck, and bind him to the mortar: now stay still. We have caught you at last, Hari; today you will steal no more. But he glances mischievously side to side and laughs. Then, scattering them all, he uproots the mortar and topples the two Arjuna trees. A great uproar rises; Dasavanti cannot hold herself back. Tuka says: the Lord, my benefactor, runs and embraces the child.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram retells the child Krishna's butter-stealing as both delight and revelation. The gopis come complaining to Yashoda, the boy is caught smeared and laughing, bound to the mortar to keep him still, and even then he breaks free and uproots the twin Arjuna trees. The frame the poem leaves unspoken is that the child who lets himself be tied is the Lord who fills everything; he submits to the rope of a mother's love and yet no binding can hold him. The verse keeps the mood playful and affectionate, the scolding of doting women rather than real anger. The claim it lands is the last line: the same Lord who plays the thief is the seeker's benefactor, and in the end he runs to embrace, which is what all his mischief was reaching toward.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He has become a toll-collector on my path and grabbed the hem of my garment. Pay me my dues first, then go your way.

She says: let go, step back. Now that you have met me at the source, the game of fate has begun and these journeys are done.

She shakes free of his hand; he seizes another's garment. The others too start grappling with his hands.

We have come and gone many times; we do not even know if he is fair or dark. Step aside, cowherd boy, what are you saying? We are the rightful ones here; you stole from us before, and now that we have caught on, you must answer for what you did.

They speak, laughing: we are married women living in our in-laws' homes. Why do you grab at us from afar? Say something proper.

In vain you clutch the garments of other men's wives. If their husbands find out, neither you nor we will be spared.

But he has pierced their hearts and will not let those women go; wherever the secret is, he holds fast. Those who fell into his hands were lost even in the marketplace.

The women who mingled with dark-skinned Krishna never turned back. Says Tuka, do not grieve in vain. This was written in your own destiny, and today it has ripened.

The women who mingled with dark Krishna never turned back. Tuka says: do not grieve in vain. This was written in your own destiny, and today it has ripened.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells the toll-scene at the riverbank, where Krishna blocks the gopis' path and demands his due, as an image of how God claims the soul. The women protest, scold, and laugh, pleading their respectability and the danger of scandal, but their resistance is the surface of the story. The frame it names is that once he has met them at the source, the cycle of their ordinary journeys is finished. The claim it lands comes through the gopis who could not turn back: whoever falls into his hands is pierced in the heart and lost to the old life for good. Tuka closes by pointing it at the listener's own self-examination: do not grieve at being caught, for this was written in your destiny and has now simply come ripe.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Hari, your complexion is dark, and I am fair as a champa blossom. By beholding you I will turn dark, and then the world will shun me.

Stay quiet and stop your mischief. How many times must I tell you, cowherd? Your blanket is rough and scratchy.

Stay away, O child of Nanda. You smell of ghee and curd; you gorge on milk, butter, and cream from your own house and others'.

I am delicate as moonlight. People will laugh at me; they will jeer when they see me.

If your marks appear on my body, I will be disgraced. You have no shame, no fear, no hesitation, while I have respectable elders and sharp-tongued in-laws.

What more can I say? You have no regard for my dignity at all. Says Tuka, my Lord Gopinath will not let go and will not release her hand. Knowing the truth, he cannot bear to hear her refusals.

He makes her one with himself in liberation, even as he enjoys the play of love.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O Hari, your color is dark; I am fair, fair as a champa flower. If I look at you I will turn dark, and then people will cast me out. Stay quiet; stop your tricks. How many times must I tell you, cowherd? Your blanket is rough and scratchy. Keep away, child of Nanda. You stink of ghee and curds; you stuff yourself with milk, butter, and cream, from your own house and from others' too. I am tender as moonlight. People will laugh at me; they will jeer when they see me. If your marks show on my body I will be shamed. You have no shame, no fear, no second thought, while I have respectable elders and sharp-tongued in-laws. What more can I say? You have no care at all for my honor. Tuka says: my Lord Gopinath will not let her go and will not release her hand. He knows the truth and cannot bear to hear her refuse. He makes her one with himself in liberation while he enjoys this play of love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram writes in the voice of a gopi scolding Krishna, and the scolding is itself the love. Every complaint she makes, his dark skin, his smell of butter, the disgrace his touch will bring among her in-laws, is a way of staying close while pretending to push away. He has no shame and no fear because he is not bound by the social code that binds her, and that is exactly what frees her from it too. In the closing turn Tukaram names what the quarrel is really about: Gopinath will not let go of the soul that argues with him, because her refusals are only the soul's last resistance. He holds her hand until she is made one with him, and the whole teasing scene is the play through which liberation is given.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He has lured and ruined our daughters and sons and driven our daughters-in-law mad, O Yashoda. Tell him properly to behave, or else there will be no mercy left; our very lives are at stake.

We women will all unite and confront you; the friendship between you and us will be broken. He knows no boundaries, no propriety, no social custom; he does whatever he pleases wherever he goes.

When we are not watching our homes, he makes his entrance there. He kisses and embraces everyone, rolls on beds and benches, smashes the pots on the ceiling hooks, and empties every vessel of buttermilk; no one can catch him.

We have endured this too long and been too patient, thinking he is your only child. But now we will bind him to a post with all our strength, and nothing he does will save him.

Even if it costs us everything, we will not let go. Then Mother Yashoda takes the Lord of the Discus in her hands and presents him to the milkmaids.

Do not speak harshly, all of you, or my little one will be hurt. Says Tuka, wherever his hands touch, fresh butter springs up in streams of nectar. Seeing my Lord, the whole country forgot every other awareness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He has lured and ruined our daughters and our sons; he has driven our daughters-in-law mad, O Yashoda. Tell him now, plainly, to behave, or there will be no mercy left; our very lives are at stake. We women will unite and confront you, and the friendship between you and us will break. He knows no boundary, no decency, no custom; he does whatever he likes wherever he goes. When we leave our homes unwatched, he slips in. He kisses everyone, embraces them, rolls on the beds and benches, smashes the pots on the ceiling hooks, and empties every vessel of buttermilk; no one can catch him. We have borne this far too long, patient because he is your only child. Now we will bind him to a post with all our strength, and nothing he does will save him. Even if it costs us everything, we will not let go. Then Mother Yashoda takes the Lord of the Discus in her hands and gives him to the milkmaids again and again. Do not speak harshly, all of you, or my little one will be hurt. Tuka says: wherever his hands touch, fresh butter springs up in streams of nectar. Seeing my Lord, the whole country forgot every other awareness.

WHAT IT MEANS

The milkmaids come to Yashoda as outraged neighbors, listing Krishna's thefts and trespasses as crimes, but the complaint exposes its opposite. He has overturned every household boundary and rule of propriety, and that is precisely why the young people cannot keep their hearts away from him. Their threat to bind him to a post is the gesture of those who can neither hold him nor let him go. When Yashoda hands him over and begs them not to be harsh, the quarrel dissolves into tenderness, and Tukaram lands the truth: his touch turns to streams of nectar, and one look at him makes the whole country forget itself. What looked like ruin is the disordering power of God, which breaks the small order of decorum so that love can take its place.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

She throws herself about without guarding her limbs, looking in every direction, ready to break away from home and family. All of them have reached the end of their wits.

They do not know their own from a stranger's. They cry out his names aloud: O Shripati, Shripati! The onlookers marvel and laugh at this spectacle.

She runs outside into the wilds and will not stay in the house. Through that bond she wanders everywhere, having forgotten whether this is her husband's home or her parents'.

Her gaze is fixed on one alone; all else has dropped from memory. Says Tuka, all of you stay calm and steady. This power will never yield to force.

From his own mouth the full truth will come. All debates and conjectures fall apart here on their own.

IN PLAIN WORDS

She throws herself about, not guarding her body, looking everywhere, ready to break free of home and family. All of them are at the end of their wits. They no longer tell their own people from strangers. They cry his names aloud: O Shripati, Shripati. The onlookers marvel and laugh at the sight. She runs out into the wilds and will not stay in the house. Caught in that bond, she wanders everywhere, forgetting whether this is her husband's home or her parents' home. Her gaze is fixed on one alone; everything else has dropped from her memory. Tuka says: all of you, stay calm and still. This power will never yield to force. From his own mouth the whole truth will come. Here every argument and every guess falls apart on its own.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a woman so taken by Krishna that she has lost all sense of place, kin, and shame, and the people around her can only watch and laugh. Her wandering is not madness in the ordinary sense; it is the soul gripped by a single love that has erased every other attachment, husband's house and parents' house alike. The crowd's instinct is to restrain her, and Tukaram answers that this is useless: such a bond does not bend to force. The verse turns the laughter back on the onlookers, for the truth of her state will be settled by God himself, and all their reasoning about it simply collapses before it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

His maya does not let itself be known; only he knows his own secret. He pretends to play, yet silently strips away a hundred thousand attachments.

Those children have fixed their hearts upon Krishna; whatever they desire, their minds carry toward him. Hari has become the gathering place of all.

Go together to meet him there, within. He performs his mischief within the house so no one notices.

Hand to hand they lead one another further and further away. Filled with bliss, they play among themselves, having abandoned all other people.

There is no second, no other, in that place. Says Tuka, there is nothing besides Narayana alone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

His maya will not let itself be known; only he knows his own secret. He seems to play, yet silently he strips away a hundred thousand attachments. Without a break he has fixed those children's hearts on Kanha; whatever they long for, their minds carry to him. Hari has become the gathering place of all. Go together to meet him there, within. He works his theft inside the house, so no one notices. Hand to hand they lead one another further and further away. Full of bliss, they play among themselves, having left all other people behind. There is no second, nothing other, in that place. Tuka says: there is nothing besides Narayana alone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Here the playful stealing of Krishna's childhood is read straight through as the work of his maya, which hides its own method even as it acts. While he seems only to be playing, he is quietly removing attachments by the hundred thousand and gathering every heart into himself. Tukaram points the listener to where this meeting happens, within, and frames the gopis being drawn away from the world as souls led step by step out of their old attachments. The poem ends on the non-dual claim it has been moving toward: in that inward place there is no second thing, nothing besides Narayana alone, which is the whole point the play was disguising.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He has set up an elaborate game, a scheme of pure delight. Hiding himself, he moves with a dancing, leaping gait.

The game is on, the game is on! When they fall at his feet, he will not relent and will not return their garments. He snatches their saris, shawls, petticoats, tassels, sashes, and blouses, and with all of them in hand, he scrambles up the Kadamba tree.

Draping them over his shoulder, he looks down directly at them and bursts out laughing. The children play in joyful uproar, clapping and tumbling.

Some challenge one another with various feats of daring; the game grows wider and wilder. When one comes out of the water, she looks for her clothes and says: I do not know who took them or when.

They all call out together, and more come out, wondering how they will get home now. The wearer of the forest garland laughs, looking down at them all.

Ashamed, they hide in the water, covering themselves with their hands. They plead: protect our honor, O Gopala.

What do you want at this moment? We will give you sweets. He says: come out, all of you, come before me with folded hands.

Do not chatter and waste words. I care nothing for trinkets, ornaments, or wealth.

Give me your hearts and minds undivided. They look at one another and abandon their shame.

One says: come, friend, let us go to him. With folded hands they stand quietly.

Says Tuka, he spoke the word and their honor was preserved.

They all call out together, and more come out, wondering how they will ever get home. The wearer of the forest garland laughs, looking down at them all. Ashamed, they shrink back into the water, covering themselves with their hands. They plead: protect our honor, O Gopala. What do you want now? We will give you sweets. He says: come out, all of you, and stand before me with folded hands. Do not chatter and waste words. I care nothing for trinkets, ornaments, or wealth. Give me your hearts and minds, undivided. They look at one another and let go of their shame. One says: come, friend, let us go to him. With folded hands they stand quietly. Tuka says: he spoke the word, and their honor was kept.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram retells the famous play of the stolen clothes as a lesson in total surrender. Krishna takes every garment the gopis have, every covering and ornament, and will not return them no matter how they plead or bargain with sweets. His one demand is plain: not trinkets, not wealth, but the heart and mind given whole and undivided, and to receive it they must come to him stripped of every concealment, hands folded. The shame they must abandon is the self's last covering, the wish to keep something back. When they finally let it go and stand quietly before him, Tukaram closes by saying their honor was preserved by his word, for what is surrendered to God is not lost but kept safe.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I never would have come alone had I known. Who could tell this forest was so full of danger? Let go of my garment, Hari, let me go.

It is getting late and they will be furious at home. My mother-in-law is harsh and my father-in-law is formidable; the consequences for you and me cannot be spoken.

My friends and companions were with me, and you found your chance when they scattered. Had there been any distance, how would you have caught me? Suddenly, all at once, you clung to me.

How weary she is from arguing, her strength failing as she tries to pull her hand free. Says Tuka, the Lord, that expert enjoyer, takes his delight while preserving all outward propriety.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I never would have come alone if I had known. Who could tell this forest was so full of danger? Let go of my garment, Hari, let me go. It is getting late; they will be furious at home. My mother-in-law is harsh, my father-in-law is severe; if anyone tells them of you and me, nothing of us will be left. My friends and companions were with me, and you found your chance when they scattered. If there had been any distance between us, how would you have caught me? All at once you clung to me. How weary she is now from arguing, her strength gone as she tries to wrench her hand free. Tuka says: the Lord, that skilled enjoyer, takes his delight while keeping every outward propriety.

WHAT IT MEANS

A gopi caught alone by Krishna pleads to be released, naming the late hour, the harsh in-laws, the ruin that exposure will bring, and Tukaram lets the whole protest stand as the soul's resistance to being seized by God. She notes that she was only caught because her companions scattered and because there was no distance left between them, which is the condition of the soul left alone with the divine. Her arguing tires her and her strength fails as she tries to pull her hand away, the image of a will that cannot free itself from the grip it secretly wants. Tukaram closes by naming Krishna the skilled enjoyer who takes his delight yet keeps every outward form intact, so that the seizing is real but the world sees nothing amiss.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

They are playing chendoo-chauguna on the sandy banks. Come, come, say the women, let us go watch.

Those gopis, those love-struck women, their hearts yearning to see Hari, use the excuse of fetching water from home, gathering in groups of twelve and sixteen. While washing their garments they forget what they are doing, their gaze fixed upward on the form of Krishna.

No one remembers name or family or caste; all are spellbound, frozen in the direction of his glance. One has her hand in her mouth for cleaning her teeth, yet does not hear a word the world is saying, for her ears are drinking in Krishna's flute song.

Says Tuka, the Lord of Tuka will fulfill every wish of the heart.

IN PLAIN WORDS

They are playing chendoo-chauguna on the sandy banks. Come, come, the women say, let us go and watch. Those gopis, those love-struck women, their hearts aching to see Hari, make the excuse of fetching water from home, and gather in groups of twelve and sixteen. While washing their clothes they forget what they are doing, their gaze fixed upward on the form of Krishna. No one remembers her name, her family, her caste; all stand spellbound, frozen in the line of his glance. One has her hand in her mouth, cleaning her teeth, and does not hear a word the world is saying, for her ears are drinking in Krishna's flute song. Tuka says: the Lord of Tuka will fulfill every wish of the heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

The gopis invent an errand, fetching water, to go where Krishna plays, and once there the errand falls away entirely. Washing forgotten, teeth half-cleaned, names and caste and family all slip from mind as their attention is pulled upward to his form and his flute. Tukaram is showing how the pull of God dissolves ordinary identity and the world's chatter; the woman with her hand still in her mouth hears nothing but the flute. The closing line makes the promise explicit: this is no loss but a fulfillment, for the Lord grants the heart's deepest wish to the one who is taken up in him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What came over me, keeping your company? You have set the whole world upon my trail. Go away, go back, you rascal of a cowherd.

Do not play your false tricks here. The beauty of your form has stolen my mind and heart; I no longer see anything around me as my own.

Says Tuka, my Lord has seated himself within my very life and, having done so, has fallen silent.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What came over me, that I went near you? You have set the whole world on my trail. Go away, go back, you rascal of a cowherd. Do not play your false tricks here. The beauty of your form has carried off my mind and heart; I no longer see anything around me as my own. Tuka says: my Lord has seated himself in my very life, and having done so, has fallen silent.

WHAT IT MEANS

A short scolding poem where the rebuke is the confession. She tells the cowherd to go away and stop his tricks, but in the same breath admits that his beauty has already taken her mind and that nothing around her feels like her own anymore. The angry words are the soul's protest against a captivation it cannot undo. Tukaram closes by dropping the quarrel entirely: the Lord has settled inside her very life and then gone silent, so the outward fuss is over a presence that has already moved in and will not leave.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It tastes sweet, and yet it cannot be described. An embrace of pure love settles in, the embrace of a beloved companion.

I have been pierced by the splendor of Shrirang; all sense of "I" and "mine" has vanished. My gaze will not turn back; it has settled where it settled, and my mind has come to rest at his feet.

Says Tuka, from the moment I met my Lord, all ties with the past were cut.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It tastes sweet, and yet it cannot be told. An embrace of love settles in, the embrace of a dear companion. I have been pierced through by the splendor of Shrirang; all sense of I and mine has vanished. My gaze will not turn back; it has stayed where it came to rest, and my mind has lain down at his feet. Tuka says: from the moment I met my Lord, all ties with the past were cut.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from inside the experience of union, where the sweetness is real but words give out. The splendor of God has pierced him so completely that the sense of I and mine simply disappears, and his gaze and mind no longer turn back toward anything else. This is not a feeling he can describe to others; it is a resting place his attention has settled into for good. The closing line names the cost and the gift together: meeting the Lord severed every tie to the old life, and that severing is what the ecstasy amounts to.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Looking up into the sky, a beautiful radiance appears. He has settled in my mind; let no one shame me for it.

He is dearer to me than life itself, not separate from me for even a moment. Says Tuka, I have become the handmaid of Vishvambhara, the sustainer of all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Looking up into the sky, I see a beautiful radiance. He has settled in my mind; let no one shame me for it. He is dearer to me than my own life, not apart from me for a single moment. Tuka says: I have become the handmaid of Vishvambhara, the sustainer of all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes the voice of a devotee who has made God her whole life and will not be shamed for it. The Lord has settled in her mind and become dearer than life, never separate from her even for a moment, and she answers in advance the world's mockery of such love by refusing it any hold. Calling herself the handmaid of Vishvambhara, the sustainer of all, she names her relationship as complete service and complete belonging. The verse stands as a quiet defiance: this devotion is not foolishness to be embarrassed by, but the soul's rightful place at the feet of the one who upholds everything.

A certain woman, lost in devotion, went to sell buttermilk but called out: take Hari, take Hari, instead. Having seen him with her eyes, he settled in her mind, and so it was his name her lips uttered.

In innocent forgetfulness of herself, she displayed the art of Govinda's enchantment. Says Tuka, the people laugh, but she has no ears for them.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A certain woman, lost in him, went to sell buttermilk but called out instead: take Hari, take Hari. Having seen him with her eyes, he settled in her mind, and so it was his name her lips spoke. In her innocent forgetting of herself, she showed the art of Govinda's enchantment. Tuka says: people laugh, but she has no ears for them.

WHAT IT MEANS

A woman goes to market to sell buttermilk and finds the wrong cry on her lips: not her wares but the name of Hari. Tukaram shows how a single sight of God displaces everything else, so that the Name rises of itself even in the middle of ordinary work. Her self-forgetting is not a mistake but the visible effect of Govinda's enchantment working on her. The crowd laughs at the foolish-seeming saleswoman, and the closing line gives the measure of her absorption: she does not even hear them, because nothing of the world reaches her now.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Satyabhama prepares everything in her chamber and waits as waves of desire rise, but the night passes and God does not come. Waves of longing rise within her.

Then she hears a knock at the door. She says: go back, I have understood your ways.

You show tenderness only when you need something. All your words are deception.

You come now because you know the dawn is near. I am the fool for trusting you; no blame falls on you.

Was I not humiliated at the time of the weighing? Then again, you went and met Shiva without a thought for me. And still I trusted your words until now.

The delusion I held has now been fully revealed. I kept thinking: all is well, all is well.

You are a scoundrel whose actions never match his speech. Says Tuka, my Lord, the son of Kausalya, the beloved of Kanhoba, speaks.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Satyabhama makes everything ready in her chamber and waits as waves of longing rise, but the night passes and the Lord does not come. Then she hears a knock at the door. She says: go back, I have understood your ways. You show tenderness only when you need something; all your words are deception. You come now because you know the dawn is near. I am the fool for trusting you; the blame is not yours. Was I not humiliated at the time of the weighing? Then again you went off and met Shiva without a thought for me, and still, even now, I trusted your words. The delusion I held has been fully exposed. I kept telling myself: all is well, all is well. You are a scoundrel whose deeds never match his speech. Tuka says: my Lord, the son of Kausalya, the beloved of Kanhoba, then speaks. And Hari says: my own dear one, why give me low words to drink?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram puts the complaint of a neglected lover into Satyabhama's mouth: she has waited all night, prepared everything, and the Lord arrives only at dawn, when she sees through the timing. Her charge is sharp, that his tenderness appears only when he wants something and that his deeds never match his sweet words, and she blames her own trusting heart rather than him. The poem voices the soul's familiar grievance against a God who seems to come late and to favor others, recalling old slights to feed the resentment. Yet the quarrel is the language of intimacy, not rejection, and the closing turn has Hari himself begin to answer his beloved, so the reproach opens back into the relationship it never truly left.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whatever other one came to me, God alone knows. The words you speak are lesser than the truth.

Look within yourself first and consider. Cast off this confusion and steady your mind.

This quarrel of mine and yours is needless strife. Open your eyes even now and come to your senses.

He says: has it ever happened in this world that a wife gave away her husband as a gift? How good I have been, enduring what I did not deserve. And yet you are the one who sulks; what a wonder this is.

She says: tell me, what humiliation did I cause you? It was your own pride that made Hanuman come. You put me through trouble along with Garuda and Rukmini.

Says Tuka, whether this is right or wrong, nothing can be said.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever other woman came to me, God alone knows. The words you say are smaller than the truth. Look inside yourself first. Think. Drop this confusion and steady your mind. This fight, this mine and yours, is needless trouble. Open your eyes even now and come to your senses. Has it ever happened in the world that a wife gave her husband away as a gift? See how good I have been, bearing what I did not deserve. And yet you are the one who sulks. What a strange thing. She says: tell me, what shame did I cause you? It was your own pride that made you call Hanuman. You put me through trouble, and Garuda, and Rukmini too. Tuka says: whether this is right or wrong, nothing can be said.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram stages a domestic argument between Krishna and Rukmini and lets the bickering carry the point. Krishna protests his innocence and tells her to look within and steady her own mind instead of quarrelling; she throws his old escapades back at him. The poem treats the divine couple with affectionate familiarity, the Lord caught in the same petty wrangling as any married pair. By ending with Tuka unable to say who is right or wrong, the abhanga refuses to take a side: the quarrel itself, the mine-and-yours of wounded pride, is what stands exposed. The mirror it holds up is the listener's own readiness to fight over slights.

Then why did you deceive the good-hearted one? You are a fine actor who knows how to play every part. Step back, step back now, O Hari, says the daughter of Satrajit.

I know the craft of these words. This is how you have tricked everyone until now.

Because I came to you with devotion, there should have been no separation. From life to life, my deepest wish was to be with you.

Yet you turned the whole world against me. How was I to know these are your ways? What can I do? Love trapped me, and for its sake I endured all this.

Otherwise, would I not have known your tricks? At another man's door you would be chased away by your own famous name. How long shall I list your qualities? My tongue cannot finish; you are truly without attributes.

You make no distinction between your own and another's, between mother and sister. You set mothers-in-law and daughters-in-law fighting and watch the spectacle.

To all this, the King of Vaikuntha replies: what is past cannot be brought back to mind. I will not do so again; take this as my solemn vow.

Says Tuka, the lover of devotees, Krishna, speaks these words.

To all this the King of Vaikuntha says: what is past cannot be brought back to mind. I will not do it again; take this as my vow. Tuka says: the lover of devotees, Krishna, speaks these words.

WHAT IT MEANS

Satyabhama, daughter of Satrajit, scolds Krishna as a smooth-talking actor who has tricked everyone, and her complaint doubles as the soul's complaint to a God who seems to play games with it. She names the wound: she came in love and still suffered separation, life after life. Her listing of his faults turns into praise in spite of itself, since calling him nirguna, beyond all attributes, is the highest word she can reach. Krishna answers simply that the past is past and vows not to repeat it. The exchange dramatizes how the devotee's grievance against the Lord dissolves into the recognition that he is the very thing she cannot stop loving.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Krishna, I am alone, all alone. I was separated from you.

Fear grips me in this forest, for I am a timid girl. When I left home, my mother and father tried to stop me; then why did I come with you, O Hari? People warned me you were false, but I was already hooked.

The berry bushes have ripened and stand before me, but where has Hari gone? The forest has grown thick with tangled thorns and bushes; who knows what game Krishna has set up now? Says Tuka, let me retrace the path I came by and search for Hari, even if thorns tear my feet without mercy.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Krishna, I am alone, all alone. I lost you. Fear grips me in this forest, for I am a small, weak girl. When I was leaving, my mother and father tried to stop me. Then why did I come with you, Hari? People said the path was false, but I was already caught. The wild berries have ripened and stand before me, but who knows where Hari has gone? The forest has grown thick with thorns and tangled bushes. Who knows what game Krishna has set up now? Tuka says: let me go back along the path I came by and look for Hari, even if the thorns tear my feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

A girl who left everything to follow Krishna finds herself alone in a dark forest, and the abhanga lets her fright stand for the soul's panic when the felt presence of God withdraws. She had ignored her parents' warning and the world's cautions, drawn on by a love she could not resist, and now she does not know whether his vanishing is abandonment or another of his games. The ripe berries and tangled thorns are the world she must move through to find him again. Her resolve, to retrace her steps even if the thorns tear her feet, names the price: the seeker keeps searching through pain rather than give up the one she has staked her life on.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O mother, why do you call me back home? I am playing with the darling son of Nanda. After so many days I have met him again, and I cannot bear to part from him now.

His tender words steal my heart; my eyelids will not close. Today everyone has come out to join the play; why then do you pull me back in vain? What task of yours am I delaying? Why, mother, do you lock me inside? Says Tuka, the Lord of Gokula is my master, and whatever I say, I say for him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Mother, why do you call me back home? I am playing with the darling son of Nanda. After many days I have met him again. Now I cannot bear to part from him. His tender words steal my heart; my eyelids will not close. Today everyone has come out to join the play. Why do you pull me back for nothing? What work of yours am I holding up? Why, mother, do you lock me inside the house? Tuka says: the Lord of Gokula is my master, and whatever I say, I say for him.

WHAT IT MEANS

A child resists the mother who keeps calling it home, because it has found Krishna again and will not leave the play. Tukaram uses this small domestic tug to picture the soul absorbed in God against the world that keeps tugging it back to ordinary duty. The mother stands for everything that wants to pull the devotee indoors, away from the open field of play with the Lord. The child's complaint is plain and firm: nothing it does is wasted, since all of it is for the Lord of Gokula. To be locked away from him feels like the only real loss.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I will not turn back now; I have come drawn by his love. Let my people rage as it will, what can it do to me? My eyes have settled upon his form, and my heart cannot bear even a moment's separation.

All desire and duty have fallen away, for his arrows of love have pierced my heart. Says Tuka, I have laid down beside my Benefactor; let life without him burn to ash, for I will not retreat.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will not turn back now. I came drawn by his love. What can my own people do to me, raging? Why all this uproar over a fallen woman? All of you say whatever you like; the words you spend will turn out to be lies. At meeting him my mind, and my eyes, settled on his form. Now I cannot bear to be apart from it even a moment. Duty and work have become unwanted; I cannot even speak the basics. His arrows of desire have pierced my inmost heart. To be parted from him now, let such a life burn. My mind has taken hold, and now it will not turn back. Do not keep watch over me anymore. Tuka says: I have lain down beside my Benefactor.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the voice of one who has crossed the line and will not recross it. She has been drawn to Krishna by love and now lets the world rage; their scolding, she says, will prove empty in the end. Tukaram pictures total absorption: eyes fixed on his form, all duty and even ordinary speech fallen away, the heart pierced by love's arrows. The radical claim is that life apart from him is worth nothing, fit only to burn. By saying she has lain down beside her Benefactor, she declares a union the watching world has no power left to police.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The women devoted to Hari are so swift that none can keep pace with them. With their whole being they are supreme, enjoying divine love in fullness.

Says Tuka, such God-intoxicated souls are truly generous. The milkmaids came running, saying, let us catch him today and lock him inside the house.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The women devoted to Hari are so swift that none can keep pace with them. With their whole being they are supreme, enjoying his love to the full. Tuka says: such God-mad, God-intoxicated souls are truly generous. The milkmaids came running and said, let us catch him today, corner him in the inner room, hold him and lock him in.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram praises the women who love Hari so wholly that no one can match their pace, giving themselves over with their entire being. He calls them devapisa, God-mad, and treats that madness as the highest generosity rather than a failing. The closing scene of milkmaids plotting to corner Krishna and shut him in their house is the same love turned playful and bold: they want to seize and keep the Lord himself. The abhanga sets this reckless wholehearted devotion above any measured, careful piety.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The door stands open, yet darkness hides within; the five and seven faculties are crushed into silence. Krishna, knowing the house well, enters stealthily through the front door while his companions wait outside.

He circles cautiously, spots the fresh butter ahead, lowers the hanging pot, and tastes it piece by piece, stretching out his hand for more. The women discover the trail and catch him inside.

Says Tuka, his face never lets sorrow grow; he charmed and delighted them all with his playful mischief.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The door stands open, but darkness hides inside; the five and the seven senses are crushed into silence. Knowing the house well, Hari comes in to steal. He leaves his friends outside and slips in through the front door. Afraid of them, he creeps along, circling close to the ground. Then he sees the fresh butter ahead. He lowers the hanging pot, tastes it carefully, and finds it sweet, and one by one he stretches his hand for more. He knows the women guard their butter, so there he spoils the most. He smears the trail and wipes his hand, to leave the theft to be found. Knowing his ways, the women hold the secret inner door, shut him in, and catch him inside the house. Why do you rob us? You have ruined my store. I will make you bring back all you ate before. They take him by both arms and lead him to his mother. See what spoiling he has done coming into the house. Tuka says: his face never lets sorrow grow; with his playful mischief he charmed and delighted them all.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the butter-thief story told as pure delight. Krishna sneaks into a milkmaid's house, tastes the hidden butter, makes a deliberate mess, and even smears the trail so the theft will be discovered, all the mischief of a God who wants to be caught. The women do catch him, scold him, threaten to make him repay what he ate, and march him off to his mother. Yet the abhanga's last line turns the scene: his face will not let any real anger or sorrow take hold, and his charm melts the very women who came to punish him. Tukaram lets the playfulness make the point that the Lord disarms those who would accuse him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I came running, hoping to meet him, but the moment passed and only grief remained. How shall I meet Hari now? My life breaks apart, so great is the longing.

Many pulled me back with their claims and delays, and in trying to manage all duties I suffered grievous pain. Let this worldly life burn away.

Says Tuka, my soul pines only for my Lord Gopala.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I came running and running, thinking I would meet him. But the time slipped past, and only my exhaustion was left. Now tell me, what shall I do? How will he meet me? My life breaks for Hari; the longing has grown so great. Many delayed me; many pulled me their own way. While I tried to mind every duty, fit and unfit, I came to grief and pain. Let this worldly life burn away now. When will it ever end? Tuka says: my soul pines for my Lord Gopala.

WHAT IT MEANS

Here the seeker arrives too late: she ran to meet the Lord but the moment had passed, and all her effort left only weariness. Tukaram names what cost her the meeting, the many who delayed and pulled her aside while she tried to keep up with worldly duties, fit and unfit alike. That tending of obligations is exactly what brought her grief. So she curses samsara itself and asks when its tug will ever stop. The abhanga lands on the plain ache of the soul that wants only Gopala and keeps being held back from him.

Social criticism, the worthless company

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There are plenty of others, but they are all deceitful and hollow. These children are like cattle always set loose, always making a commotion but never attending to one another.

Says Tuka, the mother at home scolds them again and again.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Are there few others? Yes, but they are mostly false and hollow. They are like cattle always let loose; those children are forever in disgrace. They keep bellowing, raising a din, and none of them does anything for another. Tuka says: at home the mother beats them again and again.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram dismisses the crowd of so-called companions as false and empty, comparing them to stray cattle that wander loose and make noise but help no one. The point is aimed at a pattern, not at any one person: company that is all bluster and self-regard, never any real care for the next person. Such people end up shamed wherever they go, scolded even at home. The contrast left unspoken is the one true companion the devotee should seek instead of this loud, useless herd.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the company of many I suffered only disgrace. The child of Nanda did well to blacken the faces of all those false ones.

They would pick quarrels on my behalf, then hide the moment trouble came. Says Tuka, how long shall I go on calling for mother and father?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the company of many I met only disgrace. The child of Nanda did well; he blackened the faces of all those false ones. They would pick quarrels on my behalf, then hide the moment trouble came shouting. Tuka says: what now? How long shall I keep calling on father and mother?

WHAT IT MEANS

The speaker looks back on the crowd he kept and sees that it brought only shame. He credits the child of Nanda, Krishna, with exposing those false friends and blackening their faces by showing them up for what they were. Such people were quick to start fights in his name and quick to vanish when the trouble they stirred came back loud. The closing question turns inward and weary: how long will he keep crying out to parents, to ordinary worldly supports, instead of resting in the one who actually stood by him? The verse points at the pattern of fair-weather company and the habit of leaning on the wrong refuges.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let me sing the deeds and glories of the Lord who tended the cows alongside his companions. He stole butter and let himself be bound by the throat.

He enchanted the milkmaids with the music of his flute. He showed wondrous affection to his mother and father, and that sweetness we bring now into our own hearts.

He destroyed the wicked and protected the devoted. Says Tuka, let us flow on in this current of his company for all time.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will sing the play and the deeds and the glories of the Lord who guarded the cows along with his friends. He stole the fresh butter and let himself be bound by the throat, all the games you played, Gopala. He enchanted the milkmaids with the tune of his flute; let us sing the play that Govinda made. He showed his mother and father his loving wonder; let us bring that sweetness now into our hearts. He crushed the wicked and he protects the devoted. Let us call him strong, our master. Tuka says: let us stay close in this stream, joined to him for all time.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram gathers the famous Krishna stories into a song of praise: the cowherd who tends the cattle, steals butter and submits to being tied, charms the milkmaids with his flute, and delights his parents. He names the two faces of the Lord, crushing the wicked and protecting his devotees, and calls him master. The aim is not just to recount the deeds but to draw their sweetness inward, into the singer's own heart. The closing wish is to stay in the current of his company forever, so that remembering his play becomes a way of never leaving him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The sacred square is drawn and the family goddess is invoked. Come quickly, O Vithabai, dweller of Vaikuntha.

I have offered the lamp of the five vital breaths; the mind is slaughtered like a ram, and desire and craving are released. The feast of devotion is prepared in the offering plate.

Says Tuka, come and enter my body with the drumbeat of the unstruck sound; accept this offering and grant me well-being.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The sacred square is drawn, and on the seat the family goddess is called. Dweller of Vaikuntha, come running, come quickly. Come into the dance, Vithabai, dark one with seeing eyes. When will I see your lovely face? The lamp is the rajas and tamas, the wave of the lamp is the five vital breaths; all the offering is made ready, so come running quickly. The mind is killed like a ram; hope, longing, and craving are set loose. The plate of offering is filled with the feeling of devotion, and I have called out. With the drumbeat of the unstruck sound, come and enter my body. Take your own offering, and make Tuka well.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes worship turned wholly inward. The ritual square, the lamp, the offering plate are all reread as inner acts: the dark and dull tendencies become the lamp, the five breaths become its waving, the very mind is sacrificed like a ram and its hopes and cravings released. The deity invoked is Vithoba, addressed tenderly as Vithabai, the family goddess of the heart, summoned to enter his own body with the unstruck inner sound. The longing under it is plain: he aches to see that dark, seeing face. He asks the Lord to accept this offering made of himself and to make him whole.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My shrine is true; place your vow there with honest devotion. Bring a garland of the three qualities and I will tell you what I know.

My deity dances in the company of the devoted and, once possessed, settles all disputes. What belongs to you is right beside you, but you have lost your way; your own household has plundered and ruined it.

Without my God the darkness cannot be cleared; one must search the ground. She gives eyes to the blind and feet to the lame; she grants a son to the barren.

Says Tuka, she has solved the riddles of so many wretched souls; do not delay, make your vow at once.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My shrine is the true one. Make your vow here, with real faith. Bring a garland of the three qualities, and I will tell you what I know. My deity dances in the company of the devout. Once she fills the body, she settles every dispute. What you are looking for is right beside you, but you have lost the place. Your own household has plundered it and laid it waste. Now there is no way to find it again, except through my God. The darkness must break; the ground must be searched. She gives eyes to the blind, feet to the lame, a son to the barren. Vithai grants the vow. She has untangled the knots of so many wretched souls before you. Tuka says: it takes no time at all; make your vow first.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as one who has found the real place of worship and is calling others to it. The thing they are searching for, he says, is already right beside them; they have simply lost their bearings, and their own habits have ransacked it. Vithai, the Goddess form of Vitthal, is named as the one who fixes the dimmed senses, restores what was barren, and unties the knots of life. The point is not magical favors but trust: he tells them to stop delaying and place their vow at this true shrine first, before anything else.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have laid my plea before you; grant me fearlessness with your own hand. Evil spirits and the cycles of rebirth have tormented me.

Come, O single radiance; the great chant of Hari's name has begun and the call rings out. Even the gods of gods bow to you, O Adinath.

Come, O compassionate one, hasten to my rescue. Says Tuka, delay no more; all is prepared. You are the presiding deity of our lineage.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have laid my plea before you; hear it. Give me fearlessness from your own hand. Evil spirits have tormented me, and so have the rounds of birth and death. Come, O single radiance; the colors are spread out. The chant of Hari's name has risen; the call has gone out. You are the deity of the gods themselves; even Adinath bowed to you. Come, O compassionate one, run to take away what I must suffer. Do not delay now; everything is made ready. Tuka says: you are the deity of our whole lineage.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays for one gift above all, abhaya, fearlessness placed directly in his hand by God. He names what frightens him: tormenting spirits and the repeated cycle of rebirth. The praise is deliberately high, that even the chief of the gods bows here, so the appeal carries weight, and the festival of the Name is already underway, the call already sent. He closes by claiming the bond of lineage: this is not a stranger he begs, but the family deity, so the delay he asks God to drop is the delay of one's own household.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My shrine is the true one; it belongs to no other. Its imprint stands across all three worlds and need not be erasededs no verification.

Come, prostrate yourselves, offer some prayer; this deity will sweep away the ghosts of worldly existence. Those entangled in the tumult of sense-pleasures are seized by the three qualities, yet when the cry of Hari's name strikes their ears, they rise at once.

Ego, lust, anger, and envy flee in a rush of love, abandoning all their strongholds. Maya and attachment, which had taken full shelter, all scatter together at the sight of the divine color.

Says Tuka, offer your sincere devotion and every doubt in the mind will vanish; you need wander nowhere else.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My shrine is the true one; it belongs to no one else. Its mark stands across all three worlds; you need not ask. Come, fall down full length, make your prayer. This deity will sweep the house clean and drive out the ghost of worldly life. Those who have fallen into the uproar of the senses are gripped by the three qualities. But when the cry of Hari's name strikes their ears, they rise at once. Ego, lust, anger, and envy flee in a rush of love, leaving every stronghold behind. Maya and the sense of mine, which had settled in firmly, all scatter together when they see the color of God. Tuka says: give your true faith, and the doubt in your mind will dissolve. You need wander nowhere else.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes what the Name actually does inside a person. The shrine he points to is the true one, recognizable everywhere, and the worship he asks for is plain prostration and prayer. The real exorcism is interior: the cry of Hari's name wakes those drugged by the senses, and the inner enemies, ego, lust, anger, envy, attachment, flee like routed squatters when the divine presence appears. The closing turn is the whole teaching: offer sincere faith and the mind's doubt clears, so there is no need to roam from shrine to shrine looking elsewhere.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The goddess approaches; let her procession move forward and sweep aside all obstacles behind it. Ekavira has entered the body; she will now cure all disease.

Tell my devotees to worship her with true feeling. Offer the sacrificial ram; the worship has been received in full.

Says Tuka, she who has taken root from the very origin has come into the family; let all bow and offer their lives in adoration.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The goddess comes forward; let her procession move on. Sweep away what lies behind, and shake off all that is owed. Ekavira has entered the body; now she will drive out the disease. Tell my devotees to worship her with true feeling. Offer the ram; the worship has been received in full. You put your strength into it, and after that I do not fall down anywhere. Tuka says: she who took hold from the very root has come into the family. Let everyone bow, and offer their very life in worship.

WHAT IT MEANS

This abhanga is set in the idiom of a village goddess possession, where Ekavira, a form of the Mother, enters and clears away sickness and old debts. Tukaram turns the folk rite toward true devotion: the worship that counts is the one done with bhava, real feeling, and the result is that the devotee no longer collapses. The figure of the goddess taking root from the very origin and coming into the family marks her as the household's own. The call at the end is total, to bow and to offer one's life, not just an offering of ritual goods.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Which is the eldest among all goddesses, and where is her proper seat of worship? The moment you hold true devotion, all that seemed lost reappears. Everything looks alike on the surface, yet each serves a different purpose; what lies beneath cannot withstand the blows that fall from above.

One goddess wears the cloth of honor upon her head with full ceremony, while the others carry pitchers, pots, and vessels. Says Tuka, let none take offense here; each is beautiful in her rightful place.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Among all the elder goddesses, which one holds the true seat of worship? The moment you hold true faith, nothing is missing anywhere. On the surface they all look alike, yet each serves a different purpose. What sinks to the bottom cannot bear the blows that fall from above. One wears the cloth of honor on her head with full ceremony; the others carry the small pots, the pitchers, the jars and vessels. Tuka says: accept it, and let no one sulk here. Each is beautiful in her own place.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at the many goddesses and asks where the real seat of worship lies, then answers that true faith finds it lacking nothing. His point is that things which look identical on the surface are not equal in function, and what is low cannot take the strain that the high one bears. He uses the image of a household: one vessel is honored, the rest carry humble loads, yet none is to be resented. The lesson is contentment with one's appointed place, since each is beautiful exactly where it belongs.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sky-wanderers and fierce powers tremble and even Death and the demons shake with fear before her. She dwells on the banks of the Bhima at Pandharpur.

Chant her thousand names in one stream; she drives away evil spirits by her very touch. When Sita was seized, the goddess came roaring with her hair unbound.

When Prahlada was tormented by the buffalo-demon, she arrived at once, grinding her teeth in fury. When seven infants of Vasudeva were devoured, she appeared at the fateful hour.

When the Pandavas were driven into helpless exile, she rushed to their side and sheltered them. Wherever the name is remembered, she runs of her own accord, seeing only the devotee's faith.

Says Tuka, she is our family goddess and our mother; what fear can death or its messengers hold for us?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sky-wanderers and fierce demons tremble; even Death and the demons shake before her. She dwells on the bank of the Bhima, in the town of Pandharpur. Now why not call out to her? Chant her thousand names in one stream. She drives away the spirits by her very touch, holding close to the body. When Sita was seized, she rushed in; she had been living in the forest of Vasuki, and the Mother came with her hair flying loose. When Prahlada was tormented, she came at once against the buffalo-demon, grinding her teeth. When seven children of Vasudeva were devoured, she came at the fated hour for their sake. When the poor Pandavas were driven to wander like the mad, she ran and pulled them out, sheltering them close. Where the Name is remembered, she runs there herself; she does not weigh the lowly, she sees only the faith of the one who calls. Tuka says: the family deity is our Mother. What fear, then, of ghosts, of Death, or of Death's messengers?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram piles up rescue after rescue to make one point: the family Goddess comes running to whoever calls her with faith. The threatening powers, demons, even Death, are the ones who tremble, not the devotee. The roll call of the saved, Sita, Prahlada, the children of Vasudeva, the exiled Pandavas, is drawn from the shared store of devotional story, used here as evidence that she answers in the worst hour. The decisive line is that she does not measure a person's lowliness; she looks only at their bhava, their faith. So Tukaram closes without fear: if the Mother is ours, the messengers of Death hold no terror.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The goddess has become the God; the experience is exhausted and no other power remains to speak of. Sing the divine name of Hari and stay awake; claim your reward and leave no entanglements behind.

At the close, sound the final drum well and seal the tally of what has been accomplished. Says Tuka, wrap up the shrine, let the custodians give due honor; today all riddles have been solved.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The goddess has become God; the offering is finished, and there is no other left to speak of. Sing the name of Hari, the name of God, and stay awake. Ask for your reward; do not leave loose ends behind. At the close, sound the final drum well; set the last beat when it is all over. Wrap up the shrine; let the keepers of honor give what is due. Tuka says: today, well done, the riddles have all been solved.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the close of the worship Tukaram has been describing, and he uses the closing of a rite to make a deeper claim: the Goddess and God are one, so the form of the offering ends while the truth does not. What carries on past the ceremony is the Name, sung in wakefulness, with no unsettled business left behind. The final drumbeat and the folding up of the shrine are the ordinary signs that the rite is complete and rightly honored. The last line names the gain: today the tangles have been undone, the work has come out well.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A fierce deity has seized me; now that she has entered, she will not depart. Attend to me at once; I can bear no other burden.

Take me to the bank of the Chandrabhaga; no strength remains in this body. Says Tuka, the truth has become clear; my own words have been swallowed by her power.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A fierce deity has seized me. Now that she has entered, she will not leave. Tend to me at once, tend to me now; I can bear no other weight. Carry me and lay me on the bank of the Chandrabhaga; there is nothing of this life left in me now. Tuka says: the truth has come clear; my own words are swallowed up.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from inside the grip of divine possession, where God has taken hold and will not depart. He asks for the only care that fits: not to be eased, but to be carried to the bank of the Chandrabhaga at Pandharpur, the holy river, since nothing of his separate self remains. The phrase that his own words are swallowed names the loss of the speaker, when the one who is seized can no longer speak as himself. What looks like helplessness is the surrender he has wanted: the truth has become plain only when his own voice is gone.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The goddess plays within this body; why can you not see it? Whose sport is this, unconcerned with pleasure or pain? I am no longer present here; recognize me only through these words. The outward form changes, but true devotion can never be concealed.

Question your own selves and sit together as equals; once the mind is steadied, who can know what understanding may come? Says Tuka, when the hour of gain arrives, do not remain idle; such a moment, once lost, may never be found again.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The goddess plays within this body. Why can you not see it? Whose sport is this, that takes no notice of pleasure or pain? I am no longer here. Know me only in these words. Take in the change; true faith is never hidden. Ask within yourselves; sit together as equals. Once the mind is steadied, who knows what understanding may come? Tuka says: when the time of gain has come, do not sit there cold. Such a moment, once gone, where will you find it again? I have become crippled, O God, with no hands and no feet. Whatever I sat upon ran wild and carried me off.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reports that the divine presence is at play inside him, indifferent to his own pleasure and pain, and so the man they knew is no longer there; they should recognize him only through these words. The outward change can be doubted, but he insists that real faith cannot stay concealed. He turns it back on the listeners: look within, steady the mind, and meaning will come of itself. The urgent close is the heart of it: when the hour of grace arrives, do not stay cold and idle, because it will not return; the final image of being carried off, crippled and seatless, by something that ran wild is the surrender he can no longer steer.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I stumble through hedges and thorns, tripping over stumps and cliffs without seeing; I have no support, no father, no mother. O generous ones, give this gift: carry me to Pandharpur, the home of the eternal Friend.

Wandering door to door, I am exhausted, yet I find no giver who will end the suffering of birth. The saints praise him who grants feet to the crippled and dwells in Pandharpur.

For the sake of this belly I became dependent on people, yet neither parent nor beggar's charity can sustain me. Those ahead say they have no compassion, and the dog of desire follows at my heels.

I do not know what sin I committed before; I cannot tell merit from transgression. I have come from far away through grievous hardship, and only this longing brought me here.

Says Tuka, with folded hands I beg the saints: this meeting with you is the rarest blessing.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I stumble against hedges and thorns, over stumps and cliffs I cannot see. No one supports me, neither father nor mother. Givers, give your gift: I am going to Pandharpur. Carry me that far, you who befriend the helpless. Wandering the roads, I am worn out, door to door. I find no giver who will end the suffering of birth. The saints sing his fame; show me that very Hari. He gives feet to the lame, and he lives in Pandharpur. For the sake of this belly I became a burden on people. Neither parent nor a beggar's alms can keep me; the alms never stop, and they never fill. Those ahead say one thing, but they have no pity. The dog of desire keeps at my heels, and the craving is cruel. What did I do wrong before? I remember nothing behind me. I cannot tell sin from merit; there is no memory of it. I lost myself, like a moth drawn to the lamp. Give me my life back, you saints, you great souls. I have come from far off, through grievous pain. To reach here was the one reason for it all. To meet you is rare; at your feet I have had the sight. Tuka begs the saints, both hands joined. This is no land of mine, no dress of mine; I came wandering by chance. Over whom can I claim any power? Nowhere have I stayed and rested.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes on the voice of a blind, friendless beggar to dramatize the soul's helplessness on the road to God. The literal blindness, the thorns, the stumbling, the begging door to door, all stand for a life that cannot find its own way and cannot end the recurring sorrow of birth. The dog of desire at his heels and the moth drawn to the lamp name the cravings that destroy him while he forgets his own good. The turn comes when he reaches the saints: the rare meeting at their feet is the one thing the whole hard journey was for, and so, hands folded, he begs not coins but his very life, the help only they and Hari at Pandharpur can give.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My eyes and my feet have abandoned me, and I am left blind and lame in a foreign land with no one at my side. Now take care of me, O Lord; give me your gift.

I have no one before or behind me; entrust me to the company of the good. Fear grips my heart on the road ahead, for many have gone that way and never returned.

I sit at the crossroads, holding only you in my mind. I cry for mercy; my belly is never filled, and there is no steady ground beneath my feet.

I have wandered through eighty-four hundred thousand births and settled at last in this one place. Says Tuka, you alone are now my everything; all possessions, kin, and attachments have fallen away, and I am left desireless.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My feet and eyes were called mine, yet all three have abandoned me. In this foreign land there is no one; I have gone blind and lame. Now think of me, give me your gift, O God. There is no one behind me or before me; entrust me to the good and to the saints. Walking the road ahead, fear fills my heart. Many people have gone that way and not come back. I cannot see what became of them. My ears at least still hear; I sit at the crossing, holding only you in mind. I cry for mercy, like one left at a forsaken place. My belly is never full; my feet never find firm ground. Wandering, I am worn out. Through eighty-four hundred thousand births I went, and stopped at last here. This alone is the place to live. What trust can I place now? Who would come for me by chance? The same fame spread of me, that I am one of the many lost. So I call out: come to me, you holy ones; a great hunger has caught me, and you alone are the merciful giver. My store of merit is spent, whatever little I had near me. Wealth, kin, son, attachment, the whole tangle has snapped. I have become free of desire, O God; this was written on my brow. Tuka says: you alone now are my all, my whole strength. Before this I could see, everything behind and before. Then my sight went, and a film came over the eyes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Again Tukaram speaks as a blind and crippled man stranded far from home, with no kin before or behind him, to picture the soul that has lost every worldly support. The road ahead is frightening because all who went before vanished and never returned, the plain image of death; he can only sit at the crossroads with God held in his mind and his ears still open. The vast number, eighty-four hundred thousand births, is the traditional count of the wandering of birth and rebirth, and he says he has stopped at last in this one true place. The reversal is grace: with his merit spent and every tie of wealth, family, and attachment snapped, he is left desireless, and that very emptiness lets him say God alone is now his everything.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Darkness has choked everything and grown overwhelming. I am frightened, O God; what is the fruit of this life? Now grant me sight, O Panduranga, my mother and father.

I have come to your refuge; remove my sins, apply the healing balm to my eyes, and make the path easy so I may travel the way of perfection with no more wandering. Great anguish fills my mind and no remedy comes to thought.

I was going toward the world, but even that support I abandoned. Everything has become darkness; my own people have turned away and no one offers a hand.

So long as the body had strength, they called me theirs; now that the senses have dimmed, even the same body is treated as a stranger. I was tangled in this world and became blind, nurturing 'me' and 'mine' until the craving of illusion destroyed my own welfare.

Death pursues me with lust and anger at its side. Says Tuka, O physician-king dwelling in Pandhari, I stumble and look for your scent with great hope.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Darkness has closed in and grows stronger as it spreads. I have become afraid, O God. What is the fruit of being alive? Now give me sight, Panduranga, my mother and father. I have come to your refuge; clear away my sins. Line my eyes with the healing salve; make the road easy. I will go by the path of perfection, and all the wasted journeys will end. Grief fills my mind, and no remedy comes to thought. I was going out toward the world, but I left even that support behind. Neither this place nor that is mine; everything has fallen into darkness. My own people have turned away; no one offers a hand. As long as the body could move, they called me theirs. They counted me, high and low, for the body's comforts. Now the senses have failed; the old terror has come. How strangely it has turned; yet this is the same body, no other. I was tangled in this world, and see how blind I became, swelling 'me' and 'mine' under the hurt of illusion's craving. My own good never showed itself; I worked my own killing. Death is at my back, with lust and anger beside it. As I walk I keep striking against the stones of virtue and fault. Then I left the road; see how I became cut off and apart. I watch for your scent, raising a great hope. Tuka says: O physician-king, who dwells in Pandhari. I am blind by nature, on the path of the formless Self; outgoing thought has turned to stillness, where no people are seen.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram cries out from a thickening darkness, afraid and unable to see any fruit in his life, and asks Panduranga, named as both mother and father, to give him sight. The blindness is inner: he describes how the swelling of 'me' and 'mine' under illusion's craving blinded him to his own good, so that he was, in effect, killing himself while death waited with lust and anger at its side. The crowd that once called him theirs deserts him the moment the body weakens, which lays bare how little worldly belonging is worth. So he turns to the one healer: the physician-king of Pandhari, asking for the salve that opens the eyes and the easy road of perfection, until outgoing thought settles into the stillness of the formless Self.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The 'I' within me dissolved right where it was; all that was visible became invisible. I slept in bliss, having swept aside the void, and upon the peak of the three-fold summit the gift appeared ready-made.

I threw away the begging bag and bowl of merit, demerit, and desire, and escaped the tumult of the three qualities. I no longer beg, for the seventeenth power has arrived and fulfilled every wish.

With an upward cry the sound of 'Soham' was raised, and the formless Giver awoke, bringing the gift of self-knowledge. He merged me into my own nature and bestowed the name 'difference' no more.

This word is a treasury of blessing, kept alive for those who follow. Says Tuka, the one secret is to hold firm faith; abandon the tricks of knowing and not-knowing, embrace non-dual devotion, for this is the remedy the saints have always used.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The 'I' in me dissolved right where it stood. All that I could see became unseen. I lay down in bliss, having pushed the void aside, and on the peak of the three summits the gift was already waiting for me. I threw away the begging bowl and bag of merit, demerit, and desire. I slipped past the uproar of the three qualities. I no longer beg; this is my certainty now, for the seventeenth power has come and filled every wish. With my face turned upward I called the sound of 'Soham,' and the formless Giver woke and took up the play. He came bearing the gift: my own truth, my own knowing. He merged me into the one nature and set aside the name of difference. This word is full of meaning, a heap of blessing; so I send it on for those who come after. The path opened up behind me, a row of attainments, and others crossed over too, others who trusted. The one secret is this: hold the heart firm. Do not let knowing or not-knowing find a place to stand. So drop all clinging and live in non-dual love. Tuka says: this is the very way the saints walked before me. The one giver for the blind and the lame is Vithoba. He gave birth to the world; he alone knows all of it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is reporting from inside an experience he says happened to him, the collapse of the separate self. The 'I' dissolves on the spot, the visible world goes unseen, and what is left is rest and a gift already prepared. He throws away the beggar's tools, which here stand for the whole economy of merit and demerit and wanting, and walks past the three qualities of nature instead of bargaining with them. The center of the poem is the turn at the end: the one secret is not technique but firm devotion, refusing to let the mind's pride in knowing (or its shame at not-knowing) take hold. He frames this not as his discovery but as the road the saints have always walked, and he passes the report forward so that others may cross on it too.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In mere sport you build and demolish the accumulated store of merit and sin. Who but you can remove the sorrow of existence? Your justice is awake, for you are the compassionate King who knows the heart without being told.

Pundalik threw himself down in the sands of Pandharpur on the sacred bank of the Bhima, and his gaze became unseen to all else; the Lord of love appeared and rained nectar. Then there was the child Upamanyu, small and helpless, unable to see or walk among people; he cried out Hari's name, and the Lord rushed to him with great force.

And Shuka, blind within the womb, exhausted by the cycles of birth; he cried out to Gopala, and the Lord came to protect his honor. Says Tuka, that same grace has come to me; may I reach Narayana, who shows himself to those who cannot see and frees them from the bonds of pleasure, pain, and worldly attachment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In a moment, as if in play, you build up and break down the whole store of sin and merit. Who but you can turn aside the sorrow of this world? Who else carries that worry? Your justice is awake; you are the merciful King. You know what is in the heart without being told; it is your nature. Pundalik threw himself down in the sands at Pandhari, on the holy bank of the Bhima. He saw nothing else; his sight turned inward. The Giver of love poured out, and rained nectar. And there was Upamanyu, a small child, who could not see and could not walk the road that others walk. He threw himself down crying Hari's name, and for his sake the Lord came running hard. Shuka sat folded in the womb, blind, worn out by going and coming, remembering the pain of each turn. He bore what was behind him; he cried 'do not fear,' said Gopala, and for his sake the Lord came and kept his honor. To the one who cannot see this world, you show yourself. You set him apart from pleasure and pain; you make him let go of attachment to wealth. There is no mine and yours, no kin, no good and bad. Tuka has come to that very state; let me reach Narayana. For your sake, Lord, I have died while still alive. The mind that wants nothing has stopped; it does not stir.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a prayer built on precedent: Tukaram lays out a string of cases where the helpless cried out and God came, then places himself in that line. He opens by naming what only God can do, undoing the whole ledger of sin and merit in an instant, and praising a King whose justice is awake and who reads the heart without being told. The examples (Pundalik prostrate in the sands at Pandhari, the blind child Upamanyu, Shuka cramped and blind in the womb) all share one feature: they could not help themselves and called the Name, and the Lord ran to them. Tukaram's claim is that the same grace has reached him, so that he is now dead while still alive, free of the pull of pleasure, pain, and possessions. The poem rests the whole weight of rescue on God's mercy rather than the devotee's strength.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My hands and feet will not move; my sight has reversed; I can no longer perceive the perishable or the imperishable. O Vitthala, give me the gift of your name, whose fame has spread beyond all measure.

You alone are the giver of devotion, liberation, and all powers; therefore I have cast away grief, fear, shame, and worry. I have renounced everything and now rush toward you; come forward and grant me the gift of your grace.

This ocean of worldly existence is the root of all sorrow; public opinion is a bed lined with burning coals, and the blows of the senses scorch with unbearable heat. In all three worlds your name is a tree with branches and leaves; I have climbed its trunk, clinging with the grip of faith.

Says Tuka, your surrendered one: I can no longer tell self from other, and all reckoning has dissolved. I have placed the burden of my welfare upon you; grant the fearless hand to this refugee.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My hands and feet will not move. My sight has somehow turned around. Even knowing, I no longer see the perishable or the imperishable. Vithoba, give me the gift: a name like your own. That fame is praised; its bounds have grown great. You alone are the giver of devotion, of liberation, of every power. So I have let grief, fear, shame, and worry be taken from me. I have renounced everything; now I have run to you. Grant me the gift of grace, God; come out to meet me now. The ocean of worldly life is the root of all this sorrow. People's talk is a bed, and they have laid burning coals in it. These fall like thunderbolts and scorch; the flame burns above. What I have borne, what can I do; this misery is hard and cruel. In all three worlds your name is a tree with leaves and branches. I have climbed its trunk and clung there, holding on with faith. Let it wake men and women; let dharma stay awake in people. Let the worthy reach it; this is the call we make. I no longer know mine from yours; what shall I do now? The even balance is gone; reckoning has dissolved. I have placed my whole welfare, my burden, on you. To Tuka who has come for refuge, give the hand that says, do not fear.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram writes from a body and mind that have stopped working in the ordinary way, and turns that helplessness into total surrender. He asks Vithoba not for things but for the Name itself, then renounces grief, fear, shame, and worry by handing them over. The harshest image is social: 'people's talk' is a bed lined with burning coals, and the blows of the world fall like thunderbolts, so worldly existence itself is the root of his suffering. Against that he sets the one shelter, the divine Name pictured as a great tree he has climbed and clings to by faith. The poem ends with the core move of surrender: he can no longer separate self from other or balance any account, so he lays the entire burden of his welfare on God and asks only for the gesture of reassurance, the hand that says, do not fear.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He who is rich in sons and grandsons has shown us his grace. Because of him I came to this land; without him I would have lost my way in every direction.

That generous one met me and walked the path beside me. He brought four companions along: Devotion took my hand and led the way, while Knowledge, Dispassion, and Righteousness followed, steadying all that had been restless and setting me on the true path.

What shall I say of his kindness? Not even a father or mother does so much. By his grace I beheld the Lord's feet, and he gave me the deathless gift, dispelling all fear.

Says Tuka, I was suffering, wandering from village to village, my belly unfilled, with no place to rest; then this brother came and removed every doubt.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He is rich in sons and grandsons. Out of that fullness he showed his grace to me. Because of him I came to this country. Without him I would have lost my way in every direction. The Giver met me, the one I longed for; he came and showed me the road, walking beside me. He brought four companions with him, that fine young man. He led me past the edge of the thorns. Listen, and hear who they were that he brought. Devotion went in front and took my hand. Behind came Knowledge, Dispassion, and Dharma. The ones that had been restless he made steady. He set them on the path and brought them to their goal. What can I say of his kindness? No father, no mother, does so much. By his dharma I saw the Lord's feet. He gave the deathless gift and turned away all fear. I was suffering, wandering from village to village. My belly would not fill; there was no place to stay. He came and ended all that doubt. Tuka's brother says: he redeemed me. Listen, I sing of Vasudeva, keeping my mind fixed in one place with single love.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a thanksgiving poem in which the saint credits everything to a guide, the gracious Giver who found him when he was lost. The striking image is the company the guide brings: Devotion walks in front and takes the seeker's hand, while Knowledge, Dispassion, and Dharma follow behind, and together they steady faculties that had been restless and bring them to their goal. Tukaram measures the kindness against the deepest human bond, saying not even a father or mother does this much. The reward is concrete in his telling: he saw the Lord's feet, received the deathless gift, and had his fear removed. The end grounds it in his own former misery, wandering hungry from village to village with nowhere to rest, so the gratitude lands as rescue from real destitution, not abstract piety.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not close your eyes and pretend it is night; Death sits making his account. Remember Rama's name now; seize this chance and tie the knot at the root.

Set aside idle distractions and fix your gaze upon Govinda. This human body is brief: count a hundred years, and half is spent in sleep.

Add childhood, illness, and decline, and see what time remains for devotion. Nothing here is dependable; be alert, release the grip of desire and illusion.

When strength fails, the noose will fall, and the terror ahead is vast. Practice even a little devotion with a firm and steady heart; set body, mind, and attention straight if you wish for a sweet ending.

Says Tuka's brother, with folded hands I beg all people, great and small: give me this one gift, and say the name of Rama.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not shut your eyes and pretend it is night. Death sits there, keeping the account. Remember Rama, Rama first of all. Be quick; tie the knot at the very root. Throw off the useless tangles. Fix your whole attention and stay in Govinda. This human body is such a small thing. Count a hundred years, and half of them sleep eats. Then add childhood, the troubles, sickness, decline. See for yourself what is left over for worship. It breaks in a moment; there is no surety. Wake up, you; let go of illusion and desire. When the strength is gone, the noose will fall. Be alert now; a great snare lies ahead. A little or a lot, keep at the practice. Do devotion; hold faith firmly. Set body, mind, and meditation straight, if you want the ending to be sweet. I beg all people, with folded hands, the great and the small alike. Give me just this much gift, to me who is poor: Tuka's brother says, say the name of Rama. Three watches have already passed and gone. Are you still half asleep?

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a wake-up call, addressed to a sleeper who keeps pretending it is still night while Death sits nearby tallying the account. The poem's force comes from a blunt reckoning of time: a hundred-year life is already halved by sleep, and what remains is further eaten by childhood, illness, and old age, so very little is actually left for the inner work. Against that scarcity Tukaram urges the one cheap, available act, remembering the name of Rama, done now and held firmly, body and mind set straight. The 'noose' and 'snare' name the stakes plainly: when strength fails at the end it is too late to begin. The closing plea, asking only that people say the Name, makes the whole exhortation a gift requested rather than a threat delivered.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Wake up and give something; do not close your eyes after hearing this. I proclaim Hari, Rama, Krishna, Vasudeva to all people, with cymbals and bells in hand and the chant of Narayana on my lips.

Whatever you can spare, a flower, a fruit, or even water, give it; but do not merely pretend, for turning away once you have heard will not serve you well. God asks only for sincere feeling, not great wealth; if the heart becomes one-pointed, that is enough, so do not ruin everything for the sake of withholding.

I have come this far with great effort, only to ask for this one gift. Do not take on the burden of refusal; righteousness is the true profit of worldly life.

Says Tuka's brother, take hold of this recognition, for another chance to visit this town may or may not come; without it you will fall into a terrible darkness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wake up and give something. Do not hear this and shut your eyes. Hari, Rama, Krishna, Vasudeva: I am making it known to people, cymbals and bells in hand, the chant of Narayana on my lips. Whatever anyone can spare, a fruit, a flower, or even water, give it. But do not just pretend, brother; turning away once you have heard will go badly for you later. For God's sake, it is the feeling that matters; you need not give much wealth. If the heart becomes one, that is plenty. Do not ruin everything for the sake of holding back. I have come this far with great effort, only to ask for this one thing. Do not take on the weight of refusal. Dharma is the real fruit of worldly life. Whether the round comes again to this town may or may not happen. Tuka's brother says: take hold of this recognition; without it you fall into a terrible darkness.

WHAT IT MEANS

The Vasudeva-singer goes door to door and turns the act of giving alms into a teaching about the heart. The point is not the size of the gift, a fruit, a flower, even water will do, but the sincerity behind it; what God asks for is one-pointed feeling, not wealth. The warning is against the worst response, hearing the call and then pretending you did not, which Tukaram says will go badly for you. He frames giving as 'the real fruit of worldly life,' so generosity becomes the thing the whole of ordinary life is finally for. The closing presses urgency: the singer's round may not pass this way again, and to miss the recognition now is to fall into darkness, so the small chance in front of you is the whole opportunity.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Rama, Rama: two syllables, simple and easy. Wake in the last watch of the night, for that which is final is truly sweet.

The singer of Vasudeva chants Vasudeva and knows no other name. Give generously; hold nothing back.

Even if told only once, keep it firm in the heart; do not take on burdens, let go of labor, and rest in devotion. All beings carry the divine within them; the saint who knows this sees no difference anywhere.

Says Tuka, I bow to those heroes of generosity who never forget Vasudeva, whose fame fills the moving and the still.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Rama, Rama: two syllables, easy and simple. Wake in the last watch of the night. What comes at the end is the truly sweet thing. Rama, Krishna, Vasudeva: I make it known to people, playing the small cymbals, the bells, the loud chant. Sing Vasudeva, Vasudeva; there is no other name apart from it. Knowing this, make your gift; keep nothing back in your heart. Even if you are told only once, hold it and stay in your mind. Do not take on burdens; drop the work from your hands. Take your rest in it and go your round. Where the vessel is worthy, all feeling is there: I am wholly Vasudeva. The merciful saints, the great souls, know this; for them there is no place where difference stands. Brave and open-handed with their very lives, never forgetting Vasudeva, their fame grows through all that moves and is still. Tuka says: to them I bow.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses the whole of the path into the smallest possible thing: two syllables, Rama, said simply, best of all in the last watch before dawn. The teaching is that ease is no objection; the Name is meant to be available to everyone, and the singer carries it through the streets with cymbals and the loud chant. Behind the simplicity sits a non-dual claim, 'I am wholly Vasudeva,' the recognition that the divine is not other and that for the saints who see this no real difference stands anywhere. The poem links this inner seeing to outward generosity: those who give freely and never forget the Name are the heroes he honors. He ends not by instructing but by bowing to them, making admiration itself the close.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He speaks the speech that is silence; he is awake outside yet asleep within. How he has built a nest inside the house, where one cannot tell darkness from light.

I, Vasudeva, make my rounds at your gate and in your courtyard. Give me something; if you give no answer, I will come and stand before you.

With cymbals in hand and a song on my lips, the chant thunders loud. I have not sorted out the great from the small; do not hide in sleep for fear of giving alms.

I am Vasudeva in truth; reflect on it and the meaning will become clear. I am known to the blessed saints, and there is no other beggar like me.

Says Tuka, those who had past merit gave their gifts, but the wretched ones went on forgetting Vasudeva.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He speaks the speech that is silence. He is awake outside and asleep within. See how he has made a little house inside the house, where one cannot tell the dark from the light. I, Vasudeva, make my round, through the courtyard and at the outer door. Someone, anyone, give a gift. If you give no answer, I come and stand before you. Cymbals in hand, the dindi going, a song on my lips, the chant rings out loud. I have not sorted the great from the small. Do not hide in sleep for fear of giving alms. I am Vasudeva in truth; reflect on it and the meaning will grow clear. The blessed saints know me. There is no other beggar like me. Why do you lie there asleep, awake by your own empty door like a dog? For your own good, Vyasa makes the work; yet you take no meeting with Vasudeva. So he woke all the people. Those who had merit gave their gift. Tuka says: but the poor wretches, one and another, went on forgetting Vasudeva.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem speaks in the voice of the Vasudeva-singer, the wandering minstrel who is also a figure for God moving among people. The opening riddles, speech that is silence, awake outside and asleep within, a house inside the house, point to the hidden divine presence that the ordinary eye cannot read. The singer comes to every gate without sorting great from small, asking for a gift and refusing to be ignored: if you give no answer he stands before you. The sharp line, 'why do you lie asleep, awake by your own empty door like a dog,' aims at the pattern of staying spiritually drowsy while help is literally at the door. Tukaram closes by dividing people not by wealth but by response: those with merit gave, while the truly impoverished are those who keep forgetting Vasudeva.

गांवगुंड - अभंग १

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Singing the songs of Rama and Krishna, clapping cymbals, dancing in his own rapture, the wandering minstrel goes from door to door while the world sleeps. Everywhere, in town and forest, God pervades all; wipe away the stain of desire and let the Vasudeva-singers serve you.

Great is the love of the Lord's true servant; the sweetness of Vasudeva has seized him, and the divine name rings on his lips at every moment. When the end of all accounts arrives and no effort can avail, wake from your slumber and give to the Vasudeva-singer.

Says Tuka, blessed is the life of those who gave that gift; they need never come and go again, for they have come to dwell in Vasudeva.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Singing the songs of Rama and Krishna, ringing the cymbals and the small clappers, dancing in his own delight, he takes his rest and goes his round. In town and in forest, all of this is God. Wipe out the place where desire lives. Then Vasudeva will answer you; let that feeling live in your mind. The Lord's own servant has a great love; the sweetness of Vasudeva has taken hold of him. The Name is on his lips at every moment. Make this your union with Vasudeva. When everything is over and the end has come, no effort you make will work anymore. So wake up, throw off your sleep, and give your gift to Vasudeva. Tuka says: blessed is the life of those who gave their gift to Vasudeva. For them there is no more coming and going; they have come to dwell in Vasudeva.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram joins two themes here: the all-pervading presence of God and the urgency of acting before death. The seer's claim is that town and forest alike are wholly God, so the work is simply to wipe out the place where desire lives, and then the divine answers from everywhere. The servant who keeps the Name on his lips at every moment is offered as the model of the love being described. The warning is the familiar one made concrete: when the end comes, no effort will avail, so the gift must be given now while there is still waking life to give it. The reward is release from the round of coming and going, to 'dwell in Vasudeva,' which is the poem's name for liberation.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have become the village rogue, a bully to all the spirits and ghosts. Whatever second player comes along, I alone speak for him.

I will come at everyone and let no one touch my body. Says Tuka, I will exhaust their noise and win every argument by sheer persistence.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have become the village rogue, a bully to all the spirits and ghosts. Whatever second one comes to play, I am the one who speaks for him. I come at every one of them and let none of them touch my body. Tuka says: I will choke off their noise and win the argument by sheer persistence.

WHAT IT MEANS

In this short boast Tukaram casts himself, half playfully, as the local troublemaker, the one the unseen forces have learned to fear. The 'spirits and ghosts' stand for the inner enemies and old terrors that used to push him around; now the relation is reversed and he is the bully. The line about speaking for the 'second player' suggests he answers on behalf of others who are still afraid, taking the contest onto himself. The closing claim is not about cleverness but about persistence: he will simply outlast and outshout the opposing voices until they fall silent. The tone is the confidence of someone who has stopped being intimidated by what once intimidated him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The world-yogi calls out: wake, wake! The Lord of the world is awake; keep some devotion in reserve. Worship the guardian of all the fields.

Offer something as worship: a flower, a fruit, or water. After many days the yogi's round has come again to this town.

Do not take on the burden of refusal; righteousness alone is the essence. Says Tuka, I ask for one gift: give me your undivided surrender.

IN PLAIN WORDS

World-yogi, world-yogi, calling out, awake, awake. The Lord of the world is awake; keep some devotion in reserve. He is the guardian of every field; worship them all. Offer something as worship: a fruit, a flower, water. After many days the round has come again to this town. Do not take on the weight of refusal; dharma alone is the essence. Tuka asks for a gift: give, please, your undivided self. Listen, brother. What does he keep saying, over and over? Here the mother of two sons will be cheated.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem is sung in the persona of the wandering 'world-yogi' who comes calling people awake. Its core is the same plea found in the other alms songs: God is awake and watching, so keep some devotion in store and offer something, even a fruit or a flower or water, since it is the gesture, not the value, that counts. Tukaram presses that 'dharma alone is the essence,' so giving rightly is the whole point of worldly life. The single gift he actually asks for is the highest one, undivided surrender of the self. The closing line shifts to a sharper warning that the careless will be cheated, pointing the listener toward not letting this recurring chance slip by unanswered.

मुंढा - अभंग ३

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who humiliate the mother of the two sons bring disgrace upon themselves before the whole world; without correcting even one person, no one finds happiness. One who speaks the plain truth falls into the netherworld; but if everyone, man and woman, simply speaks what is false, all suffering ends.

Furthermore, the bard warns: whoever claims 'this is mine' invites thieves into his own house; therefore call nothing your own, sleep in peace, and place your trust in the thief's own quarter. Also, the devoted wife will suffer if she obeys the commands of the five senses and takes delight in another; yet the one who resists finds true happiness.

And finally, whoever blocks a person from giving charity is no good person at all. Says Tuka, let the name of that wretch perish.

IN PLAIN WORDS

They humiliate her, and the whole world watches it happen. Without setting even one person straight, know this: the wise man finds no peace. And listen, here is what the bard keeps telling you. The one who speaks the plain truth, he goes down into hell. But if everyone, man and woman, just speaks what is false, then all your sorrows end. And another will be cheated, listen: the one who keeps saying 'this is mine.' A hole gets dug in that man's own house. So do not call anything yours. Sleep easy in your own place. When the chance comes, put your trust in the thief. And here is another, listen to the bard's great teaching: the faithful wife will come to grief. The five gave her into one man's hand, so do not hold to that certainty. Let her take pleasure in another man; that, he says, is the happy way. And one more thing the bard tells you to do: whoever does not block a man from giving charity, he is no good at all. Tuka says, mother, what name shall I even give it; let the harlot's word die.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is satire, and it must be read against its surface: the 'bard' recites a gospel of lies, and Tukaram's point is the exact opposite of every counsel quoted. The voice praises falsehood over truth, theft over honesty, betrayal over faithfulness, and obstructing charity as if these were wisdom, precisely so the listener will recoil and recognize them as the corrupt 'common sense' that actually circulates in the world. The opening image of a woman publicly humiliated sets the moral stakes: a society that will not correct a single wrong finds no peace. By voicing the perverse advice plainly, Tukaram exposes how respectable cynicism inverts every real value. His closing disgust, refusing even to dignify the teaching with a name, turns the listener back on self-examination: do not let this inverted gospel pass for sense.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Guard yourself, friend; the blows fall from both above and below. Whoever keeps a watchful eye is saved, but the heedless one is plundered.

Love belongs to God alone; remember God alone. Why do you dance and shake your hips, stumbling and staggering under a needless load? Says Tuka, come, let us walk together with those who are true. Whatever we receive, let us offer it back; let us extend a hand upward.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Watch yourself, friend. The blows come from above and from below. The one who keeps his eyes open is kept safe; the heedless one is robbed. Love belongs to God. Remember God. Why do you leap and prance and shake your hips, forgetting love, fumbling and staggering under a load you do not need? Tuka says: come, let us walk together with those who are true. Whatever we are given, let us give it back; let us lift a hand upward.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks here in his plain Hindi voice, as one traveler warning another on a dangerous road. The blows fall from every side, and only attention saves you: the watchful one comes through, the careless one is stripped bare. Against all the showy dancing and shaking that pass for devotion, he sets one quiet rule, love God and keep his name. He then turns the warning into an invitation: walk with the true ones, hold nothing back, and offer everything you receive upward to the One who gave it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Everyone is startled and stands reeling and mute; intoxicated by the wine of delusion, they have lost their senses. Guard yourself, guard yourself.

O shaven-headed one, keep the rhythm well; if you will not even open your mouth, I will give you a hard time. The careless one forgets even his own capital and never looks back.

The shameless wretch goes on swallowing dives into the water. The one for whose sake all this was done is not loyal to you; in a frenzy he has heaped up wicked deeds.

Get away, clear out. O shaven one, show some courage of the heart.

Drop the talk of mere words and come to the one string of truth. Says Tuka, stop slipping and sliding; look at what I am giving you. Seize it, push hard, get down on your knees, and let me draw up the account.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Everyone stands startled, reeling and dumb, drunk on the wine of delusion, their senses gone. Watch yourself, watch yourself. Shaven one, keep the beat well; if you will not even open your mouth, I will give you a hard time. The careless man forgets his own capital and never looks back. The shameless one keeps diving and swallowing water. The One for whose sake all this was done is not loyal to you; in a frenzy you have piled up wicked deeds. Get out, clear off. Shaven one, show some heart. Drop the talk of empty words; come to the one string of truth. Tuka says: stop slipping and sliding. Look at what I am giving you. Seize it, push hard, get down on your knees, and let me settle the account.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram aims this at the religious performer who is drunk on his own act and has lost the point of it. He plays the harsh drill-master to the shaven mendicant: keep the rhythm, open your mouth, stop forgetting that your own soul is the capital you are squandering. The cutting line is that the One for whose sake the whole show was begun gets nothing from it; the frenzy only heaps up harm. The poem ends as a hard offer rather than mere mockery: drop the noise of words, take hold of the single thread of truth, and kneel, and the reckoning can be set right.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The first and greatest name is Allah; take it and never be deceived. On the day of reckoning, even over the bridge of judgment, that name will sound like a drum.

Allah is one, the Prophet is one. Even if the head is cut and the hands and feet are severed, the life-breath does not leave.

He who sees what is ahead and understands what is behind stands ready in the divine presence. Listen, brothers, this is no marketplace; everyone must be leveled alike.

There is no great or small; all must meet in one single place. Says Tuka, that shaven-headed fakir who has no attachment to life or body should be kept at the feet of the Lord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The first and greatest name is Allah; take it and never be fooled. On the day of reckoning, even on the bridge of judgment, that name will sound like a drum. Allah is one, the Prophet is one. Even if the head is cut off and the hands and feet are severed, the life does not leave. The one who sees what is ahead and knows what is behind stands ready in the divine presence. Listen, brothers, this is no marketplace; everyone must be made level. There is no great and no small; all must meet in one single place. There is no thread, no love, no clinging to staying alive. Tuka says: that shaven fakir should be kept at the Lord's feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Speaking in the fakir's idiom, Tukaram makes the Name the one thing that carries a soul through the final crossing, sounding like a drum even on the bridge of judgment. He presses oneness all the way down: God is one, and the true seeker who has died to fear stands present, unshaken even if the body is cut apart. Then he levels the ground, this is no bargaining place, no rank of great and small; every soul meets in the same single spot. The poem ends by handing over the one who has let go of life and clinging, to be kept at the Lord's feet.

मलंग - अभंग १

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who worship in darkness are wretched, but those who practice zikr, the remembrance of God cut off the head, beat the breast, and make everyone tremble. In that state only you exist, only you.

There is no 'I' and no 'you' apart from you. Whoever beholds the divine face is bewildered; no one can recognize another.

The truthful one cannot be seized, while the false one weeps in his own falsehood. Who can call anything 'mine' when no one has truly kept company? The dead do not meet the living; the false one has brought about his own ruin.

Listen, brother: become whatever you must. Walk the path, eat your bread, and say 'Allah' at least once.

Says Tuka, the shaven one who takes this bargain sees his own profit. Call upon Allah, the One.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those who worship in the dark are wretched; those who truly remember God cut off the head, beat the breast, and make everyone tremble. There, only you. There, only you. There, only you, my friend; there is no us and no you. Whoever beholds the face is lost to himself; no one can recognize another. The true one cannot be seized; the false one weeps in his own falsehood. Who can say this is mine, when no one has truly kept company? The dead do not meet the living; the false one has ruined himself. Listen, brother: be whatever you must be. Walk the road, eat your bread, and say Allah at least once. The shaven one who takes this bargain sees his own profit. Tuka says: call on Allah, the One.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts dark, half-hearted worship with true remembrance, which is severe enough to slay the self, the cut head and beaten breast, until only God remains. In that state the difference between I and you collapses; the one who really sees the divine face loses himself and can no longer pick out a separate other. He warns that the false seeker cannot grasp truth and only weeps in his own pretense, his life wasted. The closing counsel is disarmingly simple: live your ordinary life, but say the Name even once and mean it, for that one true word is the whole profit.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The one who watches wins; from a distance, my friend, watch the spectacle. The trickster sits with his staff and snare, his disguise set to deceive those who come near.

Why are you dazzled? Open your eyes and see the blows raining down in this marketplace. The fool who is lured by a penny will get kicked even by his own kind.

Do not go uninvited, my friend, and do not call anyone who has not been summoned. Says Tuka, whoever keeps company with such a one gets kicked again and again.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The one who watches wins. From a distance, friend, watch the show. The trickster sits with his stick and his snare, his disguise set to fool whoever comes near. Why are you dazzled? Open your eyes and see the blows falling in this marketplace. The fool who is tempted by a penny gets kicked even by his own kind. Do not go where you were not called, friend, and do not summon anyone who was not asked. Tuka says: whoever keeps company with such a one gets kicked again and again.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a marketplace parable about the spiritual con man and the greed that walks into his trap. Tukaram tells you to keep your distance and simply watch: the trickster has dressed himself up and laid his snare for whoever draws near. The one who is dazzled and lured by a small gain gets battered, even by people of his own sort. The lesson is to stay where you belong and not go chasing or being chased; keep company with the deceiver and you will be kicked over and over.

Whatever Allah wills, that alone happens; the Creator wears the crown. He drives the cow and calf as he pleases; the tiger cannot walk beside them.

My thought is fixed upon the Master, for the Creator himself has become the rider, mounting the steed from the front. Remember Allah, for he dwells within all in every guise.

Says Tuka, whoever truly understands this has become a real dervish.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever Allah wills, that alone happens, friend; the Creator wears the crown. He drives the cow and her calf as he pleases; the tiger cannot walk beside them. My mind is set on the Master, friend, for the Creator himself has become the rider and mounted the horse from the front. Remember Allah, friend, who lives within all in every form. Tuka says: whoever truly understands this has become a real dervish.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram states the heart of trust: nothing happens but God's will, and the Creator alone is sovereign. His images are of that sovereignty made gentle, the cow and calf led safely so that the tiger cannot come near, a guarding will that orders all things. He fixes his whole attention on this Master, who is not distant but has himself become the rider directing the journey, and who dwells inside everything in every disguise. To grasp this, that all is God's doing and God is in all, is what makes someone a true dervish rather than one in name only.

Allah gives, Allah causes to give, Allah is the medicine, Allah causes it to be taken. There is no one besides Allah; whatever Allah does, that alone comes to pass.

The brave one stands firm; the coward has no steadiness. Make your own heart happy; what pride can a thing worth three pennies carry? Strike down all other relishes; the pill of devotion alone is the essence.

Faith is the true companion; take even a little and go your way. Those who sleep beside wealth will also sit and be robbed.

The five and seven senses strike their blows; the aftermath is swallowed later. All youth passes away, and afterward the old donkey eats dust.

Whoever has taken my medicine has beheld the divine face and reached the holy shrine. Says Tuka, I hand out this remedy free. Whoever has the good fortune, let him take it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Allah gives, Allah makes others give, Allah is the medicine, Allah makes you take it. There is no one but Allah; whatever Allah does, that alone happens. Be a man and stand firm; the coward has no steadiness. Make your own heart glad; what pride can a thing worth three pennies hold? Strike down all the other pleasures; the one pill of devotion is the whole essence. Faith is the true friend; take even a little and go on your way. Those who sleep beside their wealth will sit there and be robbed. The five senses and the seven strike their blows, and the cost is swallowed later. All the youth drains away, and afterward the old donkey eats dust. Whoever has taken my medicine has seen the divine face and reached the holy shrine. Tuka says: I hand out this remedy for free. Whoever has the good fortune, let him take it.

WHAT IT MEANS

In the fakir's voice, Tukaram makes God the giver, the medicine, and the hand that makes you swallow it, all action belongs to the One. He calls for courage rather than cowardice and tells you not to prize the cheap pleasures of the senses, which strike their blows now and send the bill later. The blunt warning is mortal: youth runs out, and the man who clung to it ends up an old donkey eating dust, while the one who slept beside his wealth wakes up robbed. Against all of this he sets one cure, the pill of devotion, which alone brings the seeker to the divine face. And he gives it away free, asking only that the fortunate take it.

My beloved is the playful Parabrahma, radiant as ten million suns and moons. O beautiful Vithabai, my meditation rests at your feet.

Forsaking the four pursuits, I follow only your path. How delicate and lovely are your tender feet, with a garland of tulsi at the throat, standing on the bank of the Bhima.

Your teeth gleam like jewels; the conch and discus shine in your hands. You are formless and beyond all attributes; even the Vedas cannot fathom your shape, and Shesha and the scriptures tire in seeking your limit.

With arms raised, you bestow fearlessness upon the devoted. Says Tuka, having come to Pandharpur as Sarangadhara, seeing the love of the devotees you overflowed with streams of nectar and gave the milk of divine love to this servant.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My beloved is the playful Parabrahma, radiant as ten million suns and moons. O lovely Vithabai, my whole meditation rests at your feet. I let go of the four pursuits and follow only your way. How tender and beautiful are your feet, a garland of tulsi at your throat, as you stand on the bank of the Bhima. Your teeth gleam like jewels; the conch and the discus shine in your hands. You are without form, beyond all qualities; even the Vedas cannot grasp your shape, and Shesha and the scriptures grow weary seeking your limit. With your arms raised, you grant fearlessness to those who love you. Tuka says: you came to Pandharpur as Sarangadhara, and seeing the love of your devotees you overflowed with streams of nectar and gave this servant the milk of your love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram adores Vithabai, his beloved form of God at Pandharpur, as the playful Absolute itself, brighter than countless suns and moons. He makes his choice clear: he sets aside the four standard aims of life and rests his whole mind at her feet. He holds two truths together, the close and the vast: he can describe her tender feet, her tulsi garland, her gleaming teeth and the conch and discus in her hands, yet she is also formless and beyond all attributes, past the reach of the Vedas and the great serpent Shesha. The poem closes in gratitude: drawn by the devotees' love, she poured out nectar and fed him, her servant, with the very milk of divine love.

This is an auspicious day and hour for your Gondhal. The five vital breaths serve as torchbearers and the two eyes are the crescent lamps.

O dweller of Pandharpur, I dance in your joy. Fulfill my vow, knowing the wish hidden in my heart.

Your shrine is established in the midst of the three worlds; the sacred square is prepared and the water-vessel is placed at the crown of the navel-center. The deity is seated, and before her the devotees sing; they roar with fervor, wearing the rosary of tulsi at their throats.

On the tray of innate bliss, the incense, lamp, and fivefold worship are offered. The mother Vithabai is waved over with the light of the five elements.

Says Tuka, what belongs to you has returned to you; now fulfill my vow and protect this one who has surrendered.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It is an auspicious day and hour for your Gondhal. The five breaths are the torchbearers, and my two eyes are the crescent lamps. O dweller of Pandharpur, I dance in your joy. Fulfill my vow, knowing the wish hidden in my heart. Your shrine is set up within the three worlds; the sacred square is drawn, and the water-pot is placed above, at the navel-center. The deity is seated, and before her the devotees sing; they cry out with fervor, the tulsi rosary at their throats. On the tray of inner bliss, incense and lamp and the fivefold flame are offered. The mother Vithabai is waved over with the light of the five elements. What is yours has come back to you; now fulfill my vow. Tuka says: protect this one who has surrendered to you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns a Gondhal, the night ritual of lamps and song for the Mother goddess, into an inward act of worship of Vithabai. Every outward object becomes part of the worshipper's own body and being: the five vital breaths are the torches, the two eyes are the crescent lamps, the shrine stands within the three worlds, and the sacred pot sits at the navel-center. The deity is enthroned in the heart while devotees sing with the tulsi at their throats, and she is honored on the tray of innate bliss with the light of the five elements. The prayer underneath the festival is plain: he offers back to her only what was always hers and asks her to fulfill his vow and keep safe the one who has surrendered.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Wide and beautiful are her Venkata-eyes, and the Vaijayanti garland gleams at her throat. She wears a sash of yellow silk, and the sandal-paste fragrance adorns her body.

The beauteous child has come to the sacred ceremony, a treasure of radiance, a crown-jewel among the graceful. Her splendor eclipses ten million suns and moons.

Even Brahma and the other gods cannot fathom her incomparable play. She is dusky-hued and tender, fair; her four arms are resplendent.

Her broad chest shines, and a fine pendant glistens above it. Small bells tinkle at her waist in sweet tones, and anklets ring at her feet as she performs an exquisite dance.

Her entire form is adorned with the eight ornaments; she is a perfumed mine of beauty, gracious and sweet-spoken. In countless forms she appears, the primal Shakti, Narayani herself.

The sacred pot is installed in the great city of Pandharpur; a canopy stretches over the three realms. The ceremony begins on the bank of the Chandrabhaga.

She has come for the sake of devotion: Krishnabai, the supreme yogini. Thirty-three crore gods and countless Bhairavas attend, performing worship and showering flowers.

Narada and Tumbara sing, and the Gandharvas make music of divine bliss. Says Tuka's brother, I bow to the dust of those feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wide and lovely are her eyes; the Vaijayanti garland gleams at her throat. She wears a sash of yellow silk, and fragrant sandal-paste adorns her. The beautiful child has come to the sacred ceremony, a heap of radiance, a crown-jewel among the graceful; her splendor swallows ten million suns and moons, and even Brahma and the gods cannot grasp her matchless play. Dusky and tender, fair, her four arms shine; her broad chest gleams, and a fine pendant glistens upon it. Small bells ring sweetly at her waist, anklets sound at her feet, and she dances a wondrous dance. Narada and Tumbara sing, and the Gandharvas make music of bliss. Tuka's brother says: I bow to the dust of those feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a long hymn of praise to God at Pandharpur worshipped as the Goddess, the primal Shakti who is also Narayani. Tukaram piles up the lovely particulars, the wide eyes, the Vaijayanti garland, the four shining arms, the ringing anklets and the wondrous dance, yet keeps insisting she is beyond reckoning: her light eclipses ten million suns and moons, and Brahma and the gods cannot follow her play. He frames the whole vision as a great ceremony at Pandharpur, the sacred pot installed, a canopy over the three worlds, the rite begun on the Chandrabhaga's bank. All the heavens attend, gods and Bhairavas and the singing Gandharvas, and at the end the poet bows simply to the dust of her feet.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Listen, I tell you plainly: eat to sustain life whatever falls into your hands at home. Tilak-marks, rosaries, and saintly costumes are all mere show; the hand stretches out to beg, yet there is no real renunciation, and one worships a stone while serving the body.

Smearing ash on the body, one boasts of being a great champion, yet remains enslaved to desire. What happiness is there in hanging upside down with feet above and head below? Such practices only inflict pain and lead to hell, yet the fool will not flee them.

The clever trickster shouts and gathers crowds of women and children, torments the body for a coin, and in the end it all comes to nothing. To prove himself mighty, a man stands and displays his feats, bruising his own knees and elbows, ruining himself while writhing in agony.

Do not play these empty games of dust and dirt. Instead, take the fragrance of sandal-paste: it benefits you and everyone around you, while hollow spectacles only bring disgrace.

Says Tuka, listen to what I say: stop the game, do not pretend to understand anything. Let us first eat, for hunger gnaws at the belly; after being satisfied, everything else can be a pleasant pastime.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Listen, I tell you plainly: whatever comes to your house, eat it to keep yourself alive. O Vithal. Tilak-marks, rosaries, the little box, the costume, holding all this, he leads the world astray; he stretches out his hand, there is no renunciation in him, he shows a stone and worships his own body. O Vithal. Smearing ash on his dirty body, he beats his chest, I am a great champion, while his hands stay tied to desire, and then he comes begging. O Vithal. What pleasure is there hanging upside down, feet up and face down? He brings on his own pain and tastes his own misery; he falls into hell, yet the fool will not run from it. O Vithal. The trained one shouts his cries, gathers women and children and crowds, torments his body for a coin, and all he did is gone for nothing. O Vithal. To show the people he is a great champion, he stands and spreads out his feats, splits his knees and rubs his elbows, ruins himself and then writhes in his own pain. O Vithal. These empty games cheat people for nothing; holding the pose with a shaved head, the untouchable illusion is in his heart; without earning anything he has only disgraced his body. O Vithal. Do not play these games of dust and dirt at all. Take instead the fragrance of sandal-paste, of musk and scented powder: the perfume is for you and for others too; a thing of worth, while the hollow show is free disgrace. O Vithal. He grows very wretched from the game; there is no real strength of mind in him; blows on his back, his face black, his tongue waters at the root of lust. O Vithal. Tuka says: listen to what I say. Break off the game, do not pretend to anything. Come, let us eat first, hunger is gnawing the belly; once we are full, the rest can be a pleasant pastime. O Vithal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tears into the showman ascetic whose marks, rosaries, ash, and contortions are pure theater, a costume to lead the world astray while the hand still begs and the heart stays bound to desire. He keeps pointing at the pattern, not just one man: hanging upside down, splitting one's knees, shouting to gather a crowd of women and children for a coin, these self-inflicted torments lead to hell and ruin, and the poet calls them dust-and-dirt games that earn nothing but disgrace. Against this he sets a real fragrance, the sandal and musk of true devotion that blesses both you and those around you, worth something where the spectacle is worthless. The closing turn is deliberately earthy and sane: stop the act, do not pretend to a wisdom you lack; first eat and meet the body's plain hunger, and let everything else fall into proper, humble place. The repeated cry O Vithal keeps the whole satire turned back toward God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Listen, sister, I will tell you your fortune. You who have been sleeping, wake up, for that is why I speak.

Honor my word; I tell it in a single sentence. What I see will not be understood by anyone else.

I read the lines of the soul; hear my counsel. Sit down with one mind and place your hand in mine.

Your household life is good and you have found your place, yet no fruit has come, for there is some falseness in your devotion. The fruit of a vow already lies in your hand; take the strength of the four and the eighteen and make devotion your ally.

Pursue it with persistence; do not look to the cost of heart and wealth. The eternal ornament of grace will never fail you.

The original goddess of your lineage has been forgotten, and that is why no fruit has appeared. Says Tuka, live in happiness and hold this remembrance; whoever comes from my house, treat them with the highest respect.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Listen, sister, I will tell you your fortune. You have been asleep; I speak so that you will wake. Honor my word; I tell it in a single sentence. If it does not come true, let it be known to everyone. I will tell the marks of the soul; hear my counsel. Sit down with one mind and place your hand in mine. Your household life is good, you have found your place, yet no fruit has come into your lap, and I see a falseness here in your devotion. The fruit of a vow already lies in your hand; with the strength of the four and the eighteen, make devotion your ally. Keep at it steadily; do not count the cost to heart or purse. The unbroken bangle of grace will never fail to be yours. The first goddess of your own lineage has fastened on you and has been forgotten; you do not know it, and that is why no fruit appears. Tuka says: live in happiness and hold this in memory; whoever comes from my house, treat them with good respect.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes the voice of a wandering fortune-teller reading a sleeping woman's palm, and the reading turns into a teaching about the soul. Her outward life is fine, yet nothing bears fruit, and the diviner names the reason plainly: there is a falseness in her devotion. The cure is not more striving for gain but steady, wholehearted practice that does not stop to count its cost, for the unbreakable bangle of grace is already within reach. The heart of the prophecy is a forgotten allegiance, the original deity of her own line, the truth she was born to, has been neglected and so the fruit cannot come. He sends her off to live happily, only remembering what she had forgotten, and to honor those who come in his name.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Bowing my head at the guru's feet, I will speak the words that flow by his grace, singing the heroic deeds of Hari and Hara. My proclamation is this: servitude to the servant is the highest distinction.

The forerunner clears the path; drink this water of life, O fortunate ones. That which is cooler than the cool, subtler than the subtle, that nectarous juice of love, partake of it.

If you would conquer, conquer pride. If you would banish anything, banish shame and vanity.

If you would hold to something, hold to Shambhu's feet. Do not give Death any room; seize the advantage the moment it comes.

Keep your faith rooted in pure goodness, and let the cry of 'Mahadeva, Hari-Hara' thunder from your lips. Regard another man's wife as your own mother; do not let the mind stray toward another's wealth.

Hold life as cheap as grass in the cause of your master. Spend your strength in service to others; the display of the false is nothing but a sham.

Truth alone ferries you across the river of existence; do not be lazy in this. Observe the vow of Ekadashi and Monday, practice worship and the vigil of Hari.

Great merit lies in singing and dancing his name; worldly life, in truth, does not return. The company of saints is a treasury of the finest fame.

Walk the right path and uproot the tangle of desire. Says Tuka, I carry this balanced load of worldly duty and inner freedom; the sweetness grows with every step, and the vessel of devotion brims over as the servant of Keshava dances on.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I lay my head at the guru's feet, and the words come by his grace. I sing the great deeds of Hari and Hara. This is my proclamation: to be the servant of the servant is the highest thing. The one who goes ahead clears the road. Drink this water of life, O fortunate ones. It is cooler than the cool, finer than the fine: the sweet nectar of love. Take it; you are blessed. If you would conquer, conquer your pride. If you would throw something away, throw away shame and vanity. If you would hold on to something, hold the feet of Shambhu. Give Death no room. The moment he comes, take the upper hand. Keep your heart in pure goodness. Cry out Mahadeva, Hari-Hara; let the words thunder. Look on another man's wife as your mother. Do not let your mind go toward another's wealth. Hold your life as cheap as grass in your master's service. Then you may be called brave. Spend your strength in helping others. The display of the false is only a sham. Truth alone carries you across the river of this world. Do not be lazy in this; I tell you so. Keep the vow of Ekadashi and Monday. Do worship, the telling of the story, the vigil of Hari. There is great merit in singing and dancing his name. Worldly life does not come back; in truth, it does not. Keep good company with the saints; that is a treasury of the finest fame. Walk the path by the good road. Uproot the tangle of desire. Tuka says: I carry this balanced load, action on one side, freedom on the other. The sweetness grows with every step. The vessel of worship brims over, and the servant of Keshava dances on.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks here as a singing pilgrim summoning everyone to a shared feast of the Name. He sets the whole road of practice in order: conquer pride, throw away shame and vanity, hold only to God's feet, and serve others as if your own life were worth nothing. Each line names a discipline, regarding another's wife as your mother, never coveting another's wealth, never being lazy in truth, because these are the rungs by which a person actually crosses the river of worldly life. The vows and the singing are not decorations; they are the load he carries, with worldly duty on one side and inner freedom on the other, balanced like a water-bearer's pole. He ends on the image he has built throughout: the pot of devotion brims over, and the sweetness only grows the further you walk.

Rest-houses are set along every road, and all paths are merely paths, to fulfill the longing of the heart's desire is spread for all. Let whoever comes partake; the inexhaustible Lord Sadashiva has prepared it all.

Only the vessel must be clean; with an auspicious spirit, say the name of Hari. This is no unguarded affair; its witness stands apart from any faction.

It will not let anyone dance by the force of mere opinion, for it is subtler than the subtlest and greater than the greatest. This porridge of Hari's name has filled the belly of the world.

The shade of the wish-fulfilling tree gives rest to all, and all castes may partake of it freely. Say Hara Hara Mahadeva.

Says Tuka, the servant of Hari summons everyone. Come, let us bow from peak to foundation; in this festival month of Chaitra, may the sight of Mahadeva be ours.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Rest-houses are set along every road. All the paths are only paths. They are laid out to satisfy the heart's longing for food. Let whoever comes take what they need. Sadashiva, who never runs short, has prepared it all. Only the bowl must be clean and good. With an auspicious heart, all of you say the name of Hari. This is no loose, careless thing. Its witness stands apart from every faction. It will not let anyone dance on the strength of mere opinion. It is finer than the finest, greater than the greatest, the witness in all that is small and all that is large. Say the name of Hari. This porridge of Hari's name has filled the belly of the world. It is the shade of the wish-granting tree, where all may rest. All castes may take it, and it is good. Say Hara, Hara, Mahadeva. Tuka says: the servant of Hari calls out to everyone. Come, let us bow from the peak to the foot of the hill. In this festival month of Chaitra, let us have the sight of Mahadeva.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the Name into a free public kitchen open to the whole world. The roads and rest-houses are the practices; the food is the longing of the heart; and the host is Sadashiva, who never runs out, so no one need be turned away. The single condition is an inner one: the bowl, the heart, must be clean, because this is not a loose affair that bends to anyone's faction or clever opinion. By calling it porridge that has filled the belly of the world and the shade of the wish-granting tree open to all castes, he insists the Name is for everyone, not the property of one rank. He ends as the crier of the feast, summoning all people to the festival sight of God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I bow to those who have become indifferent to the body and who call upon God. I bow to those who walk the pilgrim paths and to those who welcome the coming and see off the going.

I bow to those who trust the words of the saints and who serve the guru with devotion. I bow to those who honor their mother and father.

I bow to those who speak only truth. I bow to those who understand another's joy and grief and who endure their own hunger and thirst.

I bow to those who do good for others. I bow to those who have mastered their senses.

Says Tuka, I bow to the servants of Hari; in their presence every desire is fulfilled.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Ah, brother. I bow to those who have grown cool toward the body and who call upon God. I bow to them. I bow to those who walk the pilgrim roads, who welcome those who come and see off those who go. I bow to them. I bow to those who trust the words of the saints. I bow to those who serve the guru with a true heart. I bow to those who care for their mother and father. I bow to those who speak only the truth. I bow to those who feel another's joy and grief, who bear their own hunger and thirst. I bow to them. I bow to those who do good for others, the people of merit. I bow to those who have mastered their senses. Tuka says: I bow to the servants of Hari. There, every wish is fulfilled.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a litany of reverence: Tukaram bows, line after line, to the marks of a truly godly person. The traits he honors are plain and practical, not showy: indifference to the body, trust in the saints, care for one's parents, truthful speech, feeling another's joy and grief, doing good, and mastering the senses. By repeating the bow he makes clear that holiness is recognized in conduct, not in claims. The closing line gathers all of these under one name, the servant of Hari, and says that in such company there is nothing left to want.

He hoards his money and starves his own belly, knowing nothing of charity or righteousness. Says Tuka, he puts on a costume and displays a pose, yet never lets his body bend in genuine devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Ah, brother. My proclamation falls on this man: corrupt in this dark age, empty of all good practice. Spit, spit upon his face. The greatness he has claimed, cast it out, throw it away as worthless. He is a slave to his wife and cold toward his parents. No beggar finds anything at his door. With the strength of his learning he only argues and torments others, setting traps for them. He never bows to the village god. He never serves a priest or a guest, not once. All day, every day, he does nothing but slander. Even in a dream he does not remember Govinda. He hoards his money in a chest and starves his own belly. He knows nothing of giving or of right conduct. Tuka says: he puts on a costume and strikes a pose, but he never lets his body bend in real devotion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram aims his proclamation at a recognizable type: the man who keeps the outward forms of religion while emptied of every inward good. The harsh cry, spit on his face, throw out his claimed greatness, is pointed at the pattern, not at any one soul: the pattern of using learning to win arguments, hoarding wealth while doing no charity, slandering constantly, and never truly bowing. The list works as a mirror; each fault, neglecting parents, ignoring guest and priest, forgetting God even in sleep, is a place to examine oneself. The closing line names the core of the indictment: he wears the costume of devotion and strikes the pose, but the body never actually bends, and that pretense is what Tukaram refuses to honor.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The Ganga is not mere water. The banyan and the pipal are not ordinary trees.

The rosary of tulsi or rudraksha is not a common necklace; they are the sacred body of God. The ocean and rivers are not the same, and one must not call the Shiva-linga a mere stone.

The saints are not ordinary people. A staff is not just a stick; consecrated food is not common grain.

The words 'Rama Rama' are not idle syllables. The sun, moon, and stars are not mere lamps; Mount Meru is not an ordinary hill.

Shesha and Vasuki are not common serpents. Garuda is not an ordinary bird; Nandikeshvara is not a beast of burden.

The wish-fulfilling tree is not firewood; the divine cow Kamadhenu must not be called a common cow. The cosmic tortoise is not a mere turtle; the divine boar is not a pig.

Brahma is not an ordinary soul; Lakshmi is not an ordinary woman. A window-frame is not a bone; fine silk is not common cloth; the touchstone is not a rock; all these are attributes of the divine.

Gold is not base metal; salt is not sand; the hides of the black deer and the tiger are not mere leather. Pearls are not pebbles; the diamond is not like an ordinary stone.

The soul is not a relative to be bade farewell at one's own whim. Dwaraka is not a common town; the idol in the battlefield is not a mere image; the Gomati is not an ordinary stream; liberation is won by their sight.

Krishna is not a worldly lover; Shankara is not a common ascetic. Says Tuka, in Panduranga's presence I have received this understanding as grace.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Ah, brother. The Ganga is not just water. The banyan and the pipal are not just trees. Tulsi and rudraksha are not just a string of beads. They are the high body of God. The ocean and the river are not the same. Do not call the linga a mere stone. The saints are not like the rest of the world; they are not like ordinary people. Do not call the staff a mere stick. Do not call the offered food common grain. The words Rama, Rama are not just sounds; do not call them mere words. The sun and moon are not the same as the stars. Meru is not like other mountains. Know that Shesha and Vasuki are not like common snakes; they are not like ordinary serpents. Garuda is not just a bird. The bull Nandikeshvara is not a mere beast. The tree is not just a tree; it is the wish-granting tree. Do not call Kamadhenu an ordinary cow. The Kurma is not just a tortoise. The boar is not just a pig. Brahma is not just a creature. The woman is not just a woman; she is Lakshmi. The window is not just a bone. The fine silk is not just cloth. The touchstone is not just a stone. These are the forms of God with attributes. Gold is not just a metal. Salt is not just sand. No, it is not mere hide: the black-deer skin, the tiger skin. Pearls are not pebbles. The diamond is not like an ordinary stone. The soul is not a relative you can send off as you please. The town is not just a town; it is Dwaraka. Ranchhod is not just an image. The river is not just the Gomati; liberation comes from their sight. Krishna is not a worldly pleasure-seeker. Shankara is not a common ascetic. Tuka says: at Panduranga's feet I have received this grace.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram chants a long string of denials to wake the eye that sees only surfaces. River, tree, stone, beads, food, the very syllables Rama Rama: he insists each one is not the mere object it appears to be, because the divine has entered it. The litany sweeps from sacred places and emblems to gods, animals, metals, and at last to the soul itself, which is not a relative you can dismiss at will. The point is not that these things are magical, but that nothing touched by God can be reduced to its plain material; to call the linga a stone or the Name idle sound is to miss what is truly present. He closes by tracing this changed sight to a gift: standing before Panduranga, he received the grace to see the holy in everything.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All worldly costume has fallen away, and what remains is neither man nor woman, free of desire. Cut off from one's own, meeting only with strangers, this is the round of the holy minstrels.

The passion for Hari Govinda has taken hold at every moment. Those attached to their old ways laugh and mock, throwing garlands of scorn around our necks.

The world fears our strange appearance, but our king stands with hands on hips on the bank of the Bhima at Pandharpur. We have fallen into a separate caste, troubled yet united in a single devotion.

We have abandoned all longing for the body and its comforts. The one wisdom that surpasses all others: let us serve that and dance for our Beloved, shaking the gourd-rattle like fools in love.

Says Tuka, toss a coin and let us dance without shame; great happiness has come, and the old business of desire is finished.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The worldly costume has fallen away. Desire is gone. I am neither man nor woman now. Cut off from my own people, meeting only strangers, this is the round of the holy minstrels. The longing for Hari Govinda has gripped me, again and again. Those behind me laugh in scorn and hang garlands of mockery around my neck. People are afraid of our strange look, of our brawling ways. But our king stands with hands on hips on the bank of the Bhima, at Pandhari. I have fallen into a caste of my own, sorrowing, yet held together by one single love. I have thrown away all care for the body. The one wisdom that rises above all others, let me serve that. Shaking the gourd-rattle like a fool in love, let me dance the devotion of the heart. Tuka says: toss down a coin and let us dance, without shame. Great happiness has come. The old business of desire is finished.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the life of the wandering devotee as a kind of holy madness that the world cannot place. Having dropped worldly identity, even the markers of man and woman, he is cut off from his own people and ridiculed, garlands of scorn thrown around his neck. He accepts the mockery because his eyes are fixed on God standing at Pandharpur, and because one single love now holds his whole life together. The gourd-rattle, the shameless dancing, the tossed coin are signs that he has traded the entire economy of desire for this joy. What looks like foolishness from outside is, for him, the finished end of craving and the arrival of great happiness.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I do not know how to preach to others; I simply dance for myself. The shaven-headed one may wander in vain, and the people may laugh in vain.

But this is no idle amusement; restrain your mind and eyes. Observe the tricks of those ahead and understand them for what they are.

Beneath the outer costume, the inside remains as it is; so long as it is covered, all is well, and the belly gets filled under that pretense. Says Tuka, if you have taken up this role, then hold a pure intent within. Otherwise you go to waste, belonging neither here nor there.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I do not know how to preach to others; I just dance for myself. The shaven-headed one may wander for nothing, and people may laugh for nothing. But this is no idle game. Hold your mind and eyes in check. Watch the tricks of those ahead of you, and understand them for what they are. Under the outward costume, the inside stays as it is. As long as it is covered, all looks fine, and the belly gets filled by that pretense. Tuka says: if you have taken up this role, then keep a pure heart within. If not, you go to waste, belonging neither here nor there.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the warning inward, onto the very life of the wandering devotee. He admits he is no preacher; he simply dances, and he knows the role can be faked, a shaved head and a costume that fills the belly while the inside stays unchanged. So he tells himself and his hearers to restrain mind and eye and to see clearly through the tricks of those who go through the motions. The danger is not the outward form but a hidden hollowness, which is hidden only as long as it is covered. The plain test he names at the end is decisive: take up the role with a pure heart, or you end up belonging nowhere, neither in the world nor in God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Toss a coin and move on, you wretch; why have you tangled yourself? I have wiped the old slate clean and will stitch a new border in its place. Now let us dance in this rapture of play.

Govinda has made me a stranger to myself. Why do you waste those dry, empty words? Show me by your actions where your real origin lies.

Says Tuka, it is for this very reason I have taken the drum in my hand: to untie the knot that binds you.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Toss down the coin and move on, you wretch; why have you tangled yourself up? I have wiped the old slate clean, so I scold you and tell you to be gone. Now let us dance in this rapture of play. Govinda has made me a stranger to my own self. Why do you spend those dry, empty words for nothing? Show it by your deeds; go back to where you first came from. It is for this very reason that I took the drum in my hand. Tuka says: it is your grief that I mean to loosen, the knot that binds you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks in the voice of the minstrel scolding a clinging, complaining self, addressed harshly as the wretch who keeps tangling herself in worldly attachment. He has wiped his own slate clean because Govinda has made him a stranger to his old self, so he has no patience for dry words that are never matched by deeds. The blunt command, toss the coin, be gone, go back to your origin, is aimed at the habit of clinging, not at a person to be despised. The drum in his hand is the whole purpose: he took it up to untie the knot of grief and bondage, both his own and his hearers'.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

She is free yet entangles herself, empty yet groans as if carrying a burden. She has sat down in the quarter where the shunned dwell, willingly taking the stocks upon herself in the stocks of low habits, bound by her own nature.

Listen, sisters: a truly worthy woman feels no shame before others, for she is content in the high seat of faithful service to her husband. Without speaking she broods in worry, and without being struck she runs away.

She does not love her husband's bed but sleeps amid the storms of worldly distraction. She has eyes yet is blind, ears yet is deaf, a tongue yet is mute.

Says Tuka, her downfall and her companions have all become one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

She is free, yet she ties herself up. She is empty-handed, yet she groans as if loaded down, though there is no burden on her back. She has gone to sit in the quarter of the outcastes and has put her own feet in the stocks, by her own will. Listen, sister. She feels no shame before other worthy women. The good wife is content; she keeps the high seat and knows how to serve her husband. This one frets without saying a word, and runs off though no one strikes her. She does not love her husband's bed; she sleeps amid the storms of worldly distraction. She has eyes, yet is blind; ears, yet is deaf; a tongue, yet is mute. Tuka says: her ruin and the company she keeps have all become one and the same.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the figure of an unfaithful, self-defeating wife to picture the soul that turns away from God. She is free, yet she binds herself; carries no real load, yet groans; and willingly puts her own feet in the stocks by choosing low company and worldly distraction over her true husband. Against her he sets the faithful wife who is content and serves with devotion, the picture of a soul fixed on the Lord. The senses she misuses, eyes that are blind, ears that are deaf, a tongue that is mute, are the powers wasted when one ignores God. The closing line is the verdict on the pattern: her downfall and the company she keeps have become indistinguishable, a warning to examine the company and habits we choose.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Come, all of you, apply the collyrium, oil your hair, and take your combs. The court is in session; let us form a circle and dance.

The Master's payment has been made in full; we need not come begging again and again. No more wandering through market stalls and shops.

All the women together, with one Lord over all, let us dance in a single surge. The joy has arrived; what a wonderful game in one place.

Says Tuka, let us devote ourselves to the One alone. Cut away the tangle of worry and illusion, raise a shout, and go to the place of our true origin.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Come, all of you, put on the kohl, oil your hair, take up the comb. The court is in session at the meeting-place; let us hold a circle and dance. This Master's payment has been made; there is no need to come back again and again. So why wander the market now, from stall to shop and back? All the women together, with one Lord over them all, let us dance in a single rush. The joy has come close; what a game it is, all in one place. Tuka says: let us serve the One alone. Cut away worry and illusion. Let us raise a shout and go now to the place we first came from.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram dresses up the soul like a woman adorning herself for a festival dance, then declares that the long debt has already been paid in full. Because the Master has settled the account, there is no need to keep coming back as a beggar or to wander endlessly through the market, the image of restless worldly seeking. The call is to gather as one, under the one Lord, and pour everything into a single surge of joyful devotion. The closing turn names the goal plainly: serve the One, cut away worry and illusion, and return to the original home of the soul.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The minstrel-song is done, the tune is cast away, and the drum is in hand. Attachment and delusion have fallen away, and the conquest has spread through all three worlds.

Come, Vithabai, give us the full feast. I hold back nothing when I find you on the open sands of the riverbank.

Having wandered through eighty-four hundred thousand houses, I have come at last to your door, and for the sake of one coin I have renounced the entire world. Shame is dead, doubt is gone; let me dance at the great gate.

Illusion and its shadow have been stripped away; no remnant remains. I have become a quarreler with the world, abandoned all constraint, and thrown aside all timidity.

I will clasp your feet and fulfill the longing of my heart. Says Tuka, one small coin severs the bonds of worldly life; now we have traded our very lives for each other.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The minstrel-song is done, the tune set aside, the drum is in my hand. Maya and delusion have been made to fall away, and I have prevailed in all three worlds. Come, Vithabai, lay out the whole feast. I hold nothing back now that I have caught you here on the open sands. I have wandered through eighty-four lakh houses, and at last I have come to your door. For the sake of one coin I have given up the whole world. Shame is dead, doubt is gone; let me dance at the great gate. Illusion and its shadow have been wiped away; what is left over now? I have become a quarreler with the world; I have dropped all timidity, all anxious holding-back. I will clasp your feet and fill the longing of my heart. Tuka says: one small coin cuts the bonds of worldly life. Now you and I have traded our very lives for each other.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a song of arrival, sung at the moment the seeking is over and the drum is in hand. Tukaram declares that maya and delusion have fallen away and he has won through all three worlds, so he can call boldly on Vithabai, Vithoba as mother, to spread the whole feast. The long wandering through eighty-four lakh births has ended at her door, and for one small coin, the single act of total surrender, he has let go of the entire world. Shame, doubt, and timidity are dead, so he can dance shamelessly at the temple gate and clasp God's feet. The last line names the exchange at the heart of it: the bond of worldly life is cut, and devotee and Lord have traded their very lives for each other.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Level and smooth, with all desire cut away, I have become a detached minstrel. The territory of the body has been reclaimed, and I will let no rival enter.

Singing of Raghuram is all that remains for us now; the clinging to life, wealth, and kin is finished. The place has been emptied; what is there left to cover? There is no one to be ashamed before, no second person watching.

The company of minstrels has estranged us from the world; the old pleasures are gone and the color of devotion has changed entirely. Shame and fear have both been abandoned; the costume is transformed, and we belong to no one.

Says Tuka, the One who gave us this garb walks with us, and in the presence of all we stand as one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Level and smooth, with desire cut clean away, I have become a detached minstrel. I have fenced off this whole country; now I will let no other enter. To sing of Raghuram is all that is left for us. The clinging to life, to wealth and kin, is gone. The place has been emptied. What is there to cover now? Before whom should I feel shame; who is the second person watching? The company of the minstrels has set the world far from us. The old pleasure is gone; its taste is now a different thing, and the color of devotion has changed. Shame and fear, I have let both of them go. The costume is turned around; we belong to no one, and no one belongs to us. Tuka says: the One who gave us this garb walks with us. Before all people we stand as one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures the renounced life as a cleared, leveled field that he has fenced off for God alone, letting no rival desire back in. With clinging to life, wealth, and kin gone, only one thing remains to do: sing of Raghuram. Because the inner place is now emptied, there is nothing left to hide and no second person to feel ashamed before, so shame and fear are simply dropped. The strange garb of the minstrel marks his separation from the world; he belongs to no one and no one to him. Yet he is not alone: the God who gave him this garb walks beside him, and in the sight of all people the two stand as one.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am neither man nor woman in this world; I have become estranged from all, shameless and desireless, set apart from everyone. Come, Raghuram, let us go to our own homeland.

Who is our companion and friend but you? We will bear the people's taunts and the slander of the malicious; for your sake even brothers and sisters have become strangers. Many times I have sent word to you through the marketplace.

Says Tuka, I have now cast aside all worldly reputation and shame.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am neither man nor woman in this world. I have grown apart from all. I am shameless now, I want nothing, I stand off by myself, away from everyone. Come, Raghuram, let us go away to our own country. Who is our friend, who is our kin, if not you? People will mock us; the spiteful will spread their slander. I will bear all of it for your sake. For you, even brothers and sisters have become strangers to me. Many times I have sent word to you through the marketplace. Tuka says: now I have thrown away my good name, and all my shame before the world.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram declares that he has stepped outside every worldly category and bond. He is no longer man or woman in the world's reckoning, no longer kin to his own family; he is shameless and free of want, deliberately set apart. The whole point is that one tie now holds everything: Raghuram is his only friend and family, and he is ready to bear public mockery and the slander of malicious people for that one bond. He has cast off reputation and shame, which is the very thing that usually keeps a person inside the world. The cost of belonging wholly to God is being willing to be nothing to everyone else.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

She dresses herself neatly and parades with airs, hoping someone will notice her as she heads to the marketplace. But that minstrel-woman is not a true one; without devotion she is tasteless.

She puts on a fine appearance, displays rosaries and rings, and driven by the hope of a coin she sways her hips. She makes her rounds to wealthy houses and dances well there; wherever a coin emerges, she wiggles her skirt.

Outwardly she looks splendid, but inside she is base; she is no genuine minstrel but a sham. Says Tuka, the true servant dances for God and keeps no company with such pretenders.

IN PLAIN WORDS

She dresses herself up just so, struts about, puts on airs. She wants someone to look at her as she sets out for the marketplace. That dancing-woman is no true one. Without devotion she is tasteless. She makes herself up, puts on a show, displays her rosaries and rings. Hungry for a coin, she sways her hips. She does her rounds at the houses of the rich, and there she dances well. Wherever a coin appears, she wags her behind. Foul within, fine without: she is no real dancer, only a fake. Tuka says: the true servant dances for God. Keep no company with one like her. Come, my Ragho; let a lamp be lit on the mountain.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks the pattern of performed piety, picturing a dancing-woman who has all the props of devotion and none of the substance. She wears rosaries and rings, she dances well, but every move is aimed at being noticed and at the coin she can squeeze from rich houses; without real devotion the whole display is flavorless. The sharp line is foul within, fine without: the outward holiness only hides an inward greed. He sets against her the true servant, who dances for God alone and not for an audience or a payment, and warns the listener to keep clear of pretenders. The test he points us to is our own motive: are we performing for eyes and coins, or turned toward God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

She built a house and made a door, but there is no bridegroom within. May the five children of that sinful neighbor perish.

She has five children, yet they are bigger than she is; by the strength of those five they devoured fifty-two bananas. She built a house and made a door and opened a grand shop, yet the coin in her lap is counterfeit.

You call the eunuch a yogi, yet he enjoys sixteen thousand. Says Tuka, say the name of Hari in this world without delay.

IN PLAIN WORDS

She built a house, she made a door, but there is no husband inside. Let the five children of that sinful neighbor woman die off. There are five children in the house, and they are bigger than she is. By the strength of those five, fifty-two bananas were eaten up. She built a house, she made a door, she set up a grand shop. The wedded queen makes her noisy uproar, and her racket is loud. She set up a grand shop, but the coin in her lap is counterfeit. You call the eunuch a yogi, yet he takes his pleasure with sixteen thousand. Tuka says: be quick, say the name of Hari in this world. Births come and go, but devotion was never done.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses a riddling, satirical picture of a household to expose a life that is all structure and no God. The woman builds the house and even opens a grand shop, but there is no husband within and the coin she holds is counterfeit, so all the activity is hollow. The five children who are bigger than she is and devour fifty-two bananas point to the senses and appetites that grow stronger than the self and consume everything. The closing turn names the real failure plainly: lifetimes come and go and the only thing that was never done is devotion. So he urges the one remedy, to say the name of Hari now, before another birth is wasted on counterfeit business.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Saying 'mine, mine,' they got hopelessly entangled and perished. Nothing here is real; bow at the guru's feet.

Come, toss a coin, woman, and stop this idle talk; without a guru there is no true path, and whatever else you do is wasted. They eat, drink, dress, and adorn themselves, saying 'we are fine,' but when a saint comes to their door they turn their backs.

Having read and studied, they call themselves saints, yet at the sight of another's wife their minds grow restless. They wear tilak-marks, caps, and rosaries and proclaim themselves holy, but without compassion and righteousness in the heart they are nothing but frauds.

In this dark age, saints have multiplied in every house, wandering from door to door for a mouthful of food. If the saints say I have slandered them, I answer: this is not slander, brothers.

Says Tuka, I remain with undivided devotion at the feet of the true saints.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Saying 'mine, mine,' they got tangled up and died. Nothing here is real. Bow at the guru's feet. Come, woman, toss down your coin, stop the idle talk. Without a guru there is no path; whatever else you do is empty. They eat and drink and dress and adorn themselves and say, 'we are doing well.' But when saints and holy men come to the door, they turn their backs. They have read and studied and grown clever, and they call themselves saints. Yet at the sight of another man's wife their minds go restless. They put on tilak and cap and rosary and call themselves holy men. With no mercy and no right conduct in the heart, know them for frauds. In this dark age, in house after house, saints have sprung up in great numbers. For a bellyful of food they wander door to door. If these so-called saints say I have slandered them, brothers, this is not slander. Tuka says: with undivided love I take refuge at the feet of the true saints.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tears the costume off counterfeit holiness in the Kali age, where the marks of a saint are everywhere but the substance is rare. He names the symptoms one by one: those who feast and preen yet turn their backs on real saints, the learned who call themselves holy but grow restless at the sight of another's wife, the wearers of tilak and rosary who have no mercy or right conduct in the heart. These, he says, are frauds, and the swarm of food-begging 'saints' going door to door is part of the same disease. He answers the obvious charge head on: this is not slander but plain naming of the pattern. The poem closes by turning the listener toward what is real, the guru's feet and the true saints, since without that refuge all study, marks, and reputation are empty.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Today has been a blessed day, a golden, splendid day. The saints have gathered in the communal dining row, and the meal has been prepared with care.

The names of Rama and Krishna are the finest dishes, seasoned with love. Says Tuka, this delicacy has arrived with the most exquisite flavor.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Today has been a day, a blessed, golden, good day. There was a row of saints sitting to eat, and the meal was set out with care. The names of Rama and Krishna were stirred sweetly into it with love. Tuka says: it has come, this savory, juicy mixture.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is celebrating the joy of singing God's name in the company of the saints, and he frames it as a shared meal. The day is golden because the devotees have gathered in a dining row and a feast has been laid out with care. The real food is the names of Rama and Krishna, seasoned with love, so the eating is the chanting itself. The kala, the mixed offering of curds and rice, becomes his image for that sweet, communal taste of the Name. The point is that fellowship in devotion is itself nourishment, a flavor more delicious than any literal meal.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Will you not speak to Him about us, Rukhmabai, on our behalf? If any remnant has been left over, send it to me quickly. I sit here gazing, longing for just one morsel.

Says Tuka, speak the word 'Vitthal' and send me on my way with your love.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Will you not say something to Him about us, Rakhumai? If anything has been left over there, send it to me quickly. Look, I sit here waiting, longing for just one mouthful. Tuka says: give me your love and send me on my way; only say the word, Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram approaches Rukhmini, Vitthal's consort, as the one who can put in a word for him with God. The image is a humble petitioner at the table's edge, begging not for plenty but for a single leftover morsel. That morsel is grace and the taste of the Lord's love; he is content with even a scrap of it. He asks her to intercede, to send him away satisfied with that love, and the one thing he wants spoken is the name Vitthal. It is a posture of total smallness before God, asking for the least and trusting that the least from Him is enough.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I stand watching the road, hand raised to my forehead, my eyes and chitta fixed upon the path to Pandharpur. When will I see my mother and father coming? I count the hours, measuring each day as it passes.

My left eye flutters, my right arm throbs; my mind races ahead, leaving the body behind. No comfort of bed or sweetness of heart can hold me.

I have forgotten home and door; hunger and thirst have fled. Says Tuka, blessed will be that day when I see my Beloved approaching on the road to Pandharpur.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I watch the road, my hand raised to my brow. My eyes, my whole mind, are fixed on the road to Pandhari. When will I see my mother and father coming? I count the hours on my fingers, measuring out each day. My left eye flutters, my right arm throbs. My mind runs ahead, leaving the body behind. No soft bed, no sweetness pleases me; I want nothing else. I have forgotten house and door. Thirst has fled, hunger has run off. Tuka says: which day will it be, that blessed day, when on the road to Pandhari I see my Beloved coming.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram paints the ache of waiting for God as a lover or child watching the road for someone dear. He stands with his hand shading his eyes, counting the hours, his whole mind fixed on the path to Pandharpur where Vitthal dwells. The body's omens and his racing mind show how the longing overruns him; he forgets home, and even hunger and thirst fall away. Nothing comfortable can satisfy him because only one thing will: the sight of his Beloved, whom he calls his mother and father, coming up that road. The poem makes desire for God concrete and bodily, and names the blessed day he lives for as the day that wait ends.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Shall I serve you and then beg from others for my food? Cursed is such a life, O Lord of Pandhari. What shall I say to you, Vithoba? By the fortune of the great, both good and ill become sweet.

The dread of worldly existence haunts us ceaselessly; death would be welcome, but even that comes with its own disgrace. Says Tuka, if those who have surrendered to you must go begging at another's door, whose shame is that? Why do you not understand?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Shall I serve you, and then beg my food from others? Shame on such a life of mine, Lord of Pandhari. What is there to say to you, Vithoba? When fortune is great, both good and ill taste sweet. The fear of this worldly life never leaves us. Death would be better, but must it come in such disgrace? Those who have taken refuge in you, must they take refuge with others too? Tuka says: whose is the shame in that? Why do you not understand this?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a blunt complaint to Vitthal that doubles as an appeal. If he is the Lord's servant, it is a disgrace that he should still have to beg his living from other people; that life feels cursed to him. The constant dread of worldly existence wears on him so that even death seems welcome, except that it too would come with humiliation. The pointed argument is that one who has surrendered to God should not have to seek refuge anywhere else, and if such a devotee is reduced to begging at strangers' doors, the shame falls on the Lord, not the devotee. He presses God to feel the dishonor of letting His own surrendered ones go unprovided for.

GATHA 0468 The Nature of God

Nature of God, God as mother

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Every wish I ever made, he fulfilled at the right time. Tell me, is there any mother like this, O compassionate Panduranga? When I could not stand on my own, he lifted me onto his hip.

Says Tuka, he places morsels of the supreme nectar in my mouth with his own hand.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Every demand I made, he met it, each one in its own time. Tell me, is there any mother like this, merciful Panduranga? When I could not get up by myself, he lifted me onto his hip. Tuka says: he puts the morsel in my mouth, the morsel of the nectar of Brahman.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes God's care through the plainest of images, the tenderness of a mother. Every wish the devotee ever made was granted, and granted at the right time, so the giving is wise and not merely indulgent. When he could not even stand on his own, God lifted him up and carried him on the hip as a mother carries a child. And the food this mother feeds is no ordinary food but the nectar of Brahman, the taste of God himself, placed into the mouth by his own hand. The point is that the supreme reality is not distant or austere but intimately, maternally caring, raising and feeding the helpless devotee.

GATHA 0469 Prayers

Prayer, keep me singing to the end

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let the materials for the sacred story last as long as this body endures. Do not let my limbs give way, O Panduranga.

Shorten my lifespan if you must, but let me love the singing of your glory until the end. Says Tuka, apart from this one longing, let nothing else enter my mind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let the things I need for telling your story last as long as this body lasts. Do not let my limbs fail me, Panduranga. Cut my life short if you must, but let me keep loving the singing of your praise. Tuka says: strike that down, but bring nothing into my mind but this.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays not for long life or comfort but for the capacity to keep praising God to the very end. He asks that his body and limbs hold together only so far as they serve the telling of the sacred story; their worth is measured by that use. He will even trade away length of life, asking God to shorten his days if need be, as long as the love of kirtan stays with him. The single petition is that nothing else be allowed to enter his mind, that no other desire crowd out this one. It is a request to be kept single-pointed, with devotion as the one thing he refuses to lose.

तुका म्हणे गोड जालें । नारायणीं पोट धालें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The body has grown frail, and this itself is the final play, O Lord of Pandhari. Life has come to its closing hour, yet your form remains settled in my heart.

The pinnacle has been raised, and there the essence has become still. Says Tuka, it has all turned sweet; my belly is filled with Narayana.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The body has worn away. This itself is the final play, Lord of Pandhari. It has come to the last breath, yet your form stays settled in my mind. The pinnacle has been raised, and there the sweetness has come to rest. Tuka says: it has all turned sweet; my belly is filled with Narayana.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks on his own dying body and finds it not a loss but the closing scene of a play. As the flesh wears away and the last breath nears, what matters is that God's form stays fixed in his mind and does not waver. He uses the image of a temple finished and its crowning pinnacle raised: the work is complete, and the sweet essence of devotion has come to rest at the top. So death arrives as fulfillment, not fear. His belly is filled with Narayana, meaning he is wholly satisfied by God, and at the end everything has turned to sweetness.

GATHA 0471 Devotion to Vitthal

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Upon a jewel-studded throne he sits in person. Royal fans wave on either side, and Rukhmabai and Rahi stand close by.

Innumerable powers attend him like servants, bringing every manner of offering. Says Tuka, I stand holding his sandals, a bard at his door.

IN PLAIN WORDS

On a jewel-studded throne he himself sits. Royal whisks wave on both sides. Rakhumai and Rahi stay close beside him. All the powers and perfections wait on him like serving-maids, with every kind of offering. Tuka says: holding his sandals in my hands, I stand, a servant at his gate.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures Vitthal in full royal majesty, a king enthroned and attended. He sits on a jewel-studded throne with fans waving on either side and his consorts Rakhumai and Rahi beside him. Even the siddhis, the supernatural powers that yogis chase after, are reduced here to handmaids waiting on him with their offerings; nothing is greater than the Lord himself. Against all that grandeur Tukaram chooses the lowest place for himself: holding the Lord's sandals, standing as a doorkeeper or attendant. The contrast is the point, that the highest honor a devotee desires is simply to serve at the feet of the King of kings.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A diamond shines in its setting, embedded in a mine of rubies. Just so does Narayana appear, his face the very ornament of bliss.

His splendor surpasses ten million moons at their fullest brilliance. Says Tuka, once the eyes behold him, the gaze does not turn back. Yet by your own sovereign will, make me complete.

My mind is not yet pure, nor is my understanding steady at your feet. Says Tuka, I am nothing but a mass of offenses; how much more can I confess?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A diamond shines in its setting, like a mine studded with rubies. Narayana looks just like that. His face is the ornament of all joy. He is brighter than ten million moons, full as the full moon. Tuka says: once the eyes look at him, the gaze drinks its fill and does not turn back. But you, by your own power, make me whole. My mind is not pure. My thoughts will not stay still at your feet. I am made of nothing but faults. Tuka says: how much can I confess?

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem moves from sight to plea. First Tukaram describes Narayana's beauty in heaped images, a diamond in its setting, a mine of rubies, the brilliance of ten million full moons, and says that once the eye sees this it cannot look away. Then the praise turns into prayer: he asks God to complete him by sovereign grace, because he cannot do it himself. He confesses plainly that his mind is impure and his attention will not hold steady at God's feet. The honesty is the point; he names himself a mass of faults and admits there is no end to what he could confess, so he leaves the making-whole to God alone.

आशीर्वाद - अभंग ५

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He raised his hand and declared his word to the world. God is seated upon the throne; whoever comes as a supplicant, he becomes their benefactor.

For the sake of one devotee, the puzzles of many are solved. Says Tuka, in both this world and the next, he does not let a single error remain.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He raised his hand and made his promise known to the world. God sits on the throne. Whoever comes begging, he becomes their provider. For the sake of one devotee, the troubles of many are untangled. Tuka says: here and hereafter, in both places, he lets no mistake of mine stand.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures God enthroned and openly pledging refuge: the raised hand is a public declaration that anyone who approaches as a supplicant will be provided for. He widens the claim: helping one devotee, God loosens the knots of many at once, so the grace given to one overflows. The closing line states the scope of that protection. In this world and the next, God will not let a single error of his devotee remain to count against him. The mood is reassurance: the seeker is not pleading with an indifferent power but resting on a stated promise.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The one who strives with whole-hearted devotion has a sturdy boat. There is no doubt about crossing the river of existence and reaching the far shore.

Blessed is the lineage of faith, for God himself dwells there. Says Tuka, the Lord is truly bound to the simple and sincere.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The one who tries with his whole heart has a strong boat. There is no doubt about crossing the river of the world and reaching the far shore. Blessed is the family of faith; God lives there. Tuka says: to the simple and sincere, God truly belongs.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers the fear of being lost in worldly existence with a single image: whole-hearted devotion is a sturdy boat, and with it the far shore is not in doubt. He honors faith as a lineage, a household, blessed because God himself dwells where faith is. The last line is the heart of it and the most radical: God is the bonded servant of the simple and sincere, owned by their trust. So the crossing depends not on cleverness or ritual mastery but on plain, undivided faith, which God answers by belonging wholly to it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Blessings upon those in whose chitta the love of God abides. May their well-being endure, and may their love grow ever greater.

They whose treasury is the wealth of devotion deserve the homage of every soul. Says Tuka, all hopes rest at the feet of Hari's servants.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Blessings on those whose hearts hold love for God. May their welfare last; may their love keep growing greater. Their treasure is the wealth of devotion; every soul should bow to them. Tuka says: at the feet of Hari's servants, all my hope rests.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a benediction spoken over those who love God. Tukaram wishes their well-being to endure and their love to keep increasing, treating devotion itself as their real wealth, a fortune that makes them worthy of everyone's homage. He then places himself among them as a supplicant: all his own hope lies at the feet of Hari's servants, not only at God's. The poem quietly raises the devotees of God to the level of God's own presence, so that honoring them and trusting them is part of the devotional path.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For their sake I spend my voice, and with my ears I drink in any news of them. I ask after the welfare of my fellow devotees of Hari, and their well-being is my peace of mind.

They are the true companions for the life beyond; I do not consider their caste. Says Tuka, those valiant ones of pure heart are the best of all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For their sake I spend my voice, and I listen for any news of them with both ears. The welfare of Hari's people is my own peace; I ask after how they are. They are my companions for the world beyond. I do not ask about their caste. Tuka says: those steady ones, the pure of heart, are the best of all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes how he holds the company of devotees: his speech is spent for them and his ears strain for news of them, and their welfare is his own peace of mind. Then comes the sharp line that breaks a deep social rule. These are his companions for the life beyond, and he refuses to ask their caste. The bond of devotion overrides birth entirely. He closes by naming what does count, courage and a pure heart, and calls such people the best of all, putting inner steadiness above any inherited rank.

Whatever is due to this body, let me offer it standing at your feet. Says Tuka, I worship with my stammering voice, singing your song in broken words.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The saints gave me the gift of fearlessness, and my heart found peace by it. Now let this sweetness of love never be broken. Grant me the gift of your grace, Narayana. Whatever is owed by this body, let me offer it standing at your feet. Tuka says: I worship you with my stammering voice; in broken words I sing your song.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram traces a chain of gifts. The saints first gave him freedom from fear, and that settled his heart; now he asks God to keep the stream of love unbroken with further grace. He offers his whole bodily life as service rendered standing at God's feet, holding nothing back. The closing image is deliberately humble: he worships not with polished eloquence but with a stammering, faltering voice, singing in broken words. The poem says that the worth of worship lies in the love behind it, not in the skill of the tongue, so even clumsy praise is accepted.

Surrender, beyond ritual and hurry

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let the rites be imperfect, the mantras incomplete; do not scrutinize the formalities. Count it all as service, and grant your grace at the end.

Having considered every ground and place, my devotion has settled here. Says Tuka, there is no envy left in me now, O God, and no impatience.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let my rites be without mantras, my actions flawed. Do not examine the formalities. Count it all as service, and at the end, show me grace. I have looked everywhere, and my devotion has settled here. Tuka says: now there is no craving left in me, no impatience, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks God to set aside the ritual scorecard: his ceremonies lack the proper mantras and his conduct is imperfect, and he begs that these defects not be inspected. Instead he asks that the whole effort be counted simply as service, with grace granted at the end. Having searched every other ground, his trust has come to rest in this one place. The poem closes in a settled calm that is its real subject: no more grasping, no more impatient demand for results. He has handed the timing over to God and is content to wait.

Prayer, one request only

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hear this plea, O Lord of Lakshmi: it is the petition of a poor man. I join my hands at the hour of the sacred story and ask only that you remain close beside me.

Take this vow from me: if ever I ask for anything else, hold me to account. Says Tuka's brother, O God, keep just this one word of mine.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hear my words, Lord of Lakshmi: this is a poor man's request. I fold my hands at the time of the sacred story and ask only that you stay near me. Take this as my vow: if I ever ask you for anything else, hold me to it. Tuka's brother says: God, keep just this one word of mine.

WHAT IT MEANS

The prayer narrows everything down to a single petition. Calling himself a poor man before the Lord of Lakshmi, the speaker asks for only one thing: that God remain close during the kirtan, the telling of the sacred story. To prove it is the only thing he wants, he makes it a binding vow, inviting God to call him to account if he ever begs for anything more. The closing line drives the point home: keep just this one word. The poem is signed by Tuka's brother, and its discipline is in the refusal to ask for anything beyond God's nearness.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The hour of the final play has come; let everyone be alert. Hurry, remember the Lord of the universe and clap your hands in praise.

Once life departs, these feet will not be found again. Says Tuka's brother, only a little time remains ahead. Accept me, O Hari; do not let me go.

Make good your title of Redeemer of the fallen. I know nothing of devotion, yet I call myself your servant; if you abandon me, whose shame will it be? Says Tuka's brother, I have grasped your feet; who else is there for me now? There is no other proof or refuge remaining. I have placed the burden of my welfare upon your head.

You are my action, my duty, my righteousness, my deity, my family. You are my penance, my pilgrimage, my vow, my guru, my all.

Says Tuka's brother, O God who accomplishes all things, you alone are my devotion, my worship, my ritual, and my every offering.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The hour of the closing play has come. Everyone, be alert. Hurry, remember the Lord of the universe at once, clapping your hands. Once the breath is gone, these feet will not be found. Tuka's brother says: only a little time is left ahead. Take me as your own; do not let me go, Hari. Make your name, Savior of the fallen, come true. I know nothing of true devotion, yet I call myself your servant. If you turn me away, whose is the shame? Tuka's brother says: I have held your feet; who else is there for me now? There is no other proof, no other refuge left. I have laid the whole burden of my keeping on your head. You are my act and my duty, my religion, my God, my family. You are my penance, my pilgrimage, my vow, my guru, my everything. Tuka's brother says: God who does all things, you yourself are my faith, my devotion, my worship, and my every offering.

WHAT IT MEANS

This composite prayer is spoken under the pressure of the last hour, the closing scene of life, and its watchword is be alert and remember God now, while a little time remains, because once the breath leaves, the feet cannot be reached. From that urgency the surrender deepens by stages. First the speaker reminds God of his own title, Savior of the fallen, and turns his own ignorance of true devotion into a claim on God: if a confessed servant is abandoned, the shame falls on the Lord, not the servant. Then he renounces every other support, placing the entire burden of his welfare on God's head alone. The final movement collapses all the usual props of religion into God himself: duty, penance, pilgrimage, vow, guru, family, even the worship and the offering are God and nothing apart from God. Signed by Tuka's brother, it leaves the devotee with no separate self-effort to lean on, only God doing everything.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Receive what is proper from me and place your love within my heart. I have come to beg a gift, carrying a great hope.

At the hour of remembrance, grant me the privilege of your own service. Says Tuka's brother, entrust me to the care of God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do what is fitting, and place your love inside my heart. I have come to beg a gift, carrying a great hope. At the time of remembrance, give me your own service. Tuka's brother says: entrust me to your care, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

The prayer asks for two inward gifts rather than any outward thing. First, that God set his own love within the heart; second, that at the hour of remembrance the speaker be given the privilege of serving God. He comes openly as a beggar, but the great hope he carries is for nearness and devotion, not goods. The closing line, signed by Tuka's brother, asks God to take charge of him, to entrust him to his own keeping. The whole movement is a handing-over: let God supply the love, the service, and the safekeeping.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let us sing, let us play, let us clap and dance freely in detachment, casting off fear, shame, doubt, hope, and despair. Our champion is the Mighty One himself, the giver of both worldly enjoyment and final liberation, the lord of all powers.

We will hurl the arrows of the spoken word, unstoppable and without hesitation, crushing the thorny enemy and splitting the skull of Death. Says Tuka's brother, I care nothing for this life; where my Lord stands, what room is there for anyone else's claims?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let us sing, let us play, let us clap and dance free, beyond care, throwing off fear, shame, doubt, hope, and despair. Our champion is the Mighty One himself, who gives both worldly joy and final freedom, the lord of all powers. We will shoot the arrows of the spoken word, fearless and unstoppable, grind the thorny enemy to dust, and split open the skull of Death. Tuka's brother says: I have no care for this life. Where my Lord stands, what room is there for anyone else's claim?

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a war song of devotion sung in ecstatic release. The dance throws off the five inner weights named outright, fear, shame, doubt, hope, and despair, because the singer's champion is the Almighty himself, giver of both enjoyment and liberation and lord of every spiritual power. The weapons are words: the spoken Name and praise become arrows that crush the thorny enemy of obstacles and split the very skull of Death. The closing line, signed by Tuka's brother, shows where the fearlessness comes from. He has stopped caring about his own life, so where God stands no rival claim can crowd in. The mood is bold rather than cruel; the violence is aimed at Death and at whatever blocks the path, not at any person.

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Leaving Vaikuntha behind, he stands upright upon the brick. He has come, the Lord of the world has come, to meet his devotee Pundalik.

There on the bank of the Chandrabhaga, he stands with hands upon his waist. Says Tuka's brother, the sky resounds with the thundering cry of victory.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Leaving Vaikuntha behind, he stands straight upon the brick. He has come, he has come, the Lord of the world, to meet his devotee Pundalik. There on the bank of the Chandrabhaga, he stands with his hands upon his waist. Tuka's brother says: the sky rings with the thundering cry of victory.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem retells why Vitthal stands at Pandharpur. He left Vaikuntha, his own heaven, to come down and stand upright on a brick for the sake of his devotee Pundalik, and the cry He has come carries the joy of that arrival. The familiar posture is named, the Lord on the bank of the Chandrabhaga with hands resting on his waist, the very image pilgrims go to see. The closing line, signed by Tuka's brother, fills the whole sky with shouts of victory. The point is the tenderness behind it: the Lord of the world preferred standing on a brick beside his devotee to remaining in heaven.

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

So gracious is this Lord to the devoted, the very husband of the milkmaids. He stands at the door without being called and does your work without being told.

Seeing a pure heart, he bows his own forehead to the dust of its feet. Says Tuka's brother, why will you not worship such a guileless King?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He is gracious to those who love him. He is the very husband of the milkmaids. He stands at your door, and you did not call him. He does your work, and you did not ask. When he sees a heart that is clean, he bows his own forehead down into the dust at its feet. Tuka's brother says: why will you not worship such a guileless King?

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem praises Vitthal by the way he serves rather than the way he is served. He comes unbidden and works unasked; he is the Lord of the gopis, near and intimate. The sharp turn is the second verse: seeing a pure heart, God lowers his own head to the dust of the devotee's feet, reversing every expectation of who bows to whom. The closing question presses the listener: a King this open and this humble is precisely the one you have no excuse to refuse.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The God of Pandhari has taken me under his care. What can Death, mosquitoes, or any mortal do to me now? He has expelled every fear that once resided within and has himself taken up his station there.

He does not let even a breeze from any rival touch my body; this absolute certainty has become clear to me. Says Tuka's brother, there is no need for worry about anything; I am seated upon the head of the elephant itself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The God of Pandhari has taken me as his own. So now what can Death do to me, or mosquitoes, or any mortal? He has thrown out the fear that used to live inside me, and he has sat down in that place himself. He will not let even a breeze from any rival touch my body. This much I now know for certain. Tuka's brother says: there is no need to worry about anything now. I am seated with my head upon the very elephant.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram's brother declares total safety once God has accepted him. He lists the threats and dismisses them together, the great and the small alike: Death itself, biting insects, any human power. The inner reversal is precise: where fear once lived inside him, God has now taken up residence, so the old occupant cannot return. The final image of riding high upon the elephant names the stakes plainly: under such protection there is nothing left to fear from any quarter.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have spoken boldly, going beyond what was permitted. Yet do not cast me out of your temple for it, O Lord.

Without your notice, my words will perish and no one will heed me. I called myself yours; now see to it, Purushottama.

Let no offense occur, and if one does unknowingly, do not hold it in your heart; find whatever remedy you please. Says Tuka's brother, if you feel ashamed because I am lowly, know this: it is always the tallest tree that the wind tries hardest to reach.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I spoke of hidden things, boldly, more than I was allowed. But do not cast me out of your temple for it now. My words will perish at once and no one will heed me. I have called myself yours; now see to it, Purushottama. Let no offense stand, and if one slips out without my knowing, do not hold it in your heart; use whatever remedy you please. Tuka's brother says: if you are ashamed of me because I am lowly, remember this: the wind always tries hardest to reach the tallest tree.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a confession folded into a plea. He admits he has spoken past his license about things beyond speaking, then asks not to be expelled from God's house for the overreach. The hinge is ownership: having called himself God's own, he hands the matter back to God to settle. The closing image turns the shame around. If God hesitates because the devotee is lowly, Tukaram answers that storms strike the highest trees, so it is exactly the great who are tested, and lowliness is no reason to be cast off.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The meal is ready and Rukhmabai waits. The water is heated, and the herbal paste has been ground and prepared.

Rise, O Panduranga; the hour for dining has grown late. The milkmaids stand ready with vessels for the rinsing of hands.

All are attentive and eager to serve. Uddhava and Akrura have come to call the Lord.

The bed is made with fragrant flowers, and the tray holds betel, spices, and sweet amusement beside the jeweled lamp. Says Tuka, I make my plea; look this way, O King of Pandhari, and tell all the people to be ready.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The meal is ready, and Rukhmabai is waiting. The water is heated in the pot, and the herbal paste has been ground. Rise, Panduranga; it has grown late for your dinner. The milkmaids stand ready with vessels to rinse your hands. Everyone is attentive, eager to serve. Uddhava and Akrura have come to call you. The bed is made with fragrant flowers; the tray holds betel, spices, and sweet delights beside the jeweled lamp. Tuka says: I make my plea. Look this way, King of Pandhari, and tell all the people to be ready.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram serves God as if God were a beloved householder, and the whole poem is a household summoned to attend him. The meal, the heated water, the ground paste, the waiting wife Rukhmabai, the milkmaids with rinsing vessels: every domestic detail is real care offered to Vitthal. By naming Uddhava and Akrura come to call him, the poet folds devotee and Lord into one intimate home. The point is that love does not worship from a distance; it cooks, prepares the bed, and waits at the door for the Lord to turn and look.

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Rise, all people! Narayana has risen. The sages rejoice, and all three worlds are filled with gladness.

Raise the cry of victory, let instruments thunder: drums, lutes, cymbals, and bells beyond counting. Join your palms, gaze upon his face with reverence, and lay your head upon his feet.

Says Tuka, ask now for whatever you need; tell him your joys and your sorrows.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Rise, all of you! Narayana has risen. The sages rejoice, and all three worlds are filled with gladness. Raise the cry of victory; let the instruments thunder: drums, lutes, cymbals, and bells beyond counting. Join your two palms, gaze at his face with reverence, and lay your head upon his feet. Tuka says: now ask for whatever you long for; tell him your joys and your sorrows.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a morning waking-song, calling the whole world to rise because God has risen. The waking of Narayana is the waking of everything; the sages and all three worlds share the gladness, so the moment is cosmic, not private. The instruments and the cry of victory turn devotion into shared celebration rather than solitary prayer. The closing line names the chance the morning opens: now that the Lord is awake and present, lay your head at his feet and pour out everything, both the joys and the sorrows you carry.

GATHA 0489 Prayers

Prayer, a small place at the feet

मराठी मूळ

करूनी विनवणी पायीं ठेवीं माथा । परिसावी विनवणी माझी पंढरीनाथा ॥१॥

तुका म्हणे आम्हीं तुझीं वेडीं वांकडीं । नामें भवपाश हातें आपुल्या तोडीं ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I lay my head at Your feet and beg You, Lord of Pandhari to hear my prayer. I wish to remain forever at these feet.

Bear with my shortcomings and grant me even a small place. I have come to your abode with whatever devotion I possess.

Look upon me with the eye of grace, O Lord of Pandhari. Says Tuka, we are your crooked, wayward ones; with your own hand, sever the noose of worldly bondage that binds us.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I make my plea and lay my head at your feet. Hear my prayer, Lord of Pandhari. I feel I should stay at these feet always, unbroken. Bear with my smallness and give me even a tiny place. With whatever love I have, I have come to your home. Look upon me with the eye of grace, Lord of Pandhari. Tuka says: we are your crooked, wayward ones. With your own hand, cut the noose of worldly bondage that binds us.

WHAT IT MEANS

The whole poem asks for one thing: to stay at God's feet without a break, and to be granted even a small space there. Tukaram does not pretend to be worthy; he asks God to bear with his shortcomings and to look on him with grace anyway. The honesty sharpens at the end. He calls himself and his fellows crooked and wayward, not straight or deserving. The closing request names the real need: only God's own hand can sever the noose of worldly bondage, so the prayer for a place at the feet is finally a prayer for release.

Procession, the feet that float stones

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Placing sandals beneath His feet, the Lord walks forward, and soft vermilion footprints appear wherever he steps. All people, bow to the dust of those feet, for these are the feet that made even stones float upon the water.

Follow quietly in his train, keeping silence, and do not speak. Says Tuka, I announce that the hour has come; the doors of the great palace have been opened.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sandals placed beneath his feet, Vanamali walks forward, and soft vermilion footprints rise where he steps. All you people, bow to the dust of those feet. These are the feet that made even stones float upon the water. Keep your distance and stand in your places along the way. Hold silence; say nothing at all. Tuka says: I announce that the hour has come. The doors of the great palace and temple have been opened.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a procession song, marshalling the crowd as the Lord walks out. The vermilion footprints make his passage visible, and the call to bow to the dust of his feet sets the right posture: reverence, not jostling. The reminder that these feet floated stones on the water points to the bridge to Lanka, naming the power hidden in the gentle figure walking by. The instruction to keep back and keep silent guards the moment, and the final announcement that the palace doors have opened tells the people the long-awaited hour of darshan has finally come.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hari has gone inside; wait here a moment and the fruit will come if you are patient. Do not be hasty; hear what I say and sit quietly for a short while.

The massage is finished and the bath is done; the Lord has bathed and Bhavani dries his body. He dresses in a golden silk garment; Rukhmabai requests that the meal be served.

After eating and rinsing his hands, Narayana reclines in bliss. Says Tuka, I pass this word along to all of you: be at ease.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hari has gone inside. Wait here a moment; the fruit will come if you are patient. Do not rush; hear what I say, and sit quietly for a little while. The massage is over, the water is poured, the Lord has bathed, and Bhavani dries his body. He puts on a golden silk garment; Rukhmabai asks that the meal be served and the Lord come to his place. After eating and rinsing his hands, Narayana lies down in bliss. Tuka says: I pass this word to all of you now: be at ease.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem teaches waiting by narrating, step by step, what God is doing within. Hari has gone inside, so the devotee outside is told not to be hasty but to sit quietly and trust that the fruit of waiting will come. Each domestic stage, the bath, the drying, the golden garment, the served meal, the rest, marks time passing in the Lord's own house. The reassurance at the close is the lesson: the devotee need not fret or push, because God is unhurried and at ease, and patience itself is the right posture before him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Give us something, Rukhmabai; tell us, is there any remnant left over from what the sages ate? We sit outside, watching and waiting, longing for even one morsel to share among us. We have come this far in your name, placing all our hope in you, O generous one.

Says Tuka, grant us the parting gift of love, and let us go saying 'Vitthal, Vitthal.'.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Give us something, Rukhmabai; tell us, is anything left over from what the sages ate? We sit outside, watching and hoping, longing for even one mouthful to share among us. We have come this far in your name, putting all our hope in you, generous one. Tuka says: give us the parting gift of love, and send us away saying Vitthal, Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram begs at the edge of God's household, asking Rukhmabai for even the scraps the great sages left behind. The lowliness is deliberate: he does not claim a seat at the table, only a single morsel to share, because nearness to God in any measure is enough. He stakes his whole claim on having come in God's name and on hope alone. The last line raises the asking past food: the true parting gift he wants is love, and the blessing is to leave with the Name on his lips.

Devotion, the night-service at the feet

मराठी मूळ

बहुडविलें जन मन जालें निश्चळ । चुकवूनी कोल्हाळ आला तुका ॥१॥
पर्यंकीं निद्रा करावें शयन । रखुमाई आपण समवेत ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका म्हणे आतां परिसावीं सादरें । बोबडीं उत्तरें पांडुरंगा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The crowd has been sent home, the mind has grown still, and Tuka has slipped away from the commotion. Now let the Lord take rest upon the royal bed, with Rukhmabai beside him.

I have come carrying the lute and cymbals in my hands to attend upon my Master's feet. Says Tuka, now listen kindly, O Panduranga, to my stammering words.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The crowd has been sent home, the mind has grown still, and Tuka has slipped away from the noise. Now let the Lord sleep upon the royal bed, with Rukhmabai beside him. I have come carrying cymbals and the lute in my hands, to serve at my Master's feet. Tuka says: now listen kindly, Panduranga, to my stammering words.

WHAT IT MEANS

When the day's crowd has dispersed and the mind is quiet, the devotee comes alone for the last service of the night. He readies the Lord and Rukhmabai for rest upon the royal bed, then takes up cymbals and lute to wait at the feet. The intimacy lies in this private hour, when noise has fallen away and only love remains to keep watch. He calls his own words stammering, owning that his praise is clumsy, and asks only that God listen kindly anyway, for the offering is love, not eloquence.

Devotion, song as the only offering

मराठी मूळ

नाच गाणें माझा जवळील ठाव । निरोपीन भाव होईल तो ॥१॥
तुम्हां निद्रा मज आज्ञा ते स्वभावें । उतरूनि जीवें जाईन लोण ॥ध्रु.॥
एकाएकीं बहु करीन सुस्वरें । मधुर उत्तरें आवडीनें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे तूं जगदानी उदार । फेडशील भार एका वेळा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Song and dance are the only place I have near you. Whatever devotion arises, that I will offer.

Your sleep is my own command by nature; with my very life I will remove the evil eye from you. Alone, I will sing many sweet melodies in a loving voice.

Says Tuka, you are the generous Lord of the universe; in a single moment you will lift the entire burden.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Song and dance are the only place I have near you. Whatever devotion rises in me, that I will offer. Your sleep is my command, by my very nature; with my own life I will lift away the evil eye from you. Alone, I will sing many sweet melodies in a loving voice. Tuka says: you are the generous giver to the whole world. In a single moment you will lift the whole burden.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names the one gift he has to bring: song and dance, the place where he can stand close to God. He has no learning or riches to offer, only the devotion that rises in him, and he gives that. The tenderness turns protective: he treats God's rest as his charge and offers his own life to ward off any harm, the evil eye, that might touch the Lord. The close trades the small gift for an immense return: the one who is generous to the whole world will, in a single moment, lift away the entire burden the devotee carries.

Adoration, the tender guardian

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे अगा कुटुंबवत्सळा । कोण तुझी लीळा जाणे ऐसी ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Having granted each weary servant the gift of his heart's desire, you embraced them with the honor of your acceptance. O Lord of the lowly, O form of bliss, such titles truly become you.

Many have prayed in many ways, and in every instance you have filled them to overflowing. Says Tuka, O tender guardian of your family, who can ever fathom your play?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You gave each weary servant the gift his heart desired, and you took them up as your own with honor. O Lord of the lowly, O form of bliss, such titles truly suit you. Many have prayed to you in many ways, and in every place you have filled them to overflowing. Tuka says: O tender guardian of your family, who can know your play as it truly is?

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem praises God by what he does for the tired and the lowly: he grants each one his heart's desire and then accepts him with honor, not condescension. The titles Tukaram uses, Lord of the lowly and form of bliss, are earned by this conduct, not merely conferred. The breadth is the point: however differently people have prayed, none has gone away empty, and all have been filled past measure. The closing wonder names the mystery: a God who guards his devotees as tenderly as his own family acts by a play no one can fully fathom.

Putting God to rest, tender care

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Rise now, you who are weary from the night vigil; the Master has retired, so go and take your rest. Rukmini stands waiting, having prepared the royal bed.

Forgive the many words I have spoken, O Purushottama. Says Tuka's brother, I fall at the feet of Narayana.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Rise now, you are worn out from the long night watch. The Master has lain down, so go and take your rest. Rukmini is waiting; she has made the bed ready and stands beside it. Forgive my chatter, O Purushottama. Tuka's brother says: I fall at the feet of Narayana.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a bedtime song for the Lord, sung as the day's worship ends and the deity is laid down to sleep. The singer turns to those who have kept the night vigil and tells them their service is done; they may rest now, for Rukmini stands waiting by the made bed. Then he asks pardon for all the words he has poured out, calling them mere chatter before God. The closing is pure surrender: the body of devotion is to fall at Narayana's feet and ask nothing more.

Leave-taking, fed from God's own plate

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे दिलें उच्छिष्टाचें भोजन । आम्हां आपुलिया नाहीं निवडिलें भिन्न ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The consecrated offering has been received; now you may depart satisfied. I know in my heart how much labor this has cost you.

Now sleep in peace, O Gopala; all desires are fulfilled, and we go to our own places. It is for our own needs that we kept you awake, to remove the afflictions of our good and bad deeds.

Says Tuka, you fed us from your own plate and made no distinction between yourself and us.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The offering has been received; now you may go satisfied. I know in my heart how much this cost you. Now sleep in peace, O Gopala; every wish is fulfilled, and we go to our own places. We kept you awake for our own sake, to take away the harm of our good deeds and our bad. Tuka says: you fed us from your own plate, and made no difference between yourself and us.

WHAT IT MEANS

The worship is over and the devotee is taking leave, but he speaks first to God's tiredness, not his own. He admits a strange honesty: it was for his own need that he kept the Lord awake all night, to have his merits and sins alike wiped away. So the service was never charity offered to God; it was the devotee's own rescue. The last line names the wonder of it: God fed them from his own plate, ucchishta, the leftovers from his own mouth, drawing no line between himself and his people. That shared plate is the whole intimacy of bhakti.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I fashioned ornaments from the jewels of words and with them adorned the Lord of the universe. I prepared a meal of heartfelt devotion and with it fed Narayana.

I gave the rinsing water of worldly life to his hands and offered my mind as the final cleansing of the mouth. The senses, steeped in fragrant betel, were offered, and a tulsi leaf was placed upon his head.

Making a single lamp of undivided focus, I gave him this body as his seat. Says Tuka, in silence I serve his feet and have laid the Lord to rest in the inner chamber.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I made ornaments out of the jewels of words, and with them I adorned the Lord of the universe. I made a meal out of heartfelt feeling, and with it I fed Narayana. I gave the rinsing water of worldly life to his hands, and offered my mind as the mouth-cleansing after the meal. I dressed his senses in fragrant betel, and placed a tulsi leaf upon his head. I made a single lamp of undivided feeling and waved it, and I gave him this body as his seat. Tuka says: in silence I serve his feet, and I have laid God to rest in the inner chamber.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes the whole ritual of temple worship and performs it inwardly, with nothing physical at all. Words become the ornaments, devotion becomes the food, the busy world becomes the hand-rinsing water, the mind itself becomes the rinse of the mouth. Each outward act of puja is matched by something offered from within. The point is that real worship needs no brass and no flowers; the body is the temple, single-pointed feeling is the lamp, and the deepest service is done in silence. He ends by laying God to rest in the innermost room, the heart, where the worshipper and the worshipped are finally alone.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Having risen, Tuka went to his own place, and the Lord remained within the temple. The exchange between servant and Master is complete; the mind is at peace through obedience to his command.

Hari has reclined upon the serpent-bed of infinity; there is no further task remaining. Tuka put everyone outside as he left and told the people: the Lord is asleep.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Tuka rose and went to his own place, and God stayed behind in the temple. The service between servant and Master is finished; obeying the command, the mind is at peace. Hari has lain down on the endless serpent-bed; no task is left there now. Tuka put everyone outside and left, and told the people: God is asleep. It is a holy day, a fine day, the great day of Dasara; a good hour has been found, so make good use of it today.

WHAT IT MEANS

This closes the cycle of worship at Pandhari: the deity is settled for the night and the worshipper goes home. The peace here comes from obedience, doing what was asked and then letting go, so nothing remains to be done. Hari rests on Shesha, the serpent of infinity, the image of a God wholly at ease. Tuka clears the temple and quietly tells the people the Lord is sleeping, the way one hushes a house around someone resting. The mention of Dasara names the auspicious moment and urges the hearer to seize the rare good hour while it lasts.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Raise the cry of victory and hold Hari in your heart. Do not be lazy; I say this to the young and old alike.

Come, come, O women, Hari is setting out. Hurry with your lamps for the waving of lights; let us wave the flame before his blessed face and bow our heads to his feet.

Good fortune has come to us right here at home. The imperishable moment may be seized in the space of a single breath; after that, things go on as they will.

Therefore look neither forward nor backward; drop all other work and go with Hari. Take this to heart in every possible way.

Do not let it slip, for if it reaches your ears and you still waste the chance, you will never find this joy even in a dream; only regret will remain, and it will become an old, sad tale. There is truly no measuring the misfortune of those who squander such an opportunity.

This moment will not return, deathless and undying; know this with certainty, and then let your deliberations begin. For this prize, Brahma and the other gods went mad.

For the sake of a leftover morsel, God himself became a fish in the water. Lakshmi, the mother of the universe, still dwells in the depths of the ocean for his sake.

Says Tuka's brother, he has come here of his own accord and without effort.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Shout the cry of victory and hold Hari in your heart. Do not be lazy; I say this to the young and to the old. Come, come, O women, Hari is setting out; hurry, take up your lamps for the waving of lights. Let us wave the flame before his blessed face and bow our heads to his feet. Good fortune has come to us, right here in our own home. The unfading moment can be won in the space of a single breath; after that, things go on as they will. So look neither behind you nor ahead; drop every other task and go with Hari. Hold this in your heart in every way; do not let it slip once your ears have heard it. If you waste this chance, you will never see this joy again, even in a dream; only the cry of regret will be left, and it will become an old, sad tale. There is no measuring the misfortune of those who throw such a chance away. No, no, no; know this for certain. This hour will not come back, deathless and undying. Let this be understood, and then your reasonings can begin. For this prize Brahma and the gods went mad. For the sake of a leftover morsel God became a fish in the water; and Lakshmi, mother of the world, still lives in the depths of the ocean for his sake. Tuka's brother says: he has come here on his own, and without any effort of ours.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is an urgent call to seize a rare moment of God's nearness before it passes. Hari is setting out, the lights are ready, and the singer drives everyone, young and old, women with their lamps, to drop all other business and come now. The whole force of the poem is on the smallness of the window: the imperishable instant can be caught in one breath, and then ordinary life resumes. He paints the cost of missing it bluntly, that nothing will be left but lifelong regret turned into a sad old story. Then he raises the stakes, recalling that the gods themselves longed for this, that God stooped to become a fish for a small thing, that Lakshmi waits in the deep for his sake. The relief in the last line is that this prize, so coveted, has now come to the ordinary devotee freely and without any earning.

तुकाराम गाथा

Original Marathi with English translation, a plain-language reading, and an explanation of what each abhanga means

Volume 2: Gatha 501-1000 - 490 abhangas

About This Edition

This reading edition brings together four layers for every abhanga: the original Marathi, an English translation, a rendering in plain words, and a short explanation of its meaning.

The English layers are devotional reading aids. No translation can fully carry Tukaram's Marathi music, wordplay, cultural setting, or spiritual force. Readers are encouraged to return to the original and to consult Marathi teachers and established scholarly editions.

Marathi source: Tukaram Gatha on Marathi Wikisource. The source dataset identifies the Marathi text as public domain. English reading layers are from the Ananta Satsang online edition.

Editorial note: We ask forgiveness for any inaccuracies in rendering Tukaram Maharaj's original Marathi.

Arati, the formless takes a form

मराठी मूळ

ओवाळूं आरती पंढरीराया । सर्वभावें शरण आलों तुझिया पायां ॥१॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let me wave the lamp of worship before the Lord of Pandhari. With all my being I have come to the shelter of your feet.

How is it that the one who pervades everything and whose form is beyond grasp was born as the child Krishna in a cowherd's house? He who is beyond all qualities took the form of an incarnation; that same Panduranga stands upon the brick. For the sake of devotion he assumed a visible form and proudly wears the anklet of his pledge upon his feet.

Says Tuka, through the strength of loving devotion you become gracious, O God; O Panduranga, your ways are beyond anyone's reckoning.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let me wave the lamp of worship before the Lord of Pandhari. With my whole being I have come to the shelter of your feet. How is it that the one who fills all things, whose form cannot be grasped, became the child Krishna in a cowherd's house? He who is beyond all qualities took on a body as an incarnation; that same Panduranga stands here upon the brick. For the sake of devotion he came into a visible form, and on his feet he proudly wears the anklet of his vow. Tuka says: by the strength of loving faith you turn gracious, O God; O Panduranga, your ways are past anyone's understanding.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is an arati, a lamp waved before the deity, but it stops to marvel at the deepest mystery of that deity. The God being worshipped is the one who pervades everything and has no graspable form, yet he became a baby in a cowherd's home and now stands as a plain stone image on the brick at Pandhari. The poem says he did this on purpose, for the sake of devotion, even wearing the anklet of a vow on his feet like a binding pledge to his devotees. The point is that love draws the formless into a form it can hold and serve. Tuka ends by confessing that this self-lowering of God is beyond all reckoning; only devotion, not reasoning, can meet it.

Arati, the vow fulfilled

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Having prepared the worship, let us now wave the lamp before the Lord. Today the vow is fulfilled; blessed is this day.

Behold him, all you fortunate ones, you beloved children. Says Tuka, I clap in joyful rhythm, standing right beside him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Having made ready the worship, let us now wave the lamp before the Lord. Today the vow is fulfilled; blessed is this day. Look at him, all of you fortunate ones, you beloved children. Tuka says: I clap in joyful rhythm, standing right beside him.

WHAT IT MEANS

A short, glad arati sung at the moment a long-held vow comes true. The day is called blessed because what was promised and waited for has finally arrived: the sight of the Lord. The singer turns to the gathered people, calling them fortunate children, and bids them simply look at him. The whole feeling is nearness; Tuka is not describing God from a distance but clapping in rhythm right beside him, sharing the joy of the company.

Bargaining with God for grace

मराठी मूळ

घ्याल माळ जरी पडेन मी पायां । दंडवत वांयां कोण वेची ॥१॥
आलें तें हिशोबें अवघिया प्रमाण । द्यावें तरी दान मान होतो ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका म्हणे तुम्ही जालिया कृपण । नामाची जतन मग कैची ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If you grant me the garland, I will fall at your feet; who wastes a prostration for nothing? Everything proceeds by measure and proportion; if you give, let it be a real gift, and honor follows. If you will receive my service with an open heart, then send the consecrated offering quickly.

Says Tuka, if you become miserly, how will the treasury of the Name be preserved?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If you give me the garland, I will fall at your feet; who spends a prostration for nothing? Everything that comes does so by measure and proportion; if you give, let it be a real gift, and honor follows. If you will take my service with an open heart, then send the offering quickly. Tuka says: if you turn miserly, how then will the treasury of the Name be kept safe?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram half-playfully drives a bargain with God over grace. He says he will bow and prostrate, but he wants the garland of acceptance in return, refusing to waste his devotion on nothing. He asks God to be a real giver and to receive his service freely, sending back the prasad without delay. The sting is in the last line: he warns God that if God turns stingy with grace, the very treasury of the Name, the wealth of devotion that depends on God's open hand, will not be kept. It is the bold, teasing intimacy of a devotee who feels free to hold God to account.

GATHA 0504 Devotion to Vitthal

Parting, the mind stays at his feet

मराठी मूळ

तुम्हीं जावें निजमंदिरा । आम्ही जातों आपुल्या घरा ॥१॥
विठोबा लोभ असों देई । आम्ही असों तुमचें पाई ॥ध्रु.॥
चित्त करी सेवा । आम्ही जातों आपुल्या गावां ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे दिशा भुलों । फिरोन पायापाशीं आलों ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You go to your own temple, and I shall go to my own home. O Vitthoba, let there be love between us; let me remain at your feet.

My mind performs your service even as I return to my village. Says Tuka, I lost my way in every direction and came right back to your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You go to your own temple, and I will go to my own home. O Vithoba, let there be love between us; let me stay at your feet. My mind keeps up your service even as I go to my own village. Tuka says: I lost my way in every direction, and came back again to your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a song of parting after worship, but the parting is only of the body. The devotee goes home and lets God stay in the temple, asking only that the bond of love between them remain unbroken. He claims that distance changes nothing: his mind goes on serving even as his feet carry him back to his village. The last line is a quiet confession of the whole spiritual journey, that he wandered off in every direction and found that every road led him back to the feet he started from. The feet are home in a way the village is not.

GATHA 0505 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, waiting for the leftovers

मराठी मूळ

पाहें प्रसादाची वाट । द्यावें धोवोनियां ताट ॥१॥
शेष घेउनि जाईन । तुमचें जालिया भोजन ॥ध्रु.॥
जालों एकसवा । तुम्हां आडुनियां देवा ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे चित्त । करूनि राहिलों निश्चित ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I wait for your blessed leftovers; let me wash the plate clean. When your meal is finished, I will carry away what remains.

I have become one with you, standing close to you, O God. Says Tuka, I have steadied my mind and remain at peace.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I watch for your blessed leftovers; let me wash your plate clean. When your meal is done, I will carry off what remains. I have become one with you, standing close to you, O God. Tuka says: I have steadied my mind and stay here at peace.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks for nothing grand, only the leftovers from God's plate, the ucchishta that a humble servant is glad to eat. He waits, ready to wash the plate and carry away the remains, taking the lowest place by his own choosing. Yet in that very lowliness he claims the highest thing: standing so close to God that he has become one with him. The point is that the way up is the way down; the servant who wants only the scraps is the one who ends up inseparable from the Master. His mind, fixed on this, is finally still and at peace.

The child's plea to be forgiven

मराठी मूळ

तुझिये संगतीं येऊं करूं कोल्हाळ । तुका म्हणे बाळें अवघीं मिळोन गोपाळ ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have made a commotion, singing and dancing without knowing how, feeling no shame or fear, only the worry of my belly. Sit down, you are tired; let me rub your feet, O Generous One, and let the breeze cool your body.

Forgive my delay, for a mother should hold no anger toward her child. Says Tuka, we children will come to your company and raise a joyful uproar, all the little cowherds gathered together.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I made a racket, singing and dancing though I do not know how, with no shame and no fear, only the worry of my belly. Sit down, you are tired; let me rub your feet, O Generous One, and let the breeze cool your body. How long can my lateness be scolded? A mother should hold no anger against her child. Tuka says: we children will come into your company and raise a happy uproar, all the little cowherds gathered together.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram comes to God as a clumsy, hungry child rather than a polished worshipper. He admits his devotion is a noisy, untrained racket, sung and danced without skill, driven partly by the simple need of his belly, and he feels neither shame nor fear about it. Then he turns servant, offering to rub God's tired feet and fan a breeze over him. The heart of it is the appeal to a mother's love: a parent does not stay angry at a late or awkward child, so God should not either. The longed-for end is the joyful uproar of all the cowherd children crowding into Krishna's company, where being a child, not being correct, is what wins the welcome.

GATHA 0507 Ecstasy and Joy

Fulfilment, the harvest of the Name

मराठी मूळ

कळस वाहियेला शिरीं । सहस्रनामें पूजा करीं ॥१॥
पीक पिकलें पिकलें । घन दाटोनियां आलें ॥ध्रु.॥
शेवटीचें दान । भागा आला नारायण ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे पोट । भरलें वारले बोभाट ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The pinnacle is placed upon my head; I worship with the thousand names. The harvest has ripened, the dense clouds have gathered.

The final gift has arrived: Narayana himself has come as my share. Says Tuka, my belly is full and all clamor has ceased.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The pinnacle is set upon my head; I worship with the thousand names. The harvest has ripened, it has ripened; the clouds have gathered thick and come. The last gift has arrived: Narayana himself has fallen to my share. Tuka says: my belly is full, and all the clamor has stopped.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the song of a devotee whose long labor has finally borne fruit. The images are of harvest and rain: the crop has ripened, the rain clouds have come at last, the whole growing season of devotion has paid off. The crowning gift, set like a temple spire upon his head, is that Narayana himself has come to him as his portion. The closing is deeply plain: his belly is full, every craving satisfied, and the noise of wanting and crying out has fallen silent. When God is your share, there is nothing left to clamor for.

Plea to the Mother, a willful child

मराठी मूळ

आरुष शब्द बोलों मनीं न धरावें कांहीं । लडिवाळ बाळकें तूं चि आमुचि आई ॥१॥
देई गे विठाबाई प्रेमभातुकें । अवघियां कवतुकें लहानां थोरां सकळां ॥ध्रु.॥
असो नसो भाव आलों तुझिया ठाया । पाहे कृपादृष्टी आतां पंढरीराया ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे आम्ही तुझीं वेडीं वांकुडीं । नामें भवपाश आतां आपुलिया तोडीं ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not hold in your mind any harsh words I may speak; I am but a willful child and you alone are my mother. O Mother Vithabai, give us the gift of love, a delight for all, young and old alike.

Whether my devotion is worthy or not, I have come to your doorstep; look upon me now with merciful eyes, O Lord of Pandharpur. Says Tuka, we are your foolish, crooked ones; now sever our bonds of worldly existence with your name.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not hold in your heart the harsh words I speak. I am only a willful child, and you alone are my mother. O Mother Vithabai, give us the gift of love. Let it be a delight for all, young and old alike. Whether my devotion is worthy or not, I have come to your doorstep. Look on me now with merciful eyes, O Lord of Pandhari. Tuka says: we are your foolish, crooked ones. Now cut the bonds of this worldly life with your Name.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram comes to Vithoba the way a small child comes to its mother, and he asks her not to take offense at the sharp things he says. He does not claim to deserve anything; he simply names the relation and rests on it. The whole prayer turns on that bond: a child does not earn its mother, so he can come unworthy and still ask for love, for mercy, and for release. The gift he wants is not for himself alone but for everyone, young and old. The bonds he asks to be cut are cut by one means only, the Name.

Longing, the shut temple door

मराठी मूळ

आडकलें देवद्वार । व्यर्थ काय करकर ॥१॥

देवा लागलीसे निज । येथें उभ्या काय काज ॥२॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The temple door is shut; why make a fuss over nothing? Come, let us go home now and not keep this pointless vigil. God has fallen asleep; what business do we have standing here? Says Tuka, God is annoyed and will not accept our service.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The temple door is shut. Why make a fuss over nothing? Come, let us go home now. Do not keep this pointless vigil. God has fallen asleep. What use is there in standing here? Tuka says: God is annoyed, and he will not accept our service.

WHAT IT MEANS

On the surface Tukaram is telling the others to give up and go home, since the door is closed and God seems asleep and even displeased. But the words are spoken by a man who cannot leave, and the giving-up is a kind of complaint pressed against the very door he refuses to abandon. The shut door, the sleeping God, the rejected service: these name the experience of devotion gone silent, when the Lord seems to withhold himself. Saying God will not accept our service is itself an act of service, the lover protesting at the threshold.

GATHA 0510 Krishna Leela

Krishna is everything, total refuge

मराठी मूळ

कृष्ण माझी माता कृष्ण माझा पिता । बहिणी बंधु चुलता कृष्ण माझा ॥१॥
कृष्ण माझा गुरू कृष्ण माझें तारूं । उतरी पैल पारू भवनदीची ॥ध्रु.॥
कृष्ण माझें मन कृष्ण माझें जन । सोइरा सज्जन कृष्ण माझा ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे माझा श्रीकृष्ण विसावा । वाटे न करावा परता जीवा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Krishna is my mother, Krishna is my father; Krishna is my sister, brother, and uncle. Krishna is my guru, Krishna is my boat that ferries me across the river of worldly existence.

Krishna is my mind, Krishna is my people; Krishna is my true friend and companion. Says Tuka, Sri Krishna is my rest and refuge; I never wish to turn my soul away from him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Krishna is my mother. Krishna is my father. Krishna is my sister, my brother, my uncle. Krishna is my guru. Krishna is my boat that carries me across the river of worldly life. Krishna is my mind. Krishna is my people. Krishna is my kinsman and my true friend. Tuka says: Sri Krishna is my rest and my refuge. I will never turn my soul away from him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes every tie a person leans on, family, teacher, friends, his own mind, and assigns all of them to one name. This is not a list of things Krishna gives him; it is a replacement, where Krishna becomes each relation himself. The boat across the river of worldly existence names the stakes: the one who is mother and father is also the only crossing out of birth and death. Having gathered everything into Krishna, he refuses to take any of it back; the soul that has found its rest will not turn away again.

Prayer, asking for an heir to the vow

मराठी मूळ

कृपा करावी भगवंतें । ऐसा शिष्य द्यावा मातें ॥१॥
माझें व्रत जो चालवी । त्यासि द्यावें त्वां पालवी ॥ध्रु.॥
व्हावा ब्रम्हज्ञानी गुंडा । तिहीं लोकीं ज्याचा झेंडा ॥२॥
तुका तुका हाका मारी । माझ्या विठोबाच्या द्वारीं ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

May the Lord be gracious and grant me such a disciple who will carry forward my vow; may you shelter him under your wing. May he become a knower of Brahman, with his banner raised across the three worlds.

Says Tuka, let him call out my name at the door of my Vitthoba.

IN PLAIN WORDS

May the Lord be gracious and give me such a disciple. Give me one who will carry my vow forward. Shelter him under your wing. Let him become a knower of Brahman, with his banner raised across the three worlds. Tuka says: let him call out my name at the door of my Vithoba.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is not asking for a reward but for someone to come after him and carry on his vow of devotion. He asks the Lord both to grant such a disciple and to protect him, since the gift and its keeping both belong to grace. He wants this heir to be no small figure but a true knower of Brahman, his banner raised across all three worlds. The last line is the tenderest part: that the disciple, having risen so high, will still stand at Vithoba's door and call out the name of his own teacher.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am going to Varanasi; settle the matter of the cows, horses, and buffaloes. Trust me truly when I say that once I have gone I will not return.

Do not open my grain stores; you may eat the chaff and husks. Chase any beggars away with a stick.

If you invite Brahmins to feast, then cut off my head. I have vomited it all out; I have not spent a single coin.

Drink your buttermilk and water, and guard the butter and ghee carefully. I have no concern in my heart for wives and children and their plundering ways.

Says Tuka, I am straightforward and speak plainly just as things are.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am going to Varanasi. Settle the cows, the horses, the buffaloes. Believe me truly: once I have gone, I will not come back. Do not open my grain stores; you may eat the chaff and husks. If beggars come, take a stick to them. If you invite Brahmins to feast, then cut off my head. I have vomited it all out. I have not spent a single coin. Drink your buttermilk and water; guard the butter and ghee with care. There is nothing in my heart for wives and children and their grasping ways. Tuka says: I am straightforward, and I speak plainly just as things are.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a sharp, bitter farewell from a man renouncing the household and saying so without softening. Going to Varanasi is the old language for walking away for good, and he wants no doubt about it: he will not return. The cruel-sounding instructions, hoard the grain, beat off beggars, never feed a Brahmin, are aimed at the household's stinginess, the very pattern he is leaving behind, not held up as advice. He says he has vomited it all out, the whole tangle of property and family claims that he calls grasping. The point of self-examination is the grip itself: how a house and its anxieties can own a person until plain speech is the only way to break free.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Girding my loins firmly, I have confronted all-devouring Time and paved a path across the ocean of worldly existence. Come, come, all of you, small and great, men and women of every kind; no deliberation is needed, no one need worry.

Those entangled in desire and those sitting idle, those who chant and those who practice austerities, all are assembled here; the liberated and the seekers of liberation alike. Says Tuka, I have been sent into this world as a single recruit; I am the bearer of the Name.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I girded my loins tight. I stood up straight to all-devouring Time. I made a footpath across the ocean of worldly life. Come, come, all of you, small and great. Come, men and women of every kind. No weighing is needed. No one need worry. Those caught in desire, those sitting idle, those who chant, those who do austerities, all gather here. The freed and the seekers of freedom alike. Tuka says: I have been sent into this world as a single recruit. I am the bearer of the Name.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presents himself as a soldier who has stood up to death itself and beaten a path across the ocean of birth and death so that others can follow. The invitation is deliberately total: small and great, men and women, every kind of person, with no entrance exam and no need to qualify. He names them by their condition, the desire-bound, the lazy, the austere, the already free, precisely to say that none of these states bars the way. He claims a single commission, sent as one recruit into the world, and his whole equipment is the Name he carries and offers to all.

Mission, dwellers of Vaikuntha sent to serve

मराठी मूळ

आम्ही वैकुंठवासी । आलों या चि कारणासी । बोलिले जे ऋषी । साच भावें वर्ताव्या ॥१॥
झाडूं संतांचे मारग । आडरानें भरलें जग । उच्छिष्टाचा भाग । शेष उरलें तें सेवूं ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We are dwellers of Vaikuntha, come here for this very purpose: to live truly by the words the sages have spoken. We sweep clean the path of the saints, for the world has become overgrown with wild thickets; we will partake of whatever blessed remnants remain.

We beat the drum of devotion, striking dread into Death himself. Says Tuka, raise a triumphant cheer with great joy.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We are dwellers of Vaikuntha. We have come here for this one purpose: to live truly by what the sages spoke. We sweep clean the path of the saints, for the world has grown thick with wild thickets. Whatever blessed leavings remain, we will take them as our food. We beat the drum of devotion and strike dread into Death himself. Tuka says: raise a cry of victory with joy.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks for himself and his companions as souls come down from Vaikuntha on a single errand: to make the sages' words actually lived, not merely recited. The image of sweeping the saints' overgrown path names the work, clearing away the wild growth of neglect so the way of the holy ones can be walked again. Calling their food the leavings, the blessed remnants, marks their lowliness and their gladness in it; they want no more than what the path leaves over. The drum of devotion is loud on purpose, a public proclamation that frightens Death, and the closing shout turns the whole mission into a festival.

GATHA 0515 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, made mighty by surrender

मराठी मूळ

बळियाचे अंकित । आम्ही जालों बळिवंत ॥१॥
लाता हाणोनि संसारा । केला षडूर्मीचा मारा ॥ध्रु.॥
जन धन तन । केलें तृणाही समान ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे आतां । आम्ही मुक्तीचिया माथां ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By surrendering to the Mighty One, we have become mighty ourselves. We have kicked worldly life aside and conquered the six waves of affliction.

Wealth, people, and body have all been made equal to a blade of grass. Says Tuka, we now stand upon the very head of liberation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We belong wholly to the Mighty One. By that, we ourselves have become mighty. We have kicked worldly life aside. We have struck down the six waves of affliction. Wealth, people, the body: we have made them all equal to a blade of grass. Tuka says: now we stand upon the very head of liberation.

WHAT IT MEANS

The whole strength Tukaram boasts of is borrowed: he is mighty only because he belongs entirely to the Mighty One. From that surrender comes a freedom strong enough to kick aside worldly life and beat down the six inner forces, hunger, thirst, grief, delusion, old age, death, that toss a person about. Once those are conquered, the things people crave or fear, money, relations, the body itself, weigh no more than a blade of grass. The final image is daring on purpose: he does not merely reach liberation, he stands on its head, mastering even the goal.

GATHA 0516 Renunciation

Renunciation, nothing but the Name

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In this mortal world nothing pleases me except the name of Hari alone. My chitta is wearied by worldly affairs; the disgust sits deep within my heart like something vomited.

Gold and silver are no better than clay to me; diamonds and rubies are mere pebbles and stones. Says Tuka, women appear before me as nothing more than she-bears.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In this mortal world, nothing pleases me. Nothing, except the one name of Hari. My chitta is sick of worldly affairs. The disgust sits deep in my heart, like something already vomited. Gold and silver are clay to me. Diamonds and rubies are only pebbles and stones. Tuka says: women appear before me like she-bears.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures everything the world values against one thing, the name of Hari, and finds it all worthless. The disgust he describes is not a passing mood but settled, lodged in him like food already thrown up, which cannot be swallowed back. He runs through the usual objects of craving, precious metal, gems, the lure of beauty, and strips each of its shine: clay, pebbles, repellent. The harsh comparison is aimed at the grip of desire itself, not at any person; he is reporting how thoroughly the longing for the Name has emptied every rival attraction of its power.

GATHA 0517 The Moral Ideal

Moral counsel, the danger of desire

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे जरी अग्नि जाला साधु । परी पावे बाधूं संघष्टणें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Narayana, shun the company of women, who are wood, stone, and clay. In their presence one forgets God, devotion becomes impossible, and the greedy mind cannot be restrained.

Through the gateways of the senses comes death by way of sight and speech; beauty is truly the root of suffering. Says Tuka, even if one has become a saint as pure as fire, mere contact can still cause harm.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O Narayana, I do not want the company of women, who are made of wood, stone, and clay. In their presence God is forgotten and worship cannot be done; the greedy mind will not be held back. Through the eyes and through the senses comes death; beauty is truly the root of sorrow. Tuka says: even one who has become a saint as pure as fire can still be burned by mere contact.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is asking God to keep him from a craving he does not trust himself around, and the heat is on his own mind, not on women as persons. The point is the grip of desire on the senses: when the greedy mind is roused it forgets God and cannot be reined in, so the eyes and ears become doors through which a kind of death enters. By calling the body wood, stone, and clay he is trying to break the spell of beauty he names as the root of sorrow. The closing image is the sharpest and the most humble: even fire-pure holiness can be scorched by contact, so he asks to be kept from the occasion rather than trusting his own strength.

GATHA 0518 The Moral Ideal

Moral firmness, refusing the temptress

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे तुज पाहिजे भ्रतार । तरी काय नर थोडे जाले ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I regard another man's wife as I would Rakhumai herself; this has been my firm resolve from the very beginning. Go away, O woman, do not trouble yourself; we are not the kind of servants of Vishnu who would fall.

I cannot bear to witness your downfall; do not utter such wicked words. Says Tuka, if you need a husband, are there so few men in the world?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Another man's wife I hold as I would hold Rakhumai herself. This has been my fixed resolve from the very start. Go away, woman; do not trouble yourself. We are not the kind of servants of Vishnu who fall. I cannot bear to watch your downfall. Do not speak such wicked words. Tuka says: if you need a husband, are there so few men in the world?

WHAT IT MEANS

Here Tukaram puts the resolve into action, turning away a woman who comes to tempt him. He has long held that any other man's wife is to him as sacred as Rakhumai, the Lord's own consort, so the boundary is settled before the test arrives. His refusal is firm but not contemptuous: he says he cannot bear to see her fall, naming her welfare and not only his own purity. The closing line lets her go without cruelty, pointing her back to the ordinary world where, if she truly wants a husband, there is no shortage of men, only this one path she may not take.

GATHA 0519 Longing and Separation

Longing, why have you forgotten me

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Vitthala, you who cherish devotion, who are tender as a cow to her calf toward the humble and full of mercy, O Mother. Have you forgotten me on account of some fault of mine? What can I do about my poor fate? Says Tuka, burn away my accumulated destiny and grant me the meeting that is rightfully due.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You who cherish devotion, tender to the lowly. O Vitthala, merciful one, you are my mother. Have you forgotten me? For what fault of mine? My fate is poor; what can I do about it? Tuka says: burn away the destiny I have stored up. Do what is fitting, and grant me the meeting.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram begins by naming Vitthala's own nature, the cherisher of devotion, mother to the lowly, full of mercy, and then asks how such a one could forget him. He does not accuse God; he turns the question on himself and his fate, wondering what fault has caused the silence. The accumulated destiny he asks to be burned is the store of past karma that he feels is keeping him apart from the Lord. His final plea leaves the remedy to God: do what is fitting, undo the obstacle, and grant the meeting that mercy itself seems to owe.

GATHA 0520 Longing and Separation

Longing, you are my only kin

मराठी मूळ

तुजविण मज कोण वो सोयरें । आणीक दुसरें पांडुरंगे ॥१॥
लागलीसे आस पाहा तुझें वास । रात्री वो दिवस लेखीं बोटीं ॥२॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who is kin to me besides you, O Panduranga? There is no other. I wait longingly for your presence, counting the days and nights on my fingers.

No work appeals to me, no worldly occupation holds my interest. Says Tuka, this alone is my constant meditation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who is kin to me but you, Panduranga? There is no other. I wait for you. I watch for your coming. I count the nights and days on my fingers. No work tastes sweet to me. This business does not hold me. Tuka says: this alone is my meditation, always.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips his whole life down to one relation. He tells Panduranga that no one else counts as family; everything else has fallen away. The waiting is physical: he counts off the nights and days on his fingers, the way someone counts down to a loved one's return. Work no longer interests him, not because he is idle, but because his attention has gone entirely to one place. He calls that fixed attention his only meditation, so that even his longing has become his practice.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What I must ask of you are intimate matters of the soul, whispered confidences. You who indulge the whims of the humble, O compassionate Vitthala, O Mother.

My life and my devotion are placed at your feet; you alone are everything to me in all places. Do not let even the slightest breeze of another's company touch me; I will not go to anyone else's house.

All power rests with you alone, and I know that whatever I ask, you will give. Says Tuka, therefore I lay out my plea before you, rubbing my eyes and weeping.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What I ask of you, I ask in private. I tell you the secret of my heart. You indulge the whims of the lowly, O tender one; O merciful Vitthala, O Mother. My life and my love I have laid at your feet. You alone are everything to me, in every place. Do not let another's company touch me, not even like a breeze. I do not go to anyone else's house. All power rests with you alone. You know it, and you will give what I ask. So I lay my plea before you. Tuka says: I rub my eyes and weep.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram comes to Vitthal the way a small child comes to its mother, asking with the certainty that he will be heard. He calls Vitthal Mother and asks in private, because what he wants is not a thing but the secret of his own heart. He renounces every other refuge: no other company, no other house, not even a stray breeze of attachment to anything else. His ground for asking is simple: all power belongs to Vitthal alone, so there is no point begging elsewhere. The poem ends not with an argument but with a child's weapon, tears, as Tuka rubs his eyes and cries until he is answered.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What auspicious occasion are you waiting for, what pilgrimage date? My chitta has been in agony. Send me the gift of your grace swiftly, O Panduranga; do not hold anything back.

Do not be angry with me, even though I am full of faults and offenses. Why do you make innocent children cry, and wise elders too, in this manner? Why do you stand with hands on your hips? Comfort your little darlings instead.

Says Tuka, I will now grab hold of the hem of your garment and never let go.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What holy day are you waiting for, what pilgrimage date? My mind is in agony. Send me your gift; send it quickly. Hold nothing back, Panduranga. Do not be angry with me because I am full of faults and wrongs. Why do you make innocent children cry, and wise elders too, the same way? Why do you stand there with your hands on your hips? Comfort your little ones instead. Tuka says: now I have grabbed the hem of your garment. I will not let go.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is impatient and says so plainly, asking why Vitthal keeps delaying grace as if waiting for some special date on the calendar. He admits he is full of faults, but turns that into a reason for mercy rather than a barrier to it. The image of God standing with hands on the hips is Vitthal's famous pose at Pandhari; Tukaram reads it as God holding back, and begs him instead to bend down and comfort his crying children. Then he stops asking and simply takes hold: he grips the hem of Vitthal's garment and declares he will never let go. The prayer ends as a refusal to leave until the embrace comes.

GATHA 0523 Longing and Separation

Longing, the silence of God

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why, O God, do you not speak a single word to me? Why do you treat me with such contempt? My life hangs in my throat as I wait for a word from you, yet you appear utterly indifferent. You have wrapped yourself up tightly in this dark blanket of silence.

Is it that you cannot bear the taint of my presence?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why, O God, do you not say a single word to me? Why do you treat me with such scorn? My life hangs in my throat as I wait for your word, and you look on as though you do not care. You have pulled the dark blanket of your silence tight over yourself. Is it that you cannot bear the stain of my touch?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is in the worst part of waiting: the silence. God will not even speak, and the silence reads to him as contempt. His life feels lodged in his throat, ready to leave, while God seems wrapped up and indifferent under a dark covering. In his pain he names the fear underneath the longing: maybe God stays silent because he, Tukaram, is too impure to be touched. The abhanga does not resolve this; it leaves the devotee held in the unanswered question, which is itself the heart of the longing.

Longing, the unanswered door

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What does a poor man know of proper conduct? Greatness has turned its face dark, O God. I call out but no one at the door will listen; as if the house stands empty with no one inside.

When a guest arrives, offering a few kind words of welcome costs nothing. Says Tuka, this befits you, O Hari; we are not so shameless as you think.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What does a poor man know of proper conduct? Greatness has turned its face dark, O God. I call out, and no one at the door will listen, as though the house stands empty, no one inside. When a guest arrives, a few words of welcome cost nothing. Tuka says: this suits you, Hari; but we are not as shameless as you make us out to be.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram stands at God's door like a beggar and gets no answer, so he turns the failure of hospitality back on the host. He admits a poor man may not know the fine rules of conduct, but a kind word to a guest costs the host nothing, and even that is withheld. The house seems empty, as if no one is home, which for a devotee is a sharp complaint against a present and powerful God. With gentle sting he says such treatment may befit Hari's grandeur, but it should not make the devotee out to be shameless for simply asking. The reproach is the prayer: he keeps knocking by accusing the silence.

GATHA 0525 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the Name over all powers

मराठी मूळ

आम्ही मागों ऐसें नाहीं तुजपाशीं । जरीं तूं भीतोसि पांडुरंगा ॥१॥
पाहें विचारूनि आहे तुज ठावें । आम्ही धालों नावें तुझ्या एका ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका म्हणे जाऊं वैकुंठा चालत । बैसोनि निश्चिंत सुख भोगू ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We do not ask for anything you need fear giving, O Panduranga. Consider it carefully; you already know: we are satisfied with your name alone.

Supernatural powers and accomplishments are your chief treasure, but they are worthless to us compared to devotion. Says Tuka, we could walk to Vaikuntha itself and sit there enjoying bliss without a care.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We do not ask of you anything you would fear to give, Panduranga. Think it over; you already know: we are content with your name alone. Riddhi and siddhi, all your powers and attainments, are your chief treasure. To us they are husks before devotion. Tuka says: we could walk to Vaikuntha and sit there, free of care, enjoying bliss.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reassures God that his asking is safe, because he wants nothing God would be reluctant to part with. What he wants is only the Name, and the Name costs God nothing. He refuses the standard prizes of religion, the supernatural powers and accomplishments that others crave, calling them empty husks next to the joy of devotion. By saying he could simply stroll into Vaikuntha and sit content, he claims that love of the Name already carries him where powers cannot. The whole point is a reversal: the devotee holds the real treasure, and the powers are the small thing.

Longing, the form over Brahman-knowledge

मराठी मूळ

न लगे हें मज तुझें ब्रम्हज्ञान । गोजिरें सगुण रूप पुरे ॥१॥
लागला उशीर पतितपावना । विसरोनि वचना गेलासि या ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका म्हणे नको रागेजों विठ्ठला । उठीं देई मला भेटी आतां ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have no need of your knowledge of Brahman; your beautiful form with all its sweetness is enough for me. You are taking too long, O Redeemer of the fallen; have you forgotten your promise? I have burned my worldly life and sit waiting in your courtyard, yet you show no concern in your heart.

Says Tuka, do not be angry, O Vitthala; rise and give me your embrace now.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have no use for your knowledge of Brahman. Your lovely form with all its sweetness is enough for me. You are late, O Savior of the fallen. Have you forgotten what you said? I have burned up my worldly life and sit in your courtyard, and you keep no thought of me in your heart. Tuka says: do not be angry, Vitthala. Get up and give me your embrace now.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram refuses the highest abstraction on offer, the knowledge of Brahman, and asks instead for the personal, visible, sweet form of Vitthal. He has burned his bridges, given up worldly life, and now sits waiting in the courtyard with nothing to fall back on. So he reminds God of a promise that seems forgotten and presses on the title Savior of the fallen, since he has made himself exactly the fallen one who must be saved. There is impatience and even reproach in it, but it ends in tenderness: do not be angry, just rise and embrace me. The plea is for nearness, not for understanding.

GATHA 0527 The Power of the Name

The Name, the devotee tastes what God cannot

मराठी मूळ

कमोदिनी काय जाणे तो परिमळ । भ्रमर सकळ भोगीतसे ॥१॥
तैसें तुज ठावें नाहीं तुझें नाम । आम्ही च तें प्रेमसुख जाणों ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका म्हणे मुक्ताफळ शिंपीपोटीं । नाहीं त्याची भेटी भोग तिये ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Does the night-lotus know its own fragrance? It is the bee who enjoys it fully. In the same way, you do not know the sweetness of your own name; it is we who taste that bliss of love.

The mother eats grass, while the child savors the sweetness of her milk; what one cannot use serves another. Says Tuka, the pearl is born in the oyster's belly, yet the oyster never knows its splendor.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Does the night-lotus know its own fragrance? It is the bee who enjoys it fully. So you do not know the sweetness of your own name; only we know that bliss of love. The mother eats grass, the calf tastes the sweetness of her milk. What one cannot use serves another. Tuka says: the pearl is born in the oyster's belly, yet the oyster never knows its splendor.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a bold claim: the devotee tastes a sweetness in God's Name that God himself does not taste. He proves it with everyday images. The flower holds the fragrance but the bee enjoys it; the cow eats plain grass but the calf drinks the sweet milk; the oyster grows the pearl but never sees how lovely it is. In each case the one who produces the treasure is not the one who relishes it. So the Name belongs to God, but the joy of the Name is the lover's portion. It is a tender boast that turns devotion into the one experience God has handed over entirely to those who love him.

GATHA 0528 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, weary of liberation itself

मराठी मूळ

काय सांगों तुझ्या चरणांच्या सुखा । अनुभव ठाउका नाहीं तुज ॥१॥
बोलतां हें कैसें वाटे खरेपण । अमृताचे गुण अमृतासी ॥ध्रु.॥
आम्ही एकएका ग्वाही मायपुतें । जाणों तें निरुतें सुख दोघें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे आम्हां मोक्षाचा कांटाळा । कां तुम्ही गोपाळा नेणां ऐसें ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How can I describe the joy of your feet? Even you do not know that experience. How strange it sounds to speak of it aloud, as if telling nectar about the qualities of nectar.

We are like mother and child who bear witness to each other; we both know that intimate joy. Says Tuka, we are wearied by the thought of liberation itself. How is it, O Gopala, that you do not know this?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How can I tell the joy of your feet? You yourself do not know that experience. How can it even sound true to speak of it, like telling nectar about the qualities of nectar? We are mother and child, each a witness for the other. We two know that joy for certain. Tuka says: we are sick of the very thought of liberation. How is it, Gopala, that you do not know this?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a joy so complete it cannot be reported, only shared. The sweetness of God's feet is like nectar trying to describe nectar; words double back on themselves. He says even God does not know this taste, because the bliss belongs to the relation between them, witnessed by both like a mother and child who alone know what passes between them. Most strikingly, he says he is tired of the idea of moksha, of liberation, because union in love is already fuller than any release the scriptures promise. He ends by teasing Gopala for not seeming to know the very thing that the devotee knows by heart.

GATHA 0529 Devotion to Vitthal

Adoration, the form that contents the mind

मराठी मूळ

देखोनियां तुझ्या रूपाचा आकार । उभा कटीं कर ठेवूनियां ॥१॥
तेणें माझ्या चित्ता होतें समाधान । वाटतें चरण न सोडावे ॥ध्रु.॥
मुखें गातों गीत वाजवितों टाळी । नाचतों राउळीं प्रेमसुखें ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे मज तुझ्या नामापुढें । तुश हें बापुडें सकळी काळ ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Seeing the form of your figure standing with hands placed upon your hips, my chitta finds perfect contentment and I feel I should never let go of your feet. I sing songs with my lips, clap my hands, and dance in your temple, overflowing with the joy of love.

Says Tuka, before your name, all of time itself is a humble, trifling thing.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Seeing the shape of your form, standing with your hands on your hips, my mind comes to rest. I feel I must never let go of your feet. With my mouth I sing the song; I clap my hands; I dance in your temple in the joy of love. Tuka says: before your name, all of time itself is a poor, small thing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at Vitthal in his familiar pose, standing with hands on the hips, and that single sight settles his restless mind completely. The contentment turns at once into clinging: he never wants to release those feet. From stillness it overflows into motion, singing, clapping, dancing in the temple, the body joining the joy the mind has found. The closing line sets the scale of it all: measured against the Name, even time, the great devourer of everything, shrinks to something small and pitiable. Adoration here is both deep rest and overflowing dance.

GATHA 0530 Renunciation

Renunciation, pleasure and pain are one

मराठी मूळ

आतां येणेंविण नाहीं आम्हां चाड । कोण बडबड करी वांयां ॥१॥
सुख तें चि दुःख पुण्यपाप खरें । हें तों आम्हां बरें कळों आलें ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Beyond this, we have no other desire. Who babbles on about other things in vain? Pleasure itself ise same as pain, and merit the same as sin: this much has become clear to us.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now, apart from this, we have no need of anything. Who babbles on in vain about other things? Pleasure is the same as pain; merit and sin are alike. This much has become clear to us.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram states the end of all wanting in a few lines. Apart from this one thing, his devotion, he needs nothing, and he brushes aside all the busy talk that chases after other goods as idle babble. Then he names what he has seen: pleasure and pain turn out to be the same, and so do merit and sin. He is not preaching this as theory; he says it has simply become clear, the settled fruit of his experience. Once the pairs that drive ordinary life lose their pull, there is nothing left to chase but God.

GATHA 0531 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, hidden in plain sight

मराठी मूळ

बोलों अबोलणें मरोनियां जिणें । असोनि नसणें जनि आम्हां ॥१॥
भोगीं त्याग जाला संगीं च असंग । तोडियेले लाग माग दोन्ही ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे नव्हें दिसतों मी तैसा । पुसणें तें पुसा पांडुरंगा ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To speak is to be silent; to die is to truly live; to exist among people is to not exist at all. In the midst of enjoyment, renunciation has happened; in company itself, detachment has taken hold, and both pursuit and attachment are severed.

Says Tuka, I am not what I appear to be; if you wish to know the truth, ask Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To speak is to keep silent; to die is to truly live; to live among people is not to exist at all. In the midst of enjoying, renunciation has happened; in company, I am uncompanioned. Both the trail ahead and the trail behind are cut. Tuka says: I am not what I look like. If you want to know, ask Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the strange double life of one who is awake. His words are also silence; the death of his old self is his real life; he moves among people while no longer belonging to the world they live in. Even while he enjoys things, the grip of wanting has let go, and even in company he stays inwardly alone with God, with the trails of past and future both cut so nothing pulls him forward or back. He admits this cannot be read from the outside: he is not what he appears to be. So he hands the verdict to God himself, telling the listener to ask Panduranga what he truly is.

GATHA 0532 Appeals and Exhortations

Teaching, do not burn the boat

मराठी मूळ

अधिकार तैसा दावियेले मार्ग । चालतां हें मग कळों येतें ॥१॥
जाळूं नये नाव पावलेनि पार । मागील आधार बहुतांचा ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे रोग वैदाचे अंगीं । नाहीं करी जगीं उपकार ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The path is shown according to one's capacity; its truth becomes clear only when one walks it. One should not burn the boat after reaching the far shore, for it serves as a support for the many still crossing.

Says Tuka, when the physician himself carries the disease, he does no good to the world.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The path is shown to each one according to his capacity. As you walk it, the truth of it becomes clear. Do not burn the boat once you have reached the far shore. Many behind you still lean on it to cross. Tuka says: when the disease lives in the physician's own body, he does the world no good.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is speaking about how a teacher should carry his learning. A path is given to each seeker only as far as he can hold it, and only walking it makes its truth plain. So even after you cross, do not destroy the means that carried you: others are still crossing, and the boat is their support. The last line names the test for any guide: a healer who is himself sick can heal no one, so the teacher must first be free of the very thing he treats.

GATHA 0533 The Saints

Saints, God living in the world

मराठी मूळ

संवसार तीहीं केला पाठमोरा । नाहीं द्रव्य दारा जया चित्तीं ॥१॥

तुका म्हणे देहें दिला एकसरें । जयासि दुसरें नाहीं मग ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who have turned their backs on worldly life, who hold no desire for wealth or spouse in their chitta, in whom neither good fortune nor bad provokes elation or resentment: they have become Janardana himself, living in the world. Says Tuka, having surrendered the body once and for all, nothing second remains for them.

IN PLAIN WORDS

They have turned their backs on worldly life. There is no wealth, no wife, in their mind. Good and bad, gain and loss, stir no joy and no resentment in them. They have become Janardana himself, living here in the world. Tuka says: they gave the body away once and for all. For them nothing second remains.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing what a true saint actually is. He names it by subtraction: no craving for wealth or spouse, no swing of elation or resentment when fortune turns good or bad. When all of that is gone, what is left is not a holy man but God walking in the world, Janardana himself. The last line lands the claim: such a one surrendered the body completely, and so for him there is no second thing, no other besides God.

GATHA 0534 Worldly Life

Worldly life, the burden of self and other

मराठी मूळ

देहबुद्धि वसे लोभ जयां चित्तीं । आपुलें जाणती परावें जे ॥१॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those whose chitta is steeped in body-consciousness and greed, who distinguish between 'mine' and 'another's,' need provisions for their journey and suffer misery because they live by falsehood. Says Tuka, the one scorched by the sun seeks shade in order to protect what is righteous.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Their mind is full of body-thought and greed. They divide the world into mine and another's. Such people must carry provisions when they travel. They live by falsehood, and so they suffer. Tuka says: to guard what is right, the man scorched by the sun goes seeking shade.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is contrasting the life weighed down by ego with the life set free. As long as the mind is sunk in body-consciousness and greed, it keeps splitting reality into mine and yours, and that division is a falsehood that brings its own suffering. Such a person can never travel light: he must always carry his store of provisions, his anxious securities. The closing image points to the remedy by analogy: just as the sun-scorched man seeks shade, one burned by this false way should seek the cool refuge of what is truly righteous.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Time has devoured every form through the cycle of creation and destruction. The seed, the sprout, is concealed in the belly of the Infinite One from beginning to end.

Says Tuka, sound pervades the sky, yet its secret remains beyond understanding.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Time has eaten every form. Creation rises and is destroyed, made and unmade. The seed, the sprout, lies hidden in the belly of the Infinite One, from first to last, in him alone. Tuka says: sound fills the whole sky. This mystery is like that. It cannot be grasped.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is pointing at what stands behind all change. Every shape that appears is devoured by time through the endless turning of creation and dissolution; nothing made survives. Yet the seed of all of it stays hidden in the Infinite One, from beginning to end, present in that One alone. The final image carries the weight: as sound pervades the whole sky and yet cannot be seized in the hand, this mystery is everywhere and still beyond the mind's grasp.

GATHA 0536 The Power of the Name

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In this dark age no other remedy avails; one must hold fast to the feet of Vitthoba. All merit resides within those feet, and all sins are destroyed thereby.

Everything is set free in every age; men and women and their entire lineages are redeemed. There is no fixed time or occasion, no suffering of the womb; simply uttering the Name with one's mouth is enough.

Says Tuka, nothing needs to be abandoned; I say this with sincerity to all who will receive it with faith.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In this dark age no other remedy works. Hold fast to the feet of Vithoba. All merit lies in those feet. By them all sin is cut away. In every age everything is set free. Men and women and their whole families are saved. There is no fixed time, no fixed hour, no pain of the womb. Just speak the one Name with your mouth. Tuka says: nothing has to be given up. I tell this in sincerity to all who will take it in faith.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the single sufficient practice for the present age. He says no other method holds, and reduces it all to one act: cling to Vithoba's feet, where every merit is gathered and every sin is undone. The Name needs no qualification, no proper hour, no ordeal; simply uttering it with the mouth rescues whole families. The closing line removes the last objection people raise: you do not have to renounce or abandon anything first, and he offers this in earnest to anyone willing to receive it with faith.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why does my plight not stir compassion in you, when you dwell so close, right within my heart? O Narayana, O Formless and Faithful One, I have cried out in anguish until my throat is raw, yet you seem not to hear. Why has my mind not found rest? Why do the senses refuse to be still? Says Tuka, why do you hold this grudge, O Panduranga? I cannot tell whether my sins have yet been exhausted.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why does my plight not stir your pity, when you live so close, right inside my heart? O Narayana, formless and faithful one, I have cried out until my throat is torn, and still you do not seem to hear. Why has my mind found no rest? Why will the senses not grow still? Tuka says: why do you hold this grudge, Panduranga? I cannot tell whether my sins are not yet spent.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praying from inside an unanswered cry, and the ache is sharpened by nearness: the God he begs from dwells in his own heart, yet seems deaf. He has worn his throat raw with calling, and still the mind will not rest and the senses will not be quiet. He even half-accuses the Lord of holding a grudge. The last line shows where he finally turns the suspicion: not on God's coldness but on himself, wondering whether his own sins are simply not yet exhausted.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Lord of the lowly, your fame as protector of all creation, who champions the cause of those who surrender, fills the moving and the still. The glorious deeds the Puranas proclaim about you, we have seen them proven true before our very eyes.

You cannot bear to see your devotees suffer any want; that is why you stand there, ready. With discus, mace, and countless weapons in hand, you rush to fill whatever is lacking.

Says Tuka, devotion is the reason you take birth in this world. This body of mine was always meant for your feet; now what more can I wave before you and cast aside? I have no devotion worthy enough to serve you; even if I offer my life, that too belongs to you.

When I look within, I see nothing of my own that I might offer to you, O Infinite One. Says Tuka, I can find no way to repay your kindness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Lord of the lowly, your name as protector fills all that moves and all that stands still. You take the side of those who surrender. The mighty deeds the Puranas sing of you, we have seen them proved true with our own eyes. You cannot bear to see your servants lack anything. That is why you stand there, ready. Discus and mace in hand, countless weapons, you run to fill whatever is missing. Tuka says: devotion is the reason you take birth. This body was always meant for your feet. What more can I now wave before you and throw away? I have no devotion good enough to serve you. Even if I offer my life, that life is yours too. When I look within, I see nothing of my own to give you, O Infinite One. Tuka says: now I find no way left to repay your kindness.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram begins in praise and ends, helplessly, in debt. He honors Vitthal as the sworn protector of the lowly and of all who surrender, and says the Puranas' old stories of rescue have come true before his own eyes: the Lord cannot stand to see a devotee in want, so he stands ready, armed, rushing to supply whatever is lacking. Then the poem turns the tribute back on the singer. Everything he might offer in return, his body, his devotion, even his life, already belongs to God, so he has nothing of his own to give. The closing confession is the point: faced with such kindness, the devotee finds no way at all to repay it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I find no pleasure in worldly comforts, I have no use for honor, and people will not leave me alone; what am I to do? Comforts of the body scorch my skin; fine delicacies taste like poison. I cannot bear to hear anyone's praise or have my greatness described; it makes my soul writhe.

Tell me some means by which I may reach you; do not entangle me in mirages. Says Tuka, work now for my true welfare and pull me out of this fire.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I find no pleasure in this. I have no use for honor. People will not leave me alone. What am I to do? Comforts of the body scorch my skin. Fine rich food tastes like poison. I cannot bear to hear praise, to have my greatness described. It makes my soul writhe. Tell me some way to reach you. Do not tangle me in mirages. Tuka says: now do what is truly good for me. Pull me, burning, out of the fire.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is begging to be rescued from the very things people chase. Honor, comfort, rich food, praise: each one repels him, scorching his skin, tasting like poison, making his soul twist when he hears it. The only thing he wants is a way to reach God, and he asks not to be deceived by mirages, the false satisfactions that look like fulfillment and are not. The closing cry names the stakes plainly: he is on fire, and he asks God to do what is actually good for him and drag him out.

GATHA 0540 Faith and Trust

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let there be nothing to eat, let no children be born to me, so long as Narayana is merciful. Let the body be tormented, let misfortune strike, so long as Narayana remains in my heart.

Says Tuka, everything in this world is perishable; to remember Gopala alone is the true good.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let there be nothing to eat. Let no children be born to me. Only let Narayana be merciful. Let the body be tormented. Let misfortune strike. Only let Narayana stay in my heart. Tuka says: all of this is perishable. To remember Gopala alone is the true good.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is setting his single condition against everything else and accepting the cost. He will give up food, offspring, the body's safety, all of it, on one term only: that Narayana be merciful and remain in his heart. The structure of the prayer makes the priority brutal and clear, hunger and ruin counted as nothing beside God's presence. The reason is given last: every one of those things is perishable and passing, so to keep remembering Gopala is the only good that actually holds.

Renunciation, the body cannot be saved

मराठी मूळ

पिंड पोसावे हें अधमाचें ज्ञान । विलास मिष्टान्न करूनियां ॥१॥
शरीर रक्षावें हा धर्म बोलती । काय असे हातीं तयाचिया ॥ध्रु.॥
क्षणभंगुर हें जाय न कळतां । ग्रास गिळि सत्ता नाहीं हातीं ॥२॥
कर्वतिलीं देहें कापियेलें मांस । गेले वनवासा शुकादिक ॥३॥
तुका म्हणे राज्य करितां जनक । अग्नीमाजी एक पाय जळे ॥४॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To pamper the body with luxuries and fine food is the wisdom of the lowest kind. They say preserving the body is dharma, but what power does anyone truly have over it? This fragile thing perishes without warning; one cannot even swallow a morsel by one's own authority.

Shuka and others sawed through their bodies and cut away their flesh, then departed into the forest. Says Tuka, even while Janaka ruled his kingdom, one of his feet was burning in fire.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To pamper the body with luxuries and rich food is the wisdom of the lowest sort. They say guarding the body is dharma. But what power does anyone hold over it? This fragile thing breaks without warning. You cannot even swallow one mouthful by your own authority. Shuka and others sawed through their bodies, cut away their flesh, and went off into the forest. Tuka says: even as Janaka ruled his kingdom, one of his feet was burning in the fire.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is attacking the project of saving and serving the body. To feed it luxuries and call that wisdom is, he says, the lowest understanding; and the claim that protecting the body is dharma collapses once you see how little control anyone has over it. The body is fragile, it breaks unannounced, and a person cannot so much as guarantee his next swallow. Against this he sets the detachment of the realized: sages like Shuka treated the body as nothing, and Janaka could rule a whole kingdom while inwardly unattached, as a king at his ease with one foot already in the fire. The point is self-examination: stop staking your life on a thing you do not own.

Devotion, the body sworn to the Name

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if someone should cut off my head, O tongue, do not speak any name other than Panduranga's. This is my plea to all my senses: do not turn away from the Lord.

Let these ears hear no one else's words; let these eyes gaze upon nothing else. O mind, remain steadfast and undivided at his feet.

Come, hands and feet, do this one task: bow before my Vitthoba. Says Tuka, what have any of you to fear? Narayana is our protector.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even if someone cuts off my head, O tongue, do not speak any name but Panduranga's. This is my plea to all my senses: do not turn away from the Lord. Let these ears hear no one else's words. Let these eyes look at nothing else. O mind, stay unbroken at his feet, settled and one-pointed. Come, hands and feet, do this one task: bow before my Vithoba. Tuka says: what have any of you to fear? Narayana is our protector.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is mustering his own body and senses like a vow taken under threat. He commands the tongue to keep the Name even if his head is struck off, and goes part by part, ears, eyes, mind, hands, feet, ordering each to attend to nothing but the Lord and to bow before Vithoba. It reads as a discipline of total inward devotion, the whole person turned single-pointed at God's feet. The closing line answers the fear such a vow might raise: none of these faculties need be afraid, because Narayana is their protector.

Social criticism, the false saints

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O God, do whatever pleases you with me, but I will never call those people saints who have become slaves to wealth, status, and the desire for worldly acquisition, who are ruled by pride and ambition. Let them be revered by the world; I will sort out the truly wise from the frauds, those who are blind despite their learning, mere beasts of burden.

Says Tuka, I hold no fear in my heart when it comes to condemning such pretenders.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do with me whatever you please, God, gladly. But these people I will not call saints with my mouth. They labor to gather kingdoms and wealth. They are slaves to show and to status, ruled by their own craving. Let the world worship them. I will sort the truly wise from the frauds, the men blind despite their learning, the beasts that only carry loads. Tuka says: I hold no fear in my heart when it comes to condemning such pretenders.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is refusing to flatter holy reputations that are hollow. He hands himself over to God's will, but draws one hard line: he will not call these men saints. He names the pattern, hunger for kingdoms and wealth, enslavement to display and status, the rule of one's own ambition, and says worldly worship of such figures changes nothing. He claims the right to separate the genuinely wise from the frauds, those learned yet blind, carrying their knowledge like pack animals carry a load. The point turns toward self-examination as much as accusation: it is the pattern of pride and acquisition that is condemned, and he says he is unafraid to call it out.

Social criticism, the false saint

मराठी मूळ

म्हणविती ऐसे आइकतों संत । न देखीजे होत डोळां कोणीं ॥१॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I hear people call themselves saints, yet none can be seen with one's own eyes. Who would place trust in such people? True substance reveals itself only under scrutiny.

In the rainy season every ditch becomes a river, but when the rains stop, not a drop remains. Hailstones look like diamonds from afar.

Says Tuka, the deception lasts only until you hold them close.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I hear people call themselves saints. But I see none with my own eyes. Who would trust such people? The real substance shows itself only when you test it. In the rainy season every ditch swells into a river; when the rain stops, not a drop is left. Hailstones look like diamonds from far away. Tuka says: the trick lasts only until you hold them close.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is warning against trusting a holy reputation that has not been tested. Anyone can claim the title of saint; the claim proves nothing, because the real worth of a person only shows under scrutiny. He gives two pictures: the monsoon ditch that roars like a river while the rains last and runs dry the moment they stop, and the hailstone that glitters like a diamond from a distance and melts in your hand. The point lands on the reader as much as on the boaster: do not be dazzled from afar, and do not be the swollen ditch yourself. Look closely, and what is hollow falls apart.

Social criticism, the costumed devotee

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One puts on excessive airs and makes a show of pointing a finger. He is a costumed actor, not a true Vaishnava but a sycophant but a fraud.

He supports one person, worships another, and torments someone else. Says Tuka, wherever compassion for all beings is absent, there is no true devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He makes a great show. He points a finger and plays a part. He is a costumed actor, not a true Vaishnava, only a flatterer. He praises one man, worships another, and torments a third. Tuka says: where there is no compassion for all beings, there is no devotion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the gap between the show of devotion and its one real mark. The man here performs piety like an actor in costume, pointing fingers and playing favorites: praising one person, flattering another, harassing a third. None of that is Vaishnava faith, only sycophancy dressed as religion. The test Tukaram applies is simple and severe: bhutadaya, compassion toward all living beings. Where that is absent, the costume is empty, however loud the performance; and the warning is for anyone tempted to mistake religious display for the thing itself.

Social criticism, religion for the belly

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Performers who act for their belly are not worth watching; their art is shaped by the senses and leads back to the senses. How can spiritual truth flourish when the mind is greedy and the show of begging is hollow? They enact the stories of God's deeds as clever tricks to enchant people.

Says Tuka, when desire lingers in the heart, both performer and audience share the same road to ruin.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not watch performers who act for their belly. Their art is shaped by the senses and leads back to the senses. How can spiritual truth grow when the mind is greedy and the begging is a hollow act? They act out the deeds of God as clever tricks, to enchant people. Tuka says: when desire stays in the heart, the performer and the watcher walk the same road to ruin.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is attacking the use of sacred stories as a livelihood, a performance staged to win an audience and fill a stomach. When the mind behind the show is greedy, the senses both drive it and feed it, so no spiritual truth can take root; even the holy deeds of God become tricks to charm a crowd. The sharp turn comes at the end: the audience is not innocent. If desire lingers in your own heart, watching such a show feeds the same hunger, and performer and spectator share the same fall. The verse asks the listener to examine what they have come for.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let those who bark keep barking; one should never learn their ways. The faithful must never take the words of the wicked as truth.

With whatever strength you possess, expose and humiliate those scoundrels. Says Tuka, there is no sin in punishing such people.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let those who bark keep barking. Do not learn their ways. The faithful must never take the words of the wicked as true. With whatever strength you have, expose and shame the scoundrels. Tuka says: there is no sin in punishing such people.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is steeling the devotee against slander. He compares hostile detractors to barking dogs: let them bark, but do not pick up their habits, and never accept the wicked man's word as truth. Then he sharpens it into a charge to act, to expose and shame those who corrupt others, with whatever strength you have. His blunt closing line, that there is no sin in punishing such people, is aimed at the harm itself and at the duty to protect the faithful from it, not at hatred of any soul. The fight is against the pattern of deceit, not against the person as a person.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

While performing japa, one whom society had cast out came and sat down near me. I need not look around at the world; let me keep sacred ash upon my body.

The company of the crooked infects even the communal meal. Says Tuka, seek Brahman free from the entanglement of ritual action.

IN PLAIN WORDS

While I did my japa, one whom the world had cast out came and sat near me. I need not look around at the world; let me keep the sacred ash on my own body. The company of the crooked spoils even the shared meal. Tuka says: seek Brahman, with action set free from attachment.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is turning a moment of social tension into counsel about where to keep your eyes. Mid prayer, someone the world rejects sits down beside him, and his answer is not to scan and judge the world around him but to keep the sacred ash on his own body, to mind his own discipline. He grants that bad company can corrupt even something as ordinary and shared as a common meal, so vigilance is real. But the resolution points inward and upward: seek Brahman, and let your action be free of the grip of attachment. The work is on yourself, not on policing others.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I belong to no village at all; I am alone, one with the One. I go nowhere and return from nowhere; all that I speak is without substance.

I have no one who is mine, nor do I truly belong to anyone. I do not need to live or to die; I remain as I am, unbroken and unchanged.

Says Tuka, I have neither name nor form; I am apart from both action and inaction.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am nothing, and I belong to no village. I am alone, one with the One. I go nowhere and come back from nowhere; all that I say is without substance. No one is mine, and I am truly no one's. I do not need to live or to die. I stay as I am, unbroken, just as I am. Tuka says: I have no name and no form. I stand apart from action and from inaction.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is Tukaram speaking from the far side of liberation, where the ordinary marks of a self have dropped away. He has no village, no kin, no comings or goings, and even his own words he calls empty, because the separate person who would own them is gone. Belonging to no one and owning no one, he no longer faces birth or death as events that touch him; he simply remains, unbroken and unchanging. The closing claim is the boldest: he is beyond name and form, and beyond the whole pair of action and inaction. The verse is the direct report of nondual realization, not a wish for it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My eyes cannot bear to witness this devastation; my chitta grieves when others are tormented. Are you not present here? Must we be made to see such things? Where the devotees of Hari dwell, no hostile force should be able to reach their land.

Says Tuka, my service has been put to shame; this lowly existence, O God, has become unbearable.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My eyes cannot bear to watch this ruin. My chitta grieves when others are tormented. Are you not here? Must we be made to see such things? Where the servants of Hari live, no hostile force should reach their land. Tuka says: my service has been put to shame. This low life, O God, has become unbearable.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is crying out to God over violence and devastation he cannot stand to witness. His grief is not for himself but for others who are being tormented, and his protest is sharp: if you are present, how can this be allowed to come before our eyes? He appeals to a kind of covenant, that where Hari's devotees dwell no hostile force should be able to invade. The closing line carries the wound of it: his lifelong service feels shamed and his existence unbearable, because the God he serves seems to stand by. The poem keeps faith and complaint in the same breath, the way a servant complains only to the master he still trusts.

GATHA 0551 Longing and Separation

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What fruit of Hari's story should I believe in, if it is said that all people are thereby saved? For destruction has already begun, and the enemy's invasion stands before us in plain sight, O Vitthala. Sin does not arrive without prior sin; the evidence has come as a living witness.

Says Tuka, where your devotees reside, how is it that your presence there can be so questioned now?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What fruit of Hari's story should I believe in, if it is said all people are saved by it? For the destruction has already begun, and the enemy stands before us in plain sight, O Vitthala. No sin comes without an earlier sin; the proof has come now as a living witness. Tuka says: where your servants live, how can your presence be in doubt now?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is pressing God with a hard question born of catastrophe. The teaching promises that Hari's story saves everyone, yet ruin has already begun and an enemy stands openly before them, so he asks what fruit that promise is supposed to have. He half answers his own doubt with the law that no calamity comes without prior wrong, the present disaster being its living evidence. But the real ache is the last line: the devotees live here, and they were told God lives where his devotees live, so how can that presence now seem absent? It is a believer's protest, demanding that God make good on his own word.

GATHA 0552 Prayers

Prayer, asking for shelter to worship

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I do not fear my own death; what I cannot bear is seeing people suffer. Our tradition has always been thus, generation upon generation; how is it, O Generous Lord, that you do not know this? Any interruption of worship is itself death to me; not a single moment should pass in vain.

Says Tuka, grant me a place where there is no threat of violence, O Lord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I do not fear my own death now. What I cannot bear is to watch people suffer. Our line has always been like this, family after family; how is it, O Giving Lord, that you do not know it? Any break in worship is itself death to me; not one moment should pass in vain. Tuka says: grant me a place where no blow can fall, O Giving Lord.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is asking God not for safety from death but for the conditions to keep worshipping. He has no fear for himself; his pain is the sight of others suffering, a tenderness he says has run through his lineage for generations, so he reproaches the Lord for seeming not to know it. For him the true death is any interruption of bhajan, any moment of devotion lost. So his single request is for a refuge free of violence, a place where worship cannot be broken. The prayer reveals what he counts as life and death: continuous devotion is life, and its interruption is the only death worth dreading.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Foreign steel and ordinary iron may look alike, yet their quality and worth are entirely different. A doorstep and a sacred image are both made of the same stone, yet their dignity is worlds apart.

Says Tuka, even so, nothing in this world can ever be made equal to the saints.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Foreign steel and an ordinary iron sickle may look alike, yet their quality and worth are wholly different. A doorstep and a holy image are both cut from the same stone, yet their dignity is worlds apart. Tuka says: even so, nothing in this world can be set equal to the saints.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is teaching that sameness of appearance says nothing about true worth. Fine foreign steel and a common iron sickle look like one metal, yet differ utterly in quality; a stone doorstep and a carved deity come from the same rock, yet one is trodden on and the other worshipped. By these pairs he prepares the ear for his real claim:

the saints cannot be measured against ordinary people at all. The likeness of human shape hides an incomparable difference, and to rank a saint among common folk is to mistake the doorstep for the image. The verse asks the reader to honor that hidden distinction rather than judge by the surface.

GATHA 0554 Surrender and Acceptance

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who knows to whom true worship is granted, and who will attain the fulfillment of these words? From now on, O God, you alone are my listener and my speaker; let me serve only you. The clever and the cunning have no place here; they will only spin empty theories and opinions.

Says Tuka, I have settled into one single home: the bond between me, Hari, and all of you.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who knows to whom true worship is granted, and who will reach the fulfillment of these words? From now on, O God, you alone are my listener and my speaker; let me serve only you. The clever and the cunning have no place here; they will only spin empty theories and opinions. Tuka says: I have settled into one single home, the bond between me, Hari, and you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is surrendering both the worship and its words back to God. He admits he cannot know who is granted real devotion or who will reach what his verses point to, so he stops performing for any human audience. From now on God is both his hearer and the one who speaks through him, and service is owed to God alone. He shuts the door on the clever and the cunning, whose cleverness only produces empty argument, because the bond here is not a matter for debate. His final resting place is small and complete: one home holding only himself, Hari, and the listener drawn into that same intimacy.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What is playful sport to us is death to the world; those without inner feeling imitate us blindly without understanding. Until one grasps the wisdom of what truly benefits the soul, one wanders uselessly from door to door.

Whatever is praised they praise, whatever is blamed they blame; wherever one goes, they follow the same beaten path. Says Tuka, no one listens when you warn them, and so they fall prey to the messengers of Death.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What is playful sport to us is death to the world. Those with no inner feeling imitate us blindly, by sight alone. Until a man grasps what truly helps the soul, he wanders uselessly from door to door. Whatever others praise, they praise; whatever others blame, they blame; wherever the crowd goes, they follow the same beaten path. Tuka says: no one listens when you warn them, and so they fall prey to the messengers of Death.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is exposing devotion done by imitation rather than from the heart. What the realized do as free, joyful sport becomes deadly when the feelingless copy it by sight alone, mimicking the outward acts without the inner life that makes them safe. Such a person, never grasping what actually benefits the soul, drifts from door to door and simply echoes the crowd: praising what is praised, blaming what is blamed, treading the worn path everyone treads. The warning is urgent because no one heeds it, and the unexamined herd ends up seized by the messengers of Death. The verse calls the reader to find the inner feeling, not just the gestures.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

They take a lamp and go searching for darkness; such an impossible discovery that would be. We are servants of Vishnu and do not fear Death; we cannot be deceived by a mirage.

Throwing dust may dim the rays of the sun for a moment; how is it that the unfortunate cannot understand this? Says Tuka, to say that grass can smother a blazing fire is an utterly hollow claim.

IN PLAIN WORDS

They take a lamp and go searching for darkness. Such a thing could never be found. We are servants of Vishnu. We do not fear death or the dark age. We will not be fooled by a mirage; that cannot happen. You may throw dust in the air, but does it dim the rays of the sun? How does the luckless soul not see this? Tuka says: to claim that a blade of grass can smother a blazing fire, that is an utterly hollow word.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is stating why faith does not flinch. He stacks up three impossibilities: looking for darkness with a lamp in hand, dust thrown up to blot out the sun, a wisp of grass put forward to put out a fire. Each one names how small the threats really are against God. As a servant of Vishnu he refuses to fear death or the corrupt age, and refuses to be taken in by what only looks like water in a desert. The point is plain: nothing the world can muster touches the one who belongs to God, and only a soul without grace fails to see it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Like an actor, I have put on the whole costume of this play, yet however the scene may change, the true color beneath does not alter. The game of many disguises has been set up as a spectacle, but I know my own true nature all along.

A crystal slab takes on no stain from its surroundings; it merely reflects yellow or red from whatever is placed beside it. Says Tuka, we are free from this crowd of people and shall sport in perfect ease.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Like an actor, I have put on the whole costume of this play. The scene changes, but the true color underneath does not change. A game of many disguises has been set up as a spectacle. Through it all, I know my own true nature. A slab of crystal takes no stain from what is near it; it only shows yellow or red from whatever is set beside it. Tuka says: we stand free of this crowd of people, and at ease we will play.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the difference between the role and the one who wears it. He compares life to a stage where he has put on a full costume and plays many parts, while what he truly is never alters underneath. The crystal is his image for this: it reflects whatever color is placed against it, yet takes no color into itself. So he passes through the world's many appearances without being changed by them. Knowing his own nature, he no longer belongs to the crowd and its anxieties; he can move through the whole spectacle in freedom and ease.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If my tongue ever praises any greatness other than yours, O Hari, then let it fall from my mouth. If my mind ever delights in anything besides you, then let my head be shattered.

If my eyes ever gaze upon another with longing, let that very moment be accursed. What use are ears that refuse to drink the nectar of sacred stories? Says Tuka, what is the point of living if I forget you for even a single moment?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If my tongue ever praises the greatness of any other than you, O Hari, then let my tongue fall out. If my mind ever delights in anything but you, then let my head be shattered. If my eyes ever look on another with longing, let that very moment be accursed. What is the use of ears that will not drink the nectar of the sacred stories? Tuka says: what is the point of living if I forget you for even a single moment?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is binding every faculty to Hari alone and cursing it if it strays. He calls down ruin on his own tongue, mind, and eyes should they turn toward anything other than God, and he writes off ears that refuse to listen to the sacred stories. This is not cruelty toward himself but the measure of how complete he wants his devotion to be: nothing held back, no part left for a rival love. The closing line names the stake plainly. A single moment of forgetting God empties life of its whole purpose.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This husband of mine has set me going in circles; has he renounced anything at all? All comforts walk right past our door, yet my humiliation never ends. Whose wife am I supposed to be, dragging along like this? How much more misery must I pull out of this household? He gives nothing; the children will tear everything apart.

It would have been better if they had died. He will not let me breathe; the house has been washed clean and there is not even cow dung left for plastering.

Says Tuka, the wife grumbles and groans under her burden without ever stopping to think.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This husband of mine has set me going in circles. Has he given up anything at all? Every comfort walks right past our door, and my humiliation never ends. Whose wife am I, dragged along like this? How much more misery must I pull out of this household? He gives nothing. The children will tear everything apart. It would be better if they had died now. He lets me have nothing; the house is scrubbed bare, and there is not even cow dung left to plaster the floor. Tuka says: the wife grumbles and groans under her burden, and never once stops to think.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks in his wife's voice to dramatize the cost of his own devotion as the household sees it. She is worn out: comforts pass them by, the children go hungry, the house is stripped to nothing, and she feels publicly shamed. Her bitter words are real and her hardship is real. But Tukaram lays a quiet judgment under the lament with his closing line: she carries the weight without ever pausing to ask what it is for. The poem turns the complaint back on us, asking whether we too only groan under life's burden and never stop to consider where our true wealth lies.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who knows what creditor died and took his revenge by raising this uproar in my life. How long must I endure this suffering every day? How long must I show my face to the world? Curse his own mother; what good has this Vitthala done for our household? Says Tuka, the wife lets out these outbursts, sobbing one moment and laughing bitterly the next.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who knows what creditor died and took his revenge by being born as my husband and raising this storm in my life. How long must I bear this suffering, day after day? How long must I show my face to the world? Curse his mother; what good has this Vitthala ever done for our home? Tuka says: the wife lets out these outbursts, sobbing one moment and laughing bitterly the next.

WHAT IT MEANS

Again Tukaram puts the lament in his wife's mouth, raw and unfiltered. She suspects her husband is some old enemy reborn to torment her, she is ashamed before her neighbors, and in her bitterness she even curses the very Vitthala her husband has given everything to. Her words swing between weeping and a brittle laugh. Tukaram does not soften her; he lets the household's anguish stand. The honesty is the point: a life given to God can look, from inside the home, like ruin, and the poem holds both truths at once without pretending the cost away.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A sack of grain comes home, but he will not let the children eat a morsel. He fills the bowls of strangers; this wretched hoarder has died to his own family.

She rages like a wild woman, clawing like a hook. Says Tuka, O woman, the store of past merit is exhausted; that is why the pile is depleted.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A sack of grain comes home, and he will not let the children eat a single bite. He fills the bowls of strangers. This wretched hoarder is dead to his own family. She flies into a rage, clawing like a hook at the hand. Tuka says: O woman, your store of past merit is spent; that is why the pile runs out.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram stages another scene of the household's grievance: grain comes in but goes to strangers and pilgrims while the children stay hungry, and the wife rages at the waste. Then his own signature line turns the frame. He answers her, naming the deeper account: the grain runs out because the store of past good karma is exhausted, not merely because of the husband's giving. The poem holds the wife's real anger together with a teaching about where lasting provision actually comes from, asking the listener to look past the visible quarrel to the invisible ledger.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What will your children eat now? Your husband has become a god-mad devotee. He shakes his head, sways, and wears garlands; he has abandoned all trade and livelihood.

He has settled his own belly's needs but has given no thought to ours. With cymbals in hand and mouth gaping, he sings away at the temple near God.

What are we to do? He will not stay at home; he roams off to the woods. Says Tuka, be patient, woman; things have not yet reached their end.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What will your children eat now? Your husband has become a god-crazed devotee. He shakes his head, sways, and wears garlands; he has dropped all trade and livelihood. He has settled his own belly and given no thought to ours. With cymbals in hand and mouth wide open, he sings away at the temple, close to God. What are we to do? He will not stay home; he wanders off to the woods. Tuka says: be patient, woman; it has not yet come to its end.

WHAT IT MEANS

Once more Tukaram voices the wife as she watches her husband disappear into devotion. He has thrown over the family trade, wears the bhakta's garlands, and spends his days singing with cymbals at the temple, leaving the children's future a question. Her worry is genuine and the strain on the home is real. But the closing line, again in Tukaram's own voice, asks for patience: things have not reached their end. The poem sets the household's fear beside a quiet trust that the God the husband sings to has not finished the story, and invites the listener to wait rather than judge too soon.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Good riddance, it all came together today. Now I will eat my fill, whether the bread is fresh or dry.

How long should I, a mere woman, keep arguing with this man? Says Tuka, the wife was at last appeased by letting her vent her bitter words.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Good, it is over; today it all came together. Now I will eat my fill, whether the bread is fresh or dry. How long should I, only a woman, keep wrangling with this man? Tuka says: the wife was appeased at last, once she had spoken out her bitter words.

WHAT IT MEANS

This abhanga closes the cycle of the wife's complaints on a note of release. Having let out all her resentment, she gives up the fight: she will be content with whatever bread there is, fresh or stale, and stop arguing. Tukaram names plainly that letting her speak her bitterness through is what finally settled her. The poem honors a small domestic truth, that anger spoken fully can spend itself and make room for peace, and it lets the long quarrel between household and devotion come to rest.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He will not do any work; lumps of food just fall into his mouth. Whatever rises up, he turns it into the clapping of cymbals; the whole place is in an uproar.

These people are as good as dead while still alive, distributing shame like a feast and drinking it down. They do not even glance at their household, which lies in ruin.

Their wives writhe in agony and curse their fate. Says Tuka, well then so be it; take it, O wife, as what was written in your destiny.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He will not do any work; lumps of food just fall ready into his mouth. Whatever comes up, he turns into the clapping of cymbals; the whole place is an uproar. These men are dead while still alive; they hand out shame like a feast and drink it down. They never glance at the household, and it falls to ruin. Their wives writhe in agony and curse their fate. Tuka says: well, so be it; take it, O wife, as what was written for you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Here Tukaram turns satirical and points it at a pattern, not at any single man. He sketches those who use the look of devotion as a cover for idleness: living off ready food, raising noise with cymbals, leaving the family to fall apart while the wives suffer. He calls such men dead while alive. The poem is a warning against devotion that is only performance and shirking dressed up as worship. The closing line, half resigned, hands the consequence over as fate, leaving the reader to examine whether their own piety carries its weight or merely escapes it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who comes to our house, and for what reason? Does everyone not have their own work to attend to? For God's sake, the whole world has become a relative; kind words cost nothing to offer. When called with respect, no one refuses to come; people arrive simply for the sake of love.

Says Tuka, the wife who despises ornaments is like a skinned dog snapping at everyone's heels.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who comes to our house, and what for? Does everyone not have their own work to do? For God's sake, the whole world has become one family; soft, kind words cost nothing to give. Call a person with respect and no one refuses to come; people come simply for the sake of love. Tuka says: a wife who hates ornaments is like a skinned dog snapping at every passing heel.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts two ways of meeting people who come to the door. The open way treats the whole world as kin and spends gentle words freely, since respect and love draw others near at no cost. Against that he sets the sour temper that grudges every visitor and asks why they bother coming. His sharp closing image is aimed at that pattern of bitterness, not at the dignity of any person: a heart that scorns gentleness becomes raw and snapping like a skinned dog. The poem commends warmth and self-examines the meanness that drives others off.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who holds sincere faith can be saved even by a stone, but what can even a saint do for the wicked? A dog's tail can never be straightened; what can the philosopher's stone do for a broken pot? What good is a field of sugarcane to one who cannot taste its sweetness? The fruit that comes is always according to the seed that was sown. Says Tuka, even a thunderbolt may crack once, but the hardened scoundrel is tougher still.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One who holds faith can be carried across even by a stone. But what can a good man do for the wicked? A dog's tail cannot be made straight; what use is the philosopher's stone to a broken shard of clay? What good is a bed of sugarcane to one who cannot taste sweetness? The fruit always comes according to the seed. Tuka says: a thunderbolt may crack once, but the hardened scoundrel is harder than that.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures two soils against the same grace. Where there is sincere faith, even a stone can ferry a soul across, but where the heart is closed, neither a saint nor the philosopher's stone can transform it, just as a potsherd cannot be turned to gold or a dog's tail made straight. His point is about the seed: the fruit a person bears matches what is sown in them. The closing line lands the claim on the pattern of stubbornness itself, harder than a thunderbolt, urging the listener to soften the ground of their own heart rather than blame the rain that finds no soil to enter.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All that I desired has come near; what more is there to say? The Name and the Form have become knotted together and every matter is settled. Like a mute who has eaten sugar, I know the sweetness but cannot express it.

Says Tuka, what can I say now? Silence itself is the best. Regard another's wealth and another's spouse as things to be shunned.

By God's grace, all good fortune comes to the house on its own. Says Tuka, that body is God's own dwelling; the household and its store belong to him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All that I longed for has come near. What reason is there to speak? The Name and the Form are knotted together, and every matter is settled. Like a mute who has eaten sugar, I taste the sweetness in my heart but cannot say it. Tuka says: what can I say now? Silence itself is best now. Treat another's wealth and another's spouse as things defiled, to be shunned. By God's grace all riches come to the house on their own. Tuka says: that body is God's own dwelling; the home and its store belong to him.

WHAT IT MEANS

This piece moves from an ecstasy that words fail to reach toward the plain conduct that flows from it. The longing is fulfilled, the Name and the Form have joined, and like the mute who has tasted sugar Tukaram knows a sweetness he cannot speak, so he chooses silence as the truest response. The second movement turns that fullness into ethics: keep clear of another's money and another's spouse, and trust that real fortune comes by God's grace, not grasping. The closing line names why such purity matters. The body itself is God's dwelling, and all that the house holds is finally his.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For our sake he took the forms of the Fish, the Tortoise, and the Boar. When we call the name of the Lord of Pandharpur, he rushes forward overflowing with a mother's milk of love.

When he is nowhere to be seen, he suddenly leaps forth without warning. He keeps all joy for us and swallows the suffering himself.

He places us behind his back and faces Death head on. Says Tuka, O treasury of mercy, carry us safely across in your boat.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He took on bodies for our sake: the Fish, the Tortoise, the Boar. When we say the name of the Lord of Pandhari, he runs to us with love, his milk flowing like a mother's. When you look, he is nowhere; then all at once he leaps out. He keeps the joy for us and swallows the sorrow himself. He puts us behind his back and stands in front, facing Death. Tuka says: O treasury of mercy, carry us across in your boat.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lists the reasons to trust God completely. The avatars, Fish, Tortoise, Boar, were not for God's own sake but for ours; the same Lord runs to the one who calls the Name, with a mother's instinct, not a master's calculation. The poem keeps reversing where God and devotee stand: God is invisible until he suddenly appears, he hands us the joy and drinks the pain himself, he shields us with his own body while he meets Death face to face. The closing prayer follows naturally: a God who does all this can be asked to ferry us across the world's flood, and he will.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The rays cannot be separated from the sun. In the same way, God has become fused with my very being.

How can sweetness be divided from sugar? Says Tuka, a sound arises and then dissolves back into the belly of the sky.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You cannot pull the rays away from the sun and set them apart. That is what my devotion has become: God has fastened himself to me and stays. How would you separate the sweetness from the sugar? They are not two things. Tuka says: a sound rises, and then it dissolves back into the belly of the sky.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing what his bhakti has turned into: not worship across a gap, but union with no gap left. His three images all name the same thing, a quality that cannot be detached from its substance: rays from the sun, sweetness from sugar, sound from the open sky it rises in and sinks back into. God has become inseparable from his very being. The point is that at this depth the question of how to worship dissolves, because the worshipper and the worshipped are no longer two.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Take what is small but pure; accept what is genuine and unfading. Take that which knows no depletion, where the seed multiplies within the seed.

Keep your mind as witness; there is no need for anything else. Says Tuka, to know one's own true welfare is the real essence.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Take what is small but pure; take what is real and never goes stale. Take the thing that never runs out, where the seed grows more seed inside itself. Keep your own mind as the witness; you need nothing and no one else for this. Your true good is the great thing. Tuka says: that is the real essence.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is telling the listener what to choose and what to ignore. He sets a small, pure, inexhaustible good against everything large but perishable: take the thing that does not run dry, the seed that keeps multiplying within itself, which is the Name and the inner devotion it feeds. He insists the test is internal: your own steadied mind is the only witness you need, so do not look to others for permission or proof. To know and seize your own true welfare, he says, is the whole essence of the matter.

तुका म्हणे नव्हे सरी । विष अमृताची परी ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All are God's creation, yet the affliction of bad qualities persists. That is why no two things can truly be compared; each remains at a distance from the other.

Sugarcane and onion grow in the same plot, yet their taste and sweetness are entirely different. Says Tuka, poison and nectar can never be made equal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All things are made by God, yet the fault of bad qualities still clings to them. So they are not all the same; one stays far apart from another. Sugarcane and an onion grow in the same plot of ground, but their taste and their sweetness are nothing alike. Tuka says: they are not equal. It is the way poison differs from nectar.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram blocks a lazy conclusion: that because God made everything, everything is therefore the same and worth the same. He grants the first half, all is God's, but says the flaw of bad qualities still marks things, so they cannot be set side by side as equals. Two plants in one field, sugarcane and onion, drink the same soil yet come out wholly different in taste. The closing line makes the stake plain: the gap between good and corrupt is the gap between poison and nectar, and the seeker must learn to tell them apart rather than flatten the difference.

GATHA 0572 The Moral Ideal

Moral counsel, peace and the far shore

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There is no happiness greater than peace; everything else is only suffering. Therefore hold fast to peace, and you will reach the far shore.

When lust and anger are inflamed, the body fills with affliction and disease. Says Tuka, the three kinds of suffering then vanish on their own.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There is no happiness beyond peace; everything else is only suffering. So hold on to peace, and you will cross to the far shore. When lust and anger flare up, the body fills with worry and disease. He says: then the three kinds of suffering leave you on their own.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names peace as the one real happiness and everything else as disguised pain, then gives a plain instruction: hold fast to peace, and that is what carries you across. He points to the cost of the opposite, when lust and anger are stirred up, they do not stay in the mind but settle into the body as worry and sickness. Calm the inner fires and the threefold suffering, of body, of circumstance, of fate, falls away by itself. The teaching is practical, not abstract: peace is both the goal and the means of crossing.

GATHA 0573 The Nature of God

Nondual union, gold and ornament

मराठी मूळ

उदका वेगळा । नव्हे तरंग निराळा ॥२॥
हेम अळंकारा नामीं । तुका म्हणे तैसे आम्ही ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Just as jaggery is nothing but sweetness through and through, so God has become all that exists. How then shall I worship, when God pervades everything, inside and out? A wave cannot be separated from the water.

Says Tuka, as gold takes the name of the ornament it becomes, so are we one with him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

As jaggery is sweet through and through, so God has become all of this. Then how shall I worship him, when he is everywhere, outside and within? A wave cannot stand apart from the water. Tuka says: as gold goes by the name of the ornament made from it, so are we one with him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pushes worship to the point where it questions itself. If God is sweet all the way through like jaggery, and fills everything inside and out, then there is no separate place to stand and offer worship from. His images all collapse the seeming difference: a wave is only water shaped for a moment, and gold called a bangle or a ring is still gold under the name. So we too are not other than God; we are God under a passing name and form. The poem does not deny worship so much as locate it inside a oneness that was always already the case.

Those whose sole wealth is the constant remembrance of Hari regard even the seat of Brahma as trivial. The pleasures of Indra's throne and such heavenly enjoyments are not pleasures at all but the disease of rebirth.

They have no use for sovereign rule over the entire earth. Dominion over the netherworlds they consider a calamity.

The fruit of yogic powers they deem worthless. Even a joy as great as liberation itself they call suffering, not happiness.

Says Tuka, without Hari, everything feels like weariness to them.

IN PLAIN WORDS

They think nothing, always, of the seat of Brahma. Their one wealth is this: the constant remembrance of Hari. The pleasures of Indra's throne and the rest are not pleasures; they are the disease of rebirth. They have no use for rule over the whole earth. Lordship over the netherworlds they count a disaster. The prize of yogic powers seems worthless to them. Even a joy as large as liberation they call suffering, not happiness. Tuka says: without Hari, the whole of it feels like weariness to them.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the devotees whose only treasure is the steady remembrance of Hari, and weighs every other reward against it. One by one he refuses the things people strive for: Brahma's seat, Indra's pleasures, rule over the earth, dominion below, the powers won by yoga. He pushes the refusal to its limit by naming liberation itself, the highest goal, as mere suffering when set beside the Name. The reason is given in the last line: for these devotees anything that is not Hari is only weariness, so no heaven and no attainment can tempt them away from him.

GATHA 0575 The Saints

The saints, kept safe in God

मराठी मूळ

तुका म्हणे खोडी । देवमणी न देती दडी ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the company of gold coins, even a thread of gold is saved from the fire; otherwise it would be burned the fire. Without the master's presence, no form holds worth for anyone.

Says Tuka, flawed or not, the gem set in the divine ring never falls from its place.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the company of pure gold, even a thread of gold is saved from the fire; without it, it would simply be burned, and what more is there to say, the proof is plain. Apart from the master's presence, no form is worth anything to anyone. Tuka says: flawed or not, the gem set in God's own ring never falls out of place.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is explaining why the one who keeps the company of God, or of his saints, is protected. Gold mixed in with pure gold survives the fire that would otherwise consume a stray thread of it; the difference is the company it keeps, and that is proof enough. In the same way a person has no standing on his own; it is the master's presence that gives any form its worth. His closing image is the strongest reassurance: a gem set into God's ring, flawed or not, does not fall from its setting, so the one held by God is held regardless of his imperfections.

GATHA 0576 Autobiography

Autobiography, no tricks with this servant

मराठी मूळ

मजसवें नको चेष्टा । नव्हे साळी कांहीं कोष्टा ॥१॥

तुका विष्णुदास । रस जाणतो नीरस ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not try your tricks with me; I am no simple weaver to be fooled. Drop your pretenses and sit down, or go away with your face blackened.

Here no fraud or low dealing will succeed. Says Tuka, this servant of Vishnu knows the real from the worthless.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not play your games with me; I am no plain weaver to be cheated. Drop your swagger and sit down, or go off with your face blackened. Here no fraud works, no cheap or low dealing. Tuka, the servant of Vishnu, knows what has flavor from what has none.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks bluntly to anyone who comes to him with pretense and show. He refuses to be taken for a simpleton who can be fooled, and tells the boaster to either set down his airs and sit honestly or leave in shame. He states the rule of the place plainly: deceit and low dealing get no traction here. As Vishnu's servant he has learned to taste the real from the worthless, so performance and posturing do not impress him; only sincerity does.

GATHA 0577 True Worship

True worship, devotion is God

मराठी मूळ

भाव देवाचें उचित । भाव तोचि भगवंत ॥१॥
धन्यधन्य शुद्ध जाती । संदेह कैंचा तेथें चित्तीं ॥ध्रु.॥
बहुत बराडी । देवजवळी आवडी ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे हें रोकडें । लाभ अधिकारी चोखडे ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sincere devotion is the only fitting thing before God; devotion itself is the Lord. Blessed, truly blessed is that pure disposition; how can any doubt enter there? Loud and fervent calling is what delights God most.

Says Tuka, this truth is plain for all to see; the sincere seeker reaps the reward.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sincere feeling is the one fitting offering before God; that feeling itself is the Lord. Blessed, blessed is the pure heart; how could any doubt enter it? Loud, fervent calling on God is what he loves. Tuka says: this is plain and present truth; the sincere seeker takes the reward.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram puts the whole of worship inside the heart's sincerity. The only thing fit to bring before God is genuine feeling, and he goes further: that feeling is not merely a means to God, it is God himself. A heart that pure has no room for doubt, and the calling that pleases God most is not refined performance but loud, fervent longing. The closing line makes it concrete: this is ready, visible truth, and it is the sincere seeker, not the clever one, who actually receives what is given.

GATHA 0578 Faith and Trust

Faith, the real labor begins in battle

मराठी मूळ

गौरव गौरवापुरतें । फळ सत्याचे संकल्प ॥१॥
कठिण योगाहुनि क्षम । ओकलिया होतो श्रम ॥ध्रु.॥
पावलें मरे सिवेपाशीं । क्लेश उरत ते क्लेशीं ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे बहु आणी । कठिण निघालिया रणीं ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Flattery lasts only as long as flattery serves; the fruit belongs to sincere resolve alone. Harder than any yoga is endurance; once you have vomited the false, the labor begins.

What was attained dies at the boundary line; pain persists only for those who cling to pain. Says Tuka, much may be brought to the field, but the real hardship begins once you step into battle.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Flattery lasts only as long as flattery is useful; the fruit belongs to honest resolve alone. Harder than any yoga is patient endurance; once you have spat out the false, the real toil starts. What you reached dies at the boundary; pain stays only with those who hold on to pain. Tuka says: much can be carried to the field, but the hardship is real once you step into the fight.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram warns that the spiritual path is harder than it first appears and that shortcuts give nothing back. Flattery and show serve only for the moment; the actual fruit comes only from sincere resolve. He calls patient endurance harder than any yogic feat, and says that giving up the false is not the finish but the start of the real labor. The final image is the soldier's: it is easy to march much to the battlefield, but the true difficulty begins the instant you enter the fight, so faith is tested in the doing, not in the preparation.

GATHA 0579 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the man who clings to his faults

मराठी मूळ

न संडी अवगुण । वर्मे मानीतसे सिण ॥१॥
भोग देतां करिती काई । फुटतां यमदंडें डोई ॥ध्रु.॥
पापपुण्यझाडा । देतां तेथें मोटी पीडा ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे बोला । माझ्या सिणती विठ्ठला ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who will not give up bad habits secretly relishes the irritation they cause. What can punishment achieve when even the blows of Yama's rod upon their heads do not move them? When the reckoning of sin and merit comes, the torment only increases.

Says Tuka, they grow weary, O my Vitthala, even of my words.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The one who will not let go of his bad habits secretly enjoys the sting they bring. What can any punishment do, when even Yama's rod splitting their heads does not move them? When the account of sin and merit is settled, the torment there only grows. Tuka says: they grow tired even of my words, O Vitthala.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at the person who refuses to drop his faults and finds a hard truth: at some level that person relishes the very irritation the habit causes, which is why correction fails. If even the blows of Yama's rod cannot move him, no outside punishment will, and when the final reckoning of sin and merit comes the suffering only mounts. The poem turns the harshness toward the pattern of clinging, not toward the soul caught in it, and ends in weary sorrow: such a one tires even of Tukaram's pleading, so he hands the matter to Vitthal.

GATHA 0580 The Nature of God

Surrender, the bond that holds

मराठी मूळ

पावे ऐसा नाश । अवघियां दिला त्रास ॥१॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He gave trouble to everyone, bringing about their ruin, yet formed an unfading bond with Panduranga, who bears all things. The feast was ready-made, a gathering of every kind of being.

Says Tuka, the boundary has been drawn and now stands firm.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Such ruin comes that everyone is troubled by it. But I have made my bond with the one who never fades; Panduranga enjoys all things. The feast was ready-made, a gathering of every kind of thing. Tuka says: I am full now. A limit has been reached, and there it stays.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets two things side by side: the ruin that troubles everyone, and the one bond that holds against it. Everything in the world wears down and gives trouble, but Panduranga does not fade, and to join oneself to him is to join the one who already enjoys and bears all things. The feast was never something Tukaram had to prepare; it lay ready, a gathering of every kind of being, waiting only to be received. He ends in fullness: he has had enough, a boundary has been reached, and there it stays. The point is that the satisfied soul stops reaching, because the unfading one is all it needs.

GATHA 0581 Appeals and Exhortations

Warning, the flood of falsehood

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All these people are wretched because they have turned their faces away from Narayana. They will depart empty-handed, shaking off their hands, fit only for punishment.

Their provisions for the journey are merely sin and merit, accompanied by the weariness of begging. Says Tuka, see how great a flood of falsehood has swept over everything.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All these people are wretched. They have turned their faces away from Narayana. They will leave with empty hands, shaking them out, fit only for punishment. Their provisions for the road are sin and merit, and with them the weariness of begging. Tuka says: look how a flood of falsehood has swept over everything.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names what makes a whole people wretched: they have turned their faces from Narayana, and so they carry nothing real. He pictures the end of the road, where they leave empty-handed, shaking out their palms, deserving only punishment. The only provisions they packed were sin and merit, and merit too runs out, leaving the weariness of begging. His closing cry is at the pattern, not at any one person: a flood of falsehood has covered everything, and he is asking the hearer to see it and turn back toward the Name while there is time.

GATHA 0582 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the ego underfoot

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Trumpets shall sound with this joy and celebration. Having conquered the ego, I have made its head my stepping stone.

Death has no room here; there is no place for any other burden. Says Tuka, the way to Vaikuntha is now easy.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Trumpets will sound with this joy and uproar. I have conquered the ego, and made its head my stepping stone. Here death has no room; where would any other burden find a place? Tuka says: now the way to Vaikuntha is easy.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram celebrates a single victory and what it opens. He has conquered the ego and set his foot on its head, using the very thing that once ruled him as the step that lifts him up. Once that is done, death finds no room and no other burden can take hold, because the self that feared and labored has been put down. The trumpets and uproar are the festival of a soul that has won. His conclusion is plain joy: with the ego underfoot, the road to Vaikuntha, God's own realm, is now easy to walk.

GATHA 0583 Prayers

Prayer, crying at the saints' door

मराठी मूळ

झाड कल्पतरू । न करी याचकीं आव्हेरू ॥१॥
तुम्ही सर्वी सर्वोत्तम । ऐसे विसरतां धर्म ॥ध्रु.॥
परिसा तुमचें देणें । तो त्या जागे अभिमानें ॥२॥
गार्हातण्यानें तुका । गर्जे मारुनियां हाका ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The wish-fulfilling tree never turns away one who asks. O saints, you who are the best among all, how can you forget this sacred duty? The touchstone gives to all, yet remains proud and awake in its own nature.

Says Tuka, burdened by my household life, I cry out loudly at your door.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The wish-granting tree never turns away one who asks. You saints are the best of all; how do you forget this duty? The touchstone gives to whoever comes, awake and sure in its own nature. Tuka says: weighed down by my household life, I stand at your door and cry out loud.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses his appeal on the saints by holding two images before them. The wish-granting tree turns no beggar away, and the touchstone turns iron to gold for whoever brings it; both give freely and stay true to what they are. If even these do their work without fail, how can the saints, who are the highest of all, forget the same duty toward one who asks? He names his own weight openly: his household life burdens him, and that is why he is here. So he does not ask quietly; he stands at their door and cries aloud, claiming the help that givers by their nature owe to those who come.

GATHA 0584 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, God in every hour

मराठी मूळ

वसवावें घर । देवें बरें निरंतर ॥१॥
संग आसनीं शयनीं । घडे भोजनीं गमनीं ॥ध्रु.॥.
संकल्प विकल्प । मावळोनि पुण्यपाप ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे काळ । अवघा गोविंदें सुकाळ ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let the house be inhabited by God, continually and without break. Let his company attend us in sitting, sleeping, eating, and walking.

Let all thoughts and doubts dissolve, along with the notions of merit and sin. Says Tuka, when Govinda pervades every moment, there is abundance in all seasons.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let the house be lived in by God, always and without break. Let his company stay with me in sitting, in sleeping, in eating, in walking. Let plans and doubts melt away, and merit and sin with them. Tuka says: when Govinda fills all of time, every season is abundance.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays not for a special hour of worship but for a life entirely lived in. He wants God to dwell in the house without interruption, his company present in sitting, sleeping, eating, and walking, the ordinary motions of a day. When that company is constant, the restless machinery of plans and doubts dissolves, and even the bookkeeping of merit and sin falls away with it. The closing line is the harvest of this: when Govinda saturates every moment, there is no lean season at all. The whole of time becomes plenty, because God is in all of it.

GATHA 0585 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, the silent imprint

मराठी मूळ

येथील हा ठसा । गेला पडोनियां ऐसा ॥१॥
घरीं देवाचे अबोला । त्याची ते चि सवे त्याला ॥ध्रु॥.

तुका म्हणे जन । तयामध्यें येवढें भिन्न ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The imprint of this place has fallen upon me and remains. In the house of God there is a silence; his company is his own way with him.

One does not need to look for it; it comes naturally of its own accord. Says Tuka, among all these people, this one difference is immense.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The mark of this place has fallen on me and stays. In God's house there is a silence; his company is just his own way of being with you. You do not have to go looking for it; all at once, on its own, it is there. Tuka says: among all people, this one difference is vast.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is reporting something that happened to him and remains. An imprint from God's house has settled on him and will not lift; what marks that house is a silence, a nearness that is simply God's own way of keeping company. He insists it is not earned by searching: it arrives all at once and of itself, not by effort or hunting. The last line measures the gap this opens. Between the one who carries this imprint and everyone else, the difference is immense, even though it shows as nothing louder than silence.

GATHA 0586 The Saints

The saints above the image

मराठी मूळ

करितां देवार्चन । घरा आले संतजन ॥१॥
देव सारावे परते । संत पूजावे आरते ॥ध्रु.॥.
शाळिग्राम विष्णुमूर्ती । संत हो का भलते याती ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे संधी । अधिक वैष्णवांची मांदी ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If while you are performing worship of the deity, saintly people arrive at your door, set the deity aside and attend to the saints with ardent welcome. The deity is a stone image of Vishnu, but the saints, whatever their caste may be, are the living God.

Says Tuka, the gathering of devotees is a richer and more sacred occasion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If, while you are worshipping the deity, holy people come to your house, set the deity aside and worship the saints with a warm, eager welcome. The shaligram is a stone image of Vishnu; the saints, whatever caste they are born in, are the living thing. Tuka says: the gathering of the devotees is the greater occasion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram ranks the living above the carved. He tells the worshipper that if saints arrive mid-ritual, the right thing is to set the stone image aside and turn the welcome and the worship toward them. His reason is direct: the shaligram is an image of Vishnu, but the saints, no matter what caste they were born into, carry God alive in them.

The caste clause is deliberate; he refuses to let birth outrank holiness. The closing line lands the claim plainly: the company of devotees is the higher and more sacred moment, worth more than the rite it interrupts.

GATHA 0587 Faith and Trust

Faith, the fearless servant

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who serves truly has nothing to fear for his life. Even arguing with the master only increases joy.

One must have dharma on one's side; then one can endure whatever strikes at the core. Says Tuka, the goddess of speech speaks, and Vitthala honors him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One whose service is true has nothing to fear for his life. Even arguing with the master only brings more and more joy. You must have dharma on your side; then you can bear whatever strikes at the core. The goddess of speech speaks, says Tuka, and Vitthal gives him honor.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the freedom of the one who serves truly. Such a servant has nothing to fear, even to argue with his master only increases his joy, because the bond is secure enough to hold the quarrel. The condition is dharma: with righteousness on your side you can take a blow aimed at the very core and still stand. He closes by naming the source of his words; the goddess of speech speaks through him, and Vitthal himself honors him. The whole abhanga rests on confidence: true service makes a person fearless and lifts him into honor.

GATHA 0588 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, fed on God

मराठी मूळ

देवें जीव धाला । संसार तो कडू झाला ॥१॥

तुका म्हणे भुक । येणें न लगे आणीक ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My soul is sated with God, and worldly life has turned bitter. The belches that arise are belches of bliss from Hari.

One whose very being carries this quality inspires others as well. Says Tuka, once this hunger is satisfied, no other craving remains.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My soul is full of God, and worldly life has turned bitter. The belches that rise up are belches of bliss from Hari. One whose body holds this quality draws others in too. Tuka says: once this hunger is fed, no other craving is left.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the plain image of a satisfied eater to describe a soul fed on God. He has eaten his fill of God, and so the world has gone bitter in his mouth; the belches that rise are not of food but of bliss from Hari. He adds that this fullness is contagious: a person whose very being carries it pulls others toward the same table. The closing line names the result. When this one hunger is satisfied, every other craving simply ends, because nothing else can compete with being full of God.

GATHA 0589 The Power of the Name

The Name, essence of all

मराठी मूळ

नाम साराचें ही सार । शरणागत यमकिंकर ॥१॥
उतमातम । वाचे बोला पुरुषोत्तम ॥ध्रु.॥.
नाम जपतां चंद्रमौळी । नामें तरला वाल्हा कोळी ॥२॥
तुका म्हणे वणूप काय । तारक विठोबाचे पाय ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The Name is the essence of all essences; even Yama's servants bow before one who has surrendered to it. Whether high or low, let the tongue speak the name of the Supreme Being.

Chandra Mauli himself chants the Name; by the Name even Valmiki, whom society had cast out, was saved. Says Tuka, what more can I describe? The feet of Vitthoba are the vessel of deliverance.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The Name is the essence of every essence; even Yama's servants bow to one who has taken refuge in it. High or low, let the tongue speak the name of the Supreme. Shiva, who wears the moon, chants the Name; by the Name even Valya the fowler was carried across. Tuka says: what can I praise? The feet of Vithoba carry us over.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lifts the Name to the highest place: it is the essence of all essences, and even the agents of death bow before whoever takes refuge in it. He throws the door open to everyone, high-born or low, since the tongue of any person can speak the name of the Supreme. His proofs are two well-known figures: Shiva, the moon-crowned, himself chants the Name, and Valya the fowler, an outcast hunter, was ferried across by it. He ends confessing that praise runs out of words; in the end it is the feet of Vithoba that carry the soul across.

GATHA 0590 Confession and Sin

Confession, the empty outward show

मराठी मूळ

गातों भाव नाहीं अंगीं । भूषण करावया जगीं ॥१॥
परि तूं पतितपावन । करीं साच हें वचन ॥ध्रु.॥.
मुखें म्हणवितों दास । चित्तीं माया लोभ आस ॥५॥
तुका म्हणे दावीं वेश । तैसा अंतरीं नाहीं लेश ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I sing, yet there is no true devotion in my being; I do it merely to adorn myself before the world. But you are the Redeemer of the fallen; make this promise of yours come true.

I call myself a servant with my mouth, yet my heart is full of greed, worldly longing, and desire. Says Tuka, the garb I display on the outside has not the slightest trace within.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I sing, but there is no real feeling in me; I do it to dress myself up before the world. Yet you are the saver of the fallen: make this word of yours come true. With my mouth I call myself your servant, while my heart is full of illusion, greed, and longing. Tuka says: the costume I show outside has not a trace of it within.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the harsh light on himself rather than on anyone else. He admits his singing has no inward feeling; it is a costume he wears to look pious before the world. With his mouth he calls himself God's servant, but his heart is crowded with illusion, greed, and craving, and he refuses to pretend otherwise. Yet the confession is also a plea: because God is the one who lifts the fallen, Tukaram asks him to make that title true in his case. The abhanga is an example of honest self-examination, naming the gap between outward show and inner state and handing it to the only one who can close it.

GATHA 0591 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the miser laid bare

मराठी मूळ

द्रव्य असतां धर्म न करी । नागविला राजद्वारीं ॥१॥

तुका म्हणे जाण । नर गाढवाहुनी हीन ॥४॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A man who has wealth but gives nothing to charity ends up stripped bare at the king's court. When his mother gave birth to him, there were no witches or sorceresses present to curse him; he cursed himself by his own greed.

He sleeps through the hour of sacred recitation, yet stays awake for lust like a prowling dog. He is ashamed to share pleasures with his own wife, yet steals the maidservant's cloth to sleep with.

Says Tuka, know that such a man is lower than a donkey.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A man has wealth but gives nothing in charity, and is stripped bare at the king's court. When his mother bore him, no witch or hag was there to curse him. At the hour of sacred recitation sleep takes him; for lust he stays awake like a dog. He is ashamed to share pleasure with his own wife, yet takes the servant girl's cloth and lies down. Tuka says: know that such a man is lower than a donkey.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips bare a single pattern: the man who hoards. He has wealth but gives nothing, so the king's court ends up stripping him; no outside curse made him this way, his own greed did. The poet lists how the pattern bends a life out of shape: he sleeps through the sacred recitation but is wide awake for lust like a prowling dog, shrinks from his own wife yet sneaks to the maidservant. The closing line is blunt, calling such a man lower than a donkey. The verse is aimed at the pattern of miserliness and hypocrisy, holding it up so a hearer can check his own life against it, not so anyone is despised.

GATHA 0592 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the hollow teacher

मराठी मूळ

मुखें बोले ब्रम्हज्ञान । मनीं धनअभिमान ॥१॥
ऐशियाची करी सेवा । काय सुख होय जीवा ॥ध्रु.॥.
पोटासाठीं संत । झाले कलींत बहुत ॥२॥
विरळा ऐसा कोणी । तुका त्यासि लोटांगणी ॥३॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He speaks of the knowledge of Brahman with his mouth, but his mind is swollen with the pride of wealth. What happiness can one gain by serving such a person? In this age of Kali, many have become saints merely for the sake of their bellies.

Says Tuka, rare indeed is the one who is genuine; to such a one I bow in prostration.

IN PLAIN WORDS

His mouth speaks the knowledge of Brahman. His mind is swollen with the pride of his wealth. Serve a man like that, and what happiness comes to your soul? In this age of Kali, many have turned saint just to fill their bellies. Rare is the one who is true. Tuka says: to that one I fall down in prostration.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram separates the words a man speaks from the mind behind them. A teacher can recite the highest truth, the knowledge of Brahman, while inside he is proud of his money; serving such a man feeds no one's soul. He names the cheap motive plainly: in a corrupt age many take up the saint's role only to be fed. The verse asks each listener to test the teacher, and himself, by what the mind actually wants. And it ends in worship, not contempt: the genuine one is so rare that Tuka throws himself flat before him.

GATHA 0601 The Necessity of Experience

Inner sacrifice, the ego laid waste

मराठी मूळ

एक वेळ प्रायिश्चत्त । केलें चित्त मुंडण ॥1॥
अहंकारा नांवें दोष । त्याचें ओस पाडिले ॥ध्रु.॥
अनुतापें स्नानविधि । यज्ञसिद्ध देहहोम ॥2॥
जीवशिवा होतां चुका । तेथें तुका विनटला ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Once and for all I performed the expiation: I shaved the head of my chitta. The fault called ego has been laid waste and emptied out.

Through remorse I performed the ritual bath; through the sacrifice of this body I completed the rite. When the error between the individual soul and the Supreme Soul was resolved, Says Tuka, I merged into that very place.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Once and for all I did the penance. I shaved the head of my mind. The fault that is called ego I laid waste and emptied out. With remorse I performed the ritual bath. With this body offered up I completed the fire-rite. The mistake that stood between the soul and the Supreme was undone. Tuka says: there I merged and was lost.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes the outward rites of expiation and turns every one of them inward. The head he shaves is not his own but his mind, his chitta; the fault he destroys is the ego itself. The cleansing bath is his remorse, and the body offered in the sacrificial fire is this very life given over. When the error that kept the individual soul apart from the Supreme Soul dissolves, nothing of the separate self is left. The penance is finished once and for all because he disappears into that union.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He who sustains the three worlds without growing weary, how can our small burden be a weight to him? He who sits inside a stone enduring hardship, who places food in that mouth? The birds and the python make no provisions, yet the Infinite One provides for them. Says Tuka, when you cast your burden upon that ocean of compassion, he will never forsake you.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He holds up the three worlds and never grows tired. So how could our small weight be a burden to him? A worm sits inside a stone. Who puts food in that mouth? The birds and the python store up nothing. Yet the Infinite One feeds them. Tuka says: cast your load on him, and my ocean of mercy will never leave you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers the fear that God is too busy or too great to bother with one small life. The same One who carries the three worlds without strain cannot find our little burden heavy. He points to creatures who plan nothing for themselves: the worm sealed in stone, the birds and the python that lay up no stores, all fed by the Infinite. If they are provided for, so are you. So he tells you to put your whole weight on that ocean of compassion, certain it will not forsake you.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The words of the deceiver sound pleasant, but his intention is to slip a noose around your neck. On the surface he appears handsome and good, but he is no devotee; he is a thorough scoundrel.

He wears the tilak, the cap, and the garland around his neck, then leads you into the dark and squeezes your throat. Says Tuka, he is nothing but a thug, and the rod of Yama hangs over him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The cheat speaks sweetly. Inside he means to drop a noose around your neck. On the surface he looks fine and good. He is no devotee. He is a complete scoundrel. He wears the tilak, the cap, the garland at his throat. Then he leads you into the dark and squeezes your windpipe. Tuka says: he is nothing but a thug. The rod of Yama hangs over him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram warns against the man who wears devotion as a disguise. His speech is pleasant, his forehead marked, his neck strung with beads, and all of it is bait; the real aim is to get a noose around your neck. The holy props prove nothing, because once he has you alone he goes for the throat. The verse points at a pattern, the fraud who trades on piety to prey on the trusting, and tells you to judge by what the man does in the dark, not by his costume. Such a one is a thug, and Yama's rod of judgment is already raised over him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sins flee from the power of kirtan, from your name sung in congregational praise. Why then would you make your own promise turn false? You fear sin, only to sow anxiety in us.

Says Tuka, devotion to God conquers even Death.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sins flee before the kirtan. They flee before your Name sung together. So why begin this? Why let your own word turn false? You are afraid of sin, only to plant worry in us. Tuka says: this service, this devotion, conquers Death himself, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks half in argument with God. The promise is that sins run from the Name sung in shared praise, so he presses the point: do not let that promise prove false by drawing back as if our sins were too much. To hesitate over sin is to make God seem afraid of it, and that fear only breeds anxiety in the devotee. The verse insists the Name is stronger than any sin. Devotion offered to God, Tuka says, defeats even death.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Narayana, put an end to my suffering. Keep my mind tethered close to your feet, dwelling firmly in my heart.

You have indulged my every whim until now; bring it at last to fruition. Says Tuka, you are the one who removes the weariness of the humble.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do it, Narayana. Put an end to my suffering. Keep my attention at your feet. Make your dwelling firmly in my mind. You have indulged my every wish until now. Now bring it to its fruit. Tuka says: he is the one who lifts away the weariness of the lowly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks Narayana for two things at once: to cut off his suffering, and to keep his own wandering mind fastened at the Lord's feet. He reminds God of a long history of being indulged, and asks that all that tending now ripen into its fruit. The prayer rests on a settled trust, that this is the God who takes the tiredness from the helpless. So the plea is bold yet humble: finish what you have begun in me.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am lowlier than the lowest; my pride rests in you alone. I have come to you as a supplicant; now see to my true welfare.

O Lord of the humble, O Merciful One, uphold the honor of your own name. Says Tuka, it will not be well if you abandon me now.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am lower than the lowest. My only pride is in you. I have come to you for refuge. Now do what is truly good for me. Lord of the humble, Merciful One, guard the honor of your own name. Tuka says: now it would not be right for you to let me go.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram comes empty-handed, claiming nothing of his own worth, only that his single pride is God. As a refugee who has thrown himself on God's protection, he asks not for what he wants but for his true welfare. Then he turns the appeal onto God's own reputation: you are called the Lord of the humble, so uphold that name by sheltering me. The closing line presses the claim home, that abandoning him now would dishonor God himself.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It delights me to recount your glorious deeds; love itself seals my lips. Two birds nested on a single tree, and a wicked hunter arrived.

He released a hawk from the treetop and fitted an arrow to his bow. In that moment the birds cried out to you: come quickly, O Lord, our mother and father.

If they flew, the hawk would kill them; if they stayed, the hunter would pierce them. Hearing the desperate cry of those birds, you swiftly took the form of a serpent.

You bit the hunter and felled him to the ground, and the hawk too was struck by the arrow. Such is your mercy toward your own devotees; you become a shelter in their hour of peril.

Says Tuka, your glory fills the three worlds; even the voice of the Vedas cannot describe it fully.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It gives me joy to tell your great deeds. Love itself seals my lips. Two birds had nested in one tree, and a wicked hunter came. He loosed a hawk from above the tree and fitted an arrow to his bow. In that moment the birds remembered you: come quickly, Shripati, our mother and father. If they flew, the hawk would kill them; if they stayed, the hunter would pierce them. Hearing the cry of those birds, you swiftly took the form of a serpent. You bit the hunter and felled him to the ground, and the arrow struck the hawk instead. Such is your mercy to your own servants. You become their shelter in the hour of danger. Tuka says: your glory fills the three worlds; even the speech of the Vedas cannot tell it in full.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram retells a rescue story to show what kind of God he serves. Two birds are trapped with no way out: a hawk above, a hunter and his arrow below, death on either side. They have nothing to do but cry out to God as mother and father, and that cry is enough. God takes a serpent's form on the instant, bites down the hunter and turns the arrow onto the hawk, so that both threats fall at once. The point is not the marvel but the mercy: this is how He shelters those who are wholly helpless and call on Him. Tuka adds that such glory is past all telling, beyond even the Vedas.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have not starved for bread, O Janardana, but I hunger for your recognition. I have made God the witness of everything, in dark times and in bright.

The one who experiences and the one who grants experience are one; the father accompanies his child through all. Both action and inaction are burned away.

Says Tuka, only the bold and steadfast survive.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have not gone hungry for bread, Janardana. But I hunger for your regard. I have made God the witness of everything, in dark days and in bright. The one who enjoys and the one who grants the enjoying are one. The father walks beside his child through all of it. Action and inaction are both burned away. Tuka says: only the bold and steadfast remain.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says his real hunger is not for food, which he has, but to be seen and owned by God. He lives with God as the witness of every moment, good times and bad alike. He sees the one who enjoys and the one who grants enjoyment as a single reality, and trusts that God walks beside him as a father beside his child. In that trust both action and inaction lose their hold and burn away. What is left, he says, is what belongs to the bold and steadfast.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

First I bow to you, O Ganapati, the single-tusked one; fill this recitation with color and sweetness. Strengthen my intellect with power, so that the darkness may be dispelled.

When your grace overflows, what else remains lacking? You alone guide us along the proven path of the perfected ones. Your invocation stands at the beginning of every undertaking; gods, sages, and seers alike commence their scriptures and Puranas with it.

How can I describe your ways? I do not possess such intellect. They call you the Lord of the humble; now make this promise of yours come true.

Says Tuka, as I am swept along in the flood of illusion, drowning in the deep pool of worldly existence, who but you can save me? Come swiftly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

First I bow to you, single-tusked one. Pour color and sweetness into this telling. Strengthen my mind, make it strong, so the darkness lifts now. When your grace floods in, what could still be missing? You alone bring us along the proven path of the perfected ones. Your worship stands at the start of every undertaking; gods, sages, and seers begin their books and Puranas with you. How can I describe your ways? Where would I get such intellect? They call you the Lord of the humble; now make that word of yours come true. As I am swept along in the flood of illusion, drowning in the deep pool of worldly life, who but you can save me? Tuka says: come quickly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram opens a recitation the customary way, bowing first to Ganapati, and asks for the gifts a singer needs: sweetness in the telling and a mind strong enough to clear the dark. He confesses he has no intellect of his own to describe the god's ways, so the whole work rests on grace. Then he leans on the title the god is given, Lord of the humble, and asks him to prove it true. The plea sharpens into an image of danger: he is drowning in the deep water of worldly illusion, with no rescuer but this one. Come quickly, he ends; the invocation is also a cry for help.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

First comes Lambodara, the pot-bellied one, the giver of all accomplishments, bearing four arms and an axe, whose greatness cannot be measured. That God, the child of Gauri, is dancing with anklets jingling at his feet, joined by the company of Narada and Tumbara, while all obstacles flee.

The stage is set and the performance begins; he waves his arms and sways his body, adorned with vermilion paste and a serpent upon his crown. Gods, sages, and seers delight in him; one's eyes are never satisfied by gazing upon him.

Demons bow at his feet; he alone exists at the beginning and at the end. Says Tuka, he is the giver of all accomplishments, his beauty is beyond measure, and he shall carry us across the ocean of the world.

IN PLAIN WORDS

At the very beginning comes Lambodara, the pot-bellied one, giver of all attainments, four-armed, bearing the axe, whose limit cannot be told. That God, the child of Gauri, has begun to dance, anklets bound jingling at his feet, with Narada and Tumbara in his company, and the obstacles take flight. The stage is set, the dance begins; he makes his arms dance and sways his body, beautiful with vermilion paste, a serpent shining on his crown. Gods, sages, and seers delight in him; the eyes are never filled with looking. Demons bow at his feet; he alone is there at the beginning and at the end. Tuka says: he is the giver of all attainments, his form has no limit, and he will carry us across the ocean of the world.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram begins his telling by invoking Ganapati under his names, the pot-bellied Lambodara, four-armed and axe-bearing, beyond all measure. He paints the god dancing, anklets ringing, attended by the celestial singers, and as he dances the obstacles flee, which is just what this god is for. The picture is meant to be feasted on: vermilion, the serpent on the crown, gods and sages unable to look their fill, demons bowing at the feet. He is named as the one present at the start and the finish of everything. The invocation closes with its purpose stated plainly, that this giver of all attainments will carry the singer across the ocean of worldly life.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Vitthala is our very life, the abode of all sacred knowledge. Vitthala is the means to all spiritual attainment, and Vitthala is the resting place of meditation.

Vitthala is the deity of our family line; Vitthala is our wealth and kin. Vitthala is our merit and our purpose; the word of Vitthala alone delights us.

Vitthala has spread throughout all people, filling even the seven netherworlds. Vitthala pervades the three realms; Vitthala dwells in the minds of the sages.

Vitthala is father, mother, and uncle; Vitthala is sister and brother. Says Tuka, without Vitthala I have no desire for any other bond; there is nothing else now.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Vitthal is our very life. He is the home of all sacred knowledge. Vitthal is the means to every attainment. Vitthal is the rest at the end of meditation. Vitthal is the deity of our family line. Vitthal is our wealth and our kin. Vitthal is our merit, our whole purpose. Only talk of Vitthal pleases us. Vitthal has spread out through all people, filling even the seven netherworlds. Vitthal fills the three worlds. Vitthal lives in the minds of the sages. Vitthal is father, mother, uncle. Vitthal is sister and brother. Tuka says: without Vitthal I want no other bond. Now there is nothing else.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names Vitthal as the single content of his whole world. One after another he hands over to Vitthal the things a person normally divides up: life and knowledge, the means and the rest of the spiritual path, the family deity, wealth, kin, merit, purpose. Then he widens the claim outward, Vitthal fills all people, the seven netherworlds, the three realms, the minds of the sages, so there is nowhere the Lord is not. He folds in the family ties too: Vitthal is father, mother, sister, brother. The verse closes by emptying the field of every rival attachment; with Vitthal there is simply nothing else left to want.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What a blessed transaction this has been. I have reached the very place I longed for.

My devotion has become firm at Your feet, and my soul has found true rest. A good omen has borne fruit, and all weariness has been dispelled.

Now that I have beheld You, there is no more birth or death. I came to this holy place, and my destined merit was waiting right here.

The body-sense has been transformed, and the shadow of Brahman has fallen upon me. The wealth I have gained is inexhaustible, the bliss of imperishable Narayana.

I have seen the even feet of that formless yet embodied Madhusudana. This is an ancient coin from the beginning of the ages, a treasure hidden for so long, lost through estrangement.

Now for the sake of this soul I will not let go of my embrace. Says Tuka, I am weary, O Lord of the World; let no other sight distract me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This has turned out to be a good piece of trade. I have reached the very place I longed for. My love has come to rest, firm at his feet, and my soul has found its rest. The omen has borne good fruit. All my weariness is gone. Now that I have seen you, there is no more birth and death for me. It was good that I came to this place. The merit I had stored was waiting right here. The body-sense has changed; the body itself is changed. The shadow of Brahman has fallen on me. This wealth I have gained does not run out. It is the deathless mass of bliss. I have seen the even feet of Madhusudana, the formless one who took form. This is an old coin from the start of the ages, a treasure kept hidden for a long time, lost through being treated as a stranger. Now, for the sake of this soul, the embrace I have closed will not loosen. Tuka says: I am weary, O Lord of the world; let no other sight catch my eye.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks in the language of a merchant who has finally closed the deal of his life. He arrives at Pandhari, sees Vitthal's even feet, and his roaming soul stops and rests; with that sight, birth and death are over for him. He names what he has gained: not perishable goods but a wealth that never runs out, the deathless mass of bliss, the formless God who stands here in form. He calls it an ancient coin, a treasure that was always his but had gone missing only because he had treated God as a stranger. Having grasped it, he refuses to let go; the embrace stays shut, and he asks that nothing else ever draw his gaze away.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am helpless and full of offenses, devoid of good deeds, dull of mind and intellect. I have never once remembered You in my speech, O treasury of mercy, my mother and father.

I never listened to or sang Your sacred songs. I held on to shame and abandoned my own welfare.

I had no love for the Puranas or for sitting with the saints; I indulged greatly in slander of others. I neither did nor caused any good deed to be done.

No compassion arose in me when others suffered. I engaged in wrong trade and bore the burden of family.

I made no pilgrimage, performed no offerings with these hands and feet. No service to saints, no charity, no worship of Your image came to pass.

Sins of bad company and many wrongs were committed; I do not know what good I should do. Says Tuka, I have become my own enemy, a claimant against myself. But You are an ocean of mercy; carry me across.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am an orphan and a wrongdoer. I have no good deeds, my mind is dull, my judgment is weak. I never once brought you to mind in my speech, O treasury of mercy, my mother and father. I never listened to your songs or sang them. I held on to my shame and threw away my own good. I had no taste for the Puranas, no taste for sitting with the saints. I slandered others a great deal. I did no kindness and caused none to be done. No pity rose in me for those who suffered. I carried on trade that should not be done. I carried the load of my family. I made no pilgrimage. I kept this body and these hands and feet only for themselves. There was no service to saints, no giving of gifts, no worship and no sight of your image. Through bad company I committed many wrongs. I took many paths of unrighteousness. I do not know what good I should do. It is not fit even to speak it or recall it. I have become my own destroyer. I have turned into my own enemy, the one suing against myself. But you are an ocean of mercy. Tuka says: carry me across.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out a full ledger of failure and refuses to soften a single line of it. He admits he never remembered God, never sang or listened to the holy songs, slandered others, felt no pity, traded dishonestly, and skipped pilgrimage, service, charity, and worship. The point of the confession is not self-loathing for its own sake; it is that he has made himself his own enemy, the very plaintiff in the case against himself, and so he has no standing to plead his own merits. That is exactly why the abhanga turns on one fact alone: God is an ocean of mercy. Having nothing to offer, he stops offering and simply asks to be carried across.

Now I have attained all joys. The days of biting my nails in anxiety are over.

All that was foreign has ended, and everything feels like my mother's home. Vitthal and Rakhumai are near, like sister, brother, father, and mother.

They are kin to all my people; nothing feels unfamiliar anymore. Sovereignty has come over all the world's forms, and dependence has departed.

Everything is my own now; both shame and worry have been banished. Desire roams freely and dwells at home, in the comfort of its own authority.

Whatever is done, one does it oneself, with no embarrassment over mistakes. I had endured the exile of a daughter-in-law's house for so many long days, fulfilling so many demands.

Now I am free and at ease. They fondle me with loving play, they call me with delight.

Says Tuka, my mother and father speak sweet words, and I babble before them like a child.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now I have come to every joy, made pure. The days of biting my nails in worry are gone. Everything that was foreign has ended. Everywhere I look I see my mother's home. Vitthal and Rakhumai are close to me, like sister and brother, father and mother. They are kin to all my people. I no longer know what a stranger is. Authority has spread over all the forms of the world, and dependence has gone away. Now everything is my own. Shame and worry have both been milked dry and sent off. Desire wanders free and lives at home, in the comfort of its own house. Here you do as you yourself please; you keep no fear of making a mistake. For a long time, for many days, I bore the harsh life of a bride in her husband's house, fulfilling so many demands. Now I am free and at ease with myself. They pet me with love. They call me with delight. Tuka says: my mother and father speak sweet words, and I babble in front of them like a child.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures the soul as a married woman who has finally come home to her parents, where nothing is foreign and no one is a stranger. He has lived the harsh in-law years of worldly life, fulfilling endless demands and biting his nails in worry, and now that he has reached Vitthal and Rakhumai every relation is kin and every place is home. With dependence gone, shame and worry are dismissed and even desire settles down quietly inside its own house. The image is not pride but the relief of belonging: the strain of performing for outsiders is over. He ends as a doted-on child, babbling in front of a mother and father who answer with sweet words.

Worldly life, the prayer for one foothold

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My whole life has passed in the pursuit of every pleasure, yet not a moment's effort was made toward liberation. Wandering in all directions, I grew weary.

My soul is entangled in maya. No one knows my true welfare; without my own effort nothing can be done.

Relatives are merely arrangements of comfort; none of them know my beginning or end. How shall I describe the torment of the womb, O Narayana? Dwelling amid flesh, filth, and urine, I remembered You every moment.

When my final journey comes, those who were near will not be seen. Earth embraces earth, and one travels alone with one's accumulated deeds.

Now, O God, grant me this much: let some service at Your feet come to pass. Says Tuka, appealing to Keshava, guide me through this worldly trial.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My whole life has gone in hoping for every kind of pleasure. I made no effort, not for a moment, toward liberation. Wandering in all directions, I grew tired. My soul has been wrapped up by maya. No one knows my true good. Nothing can be done about it except by me. My own people are only an arrangement of comfort. None of them knows my beginning or my end. How can I tell the torment of the womb that I suffered, O Narayana? Lying among flesh and filth and urine, I kept meditating on you, moment after moment. When I set out on the final journey, those who were near will not be seen. Earth takes a handful of earth. One goes alone, with the company of one's own stored deeds. Now, O God, do this much for me: let some service at your feet come to pass. Tuka pleads with Keshava: lead me through this trial of worldly life.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures a whole lifetime and finds it spent chasing pleasures, with not one moment given to liberation. He sees through the comforts of family: relatives are an arrangement that eases this life but knows nothing of where the soul comes from or where it goes. At death the picture is stark, the body is just earth folding back into earth, and the soul leaves alone carrying only its accumulated deeds. Against that solitude he recalls how even in the womb's misery he kept turning to God, and on that thread he hangs his single request. He does not ask for rescue from the world, only for enough grace to perform some service at God's feet while he is still passing through it.

Prayer, the belly and the broken path

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O dark-complexioned one, O treasure-house of virtues, Narayana, hear our plea and protect Your own helpless ones. Great are the hardships of this belly; they have made us fallen from our duty, led us astray from Your path, and made us chatter for these worldly needs.

I have been scattered among people, given as a servant to worldly life. I do not know when You will free me; I am bound fast in strong bonds.

Here no remembrance arises at all; there is not a moment's rest. I have fallen into another current, and no welfare is in sight.

My life has been spent in separation, wandering on futile journeys, afflicted by disease and suffering. I have become my own enemy.

What son, what wife, what friend is truly mine? Why did You spread this net? Says Tuka, O Lord of the World.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O dark and lovely one with form, O Narayana whose name is the treasure-house of virtues, listen to our request and protect your own poor ones. The hardships of this belly are many. They have made us fall from our right work. They have led us off your path and set us chattering for the sake of these needs. I have been scattered among people, made the bonded servant of worldly life. I do not know when you will set me free. I am bound fast in strong cords. Here no remembrance of you rises at all. There is not a single moment of rest. I have fallen into another current. I can see no good for myself anywhere. My life has been used up in separation, in pointless wandering and travel, worn down by sickness and pain. I have become my own enemy. What son, what wife, what friend is truly mine? Why did you spread out this net? Tuka says: O Teacher of the world.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram traces his lost devotion back to a plain cause: the daily pressure of the belly. The need to feed and provide has dragged him off God's path, scattered him among people, and bound him as a servant to worldly life, until not a single moment of remembrance is left. He does not pretend the burden is light, but he also refuses to mistake it for his true home, asking what son, wife, or friend is finally his own. The blame turns inward, he has become his own enemy, and then outward in a raw question to God: why was this net of attachment spread in the first place? The cry stays a cry; he leaves it open, addressed only to the Teacher of the world.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now restore my awareness and turn my mind back from here. Free me, O treasury of mercy; I am caught in the wheel of time.

If You will it, nothing is impossible. A grain of sand becomes a mountain, a mountain becomes a grain.

Open the mine of Your compassion upon me, O Mother. The past was spent in ignorance, passing by its own nature and tendencies.

I did not realize my life was growing short, and the shelter ahead has slipped away. Now fear grips me; day by day time marches on.

What have I accomplished by coming here? I never once remembered Your feet. Forgive, O Purushottama, the offenses already committed.

Instill love for Your name and free me from delusion. May my heart dwell in Your virtues, may I find a place at Your feet.

Says Tuka, let my tongue savor this nectar until it is fully satisfied.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now hold my mind steady. Turn my thoughts back from here. Set me free and take me, O treasury of mercy. I am caught at the joint of the wheel of time. If you will it, what cannot be done? A grain of sand can become a mountain, a mountain a grain of sand. Open the mine of your compassion upon me, O Mother. The time behind me was spent in ignorance, passing away by its own nature and habits. I did not notice that my life had grown short, and the shelter ahead has slipped past me. Now fear comes over me. Day by day the time keeps walking on. What have I done by coming here? I never once brought your feet to mind. Forgive the offenses already done, O Purushottama. Take me into love for your name. Free me from this delusion. Let my heart dwell in your virtues. Let my place be at your feet. Let my tongue drink this nectar until the thirst is fully satisfied. Tuka says this.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays from inside the grinding wheel of time, asking God to halt his scattered mind and turn it back before the machinery carries him off. He confesses the years went by in ignorance almost without his noticing, the lifespan quietly shrank, and the shelter he should have reached has already slipped behind him, which is why fear now sets in. Against that he sets God's sheer power: if God wills it, a grain of sand becomes a mountain, so a wasted life can still be saved. He asks for what he failed to take on his own, forgiveness, love for the Name, a place at the feet, release from delusion. The closing image is thirst: let the tongue keep drinking the nectar of God's praise until it is finally satisfied.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I will meditate upon the One who gave this life as a gift. I will sing the virtues of Narayana, the life of the world.

He who stands on the bank of the Bhima, hands upon His waist, with beautiful even feet, I will hold Him forever in my heart. He who is death to the demons, the protector of His devotees, who plays all these wondrous games, at His feet I bow my head.

He who played among the cowherd boys, that Vanamali, who sent Bali to the netherworld and dwells in the depths, my Lord. He who is an image of beauty, who possesses all arts, who wears the Vaijayanti garland around His neck, to Him I prostrate again and again.

He whose name destroys sin, whose servant is Lakshmi herself, who is a mass of radiance, to Him Says Tuka, I surrender with my whole being.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He gave this life as a gift. I will think on him. I will sing the virtues of Narayana, the life of the world. He stands on the bank of the Bhima, hands resting on his waist, his even feet so lovely. I will hold him in my heart and stay there. He is death to the demons and the keeper of his devotees. He plays all these wonders by his sleight. At his feet I lay my brow. He played among the cowherd boys, that Vanamali. He sent Bali down to the lower world and dwells there in the depths, my Lord. He is an image of beauty; in his body are all the arts; around his neck is the Vaijayanti garland. Time and again I bow flat before him. His name destroys sin. Lakshmi herself is his servant. He is a heap of pure light. With my whole being, Tuka takes refuge in him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers the gift of his own life with the only return he can make: continual remembrance and song. He builds up Vitthal feature by feature, the figure standing on the Bhima's bank with hands on his waist, the slayer of demons who shelters his devotees, the cowherd Vanamali who once humbled Bali, the beautiful one garlanded with the Vaijayanti. The piling of names and deeds is itself the worship; each one is a reason to bow. By naming that Lakshmi is his servant and his very name destroys sin, Tukaram measures how far this Lord outranks anything else he could turn to. So the abhanga ends where it must, in total surrender of his whole being.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Will I ever be redeemed? Will Narayana ever show me mercy? O saints, please tell me so and bring peace to my mind. Will this karma ever be broken? Will right and wrong be resolved? By what means can the secret be known? This is why I feel so troubled.

Will my mind ever become steady? Will no calamity come in between? Will the awareness I have grasped be maintained? I cannot tell when the end will come. Will such merit ever be mine that I may clasp God's feet in embrace? Will the Lord of the World look upon me with kindness, and will my throat choke with devotion? Will these eyes ever be satisfied, seeing that blissful celebration? The nature of my accumulated destiny is unknown; longings stir in desire.

Says Tuka, I carry this anxiety at all times, day and night. I have no strength of my own by which I may attain the fruit with certainty.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Will I be saved? Will Narayana show me mercy? Tell me, O holy people; bring my mind some peace. Will this karma be cut off? Will right and wrong come to an end? By what means is the secret known? This is why I feel such strain. Will my mind stay steady? Will no calamity come in between? Will the awareness I have grasped be kept? I do not know when the end will come. Will I ever hold such merit in hand that I throw my arms around God's feet, that the Lord of the world fondles me, that my throat chokes with feeling? Will these eyes be cooled, seeing that joyful sight? I do not know what my stored deeds are. Longings stir in my desire. I carry this worry always, at every hour, restless night and day. Tuka says: I have no strength of my own by which I would surely reach the fruit.

WHAT IT MEANS

This abhanga is a string of anxious questions, and Tukaram lets them stand unanswered because the anxiety is the honest state of the seeker. He does not know whether his karma will break, whether his mind will hold steady, whether some disaster will cut across his path, or whether he will live to see the day he embraces God's feet with a choked throat. The longing is intense, but so is the uncertainty about what his accumulated deeds have earned. He even turns to the saints and begs them to settle his mind. The closing line names the root of the unrest: he has no strength of his own that could guarantee the fruit, which is precisely why he must throw himself on mercy rather than effort.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You alone are the benefactor of the helpless, the destroyer of sorrow, attachment, and anxiety. I have come to You now as a refuge; save me, O merciful mother and father.

Grant me the company of saints and service at Your feet, so that I may never forget You. This is the sole wish of my heart; fulfill it, O God.

Give me devotion, love, and the glory to praise Your virtues and name. Remove all obstacles from my path; please hear this prayer of mine.

I ask for nothing else, no wealth, happiness, kingdom, or riches. Let me not burden You with anything other than devotion, O mother and father.

With folded hands I place my head at Your feet. Says Tuka, appealing to the Lord of Pandhari, drench me in the color of Your story and relieve my suffering, O mother and father.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You alone are the giver to the orphan, the worry that destroys sorrow and attachment. I have come to you now for refuge. Save me, O merciful mother and father. Give me the company of saints and service at your feet, so that I never forget you. This is the one longing of my soul; fulfill my wish, O God. Give me feeling, love, and the gift to praise your virtues and your name. Take the obstacles out of my hands; please hear this request of mine. I ask for nothing else. No happiness, no riches, no kingdom, no wealth. Let me lay nothing on you, mother and father, but devotion. With folded hands I place my head at your feet. Tuka pleads with the Lord of Pandhari: bring out the story rich in color, relieve my pain, O mother and father.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram comes as a refugee and then is careful to ask for the right thing. He explicitly turns away wealth, comfort, kingdom, every prize people usually beg from God, and asks instead only for what keeps him near God: the company of saints, service at the feet, and the love and skill to praise the Name. The single danger he fears is forgetting, so his one petition is the means that prevents it. By insisting he wants to lay no other burden on God but devotion, he frees the prayer of all self-interest. He ends with his head literally at the feet of the Lord of Pandhari, asking only that the colorful story of God keep flowing and his pain be eased.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

These vermilion-smeared village deities and spirits, who worships them? They themselves cry for their own bellies and beg for scraps of food as offerings. They torment others to fulfill their own desires.

What can such beggars ever give? Their wealth is now known: a petty, shallow, short-lived intelligence. Can a slave's guest expect anything? The master gives with his own hand, with kind and proper words.

But these are empty, always powerless. What is that puddle-water? It cannot even wet the lips, yet the thirst remains.

They labor from start to finish, and anger alone is the fruit of their rituals. They daub faces with paste, carry heavy loads in abundance, and inflict punishment upon themselves.

God calls such ones charlatans. Not so is Narayana, who pervades the world, Janardana.

Says Tuka, contemplate Him, and all beings will come to bow at His feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

These vermilion-smeared village goddesses and godlings, who worships such spirits and ghosts? They themselves cry for their own bellies. They beg for scraps of food as offerings. To get what they want, they torment others. What can such beggars give you? Their worth is known now: a small, ready, low cunning. Does a servant's guest get fed? It is the master who gives with his own hand, with kind and fitting words. These are empty, always weak and powerless. What is this puddle water? It will not wet the lips, and the thirst stays. You labor from start to finish, and the only fruit of the ritual is more anger. They smear paste to cover the face. They carry deep, heavy loads beyond measure. They bring punishment down on themselves. God calls such a one a fraud. Narayana is not like that, the all-pervading one, Janardana. Tuka says: meditate on him. All beings come to bow at his feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks a whole economy of fear-worship: the smeared village godlings and spirits that people propitiate. His argument is hard-headed, not contemptuous of the worshippers but exposing the bargain, since these objects of worship are themselves beggars crying for their own bellies, all they can dispense is a petty cunning, and they extort by tormenting. He uses the homely image of puddle water that will not even wet the lips: such worship costs constant labor and pays back only frustration and self-inflicted punishment. The point lands as a warning to examine where one places one's devotion. Set against the beggar-gods is Narayana, the Lord who actually pervades everything and gives like a master with his own hand; turn there, Tukaram says, and all beings find a place to bow.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Souls deluded by the pull of sense-pleasures, who will now show them compassion? They do not develop devotion to Narayana even after attaining a human body. What happiness is there in clinging to worldly life while falling prey to Death? The body is already measured; once branded, they are dragged away.

The wretched will suffer at the end when their lifespan is cut short. What was enjoyed before will return; they will meet birth again, millions of times over.

Like oxen yoked to the oil-press, blindfolded, goaded from behind, they walk on not knowing how far, tormented by the ache of hunger and thirst. The body for whose sake all this is done, shaped by fate and destiny, they regard as permanent, yet they never chant the eternal Name.

Says Tuka, Vitthal costs nothing at all, yet to these unfortunate ones He seems too expensive. They spend only cheap words.

How deep is their misfortune.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Souls deluded by the pull of sense-objects, who will now pity them? Devotion to Narayana does not arise in them, even after they have won the place of a human body. What happiness is there in holding to worldly life and falling into the food of Death? The measure has already been set on this body. Once it is marked out, they are dragged off. The wretched will suffer in the end, when the cut comes with the end of life. What was enjoyed before will return; there will be a meeting with birth again, millions of times. Like an ox yoked to the oil-press with its eyes tied shut, goaded from behind so it burns, it walks on, not knowing how far it has gone, broken with the ache of hunger and thirst. The body, for whose sake all this is done, shaped by fate and act and the deeds stored up, they take it to be lasting, and they do not do the daily remembrance of the Name. Tuka says: Vitthal costs nothing to gain, yet to these people he is too dear a price. To spend mere free words, how deep is the misfortune of these unlucky ones.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram aims this at the waste of a human birth, the one chance, he holds, to win devotion, squandered by souls dragged along by the senses. He warns that clinging to worldly pleasure simply feeds the body to Death, whose measure is already taken, and that the cycle of enjoying and being reborn will repeat by the millions. His central image is the blindfolded ox on the oil-press, goaded in circles, walking endlessly without knowing it has gone nowhere, the picture of a life of effort that never arrives. The bitter twist is the price: Vitthal can be had for nothing, costing only the free breath of saying the Name, yet these people find even that too expensive to spend. The reproach is meant to wake the listener, not to write anyone off; the depth of the misfortune is that the cure is free and still refused.

You have come into this world; now do this one thing. Gently take the path of liberation.

The rod of Death, the torment of Yama's cauldron, these are terrible. Why do you not see the horror? Yama has no compassion when he drags the life-breath out of the body.

Just as a thief caught stealing grain is seized and punished, so it is with the soul. One who has not given charity, how will he fare on that road? The path takes a detour then.

If you do not know, listen now: they seize and lead you away like a prisoner. Not even a moment can you walk barefoot, and nothing avails you then.

They drag you over thorns and force your arms around pillars of fire. Seeing this, bodies tremble as they are made to walk through that dreadful river.

They are plunged in and beaten with Yama's rod upon the surface. You who cannot endure hunger or thirst for even a moment, they will hold you for ages.

The body you pampered in comfort is rolled on burning ground amid flames. Therefore make some effort.

If you can, become detached from the world. If you can, chant the Name aloud.

Says Tuka, taste the nectar of devotion and service.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You who have come into this world, do this one thing. Quietly take hold of the path of liberation. The rod of Death, the great torment of the cauldron, why, O reckless one, do you not see it? That Yama has no pity when he pulls the foul life-breath out of the body. As a stray ox caught in the grain is seized, as a thief is held and tortured, so it goes. One who has given nothing, how will he fare? On that road there is a long detour for him. If you do not already know it, listen to how it goes: they seize you and lead you off bound, like a captive. Not for a moment can you walk barefoot, and nothing you do helps you then. They drag you over thorns. They wind your arms around pillars of fire. The body trembles to see it; they march you into that river. Where there is no footing they drown you, and on the surface they beat you with Yama's rod. You who cannot bear hunger and thirst for an hour, they hold you for ages. The body you kept so cool and pampered, they roll it on burning ground amid the flames. So make some effort. If you can manage it, become detached. If you can manage it, raise the sound of the Name. Tuka says: take to the service and the nectar of devotion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram preaches here with the full machinery of Yama's hell laid out in front of the listener: the rod, the cauldron, the thorns, the pillars of fire, the river with no footing. The terror is deliberate and pointed, the soul that gave nothing and remembered nothing is dragged off bound like a caught thief, and the very body that was pampered and kept cool is rolled in flames. He drives home the contrast between an hour's hunger we cannot bear now and ages of torment later, so the danger feels real rather than abstract. But the threat is only the setup; the whole point is the way out, named plainly at the end. Take the path of liberation gently, grow detached if you can, and above all raise the sound of the Name and taste the nectar of devotion, while there is still time to choose.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even what You do not speak, I understand, O God. You feel shame on account of Your own reputation.

I am not putting You in any difficulty; what hesitation can there be, O Keshava? Settle this matter and give me a clear answer. If You will not accept me, tell me plainly, and then I will decide what to do.

The law of giving speaks thus between giver and beggar: whatever one can, one should give; refusal harms both parties. Therefore I persist in hope, waiting for Your word.

With great effort I hold firm and will not abandon my resolve. Until I receive what is Yours to give, I will not leave this place.

This is my true vow. Says Tuka, say whether it shall be or not.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even the things you do not say, I have understood, O God. You feel shame for your own name. I am not trying to trap you; what need is there for shyness, Keshava? Carry this through to the end. Speak to me, give me your answer. If you will not take me as your own, say so, and then I will decide what to do. The law of giving speaks like this between a giver and a beggar: give what you can; to turn away harms both of you. So I keep on hoping, waiting for your word. I steady myself with great effort, and I will not let go of my vow. Without taking what is yours to give, I will not move from here. Know this is my true vow. Tuka says: tell me, will it be, or not?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram has cornered God like a beggar who will not leave the door. He claims he can already read the silence: God hangs back out of concern for his own reputation as the savior of the lowly, and Tukaram presses exactly there. He invokes the plain ethic between a giver and one who asks: a refusal shames both parties, so God cannot afford to send him away. The vow is a sit-in. He will not move, will not abandon hope, until he receives what is God's to give, and he demands a clear yes or no rather than more silence.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now I will not fall again into the traps of worldly sorrow. I will take refuge with the saints and beg for a place at their feet.

I do not know what accumulated merit I had, or by what virtue one attains Your feet. Do not abandon me now, O Mother; I cry out, releasing all restraint.

I have been greatly tormented by worldly life, by the poisonous snares of attachment and illusion. The waves of the three qualities come crashing, and under that great suffering I have wept aloud.

How many more sorrows shall I recount? The whole condition of worldly existence is unbearable; even stones would split. Fear fills my heart and trembling has overtaken me.

Now I can endure no more, not even the faintest whiff of worldly life. Though I have knowledge, I have gone mad.

Says Tuka, come to me, O Infinite One.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now I will not fall again into the traps of worldly sorrow. I will take refuge with the saints and beg for a place at their feet. I do not know what merit I had stored up, or by what good deed one reaches your feet. Do not let go of me now, Mother; I cry out and hold nothing back. The world has worn me down with the poison of attachment and illusion. The waves of the three qualities come crashing in, and under that great pain I have wept aloud. How many more sorrows shall I count? The whole state of worldly life cannot be borne; even stones would crack. Fear fills my heart and trembling has taken hold of me. Now I cannot stand it at all, not even the faintest smell of worldly life. I have gone mad, though I still know. Tuka says: come to me, O Infinite One.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the moment of breaking, where Tukaram swears off the world for good and runs to refuge. He does not claim he earned this turn; he confesses he has no idea what merit brought him near God's feet. The suffering he names is not bad luck but the structure of worldly life itself: attachment, illusion, and the three qualities of nature breaking over him in waves. He describes a fear so total that even stone would split, and a strange double state, mad with grief yet still clear-eyed enough to know where to run. The poem ends as a child's cry to the Mother and to the Infinite: come now.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now do with me as You see fit. Save me if You will, or destroy me.

Keep me near or cast me far. Throw me back into the world or do not.

I have come to You in my ignorance, knowing nothing of devotion or love. I am dull in all wisdom, more destitute than the poorest wretch.

My mind is not steady; it is not in my control. The senses run wild and cannot be restrained.

All my strategies are exhausted; peace and tranquility are nowhere near. I have surrendered my entire being at Your feet, placed my very life there.

Now apply whatever remedy You know. You alone are my everything, O God.

I remain holding fast to faith, clinging firmly to Your support. Says Tuka, I know no other effort; this matter is Yours to resolve.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now do with me whatever you see fit. Save me or kill me. Keep me close or hold me far off. Throw me back into the world, or do not. I have come to you knowing nothing. I know nothing of faith, nothing of devotion. I am dull in all understanding, poorer than the poorest beggar. My mind is not steady; it is not in my hands. The senses run loose and cannot be reined in. Every plan of mine is finished; peace and stillness are nowhere near me. I have laid bare all that I feel. I have set my very life at your feet. Now apply whatever cure you know. You alone are my whole refuge, O God. I stay here holding to faith, gripping your support hard. I know no other effort. Tuka says: this matter is yours to settle as befits you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram hands over the whole decision and keeps nothing back, even his own fate. He offers no merit and no skill; he confesses an unsteady mind, runaway senses, and a stock of strategies that has run completely dry. This is surrender precisely because he has stopped negotiating outcomes: save or destroy, near or far, the world or not, he leaves all of it to God. Having admitted he can do nothing himself, the only thing he still does is hold on, gripping God's support as his single refuge. The closing line puts the burden of the result where he says it belongs, on God, as fitting God's own nature.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O God, You are an ocean of grace and compassion, our mother, father, and brother. You are the ocean of fulfillment and the ocean of all means. You are the fulfillment of life, the ocean of all means.

You sever the bonds of worldly existence and the noose of Death. For those who surrender, You are an adamantine fortress.

In granting fearlessness, You are supremely generous. You are beyond the comprehension of all the gods, unchanging and imperishable.

Even the greatest praises grow weary in singing of You. What then can a fool like me say? Do not keep me at a distance any longer from understanding Your nature.

I do not know devotion, yet I call myself Yours. I do not know worship, yet I perform Your puja.

For the sake of Your own Name, O Keshiraja, You must come running. By Your strength, O Lord of Pandhari, I have become carefree and my suffering has ended.

Says Tuka, I have placed the burden upon Your head and fear nothing at all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

God, you are an ocean of grace and mercy. You are our mother, father, and brother. You are the wealth of life, the ocean of every means. You break the bonds of worldly existence and the noose of Death. For those who surrender, you are a fortress of diamond. In giving fearlessness you are generous. You are beyond the reach of all the gods, changeless and undying. Even great praises grow tired in singing of you. What can a fool like me say? Do not keep me at a distance any longer. I do not know true feeling, yet I call myself yours. I do not know worship, yet I do your puja. For the sake of your own Name, Keshiraja, you must come running. By your strength, Lord of Pandhari, I have grown free of care and my pain has ended. I have laid the load upon your head. Tuka says: I fear nothing at all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram piles up the names of God's nature, then uses them as leverage. If God is grace, refuge, mother and father, the one who cuts the noose of death, then that very reputation obliges him to come. The devotee admits he has no real feeling and no skill in worship, so his only claim is on God's side, not his own: God must act for the sake of his own Name. The poem's hinge is the transfer of weight. Having set the whole burden on God's head, Tukaram declares himself carefree and free of fear, because the responsibility is no longer his to carry.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What happiness is there in worldly life that I should cling to it? Tell me, O Hari. Everything is perishable; the Eternal One remains distant.

First came the torment of dwelling in the womb. What can be said of those trials? Nine months of suffering were endured before I arrived in this world.

Childhood passed in ignorance, youth was spent in the agony of sense-pleasures, and old age brought nothing but worry. One dies only to be born again.

There is not even a moment's rest. Through eighty-four lakh births I have been driven by cravings chasing me from behind.

Let fire consume my sense of "I" and "mine." Enough of this turmoil. I will become a pauper and stand at Your door.

I am Your servant, a humble laborer. Says Tuka, show me mercy now.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What happiness is there in this world that I should cling to it? Tell me, Hari. It is all perishable, and meanwhile the Eternal stays far from me. First came the dwelling in the womb. What can I say of those trials? Nine months of pain were borne before I came into this life. Childhood went by without my knowing it. Youth was spent in the ache of sense-pleasures. Old age brought worry. One dies only to be born again. There is not a single moment's rest. Through eighty-four lakh births I have been driven, cravings always chasing at my back. Let fire take my sense of "I" and "mine." Enough of this whirling now. I will become a pauper and stand at your door. I am your servant, your lowly laborer. Tuka says: show me mercy now.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram walks through a whole human life and finds no resting place in any stage of it. The womb is torment, childhood passes unnoticed, youth burns in craving, old age sinks into worry, and then death only restarts the round through countless births. His verdict is that the world offers nothing worth clinging to, since all of it perishes while the Eternal stays out of reach. The decisive line is his curse on "I" and "mine": let fire take the ego that drives the whole exhausting chase. Having given up every claim, he chooses the lowest place, a pauper and laborer at God's door, and asks only for mercy.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the company of saints, joy grows ever greater through Your Name. All karmas are burned away, and I sway in love at all times.

Therefore I have no worry at all. You alone are our mother and father, sister, brother, uncle, and every relation in every place.

This certainty has become clear to me, and so You will not forget me. You abide giving me courage, outwardly and inwardly, always near me.

Sorrow cannot even approach my dreams. Liberation and worldly enjoyment have become servants to me.

Their secret rests with You, dwelling within us in the joy of love. Where the sound of Your kirtan resounds, sins are burned and faults flee.

What lack could there be in our bliss? Says Tuka, we drink the nectar of Brahman.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Joy grows in the company of the saints, doubling day by day through your Name. All my deeds are burned to ash, and I sway in love at every hour. So I have no worry at all. You alone are my mother and father, sister, brother, and uncle, and every relation in every place. This certainty has become clear to me, and so you will not forget me. You stay close, giving me courage, outside and within, always near. Sorrow cannot even enter my dreams. Liberation and worldly enjoyment have become my serving maids. Their secret rests with you, who live within us in the joy of love. Where the sound of your kirtan rings out, sins burn and faults run away. What could be missing from our bliss? Tuka says: we drink the nectar of Brahman.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the bright counterpart to the poems of dread: in the company of saints and the singing of the Name, the world's terror simply has no foothold. Tukaram says the Name burns away his accumulated deeds and replaces every family tie with God alone, so that he carries no worry. He makes a startling reversal of the usual spiritual goal: liberation itself, along with worldly enjoyment, now waits on him like a servant, because their secret belongs to the God who lives within. Where kirtan resounds, sin and fault flee on their own. The verse ends in the fullness it describes, the taste of Brahman, with nothing left to lack.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O God, You are our compassionate protector of devotion, lover of the lowly, tender mother full of affection. You bear the entire burden and carry it forward.

All concern falls upon You. You must watch over us when we stray, and You entrust us again to the saints.

You cannot bear to leave us unattended for even a moment. We have no fear, no anxiety, no dread of birth or death.

The other world has merged into this one, and all of Vaikuntha has arrived here. Day and night cannot be distinguished; an unbroken flame of light blazes constantly.

The waves of bliss are beyond description, and that joy surpasses all praise. You have adorned me with the ornaments of Your Name, bestowing precious jewels upon me.

Says Tuka, by Your virtues, what could we possibly lack?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

God, you are merciful to us, protector of devotion, tender to the lowly. You are our mother, the loving one who nurses us. You carry the whole load forward. All the care has become yours. You must guard us when we go crooked, and you hand us over again to the saints. You cannot bear to leave us alone for even a moment. We have no fear, no worry, no dread, none at all, of birth or of death. The other world has merged into this one; all of Vaikuntha has come here. Day cannot be told apart from night; an unbroken flame of light burns steadily. The waves of bliss are beyond telling, and that joy is past all praise. You have dressed me in the ornaments of your Name and laid those jewels on me. Tuka says: by your goodness, what one thing could we lack?

WHAT IT MEANS

Here God is cast above all as the nursing Mother who shoulders the entire burden of her child's life, including the duty of correcting him when he strays. Because that care is wholly God's, the devotee is released from the two great fears, birth and death. Tukaram describes the result as heaven collapsing into the present: Vaikuntha has arrived here, day and night blur into one unbroken light, and bliss runs past anything words can hold. The Name itself is the jewelry God has put on him. The closing question is rhetorical and complete: under such care, nothing whatever is missing.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I feel anxious because You are not near, and on top of that the authority of so many worldly powers presses down. I cannot untangle myself; the knot only tightens.

I am caught in the grip of powerful karma. A great burden has fallen upon my head, this sense of "I" and "mine." I have been robbed in broad daylight, plundered in my own home while fully aware.

I ask You only this much now: entrust me to the saints. My throat is hoarse from calling out to You; do not be indifferent any longer.

The hour is desperately close. What shall I do then? Once the day has passed, the shadow will be cast aside, and only regret will remain in the night.

The force of accumulated destiny will take hold, and dependence will grip my body. No hiding place is visible, and great anxiety has set in.

Says Tuka, in this perilous juncture, rush to me, O treasury of mercy. My strength and wisdom, all my accomplishments, are Your feet alone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am anxious because you are not near me, and on top of that the power of many worldly things presses down on me. I cannot get free; the knot only tightens as I fall. I have been caught by mighty karma. A heavy load has fallen on my head, this "I" and this "mine." I have been robbed in broad daylight, plundered inside my own house while I watched and knew. I ask you only this much now: hand me over to the saints. My throat is hoarse from calling you; do not be cold to me any longer. The hour is dangerously close. What am I to do then? Once the day is gone, the shade will be thrown off, and only regret will be left in the night. The force of my past deeds will take hold; helplessness will grip my body. I see no place to hide, and great fear has set in. Tuka says: in this tight corner, come running, treasury of mercy. My strength, my wits, all my success, are your feet alone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram cries out from a sense of siege, hemmed in by worldly powers and by the tightening knot of his own past actions. His sharpest image is the daylight robbery: he watches his own "I" and "mine" plunder him inside his own house, fully aware and still unable to stop it. The urgency is about time, the hour is desperately near, and once the daylight is gone there will be nothing left but regret and the grip of destiny in the dark. His one request is humble and specific: hand me over to the saints. He ends by locating all his strength and success not in himself but only at God's feet, and begs the merciful one to rush in before it is too late.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now, setting aside questions of right and wrong, consider my welfare. You know me to be a sinner, yet I have still come as one who surrenders.

Here the king and the pauper stand on equal ground; there is no distinction in Your house. Having reached Your feet by whatever means, do not cast me out again.

This has been the custom from ages past; I do not speak idle words. By the circumstances of my own life, this fame is spoken throughout the world.

I have placed the burden on my head and abandoned worldly propriety and conduct. I considered this course beforehand: the imperishable supreme state.

Here, one thing is needed: patience. But I have deemed the body to be impermanent and worthless, and I have grasped Your Name as the essence.

I have bid farewell to everyone, resolving to hold firm to what I have chosen. Says Tuka, the saints have instructed me. O God, grant me a place at the end.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now set aside questions of right and wrong, and look to what is good for me. You know me as a sinner, yet I have still come to surrender. Here the king and the pauper are equal; in your house there is no high and no low. By whatever means I have reached your feet, do not throw me out again. This has been the way from old times; I am not speaking idle words. By what happened in my own life, this fame of yours is sung throughout the world. I have set the load on my head and let go of worldly custom and dealings. I thought it through first: this is the imperishable, supreme state. One thing is needed here, patience. But I have judged the body to be perishable and worthless, and I have grasped your Name as the one thing that matters. I have taken leave of everyone, holding firm in my heart to what I have chosen. Tuka says: the saints have told me so. Give me a place at the end, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks God to suspend the ledger of right and wrong and simply look to his welfare, openly naming himself a sinner who has come anyway. His claim rests on God's own house rule: there king and beggar stand equal, with no distinction, so a soul that has reached the feet by any means at all must not be turned out. He has already paid his side of the bargain, dropping worldly custom and the demands of reputation, judging the body worthless, and clutching the Name as the only thing of substance. The one virtue still required of him is patience. Backed by the instruction of the saints, he asks for the only thing that finally matters, a place with God at the end.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How blessed it is that I was born and received this priceless treasure of a human body. It is the greatest of all gains, the supreme wealth by which one becomes worthy of true joy.

You have given me senses, hands, feet, ears, eyes, and a mouth to speak, by which one may attain You, O Narayana, and the disease of worldly existence may be cured. Grain by grain, merit accumulates, and through many births this human form is earned.

Your Name has come to my tongue, and the company of saints has been granted. Having been brought to this blessed place, how can I ever repay this debt? I will place this very life at Your feet, O Panduranga, my Mother.

The veil over my eyes has been removed, the dirt of virtues and faults has been washed away. Nursing me at Your breast, You cooled me and laid me to rest in my true home.

There is no equal to this bliss. Says Tuka, the telling of it tastes sweet. You have taken form for our sake, compelled by devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How good it is that I came to be born and won a thing like this human body. It is the highest heap of great gain, the wealth that makes one fit for true joy. You gave me senses, hands, feet, ears, eyes, and a mouth to speak, so that I might win you, Narayana, and the sickness of worldly existence would end. Grain by grain the merit gathers, and across many births this is earned. Your Name has come to my tongue, and the company of saints has been given to me. You have brought me to such a place. How can I ever repay it? I will lay this whole life at your feet. You are my Mother, Panduranga. You have lifted the film from my eyes and washed off the stain of my virtues and faults. You held me to your breast, cooled me, and laid your child to sleep in its own true home. There is no equal to this joy. Telling of it tastes sweet. Tuka says: you have taken form for our sake, drawn by devotion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram counts the human birth as the supreme stroke of fortune, the one form of life equipped to win God and be cured of the disease of worldly existence. The body's faculties are not for indulgence but are tools given for that single purpose, and he reminds himself how rare the chance is, earned grain by grain across many lifetimes. He cannot repay such a debt, so he offers the only thing he has, his whole life laid at the feet. The closing images are wholly maternal: God as Mother lifts the film from his eyes, washes off even his good and bad alike, nurses him cool, and lays the child to rest in its true home. He ends in wonder that God takes form at all, pulled into shape by the love of devotees.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My devotion is slight, my intellect is slight, my lifespan is short and not in my hands. I am an embodiment of offenses.

O Lord of the Vedas, please listen. How many faults can I atone for? Virtues and faults have filled the space within.

Past, present, and future stretch on; there is no end in sight. Through varied karmas and eighty-four lakh births, the body endures threefold suffering.

The body is a storehouse of karma, a cage of birth, old age, and death. The soul gets nothing lasting from this body, which is made of five separate elements, assembled and dismantled by accumulated deeds, hollow and fruitless.

Son, wife, siblings, parents, and the entire spread of relations are like logs meeting in a flood; they collide and are swept apart in the torrent. Therefore destroy my ignorance; grant me this one gift of mercy.

You are compassionate, O Janardana. Says Tuka, I clasp Your feet and plead.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My feeling is small, my mind is small, my life is short and not in my hands. I have become an image made of offenses. O embodiment of the Vedas, please listen. How many faults can I make up for? Virtue and fault together have filled the space within me. Beginning, present, and what is to come stretch on with no end in sight. Through varied deeds and eighty-four lakh births, the body bears its threefold suffering. The body is a storehouse of karma, a cage of birth, old age, and death. The soul gains nothing lasting from this body, made of five separate elements, built up and pulled down by past deeds, empty, useless, husk. Son, wife, brother, mother, father, the whole spread of kin, are like logs that meet when the flood drives them together, then strike and are flung apart in the rushing water. So destroy my ignorance; grant me this one gift of mercy. You are merciful, Janardana. Tuka says: I hold your feet and plead.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram empties himself out before God, owning that his feeling, his understanding, and even his lifespan are small and beyond his control, until he is little more than a heap of offenses. He looks at the body coldly: a storehouse of karma and a cage of birth, aging, and death, assembled and dismantled out of five elements, from which the soul gains nothing that lasts. His image for family is unsparing: kin are driftwood swept together by the flood, colliding for a moment and then torn apart, no permanent bond at all. He does not ask to keep any of it. His single request is mercy in one precise form, the destruction of his ignorance, made while clasping the feet of the compassionate Lord.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let us make the voice thunder forth: Keshava, Mukunda, Murari! The names Rama and Krishna are beautiful; Hari, Hari destroys all faults. Janardana, life of the world, cosmic form, Vamana, great Madhusudana, the one who severs the bonds of worldly existence.

Wielder of the discus, bearer of the mace, crusher of demons, hero among heroes, the jewel in the crown of all the brave, O generous giver to the world. Beautiful as Madana, enchanter of minds, delight of the gopis and cowherds, skillful dancer, O Kanha, endowed with all virtues.

Lord of qualities and yet beyond qualities, witness of all and knower of all, the doer who remains a non-doer, who never lets pride touch Him. By what means can one serve Him? What can be offered to this God? He cannot be won except through love.

Says Tuka, I will not let His feet be separate from my life.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let us make the voice thunder it out: Keshava, Mukunda, Murari! The names Rama and Krishna are good; Hari, Hari wipes out every fault. Janardana, life of the world, cosmic form, Vamana, great Madhusudana, you who break the bonds of worldly existence. Holder of the discus, bearer of the mace, crusher of demons, hero of valor, jewel in the crown of all the brave, O giver, generous to the whole world. Beautiful as Madana, enchanter of the mind, delight of the cowherds and the gopis, skilled dancer, Kanha, full of every virtue. You have qualities and yet are beyond qualities, witness of all and knower of all, the one who acts and yet is no doer, who never lets pride touch him. By what means can his service be done? What single thing can be offered to this God? He cannot be won by anything but love. Tuka says: I will not let his feet be parted from my life.

WHAT IT MEANS

This abhanga is a garland of the Names, sung out loud so the very voice thunders, because the recitation itself burns away faults. Tukaram heaps up God's titles and deeds, the cosmic form, the slayer of demons, the enchanting cowherd, the lord who has qualities yet stands beyond them and acts while remaining no doer. The point of all this praise is the turn near the end: such a God cannot be bought with offerings or earned by any technique, because nothing matches him. The one thing that wins him is love, pure feeling. So Tukaram closes with the only offering he has, vowing never to let God's feet be separated from his life.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What I had been longing for in my heart has come to pass; my vows have borne fruit. I have found union with Narayana, that inexhaustible One in whom there is no destruction.

I have held His feet in my heart and will not let go. What is the worth of this life otherwise? When will I reach that destination? My accumulated merit has shown me the way.

I had been lost in delusion; my mind's course had gone astray. I was deceived by mirages, but now my vision has cleared.

It is well. May this devotion now reach fulfillment, and may the mind not waver in between.

I beseech You thus with compassion, O merciful Lord of the world. My own intellect understands, yet I cannot bring it about on my own.

Great obstacles arise in between; shame and worldly prosperity stand in the way. The saints have shown me grace and adorned my speech.

They have instilled love for kirtan. Says Tuka, I roll at Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What I longed for in my heart has come to pass. My vows have borne fruit. I have found Narayana, the inexhaustible One, in whom there is no destruction. I have held his feet in my heart, and I will not let go. What is this life worth otherwise? When will I reach that place? My stored-up merit has shown me the way. I had been lost in delusion. My mind ran the wrong way. I was caught in mirages. Now my sight has cleared. It is well. Let this devotion reach its end now, and let my mind not waver in between. I beg you with this plea, O merciful Lord of the world. My own mind understands, yet I cannot bring it about by myself. Great blows fall in between; shame and worldly success stand in the way. The saints have shown me grace. They have adorned my speech. They have set love in my kirtan. Tuka says: I roll at your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming a longing that has finally landed and asking that it not slip away. He has found Narayana, the one thing that does not pass, and he refuses to loosen his grip on those feet, because without them this life has no worth. He admits how he got here: lost in delusion, chasing mirages, until his sight cleared and stored merit pointed the way. Then he names the real danger, which is the gap between now and the end: the mind that wavers, the blows that fall, the shame and the lure of worldly success that block the road. He knows the goal with his head but cannot reach it on his own power, so he hands the work to the Lord's mercy and to the saints who tuned his speech and set love in his song.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There is no end to Your virtues, and my intellect is small, O Narayana. O wise one who ferries souls across this world, I make one humble request at Your feet.

What can a pitiable one like me know of the marks of true devotion? I cannot even wash my face properly, yet I spend my time in contemplation of You. Do not let my mind go astray after any other madness.

Lead me by Your own light, holding me hand in hand. I have surrendered this body and soul to You, O King of Pandhari.

Guard me through every twist and turn; shelter me under the shade of Your mercy. You are wise among the wise, the life of all lives.

Where is there any lack? My devotion may be rough and unpolished, yet it is mine. Whatever capital I had, I have offered these words at Your feet.

Says Tuka, what is offered with love receives its due value. You know what is genuine and what is false.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There is no end to your virtues, Narayana, and my mind is small. O wise one who carries souls across this world, I make one request at your feet. What can a poor man like me know of the marks of true devotion? I cannot even wash my own face properly. Still I pass my time thinking of you. Do not let me run after any other madness. Do not let my mind go to waste. Lead me by your own light. Hold my hand and walk with me. I have given you this body, with my whole life and heart, O King of Pandhari. Keep me through every turn, smooth or rough. Make a shade of your mercy over me. You are the wise one among the wise, the life of all that lives. Where is there any lack in you? My devotion is rough and unpolished, but it is mine. Whatever capital I had, I have laid these words at your feet. Tuka says: what is offered with love receives its worth. You know what is real and what is hollow.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram opens by setting the scale: the Lord's virtues have no end, his own mind is small, so he asks for one thing only. He confesses he does not know the marks of real devotion and is barely competent at the smallest tasks, yet he spends his days remembering the Lord. The single request is that he be led, hand in hand, by the Lord's own light, and not let wander after other obsessions. He surrenders the whole of body and life to the King of Pandhari and asks to be guarded through smooth stretches and rough. The closing turn names his fear and his trust at once: his offering is crude, but it is sincerely his, and he leaves it to the Lord, who alone can tell the genuine from the hollow, to set its true value.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why, does my burden seem so heavy to You? Countless others have been delivered before. Am I the one who can never be saved? Is my sin so formidable that even You cannot stand before it? Has something from the past remained unpaid? What a strange riddle this is.

What will the saints think, hearing such words of helplessness from You? Has Narayana grown old, unable to keep His former promise? Now do not play games or hold me at a distance. Why put up walls within Your own household? What was once grasped, let it remain grasped.

Do not trifle with me, O Infinite One. Why do You pretend not to know? Do You not hold all authority? Says Tuka, reveal Yourself now.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why, does my weight seem so heavy to you? You have saved countless others. Am I the only one who finds no resting place at the end? Is my sin so strong, so massive, that even you cannot stand before it? Has some old debt of mine stayed unpaid? What a strange riddle I am looking at. What will the saints think of you, hearing such words of helplessness? Has Narayana grown old, so that he can no longer keep his earlier promise? Now do not play tricks. Do not hold me so far off. Why a curtain inside your own house? What you have held at a distance, you held at a distance long enough. Do not toy with me, O Infinite One. Why do you act as if you do not know? Do you not hold all power? Tuka says: now show yourself.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses his case against the Lord like a man arguing with one who owes him. He points to the record: countless souls already saved, so why should he alone be left with no resting place, unless his sin is somehow too strong even for God, which he plainly does not believe. He turns the shame back on the Lord, asking what the saints will think of such helpless silence, and whether Narayana has grown too old to keep his ancient promise to deliver. The harshness is aimed at the delay and the hiding, the curtain inside God's own house, not at any real doubt of God's power. The plea lands as a demand born of trust: stop pretending not to know, drop the games, and reveal yourself now.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The saints who have beheld You in visible form will laugh at me. This is why my chitta is troubled; I appear to be a mere devotee in name only.

How shall I describe in meditation what others have already praised before me? My soul cannot depart from that longing; I am bound by such hope. Why have You set me up like this, stumbling and crooked for no reason? We are Your children, and this torment is great; one trouble follows upon another.

Tell me, whose fault is this? I cling to Your feet. You are the same loving mother to all; what is my special offense? If this one is unfit for the purpose, then why did You bring him forth, O Narayana? At least give Your word in answer to my plea and make this ignorant one understand.

I have cried out for many days, and I am weary looking down that path. Says Tuka, the plate has been spread wide. I do not know if You have grown tired of me, O Lord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The saints who have seen you in visible form will laugh at me. That is why my mind is troubled. I look like a devotee in name only. How shall I describe you in meditation, when others have already praised you to your face? My soul cannot leave that longing. Such a hope holds me. Why have you set me up like this, crooked and stumbling for no reason? We are your children, and this torment is heavy; one trouble follows another. Tell me, whose fault is this? I cling to your feet. You are the same loving mother to all. What is my one special offense? If this one was no good for the purpose, then why did you bring him forth, Narayana? At least give me a word in answer, and make this ignorant one understand. I have cried out for many days. I am worn out watching that road. Tuka says: the plate is spread wide. I do not know, Lord, whether you have grown tired of me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from the ache of being unanswered while others have already seen God face to face. He fears he is a devotee in name only and will be laughed at by the saints who received the vision he still waits for. The complaint sharpens into a question of fairness: if God is the same loving mother to all her children, why is he the one left crooked, stumbling, and tormented, and what single offense singles him out. He even pushes the logic to its edge, asking why God brought him into being at all if he was unfit for the purpose. Worn out from watching the empty road, he asks for the smallest thing, a single word in reply, and confesses he cannot tell whether the silence means he has wearied his Lord.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It is well that until today I have not fallen into Death's jaws. I have survived this far; whatever remains of life, O Hari, I offer to You.

Time has granted me this reprieve; my lifespan has not yet come to destruction. The purpose still has a remainder; let what is gone be gone like chaff.

The fear of drowning vanishes upon reaching the shore. There was a struggle in the dream, but the waking hour has come.

The final morsel is the sweetest. I called out to You, and by that my terror was dispelled.

It is Your nature and Your vow to protect those who seek refuge. As the sun rises, night is destroyed and light appears at once.

What fault then can remain in us? You, Lord of the World, are our champion. Now let the body, comfort, pride, and vanity burn.

I will not pursue them any longer. You are the primal Narayana.

Says Tuka, I have come to Your shelter.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It is well that until now I have not fallen into Death's mouth. I have lived this far. Whatever is left, Hari, I give to you. Time has granted me this room. My life has not yet run to its end. The work still has a remainder. Let what is gone go like chaff. The drowning was false; I have reached the shore. The struggle was in a dream. The waking hour has come. The last morsel is the sweetest. I called out to you, and my fear was cleared away. It is your nature and your vow to protect those who come for refuge. When the sun rises, night is destroyed; light comes the moment it dawns. What fault can be left in us then? You, Lord of the world, are our champion. Now let the body, comfort, pride, and honor burn. I will not work to win them. You are the primal Narayana. Tuka says: I have come to your shelter.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram counts his survival as grace and offers the remainder of his life back to Hari. The years he still has are not his to spend on himself; what is past he lets fall away like chaff, keeping only what serves the real purpose. He reframes his earlier terror as a dream of drowning from which he has now woken safe on the shore, the last stretch of the journey turning out to be the sweetest. His confidence rests not on his own worth but on the Lord's settled nature and vow to protect everyone who takes refuge, the way sunrise simply abolishes the night. From that footing he renounces the chase after the body's comfort, pride, and honor, and stands plainly in God's shelter.

Now I do not know whether my devotion will turn back. Having found rest, I have placed my life at Your feet.

This is the abode of all gains; such spaciousness has opened in my heart. My capital is faith.

What has happened has happened; I have become Your servant with certainty. I will not look back at the past; from here on, my only longing is for service.

I have offered everything I had; I have broken the pride of "I" and "mine." Every season has become auspicious; confidence in receiving Your grace has taken root. In worldly dealings, O Infinite One, I know nothing other than You, yet my mind is at peace.

Gain or loss does not disturb my depths. I perform the duties of the world yet remain untouched, keeping the body separate from the soul's inner life.

The seed's sprout is kept far from harm. I have become free from all doctrines and opinions, remaining pure.

Says Tuka, the beauty of that form has entered my eyes, and I am adorned with it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now I do not think my devotion will turn back. I have found rest and laid my life at your feet. This is the home of every gain; such open room has opened in my heart. My capital is trust. What has happened has happened: I have become your servant for certain. I will not look back at the past. From here on, my one longing is for service. I have offered all I had. I have broken the pride of I and mine. Every season has become a festival; confidence in your grace has taken root. In worldly dealings I know nothing but you, O Infinite One, yet my mind is at peace. Gain and loss do not reach my depths. I do the work of the world and stay untouched, keeping the body apart from the soul's inner life. The seed and its sprout are kept far from harm. I have stepped clear of all doctrines and opinions, and stay pure. Tuka says: the beauty of that form has entered my eyes, and I wear it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the steadiness that comes after surrender, when devotion no longer threatens to turn back. Having laid his life at the feet, he finds his heart opened into a place where every true gain is held, and trust, not anything earned, is the capital he trades on. He marks the break as final: the pride of I and mine is broken, the past is not worth a backward glance, and his only remaining want is to serve. The fruit is an even mind that handles the world's dealings, profit and loss alike, without being disturbed at its depths, because he keeps the inner life set apart from the body's affairs. Free of competing doctrines, he says the beauty of the Lord's form has entered his eyes, and he wears it like an ornament.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Wearing the tulsi garland around His neck, the Lord of the World stands upon the brick. Gazing upon Pundalika, the Lord of Pandhari rests on the bank of the Bhima.

Liberation and worldly pleasure are His servants; miraculous powers attend His door. The Sudarshana whirls as a protective canopy, and Death trembles in fear of Him from afar.

The Mother of the universe stands at His left side; Bheemaki adorns His other half like lightning flashing in the clouds. Her mere glance destroys the greatest sins.

He is an ocean of bliss, supreme joy, the delight of the gopis, cowherds, and cattle. Even birds and beasts are drawn to Him.

Govinda plays His flute in sweet rhythm. With a beautiful face and four arms, He enchants the mind and bears the Garuda banner.

Says Tuka, my Lord swiftly comes to the aid of His devotees.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The tulsi garland on his neck, the Lord of the world stands on the brick. His eyes resting on Pundalika, Pandharinath stands on the bank of the Bhima. Liberation and worldly pleasure are his serving-maids. Wealth and powers wait at his door. The Sudarshana circles as his guard, and Death trembles far off in fear of him. The Mother of the universe stands at his left side; Rukmini adorns his other half, like lightning flashing in a cloud. One look from her breaks the greatest sin. He is an ocean of bliss, the highest joy, the delight of the gopis, the cowherds, and the cattle. Even birds and beasts are drawn to him. Govinda plays his flute in sweet rhythm. With a lovely face and four arms, he enchants the mind and carries the Garuda banner. Tuka says: my Lord comes swiftly to his devotees' aid.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a portrait of Vitthal standing on the brick at Pandhari, the pose given to him out of love for his devotee Pundalika. Tukaram piles up the marks of his sovereignty: liberation and worldly pleasure serve him as maids, riches and miraculous powers wait at the door, his discus guards him, and even Death keeps its distance in fear. Rukmini, named here as the Mother of the universe, shares his form like lightning in a cloud, her glance alone able to break the worst sin. He is bliss itself, drawing gopis, cowherds, cattle, even birds and beasts, by the sweetness of his flute. The closing line lands the point of all this glory: this Lord of every power comes quickly when his devotees call.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

God should not let go of what is already in hand. I have surrendered with my whole life and soul.

Consider me Your own. I offer my life as a waving flame of protection.

Sitting in the company of saints, I have come to understand, O Lord of Lakshmi, that none of these worldly relations are truly mine. This conviction has become firm within me.

Those who obstruct Your worship come showing the allurements of worldly life. They place sweet attraction in low things, but I can see the trap clearly.

So many have died and perished; that is the only gain of their company. Therefore I come to You with humble supplication: grant me firm courage in my heart.

Let the world revile me if it will; I will not quarrel with them. You are the primordial father, Narayana; let me be joined to Your feet.

Says Tuka, if I do not pursue my own true welfare, then I am indeed pitiable; the saints would rightly laugh at me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

God should not let go of what is already in his hand. I have come for refuge with my whole life and heart. Call me your own. I wave my life around you to keep you from harm. Sitting in the company of the saints, I came to understand, O Lord of Lakshmi, that none of these worldly people are mine. That certainty has grown firm in my heart. They come to block your worship, showing off the charm of worldly life. They put a sweet taste in low things, but I see the trap clearly. So many have died and perished. That is the only profit of their company. So I come to you, pleading: set firm courage in my heart. Let the world revile me happily; I will not trade words with them. You are the first father, Narayana. Let me be joined to your feet. If I will not work for my own true good, and instead take fate as my excuse, then I am simply ruined and fallen. Tuka says: the saints would laugh at me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram has surrendered fully and now begs the one thing he most fears to lose: that God, having taken him in hand, will not let go. The saints' company has taught him a hard clarity, that the worldly people he counted as his own are not, a conviction now fixed in him. He sees how the lure of ordinary life comes dressed as something sweet to block real worship, and he names its end plainly, that everyone in that company simply dies and is gone. So he asks for firm courage to ignore the world's scorn and stay joined to the Lord's feet. The closing turn is aimed at himself: if he hides behind fate instead of working for his own true good, he would be ruined and rightly laughed at, so the responsibility to hold on is his too.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How blessed it is that I have been put to good use and have remained at Your feet. I will satisfy my longing in the company of saints, and my voice will resound with Your virtues.

The inmost essence of my life has been preserved. I have become separate from my old self.

This body of five elements moves now in effortless play. What was destined to be understood has been understood; this gain has been won through pure devotion.

This is what had been safeguarded within, kept by God through all the turns. The lingering desires of this journey have been dispelled; all paths have become easy.

By Your grace, O friend of the lowly, all else trembles under Your sovereign authority. Marked as Your own, I abide in bliss.

Sin and merit cannot touch me. All imaginations have been put to rest.

Says Tuka, all of it happened spontaneously, of its own accord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It is good that I have been put to use, that I have stayed at your feet. I will satisfy my longing in the company of saints, and my voice will ring out with your virtues. The deep love of my life has been kept safe. I have become separate from my old self. This body of five elements moves now in easy play. What each was meant to understand has been understood; this gain was won through pure devotion. This is what had been kept safe within me, guarded by God through all the turns. The desires of this journey have been cleared away. Every path has become easy. By your grace, O friend of the lowly, all else trembles under your rule. Marked as your own, I am bliss itself. Sin and merit cannot touch me. All my plans have been laid to rest. Tuka says: it all happened of itself, all at once.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks back on his release as something done to him, not achieved by him. He is glad to have been put to use and kept at the feet, with the saints' company and the singing of God's virtues to satisfy his longing. The living core of him has been preserved while his old self fell away, so that his five-element body now moves in effortless play, untroubled. The desires that drove the journey are gone, the paths have all turned easy, and marked as God's own he is bliss itself, beyond the reach of sin and merit alike. The signature line carries the whole weight: none of this was his doing; it happened on its own, all at once, by grace.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All spiritual states are attained through the primary practice of devotion to the Lord in form. The image within the heart reveals itself when it recognizes the purity of one's devotion.

The Name of Hari is both the seed and the fruit, all merit, all righteousness, and the key to every art. It dispels all weariness.

Where the Name is chanted aloud and Hari's devotees sing without shame, all nectar overflows and the bonds of worldly existence are severed. The marks of devotion appear on the body when God has taken His seat within.

His virtues come of their own accord, and the cycle of coming and going ceases. There is no need to abandon one's station in life or the duties of one's heritage.

No other effort is required; the Name of Vithoba alone is enough. The Vedas call Him Narayana; the yogis know Him as the void Brahman; to the liberated He is the perfect Self.

Says Tuka, for us He is the Lord we can enjoy in form.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Every state is reached by this: the chief practice is devotion to the Lord in form. The image hidden in the heart shows itself when it knows that one's love is pure. The Name of Hari is the seed and the fruit, all merit, all duty. It is the heart of every art, and it clears away all weariness. Where the Name is sung aloud, where Hari's servants sing without shame, all the nectars brim over and the cords of worldly bondage are cut. The marks of devotion settle on the body when God has taken his seat within. His virtues come of their own accord, and the coming and going of birth ends. You need not give up your station in life or the duties you were born to. No other labor is needed. The one Name of Vithoba is enough. The Vedas call him Narayana. The yogis know him as the empty Brahman. To the liberated he is the perfect Self. Tuka says: for us he is the Lord we enjoy in form.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is laying out his path plainly: the way to every spiritual state is loving devotion to God in form, and the form hidden in the heart only shows itself once the love is sincere. The engine of it is the Name of Hari, which he calls both seed and fruit, the sum of all merit and duty, enough by itself to cut the bonds of birth and death. He insists the practice needs no withdrawal: keep your place in life and your inherited duties, add no other labor, because the single Name of Vithoba suffices, and the marks of devotion appear once God settles within. The close sets his choice against the alternatives, naming how the Vedas, the yogis, and the liberated each conceive God, and claiming that for ordinary devotees like him the Lord one can love in visible form is the true gift.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O infinite Madhusudana, O Padmanabha, Narayana, all-pervading Janardana, fullness of bliss, imperishable one. O God of all gods, primal deity, O merciful Keshava, great among the great, O Sadashiva of innate form.

Bearer of the discus, sustainer of the universe, bearer of the Garuda banner, fountain of compassion, thousand-footed, thousand-armed, resting on the serpent in the ocean of milk. Lotus-eyed, Lord of Lakshmi, enchanter of hearts, beautiful as Madana, upholder of the earth, O Vamana of the Trivikrama form.

O Lord of qualities and beyond qualities, creator and life of the world, O delight of Vasudeva and Devaki, crawling infant, child Krishna. Says Tuka, I have come prostrating. Grant me a place at Your feet.

This alone is my plea: free me from the bonds of worldly existence.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O infinite one, Madhusudana, Padmanabha, Narayana, all-pervading Janardana, dense with bliss, undying one. God of all gods, first deity, merciful Keshava, greatest of the great, Sadashiva, you of the natural form. Bearer of the discus, holder of the universe, you with the Garuda banner, well of compassion, thousand-footed, thousand-armed, you who lie on the serpent in the ocean of milk. Lotus-eyed, Lord of Lakshmi, charmer of hearts, lovely as Madana, ferry across this world, upholder of the earth, Vamana who became Trivikrama. O you who are with form and beyond form, maker and life of the world, delight of Vasudeva and Devaki, crawling child, child Krishna. Tuka has come and fallen flat at your feet. Give me a place there. This is my one plea: free me from the bonds of worldly life.

WHAT IT MEANS

Almost the whole poem is a rolling litany of the Lord's names and forms, each one a fresh angle on the same God. Tukaram heaps them up deliberately, the slayer of Madhu, the lotus-naveled, the discus-bearer asleep on the cosmic serpent, the dwarf Vamana who strode the worlds as Trivikrama, the crawling child Krishna, naming him at once as the one with form and the one beyond form. The piling on is itself the devotion: he is praising God from every direction his mind can reach. Only at the very end does he state his request, and it is a single thing. He falls flat at the feet and asks for a place there, and for release from the bonds of worldly existence.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now by this power the Lord of Pandhari has remained standing close at hand. Looking upon Him, one cannot fathom His limits, yet that very One I will now place within my heart.

Forgetting all body-consciousness, I have been captivated by the Name alone. The Lord of Pandhari does not consider caste, lineage, or reputation when it comes to touching the feet of saints.

A wonderful secret has come into our hands. Without searching or seeking, the imperishable and generous Giver appears, though He stands in awe before His saints like a four-armed deity.

He becomes large or small according to one's love. His form is beautiful and enchanting.

He loves devotion and shows respect even as a supplicant. That secret has come into our hands, and so I have gone to the saints for refuge.

Says Tuka, O Lord of Pandhari, I will not let go of You now, with all my life and soul.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now by this power Pandharinath has stayed standing close at hand. Look at him, and you cannot find his end; yet that very One I will now set inside my heart. Forgetting all sense of my own body, I am charmed by the Name alone. The Lord of Pandhari does not ask after caste, family, or name when it comes to touching the feet of his saints. A good secret has come into our hands. Without wandering and searching, the undying, generous Giver appears; four-armed, yet he stands in awe before his saints. He grows small or great according to your love. His form is beautiful, stealing the mind. He loves devotion and gives way to it, showing respect like one who comes begging. That secret has come into our hands, and so I have gone to the saints for refuge. Tuka says: O Pandharinath, I will not let you go now, with all my life and heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram has found the secret that lets him hold the boundless God inside his own heart. The endless One, whom no looking can fathom, comes close and stays, drawn not by ritual but by the Name and by love, and he asks nothing about caste, lineage, or reputation when it is his saints he attends to. The wonder Tukaram names is the Lord's strange humility: the four-armed God stands in awe before his devotees, grows small or great according to the love offered him, and behaves like a respectful supplicant before those who love him. Because this secret of the Name has come into his hands, Tukaram takes refuge with the saints who carry it. And having grasped the Lord, he makes the only vow that matters: he will not let go.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My remedies are exhausted; I have no means to reach Your feet. To practice devotion I lack true feeling; I have no control over my life in any way.

To perform charity I have no wealth; to give donations I have no money. I do not know how to honor brahmins or guests.

I have no compassion in my hands or belly to extend to living beings. I do not know the service of a guru, attendance upon saints, chanting, austerity, or ritual practice.

Renunciation and forest-dwelling are beyond me; I cannot subdue my senses. To go on pilgrimage, my mind will not come along.

To keep a vow, I do not know the proper way. If I say God is with me, I deceive both myself and others.

Therefore I have become one who surrenders. I am Your servant, marked as Yours.

This requires no accumulated merit. Says Tuka, I am at peace with this.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My tricks are all used up. I have no way to reach your feet. I try to do devotion, but I have no true feeling. My life is not in my own hands at all. I would do my duty, but my mind will not stay on it. I would give in charity, but I have no wealth. I do not know how to honor a brahmin or a guest. I have no compassion in me to give to living things. I do not know how to serve a guru or wait on the saints. I do not know chanting, austerity, or rites. I have no renunciation, no life in the forest. I cannot rule my senses. I would go on pilgrimage, but my mind will not come along. I would keep a vow, but I do not know the proper way. If I say God is with me, I am lying to myself and to others. So I have come to surrender. I am your servant, marked as yours. This needs no store of merit. Tuka says: I am at peace now.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out every path to God and admits he can walk none of them. He has no feeling for devotion, no wealth for charity, no knowledge of ritual, no mastery of his senses, no will even for pilgrimage. The point is not self-pity but a clearing of the ground: he refuses to pretend he has earned anything. Having nothing in his hands, he has only one move left, which is to surrender and become Vitthal's servant outright. The relief in the closing line comes from this: when you stop claiming merit you do not need, peace arrives. Surrender asks for empty hands, not full ones.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Then whom shall I call upon? Who will fulfill this longing? Without You, O Narayana, who will nurse me at the breast of mercy? Do not consider Your own weariness; do not hold Yourself apart from me. Having accepted me, protect this helpless one; grant me the gift of life through Your love.

This is the hope of my heart: to drink the nectar of Brahman constantly, to dwell forever at Your feet. Fulfill the desire of this beggar.

My accumulated destiny is my true treasure; it showed me the way to You, O God. Behind this is the yearning for devoted service, given with love.

I will call upon You with words of tenderness; nothing else appeals to my mind. In sleep, waking, and dream, I hold Your form in contemplation.

Now, whether we meet or do not, let me examine this: the spring that has begun to flow is unceasing. Says Tuka, endurance has been established within.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Then whom shall I call on? Who will fill this longing? Without you, Narayana, who will hold me to the breast of mercy? Do not count your own weariness. Do not hold yourself apart from me. You have taken me up; now keep this helpless one. Give me the gift of life out of love. This is the hope of my heart: to drink the nectar of Brahman always, to live forever at your feet. Fill this beggar's hope. My store of destiny is my real treasure; it showed me the way to you, God. Behind it is the longing to serve you with love. I will call you with tender words. Nothing else tastes sweet to my mind. Asleep, awake, and dreaming, I hold your form in my thought. Now, whether we meet or do not meet, let me look and see. The spring has begun to flow, and it does not stop. Tuka says: endurance has been set firm within me.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem opens in need: with no other refuge, Tukaram turns to Narayana as a child turns to the breast, asking to be held and not held at arm's length. He names his one desire, to drink the nectar of Brahman and dwell at God's feet, and counts his very destiny as treasure because it led him here. Then it shifts. Waking, sleeping, and dreaming, the Lord's form is steadily before his mind, so that whether or not the longed-for meeting comes no longer rattles him. The image of the unceasing spring says it plainly: love has become continuous, self-sustaining, no longer dependent on an answer. The closing word, endurance set firm within, is the fruit. The longing has turned into a settled steadiness.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This is the remedy for the disease of worldly existence. It severs the afflictions of birth and old age.

No other harm can stand against it; it will slay the six enemies of the soul. Let the eyes absorb that dark-hued form, the essence that conquers the six senses, the eighteen chapters, and the six philosophies.

Do not let the wicked approach. The garland of the Name, the Vishnu Sahasranama, is the mantra.

Do not feed the body with food that disrupts the proper regimen, for only then will the medicine taken bear fruit and true faith will arise. Do not leave your own home or let outside winds touch you.

Curtail excessive speech; avoid the company of others. Apply one poultice on top: the effect will be like butter churned from buttermilk, separating what is essential from what is not.

Bathe in repentance, clothe yourself in renunciation, and let all craving be sweated out. You will become what you once were.

Says Tuka, experience the state of dispassion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is the medicine for the disease of worldly life. It cuts off birth, old age, and sickness. No other harm can stand against it. It will kill the six enemies inside you. Take that dark form into your eyes. It is the essence that masters the six senses, the eighteen chapters, the six schools. Let no wicked thing come near. The garland of the Name, the Vishnu Sahasranama, is your mantra. Do not feed the body food that breaks the regimen, for only then does the medicine work and true faith comes. Do not leave your own house; let no outside wind touch you. Cut down too much talk; avoid other company. Lay one poultice on top, and it will turn out like butter churned from buttermilk, the essence parted from what is hollow. Bathe in repentance, wrap yourself in renunciation, sweat out every craving. You will become what you once were. Tuka says: live in the state of dispassion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram treats the round of birth and death as an illness and prescribes a cure like a physician giving a regimen. The medicine is the dark form of God taken into the eyes and the Name held on the lips. But a medicine fails if the patient breaks the diet, so he lists the conditions: stay home from harmful company, cut idle talk, refuse what disrupts the treatment. The churning image names the goal, to separate the true self from the hollow accretions the way butter is separated from buttermilk. Repentance, renunciation, and sweated-out craving are not punishments but the bath and the cure, and what they restore is your original nature, what you once were before the disease set in.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You will take this very same birth again and know the pleasure and pain you have already tasted. This cannot be gained through any effort; why then do you willingly become blind? The cycle of eighty-four lakh births cannot be escaped.

The torments in the womb are immense. You fall again into the city of doubt, entangled deeply in the snare of illusion.

Do animals know sin or virtue? They experience enjoyments of high, middle, and low degree. Some die the moment they are born.

Some are deaf, some blind, some lame, some mute. This human body is a treasure that has come into your hands, the supreme essence, the highest path.

Those who say they will become God themselves do become so. Why then not take it to heart? Make the mind steady for even a moment, become alert, and open your eyes.

Look at what the Vedas and Puranas have declared. Says Tuka, this is my humble plea.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You will be born into this very life again and taste the same pleasure and pain you already know. This birth cannot be won back by any effort, so why do you go blind on purpose? The round of eighty-four lakh births is not escaped. The torment in the womb is great. You fall again into the city of doubt, tangled deep in the net of illusion. Do animals know sin from virtue? They take their pleasures high, middle, and low. Some die the moment they are born. Some are deaf, some blind, some lame, some mute. This human body is a treasure that has come into your hands, the highest essence, the highest path. Those who say they will become God do become God. Why then not take it to heart? Make the mind still for one moment, wake up, open your eyes. Look at what the Vedas and Puranas have said. Tuka says: this is my humble plea.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is shaking a sleeper awake. The human birth, he insists, is a rare treasure, the one form able to tell right from wrong and reach the highest goal, while animals only suffer their lots blindly and many forms perish at once. To squander this birth is to choose blindness with your eyes open, knowing the wheel of countless births and the agony of the womb still turns. The stakes are exact: those who set their will on God actually reach God, so the waste is not of comfort but of the single real chance. The closing plea is not a threat but an appeal: be still for even a moment, look at what scripture says, and use the body you have been given.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He serves His own servants and cannot bear any lack in them. He leaves His own seat and runs to provide for them.

Such is that ocean of mercy, standing on the brick with hands on His waist. He is generous with everything He has and manifests for the sake of His devotees.

He wears the Shrivatsa mark upon His chest, displaying the ornament of His devotees' love. He knows no weariness and has embraced the joy of being kicked by the feet of His beloved.

When Satyabhama made a gift of Him, He accepted without objection. He carries the sandals of His servant upon His own head.

He guards the doorway of Bali's realm. He became the charioteer of Arjuna.

He truly becomes the servant of His servants, marked as their own. He will not interrupt Pundalika; He stands patiently behind, honoring his devotion.

Says Tuka, why do you not worship such a Mother?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He serves his own servants. He cannot bear to see them lack anything. He leaves his own seat and runs, scattering the dishes, to feed them. Such is that ocean of mercy, standing on the brick with his hands on his hips. He is generous with all he has, and he shows himself for his devotees' sake. He wears the Shrivatsa mark on his chest, the ornament his devotees' love has placed there. He knows no weariness; he took as joy even being kicked by his beloved's foot. When Satyabhama gave him away as a gift, he accepted with no objection. He carries his servant's sandals on his own head. He guards Bali's doorway. He became Arjuna's charioteer. He truly becomes the servant of his servants, marked as theirs. He will not break in on Pundalika; he stands patiently behind him, honoring his devotion. Tuka says: such a Mother, why will you not worship her?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the usual order upside down: God is not the master to be served but the servant who serves his devotees, running with the food and leaving his own throne behind. He gathers the well-known stories as proof, the Shrivatsa mark, the sage's kick taken as joy, Satyabhama's gift, the sandals carried on his head, Bali's doorway, Arjuna's chariot, and Pundalika kept waiting while God stands patiently behind on the brick at Pandhari. The stakes are a picture of what divine love actually looks like: not lofty distance but eager, self-forgetting attendance. By calling this God a Mother at the end, he closes the gap entirely, and asks the only question that then makes sense: with a Lord like this, why hold back your worship?

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The servants of Hari are just like Hari Himself. They have no fear, no attachment, no worry, no craving.

They remain detached, holding firmly to the rope of devotion. Having clasped His feet, they have abandoned worldly concerns.

They need no honor or earthly riches. With the Name as nectar upon their lips, they desire nothing else.

Their hearts are vast and spacious; their patience is deep as the ocean. These lords of the world have subjugated lust and anger, making them labor as household servants.

In strength they overpower even Death, yet in humility they are the lowest of the low. They are generous with their bodies to all, and though they know all arts, they remain as the unknowing.

Worldly life itself becomes their servant, and liberation waits upon them eagerly. Miraculous powers circle them like anxious attendants yet cannot touch these devotees of Vishnu.

Birth and death are like dreams to them; nothing appears foreign to their eyes. Says Tuka, in unbroken happiness their tongues speak the nectar of love.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The servants of Hari are just like Hari himself. They have no fear, no attachment, no worry, no craving. They stay unconcerned, gripping the rope of devotion hard. They have caught his feet and left the world behind. They want no honor and no earthly riches. With the Name as nectar on their lips, they desire nothing else. Their hearts are wide and open; their patience is deep as the sea. These lords of the world have crushed lust and anger and set them to work like household servants. In strength they overpower even Death; in humbleness they lie below everyone. They are open-handed with their own bodies to all, and though they know every art, they live as if they know nothing. Worldly life becomes their servant; liberation waits eagerly on them. Powers and perfections circle them like nervous attendants and cannot touch these devotees of Vishnu. Birth and death are like dreams to them; nothing looks foreign to their eyes. Tuka says: in unbroken happiness their tongues speak the nectar of love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes what the saint has become: so wholly given to Hari that he takes on Hari's own nature, free of fear, craving, and worry. The freedom is concrete. Lust and anger, which rule most people, have been mastered and put to labor like servants; honor and wealth hold no pull; even death is overpowered while the saint lies humbly below everyone. The point is that liberation and miraculous powers, the very goals others chase, now wait on the saint and cannot touch him, because he wanted only the Name. Seeing birth and death as passing dreams and nothing as foreign, he lives in steady happiness, and what overflows is not power but love. The poem holds this up not to flatter saints but to show what devotion does to a person.

Worldly life, the cry of the trapped soul

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have suffered greatly in worldly life, dwelling in the womb of a mother, wandering through eighty-four lakh lakh forms of birth, becoming a beggar and a supplicant. My existence is dependent on others.

I am bound tightly by the ropes of accumulated karma. Fate, destiny, and ongoing actions are my companions; they spin me around by their own authority.

My belly is never full, there is no rest. There is no settled home, no village, no sovereignty that does not change.

The soul writhes in this broken vessel. Ages have passed in this manner, and I know not how many more lie ahead.

There is no end to this repeated cycle; not even at the end of time will I be freed. Who will remove my sorrow? On whom shall I place the burden of my load? Your name is the raft that carries one across the ocean of worldly existence; You rush to the aid of those in trouble.

Now rush to me, O Narayana, for the sake of this poor, lowly one. Says Tuka, do not weigh my virtues against my faults; I plead for compassion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have suffered much in worldly life. I lived in a mother's womb. Through eighty-four lakh kinds of birth I became a beggar and a supplicant. My life is in others' hands, not my own. I am bound tight by the ropes of stored-up karma. Fate, destiny, and present deeds are my companions, and they spin me around by their own power. My belly is never full; there is no rest. There is no settled home, no village, no power that does not change. The soul writhes in this broken pot. Ages have passed this way, and I do not know how many more lie ahead. There is no end to this returning; not even at the end of time will I be free. Who will take away my sorrow? On whom can I lay down my load? Your name is the raft that carries one over the ocean of worldly life. You run to the aid of those in trouble. Now come running, Narayana, for this poor lowly one. Tuka says: do not weigh my virtues against my faults; I beg for your compassion.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the soul's cry from inside the trap. Tukaram piles up the marks of bondage, the womb, the countless births, the ropes of karma, a belly never filled and a home that never holds, to show a life spun helplessly by forces that are not his own. The despair is real: he sees no end to the returning, not even at the end of time. The turn comes when he names the one thing not bound to that wheel, the Name of God, the raft across the ocean. So the helpless catalogue becomes the ground of his plea: precisely because he can do nothing, he asks Narayana to come running and to grant mercy without first weighing his merits, which he has already confessed he lacks.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

While all your faculties are still intact, your hands and feet still move, look to your own welfare. Go on pilgrimage; do not neglect it.

While Death still stands at a distance, sing and listen to the virtues of Hari, quickly. Hold sincere devotion in your heart; do not cheat that impulse.

Do not bury your earned wealth in the ground. Worship the brahmins, practice truth and compassion toward all beings.

Make these your companions; do not neglect them. While the bloom of youth is upon your body, do not scatter yourself in sense-pleasures.

Abandon lust, anger, greed, and delusion. Stay in the company of saints; do not neglect this.

Later, nothing will avail. Wealth and power will remain where they are.

Ahead, only your accumulated deeds will testify. Says Tuka, remember that Yama's judgment awaits.

IN PLAIN WORDS

While everything is still ready, while your hands and feet still move, look to your own good. Go on pilgrimage; do not miss it. While Death still stands far off, sing and hear the praises of Hari, and be quick. Hold good devotion in your heart; do not betray it; do not miss it. Do not bury the wealth you earn in the ground. Worship the company of brahmins. Practice truth and compassion toward all beings. Make these your companions; do not miss them. While the bloom of youth is on your body, do not scatter yourself in sense-pleasures. Give up lust, anger, greed, and delusion. Stay in the company of saints; do not miss it. Later nothing will help. Power and wealth will stay right where they are. Ahead, only your stored-up deeds will speak for you. Tuka says: and that too is Yama's command.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses one point: act now, while you still can. Every line measures the gift against the closing window, hands and feet that still move, Death still at a distance, youth still on the body. He names the things to do while there is time, pilgrimage, the praises of Hari, charity instead of hoarded wealth, truth and compassion, the company of saints, and the abandoning of lust, anger, greed, and delusion. The stakes are stated plainly at the end: when the time runs out, power and wealth stay behind, and only your deeds go forward to testify before Yama, the lord of death. The urgency is not fear for its own sake; it is the simple fact that the chance is held open only for a while.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Listen, O Panduranga, to one thing. I have something to say in private.

If my accumulated merit alone could save me, then what would be Your role? When one merely repays a debt, what virtue is there in that? Will the world respect such a thing? Why flaunt ornaments of greatness among people for nothing? If a gift is not given to one who has nothing to eat, if charity is not offered to the deserving guest, if beneficence is claimed only through the possession of wealth and power when there is no real selfless giving, then what is it worth? A true hero is one who shelters the weak behind him. There is no limit to the merit of such a one.

Hear this, O Narayana. Now what more is there to say? If You save me, then indeed it is proven.

Fulfill Your own word. Says Tuka, only then will I know You.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Listen, Panduranga, to one thing. I have something to say in private. If my own stored-up merit could save me, then what would your part be? When a man only pays back a debt, where is the virtue in that? Would the world respect it? Why flaunt the ornament of greatness among people for nothing? If you give no food to one who has none, if you offer no charity to the guest who deserves it, if you call it kindness only because you have wealth and power, when there is no real giving, what is it worth? A true hero, know this, is the one who shelters the weak behind him. There is no limit to the merit of that ornament. Hear this, Narayana. Now what more is there to say? If you save me, then it is truly proven. Make your own word come true. Tuka says: only then will I know you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a quiet, almost legal argument to Panduranga. If his own accumulated merit were enough to save him, God would have no role and would deserve no credit, the way repaying a plain debt earns no gratitude. So he turns it around: real greatness is not in giving to those who can repay or in boasting of wealth, but in sheltering the weak who can offer nothing back. By that standard the truly helpless devotee is exactly the occasion for God to show his glory. The challenge in the closing lines is bold but reverent: God has promised to save those who surrender, so let him make his own word come true, because only then, Tukaram says, will he truly know who God is.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What a beautiful Name, what a lovely form. The eyes find rest and all suffering is removed.

This chant of "Vitthal, Vitthal" is a compact yet supremely potent practice. It is the ultimate weapon, the final arrow.

At the critical hour of death, where can one arrange ten kinds of charity? Narayana destroys all sorrow through contemplation. This is the consensus of all the great ones.

It brings fulfillment and leads to the Infinite. Therefore one should surrender; this much alone is proper.

I have turned away from worldly life in disgust, for it is a white serpent full of poison. I am kept from You, O generous Lord, because of these worldly claimants.

They have made me suffer through countless births, planting unnecessary desires in my mind. I was puffed up with the madness of "I and mine," and was stripped and humiliated.

I have received the punishment for my deeds and endured enormous suffering. Now a stop must be put to all this.

Says Tuka, I prostrate before You, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What a good Name, what a lovely form. The eyes are cooled and the burning is taken away. This chant of Vitthal, Vitthal is small and plain to do, yet it is the very essence. It is the weapon, the last arrow at the end. At the close hour of death, where could you arrange ten kinds of charity? Narayana cuts off all sorrow when you think on him. This is what all the great ones agree. It brings fulfillment and leads to the Infinite. So one should surrender; this much alone is right. So I have grown sick of worldly life; it is a white serpent full of poison. I am kept from you, my generous Lord, by these very claimants. They made me suffer through countless births and planted needless cravings in my mind. I swelled up in the madness of I and mine, and was stripped and shamed. I have taken the punishment for my deeds and suffered through endless births. Now there must be an end to it. Tuka says: I lay myself flat before you, God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram weighs the simple chant of Vitthal's Name against every elaborate rite and finds it the one thing equal to the crisis of death. At that hour you cannot arrange ten kinds of charity, but you can say the Name, which he calls the final arrow, and which the great ones agree leads all the way to the Infinite. Against this he sets worldly life as a white serpent: it looks harmless yet is full of poison, and it is the worldly claims of I and mine that have kept him from God and dragged him through countless births. Having taken the punishment for his own deeds, he asks for the cycle to be cut off. The closing prostration is the whole teaching in one act: stop bargaining, surrender, and let the Name carry you.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If one speaks of someone truly excellent, He is perfectly fulfilled. If one speaks of sweetness, His Name alone is sweet.

If one speaks of compassion, He is all righteousness. If one speaks of goodness, He does not let His servants suffer.

If one speaks of generosity, His is the generosity that Lakshmi herself serves. If one speaks of a warrior, He fights Death itself.

If one speaks of cleverness, He is a treasury of virtues. The one who truly knows, He alone is that one.

If one speaks of ancientness, He is older than time, His play beyond comprehension. Among the cowherds, He was an innocent cowherd; yet He is the most skillful trickster and enchanter.

He plays the game only in this manner. He is such an actor.

Hiding within the soul, He is unknown to the soul itself; when you try to grasp Him, He eludes you. If one speaks of height, He is immeasurably high.

If one speaks of lowliness, He is immeasurably low. Says Tuka, I have spoken the truth; this is no flattering worship.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If you speak of the excellent, he is the one whose every wish is full. If you speak of sweetness, only his Name is sweet. If you speak of mercy, he is righteousness itself. If you speak of goodness, he will not let his servant grow tired. If you speak of generosity, his is the giving that Lakshmi herself waits on. If you speak of a warrior, he fights Death itself. If you speak of cleverness, he is a heap of all virtues. The one who truly knows him, he alone is that knower. If you speak of what is ancient, he is older than all time, and his play cannot be understood. Among the cowherds he was an innocent cowherd, yet he is the most skillful trickster and enchanter. He plays the game only in his own way. He is such an actor. Hidden inside the soul, he is unknown to the soul itself; when you try to grasp him, he slips away. If you speak of height, he is far the highest. If you speak of lowliness, he is far the lowest. Tuka says: I have spoken the truth; this is no empty flattering worship.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram runs through one virtue after another and finds that every superlative ends in God: the highest excellence, the only real sweetness, mercy, generosity, courage against Death, cleverness, antiquity, all of them are simply names for him. The poem then catches the paradox at the heart of this God. He is the simple cowherd and the supreme enchanter at once; hidden so deep within the soul that the soul cannot find him, and slipping away the moment you grasp at him; and he is both the very highest and the very lowest. The closing line guards against misreading: this is not flattery heaped on a favorite deity. Tukaram is reporting what he has seen, that there is nothing real left over once you have named God in all these ways.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What devotion should we perform and how? What offering should we bring to You? You fill everything and overflow. You pervade every store, every mine, every taste, every form, every fragrance.

How shall we restrain the senses? How shall we break the chain of sin and virtue? What vow or observance shall we practice? What remains apart from You? Should we close our eyes to see? What mantra shall we chant? What shall we meditate upon? Where shall we fix our devotion? What is there that is not You? Where should we wander and in which direction? Where and how shall we set our feet? You are everything, though You appear as though You are not. How then shall I look? Your Name itself is all worship, all prayer, all chanting, all garlands, all incense, all lamps, all food-offerings, all fruit.

Says Tuka, we will gather this handful of flowers in Your Name.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What devotion are we to do, and how? What one thing can we bring you? You have filled everything and still overflow. You are in every word, every mine, every taste, every form and fragrance. How shall we bind the senses? How shall we break off sin and virtue? What vow shall we keep, what practice perform? What is left over apart from you? Shall we shut our eyes to see you? What mantra shall we chant, what shall we meditate on? Where shall we fix our devotion? What of any of it is real apart from you? Which way shall we wander? Where, and how, shall we set our feet? You are everything, though you seem as if you are not. How then shall I look? Your Name itself is all the worship, the prayer, the chanting, the garland, the incense, the lamp, the food-offering, the fruit, the betel. Tuka says: in your Name we offer up this handful of flowers.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram faces a real difficulty for the lover of an all-pervading God: if the Lord already fills everything and overflows, what is there to offer, and where could you even turn to make the offering? Question after question, he shows that every ordinary tool of worship, restraining the senses, keeping vows, chanting, meditating, going on pilgrimage, has no separate ground to stand on, because nothing exists apart from God. The puzzle is that God is everything and yet seems hidden, so that the worshipper cannot find a spot outside him from which to bow. The resolution is the Name. Since the Name itself contains all the rites, the incense and lamp and food and flowers, to utter it is to perform the whole of worship at once. Devotion is not adding something to God; it is offering him back to himself.

The body, neither vile nor holy, turn to Hari

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The body is a storehouse of suffering, a warehouse of disease, a den of foul odors. There is nothing as impure as the body.

Yet the body is excellent and good. The body is a nest of happiness.

What is to be accomplished is accomplished through the body. Through the body, the Supreme Brahman is realized.

The body is a pit of defilement, a snare of illusion and attachment. Downfall comes because of the body; the body is engulfed in darkness.

Yet the body is entirely pure. The body is the treasure of all treasures.

Through the body the bonds of existence are cut, for God dwells within and enjoys the body. The body is a house of ignorance, a furnace of bad qualities.

Many afflictions reside in the body; there is not a single redeeming quality in it. Do not give the body the pleasure of indulgence; do not give it comfort; do not renounce it either.

It is neither bad nor good. Says Tuka, make haste in the worship of Hari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The body is a storehouse of suffering, a warehouse of disease, a den of foul odors. Nothing is as impure as this body. And yet the body is excellent and good. The body is a nest of happiness. What must be done is done through the body. Through the body the Supreme Brahman is reached. The body is a pit of defilement, a snare of illusion and attachment. Downfall comes through the body; the body is wrapped in darkness. And yet the body is wholly pure. The body is the treasure of all treasures. Through the body the bonds of existence are cut, for God dwells within and enjoys the body. The body is a house of ignorance, a furnace of bad qualities. Many afflictions live in the body; not one good quality is in it. Do not give the body the pleasure of indulgence. Do not give it comfort. Do not renounce it either. It is neither bad nor good. Tuka says: make haste in the worship of Hari.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram piles up two opposite verdicts on the body and refuses to settle on either. In one breath it is a warehouse of disease and a pit of defilement; in the next it is the treasure of treasures, the very means by which Brahman is reached and the bonds of existence are cut. The point is that the body is not the question. To pamper it or to torture it are both ways of staring at it, and both miss the mark. So he tells you to stop ranking the body and to spend it instead, quickly, on the one thing that settles the matter: the worship of Hari.

GATHA 0661 The Moral Ideal

Moral counsel, faith carries the burden

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do this much, by whatever means: abandon in your heart the craving for another's wealth and another's spouse. Live happily in your worldly dealings.

Do not labor at pretense. Dwell in deep peace.

Let the tongue relish the sweet nectar of the Name. Do not be lazy in chanting the Name of Rama.

If you place your hope in anything other than God, all of it will come to nothing. If you keep feeding your cravings endlessly, you will never find happiness.

Hold firm faith and be patient. This is the one certainty: God bears the burden of sustaining those who do so.

Says Tuka, there is no distance between God and such a one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do this much, however you can: drop from your heart the craving for another's wealth and another's spouse. Live happily in your worldly dealings. Do not toil at pretense. Stay deep in peace. Let your tongue taste the sweet nectar of the Name. Do not be lazy in the Name of Rama. If you put your hope in anything but God, all of it will come to nothing. If you keep feeding your cravings, you will never reach happiness. Hold firm faith and be patient. This is the one certainty: God carries the burden of caring for the one who does this. Tuka says: there is no distance between God and such a one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips the moral life down to a few things a person can actually do. Let go of the appetite for what belongs to another, drop the labor of pretending to be holy, and keep the Name on your tongue without slacking. Behind the practical advice is one wager: hope placed anywhere but God collapses, and craving fed endlessly never arrives at rest. The reward he names is not a transaction but a relationship; to the one who holds faith and waits, God himself shoulders the weight of provision, and the gap between the devotee and God closes to nothing.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This ocean of worldly life is impossible to cross. However much one tries to swim across, the far shore never comes into view.

O generous Lord, I have been swept far out. How many births have passed in this cycle, I cannot count.

I am caught in whirlpools and vast currents. I have grown in body, but my intellect has not matured.

My awareness never turned back or found its footing. When then shall I reflect, having let go of this opportunity? Through countless births I have known only eating, sleeping, fear, and mating.

Childhood, youth, and old age are the primary experiences there. Having passed through so many stations, spun around by time, now this net must be untangled by the power of daylight.

I will abandon the road of worldly life, which has caused me so much suffering. Says Tuka, it shows the face of truth, yet is utterly false. I have become a traitor to God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This ocean of worldly life cannot be crossed. However hard I swim, the far shore never comes. O generous Lord, I have been swept far out. How many births this cycle has held, I cannot count. I am caught in whirlpools and in great currents. I have grown in body, but my mind has not grown up. My awareness never turned back, never found its footing. When, then, will I reflect, after letting this chance slip away? Through countless wombs I have known only eating, sleeping, fear, and mating. Childhood, youth, old age: those are the main fare there. I have passed through so many stations, spun around by time. Now this net must be untangled by the power of daylight. I will leave the road of worldly life, which has made me suffer so much. Tuka says: it shows the face of truth, yet is utterly false. I have become a traitor to God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks back over an uncountable string of births and sees only motion without arrival, a swimmer carried farther from shore the harder he strokes. The body has aged again and again while the mind never grew up; awareness never once turned around to find its ground. He names the dull menu of every life, eating, sleeping, fear, mating, childhood to old age, and calls it what it is: a wheel he keeps boarding. The sharp confession at the end is that worldly life wears the face of truth while being utterly false, and that by going along with it he has been a traitor to God; he resolves now, in daylight, to cut the net.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Vitthal dwells on the bank of the Bhima. Vitthal resides in Pandhari.

Vitthal is near Pundalika, supremely generous in bestowing mercy. Vitthal is tender to those who remember Him and surpasses all in honor.

He is the support of the entire creation; Vitthal embodies divine play. He stands and yet never feels weariness.

In granting liberation He makes no distinction. In the house of the Almighty there is one food for all; He cares for the distressed at every moment.

Delicacies of every kind are brought before Him with devotion. He never fails anyone.

He is great to the great and small to the small. He cannot be seized by force; He yields only to the heart and mind.

He who dwells in the heart knows the way of one's own purpose. When the milk of love flows, the distance vanishes; nothing is left empty.

Says Tuka, I partake of what is ready, merging my heart with His.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Vitthal lives on the bank of the Bhima. Vitthal dwells in Pandhari. Vitthal is beside Pundalik, generous in giving mercy. Vitthal is tender to those who remember him, and beyond all in honor. He is the support of the whole creation. Vitthal takes form for the sake of play. He stands and stands, yet feels no weariness. In granting freedom he makes no distinction. In the house of the Almighty there is one food for all; he watches over the distressed at every moment. Dishes of every taste are brought to him with love. Nowhere does he fall short. He is great to the great and small to the small. He cannot be seized by force; he yields only to the heart. The one who dwells in the heart knows the aim of your own purpose. When the milk of love comes, the distance is gone; nothing is left empty. Tuka says: I take what is ready, joining my heart to his.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram fixes Vitthal in place, on the riverbank, in Pandhari, beside Pundalik, and then widens him out into the support of all creation who has only stood there, never tiring, for the sake of his devotees. The heart of the poem is fairness and access: in this Lord's house there is one food for everyone, no rank in who gets liberated, great for the great and small for the small. What he cannot be is forced; he yields only to the heart, because as the indweller he already knows your true intention. The closing image is a nursing mother whose milk lets down: when love flows, the distance between soul and God simply disappears.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

His holy face removes all burning pain. It cures the terrible disease of worldly existence.

Beholding it, joy arises; it stands before my eyes in person. The eyes can never have their fill of it.

His mercy is a deep, inexhaustible mine. Even the Vedic hymns cannot praise Him adequately.

This treasury of mercy stands on even feet. In the meditation of Rama, Krishna, Vamana, and Narasimha, there is nothing fierce or mild; all merge into one.

He is found in the full current of pure devotion; sincerity of heart is His delight. He is noble, profound, wise, and discerning.

He is brave, steadfast, generous, Narayana. Though He pervades the three worlds, He is this enchanting, captivating beauty.

His stance is graceful and beautiful, imperishable and unchanging, infinite and boundless. He stands with hands upon His waist.

His words are garlands of flowers, nectar of the highest order. The Infinite One possesses infinite arts.

Says Tuka, I stay close, serving at His feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

His holy face takes away all burning pain. It cures the disease of worldly existence. Looking at it, joy is born; it stands before my eyes in person. My eyes can never get their fill of it. His mercy is a deep, never-emptying mine. Even the speech of the Vedas cannot praise him enough. This treasury of mercy stands on even feet. In meditating on Rama, Krishna, Vamana, Narasimha, there is nothing fierce, nothing mild; all is one. He is found in the full current of pure devotion; a sincere heart is his delight. He is noble, deep, clever, wise. He is brave, steady, generous, Narayana. Though he fills the three worlds, he is this heart-stealing beauty. His stance is graceful and lovely, undying and unchanging, endless and without limit. He stands with his hands upon his waist. His words are garlands of flowers, nectar of the highest kind. The Endless One holds endless arts. Tuka says: I stay close, serving at his feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram gazes at Vitthal's standing form and reports what the sight does: it lifts the fever of worldly life and pours in a joy the eyes can never exhaust. He insists the Vedas themselves run out of praise before this mercy is described, and that across the avatars, Rama, Krishna, Vamana, Narasimha, there is no longer any split between fierce and gentle; all of them resolve into this one even-footed beauty. The form is gorgeous and infinite at once, world-pervading yet standing simply with hands on hips before him. The way in is not force or cleverness but sincerity; a pure heart is what delights him, and that is where Tukaram chooses to stay, at the feet.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Lord of Vaikuntha, O deliverer of the three worlds, O all-pervading Janardana, O protector of Your devotees. O son of Vasudeva and Devaki, O delight of the gopis, O Vamana who bound Bali, O treasure-house of virtues.

O brother of Draupadi, O friend of the Pandavas, O life of our very life, O Madhava, Madhusudana. O great Lord, O supreme King, O Shri Hari bearing the Garuda banner, O beautiful one of a thousand arms.

How can I describe Your fullness? O heir of Ambarisha's lineage, O spotless one beyond all change, O lifter of Govardhana, O home of the helpless. O righteous one of supreme virtue, O ocean of compassion, O flood of pure love, master of all arts.

O wise and discerning one, of sweet speech and auspicious qualities, O generous crusher of demons, protect Tukayabandhu who comes to Your shelter.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O Lord of Vaikuntha. O deliverer of the three worlds. O all-pervading Janardana. O protector of your devotees. O son of Vasudeva and Devaki. O delight of the gopis. O Vamana who bound Bali. O beautiful one of a thousand arms, how can I tell your fullness? O heir of Ambarisha's line. O spotless one beyond all change. O lifter of Govardhana. O home of the helpless. O righteous one of highest virtue. O ocean of compassion. O flood of pure love, master of all arts. O wise and discerning one, of sweet speech and lovely marks. O generous crusher of demons: guard Tukayabandhu, who has come to your shelter.

WHAT IT MEANS

This abhanga is almost entirely an address, name after name laid before the Lord like offerings. Tukaram threads together his cosmic titles, Lord of Vaikuntha, all-pervading Janardana, and his intimate ones, brother of Draupadi, friend of the Pandavas, life of our life, so that the same God is at once beyond the three worlds and bound to those who love him. Each name also recalls a rescue: Vamana who humbled Bali, the lifter of Govardhana, the home of the helpless, the crusher of demons. The long list is itself the prayer; only at the very end does the single request arrive, that this Lord of so many names guard the one who has taken refuge.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have seen Him standing on the bank of the Bhima, His hands displayed proudly upon His hips. His feet are beautifully even, and His Name is infinitely sweet.

Conch and discus mark His ornaments. A jeweled girdle shines with the gems of consciousness.

A yellow silk garment and sandalwood paste enhance His fair complexion, outshining the radiance of the sun. Earrings cast their glow upon His ears.

Rings adorn His ten fingers alongside a rosary. His row of teeth sparkles like diamonds.

His face is pure and overflows with bliss. A waist-cord and bracelets adorn His waist and wrists.

Armlets grace His arms, a pendant hangs at His throat, and a musk tilak marks His forehead. His eyes flash like lightning.

What comparison can describe such beauty? Says Tukayabandhu, O Achyuta, blessed indeed are the mother and father who gave birth to You.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have seen him standing on the bank of the Bhima, his hands set proudly on his hips. His feet are beautifully even, and his Name is endlessly sweet. Conch and discus mark his ornaments. Rings adorn his ten fingers, with a rosary among them. His row of teeth sparkles like diamonds. His face is pure, a heap of bliss. A waist-cord and bangles adorn his waist and wrists. Armlets grace his arms, a pendant hangs at his throat, a musk mark is drawn on his brow. His eyes flash like lightning. What can match such beauty? How shall I tell it now? Tukayabandhu says: O Achyuta, blessed are the mother and father who gave you birth.

WHAT IT MEANS

Here Tukaram does nothing but look, head to foot, at Vitthal standing on the Bhima's bank with hands on hips. He moves slowly over the form, the even feet, the conch and discus, the yellow silk and sandal paste, the earrings, rings, rosary, the lightning of the eyes, as if love itself were taking inventory. The jeweled girdle made of gems of consciousness quietly hints that this gorgeous body is woven of more than matter. Overwhelmed, he gives up the catalogue and blesses the very parents who brought such beauty into the world, the worshipper's most personal way of saying that the sight is beyond describing.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have one request, O Hrishikesha. Give Your chitta to my words.

Grant me such grace that I am never separated from Your feet. I do not want any other attainment, no miraculous powers, no other world.

You are the master and I am the servant; do not sever this bond. Give me whatever birth pleases You, in any family, in any place.

I do not make demands about that. But do not leave my heart.

Grant me this much, in any manner. By whatever form of devotion, let me remain at Your door as a servant, a laborer.

Let my voice utter Your Name constantly. Consider nothing else now.

Says Tukayabandhu, I have come to You for refuge, O Lord of Pandhari. O Achyuta, You are indeed the most generous giver.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have one request, O Hrishikesha. Give your attention to my words. Grant me such grace that I am never parted from your feet. I want no other gain, no powers, no other world. You are the master and I am the servant; do not break this bond. Give me whatever birth pleases you, in any family, in any place. I make no demands about that. Only do not leave my heart. Grant me this much, in any way at all. By whatever kind of devotion, let me stay at your door as a servant, a laborer. Let my voice say your Name without stopping. Think of nothing else now. Tukayabandhu says: I have come to you for refuge, O Lord of Pandhari. O Achyuta, you are the most generous giver of all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram brings God a single petition and guards it against being mistaken for greed. He waves away every prize a devotee might be expected to ask for, miraculous powers, a higher world, a better birth, and keeps only one thing: never to be parted from the feet. He hands God complete freedom over his next life, any family, any place, on one condition, that God not vacate his heart. The role he asks for is the lowest, servant or day-laborer at the door, with the Name always on his lips, and he closes by reminding the most generous of givers that a refugee has arrived.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When will I see with these eyes the dark-hued form in all beings, the one who bears the name "soul" throughout the earth, in water, on land, in wood and stone? When will Narayana show such mercy that I become the very life of the world? When will I be drowned in an ocean of love and bathed in the waters of repentance? When will such fortune dawn upon me that all appearance of the visible world dissolves along with all desire? May I dwell always at the feet of saints, partaking of their sacred remnants until fully satisfied. When will the seeds of my vows sprout, and happiness overflow beyond all measure? When the nectar of earth, water, and ocean will flow in floods of bliss.

When will grace, forgiveness, patience, and peace manifest? When will ninefold devotion arise? When will I enjoy the wealth of detachment? Then alone will I know my longings have been fulfilled. Says Tukayabandhu, tell me, for without You this restlessness will not be quieted. Therefore I fall prostrate before the feet of Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When will I see with these eyes the dark-hued form in all beings, the one who bears the name "soul" across the earth, in water, on land, in wood and stone? When will Narayana show such mercy that I become the very life of the world? When will I be drowned in an ocean of love and bathed in the waters of repentance? When will such fortune dawn on me that all the visible world dissolves along with every desire? Let me dwell always at the feet of the saints, taking their sacred leavings until I am full. When will the seeds of my vows sprout, and happiness pour out past all measure? When will the nectar of earth, water, and ocean flow in floods of bliss? When will grace, forgiveness, patience, and peace appear? When will ninefold devotion arise? When will I enjoy the wealth of detachment? Only then will I know my longings are fulfilled. Tukayabandhu says: tell me, for without you this restlessness will not be stilled. So I fall flat before the feet of Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

The whole abhanga is one long ache of when, a list of graces Tukaram cannot give himself and can only wait for. He wants to see the dark-hued form in every being, in water and stone alike, to be drowned in love and washed clean by repentance, until the visible world and all its desires dissolve. He counts off what he is longing for, a seat at the feet of the saints, ninefold devotion, the wealth of detachment, peace and forgiveness, and recognizes that each is a gift, not an achievement. That is why the question is aimed at God: without him the restlessness will not quiet, so the poem ends face-down before Panduranga's feet, the question turned into surrender.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You are the supreme trickster, dwelling within these three worlds. I have taken refuge behind You, and so I will do whatever must be done.

You, O God, are a sun of mighty prowess, a champion among gods and demons, a hero among great warriors and archers. What am I, a lowly wretch, in comparison? O ocean of mercy, lover of the humble, You have broken open the prison of the gods.

Having destroyed the demon armies, You have restored the rightful kings who sought Your protection. If much good is to be done, You know the proper code.

What is fitting and what is not, protect this refugee who has come to You now. How much more shall I plead? I have come to You with all my life and soul.

Says Tukayabandhu, grant safety and well-being in this hour.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You are the supreme champion, the crown of the strong, dwelling within these three worlds. I have taken refuge behind you, and so now I will do whatever must be done. You, O God, are a sun of mighty power, the god above gods and demons, a hero among great warriors and archers. What am I, a poor wretch, beside you? O ocean of mercy, lover of the lowly, you broke open the prison of the gods. You destroyed the armies of demons and set the surrendered kings back on their thrones. If much good is to be done, you know the law of right. What is fitting and what is not, you know; protect this refugee who has come to you now. How much more can I plead? I have come to you with all my life and heart. Tukayabandhu says: grant safety and well-being in this hour.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pleads by leaning his whole weakness against God's strength. He stacks up the heroic titles, sun of power, god above gods and demons, hero among archers, and then sets himself beside them as nothing, a poor wretch with no standing of his own. His confidence does not come from himself but from precedent: this same Lord smashed the prison that held the gods and put surrendered kings back on their thrones. So he leaves the judgment of right and wrong, fitting and unfitting, entirely to God, and asks only the one thing a refugee can ask, to be kept safe in this present hour.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O God, even to call myself a wretch takes a long time, for there is no one in all the earth as inauspicious and vile as I. From the very moment of my birth, I have practiced nothing but falsehood.

I do not know righteous conduct even in dreams. I am a pure mine of faults.

Devotion, compassion, sacred stories, I cannot even bear to hear of them. My mind is ceaselessly tormented by sense-pleasures.

I am the lowest of the low, more degraded than the most degraded. Lust, anger, hypocrisy, ego, arrogance, pride, and jealousy, these are my true home.

Kindness to others is my enemy. In slander, malice, treachery, and betrayal, I have shown no laziness.

I have mocked the saints, that which should never be done. I have consumed what should not be consumed.

I did not heed my father's words. My gaze was always fixed on another's door and another's wealth.

Unspeakable deeds have been done, beginning with sins too shameful to name.

I did not obey my father's words. My eyes were always on another's door and another's wealth. Things too shameful to speak have been done, beginning with going in to a servant-woman, and worse.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a confession in which Tukaram makes himself the worst man on earth, refusing every comfort of self-excuse. He does not list sins to titillate but to break his own pride: he names lust, anger, hypocrisy and ego as his real household, admits he cannot even stand to hear devotion spoken of, and confesses that doing good to others felt like an enemy. The catalogue runs from slander and betrayal to mocking the very saints and shaming his father, down to deeds he says are too shameful to name. The force of it is self-examination, not despair; by speaking the corruption out loud before God he is dragging it into the light rather than guarding it, which is the first honest move a soul can make.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What shall I do with this mind, O Narayana? It refuses to listen. It plots what should never be done and drags me toward ruin.

It runs wild in every direction, down roads and byroads, through valleys and ravines, never pausing to consider any deceit or treachery. A great trap has been set.

Not even all ten directions suffice for its wandering, nor the seven nether worlds, nor the skies above. It leaps headlong at the sight of a snare and has made me a stranger in my own land.

It has roused all the senses, along with desire, craving, imagination, lust, anger, and time. It has driven away pure wisdom and reduced my intellect to dust.

This uncontrollable wretch is beyond restraint. Now what can be done with it? I am tormented and made miserable by it.

Says Tukayabandhu, O Hrishikesha, rush to me, for such is my condition.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What, what shall I do with this mind, O Narayana? It will not listen. It plots what should never be done and sets out to carry me to ruin. It runs wild after anything at all, down roads and off roads, through valleys and ravines, never stopping to weigh any deceit or treachery. A heavy trap has been laid. The ten directions are not enough for its wandering, nor the seven nether worlds, nor the skies. It leaps headlong the moment it spots a snare, and has made me a stranger in my own land. It has stirred up all the senses, with desire, craving, imagination, lust, anger, and time. It has driven away clear wisdom and ground my intellect to dust. This is a wretch beyond all restraint. Now what is to be done with it? It has worn me down and made me wretched. Tukayabandhu says: O Hrishikesha, rush to me, for this is the state I am in.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the confession outward onto a single culprit, the mind, which he describes as a runaway that will not obey and actively schemes toward ruin. He pictures it tearing across roads and ravines, through all ten directions and seven worlds, leaping straight at every snare it sees, until he is a stranger even in his own home. It does not act alone; it rouses the senses and yokes desire, craving, lust, anger and time against him, grinding clear judgment to dust. Having admitted plainly that he cannot control this himself, he stops trying and turns it into a cry for rescue: O Hrishikesha, run to me, this is the state I am in.

What shall I eat now, where shall I go? By what strength shall I remain in this village? The village headman is angry, and these townspeople are hostile. Who will give me alms now? They say I have lost my senses and are passing judgment against me in the village council.

Good people have been told tales about me; the powerful have ruined this poor one. Says Tuka, this company is no good. I will go now in search of Vitthal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What shall I eat now? Where shall I go? By what strength can I stay in this village? The headman is angry. The townspeople have turned against me. Who will give me alms now? They say I have lost my senses. They are passing judgment on me in the council. They have carried tales about me to the good people. The powerful have ruined this poor man. Tuka says: their company is no good. I will go now in search of Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from the inside of being cast out by his own village. The headman is angry, the people are hostile, the council has ruled against him, and slander has reached even the decent folk, so that a poor man has been crushed by those with power. He names the practical terror of it: no food, no place, no alms, nowhere to stand. Then he turns the whole loss into a verdict on the company that produced it. If this is what their fellowship comes to, he wants none of it, and he leaves to look for Vitthal instead. The ruin pushes him toward God rather than away.

When a saint asks for water, this man will not give even a sip. But for his mistress he stores water for her bath.

Seeing a saint, he turns his back, but he kisses the children of his maidservant. Seeing a saint, he makes excuses, yet he lovingly washes the feet of his mistress.

Says Tuka, spit upon the face of such a one. He is bound for Yama's realm of punishment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When a saint asks for water, this man will not give one sip. But for his mistress he keeps water ready for her bath. Seeing a saint, he turns his back. He kisses the children of his maidservant. Seeing a saint, he makes excuses; but he lovingly washes his mistress's feet. Tuka says: spit on the face of such a one. He is going to Yama's realm to suffer.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets two devotions side by side to expose a man whose worship goes entirely to his appetites. The saint who comes to his door gets nothing, not even a sip of water, while his mistress gets her bath drawn and her feet washed with tenderness, and her servant's children get his kisses. The point is not the woman but the inversion:

every honor owed to the holy is spent instead on lust. Tukaram's harsh line, spit on him, is aimed at this pattern of turning one's back on the sacred while lavishing reverence on indulgence. He warns that such a life ends in Yama's hall of punishment, where the reckoning falls due.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Listen, O Lord of the World, to this tale of love; a story has come to mind. A deer with its two fawns was grazing happily in the forest.

Suddenly a hunter arrived, bringing two hunting dogs. On one side he spread his nets, on another he placed his hounds, on a third side he lit a wildfire, and on the fourth he stationed himself.

Surrounded on all sides, the deer began to remember Your Name. "Rama, Krishna, Hari, Govinda, Keshava, O God of gods, come to us now.

Who will protect us in this dire peril, O Father, Lord of the World, if not You?" Hearing their plea, Your heart was moved with tender compassion. You commanded the rain to fall swiftly and extinguish the fire.

Then a hare was startled and set running, and both dogs chased after it. The deer, alert and quick, fled to safety.

Govinda saved them. Such is Your compassion, Your love, and Your tenderness toward Your devotees.

Says Tuka, O Lord of Rakhumai, such is Your fame, dear to my heart.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Listen, Lord of the World, to a tale of love; a story has come to mind. A deer with its two fawns was grazing happily in the forest. Suddenly a hunter came, bringing two dogs. On one side he spread his nets. On another he set his hounds. On a third he lit a wildfire. On the fourth he stood himself. Surrounded on all sides, the deer began to remember Your Name. "Rama, Krishna, Hari, Govinda, Keshava, God of gods, come to us now. Who will protect us in this peril, Father, Lord of the World, if not You?" Hearing their words, Your heart was moved with tender pity. At that moment You ordered the rain to fall and put out the fire fast. A hare there was startled and ran, and both dogs chased after it. The deer, alert and quick, fled to safety. Govinda saved them. Such is Your pity, Your love, Your tenderness toward Your devotees. Tuka says: such is Your fame, dear to my heart, O Lord of Rakhumai.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells a parable to show what the Name does in an hour of total helplessness. The deer and its fawns are boxed in on all four sides, nets, hounds, fire, and the hunter himself, with no opening left by any natural means. Their only act is to cry the Name and ask, who will save us if not You. The poem shows God moved by that cry and answering not with one rescue but with a chain of them: rain to kill the fire, a startled hare to pull the dogs away, an opening through which the deer escape. The lesson Tukaram draws is the character of God revealed in the act: tender toward the devotee, swift when called, glad to be famous for exactly this kind of saving.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A speaker bound by worldly expectations instills only fear in the hearts of listeners. Such devotion goes to waste, for the minds of both are driven by greed.

Both are turned outward, facing the same direction. Says Tuka, the measure and the sack are alike: both empty.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A speaker bound by his own wants puts only fear in the listeners' hearts. That devotion is wasted, for both minds are ruled by greed. Both face outward, the same direction. Tuka says: the measure and the sack are alike; both are empty.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at a religious gathering and finds it hollow on both sides. The speaker preaches to get something, not to give, so what reaches the listeners is fear, not love, and the worship is wasted. The trouble is that speaker and hearer are bent the same way, both turned outward toward gain rather than inward toward God. He ends with a homely image from the grain market: the measuring cup and the sack into which it pours are no different here, because both are empty. The warning is to examine which way one's own devotion faces, and whether anything real is being passed at all.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Vitthal, You are the king of the generous. O Vitthal, You are the life of this world.

O Vitthal, You are the very sum of generosity. O Vitthal, all powers reside with You.

O Vitthal, Your Name is supremely sweet. O Vitthal, You fulfill every longing.

O Vitthal, Your holy face is beautiful. O Vitthal, Your meditation has seized my mind.

O Vitthal, the words from Your mouth overflow with nectar. O Vitthal, my very breath is pledged to You.

Says Tuka, O Vitthal, I grieve in longing. O Vitthal, come to me swiftly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O Vitthal, You are the king of the generous. O Vitthal, You are the life of this world. O Vitthal, You are the very heap of generosity. O Vitthal, all powers rest with You. O Vitthal, Your Name is so sweet. O Vitthal, You fulfill every wish. O Vitthal, Your holy face is beautiful. O Vitthal, Your image has settled in my mind. O Vitthal, the words from Your mouth are full of nectar. O Vitthal, my breath is pledged to You. Tuka says: O Vitthal, I grieve in longing. O Vitthal, come to me quickly.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a litany of praise that builds toward a cry for presence. Tukaram names Vitthal's generosity, His power, the sweetness of His Name, the beauty of His face, the nectar of His speech, each line opening and closing on the name itself, so the praise is also the practice. The repetition shows a mind that has fixed on one object and will not let it go: Vitthal's image has lodged in his thought and his very breath is given over. Then the adoration tips into ache. For all this nearness in the heart, the Lord is not yet here in the flesh, and the poem ends in grief and the plain plea, come quickly.

Spiritual experience, separating truth from self

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By my own doings I have strayed outside my own self and become entangled in worldly life with all my heart. Yet the two cannot be mixed; buttermilk and butter have been separated.

From one single churning two names have arisen, made different by their qualities. Says Tuka, just as shells remain behind when pearls are extracted, so do our deceptions end when the truth is found.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By my own doing I went outside myself and bound my whole life to the world. The two cannot be mixed; buttermilk and butter have been parted. From one churning two names arose, made separate by their qualities. Tuka says: as shells stay behind when the pearl is taken, so deceptions end once the truth is found.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the moment of inward sorting that follows a life spent turned outward. He admits the entanglement was his own work, then says it can now be undone, because the true and the false are no more mixable than butter and the buttermilk left after churning. One process, the churning of a life, yields two distinct things, told apart by their nature. He closes with the image of pearl and shell: when the real thing is found and lifted out, the husk of illusion simply drops away and is left behind. The poem is about discrimination, the labor of separating the self that clung to the world from the self that belongs to God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How beautiful, how beautiful, how beautiful You are, O God. You are dearer to the soul than the soul itself.

Gazing at Your face, the eyes are satisfied. Hearing Your virtues, the ears are fulfilled.

All eight limbs of the body are soothed, and the threefold afflictions of life are dispelled when Your qualities are described. The mind has become absorbed beyond thought.

Says Tukayabandhu, I cannot comprehend this glory.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How beautiful, how beautiful, how beautiful You are, O God. You are dearer to the soul than the soul itself, O God. Gazing at Your face, the eyes are content. Hearing Your virtues, the ears are filled, O God. The whole body in its eight parts is soothed, the threefold afflictions and weariness are gone, when Your marks are described, O God. The mind has passed beyond thought, an unmatched taking-hold. Tukayabandhu says: I do not know this glory.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram, here speaking in his brother's voice, traces beauty entering through every gate of the body until the mind itself dissolves. Sight is satisfied by the Lord's face, hearing by His qualities, and the whole frame is eased so that the three great afflictions and all tiredness lift away. The praise then crosses a threshold: the mind becomes unmana, gone past thought, seized by something beyond compare. The last line is the honest end of such an experience. Having been taken up entirely, the poet says he cannot comprehend the glory that took him; the experience outruns any account of it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

That pure joy, surpassing all other joys, stands in the courtyard of the Vaishnavas. Tulsi gardens are swept, rangoli patterns and garlands of flowers are arranged, and one dances beholding this celebration.

Adorned with sacred marks at all times, they wear the mudra marks and the tulsi garland around the neck. The Name flows from their lips, the essence of nectar.

Their heads are holy, blessed with the dust of the saints' feet. Says Tuka, liberation itself desires the heart of such a devotee; it waits upon his will.

IN PLAIN WORDS

That pure joy, greater than the greatest joy, stands in the courtyard of the Vaishnavas. Tulsi gardens are swept, squares are drawn with colored powder, garlands are hung, and one dances to see the festival. They are always adorned with sacred marks, wearing the mudra signs and the tulsi beads at the neck. The flood of the Name is on their lips, the essence of nectar. Their heads are holy, blessed with the dust of the saints' feet. Tuka says: liberation itself longs for the heart of such a devotee; it waits upon his will.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says the highest joy is not somewhere far off but standing in the courtyard where the devotees of God gather. He paints the scene with festival detail: swept tulsi plots, rangoli squares, garlands, dancing, bodies marked with the sacred signs and beaded with tulsi, mouths pouring the Name like nectar, heads humbled by the dust of holy feet. The whole picture argues that the company of the saints is itself the goal, not merely the road to it. He lands the claim by reversing the usual hunger: liberation, which everyone chases, here desires the devotee instead, and waits on his pleasure. The one absorbed in the Name no longer needs to seek release; release seeks him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One may have made ten million pilgrimages and still not seen Pandhari. Let his very birth burn, for it has never beheld the even feet of the Lord.

Infinite rituals and sacrifices may be performed, yet without seeing those even feet, all is in vain. Says Tuka, at the feet of Vitthal, countless holy places are contained.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One may make ten million pilgrimages and still never see Pandhari. Let his very life burn, for it has never seen the even feet of the Lord. He may perform endless yogas and sacrifices, yet has not seen those even feet. Tuka says: at Vitthal's feet, countless holy places are held.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures all sacred effort against one thing: standing before Vitthal on the brick at Pandhari. A man may rack up ten million pilgrimages and perform yoga and sacrifice without end, and Tukaram calls the whole heap empty if it never brought him to those even feet. His harsh line, let such a life burn, is aimed at the pattern of busy religion that misses its own center, not at any person. The closing claim reverses the math: the feet of Vitthal already contain every holy place there is. To reach them is to have made all the pilgrimages at once; to miss them is to have made none.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What pressing cause remains that would compel me to trouble You by force? I am not dying, nor is any harm befalling me. What came to mind arose naturally, of its own accord.

I have no worry about starving, nor any need for buffaloes or cows. You know all this within my heart.

The outward display is genuine devotion. Says Tuka, O God, for the sake of perishable things, people sever their connection with Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What pressing cause is there that I should force You into trouble for me? My life is not leaving. No harm is coming to me. What came to mind came on its own. I have no fear of dying of hunger, no need of buffaloes or cows. You know all of this within my heart. The outward show is true devotion. Tuka says: O God, for the sake of perishable things people break off their hold on Your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram refuses to use God as a means to anything. He checks himself: there is no emergency, no starvation, no loss of cattle, nothing that would justify pestering the Lord for help, and what rose in his mind rose on its own, not as a demand. He trusts that God already reads the heart and knows the difference between asking for things and simply wanting Him. The closing line names the trap he is avoiding: people let go of God's feet for the sake of perishable goods, trading the eternal for what will rot. By wanting nothing from God except God, Tukaram keeps his grip on the feet that do not pass away.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Rama, king of Ayodhya, O Lord of the lowly, my dear friend. Destroy my sins, afflictions, and obstacles; O Lord of the humble, bring me happiness.

You accepted the half-eaten fruit of the tribal woman Shabari, receiving even polluted offerings. I am Your intimate child.

Says Tuka, and You are deep and generous.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O Rama, king of Ayodhya, Lord of the lowly, my dear friend. Take away my sin, my suffering, my obstacles; Lord of the humble, give me happiness. You took the half-eaten fruit of the tribal woman; You, who accept even the polluted. I am Your own intimate child. Tuka says: and You are deep and generous.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays to Rama by the titles that matter to a sinner: king of Ayodhya, but also friend and Lord of the lowly. He asks for the ordinary relief, removal of sin, affliction, and obstacles, and rests the request on a remembered act of grace. Rama once ate the fruit Shabari had already tasted, accepting what custom called defiled because the love behind it was pure. On that ground Tukaram claims his place not as a stranger but as an intimate child who can speak freely. The whole prayer leans on God's character as deep and generous, the kind of Lord who measures by the heart's love and not by the giver's rank or purity.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Grant the sight of that one whose mind is fixed upon You. How can pure devotion fade when it has no hands, no feet, no worldly function? Gather up all the faculties and fix them upon You.

Says Tuka, hiding behind me, You reveal Your playful wonders, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Grant me the sight You give to the one whose mind is fixed on You. How can pure feeling fade, when it has no hands, no feet, no worldly function? I have gathered all my faculties and aimed them at You. Tuka says: hiding behind me, You show Your playful wonders, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks for the vision granted to a wholehearted devotee, then argues why his own longing will not run out. Pure devotion has no hands or feet or worldly business of its own; having nothing to do but love, it cannot tire or wander off the way ordinary works do. He has bundled every faculty together and pointed them all at God like one aim. The closing line catches the strange game of it: God is not far away but hidden right behind the seeker, putting on His wonders just out of sight. The plea to be shown is really a plea for the hidden, near God to step into view.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Maya pervades the whole world and has covered everything with her shadow. Truth has been swallowed up, and ignorance reigns supreme.

One's own mind creates one's own bondage. Says Tuka, O God, please unravel these riddles.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Maya spreads through the whole world. She has covered everything with her shadow. Truth has been swallowed up. Ignorance rules over all. My own mind makes my own bondage. Tuka says: O God, you alone can untie these knots.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names a single force that has darkened the world: Maya, the power of illusion, which throws her shadow over everything until truth is lost and ignorance takes the throne. Then he turns the blame inward. The bondage is not laid on him from outside; his own mind ties the knot and holds it tight. Having seen that the trap is self-made, he sees that he cannot cut it himself. So he ends by handing the riddle to God, the only one who can unravel what the mind has knotted.

The body and its kin, no real outsiders

मराठी मूळ

पोटीं जन्मती रोग । तरि कां ह्मणावे आप्तवर्ग ॥1॥
रानीं वसती औषधी । तरि कां ह्मणाव्या निपराधी ॥2॥
तैसें शरीराचें नातें । तुका ह्मणे सर्व आप्तें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Diseases are born within the body itself; then why call them strangers? Medicinal herbs grow in the wild; then why call them uninvolved? Says Tuka, even so is the body's relationship with all its kin.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Diseases are born inside the body itself. Then why call them strangers? Healing herbs grow out in the wild. Then why call them outsiders? Tuka says: it is the same with the body's ties. All of them are kin.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses two plain facts to break a careless way of thinking. Disease arises from within the very body we call our own, and the herbs that cure us grow far off in the forest, where we never planted them. So the line between what is mine and what is foreign does not hold. He turns this on the bonds of family and relation: we sort people into our own and not our own, but the sorting is arbitrary. Trouble grows from within, help comes from outside, and in truth all of it is one web of kinship.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

These words are not confined to one place; they do not abandon anyone. My voice has become all-pervading, filling the universe.

Like an arrow released from the bow, it cannot return to the quiver that held it. Says Tuka, where is Tuka now? It is the Lord's own teaching that speaks.

IN PLAIN WORDS

These words are not bound to one place. They do not abandon anyone. My voice has become all-pervading; it fills the universe. Like an arrow shot from the bow, it cannot return to the quiver that held it. Now where is Tuka here? Tuka says: it is the Lord's own teaching that speaks.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes what has happened to his own speech: it no longer belongs to him or stays in one spot, but spreads everywhere and turns away no one. He gives the image of an arrow already loosed, which cannot be drawn back into its quiver, because once such words go out they cannot be unsaid or owned. Then he asks where Tuka himself is in all this, and answers that he is not the speaker at all. The teaching is the Lord's; Tuka is only the bow that released it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the rapture of sacred song, a wondrous power comes over the body. This is Your gift, O God: accept this unbroken service.

The tide of love rises within and never ebbs, only increasing. Says Tuka, the Name from the tongue is a mine of nectar.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the rapture of song a wondrous power comes over the body. This is your gift, O God; let me give you unbroken service. The tide of love rises in me. It never ebbs; it only climbs higher. Tuka says: the Name on the tongue is a mine of nectar.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from inside the act of singing, where a strange power floods the body as the bhajan rises. He refuses to claim it as his own attainment; it is God's gift, and his only response is to ask that the service never break off. The love it raises is a tide that does not turn, only swells higher and higher. The reason, he says, is in the Name itself: spoken aloud, it is an inexhaustible mine of nectar, so the source can never run dry.

Surrender, the measuring cup and the master

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The measuring cup says, "I do the measuring," but it is the master who fills and empties it. O God, do not let pride take residence in me.

The coin that circulates has the king's stamp upon it; who pays heed to an empty pauper? Says Tuka, the greatness belongs to the one who holds the string.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The measuring cup says, I do the measuring. But it is the master who fills it and sets it down empty. O God, do not let pride live in me. Do not let me say the work is mine. The coin that passes from hand to hand carries the king's stamp; who looks twice at an empty pauper? The string is in your hand. Tuka says: the greatness is his.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram catches the soul in the act of self-congratulation and corrects it with a homely image. A measuring cup boasts that it does the measuring, but it has no will of its own; the master fills it and empties it as he pleases. So he prays that the same pride never settle in him, that he never claim the work as his doing. A coin is honored only because the king's stamp is on it, not for itself, just as a puppet moves only because someone holds the string. Whatever greatness shows through him belongs to the one who holds the string.

Surrender, the Father carried the cup away

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who had gone traveling from land to land to spread this message? The measuring cup was carried away by the Almighty, my Father. Says Tuka, by this certainty, my fear has been dissolved.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who had gone wandering from land to land to spread this message? No one of mine. The measuring cup was carried off by him. The Almighty is my Father. Tuka says: by this certainty my fear has dissolved.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses the same image of the measuring cup further. He asks who really traveled from country to country to carry his teaching abroad, and answers that he himself did nothing; the cup was simply picked up and carried by God. Calling the Almighty his Father, he places the whole work in stronger hands than his own. Out of that certainty his fear falls away, for if the doing was never his, then neither is the burden, and there is nothing left for him to be afraid of.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I place my humble plea at the feet of all. I bow my head to everyone's feet.

O listeners, speakers, all people, examine well and tie the knot firmly. The treasury has been opened; this is the Master's merchandise.

I am merely a porter, a carrier of the load. Says Tuka, this trade has spread in all four directions. The goods have proven genuine when tested.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I lay my plea at the feet of all. I set my head down at everyone's feet. O listeners, O speakers, all you people: test it well, then tie the knot fast. The treasury has been opened. This is the Master's merchandise. I am only a porter, a carrier of the load. Tuka says: the trade has spread to all four lands. Tested, the goods proved genuine.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram opens by bowing low to everyone, listeners and fellow speakers alike, taking the humblest place. He tells them not to accept his words on trust but to examine the goods well and only then hold on tight. The treasury he has opened is not his own; it is the Master's stock, and he is merely the hired porter who hauls it on his back. He takes no credit for the worth of what he carries. The proof is in the testing: the teaching has spread to the four directions and, weighed and assayed, has come out true.

Who has found His limits, even after the deepest searching? When one inquires further, O Sustainer of the Universe, there is no end. From the atom to the vast, from the subtle to the gross, there is no measure.

Even the Vedas declaring "not this, not this" have reached exhaustion. Within one fruit lies a tiny insect, within it a sky as vast as all the world, and within that, how many trees beyond counting.

The Infinite One showed Arjuna within His belly yet more creations and worlds of Krishna beyond. Says Tuka, cling to the company of saints. By taking refuge there, save your life.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who has reached his far edge, however deep the search? Inquire further, O Sustainer of the world, and there is no end. From the atom to the vast, from the subtle to the gross, there is no measure of him. Even the Vedas, saying not this, not this, have worn out and stopped. Inside one fruit is a tiny insect; inside that, a sky as wide as the world; and inside that, trees beyond counting. The Infinite One showed Arjuna within his own belly more creations and more worlds of Krishna still. Tuka says: lay hold of the company of the saints. Take refuge there and your life is saved.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram piles up images to show that God cannot be measured or reached by searching, from the smallest atom to the largest expanse, in the subtle and in the gross alike. Even the Vedas, with their method of negation, not this, not this, finally exhaust themselves and fall silent. He spirals inward and outward at once: a worlds within worlds inside a single fruit, and the vision Krishna gave Arjuna of endless creations held within his own body. The point is not to map the Infinite but to give up the attempt. Since you cannot reach him by your own searching, cling instead to the company of the saints; taking refuge there is what saves your life.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whatever I do, O God, I offer to You as service. There is no division between You and me, O Narayana, for all is one Self.

I know no one else; this is the honest witness of my own mind. Says Tuka, O Lord of the World, this is no falsehood.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever I do, O God, I offer to you as service. There is no division, O Narayana, between you and me, for all is one Self. I know no one else. My own mind is the witness of this. Tuka says: O Lord of the world, this is no falsehood.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns every action into worship by offering all of it to God as service, so that nothing he does stands apart from God. He goes further and denies the gap itself: between the worshipper and Narayana there is no real division, since all is one Self. He knows no second, no other to turn to, and he calls his own mind as honest witness that this is so. Lest it sound like a pious boast, he closes by swearing to the Lord of the world that it is not a lie but his settled truth.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even the Vedas cannot adequately praise You; where then does my feeble attempt stand? Yet my vaikhari, my articulated speech, has grown sweet with the joy of it, and my tongue craves the taste upon its lips. To describe Your form, where does the intellect suffice? Entire universes arise and vanish in each pore of Your being.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If I try to praise you, even the Vedas cannot do it. Where then does my poor effort stand? And yet my speech has grown sweet with the joy of it. My tongue craves the taste of it on my lips. To describe your form, how can the intellect ever be enough? In each pore of you whole universes arise and pass away.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram admits at once that praising God is beyond him; if even the Vedas fall short, his own attempt is nothing. But the failure does not stop him, because the praising itself has turned sweet, and his tongue keeps reaching for the taste the way one craves a flavor on the lips. He cannot describe the divine form because no intellect is large enough to hold it. He gives the measure of why: in a single pore of God, entire universes are coming into being and dissolving. The mind cannot encompass that, yet the joy of trying is its own reward.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There is no one in the three worlds who can describe You except Yourself. The thousand-mouthed Shesha has grown weary, even with his tongues split into countless parts.

You are unmanifest, imperceptible, boundless, and infinite, O formless Narayana of pure being and consciousness. You take up name and form by Your own will, becoming whatever the devotee's faith requires.

Says Tuka, only if You reveal Yourself, O Narayana, can You be known.

IN PLAIN WORDS

No one can describe you but yourself. In all three worlds there is no second who can. The thousand-mouthed Shesha grew weary, poor thing, his tongues split into countless parts and still he failed. You are unmanifest, beyond sight, boundless, infinite, formless Narayana, pure being and consciousness. You take name and form by your own will. You become whatever the devotee's faith needs you to be. Tuka says: only if you show yourself, O Narayana, can you be known.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says the one who could rightly describe God is God alone; nowhere in the three worlds is there a second fit for the task. Even Shesha, the serpent with a thousand mouths and tongues split many times over, wore himself out and could not do it. In himself God is unmanifest, imperceptible, without limit or form, pure being and consciousness. Yet by his own free will he takes on name and form, becoming whatever shape the devotee's faith asks for. The conclusion follows: he cannot be reached by our effort to grasp him; he can only be known if he chooses to reveal himself.

A flood of bliss has arrived, and waves of love surge high. Let us tie the raft of Vitthal's Name and swim to the far shore.

Come, all of you, my companions. Take the plunge, brothers and sisters.

This moment does not last forever; this is the immeasurable water of nectar. Says Tuka, by great merit this current has arrived upon our path.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A flood of bliss has come. Waves of love rise high. Let us tie the raft of Vitthal's Name and swim to the far shore. Come, all of you, my friends. Take the plunge, brothers and sisters. This does not last forever. This is the measureless water of nectar. Tuka says: by great merit this current has come to our path.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram greets a flood of joy as if a real river had risen, its waters surging with waves of love. He calls everyone to use the moment: lash together a raft made of Vitthal's Name and cross on it to the far shore. He will not go alone, summoning all his companions to jump in with him. The urgency is that the flood does not last; this immeasurable water of nectar is here now and may not be here later. He ends by naming it pure grace, a current that has reached their path only through great accumulated merit, so it must not be wasted.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There is nothing else for me now. This has been decided within my mind once and for all.

Panduranga in my thoughts, Panduranga in my meditation, Panduranga in waking and in dream. All the senses have fallen into this single groove; there is no other feeling, no second allegiance.

Says Tuka, my eyes have recognized Him. That graceful form upon the brick is my meditation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There is nothing else for me now. My mind has settled it once and for all. Panduranga in my thoughts, Panduranga in my meditation. Panduranga when I am awake, Panduranga in my dreams. All my senses have fallen into this one groove. There is no other feeling in me, no second loyalty. Tuka says: my eyes have learned to know him. That graceful form upon the brick is what I hold.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing a mind that has stopped dividing its attention. He has resolved, deep in his own heart, that there is only one object left for him, and that object is Panduranga, the Lord on the brick at Pandhari. The poem shows the resolve spreading until it covers everything: thought, meditation, waking, even dreaming. Every sense has worn the same single channel, so there is no longer a competing desire or a divided allegiance. What was once an effort of faith has become plain seeing; his eyes simply recognize the one form he meditates on.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am utterly unfit, in every way. I do not know what will become of me, O God. When I bring the meanings of the scriptures to mind, my soul grows desperate. I am the bonded slave of my senses; my heart is stained with their pleasures. I cannot subdue even one of them. How then am I to bind them all and keep them in order? Tuka says: save me, O King of Pandhari. If you do not, your servant is lost for nothing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is making an honest confession of weakness and turning it into a plea. He admits he has no qualification for the path on his own strength, and the scriptures only deepen his distress because they show him a standard he cannot meet. He names the real bondage plainly: he is owned by his senses, and his heart is colored by their pleasures. The point he lands on is that self-discipline alone will not work, since he cannot master even a single sense, let alone all of them; his only hope is that the King of Pandhari will rescue him. The self-examination here is the lesson: he stops boasting of effort and throws himself on grace.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What the yogis strain to perceive through meditation appears before our eyes in plain sight. He stands with both hands on His waist, a dark-hued radiance upon His body.

He pervades all yet remains apart, dwelling within every being, beyond all change. He has no form, no outline, no name of His own; yet Shiva himself meditates upon Him within his heart.

He has no end, no limit, no station for any color or class, no head, no hands, no feet that can be grasped. The insentient has come alive for the joy of His devotees.

Says Tuka, this is His own delightful play.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What the yogis strain to glimpse in meditation stands plainly before our eyes. He stands with both hands on his waist, a dark radiance shining from his body. He fills everything, yet stays apart and far off; he lives inside every being, and nothing changes him. He has no form, no outline, no name of his own; yet Shiva himself meditates on him in his heart. He has no end, no edge, no place for caste or class, no head, no hands, no feet you can grasp. The unmoving has stirred to life for the joy of his devotees. Tuka says: this is his own delightful play.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is holding two truths about God at once. On one side is the formless absolute that the yogis can barely sense and that even Shiva meditates upon: without form, name, limit, caste, or body, pervading all yet untouched by all. On the other side is Vithoba standing on the brick at Pandhari, hands on his waist, dark and radiant, visible to ordinary eyes. The poem's wonder is that these are the same one. The boundless, changeless reality has taken a shape and come alive, and Tukaram insists this is not a lessening but the Lord's own free play, undertaken for the sheer joy of his devotees.

Prayer, teach me how to reach you

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How shall I meditate? How shall I behold You? Show me the secret, for I am a beggar. How shall I practice devotion? Tell me what service You require.

By what feeling can You be reached, O God? How shall I sing Your glory? How shall I bring You to mind? How shall I know You? How shall I sing of You in song? How shall I contemplate You in my heart? Show me the right way and understanding. Says Tuka, just as You made me Your servant, O God, so bring me to that experience.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How shall I meditate? How shall I look upon you? Show me the secret, for I am a beggar at your door. How shall I do devotion? Tell me what service you want. By what feeling are you reached, O God? How shall I sing your glory? How shall I bring you to mind? How shall I know you, and who can know you, and how? How shall I sing you in song? How shall I hold you in my heart? Show me the right state and the right understanding. Tuka says: just as you made me your servant, O God, so bring me into that living experience.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praying by piling up questions, and the questions themselves are the prayer. He does not assume he already knows how to meditate, worship, or even recognize God; he begs to be shown the secret like a beggar asking for alms. The repeated how reveals his stance: he will not manufacture devotion out of his own cleverness but waits to be taught the inner method, the feeling that actually reaches God. The closing turn is the heart of it. Since it was God who first made him a servant, he asks God to finish the work and carry him from these questions into direct experience.

Exhortation, leave the Vedas for the cowherd's house

मराठी मूळ

निगमाचें वन । नका शोधूं करुं सीण ॥1॥
या रे गौळयांचे घरीं । बांधलें तें दावें वरी ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not exhaust yourselves searching the forest of the Vedas. Come to the house of the cowherds, where He is tied up with a rope in plain sight.

Those tormented by confusion have lost the path because they do not know the secret. Says Tuka, throw off the burden of ego from your heads.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not wear yourselves out searching the forest of the Vedas. Come instead to the cowherds' house, where he stands tied up with a rope in plain sight. People worn down by confusion have lost the road because they do not know the secret. Tuka says: throw the burden of ego off your heads.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is calling seekers away from one path and toward another. The forest of the Vedas stands for endless scriptural searching that only exhausts the searcher; he tells them to stop straining there. Instead he points to the homely image of Krishna in the cowherds' house, the child bound with a rope, God who is near and visible rather than hidden in difficult texts. The reason people miss the road, he says, is that they do not know this simple secret. The thing blocking them is named in the last line: the weight of ego carried on the head, which must be thrown down before the nearby God can be seen.

GATHA 0701 The Necessity of Experience

Inner experience, the mind turned guardian

मराठी मूळ

मन वोळी मना । बुिद्ध बुद्धी क्षण क्षणां ॥1॥
मी च मज राखण जालों । ज्याणें तेथें चि धरिलों ॥ध्रु.॥
जें जें जेथें उठी। तें तें तया हातें कुंटी ॥2॥
भांजिली खांजनी । तुका साक्ष उरला दोन्ही ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The mind folds back into itself; intellect dissolves into intellect, moment by moment. I have become my own guardian, held fast in that very place.

Whatever rises anywhere, it is checked right there by its own hand. The tambourine has been broken.

Says Tuka, only the witness of both remains.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The mind folds back into the mind. The intellect dissolves into intellect, moment after moment. I have become my own watchman, held fast in that very place by the one who holds me. Whatever rises, wherever it rises, is checked right there by its own hand. The tambourine is broken. Tuka says: only the witness of both now remains.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is reporting an inward turning where the faculties no longer reach outward but collapse back into their own source. Mind sinks into mind, intellect into intellect, and he finds himself standing guard over himself, fixed in place by the very power that grasped him. The striking claim is that nothing needs to be suppressed from outside: each impulse that arises is stopped by its own hand in the same instant it appears. The broken tambourine is the end of the noisy activity that used to keep the music going. When the rising and the checking both fall silent, what is left is not another thought but the bare witness of both.

GATHA 0702 The Necessity of Experience

Inner experience, the untouched Brahman

मराठी मूळ

ब्रह्म न लिंपे त्या मेळें । कर्माअकर्मा वेगळें ॥1॥
तो चि एक तया जाणे । पावे अनुभविलें खुणें ॥ध्रु.॥
शोच अशौचाचे संधी । तन आळा तना चि मधीं ॥2॥
पापपुण्यां नाहीं ठाव । तुका ह्मणे सहज भाव ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Brahman is untouched by any association, separate from both action and inaction. Only that one knows It who has experienced It directly and recognized Its signs.

The boundary between purity and impurity lies within the body itself. Says Tuka, where sin and merit have no place, there abides the natural state.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Brahman is not stained by any of this. It stands apart from action and from inaction alike. Only the one who has tasted it knows it, reaching it by the sign of his own experience. The line between clean and unclean lies inside the body itself. Tuka says: where sin and merit find no place, there the natural state abides.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is pointing to a reality that none of our usual categories can touch. Brahman is not soiled by company, nor caught by doing or not doing, so it cannot be reached by external acts or abstentions. He insists it is known only from inside, by one who has actually experienced it and recognizes it by its own unmistakable mark, not by argument or hearsay. He then collapses the familiar measures we live by: the divide between pure and impure is something the body draws, not an absolute. Where the whole bookkeeping of sin and merit no longer applies, what remains is the natural, effortless state of being itself.

GATHA 0703 True Worship

True worship, outward show is a trap

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What can caves or forests do when there is no inner peace? Are there not plenty of creatures already dwelling there? What did they gain? Rushing into a granary does not bring spiritual attainment. What can ash or smearing do when there is no inner rind of devotion? The duties of the four stages of life are futile once they become mere toil.

Says Tuka, outward show is a trap. The real welfare lies in dissolving all desire.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What can a cave or a forest do for you while there is no peace inside? Are there not already plenty of creatures living there? What did they ever gain by it? Diving into a granary does not bring you spiritual attainment. What can ash or smearing do while there is no inner rind of devotion? The duties of caste and life stage are wasted once they turn into mere drudgery. Tuka says: outward show is a trap. The real good lies in dissolving every desire.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is attacking the substitution of external religion for inner change. Fleeing to a cave or forest gives you nothing if your mind is unquiet; he notes wryly that animals already live in those places and gain no enlightenment from the address. Smearing the body with ash is empty when there is no living core of devotion underneath. Even the prescribed duties of caste and life stage lose their value once they become hollow, weary routine. The pattern he points at, and asks the listener to examine in himself, is the wish to look holy on the outside while skipping the costly inner work; the only real welfare is in dissolving desire itself.

GATHA 0704 The Necessity of Experience

Inner experience, neti neti and the natural truth

मराठी मूळ

तें हीं नव्हे जें करितां कांहीं । ध्यातां ध्यायीं तें ही नव्हे ॥1॥
तें ही नव्हे जें जाणवी जना । वाटे मना तें नव्हे ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे एक चि आहे । सहजिं पाहें सहज ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What is done through effort, that is not It. What is reached through meditation, that is not It either.

What is taught to others as knowledge, that is not It. What the mind imagines, that is not It.

What revolves and circles about, that is not It. What runs naked and stripped, that is not It.

Says Tuka, there is only one reality. Look naturally at what is naturally present.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It is not what you reach by doing something. It is not what you reach by meditating either. It is not what is taught to others as knowledge. It is not what the mind imagines. It is not the thing that whirls and circles around. It is not the thing that runs about naked and stripped bare. Tuka says: there is only one reality. Look, simply and naturally, at what is naturally here.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is using a string of denials to clear away every false candidate for the truth, the way the scriptures say not this, not this. He rules out effortful action, deliberate meditation, taught knowledge, and the mind's imaginings, because each is something the seeker produces or grasps. He also rules out restless wandering, whether the mind spinning in circles or the naked ascetic running about, since outward extremity is no nearer the mark. After stripping all of these away, he points to the one thing left, which is not reached at all but already present. The instruction is to stop straining and simply see, naturally, what is naturally there.

GATHA 0705 Renunciation

Renunciation, easy to say, costly to live

मराठी मूळ

बोल बोलतां वाटे सोपें । करणी करितां टीर कांपे ॥1॥
नव्हे वैराग्य सोपारें । मज बोलतां न वटे खरें ॥ध्रु.॥
विष खावें ग्रासोग्रासीं । धन्य तो चि एक सोसी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे करूनि दावी । त्याचे पाय माझे जीवीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Speaking about it seems easy, but when one attempts to practice it, the body trembles. True renunciation is not a simple matter; when I speak of it, even my own words do not ring true.

To swallow poison with every morsel, blessed indeed is the one who can endure that. Says Tuka, the one who demonstrates it by living it, his feet dwell in my heart.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Talking about it sounds easy. Doing it makes your body shake. Renunciation is no small or cheap thing. When I even speak of it, my own words do not ring true to me. It is like swallowing poison with every mouthful. Blessed is the one, the only one, who can bear that. Tuka says: the one who shows it by living it, his feet I hold in my heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is exposing the gap between speaking of renunciation and actually living it. The words come easily; the deed makes the body tremble, because true vairagya is not the cheap, comfortable thing it is often made out to be. He turns the blade on himself, admitting that even his own talk of it sounds false in his ears when he has not paid its price. He likens the practice to swallowing poison at every meal, a daily, unglamorous endurance that almost no one sustains. So he reserves his reverence not for those who preach it but for the rare one who proves it by living it, and to that person he bows in his heart.

GATHA 0706 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the simple creed of a pilgrim

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I will become a beggar, a pilgrim of Pandhari. This alone is my creed and religion: nothing but the Name of Vithoba.

This alone is my spiritual practice: to cling to the feet of the saints. Says Tuka, O God, I will offer You only this simple, sincere service.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will become a beggar, a pilgrim of Pandhari. This alone is my rule and my religion: nothing but the Name of Vithoba. This alone is my worship: to cling to the feet of the saints. Tuka says: O God, the service I will give you is simple and sincere.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is stripping religion down to its barest essentials and choosing them gladly. He is willing to be a beggar and a wandering pilgrim of Pandhari, refusing status and wealth for the road. In place of an elaborate creed he names one rule: the Name of Vithoba and nothing besides. His whole practice reduces to holding fast to the feet of the saints, the company that keeps devotion alive. The closing line owns the manner of it; he offers not learned or showy service but a plain, sincere devotion, and that is exactly what he means to give.

GATHA 0707 Faith and Trust

Faith, Hari in the heart ends all fear

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who have stored Hari within the temple of their hearts have ended all their restless striving. Their trade has borne true fruit.

Once Hari has come into one's hands, where is there room for fear or anxiety? Says Tuka, Hari does not allow anything to remain undone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those who have stored Hari away in the temple of the heart have finished their restless coming and going. Their trade has borne real fruit. Once Hari has come into your hands, where is there any room for fear or worry? Tuka says: Hari leaves nothing unfinished, no lack and no remainder.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing what changes the moment God is truly held within. He pictures the heart as a temple and Hari as the treasure stored safely inside it; for those who have done this, the endless back and forth of seeking is over. He borrows the language of trade to say the venture has finally paid off, that the lifelong striving has yielded its true profit. With Hari in hand there is simply no space left for fear or anxiety to occupy. The closing assurance is total: Hari finishes the work completely, leaving no deficiency and nothing still owing.

Devotion over liberation, refusing moksha

मराठी मूळ

मोक्ष तुमचा देवा । तुह्मी दुर्लभ तो ठेवा ॥1॥
मज भक्तीची आवडी । नाहीं अंतरीं ते गोडी ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Your liberation, O God, is Your own affair. Keep that difficult treasure for Yourself.

What I love is devotion; I have no taste for the sweetness of final release. Guard Your own possessions carefully, O generous Lord.

Says Tuka, all I ask is one meeting with You, just that, at the very end.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Your liberation is yours, God. Keep that rare treasure for yourself. What I love is devotion. The sweetness of release does not draw my heart. Look after your own things, generous Lord. Tuka says: all I ask is one meeting with you, just one, at the very end.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns down the prize most seekers crave. Moksha, final liberation, is precious and hard to win, and he hands it straight back to God: keep it, it is yours. He has no taste for it; what he wants is the love itself, the act of devotion, not the reward that supposedly ends it. The radical move is to treat release from rebirth as God's private possession rather than the soul's goal. In place of it he asks for one thing only: to meet his Lord face to face, once, at the close of life.

GATHA 0709 Devotion to Vitthal

Form over formless, devotee refuses moksha

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे आतां अभयदान करा । ह्मणा विश्वंभरा दिलें ऐसें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The chanting of the Name is like stringing pearls. This joy in the worship of the Lord in form is something new and wondrous.

That is why we have turned away from the formless, indifferent to it. The heart of a devotee does not desire liberation.

Here in devotion, the exchange of giving and receiving keeps love alive. Why should we wipe away the place where this happens? Says Tuka, grant us the gift of fearlessness now. Say, O Sustainer of the Universe, that it is given.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Chanting the Name is like stringing pearls. This joy in the Lord with form is new and wondrous. So we have turned away from the formless; we have no interest in it. The heart of a devotee does not want liberation. Here in devotion the giving and the taking keep love alive. Why wipe out the very place where this happens? Tuka says: grant us the gift of fearlessness now. Say it, Vishvambhara: it is given.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram chooses the God with form and Name over the formless Absolute, and says plainly why. Chanting strings the Name like pearls and brings a fresh, living delight that the featureless nirguna cannot give. A devotee does not want moksha, because liberation would dissolve the very relationship he loves: the back-and-forth of giving and receiving between worshipper and Lord. To end that exchange would erase the place where love lives. So instead of release he asks the Sustainer of the universe for one assurance, the gift of fearlessness, and asks God to declare it granted.

Faith, Panduranga the boatman

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What is so difficult about the ocean of worldly life? He shows the way and walks ahead. Panduranga is a fine boatman who does not even let the body get wet.

He has already carried many across; on the far shore stand the saints and sages. Says Tuka, hurry now and follow in His footsteps.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What is so hard about the ocean of worldly life? He shows the way and walks ahead. Panduranga is a good boatman; he does not even let your body get wet. He has already carried many across. On the far shore stand the saints. Tuka says: hurry now, follow close behind him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers the fear of samsara, the endless ocean of birth and death, by pointing at who is steering. Panduranga goes ahead and shows the path, and he ferries so well that the crossing soul never even gets wet. This is not a lonely struggle: countless people have already been carried over, and the saints are visible waiting on the far bank as proof. The crossing is real and the way is known. So the only task left is to move quickly and stay close behind the one already walking ahead.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Grand ornaments do not suit me; false decorations are not my portion. I am the dust beneath the feet of the saints, the sandal on their feet.

I have no acquaintance with the formless Self. I practice devotion and worship as I see others do.

I have no knowledge of the void. I do not recognize the imperishable within the perishable.

There is no discrimination here of Self and not-Self. Says Tuka, I am nothing. Listen: falling at Your feet is all I know.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Grand ornaments do not suit me; false finery is not for me. I am the dust under the saints' feet, the sandal on their feet. I have no acquaintance with the formless Self. I do devotion and worship the way I see others do. I know nothing of the void. I cannot find the imperishable inside the perishable. There is no sorting here of Self and not-Self. Tuka says: I am nothing. Listen: falling at your feet is all I know.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips off every claim to spiritual rank and stands as nothing. The grand ornaments he refuses are the prizes of high knowledge: realizing the formless Self, seeing the void, discerning the eternal within the passing, dividing Self from not-Self. He says flatly that he has none of these, and is not even pretending to; he just worships the way he sees ordinary devotees worship. His whole standing is to be dust beneath the saints' feet, the sandal they tread in. The one thing he knows how to do, and the only thing he claims, is to fall at God's feet.

GATHA 0712 The Power of the Name

The Name, conquering Death

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The Name of Vithoba is true, honest, and genuine. It severs all bonds and brings glory in both this world and the next.

Whoever holds sincere faith receives its benefit instantly. Says Tuka, even a simple soul can conquer Death itself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It is true, honest, real: the Name of Vithoba is good. It cuts the bonds that hold you. It brings glory in this world and the next. Whoever carries sincere faith gets the reward at once. Tuka says: even a simple soul learns to conquer Death.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram stakes everything on the plain power of the Name. The Name of Vithoba is no figure of speech; it is true and genuine, and it does real work, severing the bonds of bondage and winning honor in both this life and the life beyond. The condition is not learning or status but sincere faith carried in the heart, and where that faith is present the benefit comes instantly, not after long austerity. The claim lands hard at the end: with the Name even a simple, unlettered soul defeats Death itself, the one enemy no one escapes on their own.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Truth is what we love; doubt makes devotion flee. By Your gift of grace, we can distinguish pure gold from base metal.

When suffering comes to the body, we will not delay in renouncing it. Says Tuka, O God, Your service is the true collyrium for the eyes.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Truth is what I love; doubt makes faith fly away. By your gift of grace we can tell pure gold from base metal. When suffering comes to the body, we will not be slow to let it go. Tuka says: God, your service is the collyrium for my eyes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes how a devotee learns to see clearly. He loves truth, and warns that doubt, the splitting mind, drives genuine feeling away. The power to discern, to tell real gold from the false, is not his own skill but a gift of God's grace. So when pain comes to the body he will not cling, but will let it go without delay, trusting that vision. He closes with the image of collyrium, the dark salve people line their eyes with to see better: God's service is that salve, the thing that clears his sight.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It is better to contemplate God without meeting Him in person, for then the feeling remains fresh and alive within. That very feeling is God Himself.

When yearning for His sight persists, it takes on a form of its own. Says Tuka, in the end, everything depends upon the mind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It is better to contemplate God and not meet him in person. Then the feeling stays fresh inside. That very feeling is God himself. When the longing for his sight keeps burning, it takes on a body of its own. Tuka says: it is the mind. Everything turns on that.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a strange, daring claim: better not to meet God face to face. A finished, satisfied meeting would let the feeling cool, but unmet longing stays alive and fresh, and he says that living feeling is itself God. When the ache to see him keeps burning, the yearning grows so intense it almost takes on its own form. The point is that devotion is not a transaction completed by an encounter; it is an inner state. In the end everything depends on the mind, where the feeling lives.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whatever comes at any moment, offer it in service. This is what is truly called worship: to swallow one's ego willingly.

Whether enjoying or renouncing, let the Lord be at the center, from beginning to end. Says Tuka, when you bear no weariness, there is no separation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever comes to you, wherever it comes, offer it in service. This is what is truly called worship: to swallow your own pride. Whether you are enjoying or giving up, keep the Lord at the center, from the start to the very end. Tuka says: carry no weariness, and there is no separation.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram redefines worship as a way of living, not a rite. Whatever arrives, good or hard, you hand it back into service; the real offering is your own ego, swallowed deliberately. This holds whether you are enjoying something or renouncing it, as long as the Lord stays at the center of the act from beginning to end. The closing turn names the stakes: if you carry no inner resistance or weariness about it, there is no gap left between you and God. Separation, then, is something the grudging self manufactures, not a fixed distance.

GATHA 0716 The Power of the Name

The Name, the tongue even when the heart lags

मराठी मूळ

देह पडो या चिंतनें । विठ्ठलनामसंकीर्तनें ॥ध्रु.॥
दंभिस्थती भलत्या भावें । मज हरिजन ह्मणावें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे काळें तरी । मज सांभाळील हरी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if my mind is not in it, let the Name at least dwell upon my tongue. Let this body perish in the chanting of Vitthal's Name and kirtan.

By whatever pretense or state, let people call me a devotee of Hari. Says Tuka, in time, Hari Himself will look after me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even if my mind is not in it, let it not be in it; only let the Name live on my tongue. Let this body fall away in this remembrance, in the kirtan of Vitthal's Name. By whatever pretense, in whatever state, let people call me a devotee of Hari. Tuka says: in time, Hari himself will look after me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a frank, almost reckless prayer about a half-hearted heart. He admits his mind may not be present, and rather than wait for perfect feeling he asks that at least the Name keep moving on his tongue, even if the inner devotion is missing. Let the body wear out chanting Vitthal's Name; let him be called a devotee even if his standing as one is partly pretense. The wager is that the practice itself, kept up despite the cold heart, is enough to begin with. He trusts that Hari, given time, will take over and complete what the man cannot yet feel.

GATHA 0717 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, trading on the master's name

मराठी मूळ

नये जरी कांहीं । तरी भलतें चि वाहीं ॥1॥
ह्मणविल्या ढास । कोण न धरी वेठीस ॥ध्रु.॥
समर्थाच्या नांवें । भलतैसें विकावें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे सत्ता । वरी असते बहुतां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if one can bring nothing of real worth, one can carry whatever is at hand. Who would refuse a worker who insists on being employed? In the name of the powerful master, anything can be traded.

Says Tuka, the master's authority covers everything.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even if I can bring nothing worth anything, I carry whatever is at hand. Who turns away a worker who insists on serving? In the name of the powerful master, anything at all can be traded. Tuka says: the master's authority covers everyone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures himself as a worthless servant who shows up anyway. He has nothing of real value to offer, so he brings whatever he has, and leans on a simple fact: a master does not refuse a worker who insists on being employed. The leverage is not in the servant but in the name he serves under; backed by a powerful master, even poor goods can be passed off and accepted. This is the logic of surrender: the devotee's standing rests entirely on God's authority, not his own merit, and that authority covers everyone who comes under it.

GATHA 0718 Prayers

Prayer, the unqualified beggar's plea

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे थोडें । आयुष्य अवघें चि कोडें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I cannot give up food, and I cannot retire to the forest. Therefore, O Narayana, I plead for compassion.

I have no qualification to chant even a single syllable of scripture. Says Tuka, life is short, and all of it is but play.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I cannot give up food. I cannot go off to the forest. So, Narayana, I beg you for compassion. I have no right to chant even a single syllable of scripture. Tuka says: life is short, and the whole of it is just a game.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays from open weakness instead of strength. He cannot fast away his hunger and cannot renounce the world for the forest, the usual paths of the austere; and he claims no scriptural qualification, not even the standing to recite one sacred syllable. Stripped of every credential, all he can do is beg Narayana for compassion. The bare plea is the whole prayer. He ends by setting it against the size of things: life is short and the whole of it is only a play, so leaning on God's mercy is the sane response, not the qualifications he lacks.

GATHA 0719 The Nature of God

Nature of God, three kinds of people

मराठी मूळ

एकांचीं उत्तरें । गोड अमृत मधुरें ॥1॥
ऐशा देवाच्या विभुती । भिन्न प्रारब्धाची गती ॥ध्रु.॥
एकांचीं वचनें । कडु अत्यंत तीक्षणें ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The words of some are sweet and nourishing like nectar. Such are God's different manifestations; each soul's destiny takes its own course.

The words of others are bitter and piercingly sharp. Says Tuka, God has fashioned people of three kinds.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The words of some are sweet, like nectar, gentle and nourishing. Such are God's different forms; each person's destiny runs its own way. The words of others are bitter, sharp, cutting. Tuka says: God has made people of three kinds.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at the range of human speech and reads it as God's own diversity. Some people's words are sweet as nectar, gentle and feeding; others' are bitter and cutting; and he names a third kind besides. Rather than judge this, he says these are God's varied manifestations, that the divine shows itself even through clashing temperaments. Each person's prarabdha, the destiny ripening from past action, sends them down its own track. The quiet point for self-examination is to see all three as God's making, including the sharp-tongued one you might rather condemn.

GATHA 0720 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, the middle past speech

मराठी मूळ

वचनें ही नाड । न बोले तें मुकें खोड ॥1॥
दोहीं वेगळें तें हित । बोली अबोलणी नीत ॥ध्रु.॥
अंधार प्रकाशी । जाय दिवस पावे निशी ॥2॥
बीज पृथिवीच्या पोटीं । तुका ह्मणे दावी दृष्टी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Speech can bring ruin, and silence can be a defect. True welfare lies apart from both, between speaking and not speaking.

Darkness ends when light comes; the day departs when night arrives. Says Tuka, the seed lies hidden in the belly of the earth, yet in time it shows itself to the eye.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Words can ruin you. To say nothing, to stay mute, is a fault too. The good thing lies apart from both. It is a speaking that is also a not speaking. Darkness goes when light comes. The day leaves when night arrives. The seed lies in the belly of the earth. Tuka says: in time it shows itself to the eye.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is pointing at something that does not fit the choice between speaking and keeping silent. Reckless speech brings ruin, but stubborn muteness is a defect of its own; the welfare he wants sits in neither. He calls it a speech that is also a silence, a way of being that the ordinary pair cannot hold. The images press the same point: light and dark, day and night, follow each other and pass, while the seed hidden in the earth keeps its life and shows itself in its own time. What is real is not the visible move from one opposite to the other but the quiet thing underneath that finally surfaces.

GATHA 0721 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, offer all to God

मराठी मूळ

विचारा वांचून । न पवीजे समाधान ॥1॥

देवाचिये चाडे । देवा द्यावें जें जें घडे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे होतें । बहु गोमटें उचितें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Without reflection, one cannot attain peace. The body is a structure of the three gunas, yet the Self within is free of all qualities.

For the love of God, offer to God whatever comes to pass. Says Tuka, this is the finest and most fitting practice.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Without reflection you cannot find peace. The body is a knot of the three gunas. Inside it the Self has no quality at all. For the love of God, give to God whatever happens. Tuka says: this is good, this is the most fitting thing of all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram joins clear seeing to total surrender. First he says peace will not come without reflection, and the reflection he means is this: the body is woven of the three gunas, while the Self within carries no quality and is untouched by them. Once you see that, the right response is to hand everything that happens, pleasant or painful, back to God as an offering made for love of Him. He calls this the finest and most fitting practice, better than any anxious effort to manage life yourself. Knowing what you are and giving the rest away are one movement.

GATHA 0722 The Power of the Name

The Name, even maya bows

मराठी मूळ

तुटे भवरोग । संचितक्रियमाणभोग ॥1॥
ऐसें विठोबाचें नाम । उच्चारितां खंडे जन्म ॥ध्रु.॥
वसों न सके पाप । पळे त्रिविध तो ताप ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे माया । होय दासी लागे पायां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The disease of worldly existence is destroyed, along with the effects of past, present, and future karma. Such is the Name of Vithoba: by merely uttering it, the cycle of birth is broken.

Sin cannot remain; the threefold suffering flees. Says Tuka, even maya becomes a servant and falls at His feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The disease of worldly life is cut. So are the fruits of past, present, and future deeds. Such is the name of Vithoba: when you speak it, the round of birth is broken. Sin cannot stay. The threefold suffering runs away. Tuka says: maya herself becomes a servant and falls at His feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the full reach of the divine Name, and he does not soften it. To utter Vithoba's name cuts the sickness of worldly existence and burns up karma in all three directions, the stored, the ripening, and the deeds still to come, so that the cycle of rebirth itself is broken. Where the Name is spoken, sin finds no place to live and the threefold suffering flees. The boldest claim comes last: maya, the very power that binds everyone, is reduced to a servant girl and falls at God's feet. The point is not magic words but where the whole self turns when the Name is truly taken.

GATHA 0723 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, the drop in the ocean

मराठी मूळ

मुसावलें अंग । रंगीं मेळविला रंग ॥1॥
एकीं एक दृढ जालें । मुळा आपुलिया आलें ॥ध्रु.॥
सागरीं थेंबुडा । पडिल्या निवडे कोण्या वाटा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नवें । नव्हे जाणावें हें देवें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The body has been saturated; color has merged with color. The two have become firmly one, returned to their original source.

When a droplet falls into the ocean, by what path can it be separated out again? Says Tuka, know that this is nothing new; God has always known it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The body has melted away. Color has mixed into color. The two have become firmly one and returned to their own root. A drop falls into the ocean. After that, by what path can you pick it out again? Tuka says: this is nothing new. Know that God has always known it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing union from the inside, where the seer and the seen stop being two. The separate body dissolves; one color runs into another until they are a single dye, and what seemed like two has gone back to the one source it came from. His test is the drop in the ocean: once it has fallen in, no path remains by which it could ever be lifted out as a separate drop. Then he adds the steadying word, that this oneness is not some new event he has produced; it is how things always were, and God has known it from the start. The merging only reveals what was already true.

GATHA 0724 The Moral Ideal

The moral ideal, true repentance

मराठी मूळ

अनुतापें दोष । जाय न लगतां निमिष ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे पापा । शिवों नये अनुतापा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Through genuine remorse, faults disappear in less than an instant. Then one rests in true peace, good from beginning to end.

This alone is the real atonement: to bathe the mind in sincere repentance. Says Tuka, sin cannot even approach the one who feels true contrition.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Through remorse, faults go. They leave in less than a blink. Then you rest at ease, good from the beginning to the end. This alone is the real atonement: to bathe the mind in true repentance. Tuka says: sin cannot even touch the one who feels true remorse.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes sincere remorse, not ritual penance, the whole of atonement. Genuine contrition wipes out faults in an instant, and the one who feels it comes to rest, sound from start to finish. He says plainly that this bathing of the mind in repentance is the real prayascitta, the true cleansing, over against any prescribed rite. The closing line raises the stakes: sin cannot so much as approach a person whose heart is truly sorry. The work he asks for is inward and honest, a turning of the mind, not an outward transaction.

GATHA 0725 True Worship

True worship, only pure feeling counts

मराठी मूळ

चहूं आश्रमांचे धर्म । न राखतां जोडे कर्म ॥1॥
तैसी नव्हे भोळी सेवा । एक भाव चि कारण देवा ॥ध्रु.॥
तपें इंिद्रयां आघात । क्षणें एका वाताहात ॥2॥

व्रतें करितां सांग । तरी एक चुकतां भंग ॥4॥
धर्म सत्त्व चि कारण । नाहीं तरी केला सिण ॥5॥
भूतदयेसि आघात । उंचनिच वाताहात ॥6॥
तुका ह्मणे दुजें । विधिनिषेधाचें ओझें ॥7॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The duties of the four stages of life, if not observed, bring karmic consequence. But simple, heartfelt devotion is different; for God, only pure feeling matters.

Austerities that torment the senses can be destroyed in a single moment of carelessness. A mantra, if it wavers even slightly, drives one mad.

Vows performed in full, if one step is missed, are broken entirely. Righteous conduct requires purity of heart; without it, all effort is wasted.

Even compassion for beings, if mixed with notions of high and low, collapses into ruin. Says Tuka, all other paths carry the burden of prescribed dos and don'ts.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Keep the duties of the four life-stages, or fail to, and either way deeds bind you with their fruit. Simple, trusting service is not like that. For God, one thing alone is the cause: pure feeling. Austerities batter the senses, and a single moment of carelessness can ruin them. A mantra that wavers even a little can drive a man mad. Vows done in full are broken if you miss one step. Right conduct needs purity of heart; without it the labor is wasted. Even kindness to creatures collapses into ruin if it is mixed with high and low. Tuka says: every other way carries the load of dos and don'ts.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lines up the demanding paths and shows how brittle each one is, to set off the one path that is not. The duties of the four stages bind you whether you keep them or drop them; austerity is undone by one careless moment; a mispronounced mantra unhinges the mind; a vow missing a single step is wholly broken; even compassion curdles when it is sorted by high and low. All of these stand or fall on getting the rules exactly right, and that is their burden. Against them he sets bholi seva, simple trusting service, where God asks for only one thing, pure feeling. The point is not that effort is bad but that without a clean heart it is wasted, and feeling is what carries no fragile conditions.

GATHA 0726 The Power of the Name

The Name, maya still pursues

मराठी मूळ

सोडिला संसार । माया तयावरि फार ॥1॥
धांवत चाले मागें मागें । सुखदुःख साहे अंगे ॥ध्रु.॥
यानें घ्यावें नाम । तीसीकरणें त्याचें काम ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे भोळी । विठ्ठलकृपेची कोंवळी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even after abandoning worldly life, the power of illusion pursues one relentlessly. It runs behind, step by step, sharing in every pleasure and pain.

One should therefore take the Name; that alone accomplishes the work of all three faculties. Says Tuka, this is the tender, gentle grace of Vitthal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You have left worldly life. Even so, maya hangs heavy on you. She runs along behind, step after step, sharing in every joy and every sorrow. So take the Name. That alone does the work of all three faculties. Tuka says: this is the tender, gentle grace of Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram warns the renouncer that walking away from household life does not leave illusion behind. Maya keeps running at your back, step by step, mixed into every pleasure and pain you still feel, so renunciation by itself is no safe ground. His remedy is the Name: taking it does the whole work that body, speech, and mind would otherwise have to do, accomplishing what no separate effort can. And he calls this provision tender and gentle, the soft grace of Vitthal toward those who cannot outrun maya on their own. The Name is given precisely because the struggle alone is not enough.

GATHA 0727 The Power of the Name

The Name, the garland of refuge

मराठी मूळ

बैसों खेळूं जेवूं । तेथें नाम तुझें गाऊं ॥1॥
रामकृष्णनाममाळा । घालूं ओवुनियां गळा ॥ध्रु.॥
विश्वास हा धरुं। नाम बळकट करुं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आतां । आह्मां जीवन शरणागतां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whether sitting, playing, or eating, we will sing Your Name. We will string the garland of the names Rama and Krishna and place it around our necks.

We will hold fast to this faith and make the Name our stronghold. Says Tuka, the Name is now the very sustenance of us who have taken refuge.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sitting, playing, eating, there we will sing Your name. We will thread the garland of the names Rama and Krishna and hang it on our necks. We will hold this faith. We will make the Name our fortress. Tuka says: now the Name is the very life of us who have taken refuge.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets out a way of living where the Name is woven through every ordinary act. Whatever they are doing, sitting, playing, eating, they will be singing it, and they will string the names of Rama and Krishna into a garland worn at the throat. He turns the Name into two things at once: a held faith and a stronghold, a fortress they make strong by repetition. The closing line gives the reason it can bear that weight: for those who have surrendered, the Name is not a practice among others but their very sustenance, the life they live on. Refuge here is continuous, not occasional.

GATHA 0728 Faith and Trust

Faith, no fear for Hari's servants

मराठी मूळ

पाटीं पोटीं देव । कैचा हरिदासां भेव ॥1॥
करा आनंदें कीर्तन । नका आशंकितमन ॥ध्रु.॥
एथें कोठें काळ । करील देवापाशीं बळ ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे धनी । सपुरता काय वाणी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

God is behind them and before them; what fear can touch the devotees of Hari? Perform kirtan with joy; do not let the mind be apprehensive. Where can Death exert power against God? Says Tuka, is the master so weak that His word fails?

IN PLAIN WORDS

God is behind them and before them. So what fear can the servants of Hari have? Do kirtan with joy. Do not let your mind grow afraid. Here, where can Death use any force against God? Tuka says: is the master so poor that His word would fall short?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks to frighten away fear itself. God stands both behind and in front of His devotees, so there is no gap left for dread to enter; the servants of Hari have nothing to be afraid of. From that he gives a plain instruction: sing kirtan gladly and refuse the anxious, second-guessing mind. He presses it with two questions: how could

Death exert any power in the place where God already stands, and is the Lord such a poor master that His given word would ever fail to hold? The faith he calls for rests on God's nearness and reliability, not on the devotee's own strength.

GATHA 0729 True Worship

True worship, the inner offering

मराठी मूळ

मनोमय पूजा । हे चि पढीयें केशीराजा ॥1॥
घेतो कल्पनेचा भोग । न मानेती बाहए रंग ॥ध्रु.॥
अंतरींचें जाणे । आदिवर्तमान खुणे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कुडें । कोठें सरे त्याच्या पुढें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The worship of the mind alone is what pleases Keshiraja. He accepts the offerings of imagination; outward show does not satisfy Him.

He knows the inner truth, recognizing every sign from the very beginning. Says Tuka, where can falsehood stand before Him?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Worship made of the mind, that alone is what Keshiraja loves. He takes the offering of your inmost thought. Outward show does not please Him. He knows what is inside. He reads every sign from the very beginning. Tuka says: where can falseness get through, standing before Him?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says God prizes the worship that happens within and is unmoved by display. What pleases Keshiraja is mental worship, the offering shaped by genuine thought and feeling, while outward color and spectacle leave Him cold. The reason is that He sees straight into the heart and has read its signs from the start, so nothing inside can be hidden from Him. The closing question lands the claim: counterfeit devotion has nowhere to stand in front of one who already knows the inner truth. Worship is judged by what is actually in the mind, not by what is performed.

GATHA 0730 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the lover of God

मराठी मूळ

जाणे भक्तीचा जिव्हाळा । तो चि देवीचा पुतळा ॥1॥
आणीक नये माझ्या मना । हो का पंडित शाहाणा ॥ध्रु.॥
नामरूपीं जडलें चित्त । त्याचा दास मी अंकित ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नवविध । भक्ती जाणे तो चि शुद्ध ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The one who knows the warmth of devotion is the true image of the Divine. No scholar or learned man appeals to my heart otherwise.

The one whose mind is absorbed in the Name and form of God, I am that one's servant, marked as his own. Says Tuka, the one who knows the ninefold devotion is the truly pure one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The one who knows the warmth of devotion, that one is the very image of God. No one else draws my heart, be he a scholar, be he wise. The one whose mind is fixed on the Name and form, I am that one's marked servant. Tuka says: the one who knows the ninefold devotion, that one alone is pure.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the standard for what makes a person worthy of honor, and it is not learning. The one who knows the inner warmth of devotion he treats as the living image of God, while no scholar or clever man wins his heart for cleverness alone. He goes further and binds himself as servant to anyone whose mind is glued to God's name and form. The closing line names the measure: it is the one who lives the ninefold path of devotion, hearing, praising, remembering, and the rest, who counts as truly pure. Devotion, not erudition, is what he bows to.

GATHA 0731 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, refusing the I-am-Brahman talk

मराठी मूळ

याजसाठीं वनांतरा । जातों सांडुनियां घरा ॥1॥
माझें दिठावेल प्रेम । बुद्धि होईल निष्काम ॥ध्रु.॥
अद्वैताची वाणी । नाहीं ऐकत मी कानीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे अहंब्रह्म । आड येऊं नेदीं भ्रम ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For this very reason I go to the solitude of the forest, leaving my home behind. My love will become strong and my intellect will be freed from desire.

I do not listen to the talk of non-duality with my ears. Says Tuka, I will not allow the delusion of "I am Brahman" to come in the way.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For this very reason I go off into the forest, leaving my house behind. My love will grow strong. My mind will become free of desire. I will not let the talk of non-duality into my ears. Tuka says: I will not let the delusion "I am Brahman" come in my way.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram defends the lover's path against a high philosophy that would dissolve it. He leaves home for the forest so his love for God can grow strong and his mind can be freed of craving, guarding the very relationship between devotee and Lord. To protect it he refuses even to listen to advaita talk, the doctrine that all is one. The sharp line is the last: he names the idea "I am Brahman" a bhrama, a delusion, and swears not to let it block his way. He is not denying the truth of non-duality so much as refusing a self-claim that would swallow the loving devotion he has chosen to keep.

GATHA 0732 Prayers

Plea for rescue, naming the debt

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Catch me as I drown in this ocean of worldly existence. Do not consider it a burden; do not look at my mountains of faults.

Protect what is Yours; where is Your famous pledge otherwise? Says Tuka, I am sinful, a heap of transgressions.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am drowning in the ocean of this world. Catch hold of me. Do not count it a burden. Do not look at my mountains of faults. Protect what is Yours; otherwise, what becomes of Your famous pledge? Tuka says: I am a sinner, a whole heap of transgressions.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is sinking in the round of worldly life and calls on God to pull him out before he goes under. He does not pretend to be worthy: he names himself a heap of faults, mountains high. His argument is not his own merit but God's reputation. He has heard that God is the rescuer of the fallen, and he holds God to that vow. If God will not save a wretch like him, then the famous pledge means nothing; so the very depth of his sin becomes the proof that God must act.

GATHA 0733 The Necessity of Experience

Settled certainty, speech falls silent

मराठी मूळ

अक्षई तें झालें । आतां न मोडे रचिलें ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे बोली । पुढें कुंटित चि जाली ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What has been built is now imperishable; what has been established cannot be undone. The foundation has been laid deep, and there is no room to advance further in debate.

What was scattered has now come into balance and alignment. Says Tuka, even speech has become humble and still before this.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What has been made is now imperishable. What has been built cannot be undone. The foundation has been laid deep. From there, there is no walking on, no further to go. What was scattered has come into balance; it has fallen into place and is gathered. Tuka says: from here on, even speech stops short.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing the arrival of a state that no longer changes. The realization has been built on a deep foundation, and what is built that way cannot be torn down. He pictures everything in him that was once scattered now settling into alignment and balance. Because the matter is finished, there is nowhere further to advance, no more ground to argue over. Even words give out at the edge of it: speech reaches the boundary and falls silent, because what has happened cannot be spoken, only rested in.

GATHA 0734 Devotion to Vitthal

Lowly devotion, bring what little you have

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Your great devotees engage in lofty reflection about You. I, a lowly one, can only offer words of tender pleading.

Says Tuka, accept whatever little or much I have, right here.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Your great, great devotees take up lofty reflection about You. I am a lowly one. All I can do is plead to You with tender words. Tuka says: take it, accept whatever I have, a little or a lot, right here.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets himself beside God's mighty devotees and admits he is not of their kind. They reach God through high contemplation; he cannot. What he has instead is helpless, tender pleading, the cry of a poor man. So he does not try to bring what he lacks. He offers exactly what he has, whether it counts for little or much, and asks God to accept it as it is, on the spot. The poem makes lowliness itself the offering.

Ecstatic proclaiming, God walks ahead

मराठी मूळ

लावुनि काहाळा । सुखें करितों सोहोळा ॥1॥
सादवीत गेलों जना । भय नाहीं सत्य जाणां ॥ध्रु.॥
गात नाचत विनोदें । टाळघाग†यांच्या छंदें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे भेव । नाहीं पुढें येतो देव ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sounding the drums, I celebrate with joy. I have proclaimed to all the people: know this for certain, there is nothing to fear.

Singing, dancing, playing with cymbals and drums. Says Tuka, there is no danger; God comes walking ahead.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I sound the drums and keep the festival in joy. I have gone out calling to everyone: know this for certain, there is nothing to fear. Singing, dancing, in play, to the beat of cymbals and bells. Tuka says: there is no danger. God comes walking out in front.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is in the open joy of kirtan, beating the drum and dancing, and he turns it outward into a public announcement. He goes to all the people with one message: do not be afraid. He can say this without doubt because of what walks in front of him: God Himself goes ahead, leading the way. With God out in front there is no danger to meet, so the song and dance are not a distraction from fear but the form his fearlessness takes.

Nondual fearlessness, no bondage was ever real

मराठी मूळ

मुक्त कासया ह्मणावें । बंधन तें नाहीं ठावें ॥1॥
सुखें करितों कीर्तन । भय विसरलें मन ॥ध्रु.॥
देखिजेना नास । घालूं कोणावरी कास ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे साहे । देव आहे तैसा आहे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why should one be called liberated when bondage was never real? I perform kirtan in joy; the mind has forgotten all fear. No destruction is visible anywhere; on whom should I lean for support? Says Tuka, God endures; He is as He always was.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why call anyone liberated? The bondage was never even there. I do my kirtan in joy; my mind has forgotten fear. I see no destruction anywhere. On whom, then, would I lean for support? Tuka says: God endures. God is just as God always is.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pushes past the usual talk of liberation. To be freed, there must first have been a real chain; but he says the bondage was never real, so the word liberated has nothing to grip. From that seeing, fear simply drops out of the mind and he sings. He looks for destruction and finds none, and therefore finds no need to clutch at any prop or support. What remains is the one thing that does not come and go: God abides, unchanged, exactly as God has always been.

The rope and the snake, fear is imaginary

मराठी मूळ

ओनाम्याच्या काळें । खडें मांडविलें बाळें ॥1॥
तें चि पुढें पुढें काई । मग लागलिया सोई ॥ध्रु.॥
रज्जु सर्प होता । तोंवरी चि न कळतां ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे साचें । भय नाहीं बागुलाचें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the time of ignorance, a child sets up pebbles and plays house. That same game continues forward once the habit takes hold.

The rope appeared to be a serpent, but only so long as one did not know the truth. Says Tuka, the genuine has nothing to fear from the scarecrow.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the time of not-knowing, a child lines up pebbles and plays at keeping house. The same game runs on and on once the habit sets in. The rope looked like a snake, but only as long as you had not seen the truth. Tuka says: to one who is real, the scarecrow holds no fear.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses three plain pictures for how a false thing frightens or grips us. A child arranges pebbles and treats the pretend household as serious, and the game keeps going by sheer habit, the way we keep mistaking the world for solid. A coiled rope is read as a snake, and the terror lasts exactly as long as the ignorance does, no longer. A scarecrow scares only the one who takes it for a man. In each case the fear is real but its cause is not; the moment you see truly, the snake, the scarecrow, the pebble-house all lose their power.

GATHA 0738 The Power of the Name

Command to the tongue, only the Name

मराठी मूळ

आतां पुढें धरीं । माझे आठव वैखरी ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे आण । तुज स्वामीची हे जाण ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now, O tongue, hold fast to the remembrance of my Lord. Do not babble uselessly about worthless things.

Leave aside all words except "Vitthal, Vitthal." Says Tuka, this is the command of your master; know it well.

IN PLAIN WORDS

From now on, tongue, hold to one thing: the remembrance of my Lord. Do not babble on, you chattering thing, about worthless nonsense. Drop every word but this: "Vitthal, Vitthal." Tuka says: this is your master's order. Know it well.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns and gives a direct order to his own tongue, the part of him that wanders into idle talk. He scolds it for babbling about worthless things and commands it to fasten onto one task: remembering the Lord. Everything else is to be dropped, and only the Name, Vitthal, Vitthal, is to be spoken. He frames this not as a wish but as a command from the master the tongue belongs to, so that loose speech becomes plain disobedience and the Name becomes the tongue's whole duty.

GATHA 0739 Prayers

Cry for mercy, save my honor

मराठी मूळ

काय नव्हे करितां तुज । आतां राखें माझी लाज ॥1॥
मी तों अपराधाची राशी । शिखा अंगुष्ट तोंपाशीं ॥ध्रु.॥
त्राहें त्राहें त्राहें । मज कृपादृष्टी पाहें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे देवा । सत्या घ्यावी आतां सेवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What is impossible for You? Now protect my honor. I am a heap of offenses from head to toe.

Save me, save me, save me! Look upon me with the eyes of mercy. Says Tuka, O God, accept my sincere service now.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What is impossible for You? Now guard my honor. I am a heap of offenses from the crown of my head to the tip of my toe. Save me, save me, save me. Look on me with the eyes of mercy. Tuka says: God, take up my service now, truly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram throws himself entirely on God's power and mercy. He begins by granting that nothing is beyond God, so there is no excuse of difficulty. Then he confesses the worst: he is offense from head to foot, with no clean part to point to. Having no merit, he can only cry out, save me, save me, save me, and beg for the merciful glance. The honor he asks God to protect is finally God's own, for if God lets such a sinner drown, it is God's name that suffers; so he asks God to accept his service even now, as it stands.

GATHA 0740 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, bowing to all beings

मराठी मूळ

वंदीन मी भूतें । आतां अवघीं चि समस्तें ॥1॥

गाळुनियां भेद । प्रमाण तो ऐसा वेद ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I will bow to all beings, to everything that exists. At every step I will see You, O Narayana.

Having strained out all sense of difference, I take the Vedas as my authority in this. Says Tuka, then there is no question of any second or other association.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will bow to all beings now, to every one of them. At every step I will hold You in mind, Narayana. I strain out all difference; the Veda itself is my warrant for this. Tuka says: then there is no question of leaning on any second thing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram resolves to honor every creature without exception, because he means to see God in each one. So bowing to beings is not flattery; it is worship of the one Narayana present everywhere, recalled at every step. He filters out the sense of difference between high and low, self and other, and claims the Veda's own authority for doing so. Once difference is gone, there is no second, no other to attach to or rely on; God alone remains, and company with anything else simply has no meaning.

Ecstasy of kirtan, becoming Vithoba

मराठी मूळ

पूजा पुज्यमान । कथे उभे हरिजन ॥1॥
ज्याची कीर्ती वाखाणिती । तेथें ओतली ते मुर्ती ॥ध्रु.॥
देहाचा विसर । केला आनंदें संचार ॥2॥

शोक मोह चिंता । याची नेणती ते वार्ता ॥4॥
तुका ह्मणे सखे । विठोबा च ते सारिखे ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Both the worshiper and the one worshiped stand together in the kirtan gathering. Where His glory is sung, there His very form is poured out.

The body is forgotten; only bliss moves through them. Ego has departed, shame has been dismissed, and honor cast aside.

They know nothing of grief, delusion, or anxiety. Says Tuka, they have become just like Vithoba Himself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The worshiper and the worshiped stand together in the kirtan. Where His glory is sung, His very form is poured out there. The body is forgotten; only bliss moves through them. Pride is gone; shame is sent away; honor is let go. They know nothing of grief, of delusion, of worry. Tuka says: these dear ones have become just like Vithoba Himself.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes what happens to God's people in the heat of kirtan. The line between worshiper and worshiped dissolves: where the glory is sung, the very form of God floods the place, so both stand together. The singers lose track of the body, and bliss alone moves through them. With that, the props of the small self fall away: pride, shame, the craving for honor, and then grief, delusion, and anxiety, which they no longer even recognize. Emptied of all that, they take on the likeness of the one they sing; the devotee becomes like Vithoba Himself.

GATHA 0742 The Necessity of Experience

As the feeling so the fruit, like draws like

मराठी मूळ

भाव तैसें फळ । न चले देवापाशीं बळ ॥1॥
धांवे जातीपाशीं जाती । खुण येरयेरां चित्तीं ॥ध्रु.॥
हिरा हिरकणी । काढी आंतुनि आहिरणी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे केलें । मन शुद्ध हें चांगलें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

As the feeling, so is the fruit; force has no power before God. Like attracts like; each recognizes the other in the heart.

Just as a diamond is drawn from the mine by its own kind, so it is with devotion. Says Tuka, what matters is that the mind be made pure and clean.

IN PLAIN WORDS

As the feeling, so the fruit. Force does not work with God. Caste runs to its own caste; the sign passes between them, heart to heart. A diamond is drawn from the ore by another diamond. Tuka says: what was done that is good is this, that the mind was made pure.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram states a law of the inner life: you reap according to the feeling you bring, not the effort you push. You cannot strong-arm God; pressure has no purchase there. He shows it by likeness. Like seeks like, kind recognizes kind, and a diamond is cut and lifted from the rock by its own kind. So too, a pure heart draws God, who answers in kind. The one thing worth doing, then, is not to force a result but to cleanse the mind, for the purified heart is what the fruit answers to.

GATHA 0743 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the hollow preacher

मराठी मूळ

वरि बोला रस । कथी ज्ञान माजी फोस ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे हाडें । कुत†या लाविलें झगडें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Outwardly his speech drips with nectar, but inwardly his knowledge is hollow and empty. He talks of the touchstone's power, yet its dust never touches his own body.

Such deceivers and frauds possess neither this world nor the next. Says Tuka, it is like a dog fighting over a bone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

On the surface his talk drips like nectar. Inside, his teaching is hollow, all husk. Such liars and cheats own neither this world nor the next. He talks of the touchstone, but its dust never touches his own body. Tuka says: it is like a dog scrapping over a dry bone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram aims at the gap between fine speech and an empty heart. The man's words are sweet on the outside, but inside the teaching is dry husk with no grain, and pretty talk alone wins nothing. He praises the touchstone that turns iron to gold, yet not even its dust touches him; he speaks of transformation he has never let happen in himself. The warning is to watch for this pattern in oneself, not just in a preacher: such empty cleverness gains neither this world nor the next, and the show of it is as fruitless as a dog gnawing a bare bone.

GATHA 0744 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, worship without distinction

मराठी मूळ

हे चि तुझी पूजा । आतां करीन केशीराजा ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This alone shall be my worship of You henceforth, O Keshiraja. All things are Your feet; I will bow to them without distinction.

Wherever I turn, in every direction, You are equally present. Says Tuka, You are not limited to one place; You pervade both virtue and fault.

IN PLAIN WORDS

From now on, this alone will be my worship of You, O Keshiraja. All of this is Your feet. I bow to it all, making no distinction. Wherever I turn, in every direction, You are right there. You are not held to one place. Tuka says: You are present in virtue and in fault alike.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram redefines worship as a way of seeing rather than a rite to perform. Because Keshiraja, Krishna, is everywhere, every direction he faces is already God's feet, so he bows without sorting things into holy and unholy. He refuses to confine God to a single shrine or a single kind of thing. The hard edge is in the last line: God is not only in what we call good but equally in what we call fault, so there is nowhere left to withhold reverence.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There is nothing of my own to declare here. Yet this voice chatters on, indulging its whims and babbling.

This body is an assembly of five elements; the truth within it stands apart. Says Tuka, delusion makes it all run backwards. He stands with hands on His waist, just as He is, upright and unsitting.

He does not check one's provisions, or inquire into caste and lineage. Says Tuka, at the very first call, He comes running to meet you.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have nothing of my own to declare here. Yet this voice keeps chattering, indulging its whims and babbling on. The body is a gathering of the five elements; the truth within it stands apart. Tuka says: delusion makes it all run backwards. He stands just as He is, hands on His waist, upright, never sitting down. He does not check your provisions; He does not ask your caste or your lineage. Tuka says: at the very first call, He gets up at once and comes to meet you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram first admits he has nothing to offer: the talking self is only restless noise, and the body is borrowed elements while the real self stands apart from it. He names delusion as the force that turns this the wrong way round, making us claim what is not ours. Against that emptiness he sets the figure of Vitthal at Pandhari, standing on the brick with hands on His waist, ready and unmoving. The point of the close is that this God asks for no credential: not your stores of merit, not your caste or family. He answers the first cry instantly, so the only thing required of you is to call.

GATHA 0746 The Nature of God

God's mercy, the lowly are dearest

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How merciful He is. The humble and lowly are most dear to Him.

He carries their burden upon His own head and takes care of their yoga-kshema, their getting and their head and attends to their welfare. He does not let them lose their way; holding them by the hand, He shows them the straight path.

Says Tuka, when one follows Him with single-minded devotion, all this is given.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How merciful He is. The humble and the lowly are most dear to Him. He carries their burden on His own head, and He worries over their getting and their keeping. He does not let them lose the way; He holds them by the hand and shows them the straight path. Tuka says: this is given to the one who follows Him with the soul, in single-hearted faith.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the kind of God he trusts: one whose favorite is not the strong but the poor and helpless. Such a God does not stand back and watch; He shoulders their burden Himself and takes responsibility for their welfare, their getting and their keeping. When they wander, He does not scold from a distance; He takes them by the hand and walks them onto the straight road. The one condition is wholehearted devotion, following Him with the whole soul and a single feeling.

Devotion over learning, faith binds God

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे तुज धाक । देतां पावसील हाक ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Neither the Vedas nor the scriptures know us; we are known only as simple devotees. His form is what delights us; that union is what we hold with Hrishikesha.

By the force of pure faith, we will place You within our hearts. Says Tuka, if we raise a cry to You, You will come running in fear of disappointing us.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The Vedas and the scriptures do not know us; only the simple devotees do. It is Your form that delights us; that is the union we hold with Hrishikesha. By the strength of pure faith we will set You inside our hearts. Tuka says: when we raise a cry to You, You will come running, afraid to fail us.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the devotee's path apart from the scholar's. The Vedas and learned texts do not recognize people like him; he belongs instead to the company of plain believers whose hold on God is His form, not doctrine. He then makes a bold claim: simple faith is strong enough to place God within the heart and keep Him there. The radical turn is the last line, where the relationship is reversed: God Himself feels bound to answer, hurrying to the devotee's call as though afraid of disappointing him.

तुका ह्मणें येणें । बहु नाडिले शाहाणे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The mind is entangled in trivialities and runs after them constantly. The one who pulls it back and turns it around is the true warrior, unmatched in all the world.

Once it attacks, there is no telling what it will do to you. Says Tuka, this mind has deceived even the wisest.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The mind is tangled up in trifles and runs off after them. The one who can pull it back and turn it around is the strong one, the only real hero in all the world. Once it strikes, there is no telling what it will do to you. Tuka says: this mind has tripped up even the wise.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the language of valor onto the inner life. The mind is forever entangled in small, trivial things and races toward them on its own. The true warrior, he says, is not the conqueror of others but whoever can rein in his own mind and turn it back. He warns that the mind attacks like an enemy whose next move you cannot foresee, and that it has brought down even the wisest people. The invitation is to examine where your own mind keeps running, rather than to look down on anyone else's.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O tongue, take up the sweet Name of Vithoba. O eyes, feast on the joy of Vithoba's face.

O ears, listen to the virtues of my Vithoba. O mind, run and take your place at Vithoba's feet.

Says Tuka, O soul, do not let go of this Keshava.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O my tongue, take up the sweet Name of Vithoba. O eyes, take your joy: look at Vithoba's face. O ears, listen to the virtues of my Vithoba. O mind, run there and stay at Vithoba's feet. Tuka says: O soul, do not let go of this Keshava.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram calls each faculty by name and gives it one task. The tongue is to speak the sweet Name, the eyes to feast on Vithoba's face, the ears to hear His virtues, the mind to run and settle at His feet. He gathers every sense into a single direction so that no part of him is left out of the devotion. The final plea to the soul, never to let go of Keshava, makes clear this is not a passing exercise but the one hold he means to keep for good.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Singing His virtues, one never has enough; gazing upon His form, the eyes are never satisfied. How beautiful, how beautiful is Panduranga, with His lovely dark-hued radiance.

His face is the essence of all that is auspicious, a treasury of all fulfillment. Says Tuka, there is no end or measure to this happiness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Singing His virtues, I never have enough; gazing at His form, my eyes are never full. How beautiful, how beautiful is Panduranga, His dark-hued radiance lovely. His face is the essence of all that is auspicious, a storehouse of every fulfillment. Tuka says: there is no end and no measure to this joy.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is pure praise of Vitthal as Panduranga. Tukaram says no amount of singing satisfies him and no amount of looking fills his eyes; the longing only grows with the beholding. He dwells on the dark, glowing beauty of the form and calls that face the source of everything auspicious and the treasury of all fulfillment. The close insists the happiness it gives is boundless, beyond counting, so the lack of satisfaction is not frustration but the mark of an infinite delight.

The sinner's claim, mercy needs the fallen

मराठी मूळ

जरी मी नव्हतों पतित । तरि तूं पावन कैंचा येथ ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे याचकभावें। कल्पतरु मान पावे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If I were not a sinner, how then would You be called the Purifier? Therefore my name must come first, and then Yours as the merciful redeemer. Iron gives the touchstone its glory; without it, the touchstone is just another stone.

Says Tuka, the wishing-tree gains its honor through the one who comes to ask.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If I were not fallen, how could You be called the Purifier here? So my name must come first, and only then Yours, O treasure of mercy. Iron gives the touchstone its glory; without iron the touchstone is just a stone. Tuka says: the wishing-tree wins its honor through the one who comes to ask.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a daring argument about how mercy works. God's title of Purifier means nothing unless there is someone fallen to purify, so in a real sense the sinner's name must come before God's. He drives it home with two images: the touchstone is only a plain rock until iron is brought to it, and the wishing-tree earns its fame only when someone comes to ask. The point is not pride but reversal: his own lowliness is exactly what gives God's mercy something to be, so he offers his sin as the very ground of his claim.

GATHA 0752 The Necessity of Experience

Inner experience, remembrance is enough

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When there is single-minded devotion in the heart, no technique or strategy is needed. I have come to know this through my own experience and my own feeling.

Mere remembrance is enough; all joy arises from that alone. Says Tuka, the mind itself yearns to worship Narayana.

IN PLAIN WORDS

With one whole feeling in the heart, no technique is needed at all. I have come to know this in my own life, through my own feeling. Remembrance alone is enough; from it comes all joy, all love. Tuka says: the mind itself longs to worship Narayana.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from what he has tested, not from instruction. Where the heart holds a single, undivided devotion, the elaborate methods and strategies fall away as unnecessary. He says he learned this firsthand, through his own inner experience, not by argument. Simple remembrance of God turns out to be enough, and all joy and love flow from it, so the mind, far from resisting, comes to desire the worship of Narayana on its own.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have the support of the saints, while You stand alone, beyond all change. Consider this carefully, O God, and do not contend with us.

You cannot bring Yourself to speak, but we are well practiced in argument. Says Tuka, yet in the end, only the feeling of oneness remains.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have the saints to lean on; You stand alone, beyond all change. Think it over, God: do not pick a fight with us. You cannot bring Yourself to speak, but we are well practiced at arguing. Tuka says: even so, in the end only the feeling of oneness remains.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram teases God in the voice of an affectionate quarrel. He boasts that he has the company of the saints behind him, while God stands alone and changeless, so God had better not contend with him. The joke is that God is silent and will not argue back, whereas devotees are practiced and stubborn in argument and would surely win. Yet he ends by dissolving the contest: under all the playful sparring, what truly remains is the feeling of oneness between the devotee and God.

Let me have the company of saints at all times, an abundance of deep love. Says Tuka, the Name is enough; it fulfills all my needs.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What I beg of You, O God, is only the service of Your feet. Even if You offer them, I will not take riches, powers, or the four kinds of liberation. Give me the company of saints always, and a great abundance of love. Tuka says: the Name is enough; it satisfies all my need.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out exactly what he wants and what he refuses. The one thing he asks for is to serve at God's feet, nothing more. He turns down the rewards seekers usually crave: wealth, miraculous powers, even the four kinds of liberation, refusing them outright even if offered. What he asks instead is the constant company of the saints and an overflow of love. The Name of God, he says, already meets every need he has, so there is nothing left to want.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am Your devotee, marked as Yours through birth after birth. I know no other longing, O Keshava, apart from You.

This alone is my song: the chanting of Your Name. Says Tuka, I have put on Your Name as my ornament, wearing it as my finest jewel.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have taken refuge in You; I am marked as Yours through birth after birth. I know no other longing, O Keshava, apart from You. This alone is my song: the singing of Your Name. Tuka says: I have put on Your Name as my ornament, worn it as my finest jewel.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram declares an unbroken belonging. He has thrown himself on God's protection and counts himself stamped as God's own across every lifetime, not just this one. He insists he has no other desire pulling at him; Keshava is the whole of his wanting. His only song is the chanting of the Name, and in the close he treats that Name not as a duty but as adornment, the jewelry he chooses to wear, so devotion becomes the thing that makes him beautiful.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have crossed over to the other shore; this conviction has become reality. I have held Your Name in my throat and severed all ties with worldly existence.

Now nothing can harm me, from any quarter, ever again. Says Tuka, nothing at all remains to be done.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have crossed to the other shore. This is settled now; it is true. I have held Your Name in my throat. I have cut myself loose from this world. Now nothing can harm me, from any side, ever. Tuka says: there is nothing left to do.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is reporting a thing already finished, not a thing he hopes for. He holds the Name in his throat and with that one act severs his ties to worldly life, and the crossing is done. Because the crossing is done, he says no harm can reach him from any quarter again. The poem ends in the strongest possible rest: nothing at all remains to be done. The whole life of effort closes in the single grip of the Name.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am devoid of both action and understanding. I am simply Your helpless one, O God.

Please look after me and quiet my restless anguish. Do not reckon my virtues and faults.

Says Tuka, take my millions of offenses and swallow them in Your great belly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have no good deeds and no understanding. I am only Your helpless one, O God. Look after me. Quiet this restlessness in me. Do not weigh my virtues and my faults at all. Tuka says: take my millions of offenses and swallow them inside You.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram comes to God owning nothing, neither right action nor right knowledge, and makes that emptiness the whole basis of his plea. He asks not to be judged: do not weigh what is good in me against what is bad, because such an accounting would sink me. Instead he asks God to take in his countless offenses and absorb them, the way a belly swallows what is fed to it. This is the logic of grace over merit: the one who can claim nothing throws himself entirely on the mercy of the one who can hide everything.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If the water is not clean, what can soap do? Likewise, if the chitta is not purified, what can any teaching accomplish? If a tree bears no flowers or fruit, what can the spring season do? If a barren woman has no children, what is the use of a husband? What can a wife do for an impotent man? When the life-breath has departed, what dealings can the body conduct? Says Tuka, know that without the water of devotion, no crop can grow.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If the water is not clean, what can soap do? In the same way, if the heart is not pure, what can teaching do there? If a tree bears no flower and no fruit, what can spring do for it? If a barren woman has no children, what use is a husband? What can a wife do for an impotent man? When the life-breath has left the body, what business can the body do? Tuka says: know this, without the water of life, no crop grows.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram stacks one plain image on another to drive home a single point about readiness. Soap cannot wash in foul water; spring cannot make a dead tree fruit; the things meant to bring life come to nothing when the ground for them is missing. He turns this onto the inner life: if the heart is not yet cleansed, even true teaching lands on it uselessly. The point is not contempt for the unready but an honest naming of order: the inward purification has to come first, or nothing that follows can take root and grow.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have made vow after vow to You with my voice. Who else chants Your Name? Who else offers remembrance of the departed? Who stood before or after, willing to speak plainly? Says Tuka, O Panduranga, with whom do You keep company?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Vow upon vow, I have made myself Yours with my voice. Who else takes up Your Name? Who else makes the offering for You? Who else stood behind You or before You, ready to speak straight for You? Tuka says: O Panduranga, whose company will You keep then?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses a bold, almost teasing claim on the Lord: he is the one who actually keeps the vows, chants the Name, and stands up for God in plain speech. The questions are real challenges. If not him, who is doing this work? He reverses the usual posture of the suppliant: it is God who should value the devotee, because devotees like this are rare. The closing line lands the dare gently: O Panduranga, if You let me go, whose company will be left to You?

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When a single seed is destroyed, only then does it yield a full ear of grain. Everyone understands this principle, from the smallest to the greatest.

There is no gain without effort; nothing comes without giving of oneself. Says Tuka, the one who gives his life on the battlefield receives double the reward.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One seed is destroyed, and then it gives a full ear of grain. Everyone understands this truth, the small and the great alike. There is no gain for free, nothing without giving of yourself. Tuka says: the one who gives his life on the battlefield wins double the reward.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes a fact every farmer knows and makes it a law of the spiritual life: the seed must be buried and broken before it can yield a harvest. From this he draws the plain rule that nothing of worth comes without cost, without something of yourself being given up. He raises the stakes with the image of the soldier who gives his very life in battle and is rewarded doubly. The teaching is that self-surrender is not loss but the only true investment; what you let die is what comes back to you multiplied.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My life has been wasted in vain; I have been grievously deceived. Now hurry, hurry, O Hari.

What are You waiting for? Both You and I share this fate: the days have passed and dust fills our mouths. The mind will not let me come up for air; it seeks to drown me in the river of worldly existence.

The assault of sense-pleasures has struck, and by them I have been stripped bare. I have come now as a refugee.

Says Tuka, rush to me and save me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My life has gone for nothing. I have been badly robbed. Now run to me, run, O Hari. What are You waiting for? You and I share the same fate: the days have passed and dust fills my mouth. The mind will not let me come up for air; it wants to drown me in the river of this world. The blow of the senses has fallen, and they have stripped me bare. I have come to You now for shelter; run. Tuka says: reach me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from the edge of panic, naming his whole life as wasted and himself as a man already robbed. The danger is inward: his own mind holds him under in the river of worldly existence and will not let him breathe, and the pull of the senses has stripped him of everything. His cry is urgent and almost accusing: why do You wait, Hari, when even You stand to lose by my drowning? Having no strength left, he throws himself down as a refugee at God's door and asks only that help arrive in time.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By enduring hardship, I have placed my earnings into Your hands. This alone is the return on the investment: that in the end, our dealings are with You.

I have given name and form a dwelling place. Otherwise, who would call You God? Says Tuka, O Hari, I have given You a home in my own house.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By bearing hardship, I earned, and I placed the earnings into Your hands. This is the only return on it: that in the end my dealings are with You. I gave Your name and form a place to stand. Otherwise who would call You God? Tuka says: O Hari, I have given You a home in my own house.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes his devotion as hard-won earnings, gathered through suffering and then handed straight over to God, with the only profit being that he now has dealings with God alone. Then he turns the relationship around with daring intimacy: it is the devotee who gives the formless Lord a name and a form to inhabit. Without someone to worship Him and house Him, who would even call Him God? The closing line makes it personal and tender: I have given You a home in my own house. Love makes the worshipper the keeper of the One he worships.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When asking for what is rightfully ours, do we not have the authority? But for the sake of propriety, I have kept my words measured. At this very moment, let us settle accounts.

Says Tuka, I will leave You nowhere to hide, O Vitthal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When I ask for what is my own, do I have no right to it? But for the sake of how things look, I have held my words back. Right now, this very moment, let us sit and settle the matter. Tuka says: I will leave You nowhere to hide, O Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses his claim on God with the confidence of a man asking for what is rightfully his, not begging for a favor. He admits he has kept his demand polite only out of decorum, but now he drops the pretense and calls for an immediate reckoning. The tone is loving boldness, not arrogance: a devotee so sure of his bond that he can corner the Lord. The last line says it plainly: O Vitthal, I will give You no place to slip away; settle Your account with me now.

GATHA 0764 Longing and Separation

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How long must I keep pleading with You in supplication? My fate is strong indeed; perhaps You are helpless before it. I will now hold You to Your own pledges, O Lord of Pandhari.

Says Tuka, the strong one twists the ears of the timid.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Enough now. How long should I keep crying to You in supplication? My fate weighs heavy, and before it You look helpless. So I will set You free of it myself by holding You to Your own promises, O Lord of Pandhari. Tuka says: the strong one twists the ears of the weak.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is tired of pleading, so he changes his footing from beggar to claimant. His destiny is so heavy that, he says with affectionate provocation, even God seems unable to lift it. His move is to hold God to the pledges God has publicly made, the titles and vows by which the Lord is known as the rescuer of the helpless. The closing proverb names the new strategy bluntly: the strong one takes the timid one by the ears. By leaning on God's own reputation, the devotee gains a holy leverage over Him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What cannot be accomplished by contemplating Vitthal alone? It is the essence of all spiritual practices, carrying one across the ocean of worldly existence. Through Him, immeasurable sacrifices, rituals, and austerities are performed.

Says Tuka, this chant is a simple mantra of just a few syllables.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What cannot be done by thinking on Vitthal alone? It is the essence of every practice. It carries you across the ocean of this world. Through it, countless yogas and sacrifices and austerities are accomplished. Tuka says: chant it. The mantra is easy, only a few syllables.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the simple remembrance of Vitthal above the whole apparatus of religious effort. To dwell on the Name is the essence that all other practices were only reaching toward, and it alone ferries one across the sea of birth and death. He claims that this single act quietly contains the fruit of countless yogas, sacrifices, and austerities. The point is reassurance and invitation: the highest thing is also the easiest, a mantra of just a few syllables, open to anyone willing to chant.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if one is of wicked conduct, if the tongue utters the Name, it is enough. Even if there is no devotion in the heart, singing the virtues of Hari in song is still blessed.

Even if one practices wrongdoing, the utterance of Hari's Name on the lips is still potent. Be one of any caste, honored or shunned.

Says Tuka, blessed is the one who calls himself a servant of Hari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let him be a man of wicked conduct: if his tongue speaks the Name, that is enough. Let there be no devotion in his heart: still, singing Hari's virtues in song is blessed. Let him do wrong things: still, the speaking of Hari's Name on the lips has power. Let him be of any caste, the pure or the outcast. Tuka says: blessed is the one who calls himself Hari's servant.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pushes the power of the Name to its most radical edge: it does not wait for the speaker to first become good, sincere, or high-born. Even the wrongdoer, even the one with no devotion in his heart, even the one society shuns as an outcast, is reached the moment the Name is on his tongue. This is not a license for wrongdoing but a demolition of every barrier people place at the door of God. The one thing that matters is calling oneself Hari's servant; by that single claim, anyone at all is made blessed.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

At the very first cry, He leaps forth and bursts open the pillar. Who is as compassionate as my Vitthai, my Mother? At the merest remembrance, He rushes forward and wraps you in His embrace.

Says Tuka, to those who sing His glory, He grants the ultimate union through His Name alone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

At the very first cry, He leaps and bursts open the pillar. Who is as kind as my Vithai, my Mother? At the least remembrance of Him, He comes running and folds you in His arms. Tuka says: to those who sing His glory, He gives full union through the Name alone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures God as a mother who cannot bear to delay. He recalls how at the child's cry the Lord tore open the pillar to save the devotee, and asks who could be more tender than this. The smallest act of remembrance is enough; God does not weigh worthiness but simply runs and gathers the one who calls into His embrace. The poem ends with the largest promise on the smallest condition: to those who merely sing His glory, the Name itself grants the final union with God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

As iron stands upright, drawn by the force of a magnet, so You play within us and around us. A wick is consumed by fire, yet the flame protects its glow.

Says Tuka, the fragrance of sandalwood has lifted common logs into its own nobility.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Iron stands up by the force of the magnet, lifted from where it lay. So You play in us, inside and outside both. The wick is food for the fire, yet the flame keeps its own glow alive. Tuka says: by simply being near, plain logs are carried into the nobility of sandalwood.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming, through three images, how God works on a soul that comes close to Him. Iron has no power to rise on its own; the magnet draws it upright, just as Hari plays within us and around us and pulls us toward Himself. The wick is consumed by the flame, yet the flame is what keeps the glow burning, so what looks like being destroyed is being kept alive. The last image lands the claim: ordinary wood lying beside sandalwood takes on the sandalwood's fragrance, so nearness alone lifts common things into the higher nature. The point is that the change is not earned by the iron, the wick, or the log; it comes from the one they are joined to.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who grow long matted hair and invite spirits into their bodies are not true saints. The mark of the Self is not found in them.

They gather men and women together and tell fortunes of every kind. Says Tuka, such charlatans have no connection to Govinda.

IN PLAIN WORDS

They grow their hair long and matted. They call spirits down into their bodies. But these are not true saints. The mark of the Self is not in them. They gather men and women together and tell fortunes of every kind. Tuka says: such tricksters do not have Govinda with them.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is exposing a pattern of fake spirituality and naming the test that unmasks it. The long matted hair and the spirit-possession look like signs of holiness, and crowds are impressed, but the outward show proves nothing. The one mark that matters is atmakhun, the sign of having known the Self, and that is exactly what these performers lack. He points to the fortune-telling done before mixed crowds as proof: this is a trade in spectacle, not a life turned toward God. The warning is for the listener too, to test a teacher by the inner mark and not be drawn in by display, for where Govinda is absent the rest is only theater.

GATHA 0770 The Saints

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We can turn donkeys into horses right before your eyes. A dog that chews old shoes, a stubborn barren hound, we can purify.

Says Tuka, we can make even the wicked spotless at the right moment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We can turn donkeys into horses, right before your eyes. The dog that chews old sandals, the stubborn worthless hound, we can change them. Tuka says: we make even the wicked spotless, in the right moment.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is claiming, in the voice of the saints, that their company can transform anyone. The rough images, a donkey becoming a horse, a shoe-chewing stray dog being purified, stand for people the world has written off as base and incorrigible. The boast is not arrogance about themselves but confidence in what holy company does to a person. The phrase about the right moment matters: the change is real but it comes when the time is ripe, not by force. The point for the listener is that no one is too low to be lifted, so do not despair of yourself or of anyone.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My wife has died and liberation has come; God has released Maya. O Vitthal, now Yours and mine is one kingdom; there is no need for anyone else.

My child has died, and that is well; God has made me free of attachment. My mother died before my eyes.

Says Tuka, with that, all anxiety was removed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My wife has died, and liberation came; God has released me from Maya. Vitho, now the kingdom is Yours and mine; there is no business with anyone else. The child has died, and that is well; God has cut me free of attachment. The mother died before my eyes. Tuka says: with that, the anxiety was gone.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a hard, deliberately shocking abhanga, and it must be heard as being about attachment, not about contempt for the dead. Tukaram takes the losses that ordinarily break a person, wife, child, mother, and reads each one as God prying his grip off the things that bound him to Maya. The strong line, Vitho, the kingdom is now Yours and mine alone, names what is left when every other claim on the heart has fallen away: God and the soul, with no third. He is not saying he is glad the people died; he is saying the bond that tied his anxiety to them has been broken, and what remains is rest in Vitthal. Read against oneself, it asks how much of our fear is simply our clutching at what we cannot keep.

GATHA 0772 Renunciation

Renunciation, swallow the ego

मराठी मूळ

योग तप या चि नांवें । गिळत व्हावें अभिमानें ॥1॥

तरि खंडे येरझार। निघे भार देहाचा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे मानामान । हें बंधन नसावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The true meaning of yoga and austerity is this: to swallow one's ego willingly. Practice this one thing, and let your dealings be rooted in truth.

Then the cycle of coming and going will cease, and the burden of embodiment will be lifted. Says Tuka, let there be no attachment to honor or dishonor; that itself is bondage.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Yoga and austerity mean just this: to swallow your own pride. Do only this one thing, and let your dealings be true and good. Then the coming and going ends, and the body's burden falls away. Tuka says: honor and dishonor, do not let them bind you; that itself is the bondage.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is redefining the great spiritual disciplines so they cannot be mistaken for outward feats. Real yoga and tapas, he says, are not postures or fasting but the willing swallowing of one's own ego, backed by honest and upright conduct. Do that single thing and the round of birth and death stops, and the weight of embodiment is lifted. He then names the subtle trap: caring about being honored or insulted is itself a chain, even for someone who has dropped grosser attachments. The teaching turns the listener inward, away from impressive practice and toward the quiet death of pride.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He performs his daily rituals and prayers after filling his belly with food. For him there is neither gain nor loss; he keeps a balance of income and expense.

A laborer's wealth consists of his tools: his spade and his rope. Says Tuka, God does not belong to the impatient.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He does his evening rites and his bathing, but only after he has eaten his fill. For such a man there is no real gain or loss; he just keeps his accounts of income and spending balanced. A laborer's whole wealth is his tools, his spade and his rope. Tuka says: God is not for the impatient.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is satirizing worship done as routine bookkeeping rather than longing. The man performs his prayers and ablutions, but only after his belly is full, so God comes after appetite and ritual is just one more entry in a ledger that always balances out to nothing. The laborer image sharpens it: a hired worker guards only his spade and rope, the bare means of his wage, because his interest stops at the day's pay. The closing line names the stake: God does not yield to the impatient, the ones who will not wait, will not put Him first, will not let devotion cost them. The challenge to the listener is whether worship is a heartfelt seeking or merely a transaction kept in balance.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who comes with a plough should not be met with a sword. It is not fitting to humiliate someone and cast them aside.

Why crack your knuckles at one who comes unarmed? Says Tuka, for an impotent man, no great display is needed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One who comes carrying a plough should not be met with a sword. It is not right to shame a man and throw him aside. Why crack your knuckles at someone who comes with empty hands? Tuka says: against a man who cannot fight, no great show of strength is needed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is laying down a rule of fairness about meeting the weak. The farmer with his plough, the unarmed man, the one who cannot fight back, all stand for those who come with no power to oppose you, and answering them with a sword is shameful, not strong. To humiliate such a person and cast him aside is named as unfitting, beneath what is right. The blunt last line strips the bully of his glory: there is no honor in overpowering someone who was never able to resist. The ideal is restraint and decency toward those at your mercy, and the satire is aimed at the cruelty that mistakes itself for courage.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If you observe the duties of your caste and stage of life with care, you will reach a good destination. But you do not know the path by which one becomes Brahman itself.

If you have become a scholar, you practice only the cleverness of words. You may sing with proper pitch, rhythm, and melody, with feeling and artistry in song.

You may consider yourself learned in tantric rituals and worship. Yet all such efforts are merely straining the eyes in search.

Says Tuka, the saints who realized the truth became bodiless even while in the body.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Keep your caste and your stage of life spotless, and you will reach a good world. But you still do not know the way to become Brahman in your very being. You may have become a scholar and play with clever words. You may sing with perfect pitch and time and meter, with feeling and art. You may think yourself a master of tantric rites and the machinery of worship. All of it is only straining the eyes after something. Tuka says: the saints became bodiless while still in the body.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is ranking the whole apparatus of religion below one thing it cannot reach. Faithfully keeping caste and life-stage duties does earn a good destination, and scholarship, beautiful singing, and expert ritual are all genuine accomplishments, but he calls them, one after another, a straining of the eyes that never arrives. What none of them gives is the knowledge by which one becomes Brahman in one's own being, not as a reward elsewhere but here and now. The closing line names the real mark of the saints: while still in the body they had become videhi, bodiless, no longer identified with the flesh. The teaching turns the listener from doing more and knowing more toward the inner death of the body-sense that all the performances bypass.

Surrender, led by the thread of love

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hari leads me by the thread of love; wherever He pulls, I follow. All authority rests in His hands; my pleading and supplication are His to answer.

Says Tuka, however He places us, we remain content with His will.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hari leads me by a thread of love; wherever He pulls, I go. All power is in His hands; my pleading, my crying out, are for Him to answer. Tuka says: however He sets us down, we stay content in His will.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing total surrender as being tied to God by love rather than driven by force. The thread of love means he goes wherever Hari draws him, not as a captive but as one bound by affection. He hands over all control: every authority rests with God, and his own role is reduced to pleading and crying out, which God alone can answer. The closing line completes the giving-up: wherever God places him, in whatever condition, he rests content in that will. The poem holds up a peace that comes not from getting one's way but from wanting only what the Beloved wants.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Panduranga will bring you to your destination if you contemplate Him. When you hold Him in your mind, He puts a halter on the wandering heart.

To receive the fruit, one must have the strength within. Says Tuka, then all attainments come to serve at your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Panduranga will bring you to the goal, if you hold Him in your thought. Think of Him in the mind, and He puts a halter on the restless heart. To reach the fruit, you must have this strength in you. Tuka says: then all the powers come and wait at your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is promising that steady contemplation of God carries a person all the way home. To hold Panduranga in the mind is not idle; it is what reins in the wandering, restless heart, the way a halter steadies an animal. He adds a condition: reaching the fruit takes an inner strength, a firmness that does not let the mind slip away. When that holds, the result is striking: the siddhis, the very attainments people chase, come and wait humbly at the devotee's feet instead of being sought. The teaching is to put the whole effort into remembrance and let everything else follow from it.

Faith, God becomes what the devotee believes

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Blessed is the simple devotee whose heart is pure and clean. He worships the deity in the image; the saints say true feeling resides there.

He knows nothing of scriptural prescriptions and prohibitions but holds one single-pointed faith in his heart. Says Tuka, God must become whatever such devotees believe Him to be.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Blessed is the simple devotee whose heart is clean. He worships the god in the image, and the saints say true feeling lives there. He knows nothing of what is allowed and what is forbidden; he holds one single faith in his heart. Tuka says: God must become for them whatever they believe Him to be.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is exalting pure-hearted simplicity over learned correctness. The devotee who worships God in an image, knowing nothing of scriptural dos and don'ts, is called blessed, because the saints locate the truth not in the form but in the bhava, the feeling, that is present there. His ignorance of the rules is not a defect here; it leaves room for one undivided faith. The strong closing claim is that God is bound by such faith: He must show up as whatever the sincere heart believes Him to be. The teaching lifts up the unlearned lover of God and warns the listener that purity of feeling outweighs ritual expertise.

Social criticism, laziness dressed as freedom

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He was lazy to begin with, and on top of that he received a guru's teaching about the formless. Now what barrier of right and wrong will restrain him? He will not practice any dharma or perform any prescribed ritual.

Says Tuka, such donkeys simply run wherever the mind takes them.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He was lazy from the start. On top of that, a guru taught him about the formless. So now what fence of right and wrong will hold him back? He will not practice any dharma; he will not do a single prescribed rite. Tuka says: such donkeys just run wherever the mind takes them.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is attacking a particular misuse of high teaching, not the teaching itself. A man already lazy hears a guru speak of the formless absolute beyond rituals and rules, and seizes on it as permission to drop all discipline. With the fence of right and wrong knocked away, he abandons dharma and every prescribed observance, calling his idleness freedom. Tukaram bluntly names the result: not liberation but a donkey running after the mind's every whim. The warning, pointed at the pattern in oneself, is that hearing nondual truth before the heart is ready can become a cover for self-indulgence rather than a release from bondage.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He dances, he claps, he rolls upon the ground in ecstasy. These are my true friends: the simple, faithful devotees of Hari.

They hold no shame; they have no business with the world's opinion. Says Tuka, the throat chokes with emotion and tears stream from the eyes.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He dances. He claps his hands. In love he throws his body down on the ground. These are my dear ones, my true friends: the simple, trusting servants of Hari. They hold no shame. They have no use for what people think of them. Tuka says: my throat chokes, and tears pour from my eyes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming who he loves and why. The friends he claims are not the learned or the impressive, but the simple devotees of Hari who lose themselves in song: dancing, clapping, falling to the ground in love. Their mark is that they feel no shame and care nothing for public opinion; the world's regard has no hold on them. Watching this, Tukaram is overcome himself, his throat tight and his eyes streaming. The poem says the company of such open-hearted devotees is the thing that moves him most.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He wears the tilak, the cap, the garland, all the paraphernalia of God, but carries it all as a filthy pretense just to fill his belly. He tucks tulsi behind his ear and darbha grass in his topknot, and pinches his nose in a show of breath-control.

At the time of kirtan, he weeps and falls and rolls on the ground, though tears pour from his eyes without any real love behind them. Says Tuka, such deceivers are frauds of illusion. Govinda is nowhere near them.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He wears the tilak, the cap, the garland: all the gear of God. He carries it as a filthy disguise, just to fill his belly. He tucks tulsi behind his ear and darbha grass in his topknot. He pinches his nose to fake breath-control. At the time of kirtan he weeps, he falls, he rolls on the ground. The tears come, but there is no love behind them. Tuka says: such men are tricksters of illusion. Govinda is not near them. Govinda is not near them.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is exposing the gap between religious display and the heart. He lists the whole costume of holiness, the marks, the beads, the grass, the staged tears in kirtan, and says it is worn for one reason: to feed the belly. The damning detail is the weeping without love behind it, devotion turned into performance. He calls this a fraud of Maya, an illusion dressed as piety. The pattern to watch is in oneself: religious props and even real tears prove nothing if there is no love; God does not come near a show put on for gain.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Blessed is the village of Dehu, that holy land, that sacred ground where Panduranga Himself dwells. Blessed are those who live in this holy place; they utter the Name with their own voices.

Garuda stands with folded hands at the boundary stone. The Ashvattha tree faces north across from him.

To the south stands the Shiva linga of Hareshwar, and the banks of the Indrayani shine like the Ganga. There are Lakshmi-Narayana and the grove of Ballala, with the Siddheshwar shrine established there.

Vighnaraja guards the gate, Bhairava stands outside, and Hanuman is nearby with both his forms. There the servant Tuka performs kirtan, holding the feet of Vithoba in his heart.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Blessed is the village of Dehu, that holy land, that sacred place. There God Panduranga dwells. Blessed are the people who live in this holy ground; with their own mouths they cry out the Name. Garuda stands with folded hands at the boundary stone. The ashvattha tree faces north across from him. To the south is the Shiva linga of Hareshwar, and the bank of the Indrayani shines like the Ganga. There are Lakshmi-Narayana and the grove of Ballala, with the Siddheshwar shrine set up there. Vighnaraja guards the gate, Bhairava stands outside, and Hanuman is nearby in both his forms. There the servant Tuka does kirtan, holding the feet of Vithoba in his heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praising his own village, Dehu, as holy ground and walking the listener through its shrines. He names the place where Panduranga dwells and blesses the people there because they call out the Name aloud. Then he maps the sacred geography: Garuda at the boundary, the ashvattha tree, the Shiva linga, the Indrayani river bright as the Ganga, the shrines of Lakshmi-Narayana, Ballala, Siddheshwar, Vighnaraja, Bhairava, and Hanuman. The point of the catalog is the last line: in the middle of all this, Tuka simply does kirtan, carrying Vithoba's feet in his heart. The holiness of the place is real, but the living center is the servant who keeps the Lord's feet inside him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He fixes his gaze and creates a dazzling display, showing flashing lights before the eyes. They tell the disciple, "You have entered samadhi," but this is mere deception and fraud.

The light of a lamp is enclosed within a container, and the initiation is conducted in the dim of twilight. He draws rangoli designs and decorates the seat with elaborate rituals, then sits displaying mudras behind a curtain with lamps in four corners.

For the offering, he demands rich delicacies and sumptuous food on fine plates. He says, "The initiation is complete; now take a morsel," and drowns the whole thing in ceremony.

He has built a livelihood on hypocrisy and leads the faithful astray. He has submerged genuine spiritual life under the pretense of being a guru, enjoying comforts in its name.

He has destroyed the authority of the Vedas and obliterated the guidance of the scriptures. He has no yogic discipline, no breath-control, and has abandoned all rules and daily observances.

He has ruined the path of renunciation and created obstacles in the worship of Hari, increasing sin through his cunning mind. Says Tuka, the status of the guru has gone to ruin, and he sends his own ancestors to hell.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He fixes his stare and works the mood. He makes a dazzling display, flashing lights before the eyes. They tell the disciple: you have entered samadhi. It is a lie, a trick that cheats him. A lamp's flame is shut inside a box. The initiation is done in the dark of twilight. He draws rangoli, decorates the seat with care, sets up the ritual diagram and the offerings. He hangs a curtain, puts lamps in the four corners, sits on his seat, and shows off his mudras. For the offering he demands rich sweets, fine food on fine plates. He says: the initiation is finished, now take a morsel; and drowns the whole thing in ceremony. He has built a living out of fakery and leads the faithful astray. He has sunk true spiritual life under the guru's costume, and lives in comfort on its name. He has wiped out the authority of the Vedas and lost the teaching of the scriptures. He has no yogic discipline, no breath-control. He throws away the rules and the daily duties. He has ruined renunciation and thrown obstacles into the worship of Hari. With his cunning mind he piles up sin. Tuka says: the dignity of the guru has gone to ruin; he sends his own ancestors to hell.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is dissecting the machinery of a fraudulent guru point by point. The hypnotic stare, the flashing lights, the curtain and lamps and mudras, the twilight initiation, the demand for rich food: every step is staging, designed to make a disciple believe he has reached samadhi when nothing has happened. The charge is that this man has turned a sacred office into a paying trade, set genuine practice aside, and discarded the Vedas, the scriptures, yoga, and daily discipline while living in comfort on the guru's reputation. The harm runs both ways: he obstructs real devotion to Hari and degrades the very dignity of the teacher's seat. The test the poem leaves for the reader is plain: a guru is known by discipline and self-emptying, not by spectacle and fees, and any teaching aimed at comfort and effect should be suspected.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the land where a Shakta donkey holds sway, heaps of sin abound. He proclaims the merit of his practice while the senses run riot in revelry.

Lust dwells there in the guise of anger, and he chants the name of the goddess. He eats meat and drinks liquor, belonging to the lowest ways, and stores defilement in his heart.

He worships and praises a wanton spirit and feels no shame, even with his graying beard. Says Tuka, his goddess-worship will lead him straight to her own abode of ruin.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the land where such a man holds sway, sin piles up in heaps. He announces the merit of his practice, while the senses run riot. Lust lives there dressed up as anger, and he chants the name of the goddess. He eats meat and drinks liquor, keeping to the lowest ways, and stores up defilement in his heart. He worships and praises a corrupt spirit and feels no shame, even with a graying beard. Tuka says: this worship will carry him off at the end to its own place of ruin.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is attacking a religion that uses the name of the divine to license appetite. The man claims spiritual merit while his senses run wild; lust hides behind ritual, and meat and drink are called worship. The sharp line is that he keeps doing this without shame even into old age, the gray beard that should have brought sobriety. Tukaram's warning is that worship shaped to feed craving leads only to the ruin it serves, not to release. The pattern to examine is the use of holy words as cover for indulgence; the name of God does not sanctify what the heart is actually chasing.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Where the king, the people, and the land are corrupt, that is where the Shakta cult makes its home. Unrighteousness grows there like a wild, uncontrolled crop, while true dharma is reduced to poverty.

The earth cannot bear the weight and trembles; even the clouds and winds conspire to afflict. Says Tuka, all sorrows come to take up residence where such practices dwell.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Where the king, the people, and the land are all corrupt, that is where this cult settles in. Unrighteousness grows there like a wild, untended crop, and true dharma is left poor in that village. The earth cannot bear the weight and trembles; the clouds and the wind turn against it. Tuka says: all sorrows come gladly to take up residence there.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram widens the lens from a single hypocrite to a whole society. Where rulers, people, and land are corrupt together, a religion of license takes root, and wrongdoing spreads like a weed while real dharma is reduced to poverty. He pictures the consequences in the world itself: the earth trembling under the burden, the weather turning hostile, every kind of suffering moving in to stay. The poem is naming the cost of letting corruption become the public norm. The stake is that a society's moral state and its very wellbeing are tied together; sorrow comes to live where dharma has been starved out.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In this Kali Yuga, righteousness has been utterly destroyed. Abandoning the name of Rama, the brahmins chant impure formulas.

They shun those they deem beneath them, yet they themselves wear dark and black garments. Says Tuka, they have abandoned their true calling and go begging with clubs in hand.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Because of this Kali Yuga, dharma has been wrecked. The brahmins have dropped Rama, Rama from their lips and chant impure formulas instead. They will not touch those they think beneath them, yet they themselves go about wrapped in dark, black cloth. Tuka says: they have abandoned their own true calling, and now they go begging with clubs in their hands.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the criticism on the brahmins who have left their proper work. Instead of the Name of Rama, they recite tainted formulas; they keep up rules of untouchability against others while wearing the dark garb that marks the very practices they should shun. The bite is in the last line: having abandoned the calling that was theirs, they end up wandering as armed beggars. He blames the age, Kali Yuga, for the collapse of dharma, but the failure he points to is concrete. The thing to examine is the hollowing out of a sacred vocation: keeping the outward marks of purity while letting go of the Name that gave the calling its meaning.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All sins are gathered in one: the worshiper of Shakti. O my Panduranga, let not his pollution touch my body.

He is steeped in lust, anger, and intoxicants, colored through and through with faults. When committing sin, he feels no hesitation.

Says Tuka, he fears no one at all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All sins are gathered into one in him: this worshiper of Shakti. O my Panduranga, do not let his defilement touch my body. Lust, anger, and drink are in him; he is dyed through and through with faults. When he commits sin he feels no hesitation at all. Tuka says: he is afraid of no one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays to be kept clear of a man he sees as the sum of every vice. He gathers the charges into one figure, the worshiper who has made his religion a cover for lust, anger, and drink, and is stained through and through. What disturbs him most is the lack of any check: the man sins without hesitation and fears no one, no human and no God. So Tukaram turns to Panduranga and asks not to be touched by that defilement. The poem names a real spiritual danger, the company of someone who has lost all fear and shame, and the honest response of asking the Lord for distance from it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even when they are warned and restrained by force, they push their way stubbornly into hell. Like those given over to vice, no teaching or counsel will change their course.

They have ruined their human birth; the greatest harm is done right here. Says Tuka, O Lord of Pandhari, they slander Your sacred story.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even when they are warned, even when they are held back by force, they shove their way into hell anyway. For men given over to vice, no teaching, no counsel works. They have wasted their human birth; the great ruin is done right here. Tuka says: O Lord of Pandhari, they slander Your sacred story.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes people so set in their course that nothing reaches them. They are warned and even physically restrained, yet they force their way toward ruin; advice and teaching simply do not take. The tragedy he names is the waste of a human birth, the one chance squandered here and now, and the final injury is that they slander the Lord's own story while doing it. He says this turning to Vithoba, the Lord of Pandhari, as a lament. The poem holds up the hard limit of counsel: a person who refuses every warning cannot be saved by more words, and the loss is theirs to make.

The mother-goddess of the Shaktas is a sow that eats filth from the streets. Her followers have fallen into her habits and chase after her.

The mother-goddess of the Shaktas is a she-donkey, braying at every village gate. Says Tuka, to speak of such disgraceful things even with one's voice is shameful.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The mother-goddess these people worship is a sow that eats filth in the streets. They have fallen into her ways and run after her. Their mother-goddess is a she-donkey, braying at every village gate. Tuka says: even to speak such disgraceful things aloud is shameful.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is Tukaram at his most savage, mocking a degraded cult by likening its goddess to a sow eating street filth and a braying she-donkey, and saying the followers have sunk into those same habits. The fury is aimed at a worship he sees as feeding on filth and noise rather than truth. He turns the blade on himself at the end, admitting that merely saying such things aloud is itself shameful, as if disgusted that the subject forces such words from his mouth. The point is not contempt for any person but horror at a practice that drags devotion down to the lowest appetites. The self-examination is built into the closing line: even naming the degradation is a stain one would rather not carry.

Social criticism, devotion misplaced on petty spirits

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Abandoning Hari and Shiva, they fix their devotion on petty spirits. Hear of the degradation of such devotees.

They hang cowrie shells around their necks and carry baskets, devoid of skill. They wear strings of charms and wander from door to door, appearing human but living like dogs.

With vermilion on their heads and teeth stained red, they carry the implements of the she-demon. They worship grotesque images and the trunk of Ganesha merely as an animal form.

By such practices they have lost their way; their worship and their devotion are false. Says Tuka, those who worship anything other than Vishnu and Shiva have gone astray.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Leaving Hari and Shiva, they fix their faith on petty spirits. Hear how these devotees disgrace themselves and call it godliness. They hang cowrie shells around their necks and carry begging baskets, with no real skill. They wear strings of charms and wander door to door; they look like people, but they live like dogs. Vermilion on their heads, teeth stained red, the she-demon's rattle in their hands. They worship grotesque, swollen images, the elephant's trunk as nothing more than a beast. By such fashions they have lost the road; their faith is false and their worship is false. Tuka says: those who worship anything but Vishnu and Shiva have gone astray.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is grieving over devotion poured into the wrong objects. People leave Hari and Shiva and fasten their faith on petty spirits and demon-cults, taking up cowries, charms, vermilion, and rattles, and wandering door to door for alms. He says they keep the human shape but live like dogs, and even reduce a great form like Ganesha's to a mere animal trunk, worship without understanding. His verdict is that the whole bent is a false faith that has lost the road. The standard he sets is exclusive and deliberate: real worship is fixed on Vishnu and Shiva, and devotion scattered onto lesser powers leads the devotee astray. The pattern to examine is where one actually places trust, since faith aimed at petty powers degrades the one who offers it.

Social criticism, knowledge bought cheap

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For the sake of an onion, this so-called knowledge arose, and by it the people were misled. Listen: lust and anger seethe within, like the pup of a bitch that barks and snaps.

For performing worship he demands money. What does he teach his disciples? Says Tuka, where is Brahman in all this? The whole thing is nothing but delusion about sense-pleasures.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For the sake of an onion this so-called knowledge sprang up, and by it the people were cheated. Listen: lust and anger seethe and boil in him; he yelps like a bitch's pup, barking and snapping. For doing worship he demands money. What can such a man teach his disciples? Tuka says: where is Brahman in any of this? The whole thing is nothing but delusion about the pleasures of the senses.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is dismissing a cheap, commercial sort of teaching that misleads ordinary people. He says this knowledge arose for the price of an onion, worthless and bought low, and inside the teacher lust and anger are still boiling. The man charges money for performing worship, so Tukaram asks what such a person could possibly pass on to a disciple. His blunt question is the heart of it: where is Brahman in any of this? He answers himself, calling the whole enterprise a delusion built on sense-pleasure. The test left for the reader is whether a teaching points beyond craving toward the Real, or merely dresses up appetite and sells it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Having abandoned the Lord of Pandhari, whom else can I call God? It fills my heart with shame to call anything else divine. Having set aside a diamond, who would go picking up pebbles? Says Tuka, why abandon the supreme ones, Hari and Shiva?

IN PLAIN WORDS

If I set aside the Lord of Pandhari, whom else can I call God? It shames my heart to call anything else divine. Once you have a diamond, why go picking up pebbles? Tuka says: why abandon the supreme ones, Hari and Shiva?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says his devotion has only one place to go. Having known Vitthal, the Lord of Pandhari, he finds he cannot give the name of God to any other power; even the wish to do so makes him ashamed. He frames the choice with a plain image: a man who holds a diamond does not stoop for pebbles. To leave the highest, Hari and Shiva, for lesser gods would be exactly that exchange, and so he refuses it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

So many have wasted their lives by not worshiping the Lord of Pandhari. They serve petty deities, grasping and clinging to consuming gods.

They have forgotten the master of all. Says Tuka, in the end they fall into the hands of Yama.

IN PLAIN WORDS

So many lives have gone to waste, lived without worshiping the Lord of Pandhari. They serve petty gods, begging and clinging, gods who only consume. They forget the master of all. Tuka says: in the end they fall into the hands of Yama.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram warns that a life can be spent and still come to nothing. The waste he names is the failure to worship the Lord of Pandhari, while energy goes instead to smaller deities approached for what they can give. He calls this serving gods who only take and never save, and he says it amounts to forgetting the one master of all. The cost falls due at death, when such a person is handed over to Yama, the lord of the dead.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Enough of these futile pursuits. Let me remember You, O Govinda.

If You are the one who saves, then what can anyone else do? Says Tuka, I will sing Your songs, holding Your form in my heart.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Enough now of this futile work. Let me remember You, Govinda. If You are the one who saves, then what can anyone else do? Tuka says: I will sing Your songs, holding Your form in my heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns away from pointless effort and toward remembrance. He calls his worldly striving a dead-end occupation and resolves to fill that place with the memory of Govinda. His reasoning is simple: if rescue comes from God alone, then no other power can add or subtract anything. So he chooses the one work that matters, singing God's praises while keeping the divine form fixed in his heart.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We are servants of Vishnu; we do not depend upon anyone. Why then do these wicked people always slander us? Let us dwell wherever we please, at peace within ourselves.

Says Tuka, O God, serving You is our only occupation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We are servants of Vishnu; we depend on no one. Why then do these wicked people always slander us? Let us live wherever we please, at peace within ourselves. Tuka says: O God, serving You is our only work.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers his slanderers by stating where he stands. As a servant of Vishnu he owes nothing to anyone, so the attacks puzzle him: there is no debt or rivalry to explain them. Rather than fight back, he claims his freedom to live anywhere and stay settled within himself, untouched by the noise. The whole of his life, he says, is one occupation only, the service of God, and that is enough.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The hypocrites have spread their influence behind my back. What shall I say about that, O Vitthal? One who eats onions presumes to judge musk; he does not recognize even his own poor worth.

They harass me with questions about things I do not know, and once they grab my feet, they will not let go. I know nothing apart from Your feet; You alone are everything to me, everywhere.

Says Tuka, let their mouths be sealed. How long shall I argue with these quarrelsome debaters?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The hypocrites have worked behind my back. What can I say to that, Vitthal? A man who eats onions sets himself up to judge musk; the beggar does not know his own worth. They badger me with questions about things I do not know, and once they seize my feet they will not let go. Apart from Your feet I know nothing; You alone are everything to me, everywhere. Tuka says: let their mouths be stopped. How long must I argue with these quarrelers?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram protests against critics who undermine him while pretending to piety. He exposes the absurdity with one image: a man whose taste runs to onions presumes to appraise musk, blind even to his own poverty. The same people corner him with learned questions he cannot answer and will not release him once they have hold. Against all this he names his one ground, that he knows nothing except Vitthal's feet and that God is his all, and he asks only to be left in peace rather than dragged endlessly into debate.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In this Kali Yuga, poets compose works of hypocrisy. These skilled buffoons have multiplied greatly.

Their minds are set on wealth, women, and worldly desire, while their mouths rattle on with empty words. They put on a show of pretense to impress the world.

They speak of renunciation, but it is not in their chitta. They invoke the authority of the Vedas yet do not pursue their own salvation.

They are not free from attachment to the body. Says Tuka, the one whose actions do not match his words will bear the rod of Yama.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In this Kali age, poets make verses of hypocrisy; these clever clowns have multiplied. Their minds are fixed on money, women, and worldly wants, while their mouths rattle on, dry and empty. They put on a show to impress the world; they speak of renunciation, but it is not in their hearts. They quote the Vedas yet do nothing for their own good, and they are not free from the body. Tuka says: the one whose deeds do not match his words will bear the rod of Yama.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks the gap between sacred talk and actual life. He sees a crowd of skilled performers who dress up greed for wealth, sex, and status in pious verse, and whose fine words are hollow because nothing inside answers to them. They preach detachment they do not feel and cite scripture without ever using it to save themselves, still bound fast to the body they claim to have left. The warning lands on the pattern itself: when speech and deed split apart, the punishment of Yama is what waits, and the test he sets is one any of us can turn on our own talk.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The pleasure of the senses seems sweet here, but ahead lies the dreadful punishment of Yama. His servants beat, hack, and thrash without mercy, in great numbers.

In the forest of sword-edged leaves and thorn-trees, flames leap from cauldrons of boiling oil. On scorching ground they roll the sinner, and burning pillars are clasped to his arms.

Says Tuka, I come to You in humble supplication. Enough now of womb-dwelling and the cycle of births.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The pleasure of the senses tastes sweet here, but ahead lies the dreadful rod of Yama. His servants beat and hack and thrash without mercy, in great numbers. In the forest of sword-leaved trees and thorns, flames leap from cauldrons of boiling oil. On scorching ground they roll the sinner, and burning pillars are clasped against his arms. So Tuka comes pleading: enough now of the womb and the round of births.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the brief sweetness of sense pleasure against the long horror that follows it. He paints the hells of Yama in hard detail, the merciless blows, the forest of blade-leaved trees, the cauldrons of boiling oil, the scorching ground, the embrace forced upon red-hot pillars, so the cost of present indulgence cannot be ignored. The aim is not cruelty but warning: what feels sweet now buys this later. From that fear he turns to prayer, begging God to end the whole cycle of rebirth and womb-dwelling for him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My intellect is small; therefore I come to You in humble supplication. Now show me, show me, show me Your feet, O Keshava.

My mind has no steadiness at all, O Narayana. Says Tuka, have mercy on this unfortunate one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My understanding is small, so I come to You pleading. Now show me, show me Your feet, Keshava. There is no steadiness in my mind, none at all, Narayana. Tuka says: have mercy on this unfortunate one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays from his own weakness rather than any strength. He admits his understanding is too small to manage on its own, and that is exactly why he throws himself on God. His one urgent request, repeated, is simply to be shown Keshava's feet, the place of refuge. He confesses his mind has no steadiness left in it and asks Narayana to show mercy to him as the helpless, luckless one he knows himself to be.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My eyes are weary from watching the road. When will You show Your feet to my gaze? You are the mother, the nurturing shade of mercy.

O Vitthal, I have waited long for You. Says Tuka, my arms reach out, longing to embrace You, O Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My eyes are tired from watching the road. When will You show Your feet to my eyes? You are the mother, the nursing shade of mercy. O Vitthal, long have I waited for You. Tuka says: my arms reach out to embrace You, Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the cry of one who waits and aches for the sight of God. Tukaram has worn his eyes out staring down the road for Vitthal's coming and asks how much longer until those feet appear. He calls God his mother, the cool shade of mercy that shelters a child, naming the tenderness he is starving for. The poem ends in pure bodily longing: his arms are already open, reaching out to hold Panduranga close.

The Name, the body made Brahman

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This body should be regarded carefully and with certainty. All happiness resides here in the Name.

When Brahman is truly seen and duality has departed, the body itself becomes Brahman. Those who perform rituals, sacrifices, austerities, and vows are cheated of their pure merit by doubts and mental constructions.

Says Tuka, all joy is right here. Cast delusion far away and see clearly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Look closely at this body, and be sure: all happiness is here, in the Name. When Brahman is truly seen and duality is gone, the body itself becomes Brahman. Those who pile up sacrifices, austerities, and vows are robbed of their pure merit by their doubts and notions. Tuka says: all joy is right here; throw delusion far away and see.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says the goal people seek elsewhere is already present in the body, by way of the Name. When Brahman is genuinely seen and the sense of two, self and God, falls away, the very body is found to be Brahman; nothing has to be reached for. He warns that those who trust instead in heaped-up rites, austerities, and vows lose their merit to the doubts and mental constructions that come with such effort. His call is to stop the striving, drop the delusion of distance, and see that all joy is here now in the Name.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I lack the intellect to describe Your virtues; even the Vedic hymns have fallen silent before them. Your form is such that even the eyes cannot fully see it; Brahma and other gods are baffled.

Brahma and the gods are caught in the trap of karma; therefore they too suffer greatly. Says Tuka, Your virtues, Name, and form are immeasurable. How can I describe them? I measure You, O Infinite One, with the cup of devotion.

By any other means, You cannot truly be measured. Through yoga, rituals, and austerity, through the efforts of the body, through the path of knowledge, You cannot be captured.

Says Tuka, we are simple devotees; accept the service we offer with love, O Keshava.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have not the wit to tell Your qualities; the Vedas themselves fell silent before them. Your form cannot be fully seen by the eye, the form that baffles Brahma and the other gods. Brahma and the gods are caught in the trap of karma, and so they too suffer much. Tuka says: Your qualities, Your Name, Your form are beyond measure; how can I describe them? I measure You, Infinite One, with the cup of devotion; by no other means can You truly be measured. Not by yoga, sacrifice, austerity, not by the body's effort, not by the path of knowledge, are You caught. Tuka says: we are simple devotees; accept the service we offer with love, Keshava.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram confesses that God is beyond all description and then names the one thing that can reach Him. He places himself below the silenced Vedas and the baffled gods: even Brahma cannot fully see this form, and the high gods are themselves still bound in karma and suffering. So learning, ritual, yoga, austerity, and the body's effort all fail to grasp the Infinite. The one measure that works is devotion, the cup of love, and on that ground he simply asks Keshava to accept the humble service of plain devotees.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O God, grant me a disciple like this: adept and steeped in the knowledge of Brahman. Where such wisdom has taken root, there the seat of true renunciation is established.

When such a one appears in bodily form, Says Tuka, I will wave a protective flame of blessing over him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

God, grant me a disciple like this: skilled and steeped in the knowledge of Brahman. Where such wisdom has taken root, there stands the seat of true renunciation. Tuka says: when such a one appears in the flesh, I will wave a lamp of blessing over him to ward off all harm.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays not for himself but for the kind of person he longs to see. The disciple he asks God to send is one truly grounded in the knowledge of Brahman, not in mere talk. He notes the mark of the real thing: where that wisdom has actually rooted, genuine renunciation stands as well; the two come together. And his response to meeting such a soul is tender, not proud, he says he would perform the loving rite of waving a protective flame over him, the way one wards harm from a beloved child.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Until you have seen Pandhari, you go on praising the distant Vaikuntha. Liberation itself wanders door to door in Pandhari, appearing as a humble servant.

Tulsi gardens are swept, courtyards are decorated with rangoli, garlands, and colors; a wondrous celebration fills every home. The Name of Panduranga resounds in kirtan, stories, and Puranas, even in the songs women sing while grinding grain.

All joy is present there at all times; Brahman itself dwells there in full. Says Tuka, what cannot be attained through any effort is visible right there, standing upon the brick.

IN PLAIN WORDS

As long as you have not seen Pandhari, you keep praising the far-off Vaikuntha. Here, liberation itself wanders door to door. It comes as a humble servant, with a poor face. The tulsi gardens are swept; the courtyards are drawn with rangoli, garlands, and color. A fresh wonder fills every house. The Name of Panduranga sounds in kirtan, in stories, in the Puranas; even the women grinding grain sing it in their songs. All joy is there at every hour. Brahman itself lives there, whole. Tuka says: what cannot be reached by any effort is seen here plainly, standing on the brick.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is overturning the usual map of holiness. People praise Vaikuntha, the distant heaven, because they have not seen what is already present at Pandhari. There, he says, liberation does not have to be earned in some far place; it walks the streets door to door, wearing the face of a humble servant, woven into swept yards, rangoli, garlands, kirtan, the Puranas, even the grinding songs of working women. The claim is bold: the full Brahman, the thing no austerity can purchase, stands openly on the brick at Pandharpur for anyone to see. The point is that the goal is not elsewhere; it is here, ordinary and visible, in the life of the holy town.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It pains me to hear any talk that would cause separation from Your feet. Seeing people harming themselves, compassion arises in me, and I try to correct them, but they will not listen.

What can I do, O God? I lack the power to punish them and set them right. Says Tuka, O Panduranga, do not show me such sights before my eyes.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It pains me to hear any talk that would break me from your feet. When I see people harming themselves, pity rises in me. I try to set them right, but they will not listen. What can I do, O God? I have no power to discipline them and turn them around. Tuka says: O Panduranga, do not put such sights before my eyes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praying out of grief for others, not for himself. Anything that would loosen his hold on Vitthal's feet hurts him to hear, and the same love makes him ache when he watches people ruin themselves spiritually. He has the compassion to try to correct them, but not the authority to force them; they simply will not listen. So he turns his helplessness into a prayer: rather than be made to watch self-destruction he cannot stop, he asks God to spare his eyes the sight. The pain is in his powerlessness before another's free refusal, and he hands even that over to Panduranga.

Satire, the taste for filth

मराठी मूळ

तेवीं अभक्तांसी आवडे पाखांड । न लगे त्यां गोड परमार्थ ॥ध्रु.॥
श्वानासी भोजन दिलें पंचामृत । तरी त्याचें चित्त हाडावरि ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे सर्पा पाजिलिया क्षीर । वमितां विखार विष जालें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A pig finds comfort in filth; what taste can it have for fine food? In the same way, those without devotion love hypocrisy; genuine spiritual truth holds no appeal for them. If a dog is fed a feast of the five nectars, its heart still craves a bone.

Says Tuka, if a serpent is fed milk, when it vomits, it produces only poison.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A pig is content with dung; what sweetness can rich food hold for it? In the same way, the one without devotion loves falsehood. Real spiritual truth has no taste for him. Feed a dog a banquet of the five nectars, and its heart still runs to a bone. Tuka says: pour milk into a serpent, and when it spits it out, it has turned to poison.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming a pattern, not condemning a soul: appetite decides what you can receive. Just as a pig prefers filth to fine food and a dog leaves a feast for a bone, a heart with no devotion is drawn to hypocrisy and finds genuine truth tasteless. The serpent image goes further: feed it pure milk and it returns only venom, because the poison is inside, not in the food. The challenge is to examine your own taste. If real teaching seems flat to you while falsehood appeals, the lack is in what you have made yourself crave, and that craving has to change before the truth can ever be sweet.

Satire, teaching the unwilling

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if a donkey is bathed in the holiest waters, it does not become a fine horse. Likewise, what good is teaching to a wicked person? His mind can never be made pure.

Even if a serpent is fed sugar and nectar, the venom within will not depart. Says Tuka, even if a dog is fed a meal of milk and rice, it vomits it up right away.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wash a donkey in the holiest waters, and it still does not become a noble black-eared horse. In the same way, what use is teaching to a wicked man? His mind is never made pure by it. Feed a serpent sugar and nectar, and the venom inside it does not leave. Tuka says: feed a dog a meal of milk and rice, and it vomits it up at once.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is pressing the point that instruction alone cannot transform a heart that will not be changed. A donkey bathed in sacred rivers is still a donkey; teaching poured over a hardened mind does not purify it. The deeper image is the serpent fed nectar, whose inner poison stays poison, and the dog that throws up the very meal it is given. The teaching is not contempt for these people but a warning about a real possibility in oneself. Outer exposure to truth, holy water, sweet food, good words, accomplishes nothing if the inside is set against it; what must change is the inner nature, not the input.

Diagnosis, the soul in fever

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Just as a body burning with fever finds even milk to taste like poison, so too one who has turned away from spiritual truth suffers a delirium of the soul. The one in whose eyes lust has taken hold sees even the moon as yellow and distorted.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Just as a body burning with new fever finds even milk to taste like poison, so the one who has pushed spiritual truth away has fallen into a delirium. The man whose eyes are seized by lust sees even the moon as sickly yellow.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is diagnosing why truth can seem repellent to some people. A fevered body tastes nourishing milk as poison; the fault is in the sickness, not the milk. So too, the person who has driven spiritual truth away is in a kind of soul-delirium, and what is good seems bad to him. The last image makes it personal: lust in the eyes makes even the clear moon look diseased and yellow. The point is self-examination. If holy things look distorted or sour to you, suspect the fever and the craving in your own seeing before you blame what you are looking at.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now let us set aside the tales of the faithless, so that no anxiety enters the worship of Hari's Name. One should never speak of them or tell their stories; the tongue requires penance just for uttering their names.

Just as one should not speak the name of a monkey at dawn, so should one avoid the names of the faithless at all times. Says Tuka, let us now remember only what is auspicious, so that all our hours may be filled with joy.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now let the mind set aside the talk of the faithless, so that no anxiety enters the Name of Hari. Never speak of them or repeat their stories; the tongue needs a penance just for saying their names. As one does not utter a monkey's name at dawn, so avoid the names of the faithless at all times. Tuka says: now let us remember only what is auspicious, so that every hour is filled with joy.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is giving practical advice about what the mind dwells on. Brooding over the faithless and their stories breeds anxiety and disturbs the inner worship of Hari's Name, so he says to drop that subject entirely. The folk note about not naming a monkey at dawn shows his register: he treats such talk as a small inauspicious habit best simply avoided, not as a license to hate anyone. The instruction turns the attention away from grievance and toward what is auspicious. Fill the hours with the Name and with what is good, and the joy that follows leaves no room for the corrosive talk he is warning against.

Longing, the body spent in song

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the Name is remembered, let the throat choke with emotion and let love swell within the belly. Let there be goosebumps over the whole body and tears of bliss in the eyes; let all eight limbs be saturated with Your love.

Let this entire body be spent in kirtan; let me sing Your Name day and night. Says Tuka, I will do nothing else until the end of time. May I always find rest at the feet of the saints.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the Name is remembered, let the throat choke with feeling and love swell within me. Let goosebumps cover the body and tears of bliss fill the eyes; let all eight limbs be soaked in your love. Let this whole body be spent in kirtan; let me sing your Name night and day. Tuka says: I will do nothing else till the end of time. May I always rest at the feet of the saints.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praying not for liberation but for the signs of love itself. He asks that remembering the Name break him open: a choked throat, swelling love, goosebumps, tears, the whole body trembling with devotion. He wants no other use for his body than kirtan, and no other occupation, day or night, until the end of time. This is the bhakti claim that the love is the reward, not a means to something further. The closing wish, to rest always at the feet of the saints, places that whole life of singing inside the company of the holy, where such love is kept alive.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A mother knows the secret nature of her child, every joy and sorrow, every dharma. The one who gave support to the blind, only He understands how to continue guiding them.

The one who has sheltered the refugee behind His back, He alone knows how to guard that one. For the one who holds on to Him, no effort is needed; the strong swimmer carries the clinging one across.

Says Tuka, I have placed my life in Vitthal's hands; He alone knows the course of my destiny.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A mother knows the hidden nature of her child, all its joys, sorrows, and ways. The one who gave the blind man support, he alone knows how to keep guiding him. The one who has set the refugee behind his own back, he alone knows how to guard him. For the one who only holds on, no effort is needed; the strong swimmer carries the clinging one across. Tuka says: I have placed my life in Vitthal's hands; he alone knows where it goes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing surrender through plain images of dependence. A mother knows her child better than the child knows itself; one who has taken on a blind man knows how to lead him; one who has sheltered a refugee knows how to protect him. The swimmer image is the key: the one being carried does not swim, he only holds on, and the strong swimmer does all the work of reaching the far shore. So Tukaram concludes that having handed his very life to Vitthal, the responsibility for its course is now God's, not his. The whole effort of the devotee shrinks to one thing, holding on; the carrying is God's business.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not scatter your mind among rules and prohibitions. Remember Panduranga within your heart.

Once food has been eaten, one should not speak ill of it; a single morsel can ruin the entire meal. The gains of spiritual life are hard-won; one must carefully guard and preserve them.

Says Tuka, there should be no despair here; without the proper medicine, the ailment cannot be cured.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not split your mind among rules and prohibitions. In your heart, remember Panduranga. Once you have eaten the food, do not speak ill of it; one bad word can spoil the whole meal. The gain comes, but it is very hard-won; guard it and keep it with care. Tuka says: let no despair enter here. Without the right medicine, the disease cannot be cured.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is steadying a devotee against two dangers: scattered effort and second-guessing. Do not let the mind fragment among endless rules and prohibitions; keep it gathered on Panduranga in the heart. His image of food already eaten warns against criticizing the path once you are on it, since a single sour word can ruin the whole nourishment. The point is that devotion is a hard-won gain that must be protected, not undermined by doubt or despair. And like an illness that yields only to the correct medicine, the soul's cure comes only through this one remedy, the Name, so stay with it rather than dividing yourself.

GATHA 0813 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, do not spoil the good

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not allow faithlessness to corrupt what is already good. This itself, know well, is the gravest of faults.

The rains pour down ceaselessly, but on barren land they are wasted, bringing no harvest. If a lesser person, by his own choosing, desires the portion of the greater, the wish-fulfilling tree grants him accordingly.

Says Tuka, this life is very short. Look ahead to your own welfare.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not let faithlessness ruin what is already good in you; know that this itself is a great fault. The rain pours down without limit, but on barren ground it is wasted and yields no harvest. If a lesser man, by his own choosing, asks for the share of the greater, the wish-granting tree gives him just that. Tuka says: this life is very short. Look ahead to your own good.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram warns that doubt can spoil faith you already have, and he treats that spoiling as among the worst faults. His farming image makes the stakes plain: grace falls like endless rain, but a barren, faithless heart wastes it and brings in no harvest. The wish-fulfilling tree gives each person exactly what he chooses to ask for, so a small ask yields a small life; the limit is set by the asker, not the giver. Since human life is short, the exhortation is to aim high and guard the faith you have. Do not let unbelief turn fertile ground to waste, and choose your own true welfare while there is time.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Renunciation came to me without even trying, O Vitthal. I did not cast anything out of my mind deliberately.

Exhaustion itself bred disgust, and detachment arose naturally in the heart. The body had grown heavy under the burden of obligations; worldly life had made me miserable.

Says Tuka, laziness, apathy, and the tendency toward wrongdoing have all been removed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Renunciation came to me without my even trying, O Vitthal. I cast nothing out of my mind on purpose. Weariness brought disgust of itself, and without my holding to it, detachment settled in the heart. The body had grown heavy under the weight of debts; worldly life had worn me out. Tuka says: laziness and apathy are gone, and the pull toward wrong deeds has been cleared away.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is being honest that his renunciation was not a heroic act of will. He did not deliberately renounce anything; exhaustion with the world bred a natural disgust, and detachment arose on its own. He names the plain causes: a body bent under debt and a worldly life that had simply ground him down. Out of that ordinary failure and fatigue, something good came: the laziness, apathy, and drift toward wrongdoing fell away. The quiet point is that God can use even our being worn out and defeated. What looked like mere collapse turned, in Vitthal's hands, into a real and cleansing detachment.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The farmer covers the corpse of a dead animal and ploughs right over it, quickly putting it to use as manure. In just that way, pursue your own spiritual good while this human body is available.

What is sown by the fistful grows more than what is scattered by the handful; such is the leverage of working for one's own salvation. The power of Death is not in your own hands; the wise unravel this tangle while they can.

Says Tuka, look to your own welfare. The shrewd one makes his preparations in this mortal world.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The farmer covers the dead carcass with earth and ploughs straight over it, quickly turning it to use, just as a cultivator does. In the same way, work for your own true good while you have this human body. What is sown by the fistful grows more than what is scattered by the handful; such is the leverage of working for your own salvation. The power of Death is not in your hands; the wise untangle this knot while they still can. Tuka says: look to your own counsel. The shrewd man makes his preparation here in the land of the dying.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses the shortness and uncertainty of life into urgency. The farmer who buries a carcass and ploughs it into manure shows the lesson: even what seems waste can be put to use now, so put this human birth to use while you have it. His sowing image says effort placed wisely yields far more than effort thrown about carelessly, so concentrated work toward salvation pays back many times over. The hard fact behind it all is that death is not under your control; you cannot choose your hour. So the wise untangle the knot of worldly attachment while they still can, making their preparation here, in this passing mortal world, before the chance is gone.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the king travels, grandeur accompanies him naturally. Does anyone need to tell the king this? No one here values anyone else for free, not without the grace of God alone.

An image that has not been properly adorned will soon show its true nature underneath. Says Tuka, when Narayana dwells in the house, the signs of His grace become evident.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When a king travels, his splendor goes with him. No one needs to tell the king this. Here no one values anyone for free; it comes only from the grace of the one God. A thing that has not been truly adorned cannot hold its shine on top; the truth under it shows up soon enough. Tuka says: when Narayana lives in the house, the sign of His grace is the evenness that comes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming what real worth looks like and where it comes from. As a king carries his grandeur with him by nature, so a soul in whom God dwells carries something that needs no announcing. Worth here is not given freely or earned by show; it comes from the grace of the one God alone. Mere outer decoration, paint laid on top, soon peels and the true nature underneath shows; only what is genuine lasts. The sign that Narayana truly lives in a person is an inward evenness, a settled sameness, that no borrowed ornament can fake.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When a calf runs, the cow chases after it. The natural impulse of love is in her very being.

Can what is taught ever serve the same purpose? The inner thread pulls the minds of all beings. What has been truly abandoned cannot be reclaimed by force; therefore she kicks away the pretender.

Says Tuka, there is no need to insist; direct experience speaks for itself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the calf runs off, the cow runs after it. That love is born in her very body. Can anything taught do the same work? An inner thread pulls the minds of all beings. What she has truly let go of she will not take back when you try to give it again; so she kicks away the pretender. Tuka says: there is no need to insist. Direct experience tells you itself, in your own body.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts learned behavior with love that rises on its own. The cow chasing her calf shows a love that is not instructed but native, born in the body itself; an inner thread draws every creature without being told. Real devotion is like this: it cannot be installed by teaching, and once the heart has genuinely let something go, no force can press it back, the way the cow kicks off a calf that is not her own. The point is that you do not have to argue or insist about God; lived experience makes its own case in you directly.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Through its connection with God, the whole world becomes family. One thread pulls all into relation with each other.

This is no mere gesture to be wearied of; life is absorbed into life, as I see it. The joys and sorrows of others arise within one's own heart, and by the same principle, what is here is also there.

Says Tuka, what is stamped in purity only grows more beautiful with time.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Through the bond with God, the whole world is family. One thread pulls each into relation with each. This is no thin gesture you grow tired of; life is taken up into life, as I see it. The joy and sorrow of others rise in your own heart, and by that same rule, what is here is also there. Tuka says: what is stamped in pure birth only grows more beautiful afterward.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lands the claim that devotion to God makes the whole world one's own family. The relation is not loose sentiment that wears thin; it is life absorbed into life, a single thread tying everyone to everyone. The test of it is that another's joy and sorrow rise inside your own heart, and by the same law your own state is mirrored in others. He says this kinship, once stamped purely into a person, does not fade with use but grows more beautiful over time.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have been entirely spent in the pull of the senses. Whatever happened, moment by moment, I have reported to You.

May You kindly attend to this matter of service. I have set down my own burden.

Says Tuka, if in the future something goes wrong, may Narayana Himself take care of it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am all spent in the pull of the senses. Whatever happened, moment by moment, I reported to You. Please give thought to this matter of service. I have set down my own burden. Tuka says: if in time something needs running to fix, then let Narayana take care of it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a frank act of surrender after admitting failure. He confesses he has been worn out by the constant pull of the senses, and that he has kept nothing hidden, reporting each thing to God as it happened. Having owned his weakness, he lays down the whole weight of his own keeping and asks God to take charge of his service. The last line hands over even the future: if anything goes wrong and needs urgent rescue, that too is now Narayana's responsibility, not his.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let this meditation remain now. Let the eyes and mind be fixed upon it.

With all my might I will hold on to this vision, offering up my body-consciousness as a waving flame. This is the culmination; all has settled and become still within.

Says Tuka, O beautiful Vithoba, let me fall at Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let this meditation stay now. Let my eyes and mind cling to it. With all my life I will hold it shut inside me; with my whole body-sense I will wave the lamp before it. With this it has come to its peak; it has grown steady within me. Tuka says: O lovely Vithoba, let me fall at Your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays to keep the vision he has reached and never lose it. He asks that this meditation hold, that eyes and mind stay fastened on it, and he vows to grip it with his whole life, offering his very body-consciousness as the waved lamp of worship. He names this the crowning point, the place where everything inside him has finally come to rest and steadiness. The poem ends in plain longing: let me, he asks beautiful Vithoba, simply fall at Your feet.

तुका ह्मणे दृिष्ट सकळांचे शिरीं । वचन चि करी बैसोनियां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The lamp has illuminated the beginning, the middle, and the end. This effort of making it visible was well worth it.

The attendant has been shown the treasury of the master, but the treasure is not his to keep. Through this remedy all restlessness has been dispelled, and the strength of true authority has entered the body.

Says Tuka, his gaze is upon the heads of all, and seated, he governs by word alone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The lamp has shown the beginning, the middle, and the end. This effort to make it seen was well worth it. The servant has been shown the master's treasury, but the treasure is not his to keep from here on. By this means all craving has been destroyed; the strength of true authority has come into the body. Tuka says: his gaze rests on the heads of all, and seated, he rules by his word alone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses two images for what realization gives and withholds. The lamp standing for divine light reveals the whole of things, start to finish, and that revealing was worth all the effort. Yet he is careful: the realized one is like a servant shown the master's full treasury; he may see and use it, but it is not his own possession to hoard. The fruit is that craving is burned away and a true, steady authority enters him, so that, without striving, his very presence and word govern, his gaze resting over all heads.

Metaphor, the open shop of the Name

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The goods have been stocked the capital has been invested, and the shop has been opened. Whatever anyone needs, at any time, is ready and available at hand.

The finest, the middling, and the ordinary have all been sorted. Says Tuka, I sit in this shop, displaying wares and naming each one's worth.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The goods are stocked, the capital put in, the shop opened. Whatever anyone needs, at any time, is ready right here at hand. The finest, the middling, and the plainest have all been sorted out. Tuka says: I sit in this shop, showing the wares and naming each one's worth.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures himself as a shopkeeper whose merchandise is the teaching, freely laid out. The shop is stocked and open, ready to supply whatever anyone needs at any time, with nothing hidden away. He has sorted the goods into best, middling, and plain, meeting each seeker at the level he can take. He says he simply sits there displaying the wares and naming their true value, leaving the choosing to those who come.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the infant's lips meet the breast, the mother's milk flows forth. Both are delighted; love and play fulfill each longing.

When body presses against body, the color of love deepens. Says Tuka, all the weight, the whole heavy burden, rests upon the mother's head.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the baby's lips touch the breast, the mother lets her milk flow. Both are glad; love and play fill each one's longing. As body presses against body, the color of love deepens. Tuka says: all the weight, the whole heavy load, rests on the mother's head.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram draws God's care in the image of a nursing mother. The infant only has to reach for the breast and the milk comes; the bond satisfies both child and mother in delight. As the two press close, the love between them only grows richer. The point of the figure is the last line: the whole burden of caring, the entire heavy load, falls on the mother and not on the helpless child, just as the devotee may rest his whole weight on God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

No one has ever dignified a fault. From the very beginning, this has been the established conduct of the wise.

To announce only the name of the weak is not truthful speech. Liquor and honey may share a common name, but should one consume liquor on that basis? Says Tuka, my leftover food becomes sacred offering. Let the distinction between unity and difference be made fairly, like rain that falls equally upon all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

No one has ever given a fault a place of honor. From of old this has been the conduct of the wise. To beat the drum only against the name of the weak is not honest speech. Liquor and honey may go by one common name, but should you drink the liquor on that account? Tuka says: my leftover food becomes a holy offering. Let unity and difference be told apart fairly, like rain that falls the same on all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram defends honest discernment against both flattery and cheap attack. He insists no wise tradition has ever dignified a real fault, and equally that loudly shaming only the weak while sparing the powerful is not truthful speech. His example: two things sharing a single name, like an intoxicant and honey, are not therefore the same, so you must not swallow the harmful one just because the word is shared. He asks that the line between true sameness and real difference be drawn fairly and impartially, the way rain falls alike on everyone, the call is to clear sight, not to contempt.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I know the principle that God dwells in all beings. I release my goods freely; let each one recognize the quality for himself.

Instruction should be given after discerning the readiness of the student; otherwise it becomes harmful. Says Tuka, those who stray from the path will find only thorns on the byroads.

IN PLAIN WORDS

God dwells in all beings: this is the sign I know. I let my goods go freely; let each one find for himself what they are worth. Instruction should be given only after weighing the fault, the unreadiness, in the hearer; else it does harm. Tuka says: those who miss the road find only thorns on the wild byways.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram holds together two truths about teaching. He starts from the principle that God lives in every being, so he offers his teaching openly and lets each person discover its worth for himself. Yet he warns that instruction must be fitted to the hearer; given to one not ready for it, weighed first for what would harm him, the same words can do damage instead of good. The closing image makes the stakes plain: a seeker who strays from the proper path does not wander free but lands among thorns in the trackless wild.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For us this is sport; to the world we give its proper teaching. Those who stumble are corrected.

What harm can come from serving under one master's command? Why should we be troubled by the anger of the world? Ignorance has no foothold here. The names Rama and Krishna are our arrows.

Says Tuka, there is no market here for counterfeit goods; they will not pass muster.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For us this is sport: to give the world its right teaching, and to set straight those who stumble. What harm comes from working under one master's command? Why should we be troubled by the world's anger? Ignorance has no labor to do here. The names Rama and Krishna are our arrows. Tuka says: here there is no sale for false goods; unlike elsewhere, the counterfeit will not pass.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes his work and what shields him in it. Teaching the world rightly and correcting those who go astray is, for him, a kind of joyful play, not a burden. Serving under God's single command, he feels no harm in it and refuses to be shaken by the world's displeasure. Ignorance gains no foothold where the names of Rama and Krishna are wielded like arrows; and in this place, unlike the ordinary market, nothing false or counterfeit can be passed off as real.

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

An ugly person is offended by the mirror; seeing purity, the impure become angry. Such is the effect of faults: what is straight appears crooked.

What use is a diamond to a blind person? To him it is just another pebble. Says Tuka, a dog barks without knowing who stands there.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The ugly one is shamed by the mirror; seeing what is pure, the impure grows angry. Such is the harm of faults: what is straight looks crooked. What use is a diamond to a blind man? To him it is just like a pebble. Tuka says: a dog barks, not knowing who stands there.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram explains why goodness so often draws hostility. A person carrying faults is like an ugly face shamed by a mirror, or an impure heart angered by the sight of purity; the defect in the seer makes the straight thing look bent. He adds that the blind cannot tell a diamond from a gravel stone, and a dog barks at whoever passes without knowing who it is. The figures all point the same way, and inward: the failure to recognize what is true and good lies in the flaw of the one looking, not in the thing seen.

GATHA 0828 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the wicked guest

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If they do not like it, why do these quarrelsome ones come here with darkened faces? In their company, all sweetness is destroyed. O Narayana, at the table of the wicked, all is spoiled.

A dog fouls delicacies from its mouth; it contaminates fine food with its filth. Says Tuka, the one who does not respect the honor of the saints, his own slander becomes his greatest shame.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If they do not like it, why do these quarrelers come here with their faces gone black? In their company all the sweetness is ruined. O Narayana, at the table of the wicked everything is spoiled. A dog drags foul filth out of its mouth; it defiles fine food. Tuka says: the one who keeps no respect for the saints, his own slander turns back as his shame.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing what one bitter, contemptuous person does to a gathering. The quarreler arrives unwilling, dark-faced, and his presence sours the whole table, the way a dog fouls good food it has touched. The frame the poem leaves unspoken is that the table here is the company of the saints and the sweetness is satsang itself. Tukaram names the real cost: the slanderer who shows no reverence for holy people does not bring them down, he only fouls what he eats and brings disgrace back on himself. The warning is for the listener to examine his own scorn before he carries it into good company.

GATHA 0829 The Nature of God

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A father guards and preserves his wealth for his child, showing the heir all that has been earned. In just that way, we have been protected.

Death has never been allowed to stand in the way. Nourishment lies close at hand, like a mother's breast near the hungry infant; there is no separate anxiety about finding a remedy.

Says Tuka, he called out from the far bank, and Panduranga leapt in to save him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A father guards his wealth for his child and shows the heir all he has earned. In just that way I have been kept. Death has never been let to stand in my way. Food is close at hand, like a mother's breast near the hungry baby; there is no separate worry about finding a cure. Tuka says: I called out from the far bank, and Panduranga leapt in to save me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the kind of care God gives, using two everyday pictures. God is the father who hoards nothing back but shows the child the whole inheritance, and the mother whose milk is already there before the infant's hunger becomes a problem. The point is that the devotee never has to scheme for his own rescue; the remedy waits closer than the need. He ends with the stark image of himself stranded on the far bank, and Panduranga not calling instructions across but leaping into the water to bring him over. The claim is that grace acts first and acts completely.

GATHA 0830 True Worship

True worship, the free secret

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Pure conduct itself is the worship of the saints. It does not cost any wealth or money.

In the manner of the devotee in form, those who are at rest in form come on their own to observe and appreciate. Grace overflows in kirtan itself; closeness is experienced even from a distance.

Says Tuka, I tell you the secret freely: set your mind upon your own spiritual good.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Pure living is itself the worship of the saints. It costs no wealth, no money. Where there is a devotee in form, those at rest in form come on their own to look and to bless. In the kirtan itself the flood of grace overflows; nearness is felt even across distance. Tuka says: I am telling you the secret freely. Turn your mind toward your own good.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is correcting a common assumption that worshipping holy people takes expensive offerings. He says the real offering is a clean life, and it is free. When a true devotee lives that way, God in form and the saints come of their own accord to witness and to pour out grace, and the singing of God's praise is enough to close the distance between the soul and the Lord. He stresses that he is handing this over plainly, not hiding it as some costly initiation. The closing line lands the stakes: this is for your own benefit, so set your mind to it.

GATHA 0831 The Moral Ideal

Moral counsel, reading the heart and the hour

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे कळे वचनें चांचणी । काय बोलवूनि वेळोवेळां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Loving attentiveness means knowing what is in another's heart. Stubbornness and willfulness are inauspicious.

When the mind is constricted, nothing of value can be accomplished. The greatest madness is simply the right behavior at the right time.

Nothing is palatable before its season; the proper moment has been arranged by design. Says Tuka, one can test sincerity through words, by drawing a person out again and again in conversation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To love someone is to know what is in their heart. Stubbornness and willfulness are foul things. When the mind is shut tight, nothing good can be done. The real madness is just doing the right thing at the right time. Nothing is to your taste before its season; the proper moment is set by design. Tuka says: sincerity is known through words, by drawing a person out again and again in talk.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is giving practical counsel on how to live rightly with others. Real affection is not indulgence but attentiveness: you take the trouble to know what another truly carries inside, while obstinacy and a closed mind ruin everything. He turns the word madness on its head, saying the only worthwhile intensity is fitting your action to its right moment, since things have their appointed season. The last verse points to discernment: you test whether a person is sincere not by one word but by drawing them out in conversation over and over. The poem asks the listener to cultivate patience, openness, and a careful reading of both heart and timing.

GATHA 0832 The Moral Ideal

Moral warning, lust and greed

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे वेसनें दोन्ही । नर्कखाणी भोगावया ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who is overcome with lust loses all taste and babbles senselessly. Whatever has taken hold of the body shows itself outwardly; it flings poison at others in its frenzy.

Obsession with wealth drives one mad; that babbling will not be calmed. Says Tuka, both of these addictions are mines of hell, meant to be suffered.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The man sick with lust loses all taste and babbles nonsense. Whatever has gripped his body shows itself; in his frenzy he flings poison at others. Hunger for wealth drives a man mad, and that babbling will not be stilled. Tuka says: both of these cravings are mines of hell, made to be suffered.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets two cravings side by side, lust and greed, and shows them as the same disease. Each one takes over the body and spills out as senseless, poisonous talk that the person cannot stop. The picture is of a mind no longer its own, ruled by what has seized it. He names the stakes flatly: both are mines that dig straight into hell, yielding only suffering. The poem points not at one named sinner but at the pattern itself, so the listener watches for these obsessions taking root in his own life.

GATHA 0833 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, cleared sight and rest

मराठी मूळ

कृष्णांजनें जाले सोज्वळ लोचन । तेणें दिले वान निवडुनी ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The eyes, anointed with divine collyrium, have become clear. By that vision, all things have been sorted and distinguished.

With the measuring cup of the Lord's instruction, I handle the goods. Narayana Himself has made each thing sweet in its own way.

When one works faithfully in the house of the fortunate, the task naturally succeeds. Says Tuka, the belly is filled, the burden is properly settled; now rest in your own true place, in your original home.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My eyes, anointed with the dark salve of Krishna, have become clear. By that sight I have sorted out what is true from what is not. With the measuring cup of the Lord's word I handle the goods; Narayana himself has made each thing sweet in its own way. When you work in faith in the house of the fortunate, the task comes right of itself. Tuka says: the belly is filled, the load is set down well; now rest in your own true place, your own first home.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing what happens after grace clears the inner sight. The eye salve is the Lord's own touch, and once the eyes are clear he can tell the real from the false and weigh everything by God's word rather than his own appetite. Working in trust in the house of the fortunate, meaning in God's keeping or among the saints, the work simply succeeds without his striving. The poem ends in deep rest: the hunger satisfied, the burden laid down, the soul settling back into its original home, which is God. The unspoken frame is that this peace is not earned by labor but received once the seeing is healed.

GATHA 0834 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the divine thief of hearts

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This enchanter has come to Pandhari, carrying the snare of love in His hands. He has captivated the whole world and leads them on, never letting anyone trace His path.

Raising His arms, He draws people with a single glance. He has moved His dwelling from Vaikuntha and established it in Pandhari.

Pundalika gave this thief safe passage and brought Him here. Says Tuka, come, let us all join hands and catch Him together.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This enchanter has come to Pandhari, the snare of love in his hands. He has cheated the whole world and leads it on, never letting anyone find his track. He raises his arms and pulls people in with a single glance. He has moved his home from Vaikuntha and set it up here for Pandhari's sake. Pundalika gave this thief safe passage and brought him here. Tuka says: come, you and I, let us all join hands and catch him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram plays with the image of God as a charming thief who steals hearts. Vitthal has come to Pandhari carrying a noose, but the noose is love, and with one look from his upraised arms he draws people to himself and leaves no trail to follow. The astonishing turn is that the Lord has abandoned even Vaikuntha, his own heaven, to dwell here, and it was the devotee Pundalika who brought this thief in. The closing invitation reverses the chase with delight: rather than fleeing the one who captures us, let us all band together and catch him. The whole poem makes surrender to God sound like joyful conspiracy.

GATHA 0835 The Nature of God

Nature of God, the mother who plays at quarrels

मराठी मूळ

भांडवी माउली कवतुकें बाळा । आपणा सकळां सिक्षत्वेसीं ॥1॥
माझी माझी ह्मणे एकएकां मारी । हें तों नाहीं दुरी उभयतां ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A mother playfully sets her children quarreling, watching as a witness to them all. "Mine, mine," she says, making each one hit the other, though in truth there is no distance between any of them.

"You have little; I have much more." Such petty disputes and squabbles are all false. Says Tuka, the secret lies in one place alone, and that is what puts an end to all strife.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A mother sets her children squabbling for fun, watching them all as a witness. "Mine, mine," she makes them say, setting each to strike the other, though in truth there is no distance between any of them. "You have a little; I have far more." Such fussing and false disputes. Tuka says: the secret lies in one single place, and that alone ends all the strife.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures God as a mother who playfully eggs her children into rivalry while she watches, untroubled, knowing they are all one family. The children fight over mine and yours, who has more, but their quarrels are make-believe, because no real separation divides them. The frame the poem supplies is the world of "mine" and "more," all our possessive disputes, seen as a game God watches from within. The teaching lands in the last line: there is one place, one truth, where this difference dissolves, and finding it is what ends every quarrel. The listener is asked to see through the game of separateness to the single ground beneath it.

GATHA 0836 Worldly Life

Worldly life, hoarding and waking

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I had been caught in the snare of false hopes. Through worthless pride I had become a vessel for blame.

But now my vision has cleared; otherwise I was in misery. The whole creation groans under such follies.

There was no awareness of death; the mind was driven by greed. It never turns back, never retreats.

One hoards wealth and then dies, leaving only quarrels among the children. Says Tuka, Narayana was never once remembered.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I had been caught in false hopes, fallen into the whirlpool. Through empty pride I had made myself fit for blame. Now my sight has opened well; otherwise I was in misery. The whole world cries out under just these follies. There was no awareness of death; the mind ran after greed and never once turned back. A man hoards wealth and then dies, leaving only quarrels among his children. Tuka says: Narayana was never once remembered.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks back on his own near miss with the trap most people never escape. He had been spun in the whirlpool of false hope and hollow pride until something opened his eyes; he says plainly that without that he would still be wretched, and that the whole world groans under the same follies. The core blindness he names is forgetting death while greed drives the mind forward with no turning back. The bitter end of that life is a man who dies clutching his hoard, leaving his children only something to fight over, having never once remembered God. The poem points the listener at his own forgetfulness, asking whether his days are spent storing wealth or remembering Narayana.

GATHA 0837 The Power of the Name

The Name, treasure at the lips

मराठी मूळ

जवळी मुखापाशीं । असतां नेघे अहनिनशीं ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे ठेवा । कां हा न करी चि बरवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It is right here, near your very lips, yet you will not take it, day or night. The Name destroys worldly existence; chanting "Vitthal, Vitthal" annihilates all lust and desire.

When comfort lies next door, why refuse to make your home there? Says Tuka, why does no one recognize this treasure and make good use of it?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It is right here, near your very lips, and still you will not take it, day or night. The Name burns up worldly existence; saying "Vitthal, Vitthal" destroys all craving. When comfort lives right next door, why refuse to make your home there? Tuka says: why does no one see this treasure and put it to good use?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is astonished at how close the remedy lies and how stubbornly people leave it untaken. The Name of God is already at the mouth, free and constant, yet day and night people will not speak it. He states what it does: chanting "Vitthal, Vitthal" consumes the cycle of worldly existence and dissolves desire at the root. He frames it as a house of comfort standing right next door, a treasure within arm's reach, and the only mystery is human refusal. The poem presses the listener with the plain question of why one would walk past such a gift instead of taking it up.

GATHA 0838 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the pilgrimage rewarded

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What a blessed pilgrimage this has been. What words can express it? Gain has doubled upon gain; the soul is satisfied by this holy sight.

By great fortune the meeting with saints has taken place; the longing I carried in my heart has been fulfilled. Says Tuka, all the effort I have made has finally come to fruition.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What a blessed journey this has been. What words can say it? Gain has doubled on gain; the soul is filled by the holy sight. By great fortune the meeting with the saints has come about; the longing I carried in my heart is fulfilled. Tuka says: all the effort I made has at last come to fruit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is overflowing after a pilgrimage and a meeting with the saints, and admits words cannot hold the joy. The gain keeps multiplying, and the darshan, the holy sight, leaves the soul satisfied rather than still wanting. The unspoken frame is that he had carried a long inner longing for this company, and now it has been answered. He closes by naming the whole arc: the effort and hardship of the path were not wasted, they have ripened into this fruit. The poem is the relief and gratitude of a seeker whose striving has finally landed.

GATHA 0839 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, joy beyond words at the saints' feet

मराठी मूळ

सांगतां हें नये सुख । कीर्ती मुख न पुरे ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This joy cannot be told in words; singing His glory, the mouth is never satisfied. Let us partake of it with love, holding what is in the heart within the heart itself.

When one tries to compare this gain, what likeness is worthy of it? Says Tuka, I have not lifted my head; I have kept it placed at the feet of the saints.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This joy cannot be told; singing his glory, the mouth is never satisfied. Let us taste it with love, holding what is in the heart within the heart itself. When you look for something to compare this gain to, what beauty is its match? Tuka says: I have not lifted my head; I have laid it at the feet of the saints.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is trying, and gladly failing, to describe a joy that has no words and a praise the mouth can never exhaust. He counsels savoring it inwardly with love, keeping the heart's experience held within the heart rather than spending it in talk. When he reaches for a comparison, nothing in the world is fine enough to stand beside this gain. The poem ends in the posture that holds it all: he has not raised his head in pride or even to look, he has simply laid it down at the feet of the saints. The unspoken claim is that this surrender is itself the place where the unspeakable joy is found.

GATHA 0840 Devotion to Vitthal

Joy of arrival, the body offered

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let each one claim their own share and fill their vessel with Vitthal. What fortune that I have reached this holy place.

Now let my body be an offering. When will such an occasion arise again? After many days this chance has come.

Says Tuka, this union has been won. I will not leave His feet for a single moment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let each one take their own share. Let everyone fill their vessel with this Vitthal. What good fortune, that I have reached this place. Now let my body be the offering. When will such a moment come to me again? After so many days, this chance has come at last. Tuka says: this union is won. I will not let go of his feet for even one moment.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is standing where he longed to stand, and he names both the gift and his answer to it. Vitthal is not a private hoard; he tells everyone to come and fill their own vessel. For himself, having reached this holy place, the only fitting return is to lay down his own body as the offering. He treats the moment as rare and not to be wasted, a chance that came after long waiting. Now that the union is finally his, he refuses to loosen his hold on the feet for a single instant.

My fortune has blazed bright; all worry has been dispelled. Through the sight of the saints, this gain has been won: Padmanabha has been found.

I will seal this treasure within the chest of my heart and store it safely. Says Tuka, the treasure that always existed has now been found through this pure devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My fortune has blazed up bright. Now all my worry is gone. Through the sight of the saints, this gain came: Padmanabha is found. I will make my heart into a chest and shut this treasure safely inside it. Tuka says: the treasure was always there. Through this love, it has been found.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the moment of finding God as a sudden clearing of all anxiety. He credits it to the sight of the saints, whose company gave him Padmanabha, the Lord. Having found this, he wants to keep it the way one keeps a treasure, sealing it inside the heart so it cannot be lost. The last line turns the finding inside out: the treasure was never absent, it was there all along, and what changed was that pure devotion finally laid hold of it.

Lost at sea, a cry for the pilot

मराठी मूळ

आह्मां आपुलें नावडे संचित । चरफडी चित्त कळवळ्यानें ॥1॥
न कळतां जाला खोळंब मारगा । जगीं जालों जगा बहुरूपी ॥ध्रु.॥
कळों आलें बरें उघडले डोळे । कर्णधार मिळे तरि बरें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे व्हाल ऐकत करुणा । तरि नारायणा उडी घाला ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am not pleased with my own destiny. My heart is agitated by this world's sharp edges.

Without understanding, I stumbled and lost my way, becoming a many-faced player in the world's theater. But now my eyes have opened and I see clearly.

If only a pilot could be found to steer me right. Says Tuka, if you will hear this cry of compassion, O Narayana, then take the plunge and come.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am not pleased with what my past has earned me. My heart frets at the sharp edges of this world. Without seeing it, my road got blocked. In this world I became a man of many faces. Now I have understood; my eyes are open. If only a pilot would come to steer me, that would be good. Tuka says: if you will listen to this cry, then Narayana, leap in and save me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram confesses he is unhappy with his own lot and torn by the harshness of worldly life. He admits that, without noticing, he lost his way and became a many-faced player, fitting a different face to each situation. The change is that his eyes are now open: he sees the trouble clearly and knows he cannot steer himself out of it. So he asks for a helmsman, and the helmsman he wants is God; he begs Narayana to hear his cry and dive in to pull him out.

Social criticism, the incorrigible glutton

मराठी मूळ

बरगासाटीं खादलें शेण । मिळतां अन्न न संडी ॥1॥
फजित तो केला आहे । ताडण साहे गौरव ॥ध्रु.॥
ओढाळाची ओंगळ ओढी । उगी खोडी नवजाय ॥2॥
तुका फजीत करी बुच्या। विसरे कुच्या खोडी तेणें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For lack of proper food he ate dung, but once real grain was found, he would not give it up. He has already been shamed and humiliated; he endured beatings but also received honor.

A glutton's greed is filthy and incorrigible; his bad habits simply will not cease. Says Tuka, he makes a spectacle of the stubborn ones and shames them, yet even by that they do not forget their old ways.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For lack of food he ate dung. But once real grain came, he would not give it up. He has already been shamed. He took the beatings, and he took the honor too. A glutton's pull is filthy and dragging. The bad habit simply will not leave him. Tuka says: he makes a public spectacle of the stubborn ones and shames them, yet even by that they do not forget their old ways.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram paints a picture of a person ruled by appetite and uses it to expose a pattern in all of us. The eater started on dung out of need, but then clung to grabbing food even when good grain was offered, the habit outliving the reason for it. Public shame, beatings, even occasional honor, nothing reaches him; the craving is incorrigible. The warning is for the listener too: a fixed habit can survive every embarrassment and correction, so the work is to watch the pull itself, not just to mock the one who is dragged by it.

Longing for the Mother, unbearable separation

मराठी मूळ

धांव घालीं आई । आतां पाहातेसी काई ॥1॥
धीर नाहीं माझे पोटीं । जालें वियोगें हिंपुटीं ॥ध्रु.॥
करावें सीतळ । बहु जाली हळहळ ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे डोई । कधीं ठेवीन हे पायीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Rush to me, O Mother. What are you waiting for? I have no patience left within me; separation has made me utterly forlorn.

Cool this burning pain; the anguish has grown unbearable. Says Tuka, when will I lay this head at Your feet?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Come running, O Mother. What are you waiting for now? There is no patience left inside me. This separation has worn me down. Cool this burning. The ache has grown too great. Tuka says: when will I lay this head down at your feet?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram cries out to God as Mother, demanding she stop delaying and come at once. He says he has no patience left and that being apart has worn him to nothing. The pain is a burning he begs her to cool, because the ache has passed what he can bear. The poem ends not in despair but in one waiting question: when will he finally rest his head at her feet, which is the only thing that would end the longing.

GATHA 0845 The Nature of God

Gratitude, the rescue of nothing

मराठी मूळ

तुह्मां ठावा होता देवा । माझें अंतरींचा हेवा ॥1॥
होती काशानें सुटका । तरि हे वैकुंठनायका ॥ध्रु.॥
नसतें सांभिाळलें। जरि तुह्मीं आश्वासिलें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कृपाळुवा । बरवा केला सावाधावा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You knew all along, O God, the longing hidden within my heart. How could there have been any escape from that? O Lord of Vaikuntha, tell me.

You rescued me even when there was nothing real to rescue, simply because You had given me assurance. Says Tuka, O merciful One, You made a fine rescue indeed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You knew it all along, O God. You knew the longing hidden in my heart. By what means could I ever have escaped it? Tell me, Lord of Vaikuntha. There was nothing real in me to guard, yet you guarded me, because you had given me your word. Tuka says: O merciful one, you made a fine rescue.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram marvels that God saw the secret longing in his heart before he could even voice it, and that there was never any way for him to wriggle free of it. He puts the question to the Lord of Vaikuntha as half wonder, half complaint. The strange grace he names is that God protected him when there was nothing worth protecting, doing it simply to keep his own promise. So the closing line is plain gratitude: the merciful one carried out the rescue beautifully, and the saving was all God's doing, not his own merit.

GATHA 0846 Devotion to Vitthal

Adoration, the incomparable Lord

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What comparison can I offer You with love, O Purushottama?

Looking carefully, who in all three worlds resembles You, O Father of all?

This voice of mine is rough and harsh; yet taken into the ears, it turns sweet.

Says Tuka, with love He plays; let these celebrations of joy be fulfilled.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What likeness shall I offer you, with love, O Purushottama? Look as I will, who in the three worlds is like you, Father of all? This voice of mine is rough. Yet taken into the ear, it turns sweet. Tuka says: with love he plays. Let these celebrations of joy be fulfilled.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram wants to praise God with a comparison and finds none, because nothing in the three worlds resembles Purushottama, the Father of all. He knows his own poetry is rough and unpolished, but he trusts that love makes it sweet once it reaches the listening ear, so the lack of skill is no barrier. Behind the praise is a sense that God himself plays in this exchange, delighting in the devotee's offering. The poem closes as a wish that this play of joy go on and be completed.

Longing, the soul gone ahead to the feet

मराठी मूळ

दर्शनाची आस । आतां ना साहे उदास ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The longing for darshan can no longer endure this separation.

My soul has already gone to Your feet; only this body remains here.

Nothing else is remembered; what has settled in its place will not be dislodged.

Says Tuka, while the soul still lingers, it has been arrested right where it stands.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The longing for darshan can bear this no more. The sadness is too much now. My soul has already gone to your feet. Only this body stays here. Nothing else comes to mind. What has settled in that place will not be moved. Tuka says: while the soul still lingers there, Tuka stands here, arrested where he is.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a longing for the sight of God that has reached its limit and can no longer endure the separation. He feels his very soul has already traveled ahead to God's feet, leaving only his body behind. With the soul fixed there, nothing else can enter his attention; what has lodged at the feet cannot be dislodged. The result is a man held in place, stopped and unable to move, because the deepest part of him is already gone where he wants to be.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have placed a stone over all worldly enjoyment. I have brought death to death itself.

You pervade the universe; am I something separate? Why should I now exert any force?

What should I push outside, and what should I bring within? Even if we argue, only dry debate remains; why forcibly take on the suffering of a dream?

All goods have come to Your house, O Lord; the laborer is owed his daily wage.

Says Tuka, I know nothing of profit or loss. Let the Master guard His own estate.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have laid a stone over all worldly pleasure. I have brought death to death itself. You fill the whole universe. Am I something apart from you? Why should I strain with force now? What is there to push outside, and what to bring within? Even if I try, only dry argument is left. Why take on, by force, the suffering of a dream? All the goods have come to your house, Lord. The laborer is owed his daily wage. Tuka says: I know nothing of profit or loss. Let the Master keep watch over his own estate.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram declares he has shut the lid on worldly enjoyment and even put an end to death by giving up the self that dies. His reasoning is that God pervades everything, so he is not a separate someone who must struggle to push pleasures out or pull goods in. Such effort would only be empty debate, like fighting the hardships of a dream as if they were real. So he hands the whole concern over: the goods belong to God's house, and he is content to be the hired laborer waiting for his wage. Knowing nothing of gain and loss, he leaves the Master to guard his own estate, which is the posture of complete surrender.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Has Death come between us, to work mischief against us? Has some difficulty of understanding arisen? What strange riddle is this?

Why do You not arrange for us to meet? Have You harbored duality within You, O God?

Is my transgression too great, or have You grown weak? Have You lost the power You once had?

Has Your treasury gone bankrupt? Are You bound in chains by some debt?

Says Tuka, why have You made such a tangle? Separate clearly what is Yours and what is mine.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why has death come and stood between us, to do us harm? Why has some trouble of thought fallen on you? What strange riddle is this? Why will you not arrange for us to meet? Have you taken some duality into your heart, O God? Is my sin too great, or have you grown weak? Have you lost the strength you used to have? Has your treasury gone bankrupt? Are you tied down, bound by some debt? Tuka says: why have you made such a tangle? Sort out clearly what is yours and what is mine.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram, kept from the meeting he longs for, presses God with a chain of half-teasing questions, the way a lover badgers the beloved who stays away. He runs through every possible cause for the delay: has death blocked the road, has God grown troubled, has he started seeing them as two and not one, is his own sin the obstacle, or has God somehow weakened, gone broke, fallen into debt. None of these is offered as a real charge; together they expose how absurd any excuse for the distance is. The closing demand is for clarity: untangle this knot and settle, once and for all, what belongs to you and what to me.

GATHA 0850 Prayers

Prayer, austerities offered for one gift

मराठी मूळ

काय देह घालूं करवती करमरी । टाकुं या भितरी अग्नीमाजी ॥1॥
काय सेवूं वन शीत उष्ण तान । साहों कीं मोहन धरुनी बैसों ॥ध्रु.॥
काय लावूं अंगीं भस्म उधळण । हिंडूं देश कोण खुंट चारी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे काय करावा उपाव । ऐसा देई भाव पांडुरंगा ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Should I saw this body to pieces, or fling it into fire?

Should I endure the forest's cold and heat and thirst, or sit fixed, holding to Mohan?

Should I smear ash over my body and wander to the four corners of the earth?

Says Tuka, what remedy shall I try? O Panduranga, just grant me that very bhav.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Shall I put this body to the saw, or fling it into the fire? Shall I live in the forest, bearing cold and heat and thirst, or sit holding fast to Mohan? Shall I smear ash on my limbs and wander to all four corners of the land? Tuka says: what remedy shall I try? Just give me that one love, O Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out the whole catalog of hard penances a seeker might attempt: cutting the body, throwing it into fire, enduring the forest's extremes, sitting in fixed meditation, smearing on ash and wandering everywhere. He raises each one only to ask whether any of them is the right remedy. The answer the poem points to is that none of these austerities is what he needs. What he begs Panduranga for instead is bhav, true devotion, the one inward gift that all the outward hardships could never earn.

GATHA 0851 Confession and Sin

Confession, the trap of pretense

मराठी मूळ

दंभें कीतिन पोट भरे मानी जन । स्वहित कारण नव्हे कांहीं ॥1॥
अंतरती तुझे पाय मज दुरी । धरितां हे थोरी जाणिवेची ॥ध्रु.॥

कैसा करूं घात आपुला आपण । धरूनि गुमान लोकलाज ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे मज दावी तो सोहोळा । देखें पाय डोळां तुझे देवा ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Through pretense one may fill the belly and win the world's respect, but none of it serves one's true welfare.

Your feet grow distant from me when I cling to the pride of being a knower.

The sense-desires that arise from nursing this body are claimants against me from within my own self.

How can I bring about my own destruction by clinging to vanity and the fear of public opinion?

Says Tuka, show me that celebration. Let my eyes behold Your feet, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Through pretense, fame and a full belly come, and people honor me. But none of it serves my real good. Your feet move far from me when I hold on to the pride of being a knower. The desires bred by pampering this body run loose; they are claimants against me from inside my own self. How can I work my own ruin like this, clinging to vanity and the fear of what people will say? Tuka says: show me that celebration. Let my eyes see your feet, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram confesses the quiet danger of religious show: putting on a pious front does win food, reputation, and respect, yet it does nothing for his actual welfare. Worse, the pride of posing as a knower pushes God's feet further away. He sees that the appetites he feeds by indulging the body have turned into enemies pressing their claims from within. He asks how he can keep ruining himself for the sake of vanity and the fear of public opinion, and turns the whole confession into a single plea: drop the act, and let his eyes simply behold God's feet.

GATHA 0852 The Moral Ideal

Adoration, the worth of the master

मराठी मूळ

धिग जिणें त्याचा स्वामी हीन वर । मरण तें बर भलें मग ॥1॥
ऐका जी देवा ऐसी आहे नीत । काय तें उचित सांभाळावें ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Cursed is the life of one whose master is degraded. Better then is death.

Listen, O God, this is the rightful order. What is fitting must be honored.

In a land where a great king's word commands awe, even his dog is treated well.

Says Tuka, why has this plain truth come to mind? Knowing this, may You recognize what I am to You.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A life is a curse when its master is low. Better to die than to live like that. Listen, O God, this is how it rightly works; what is fitting must be honored. In a land where a great king's word strikes fear from country to country, even his dog is treated well. Tuka says: why has this plain truth come to me? Knowing it, know in Your heart what I am to You.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures the servant by the master, and makes God measure Himself the same way. A servant of a degraded lord lives a wretched life; better to die. But a great king's reputation lifts even the lowest creature in his household, so that even his dog is honored. Tukaram presses the point home: he is God's servant, so let God see what that makes Tukaram, and treat him as belonging to a great Lord. The argument is also a prayer, asking God to honor the bond by honoring the one who depends on it.

GATHA 0853 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the pampered children

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now I will sing to You auspicious songs and raise a joyous clamor of sacred stories.

You are the remover of all that troubles us: fear, anguish, sin, and merit alike.

Whatever experiences we have lived through, we will lay them at Your account. In this world we will remain unattached and free.

Says Tuka, we are Your pampered children; we cannot endure a moment's separation from Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now I will sing You auspicious songs and raise a joyous din of sacred stories. You remove all that troubles us: fear, anguish, sin and merit alike. Whatever we have lived through, we lay it at Your account; in this world we stay unattached and free. Tuka says: we are Your pampered children. We cannot bear a moment away from Your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets devotion in the key of song and noise, the loud kirtan of Hari's stories. He claims that God takes away everything that weighs a person down, not only fear and anguish and sin but merit too, since clinging to one's good deeds also binds. So he refuses to carry his own record: he charges every experience to God's account and stays free inside the world. The closing image is intimate and bold. The devotees are spoiled children who simply will not endure separation from God's feet, and that refusal is itself their claim on Him.

GATHA 0854 The Saints

Saints, the longing fulfilled

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All joys have gathered here today. I have beheld the lotus feet of the saints.

I had been remembering them in my mind at all times, and now, at last, that longing has been fulfilled.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All joys have gathered here today. I have seen the lotus feet of the saints. I was remembering them in my mind at every hour, and now, at last, that longing is full.

WHAT IT MEANS

This short abhanga is the moment of meeting after long waiting. Tukaram says every joy has come together in one place, and the place is the feet of the saints, now before his eyes. He had been holding them in mind constantly, carrying an unsatisfied hunger. To see the saints in person is what finally fills that hunger to the brim. For Tukaram the company of holy people is not a lesser blessing; it is where all the joys arrive at once.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Vitthal is my kinsman, my companion, my friend. Vitthal has seated Himself within my chitta.

Vitthal has pervaded my body and my being. Vitthal is my own shadow following me.

Vitthal has settled on my tongue; it will not utter anything other than His Name.

Of all the senses, the mind is the chief, and even it meditates upon Vithoba alone.

Says Tuka, now I cannot be separated from this Vitthal even for a moment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Vitthal is my kinsman, my good companion, my friend; Vitthal has taken His seat in my mind. Vitthal has filled this body, this whole frame; Vitthal is my own shadow, mine to me. Vitthal sits on the tip of my tongue; it will speak nothing else, nothing other. Of all the senses the mind is chief, and even it meditates on Vithoba alone. Tuka says: now I cannot let this Vitthal slip from me for a moment.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lists the places God has occupied until nothing is left over for anything else. Vitthal is his relative and friend, seated in his mind; Vitthal fills his body and follows him like his own shadow. The Name is on his tongue, which will say nothing else, and the mind, the ruler of all the senses, meditates on Vithoba alone. Sense by sense, the self is taken over from within. The result is total dependence: he can no longer let go of Vitthal even for an instant.

GATHA 0856 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, become a pilgrim

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Become a pilgrim. Go, go, and see Pandhari.

All pride will vanish and every longing will be fulfilled.

Says Tuka, the dark-hued Vitthal has taken His seat within my eyes.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Become a Varkari. Go, go and see Pandhari. Pride will not remain; every longing is filled. Tuka says: the dark Vitho has taken His seat in my eyes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram calls the listener onto the pilgrim road. Become a Varkari, he urges, and go to look upon Pandhari. He names what the journey does: it dissolves pride and satisfies every craving, because both are emptied out before the deity. Then he speaks from his own experience to seal the call. The dark-hued Vitthal now sits within his very eyes, which is what waits for anyone who goes.

GATHA 0857 Devotion to Vitthal

Pandhari, the place that purifies

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who goes to Pandhari forgets even mother and father.

One becomes entirely Panduranga, for He takes hold of the entire being.

Wealth and honor lose their value; one becomes indifferent to the body.

Says Tuka, that holy place instantly destroys all impurity.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One who goes to Pandhari forgets even mother and father. One becomes wholly Panduranga, who takes hold of the whole being. Wealth and honor lose their pull; toward the body one grows indifferent. Tuka says: that place destroys every impurity at once.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes what Pandhari does to the one who goes there. The pull of family loosens, even the deep ties to mother and father, because God takes possession of the whole person and the pilgrim becomes wholly Panduranga's. Wealth and honor stop mattering, and even attachment to the body falls away. The closing line names the power directly: simply being in that holy place burns off impurity at once, with no slow effort required.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By great effort and outward force I have fashioned a show of renunciation, but the inner letting go has not truly happened.

This is what comes to me daily in my own experience; my mind knows this report well.

The wakefulness I practice does not carry into dreams; I forget everything there.

My chitta has not come out from the grip of worldly concerns; it continues its habitual business day after day.

Says Tuka, like a painted actor: the outward show is complete, but within, everything remains the same.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By force, by an outward push, I have put on a show of renunciation; the inner letting go has not happened. This comes to me daily in my own experience; my mind knows this report well. What I keep awake to does not reach into dreams; there I forget all of it. My mind has not come out from the world's grip; it goes on with its old business every day. Tuka says: I am like a painted actor. The show outside is complete, and within it stays the same.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the satire on himself and confesses that his renunciation is staged. He has forced an outward appearance of giving up, but inside nothing has been let go, and he admits his own daily experience tells him so. The test he applies is sharp: what is real reaches even into sleep, yet his discipline vanishes in dreams, and his mind never actually leaves its worldly business. He names himself a bhorpi, a painted performer whose costume is perfect while the man underneath is unchanged. The abhanga asks the listener to apply the same honest test to their own piety.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I call myself a servant, but the conduct does not match. Inside and outside are two different things, with separate feelings.

I sing and dance, but that is only a display for people. True love for Narayana is not present in my being.

The secret of real attainment remains unknown to me. I have drowned in the deep pool of pretense.

Time has stolen this capital of life, moment by moment. My lifespan is being measured out.

Says Tuka, I appear to have been wasted. The world will laugh at this spectacle.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I call myself a servant, but the deeds do not match; inside and outside are two different things. I sing, I dance, I show it to people, but love for Narayana is not in me. The secret of true attainment I do not grasp at all; I have drowned in this deep pool of pretense. Time has carried off the capital of my life from hand to hand; my lifespan is being measured out. Tuka says: I look like one who has been wasted. The world will laugh at this spectacle.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram accuses himself of being a servant in name only, split between an outward act and an empty inside. His singing and dancing are a display for onlookers, while real love for Narayana is missing. He has not found the secret of true attainment and is sinking in a deep pool of pretense, even as time silently steals the capital of his life and his allotted days run down. He fears the verdict: a wasted life that the world will rightly mock. The poem turns the listener's eye to the gap between public devotion and the heart, and to how little time there is to close it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I do not know what remedy to apply so that my devotion remains fixed at Your feet.

When will You come and dwell within my heart? How can this ever come to pass, and by what means?

When will genuine contemplation of You remain steady within my mind? When will You bring this about, O God?

Remove all that is false in me, and come truly to abide within.

Says Tuka, protect this fallen one by Your own sovereign power, O Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Not knowing, what remedy can I use so that devotion stays at Your feet? When will You come and dwell in my heart? How can this ever happen, and by what means? When will true contemplation of You stay steady in my mind? When will You make it so, O God? Take away all that is false in me, and come truly to live within. Tuka says: protect this fallen one by Your own power, O Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays out of his own helplessness, confessing he does not know the method to keep his devotion fixed. He asks again and again when God will come and abide in his heart, since he cannot make steady contemplation happen by himself. He asks God to remove the falseness in him and to come truly inside in its place. The closing line lays the whole burden on God. He cannot save himself, so he asks Panduranga to protect a fallen man by God's own sovereign power, not by Tukaram's effort.

Nature of God, the one who reads the heart

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He knows what is wished for in the mind, and fulfills the inner longing by its signs.

Night or day, one cannot tell; the Deity plays within the body.

The one who has made a vow enjoys all nine rasas; nothing is withheld from them.

Says Tuka, He gives equally to all, standing with even feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He knows what is wished in the mind, and fulfills the inner longing by its signs. Night or day cannot be told apart; this Deity plays within the body. The one who has made his vow tastes all nine rasas; nothing is kept back from him. Tuka says: He gives to all alike, standing with even feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a God who needs no words because He already reads the heart. He knows the mind's wish and fulfills the inner longing from its hidden signs. He plays within the body so closely that day and night blur together, the ordinary markers of time falling away. To the one who has vowed himself to God, every flavor of experience is given freely, the full nine rasas with nothing withheld. The closing image of Vitthal standing with even feet says it plainly: He gives to everyone equally, with no favoritism.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There is no doubt of being redeemed for His servants.

Panduranga takes pride in them, the giver of jiva, tender as a new shoot.

When drowning in water or burning in fire, He rescues them in that very moment.

Says Tuka, He carries compassion for us within His very belly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There is no doubt of being saved for His servants; there is none at all. Panduranga takes pride in them, the giver of life, tender as a new shoot. When they drown in water or burn in fire, at that very moment He rescues them. Tuka says: for our sake He carries compassion in His very belly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram states the servant's security plainly: for those who belong to God there is no doubt of being saved. Panduranga is proud of His servants and is the giver of life, tender toward them as a fresh shoot. The promise is tested at the extreme. When they are drowning or burning, He saves them in that very instant, not after. The closing image makes the rescue come from love, not duty: God carries compassion for His own inside His very belly, the way a mother holds a child.

Devotion, the Name over renunciation

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे आह्मां ऐसा भरवसा । विठ्ठल सरसा चालतसे ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What do I know of renunciation? I know only the one Name of Vithoba.

Let us dance joyfully in the company of Vaishnavas, in the swirl of cymbals, in bliss.

What do I know of peace, forgiveness, or compassion, apart from the kirtan of Govinda?

Why should I be indifferent toward this body when I am immersed in an ocean of nectar?

Why should I seek solitude in the forest when bliss itself resides among the people?

Says Tuka, we have this firm confidence: Vitthal walks alongside us.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What do I know of renunciation? I know only the one Name of Vithoba. Let us dance in joy in the company of Vaishnavas, in the clash of cymbals, in bliss. What do I know of peace, forgiveness, or mercy, apart from the kirtan of Govinda? Why be indifferent to this body when I am drowned in an ocean of nectar? Why seek solitude in the forest when bliss itself lives among the people? Tuka says: this is our firm trust. Vitthal walks right alongside us.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the warm path of the Name above the cold disciplines of the renouncer. He claims no skill in renunciation, no separate practice of peace or forgiveness or mercy; he knows only the one Name and the kirtan of Govinda, danced out loud among the Vaishnavas. From there he answers the ascetic directly. Why mortify the body when devotion has already plunged him into an ocean of nectar, and why flee to the forest when bliss is found right in the midst of people. The ground of this confidence is the last line: Vitthal walks beside the devotee, so the company of God's people, not lonely austerity, is the road.

Praise of the Vaishnava land

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Where Vaishnavas dwell, that land is blessed and the country is holy.

There is no need of a remedy for any blemish; the messenger tells Yama himself to stay away.

Under the weight of the Garuda-standard processions, the earth resounds with cries of victory.

Naturally, on the tongues of those people: Govinda, Govinda.

Tulsi gardens and festive garlands of color: the full splendor of Vaikuntha itself.

Says Tuka, out of sheer fear, Death does not enter that domain.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Where the Vaishnavas live, that land is blessed; that country is holy. There is no need of any cure for sin there. The messenger tells Yama himself to keep away. Under the weight of the Garuda banners in procession, the earth roars with cries of victory. On those people's tongues, without effort: Govinda, Govinda. Tulsi groves and bright garlands of color. It is the whole festival of Vaikuntha. Tuka says: out of sheer fear, Death does not enter that domain.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praising the place where devotees of Vishnu gather and saying what such a place becomes. The land itself turns holy, and the usual machinery of judgment loses its grip: no remedy for sin is needed, and Yama's own messenger is told to stay away. He fills in the scene, the standards and processions, the constant Govinda on every tongue, the tulsi and the garlands, until the village looks like Vaikuntha brought down to earth. The claim he lands is that death itself is afraid to enter where the Name is sung; the company of the devout is not a comfort but a stronghold.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How wonderful is the love of my Vithoba. He Himself becomes both God and Guru.

With fond, embodied care He fulfills every deep longing, and in the end takes one to Himself.

He stands guard before and behind, watching over everything, warding off all approaching dangers.

He knows the yoga-kshema even of the dull and heavy ones, and leads them by the hand, showing the way.

Says Tuka, if the mind does not believe this, let it examine the Puranas and consider.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How wonderful is the love of my Vithoba. He himself becomes both God and Guru. With fond, bodily care he fulfills every longing, and in the end he takes one to himself. He stands guard in front and behind, watching over everything, warding off every blow that comes. He knows the needs even of the dull and heavy ones, and leads them by the hand, showing the way. Tuka says: if the mind does not believe this, let it look into the Puranas and consider.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the completeness of Vithoba's care and how rare it is. The same God is also the teacher; the one you adore is the one who instructs you, so there is no gap to be bridged by another. He describes a love that meets you on the bodily level where you actually live, satisfies your longings, and only at the end draws you fully home. He insists this guardian goes before and behind, takes responsibility for your welfare even when you are too dull to manage your own, and leads you by the hand. To the doubting mind he offers not argument but the witness of scripture: look, and see that this is so.

GATHA 0866 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the Name as whole dharma

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The Name of Vithoba is my entire dharma. I know no other secret.

Perhaps God has entrusted me to the saints; by their grace they show me mercy.

Says Tuka, what qualification do I have? Let that discernment come to me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All dharma, for me, is Vithoba's Name. I know no other secret than this. Perhaps God has handed me over to the saints, and out of this feeling they show me mercy. Tuka says: what qualification do I have? Let that discernment come to me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is reducing the whole of religious duty to a single thing: the Name of Vithoba. He claims no esoteric method and no learning; the Name is the only secret he knows. He guesses that God has entrusted him to the saints, and that their kindness to him flows from that, not from anything he has earned. The poem ends not in confidence but in an honest question about his own worthiness; he asks for the clear seeing that would let him understand by what right such grace is given to him at all.

GATHA 0867 Faith and Trust

Faith over cleverness

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Countless wise and learned debaters have tried, yet none can fathom the mystery of Vithoba.

Let them pile up endless words and fill volumes, yet they cannot know the greatness of Vithoba.

Says Tuka, without guilelessness, all cleverness is merely tiresome labor, an empty measure.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let the wise and the clever debaters be ever so many; still they cannot know the end of Vithoba. Let them pile up countless words and fill volumes; still they cannot know the greatness of Vithoba. Tuka says: without simple trust, all this knowing is only weariness, an empty measure.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is setting reasoning against simple faith and saying which one reaches God. However many sharp debaters try, and however many words they amass, they cannot touch the limit or the greatness of Vithoba; the reach of cleverness stops short. The point is not that learning is wicked but that it is the wrong instrument for this. Without guilelessness, the unguarded trust of a simple heart, all that intellectual effort is just tiring labor and a measure that comes up empty; the knowing mind weighs and weighs and holds nothing.

GATHA 0868 True Worship

True worship, against dry knowledge

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Without a foundation, why tell stories?

Until you know the Lord of Pandhari, everything is empty air.

Who will accept your dry knowledge of Brahman?

Says Tuka, set aside this one conceit of being a knower.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Without a foundation, why do you tell your story? Until you know the Lord of Pandhari, all of it is empty air. Who is going to accept your dry knowledge of Brahman? Tuka says: set aside this one conceit, the pride of being a knower.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is challenging the person who talks about God without having met him. Knowledge that has no ground in the living Lord of Pandhari is just talk; until that knowing is real, every word is wind. He calls book-learned talk of Brahman dry, knowledge with no juice, no devotion, and asks who could be nourished by it. The thing to drop is not learning itself but the conceit that comes with it, the satisfaction of counting oneself a knower; that single pride is what hollows the whole effort out.

GATHA 0869 The Nature of God

Refuge of the helpless

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You have compassion for the helpless, O Lord of Pandhari.

Hearing this fame of Yours, I have found great peace.

You rush to the homes of the destitute; surround them with Your Name as a protecting fence.

Says Tuka, the easy path to true welfare is to fix the chitta at Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You have mercy on the helpless, O Lord of Pandhari; it rises in you on its own. Hearing this fame of yours, I have found great rest. You run to the homes of the destitute; make a fence around them with your Name. Tuka says: the welfare close at hand is this, to keep the mind at your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is leaning on Vithoba's reputation for compassion and resting his whole weight there. He says mercy for the abandoned simply arises in the Lord; it is the Lord's nature, not a favor to be bargained for. That fame alone has already given him peace, before any rescue. He asks the Lord to do what he is famous for, to run to the poor and surround them with the Name as a protecting wall, and he names the simplest practice within everyone's reach: not a feat, just keeping the mind fixed at God's feet.

GATHA 0870 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the impermanence of all

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even the great incarnations did not endure in this world forever; how much less so these ordinary souls?

Beware of wallowing in sense-pleasures. Once fully seized by them, you cannot reach the end.

Carrying and groaning under a heavy load does not make it yours; true renunciation is relinquishing what is not yours to begin with.

Says Tuka, have they no shame? The saints have already won Keshiraja.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Not even the great avatars stayed here forever; how much less these ordinary souls. Beware that you do not lie sunk in the pleasures of the senses. Once you are seized by them, there is no reaching the end for me. You groan under a heavy load you carry, but carrying it does not make it yours; true renunciation is giving up what was never yours. Tuka says: have they no shame? The saints have already won Keshiraja.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is shaking the listener awake with the fact of death. If even God's own incarnations did not remain in this world, no ordinary person should imagine he will; so do not lie wallowing in sense-pleasure, because once it has you completely there is no climbing back out. He turns to possessions: you strain under the load of what you call yours, but carrying a thing never made it yours, and real renunciation is just letting go of what was never yours in the first place. Then he names the shame of inaction by holding up the contrast: the saints have already won Keshiraja, the Lord; what is your excuse?

GATHA 0871 The Saints

Saints, fed on love

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

These same five elements are theirs. Their daily rice is love itself.

The saints have held compassion within them. That is their innermost championship of us.

This present moment is their practice. This itself is their wealth.

Says Tuka, day and night, this is the food they eat.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The same five elements are theirs as ours. Their daily food is love itself. The saints have held tenderness within them; that is their hidden care for us. This present moment is their whole practice. This itself is their wealth. Tuka says: day and night, this is the food they eat.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing what makes the saints saints, given that they are made of the same flesh as anyone. They are built of the same five elements, yet what truly sustains them is love, as if love were their daily rice. The compassion they hold inside is quietly their championing of ordinary people. They do not defer practice to a special time; the present moment is their sadhana, and that nearness to God is their only riches. He repeats it to fix it: morning and night, love is what they live on, the food they actually eat.

GATHA 0872 The Power of the Name

The Name as wealth

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A lamp knows no darkness. Now guard this alone with care.

Narayana, Narayana. This Name is wealth, held firm in the knot of your garment.

Near the chintamani, no worry can truly approach.

Says Tuka, for both worlds, this is the finest provision of all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A lamp never meets darkness. Now keep only this with care. Narayana, Narayana. This Name is wealth; tie it firmly in the knot of your cloth. Beside the wish-granting jewel, no worry can really come near. Tuka says: for both worlds, this is the best provision of all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is urging the listener to guard the one thing that matters. As a lamp can never know darkness, the Name carries its own light, so hold to it alone. He calls Narayana's Name true wealth and tells you to tie it tight in the knot of your garment the way a traveler secures his money. He likens the Name to the chintamani, the jewel that grants wishes: stay near it and anxiety simply cannot approach. The claim he lands is that this is the finest supply for the whole journey, in this world and the next alike.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Blessed is the hour when the saints are met. That was the moment I fell, embracing their feet.

The knot of doubt came undone. It became cool within my belly.

By the grace of their words, I was ferried across the river of worldly existence.

Says Tuka, now all is auspicious. What giver is greater than this?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Blessed is the hour when the saints are met. That was the moment I fell and held their feet. The knot of doubt came undone. It grew cool inside me. By the grace of their words I was carried across the river of worldly life. Tuka says: now all is auspicious. What giver is greater than this?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is recounting what the meeting with the saints did for him and calling it the turning point. He marks the moment he embraced their feet as a blessed hour, not a small courtesy. What it accomplished was inward: the tight knot of his doubt loosened, and the burning in him went cool. He credits their words, their grace, with ferrying him over the river of worldly existence, the crossing he could not make alone. He ends in gratitude that overflows into a question: now that everything is auspicious, what greater giver could there be than the saints?

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Day and night this alone is my occupation: singing the glories of Govinda.

This body has been pledged to God. All my burning zeal is fixed on that alone.

There is no end to this work, not a moment's rest. Every faculty is gathered into this pursuit.

Says Tuka, through the mouth of kirtan he roars. He makes the people wakeful and alert.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Day and night this alone is my work: the glories of Govinda. This body has been pledged to God; all my longing is fixed there. There is no end to it, not a moment's rest. Every sense is gathered into this one work. Tuka roars the glory with his mouth, and makes the people wakeful.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing how the singing of God's praise has taken over his entire life. From morning to night his single occupation is Govinda's glories, and he has handed his very body over to God so that all his desire has one object. There is no stopping point and no rest, because every faculty he has is pooled into this one act. The kirtan is not private comfort either: with his mouth he roars the praise aloud so that the people around him are shaken awake; his devotion becomes a service that rouses others.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This is genuine treasure, manifold and old, from the treasury. Brought forth is the deposit of the Capable One.

By the laborer's hand the measure is opened. I am merely empty here; the authority is His.

By the potter's hand, vessels come into being and are sent on their way to the kitchen.

Says Tuka, life belongs to Narayana. The radiance that goes forth is a ray of His light.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is genuine treasure, old and abundant, brought out from the store. It is the deposit of the Capable One. By the laborer's hand the measure is opened. I am only empty here; the power is his. By the potter's hand the pots come into being and are sent off to the kitchen. Tuka says: life belongs to Narayana. The radiance that goes out is a ray of his light.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is denying that anything he does is his own and giving it all back to God. What seems to pass through him is real treasure, but it is the deposit of the Capable One, God; it was never his stock. He casts himself as the hired laborer who only opens the measure, the empty hand through which another's authority works. The potter image makes it plainer still: the pots are made and dispatched by the potter, not by themselves. So too his life is Narayana's, and whatever light shines out of him is only a ray of God's own light, never a source of its own.

What need is there to seek the very end of the Ganga? One's own longing is met right there, at the place of thirst.

This beautiful, graceful form of Vitthal: place it within the hollow of your heart and keep it there always.

Says Tuka, everything has become one. What need is there now for the other world?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why go searching for where the Ganga ends? My own longing is met right here, where I am thirsty. This beautiful, graceful form of Vitthal: place it in the hollow of your heart and keep it there always. What matters lies in the fresh butter; who else would put up with the leftover dross? A mother feeds the child mouthfuls the right size for it; there is no straining, no worry in that. Let us sing, let us dance, let us keep this feast of joy. All we have is bhava; nothing greater is in our hands. Tuka says: everything has become one. What need have I now for the other world?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is saying the goal is close, not far off, and the way to it is simple. You do not have to trace the Ganga to its source; your thirst is quenched right where you stand. So fix Vitthal's lovely form in your heart and keep it there. He uses the churning of milk: the worth is in the butter, not the watery refuse, and God like a mother feeds each soul a portion it can take. All that the devotee actually holds is bhava, loving feeling, and that is enough; singing and dancing in joy, Tuka finds everything fused into one and stops hankering after any heaven beyond.

Prayer, the desires I cannot master

मराठी मूळ

स्त्रीपुत्रादिकीं राहिला आदर । विषयीं पडिभर अतिशय ॥1॥
आतां हाता धांवा नारायणा । मज हे वासना अनावर ॥ध्रु.॥
येउनियां आड ठाके लोकलाज । तें हें दिसे काज अंतरलें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आह्मां जेथें जेथें गोवा । तेथें तुह्मीं देवा सांभाळावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My affection for wife and children remains; I am still deeply drawn to sense-pleasures.

Now rush to my aid, O Narayana. These desires are beyond my control.

Social shame stands in the way and blocks the path; the goal appears to have receded from reach.

Says Tuka, wherever we are entangled, there You must come and care for us, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My fondness for wife and children stays with me; I am still pulled hard toward the pleasures of the senses. Now run to my aid, Narayana. These desires are beyond my control. Fear of what people will say stands in the way and blocks the road; the goal seems to have slipped out of reach. Tuka says: wherever we get entangled, there You must come and watch over us, God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays as a man who knows his own weakness and refuses to hide it. He still loves his family and is still dragged by appetite, and he admits these desires are stronger than his will. On top of that, the fear of social shame blocks the very path he wants, so the goal feels lost. Rather than claim he can fix himself, he hands the trouble back to God: come exactly where I am snared, and guard me there. The plea is honest surrender, not self-improvement.

GATHA 0878 The Power of the Name

The Name, rescue from the senses

मराठी मूळ

पडिलों भोवणीं । होतों बहु चिंतवणी ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I had been spinning in circles, lost in too much thinking.

I had gone astray, lost the path; quickly I seized the gain.

I had been caught in the crevice of the senses, held in their prison.

Says Tuka, it is well that the Name of Vitthal has come to my tongue.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I had been spinning in circles, sunk in too much thinking. I had gone off the road, lost the path; then quickly I caught hold of the gain. I had been caught in the gap of the senses, held there as in a prison. Tuka says: it is good, the name of Vitthal has come onto my tongue.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a turn from confusion to rescue. He had been going round and round, lost in his own anxious thinking, off the road and trapped in the senses as in a jail. What freed him was not effort or argument but the Name: when Vitthal's name came to his tongue, he seized hold of his real gain. The poem treats the Name as the one thing that breaks the spinning. That it simply arrived on his lips is the whole good news.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It is well that everything has gone back to its rightful owner. The wayward ones have missed their homecoming visit.

I suffered greatly tending to them. Now the face is blackened by that very greed.

Because of their wrongdoing, my body bore the punishment. I had to pay the price for every one of their offenses.

They never let me rest for a single moment; until now I have endured that weariness.

Each separate flaw has been dealt with decisively; there is not a moment of pleasure in describing all this.

Says Tuka, having resolved the entanglement, I walk on, having laid the burden down at God's feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It is good that everything has gone back to its rightful owner. The wayward ones have missed their homecoming. I was made very unhappy looking after them; now my face is blackened by that very greed. For their wrongdoing my own body bore the punishment; I had to pay the price for every offense of theirs. They never let me rest for a single moment; until now I have borne that weariness. Each separate fault has been settled, once and for all; there is not a moment's pleasure in telling it all out. Tuka says: having sorted out the tangle, I walk on, the burden set down at God's feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is speaking of breaking free from things and bonds that were never truly his to carry. The senses and worldly attachments, the wayward ones, are handed back to their owner, and good riddance. He names the cost without flinching: tending them wore him out, shamed him, and made his own body pay for their faults, with no rest. Now each account is closed for good. He does not pretend the reckoning was sweet; he simply lays the whole weight down at God's feet and walks on free.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not worry about the belly any longer. Let us put the measure to whatever destiny has provided.

Fix your gaze upon the spiritual path; pursuing trivial schemes has only brought exhaustion.

Nothing from here can be taken along; why spend your life on what is false?

There is no end to the agitation and the coming and going; the poor wretch remains forever in worldly life.

Sitting in the boat brings you to the far shore; why should anyone toil with the strength of their own arms?

Says Tuka, this is the essence of everything: if you are going to do business, let it be of this kind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not worry any longer about feeding the belly. Let us measure out whatever fate has already stored up. Turn your gaze toward the spiritual path; chasing small schemes has only worn you out. Nothing here can be carried along with you; why spend your life on what is false? The agitation never ends, this endless coming and going; the poor creature stays forever in worldly life. Sitting in the boat carries you to the far shore; why should anyone wear himself out with the strength of his own arms? Tuka says: this is the heart of it all. If you are going to do business, let it be business of this kind.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram urges a change of investment: stop straining over food and survival, since what destiny stored for you will be measured out anyway, and fix your eyes on the spiritual goal. The little schemes only exhaust you, and nothing you grasp here goes with you past death, so spending a life on the false is waste. He pictures worldly life as endless restless traffic that keeps the soul trapped. The boat is the better way: let it carry you to the far shore instead of swimming on your own strength. Devotion, the surrender that lets grace carry you, is the only trade worth doing.

GATHA 0881 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, God brought near and made mine

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This has come to us as our rightful share: the very life-marrow of this whole world.

I have held it fast with my very life, with firm and single-minded devotion.

I brought it into form and made it near, standing simple and close beside me.

Says Tuka, I made Him mine. He came down at my words.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This has come to us as our share: the very life-marrow of this whole world. I have held it fast with my life, with strong and single-hearted love. I brought it into form and made it stand simple and close beside me. Tuka says: I made Him mine. He came down at my words.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram exults that the very core of all existence has fallen to him as his portion. He did not win it by cleverness but by holding on with his whole life in firm, undivided love. By that love he drew the formless into a form, near and plain, standing right beside him. The last claim is the boldest: God came down at the devotee's word and let Himself be owned. The poem dares to say that pure single-minded bhava can bring the Infinite close enough to call your own.

GATHA 0882 Worldly Metaphors

Devotion, the inexhaustible capital

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे आतां जालीसे निंश्चती । आणीक तें चित्तीं न धरूं दुजें ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

True capital has been found and secured, of the kind that never exhausts the trade.

The rare commodity has arrived at the house; I have stocked my vaikhari full of it.

In giving and taking, there is profit for all; for the fortunate and the wretched alike, the bhava is the same.

No one who comes to this counter leaves empty-handed, even if they do not know what they need.

Says Tuka, now I am at peace. I will hold no other thing in my chitta.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have found the true capital and tied it in my purse, the kind that never runs the trade to a loss. The rare goods have come to my house; I have filled my speech with them and stored them up. In the giving and taking there is profit for everyone; for the fortunate and the wretched alike, the bhava is the same. No one who comes to this counter goes away disappointed, even if he does not know what he needs. Tuka says: now I am at peace. I will hold nothing else in my heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the language of a merchant to speak of God's Name and devotion. He has found capital that never depletes and that never lets the trade fall into loss; the precious stock has come to his house, and he keeps it stored on his very tongue, in vaikhari. This is a trade that profits everyone who comes, rich or poor, because what counts is bhava, the same loving feeling in each. No one leaves this counter empty, even the one who does not yet know his own need. Having found it, Tuka rests and refuses to hold any other thing in his heart.

GATHA 0883 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, the small self made all-pervading

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

At every step I have offered myself; the cause is now complete.

I have sealed and held this place; the whole world has room enough.

The mind moves forward. The body's delight grows.

Says Tuka, in this mortal portion I have become all-pervading in the world.

IN PLAIN WORDS

At every step I have given myself; now the work is complete. I have sealed and held this place; the whole world has room enough. The mind moves on ahead; the body's joy keeps growing. Tuka says: in this perishable portion I have become spread through the whole world.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reports the fruit of total self-offering. By giving himself away at every step, the whole purpose has been fulfilled. He has secured an inner ground so firm that the entire world fits within it, his mind carries forward and even the body fills with growing delight. The closing line states the paradox at the heart of the experience: in this small mortal body, this perishable portion, he has become all-pervading. Complete surrender of the little self opens into a self that pervades everything.

GATHA 0884 Worldly Metaphors

Devotion, the butter for the discerning

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The butter has been separated and handed over. Those who have accumulated are now enjoying it.

Ahead lies the essence of pure devotion, the resting-ground of life to be sought and found.

What has come into the hands of the discerning, the blind can only grope at.

Says Tuka, the one who partakes of this gains the true profit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The butter has been separated out and handed over; those who have gathered it now enjoy it. Ahead lies the essence of pure bhava, the resting-ground of life, to be sought and found. What has fallen into the hands of the one who can tell true from false, the blind only grope after. Tuka says: the one who truly partakes of this gains the real profit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram returns to the churning image: the butter, the real worth of devotion, has been parted from the rest and given to those who gathered with love, and they enjoy it. What still lies ahead is the essence of bhava, the firm resting place of life, which the seeker must look for. He draws a line between the discerning, who recognize this treasure when it comes to hand, and the blind, who can only fumble past it. The difference is not luck but seeing. Whoever actually takes and lives this devotion wins the only profit that counts.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He does not know what is proper, pulled along by the senses. His mouth merely repeats what it has been taught.

He himself goes to hell and by sheer force drags forty-two lineages and the whole world there with him.

He speaks the unutterable with closed eyes and babbles away in vain, all for the sake of show.

Says Tuka, I am the appraiser of that realm. I know the genuine; we recognize it by what dances before us.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He does not know what is fitting, dragged along by his senses; his mouth just rattles off what it was taught. He goes to hell himself and by sheer force drags forty-two generations and the whole world down with him. He speaks the unspeakable with his eyes shut tight and babbles on in vain, all for show. Tuka says: I am the appraiser of that realm. I know the genuine; we can tell it by what shows itself before us.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is exposing the hollow pretender who poses as a knower while still led by appetite. Such a one only parrots learned words and, mistaking display for realization, ruins not only himself but everyone who follows him, the whole line of his house. The shut eyes and grand talk are theatre, dambha, performance done for show and not from any inner truth. Tukaram claims the right to test such claims, because true devotion shows itself in the living, not in posture. The warning is for each of us to check our own show: are the eyes shut on emptiness, or open on what is real?

GATHA 0886 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the single undivided mind

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You have one mind as your entire capital. If you divide it among many, how will it serve you?

Therefore hold firmly to Panduranga, and let the body keep company with its destiny.

Do not entangle the mind in other plans; only then can the true goal be achieved.

Says Tuka, know this to be the proper way, and the natural state will reveal itself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You have only one mind as your whole capital. If you split it among many things, how will it ever serve you? So hold firmly to Panduranga, and let the body keep the company its destiny gives. Do not entangle the mind in other plans; only then is the true aim reached. Tuka says: know this to be the right way, and the natural state will reveal itself on its own.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram counsels the soul that its one asset is the mind, and a mind divided among many wants is spent for nothing. The remedy is to gather it onto one hold, Panduranga, and let the body simply live out whatever destiny, prarabdha, has assigned it. As long as the mind is scattered into other schemes the goal stays out of reach; undistracted, it is reached. He calls this the fitting way, and promises that when the mind is held single in this manner the natural, settled state of the self shows itself without forcing.

GATHA 0887 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, the mind held in the song

मराठी मूळ

गावे ह्मणउनि गीत । धरुनि राहे तैसें चित्त ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे धणी । नव्हे जेविल्यावांचुनि ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One wishes to sing a song; the chitta too must remain absorbed in it just so.

This alone is the truly difficult thing: that seeing food, the hunger should remain.

One wishes to hear the sacred story; the chitta must be held in it just so.

Says Tuka, satisfaction does not come without eating.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One wishes to sing a song; the heart too must stay held in it just so. This is the truly hard thing: that you see the food and yet the hunger stays. One wishes to hear the sacred story; the heart must be held in it just so. Tuka says: there is no being full without actually eating.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram points to the gap between outward practice and inward absorption. To really sing, the mind must rest in the song, not merely the lips; to really hear the holy story, the heart must stay inside it. He names the strange difficulty with a homely image: it is like seeing food set before you while the hunger refuses to go, the going through the motions without being fed. The closing line lands it plainly: you are not satisfied until you actually eat. Devotion only nourishes when the heart truly partakes, not when the form is merely performed.

GATHA 0888 The Necessity of Experience

The mark of God, true sight

मराठी मूळ

कळल हे खुण । तरि दावी नारायण ॥1॥
सत्य संतांपाशीं राहे । येरां भय आड आहे ॥ध्रु.॥
अनुचिया ऐसें । असे भरलें प्रकाशें ॥2॥
इंद्रियांचें धनी । ते हे जाती समजूनि ॥3॥
तर्क कुतर्क वाटा । नागवण घटापटा ॥4॥
तुका ह्मणे ल्यावें । डोळां अंजन बरवें ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If you have recognized this mark, then Narayana reveals himself.

Truth abides with the saints; for others, fear stands as an obstruction.

It is filled with light without cause, spontaneously, pervading all.

Those who have become masters of the senses move forward with this understanding.

The paths of argument and counter-argument, the pot-and-cloth debates, lead only to being stripped bare.

Says Tuka, apply the good collyrium to the eyes.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If you have known this mark, then Narayana shows himself to you. Truth stays close to the saints; for the rest, fear stands in the way. He is filled with light, with no cause, on his own, spread through everything. Those who have become masters of their senses go forward knowing this. The roads of argument and counter-argument, the pot-and-cloth disputes, leave you stripped bare. Tuka says: put the good collyrium on your eyes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is saying that God reveals himself only to one who can recognize a certain sign, and that sign is truth. Truth lives with the saints; whoever stays apart from them is kept back by fear. The light of God shines everywhere, uncaused and self-existing, and only one who has gained command over the senses can move toward it. Mere clever debate, the endless pot-and-cloth wrangling of the schools, gains nothing and leaves the arguer empty-handed. The collyrium Tuka prescribes is the clear inner sight that the company of the saints, not argument, can give.

GATHA 0889 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the shameless traveler

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He walks the road of no return, yet what provisions does this pitiable one carry?

How shameless he has become; he does not even utter the name of Rama.

He gazes toward his enemies and weeps with eyes wide open.

He has been handed over, bound, into the hands of Yama, yet has no concern for that.

He who considers these things beneath him is the most degraded of all.

Says Tuka, even now, why have you become mute?

IN PLAIN WORDS

He walks the road from which no one returns. What does this wretched one carry for the way? How shameless he has become; he feels no shame, and he will not say the name of Rama. He looks toward his enemies and weeps with his eyes wide open. He has been bound and handed over to Yama, and even that does not trouble him. The man who thinks these things are beneath him is the lowest of all. Tuka says: even now, why have you gone dumb?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is shaking awake a person heading toward death with nothing laid up for the journey. The one provision that matters is the name of Rama, and the shameless man will not even speak it. Instead he clings to the very things that betray him, weeping over enemies while death already holds him bound, untroubled by his own ruin. To scorn the Name as beneath you, Tuka says, is to be the most degraded of all. His closing question is aimed at the listener: your mouth still works, so why has it gone silent on the one word that could save you?

GATHA 0890 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, take your share now

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Take your share quickly; if you delay, you will be left behind. Others carry off the treasure and the essence, while you stand with your burden on your head.

How many have been thus deceived? I cannot count how many. They do not recognize the moment, bearing the load on their heads.

Run, make haste while it has not yet been swept away. Whatever you have gathered into your lap is your own.

Says Tuka, shame on the shameless wretch. If you cannot bear even a single push, how will you ever reach that joy?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Take your share quickly. If you hold back, you fall behind. Others have already loaded up and are carrying off the essence. How many have been fooled this way; I cannot say how many. They do not know the right moment, and they go on carrying a load on their heads. While it has not yet been swept away, run, make haste. Whatever you have taken into your lap is your own. Tuka says: shame on you, you coward. If you cannot bear even one shove, how will you ever reach this joy?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the picture of a market or a harvest being divided up: the goods are God and his Name, and the time to claim your portion is now. Those who delay are deceived, and countless people lose their chance because they do not recognize the moment and waste their lives carrying useless burdens. Only what you actually gather into your own lap, your own devotion, becomes truly yours. Tuka turns sharp at the end, calling the timid soul a coward: if you flinch at one small hardship or push, you will never come through to the joy on the other side. The harshness is meant to push the listener past hesitation, not to despise him.

GATHA 0891 The Necessity of Experience

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One must walk the path to reach the destination. Merely hearing the news is of no use.

Listen, I fall at your feet with all my weight. The path of going is not by feeling alone.

A virgin who has given birth: only she knows it from experience. Describing that bhava, it does not come across.

Says Tuka, here one must peer closely with strained attention. Only when the image is clear does the reflection appear.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You must walk the path to reach that place. Just hearing the news of it is useless. Listen, I fall at your feet with all my weight: the way there is not by feeling alone. A virgin who has given birth knows it only by going through it; tell it to another, and that state will not come across. Tuka says: here you must look with close, strained attention. Only when the image is clear does the reflection show.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is saying that the truth he points to has to be lived, not merely heard about. Secondhand report and even inward sentiment cannot carry you to the destination; you have to walk the road yourself. He uses a deliberately impossible image, a virgin who has borne a child, to say that this is an experience no description can transfer to someone who has not had it. The seeing he calls for is exact and effortful: just as a reflection appears only when the mirror or water is perfectly still and clear, the real thing shows itself only to attention that has been made clear. The teaching can point; the experience must be earned.

GATHA 0892 Worldly Metaphors

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not trees also bow their branches? Does a lunatic not also forget body-consciousness?

One upon whom no teaching has any effect: call such a one a blockhead.

Are stones not also hard and inert? A stone too remains speechless.

Says Tuka, a cracked grain is what such a swaggering fool is: call him that.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not trees also bow their branches? Does a madman not also forget the body? The one whom no teaching can ripen: call him by that name, a blockhead. Are stones not also hard and dumb? A stone too says nothing. Tuka says: he is like a hollow, cracked grain; call this swaggering fool exactly that.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is exposing outward signs of holiness that have no inner reality. A tree bends its branches and a lunatic forgets his body too, but neither bowing nor self-forgetting proves anything by itself. The real test is whether teaching can take root and bear fruit in a person; the one in whom it never ripens is simply dull, hard and silent like a stone, however pious he looks. He compares such a swaggering man to a grain that is cracked and empty, looking like seed but unable to grow. The point is self-examination: ask whether the teaching is actually ripening in you, or whether you are only imitating the postures.

Social criticism, the borrowed airs

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He copies the outward manner of another and puts it on display. But his inner being is hard as a pebble.

Know your limits, O unfortunate one. All these are forms that are like God himself.

Why have you fallen into the snare of falsehood? You have flaunted this air of greatness; now set it aside.

Says Tuka, I see ruin ahead. That is why I will bring you to public disgrace.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He learns another man's manner and puts it on show, but inside he is hard as a pebble. Know your place, you unfortunate one: all these forms are forms of God himself. Why have you fallen for what is false? You have flaunted this air of greatness; now throw it away. Tuka says: I see ruin ahead for you, and that is why I am putting you to public shame.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is attacking the borrowing of a holy man's outward style by someone whose heart stays stony and unchanged. He calls the man to know his true measure and to remember that every creature is a form of God, so the airs of superiority are an offense as well as a fraud. The pretender has trapped himself in falsehood and paraded a false greatness that he is now told to drop. Tuka says plainly that he exposes the man in public because he foresees the disaster that this pretense leads to. The disgrace is a hard mercy aimed at the pattern of pretense, meant to wake the man before his ruin arrives.

GATHA 0894 Renunciation

Renunciation, the false renunciant

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not leave any part of the worldly burden unlet-go.

The way of devotion is such: one must be stripped of everything.

A beggar who runs a trade, having a donkey do the grinding work.

Living in the marketplace, why claim to be a renunciant?

Using prasad as a cover, he has turned the ghee into water.

Says Tuka, be either a person of virtue or a plain laborer.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The burden of the world is on your head: do not keep back any part of it unlet-go. The way of devotion is like this: you must be stripped of everything. A beggar who runs a business, who keeps a donkey to do the grinding. He lives right in the marketplace; why does he call himself one who wants nothing? Using the offering as a cover, he has turned the ghee into water. Tuka says: be a person of real virtue, or else a plain laborer.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is exposing the half-hearted renunciant who claims to have given up the world while quietly holding on to it. True devotion, he says, asks for everything: you cannot set down only part of the worldly load. The beggar who runs a trade, lives in the market, and still calls himself desireless is a fraud, and using religious offerings as a screen for gain only waters down what should be pure, like ghee turned to water. Tuka's demand is for honesty over pretense: be genuinely virtuous and renounce in truth, or drop the costume and earn your bread as an ordinary worker. The attack is on the hypocrisy, not on poverty or labor themselves.

GATHA 0895 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, a word to the willing

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Spirited horses respond to a mere gesture; they take only a light tap on the back.

What more need be said? Listen and hold it in the mind.

I do not wish to quarrel or drag anyone by their garment.

Says Tuka, blacken your faces and bow your heads down in shame.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Spirited horses move at a mere signal; they need only a light tap on the back. What more is there to say than that? Listen, and hold it in your mind. I do not want to quarrel, or pull anyone back by the edge of his garment. Tuka says: blacken your faces and bow your heads in shame.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts the willing listener with the obstinate one. A good horse obeys the lightest sign, and a person ready to learn needs only a hint and should take it to heart. He says he has no wish to fight or to drag the unwilling along by force. The closing line turns sharp toward those who will not listen, telling them to bow their heads in shame, because the failure is theirs and not the teacher's. The verse leaves each hearer to decide which he will be: the responsive horse, or the one left disgraced by his own refusal.

GATHA 0896 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the warned-of age

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे किती करावे फजित । ते चि छंद नित्य बहु होती ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What the saints had warned of long ago is now coming to pass in our experience.

People have become corrupt in conduct. Merit has dwindled; sin has grown mighty in force.

No one observes the purity of caste-duties or holds to any sense of defilement. They all jumble together in one heap.

Those who recite the Vedas drink liquor. They see no distinction and fight over sensual things like brazen scoundrels.

Says Tuka, how much of this disgrace should I recount? These very cravings keep multiplying day by day.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever the saints warned of long ago is now coming true in front of us. People have grown corrupt in conduct; this is the Kali age. Merit has worn thin, and sin has grown strong. No one keeps the duties of his order or holds to any sense of purity; they all jumble together in one heap. Those who recite the Vedas drink liquor. They see no line they will not cross, and they brawl over their appetites like shameless men. Tuka says: how much of this disgrace should I keep counting? These same cravings only multiply by the day.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says the decay the old saints predicted is now visible everywhere in the age of Kali. Right conduct has collapsed, good has weakened, and wrongdoing has gained the upper hand. People no longer keep the discipline of their station or any sense of what defiles, and even those who chant the Vedas drink and quarrel over their appetites without restraint. He breaks off the list because the catalogue of disgrace would never end, since the cravings driving it keep growing. The verse is a lament over a pattern of self-indulgence loosed from all limits, naming the sickness of the time rather than condemning any one person.

GATHA 0897 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, the ripened harvest

मराठी मूळ

अक्षरांचा श्रम केला । फळा आला तेणें तो ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The labor of learning has borne its fruit.

It holds the very depths of all things, leaving no residue remaining in the soul.

When the harvest bends low under its own weight, only then has the true crop truly come.

Says Tuka, O God, let the devotion now move further forward still.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The labor over the letters has borne its fruit. It holds the bottom of everything, leaving nothing of the self left over. When the ripe grain bends low under its own weight, then the real crop has truly come in. Tuka says: O God, let the devotion move on further still.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks back on his long labor of learning and finds it has finally ripened into fruit. That fruit reaches to the depths of all things and leaves no separate self standing, the ego emptied out. He marks the sign of true ripeness with a farmer's image: the loaded ear of grain bows low, just as real attainment makes a person humble rather than proud. Even so, he does not stop at the harvest but prays to God that his devotion keep advancing further, treating arrival as one more starting point.

GATHA 0898 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, right first, then the saints' word

मराठी मूळ

उचित जाणावें मुख्य धर्म आधीं । चित्तशुद्ध बुद्धी ठायीं ि◌स्थर ॥1॥
न घलावी धांव मनाचिये ओढी । वचन आवडी संताचिये ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Know first and foremost what is right. Dharma is primary: let chitta-shuddhi and buddhi be firm and steady.

Do not go chasing after the pull of the mind. Hold dear the words of the saints above all.

Says Tuka, let faith in those words abide within. Teaching does not take root on its own.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Know first of all what is right; dharma comes first. Let the heart be pure and the mind held steady in its place. Do not go running after the pull of your own mind. Hold dear the words of the saints. Tuka says: let trust in those words stay within you. Teaching does not take root on its own.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out an order for the spiritual life. The first thing is to know what is right and to keep dharma primary, grounding it in a purified heart and a mind held firm. He warns against chasing wherever the restless mind pulls, and sets against that the words of the saints, which are to be loved and trusted above one's own impulses. The closing line gives the reason: teaching does not plant itself, so faith in the saints' word is what lets it take hold within. The verse is about which voice you will follow, your own wandering mind or the steady counsel of the saints.

GATHA 0901 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, leave the wicked company

मराठी मूळ

जीवन हे मुक्त नर जाले पावन । तजा हो दुर्जनसंगति ही ॥1॥
बहुत अन्न विष मोहरीच्या मानें । अवघें चि तेणें विष होय ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जेणें आपलें स्वहित । तैसी करीं नीत विचारूनि ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Living beings are liberated; people are made holy and pure. By this alone: abandon the company of the wicked.

A great quantity of food with even a mustard seed's measure of poison in it: all of it becomes poison entire.

Says Tuka, consider carefully what serves your own true welfare, and act accordingly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Living beings are set free; people are made pure. By this one thing: give up the company of the wicked. A great heap of food with even a mustard seed of poison in it: all of it turns to poison. Tuka says: think carefully about what truly serves your own good, and act that way.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a single practical demand: leave the company of the wicked, for that one step is what makes people pure and frees them. He drives it home with a sharp image: a huge amount of good food is wholly ruined by even a mustard seed's worth of poison. So too a little bad company can spoil a whole life, no matter how much good is mixed in. The closing line turns it back on the listener as a matter of clear-eyed self-interest: weigh what really serves your own welfare, and let your conduct follow that judgment.

GATHA 0902 The Power of the Name

The Name as the only wealth

मराठी मूळ

द्रव्याचा तो आह्मी धरितों विटाळ । तया पाठी काळ लाग करी ॥1॥
करोनियां हें चि राहिलों जीवन । एक नारायण नाम ऐसें ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I regard wealth itself as a source of contamination, for Death follows close behind it. I have kept this as my sole sustenance: the one Name of Narayana and nothing else.

Says Tuka, having guarded this treasure carefully, I will share it freely with any who come asking.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I hold wealth itself to be a defilement. Death follows close behind it. So I have made only this my whole living: the one Name of Narayana, nothing else. Tuka says: I have guarded this treasure with care, and to anyone who comes asking, I will give it freely.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the usual sense of riches upside down. He calls money a contamination, because death always trails after it; whatever you pile up, you will leave behind in dread. In its place he keeps one possession only, the Name of Narayana, and lives off it as his daily bread. Then he names the strange economics of that wealth: he hoards it carefully, yet hands it out free to whoever asks, because the Name is the one treasure that grows by being given away.

GATHA 0903 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, take the lasting wealth

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The shrieking one pursues wherever wealth is found; therefore its company is false.

Planting the root of hell behind him, a man sets up his story ahead.

In this present moment, take this one gain; place the burden of what is to come upon God.

Prarabdha does not change through any amount of bearing; this lunacy of thirst is without purpose.

Says Tuka, take hold of the kind of wealth that remains, having listened with care and attention.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Where wealth is, Death comes chasing after it; so its company is false. A man buries the root of hell behind him and sets up his story for the road ahead. Take the one gain that this present moment offers; lay the burden of what is to come upon God. No amount of bearing changes what is already fixed; this madness of craving is for nothing. Tuka says: take hold of the wealth that stays, and listen to it with care.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram warns that worldly riches are bad company, because death hunts wherever wealth gathers. The greedy man plants the seed of his own ruin and then makes grand plans for a future he will never safely reach. So the abhanga points to the one thing in reach now: take this present gain, the Name and the holy story, and hand the worry about the future over to God. Straining and scheming will not alter what destiny has set; the thirst for more is wasted lunacy. The wealth worth seizing is the kind that does not leave you, received through attentive listening.

GATHA 0904 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the gem on the wrong neck

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे चिंतामणि शेळी गळा । पावे अवकळा ह्मणउनी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

An ornament weeps when placed upon a body degraded by misery. When the noble one encounters adversity, this is what happens.

One without the other is unbecoming, O giver, O ocean of compassion, O Panduranga.

One who does not know how to cook wastes even what is already prepared and set before him; what was carefully arranged goes to waste.

Says Tuka, when a wish-fulfilling gem is tied around the neck of a goat, it meets with disgrace.

IN PLAIN WORDS

An ornament weeps when it is worn on a body wasted by misery. When a noble thing meets bad fortune, this is what happens. One without the other looks wrong, O giver, O ocean of mercy, Panduranga. A man who cannot cook spoils even the food set ready before him; what was carefully prepared goes to waste. Tuka says: a wish-granting gem tied at a goat's neck is brought to disgrace.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is saying that a good thing put in the wrong place is shamed, not honored. A fine ornament looks pitiable on a body broken by want; the worthy and the unfit do not belong together. He turns to Panduranga, the ocean of compassion, as the giver who alone joins the worthy gift to a worthy keeper. The point lands in two homely pictures: the man who cannot cook ruins even a meal already prepared for him, and the priceless wish-fulfilling jewel is degraded when it hangs on a goat. So examine whether you are fit to hold what you have been given, lest the treasure be wasted on you.

GATHA 0905 Worldly Life

Worldly life, the harvest of past deeds

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Mountains of suffering must be endured; this much is known to everyone.

The quality of past lives can be inferred from the kind of experience one receives: superior, middling, or inferior.

Says Tuka, those who close their eyes here will come to know it when the time of bearing one's fruits arrives.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Mountains of suffering must be borne; everyone knows this much. From the kind of lot you receive you can read your past births: superior, middling, or low. Tuka says: those who shut their eyes here will come to know it when the time comes to bear the fruit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram states plainly what no one really doubts: heavy suffering must be endured, and no one is spared. He reads present experience as a ledger of the past; the quality of the life you are handed, high, middling, or low, reflects deeds already done. The warning is in the last line: closing your eyes to this now does not make it go away. When the appointed time of reaping arrives, the truth you refused to see will make itself known. So the call is to look honestly now, rather than be forced to learn it later.

GATHA 0906 Appeals and Exhortations

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You are fortunate, for you still have everything. Your hands and feet still move.

Your mouth has speech, your ears can hear kirtan, your eyes can behold the divine form.

Think of how many are blind, how many deaf, how many mute, lame, or crippled.

One who sets fire to one's own house and does not flee cannot survive.

Says Tuka, wake up now; attend to your own welfare.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You are fortunate: you still have everything. Your hands and feet still move. Your mouth has speech, your ears can hear kirtan, your eyes can behold the form of God. Think how many are blind, how many deaf, how many mute, how many lame. A man who sets fire to his own house and does not run out cannot live. Tuka says: wake up now; attend to your own good while there is time.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram counts the blessings most people overlook: working limbs, a voice, ears that can hear the holy story, eyes that can see the divine form. He sets them against all those who lack these very things, so the listener will stop treating them as nothing. Then comes the sharp image: to keep these gifts and waste them is like staying inside a burning house and refusing to flee. The call is urgent and personal: wake up and use this rare chance for your own welfare now, before the fire takes everything.

GATHA 0907 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, seize the chance now

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if such an opportunity comes again hereafter, there will be no independent agency.

Therefore seize what is available now and sing the Name with love.

Sanchita and Prarabdha are powerful; Kriyaman races on ahead.

Says Tuka, otherwise life passes birth after birth like the owl's or the pig's.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even if such a chance comes again later, you will have no free power to use it. So take what is given now and sing the Name with love. Sanchita and Prarabdha are heavy; Kriyaman runs on ahead. Tuka says: otherwise life passes, birth after birth, like the owl's or the pig's.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses the rarity of a human chance to turn toward God. Another such opening may come, but you may have no freedom then to act on it, so the time to seize it is now, by singing the Name with love. He names the weight of karma: the store of past deeds and the destiny already ripening are heavy, and fresh action keeps racing ahead, piling up more. The bare alternative is the last line: miss this, and you drift through birth after birth as dull and aimless as an owl or a pig. The whole force of it is, do not let this one usable life slip.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My soul is weary of everything. Now which single feeling shall I choose?

I cannot even bear to hear talk of worldly life, nor the claim that anything is "mine."

Bodily pleasures and the treatments offered for the body feel like poison received with honor.

The burden of obligations, prestige, and recognition make my soul miserable.

Says Tuka, I can endure nothing else. The feet of the Vaishnavas alone are dear to me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My soul is weary of everything. Now what single feeling can I settle on? I cannot bear even to hear talk of worldly life, nor anyone calling a thing "mine." The comforts and treatments offered to the body feel like poison handed to me with honor. The press of obligations, of prestige and praise, makes my soul wretched. Tuka says: I can bear nothing else; only the feet of the Vaishnavas are dear to me.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is Tukaram describing a total exhaustion with the world. He is so tired of everything that he can hardly choose one thing to want; even hearing about household life, or hearing anyone claim ownership of anything, has become unbearable. The honors and comforts people offer his body strike him as poison served politely, and the whole apparatus of duty, status, and praise only tortures him. The one thing left that he can stand is the company of God's devotees. The abhanga names the turning point of renunciation: when the world has gone tasteless, the feet of the Vaishnavas become the only sweetness.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have no more need to argue or reply.

These distinctions and differences are matters of temperament and disposition. God is not of any one single kind.

Who can sort out virtue and fault between the traditions, or tell the difference between action and inaction?

It is better, then, to abandon such company so as to cut off the occasions of sorrow.

Says Tuka, let my voice take its fill singing the virtues of this God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have no more need to answer or argue. These divisions and differences come from temperament and disposition; God is not of any one single kind. Who can sort out virtue and fault among the traditions, or tell action from inaction? Better, then, not to keep such company, so as to cut off the occasions of sorrow. Tuka says: let my voice take its fill singing the praises of this God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram steps out of the endless quarrel between schools and sects. He sees that their fixed differences spring from people's varying dispositions, not from God, who cannot be boxed into one form. No one, he says, can finally rank one tradition's virtues and faults over another's, or settle what counts as right action and wrong. Rather than be dragged into that dispute, which only breeds grief, he chooses to leave the disputing company. What is left for him is simple and whole: to spend his voice singing the praise of God, and let that be enough.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I will take counsel within my own jiva. What concern of mine are these people?

Everyone knows their own welfare; to restrain them by force only causes sorrow.

Let whoever wishes to hear the sacred story listen; otherwise, let them go home and sleep in peace.

What is my concern? This has reached its end. Having seen the path, I will set others on it.

Says Tuka, I will plead before God's own compassion. Each one's desire bears its own fruit.

The clash of prescriptions and prohibitions splits the chest open, so long as one has not tasted experience directly.

Restlessness grows on both sides when one has not personally realized the truth.

In one's own opinion it seems like madness, but the truth remains exactly as it is.

The fulfillment of practice is silence; make the buddhi steady.

Says Tuka, through mere argument, even the assemblies of Brahmins have been wasted.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will take counsel within my own soul. What do I owe to these people? Everyone knows their own good; force them and you only cause pain. Let whoever wishes hear the sacred story; the rest can go home and sleep in peace. What is it to me? This has reached its end. Having seen the path, I will set others on it. Tuka says: I will plead my case before God's own mercy; each one's desire bears its own fruit. The clash of rule and prohibition splits the chest open, so long as one has not tasted experience itself. Restlessness grows on both sides while the truth has not been lived. In one's own opinion it looks like madness, but the truth stands just as it is. The fulfillment of practice is silence; make the mind steady. Tuka says: through mere argument, even whole assemblies of Brahmins have come to nothing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram resolves to stop wrestling with other people and to take the matter inward instead. He sees that everyone already knows their own good, and forcing them only causes pain, so he leaves it open: let whoever wants the sacred story listen, and let the rest go sleep. His own work, he feels, is done; having found the path, he can only point it out and leave each person's longing to bear its own fruit before God. Then he diagnoses why the arguing hurts so much: as long as a person only debates rules and prohibitions without tasting the reality for themselves, both sides stay torn and restless. The truth does not change to suit anyone's opinion, even when it looks like madness to them. So the real end of practice is silence and a steadied mind; arguing has wasted even gatherings of learned Brahmins.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The clever ones are ensnared in prohibitions. The debaters are swept away in debate.

How pitifully they are caught in the tight trap of pretense and sense-objects.

What is gained by winnowing only chaff? Both grounds are lost.

Says Tuka, what comes into hand from all that churning?

IN PLAIN WORDS

The clever ones are tangled up in prohibitions. The debaters are carried off into debate. See how pitifully they are caught in the tight trap of pretense and the senses. What is won by winnowing only chaff? Both grounds are lost. Tuka says: from all that churning, what comes into the hand?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at the learned and the argumentative and sees them snared, not freed, by their cleverness. The sharp ones get knotted in what is forbidden, and the debaters are swept off into endless dispute, all of them trapped by show and by appetite for the senses. He puts the waste in plain images: winnowing chaff yields no grain, and the disputer loses both grounds at once, this world and the truth alike. The closing question, what comes into the hand from all that churning, points the listener at their own arguing: examine whether your zeal is producing anything real, or only empty effort dressed up as wisdom.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I speak only the leftovers of the saints. What should a simpleton like me know on my own?

I cannot even utter the Name of Vitthal with purity. How then would any understanding dawn in me?

I sport with these words in lisping, babbling speech. Let no anger be held against me.

What, do you not know my caste? Consider this. How much can one like me say?

Says Tuka, it is God who makes me speak. He alone knows the meaning, the secret, and the devotional mood.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The words I speak are only the leftovers of the saints. What would an ignorant man like me know on my own? I cannot even utter Vitthal's Name purely; how then could any understanding dawn in me? I play with these words in lisping, babbling speech; do not hold any anger against me. Do you not know my caste? Think on that. How much can one like me say? Tuka says: it is God who makes me speak. He alone knows the meaning, the secret, and the inner mood.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram empties himself of any claim to authorship. He says his words are only the saints' leavings, that an unlettered man like him knows nothing on his own, and that he cannot even pronounce Vitthal's Name perfectly, let alone arrive at wisdom by himself. He asks the listener not to be angry at his stumbling, babbling speech, and points to his low birth as proof that the eloquence is not his doing. The turn comes at the end: it is God who speaks through him, and God alone holds the true meaning and inmost feeling of what is said. The abhanga makes humility itself the credential; the poet steps aside so that the words can be God's.

Self-examination, the test of the pure heart

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If someone covers their nose at the fragrance of sandalwood, that does not make the sandalwood less than gold. This simply cannot be.

The sweetness of sugar is the same for all: for the great, the old, the young, and the small.

Says Tuka, if my chitta were pure, then why do people criticize me?

IN PLAIN WORDS

If someone holds his nose at the smell of sandalwood, that does not make the sandalwood worth less than gold. It simply cannot be. The sweetness of sugar is the same for everyone: for the great and the small, the old and the young. Tuka says: if my heart were truly pure, then why would people criticize me?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram offers two images of things whose worth does not depend on how they are received. Sandalwood stays precious even if one person turns away from its scent, and sugar tastes equally sweet to everyone, great or small, old or young, because real goodness is constant and impartial. Then he turns the test on himself rather than on his critics: if his own heart were genuinely pure, would people still be finding fault with him? Instead of resenting the criticism, he treats it as a mirror, asking whether the fault may lie in him. The abhanga makes the blame an occasion for honest self-examination, not for defense.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who is as generous as You, who gives His own divine state to His servants?

You do not look at whether one is pure or lowly, nor at one's caste. You make Your dwelling even in impure bodies.

With love You eat the coarse food at a devotee's home, yet feasts without devotion do not please You.

You go where You are driven away, yet You do not come to the chitta of the yogis who seek You.

Says Tuka, these are Your true titles, proclaimed by the four Vedas themselves.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who is as generous as you? You give your own state to your servants. You do not look at whether a man is pure or low; you do not look at his caste. You make your home even in unclean bodies. You eat the coarse food in a devotee's house, and you eat it with love. But a feast without love does not please you. You go where you are driven away. You do not come to the minds of the yogis who chase you. Tuka says: these titles of yours are true. The four Vedas speak them with their own mouths.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram praises God by the company he keeps. The point is not that God is mighty, but that he turns toward the lowest and away from the proud. He ignores caste and purity, dwells in bodies the world calls unclean, and prefers a poor man's coarse food given in love over a grand feast given without it. The last turn is the sharpest: God walks into the house that drives him out, yet stays away from the yogis who use their practice to seize him. Love draws him; striving repels him, and Tukaram says the Vedas themselves attest to this.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Then why were the ancient sages unknowing? They distanced themselves from ordinary people.

Those whom the eight supernatural powers serve do not touch the minds of ordinary folk.

They ate roots and leaves to nourish their bodily elements, and yet made their dwelling in the forest.

Closing their eyes, they sat still, sealed in silence, speaking nothing.

Says Tuka, do the same to my chitta, O Ananta. Drive the world far away from me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Were the old sages then unknowing? They kept themselves far from ordinary people. The ones whom the eight powers serve do not touch the minds of common folk. They ate roots and leaves to keep the body alive. They made their home in the forest. They closed their eyes and sat still. They spoke nothing; they were sealed in silence. Tuka says: do this same thing to my mind, O Ananta. Drive the crowd far away from me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at the ancient sages and reads their withdrawal as wisdom, not ignorance. They held mastery over great powers, yet they would not mix their minds with the crowd; they lived on roots in the forest, eyes closed, sealed in silence. He is not condemning people so much as naming a danger to his own attention. So he turns it into a prayer: let my mind be drawn away from the crowd the way theirs was, O Ananta, that I may rest in you undistracted.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

On whose support shall I reflect? Who will give courage to my jiva?

I am no learned scholar, no reader of scriptures, and I have not even one footing of caste purity.

In this Kali Yuga, people are cunning and will mock me for singing Your virtues.

I am caught in doubt on both sides: should I worship You, O God, or should I not?

Says Tuka, either let the world shun me, or let death come. Both are good.

IN PLAIN WORDS

On whose support shall I think this through? Who will give courage to my soul? I am no learned scholar. I am no reader of scriptures. I do not have even one footing of caste purity. In this Kali Yuga people are clever. They will mock me when I sing your praises. I am caught in doubt on both sides: should I worship you, God, or should I not? Tuka says: now either let the world shun me, or let death come. Both of these are good.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out his disadvantage plainly: no learning, no scripture, no caste standing, and a clever, mocking age that will jeer at his singing. The doubt is real and he names it: should he even worship at all, when worship will draw scorn? Then he refuses the trap of that doubt. He chooses God over the world's opinion so completely that both being shunned by the world and dying lose their sting. Either outcome is good, because either one leaves him with God and free of the crowd's verdict.

Says Tuka, why do You hold this pride? Settle the matter clearly, O Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What have you lost, you who are able to do anything? What fault do you find in me? You will not accept me as your own. I will take this matter before the saints. Show me one witness who can prove that I am devoted to anyone but you. Tuka says: why do you hold this pride? Settle the matter clearly, O Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a lover's lawsuit, not a humble petition. Tukaram presses God like a plaintiff: you lose nothing by taking me, so what is the fault that makes you withhold yourself? He threatens to bring the case before the saints, the only court he trusts, and dares God to produce a single witness that his heart has gone to any other god. The boldness is the devotion: he is so sure he belongs to God that he treats God's apparent silence as an unpaid debt. Settle it openly, Panduranga; stop holding back.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What shall I do with other deities, when I have the Lord of Pandhari alone?

When a river has merged into the ocean, what trace of its former name remains?

The light of many lamps is destroyed when the sun rises.

Says Tuka, I know no second. There is none but the King of Pandhari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What shall I do with other gods, when I have the Lord of Pandhari alone? When a river has merged into the ocean, what is left of its old name? The light of many lamps is gone when the sun rises. Tuka says: I know no second. There is none but the King of Pandhari.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram declares that one God has swallowed every other. He gives two images for what happens to the rest: a river that reaches the ocean keeps no separate name, and many small lamps simply vanish when the sun comes up. This is not contempt for other deities but a description of what total devotion feels like from inside. Once Vitthal fills the field, no second object of worship can survive as anything distinct. He knows no other; there is only the King of Pandhari.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What need have I for debates about action and inaction? I have found the secret.

You are like a myna bird of the Name, beyond all counting.

There is no spending and no loss; You remain ever full.

Says Tuka, what burden of mine could weigh upon You?

IN PLAIN WORDS

What shall I do with debates about action and inaction? I have found the secret. You are like a myna bird of the Name, beyond all counting. There is no spending and no losing in you; you stay forever full. Tuka says: what burden of mine could ever weigh on you?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets aside the endless arguments about right action and renunciation, saying he has found the real secret underneath them. The secret is the Name, repeated freely like a bird's song, past all reckoning and bookkeeping. He fixes on God's inexhaustibility: nothing you draw from God diminishes him; he stays full no matter how much is taken. So the question that ends the poem is almost a laugh: if you can never be spent or burdened, why would my sins or needs be too heavy for you to carry?

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those mighty ones reached that exalted place in an instant, in a single stroke.

We who are without strength, O God, plead for Your mercy with our very lowliness.

Those who had strength made even time their stepping stone.

Says Tuka, the saints are heroes of valor, patient and vast as the ocean.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those mighty ones reached that high place in a single moment, in one stroke. We have no strength, God. With this very weakness we beg for your mercy. Those who had strength made time itself their stepping stone. Tuka says: the saints are heroes of valor. They are patient and vast as the ocean.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts two ways to reach God. The mighty saints crossed in an instant; they were strong enough to make even time a stair beneath their feet. He places himself outside that company, owning that he has no such strength. But he turns the lack into his plea: weakness itself becomes the appeal to mercy, the one thing the helpless can offer. He still honors the saints as true heroes, ocean-deep and patient, while staking his own hope not on strength but on God's compassion for those who have none.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I desire the fruit that the great ones attained, but I lack their strength.

O Lord, lead me to the place where the saints have gone.

How can we be matched with the elders? We cannot attain that station.

Says Tuka, fulfill my longing; indulge this wish of mine.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I want the fruit that the great ones reached. But I do not have their strength in me. The saints have gone to that place; O Lord, bring me there too. How can we be matched with the elders? We cannot reach that high station on our own. Tuka says: grant my wish; indulge this longing of mine.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram wants the very destination the great souls attained, and admits at once that he lacks the power to climb there himself. He will not pretend to be the equal of the elders; he says plainly that their station is beyond his reach by his own effort. So the whole abhanga becomes a request for transport rather than achievement: take me to where the saints already are. He asks God to indulge him, to treat his longing as a child's wish a father would simply fulfill out of love.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In Your home of kaivalya, O Hari, there are heaps of abundance.

Why then should there be shortage for me? I am not even the owner of my own share.

You are a father complete in every virtue.

Says Tuka, O Panduranga, I have come before You. Speak to me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In your house, Hari, the treasure of kaivalya lies in heaps. Why then should there be any shortage for me? I am not even the owner of my own share. You are a father complete in every virtue. Tuka says: O Panduranga, I have come and stood before you. Speak to me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram approaches God as a son before a wealthy father. The wealth here is kaivalya, final liberation, and he sees it piled high in God's house. The complaint is filial: with such abundance in the family, why is the child left wanting, denied even the portion that is rightly his? He leans on the relationship, naming God a father perfect in every good quality, so that withholding would be unworthy of him. Then he simply presents himself, standing face to face, and asks for the one thing a waiting child wants: a word, a response.

GATHA 0923 Appeals and Exhortations

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Know your own true form. Why do you fault the mirror?

This is not a matter of body-consciousness; it is a gift that Narayana has bestowed.

An arrow must strike the vital spot, but the one who merely releases it does not know this.

Says Tuka, many mouths speak many words, but know that without truth, nothing avails.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Know your own true form. Why do you blame the mirror? This is not the doing of body-thinking; it is a gift that Narayana has given. An arrow has to strike the vital spot, but the one who only lets it fly does not know this. Tuka says: many mouths speak many words. Without truth, none of it gets anywhere.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells the seeker to stop faulting the mirror for the face it shows: see your own real nature instead of blaming what reflects it back. He warns that this seeing cannot be manufactured by the ego's effort; it comes as God's gift. The arrow image sharpens the point: it is not enough to loose words into the air, the shaft must land on the vital spot, and the careless archer never learns where that is. So the closing line cuts at empty talk: many tongues say many fine things, but without truth behind them nothing reaches its mark.

GATHA 0924 Faith and Trust

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O saints, do not entertain worry. Can a diamond ever become a mere crystal?

Whatever situation arises, one responds accordingly; I have seen some trace of this detachment.

Many fear the punishment meant for one offender, and many mouths speak these words.

Says Tuka, vaikhari holds no power here. Those who only enact the outer forms are fools, fools indeed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Saints, do not let worry into your minds. Can a diamond ever become mere glass? Whatever situation comes, one meets it as it asks; I have seen some of that detachment. Many take fright at the punishment meant for one offender, and many mouths repeat the same words. Tuka says: mere speech has no power here. Those who only act out the outer forms are fools, fools indeed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram steadies his fellow seekers against fear: a true thing keeps its nature, and a diamond can never sink into being common glass. The settled soul simply meets each circumstance as it comes, with the calm of detachment. He notes how fear spreads by contagion, a crowd trembling at a threat aimed at one, all repeating the same anxious words. Against that he sets the test of reality: outward show and recited phrases carry no weight. To go through the motions of devotion without inward truth is folly, and he says it twice.

GATHA 0925 Surrender and Acceptance

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I would worship You with proper rites, but I lack the materials for it.

Now You, the Bountiful One, carry my entire burden and conduct it forward.

You know what is auspicious, O Narayana.

Says Tuka, I have surrendered to You, O Vitthal, this very sense of being the body.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I would worship you with the proper rites, but I do not have the materials for them. Now you, the giver, carry my whole burden and lead it forward. You know what is auspicious, Narayana; you know what that is. Tuka says: I have given it over to you, Vitthal, this very sense of being the body.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram cannot perform formal worship; he lacks the ritual articles for it. Rather than fail, he turns the lack into surrender, handing his entire load to God and asking God to carry it forward in his place. He no longer tries to decide what is right or auspicious; he leaves that judgment to Narayana, who knows. The final offering is the deepest one: not flowers or rites but the body-sense itself, the conviction of being this body, laid at Vitthal's feet. When even that is given away, nothing of his own is left to manage.

GATHA 0926 The Necessity of Experience

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When I consider it, this is the vessel to cross the ocean of existence.

I shall hold Your feet in my chitta; all happiness resides there.

My inner marks are with the mind, and that mind is drowned in this bliss.

Says Tuka, the secret has come into my hands. This is my good fortune.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When I look into it, this is the boat that carries me across the ocean of birth and death. I will hold Your feet in my mind. What other happiness is there than that? My inner marks are kept in my mind, and that mind has drowned in this sweetness. Tuka says: the secret has come into my hands. This is my good fortune.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram has found one thing and named it as everything. The world is an ocean you cannot cross on your own, and he says Vitthal's feet are the boat. So he keeps his mind fixed on those feet, and asks what happiness could possibly lie anywhere else. The deepest signs of his own self, the marks he kept inside, have dissolved into the sweetness of this attention. He calls it a secret because it cannot be argued out; it can only be received, and he says it has fallen into his hands.

GATHA 0927 Ecstasy and Joy

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Gazing upon Your blessed face, my joy overflows, yet the hunger of my eyes is never satisfied.

On my tongue is the sweetness of those three syllables, before which even nectar tastes bland.

The path of my ears has been purified; all distinctions of difference are swept away.

My mind, which was soiled by great impurities, has become clear as crystal.

Says Tuka, the treasure that is Vitthal, the very life of my jiva, has been found.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When I gaze on His blessed face, joy fills me with joy, and the hunger of my eyes will not go. On my tongue is the taste of three syllables; before it, even nectar is flat. The path of my ears has been swept clean and pure, and difference and no-difference are driven away. My mind, which was caked with great filth, has become clear like crystal. Tuka says: the very life of my life, the treasure that is Vitthal, has been found.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes what happens when the senses are turned wholly toward God. The face of Vitthal feeds his eyes, yet the eyes only grow hungrier, because this joy does not satiate and dull, it deepens. The Name on his tongue makes nectar itself taste flat, and the ears, scoured clean, no longer split the world into difference and sameness. The mind that was thick with impurity has gone clear as crystal. He names the cause plainly: Vitthal, the life of his life, has been found, and that finding is what purifies every sense at once.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This is the supreme bliss: I shall embrace Him in my arms. When we clasp each other, all duality is destroyed.

When I speak with Him, my mind is soothed, my chitta rejoices in delight, and the joy of love doubles.

He is the ornament among people and the accepted one in Vaikuntha. One's own welfare is fully attained through Him in every way.

All worldly dealings, all illusion and social custom, are cut away at the root. Samsara itself has withered and dried up.

Says Tuka, let there be only Vitthal. This jiva desires nothing else.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This itself is the highest bliss: I will hold Him in my arms. When we embrace, on the spot, all duality breaks. When I speak with Him my mind grows calm, my heart leaps with joy, and the love, the sweetness of love, doubles. He is the ornament among people and the honored one in Vaikuntha; through Him my own good is gained in every way. All dealings, all illusion and social custom, are cut. Worldly life has withered from the root. Tuka says: let there only be Vitthal. This soul wants nothing else.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pushes love past worship into union, and names the price and the prize together. The embrace is not a figure of speech to him; in it, the gap between worshipper and worshipped breaks open, and duality ends. Speaking with Vitthal calms his mind and doubles his love, and he sees that the one who is honored both among people and in heaven is the whole of his own good. The cost is everything else: business, illusion, social custom, the entire round of worldly life, all cut away at the root. His final word leaves no room to bargain: only Vitthal, and nothing besides.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You are our compassionate mother, O Vitthal, sheltering those who seek refuge.

The milk of love flows ever from Your breast. Your gaze is pure and nectarous.

You do not let hunger, thirst, sorrow, or weariness touch us, knowing well our inner nature.

Drive far away desire, craving, illusion, and worry. Make a place for us to play freely.

Says Tuka, keep me in the company of saints, where the hand of the shrieking one cannot reach.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You are our merciful mother, O Vitthal, the shade for those who come for refuge. The milk of love is in Your breast, always, at every hour; Your gaze is pure and full of nectar. You do not let hunger, thirst, sorrow, or weariness touch us, because You know the nature within us. Drive far away desire, craving, illusion, and worry. Make a place for us to play freely. Tuka says: keep me in the company of the saints, where the hand of the shrieking one cannot reach.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays to God as a mother, not a master, and asks to be cared for like a child at the breast. Vitthal is the shade for whoever takes refuge, the milk of love always flowing, the gaze that is pure nectar; a mother knows her child's inner state and shields it from hunger and pain. So he asks that desire, craving, illusion, and worry be carried far off, and that a safe space be cleared where he can simply play. The last line names the place of safety: the company of the saints, which he calls the one ground that death, the shrieking one, cannot reach into.

GATHA 0930 The Saints

The saints, the true inheritance

मराठी मूळ

जेथें जावें तेथें कपाळ सरिसें । लाभ तो विशेषें संतसंगें ॥1॥
पूर्व पुण्यें जरि होतीं सानुकूळ । अंतरायमूळ नुपजे तेथें ॥ध्रु.॥
भाग्य तरी नव्हे धन पुत्र दारा । निकट वास बरा संतांपायीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे हे चि करावी मिरासी । बळी संतांपाशीं द्यावा जीव ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Wherever one goes, one's fate follows along. True gain comes only through the company of saints.

If past merits were favorable, no obstacles would arise at the root of the path.

Real fortune is not wealth, children, or a spouse. Dwelling near the feet of saints is the true good.

Says Tuka, this alone is the true inheritance: to offer one's very jiva at the saints' feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wherever you go, your fate goes with you. The real gain is found above all in the company of saints. If past merits are favorable, no obstacle springs up at the root of the path. True fortune is not wealth, not sons, not a wife. To dwell close, at the feet of the saints, is the real good. Tuka says: make this alone your inheritance: to lay down your very life at the saints' feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures fortune against the only thing he counts as gain. Wherever you travel, your own karma travels with you, so changing your circumstances changes nothing; the one real gain is the company of saints. He bluntly denies the usual prizes: wealth, sons, a spouse are not fortune at all. What is fortune is to live near the feet of the holy, where past merit clears the obstacles from the path. He calls this the one inheritance worth claiming, and sets its full price: to offer your very life there.

GATHA 0931 Renunciation

Renunciation, one firm resolve

मराठी मूळ

आतां कांहीं सोस न करीं आणीक । धरीन तें एक हें चि दृढ ॥1॥
जेणें भवसिंधु उतरिजे पार । तुटे हा दुस्तर गर्भवास ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे बरा जोडला हा देह । मनुष्यपणें इहलोका आलों ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now I shall strive for nothing else. I hold firm to this one resolve alone.

That resolve by which one crosses to the far shore of the ocean of existence, and this terrible womb-dwelling, so hard to escape, is cut away.

I shall now earn the feet of God: the imperishable wealth, the supreme purpose.

Says Tuka, this human body is well obtained. I have come to this world in human form.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now I will crave nothing else. I hold to this one thing, and hold it firm. The resolve by which the ocean of birth and death is crossed, and this hard, terrible dwelling in the womb is cut off. Now I will earn the feet of God: the wealth that never perishes, the highest purpose. Tuka says: this body has been well gained. I have come into this world in human form.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram narrows his whole life down to a single resolve and names why it is worth everything. He renounces all other longing and fixes on one thing alone, because that one thing carries a person across the ocean of birth and death and ends the painful cycle of being born again and again. The feet of God, he says, are the only wealth that does not perish and the only true aim. The poem closes by naming the rare chance: a human birth, which he calls well gained precisely because it makes this resolve possible.

GATHA 0932 The Power of the Name

The Name, wealth for the final hour

मराठी मूळ

जतन करीन जीवें । शुद्धभावें करूनी ॥1॥

वदनळ हें संचित सारुं । बरवा करुं उदिम हा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे हृदयपेटी । ये संपुटीं सांटवूं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I shall guard it with my very jiva, with pure devotion.

The name Vitthal, Vitthal is my wealth, my sustenance at the final hour.

I shall invest this accumulated store and carry on this blessed trade.

Says Tuka, I shall store it in the casket of my heart.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will guard it with my very life, keeping it with a pure heart. The name Vitthal, Vitthal is my wealth, my sustenance at the hour of death. I will spend down this stored merit and carry on this good trade. Tuka says: I will store it away in the casket of my heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram treats the Name as treasure, and the whole poem speaks in the language of trade. He vows to guard the name Vitthal with his life and a clean heart, because it is the one wealth that will sustain him at the moment of death, when nothing else holds. He will invest his accumulated merit into this single trade, the repeating of the Name, as the only commerce worth doing. The closing image is a locked casket: the heart, where this wealth is stored safe until it is needed.

GATHA 0933 The Nature of God

Nature of God, the great Lord made easy

मराठी मूळ

एवढा प्रभु भावें । तेणें संपुष्टी राहावें ॥1॥
होय भक्तीं केला तैसा । पुरवी धरावी ते इच्छा ॥ध्रु.॥
एवढा जगदानी। मागे तुळसीदळ पाणी ॥2॥
आला नांवा रूपा । तुका ह्मणे जाला सोपा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

So great a Lord, yet He is content through devotion alone.

He becomes whatever His devotee makes Him; He fulfills the wish that is held.

So mighty a giver to the world, yet He asks only for a tulsi leaf and water.

Says Tuka, He has taken name and form and become easy to reach.

IN PLAIN WORDS

So great a Lord, yet through devotion He will stay shut up small. He becomes whatever His devotee makes Him; He fulfills the wish that is held for Him. So vast a giver to the world, yet He asks for only a tulsi leaf and water. Tuka says: He has come into name and form, and so He has become easy.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram marvels at how the infinite makes itself small for love. The Lord who holds the whole world will let Himself be held in a tiny space, content with devotion alone, and will take whatever shape His devotee gives Him. The one who gives everything to the world asks in return only a leaf of tulsi and a little water, the offerings of the poor. The point lands in the last line: by taking on a name and a form, the unreachable God has made Himself easy to reach, which is the whole mercy of it.

GATHA 0934 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the union that ends sin and merit

मराठी मूळ

भाग्यें ऐसी जाली जोडी । आतां घडी विसंभेना ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे खंडूं खेपा । पुढें पापापुण्याच्या ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By good fortune such a union has been made. Now I cannot be parted from it for even a moment.

The saints have revealed the sign: those even feet upon the brick.

I shall set aside all other work now; I shall take up this one cause alone.

Says Tuka, I shall sever the future rounds of sin and merit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By good fortune such a union has come to me. Now I cannot bear to be parted from it even for a moment. The even feet upon the brick: the saints have shown me the sign. Now I will set aside every other task. This is the one work I will do. Tuka says: I will cut off the coming rounds of sin and merit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as one who has been joined to God and now cannot stand to be away from Him for an instant. He credits the saints with showing him the sign, the two level feet of Vitthal standing on the brick at Pandhari, as the place to fix his gaze. Having found it, he lays down all other work and takes up this alone as his single occupation. The closing claim is the radical one: he will sever even the future cycle of sin and merit, because both are bonds that keep the soul turning, and union with God ends the turning altogether.

GATHA 0935 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the mind made wholly one

मराठी मूळ

पतिव्रते जैसा भ्रतार प्रमाण । आह्मां नारायण तैशापरी ॥1॥
सर्वभावें लोभ्या आवडे हें धन । आह्मां नारायण तैशापरी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे एकविध जालें मन । विठ्ठला वांचून नेणे दुजें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

As a faithful wife holds her husband as her authority, so is Narayana to us.

As one consumed by greed loves wealth with his whole being, so is Narayana to us.

Says Tuka, my mind has become wholly one. It knows nothing other than Vitthal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

As a faithful wife holds her husband as her whole measure, so Narayana is to us. As a greedy man, with his whole heart, loves wealth, so Narayana is to us. Tuka says: my mind has become one. It knows nothing other than Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reaches for two everyday loves to say how total his devotion is. The faithful wife treats her husband as her one standard for everything; the miser loves his money with every fiber of his being. He takes both of those single-minded attachments and says: that is exactly what Narayana is to us, the one measure, the one love. The poem ends by naming the result without ornament: his mind has become one undivided thing, and it can no longer recognize anything except Vitthal.

GATHA 0936 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the Name on every faculty

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sing Vitthal in your songs, meditate on Vitthal in your chitta, behold Vitthal standing upon the brick.

Vitthal is the friend of the helpless, the ocean of mercy. He severs the bonds of samsara and the noose of Yama.

He alone is the giver of liberation to those who surrender. Vitthal is found in the company of saints.

Vitthal is the treasure of virtues, the source of all attainments. Through Vitthal's name, samadhi is attained.

Says Tuka, by taking Vitthal's name, my mouth has grown sweet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sing Vitthal in your songs, hold Vitthal in your mind, look on Vitthal standing upon the brick. Vitthal is the brother of the helpless, the ocean of mercy; He cuts the bonds of worldly life and the noose of Yama. He alone gives liberation to those who surrender; Vitthal is found in the company of the saints. Vitthal is the treasure of all virtues, the source of every attainment; through Vitthal's name, deep stillness comes. Tuka says: when I take Vitthal's name, joy comes, and my mouth has turned sweet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets one name to every act of the body and mind: sing it, meditate on it, gaze on Vitthal upon the brick. He stacks up what that name does, naming the stakes each time: Vitthal is brother to the helpless, an ocean of mercy who cuts the bonds of worldly life and even the noose of death, and gives liberation to anyone who surrenders. He locates where the living God is found, in the company of the saints, and what the Name brings, the deep stillness of samadhi. The closing line is plain and bodily: the very taste of saying the Name has turned his mouth sweet.

GATHA 0937 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, catching God with the saints

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To catch hold of Vitthal, I have learned one sure way. I hold no fear in my chitta; how much strength does He hold?

He comes into your hands on His own; why not beg with pitiful entreaty? Then He does whatever is in His chitta.

By the force of solitary devotion alone, how will He ever be caught? But in the company of the Vaishnavas, He stands ready at their call.

Says Tuka, bind my jiva with the rope of love. I will not let go of Him, for He is generous with all that He has.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To catch Vitthal in my hands, I have learned one sure way. Hold no fear in your mind: how much strength does He really have? He comes into your hands of His own accord; so why not beg Him with pitiful pleading? Then He does whatever is in His heart. By the force of lonely devotion alone, when will He ever be caught? But in the gathering of the Vaishnavas, He stands ready at a single call. Tuka says: bind my soul with the rope of love. I will not let Him go, for He gives away all that He has.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram shares a strategy for laying hold of God, and the surprise is how gentle it is. He says to drop fear, because against love God has no real strength to resist; He comes into your hands on His own. So the way is not force but pitiful pleading, surrendering and letting God then do as He pleases. The key turn is in the third verse: devotion practiced alone, in isolation, rarely catches Him, but in the company of the Vaishnavas He stands ready at a single call. So Tuka asks to be bound with the rope of love and vows never to release the God who, once caught, gives away everything He has.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In Vaikuntha they watch the road, waiting for when the devotees will come. Those devotees carry no grief of birth and death, no grief over the afterlife in their chitta.

Blessed, blessed are the servants of Hari. Even the womb is easy for them. Brahma and the other gods long for the pilgrimage of meeting them.

Yama Dharma greatly desires to hear the sacred stories, watching day and night with folded hands.

Riches and powers come unsummoned, seeking out the devotees of Hari. Liberation itself waits at the path of the devotees.

Wherever they stand, they are forever filled with the joy of love, and they uplift even the greatly faulted and the most despised.

All beings long for them, yet they themselves remain wholly detached. Says Tuka, blessed is the fortune of those who receive their darshan.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In Vaikuntha they watch the road, waiting for the day the devotees come. Those devotees carry no grief of birth and death. There is no anxiety about the afterlife in their hearts. Blessed, blessed are the servants of Hari. Even the womb is easy for them. Brahma and the gods long to make the pilgrimage of meeting them. Yama, lord of dharma, longs to hear the sacred stories; he watches day and night with folded hands. Riches and powers come unsummoned, seeking out the devotees of Hari. Liberation itself waits at the path of these devotees. Wherever they stand, they are forever full of the joy of love. They lift up even the greatly faulted and the most despised. All beings long for them, yet they themselves stay wholly detached. Tuka says: blessed is the fortune of those who receive their darshan.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reverses the usual picture of heaven waiting at the end of the road, and puts Hari's devotees at the center instead. Vaikuntha, Brahma, and even Yama, the very judge of the dead, all stand in longing for these servants of Hari, who are free of the fear of birth, death, and the afterlife. The powers and the liberation that ordinary seekers strain after come on their own and wait at the devotee's feet. The mark of such a person is twofold: they are full of love's joy yet wholly detached, and they raise up even the lowest, the most despised. The stakes Tukaram names are simple: nearness to such a devotee, their darshan, is the highest fortune, higher than any heaven.

Warning against the counterfeit, gold over copper

मराठी मूळ

सोनें दावी वरी तांबें तयापोटीं । खरियाचे साटीं विकुं पाहे ॥1॥
पारखी तो जाणे तयाचे जीवींचें । निवडी दोहींचें वेगळालें ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One shows gold on the surface but hides copper within, hoping to sell it for the price of the real thing.

But the expert assayer knows the inner truth of his jiva and separates the two apart.

Just as milk and water may seem one, the one who discerns the taste separates them out.

Says Tuka, the one who stands firm in falsehood is already exposed. Great dishonor shall befall him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One shows gold on the surface but hides copper inside, hoping to sell it for the price of the real thing. But the assayer knows the inner truth of his soul and separates the two apart. Milk and water may look like one thing; the one who tastes them separates them out. Tuka says: the one who stands firm in falsehood is already exposed. Great dishonor will come to him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is warning against the pretense of holiness, the copper hidden under a coat of gold. The point is the assayer: there is one who tests, and the surface plating fools no one who knows how to look within. As a taster separates milk from water, the truth of a person's inner life is told apart from the show they put on. The warning is not contempt for the pretender but a hard fact about the pretense: false coin passes only until it meets the test, and then comes shame. Read against oneself, it asks where one is plating over copper and calling it gold.

GATHA 0940 Worldly Metaphors

Self-ruin, the man who breaks his own raft

मराठी मूळ

आपला घात आपण चि करी । आणिकां सांगतां नाइके तरी ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One breaks apart a raft and ties the planks around his waist. How will he ever reach the far shore this way?

He brings ruin upon himself. Even when others warn him, he does not listen.

Out of fear of hunger he now reaches for poison, seeking to bring about his own destruction.

Says Tuka, those who walk a straight path move forward. Those who go crooked stumble and are stopped.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One breaks apart a raft and ties the planks around his waist. How will he ever reach the far shore that way? He brings ruin on himself. Even when others warn him, he will not listen. Out of fear of hunger he now reaches for poison, working his own destruction. Tuka says: those who walk a straight path move forward. Those who go crooked stumble and are stopped.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram paints a man who destroys the very thing meant to carry him across, then straps the wreckage to his body and wonders why he cannot cross. The far shore is liberation; the raft is the means given for crossing, and the man dismantles it with his own hands. He pictures the same folly again: someone so afraid of going hungry that he swallows poison, choosing certain death over a passing want. The thread is willful self-ruin that refuses every warning. The closing line names the stakes plainly: the straight path moves forward, the crooked one stumbles and is stopped, so the choice of path is the whole matter.

The teacher's compassion, I cannot watch them drown

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It is for the sake of helping others that I speak these remedies. Beyond this, I have no other concern.

I cannot bear to watch people drowning before my eyes. Compassion rises within me.

Says Tuka, my eyes see clearly. When the time of bhoga comes, the truth of these words will become known.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It is for the sake of helping others that I speak these remedies. Beyond this, I have no other concern. I cannot bear to watch people drowning before my eyes. Compassion rises in me. Tuka says: my eyes see clearly. When the time of reaping comes, the truth of these words will be known.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram explains why he speaks at all: not for his own gain, but to help others, because he cannot stand by while people drown in the world. The remedies he offers are pressed out of compassion, not from any wish to be heard. He claims his sight is clear, that he sees what others do not. The stakes are deferred to the time of bhoga, the reckoning when each soul reaps what it has sown: only then, he says, will the truth of his warnings be proved. It is the stance of one who speaks unwelcome words now so they may be vindicated later.

GATHA 0942 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation to wake, drop your cleverness

मराठी मूळ

आठवे देव तो करावा उपाव । येर तजीं वाव खटपटा ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If you remember God, seek that remedy. Abandon all other struggles; they are empty and useless.

Wake up, please wake up! Why do you tire yourself in vain?

Under the weight of your own cleverness, you sink in the deep pool of samsara and never rise again.

Says Tuka, you will reach God through bhava. Knowing, on its own, takes you nowhere.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If you remember God, take up that remedy. Drop all the other struggles; they are empty and useless. Wake up, please wake up. Why do you wear yourself out for nothing? Under the weight of your own cleverness you sink in the deep pool of samsara and never rise. Tuka says: you will reach God through bhava. Knowing, by itself, takes you nowhere.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram calls a sleeper to wake before he drowns. The only remedy worth taking up is the remembrance of God; every other scheme and exertion is wasted effort. He names the precise thing that pulls a person under: not ignorance but cleverness, the weight of one's own learning, which sinks the soul in the deep pool of samsara. The closing line draws the sharp line he means: bhava, loving devotion, reaches God, while knowledge on its own carries one nowhere. The stake is plain and urgent, drowning or rising, and the choice is between trusting the mind and trusting the heart's love.

GATHA 0943 Renunciation

Renunciation, refusing to deal in wealth and praise

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let these words never leave my mouth: that any person receive offspring or wealth.

Such gratuitous dispensing only leads to the grief of downfall; both lead to the same result.

Let neither slander nor praise reach my ears, nor be received with an attentive mind.

Says Tuka, God becomes unattainable because of this: one is caught in the net of desire and delusion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let these words never leave my mouth: that any person should gain offspring or wealth. Such free dispensing leads only to the grief of downfall; both ends meet in the same ruin. Let neither slander nor praise reach my ears, nor be taken in with an eager mind. Tuka says: God becomes unreachable because of this, when one is caught in the net of desire and delusion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram refuses the role of a wonder-worker who hands out children and riches, and prays such words never pass his lips. He sees that granting these gifts only feeds the very desires that lead to a fall; giver and receiver alike are dragged down. He extends the refusal to his own ears: he wants neither blame nor flattery to enter and stir his mind. The reason he gives is the stake itself: God becomes unattainable to anyone caught in the net of craving and delusion, and gifts, fame, and the appetite for praise are the strands of that net. The poem is a deliberate shutting of doors that the world thinks of as rewards.

GATHA 0944 The Necessity of Experience

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When chitta itself is the witness, what use is public opinion? True self-interest lies within oneself.

Whatever arises as true reflection in the mind is itself true bhava, for God pervades all things, within and without.

Pure bhava needs no external justification; its truth shines forth of its own accord.

The one whose whole concern is the inner sweetness cares nothing for outward colors.

Says Tuka, pure bhava is the very cause. Narayana Himself will become the bard of such a soul.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the heart itself is the witness, what use is the opinion of the world? True good lies within oneself. Whatever rises as true reflection in the mind is itself true bhava, for this God fills all things, within and without. Pure bhava needs no outside defense; its truth shows of its own accord. The one whose whole care is the inner sweetness has no need of outward show. Tuka says: pure bhava is the cause of everything. Narayana Himself will become the bard of such a soul.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram locates the test of devotion inside, not in public opinion. When the heart is its own witness, the verdict of the crowd no longer matters, and one's real good is found within. Because God pervades everything, inside and out, whatever truly rises in the mind is itself genuine bhava and needs no external justification; it shines on its own. The person fixed on inner sweetness stops caring how things look from outside. The claim is bold and meant to land: where bhava is pure, Narayana Himself becomes that soul's praise-singer, so the only thing worth securing is the purity of the heart, not the approval of others.

Surrender, these are not my words

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

These are not my own words. Vitthal does everything.

Hold no sorrow; keep this in your chitta: your good will come.

False is that ego-pride. In the very telling, the path to abandon it has been shown.

Says Tuka, He alone knows what is His. I am merely His measure-holder.

IN PLAIN WORDS

These are not my own words. Vitthal does everything. Hold no sorrow; keep this in your heart: your good will come. False is that ego-pride. In the very telling, the way to drop it has been shown. Tuka says: He alone knows what is His. I am only His measure-holder.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram empties himself of authorship: the words are not his, Vitthal does it all. From this he draws a comfort for the listener, telling them to let go of grief because their good is assured. The obstacle he names is the false sense of I, the ego-pride, and he says the cure is already given in the act of speaking these words, which themselves point the way out. He ends by making himself small: God alone knows what belongs to Him, and Tukaram is merely the one who holds the measure, the vessel through which the grain is poured. The whole abhanga hands the doing back to God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Erect a wall before the mouth of desire; allow only what is needed for sustaining life.

This is the sign that Narayana has entered within: the settling of chitta is His mark.

At all times, with discernment, be attentive to the nature of the Self.

Says Tuka, the more one turns toward devotion, the more one feels God's nearness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Build a wall before the mouth of desire; allow only what is needed to sustain life. This is the sign that Narayana has come within: the settling of the heart is His mark. At all times make this your reflection; with discernment, stay attentive to the nature of the Self. Tuka says: the more one turns toward devotion, the more one feels God's nearness.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram gives a plain discipline: dam the mouth of desire, and let through only what bare living requires. He then tells how to know it is working: when the heart grows quiet, that settled stillness is itself the sign that Narayana has entered within. The work is constant, a steady, discerning attention to the Self rather than a single act. The closing line states the reward as a direct ratio: the more one turns toward devotion, the nearer God is felt to be. So restraint is not bleak self-denial here but the clearing in which God's presence becomes tangible.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Through contemplation I abided in the state of no-thought, still and motionless. How long should one go on prolonging even that?

The time of silence has come upon me now. Not even a residue of speech remains.

Whatever came to be done was done swiftly, leaving no room for doubt.

Says Tuka, attachment would simply not retreat. And so through renunciation itself, renunciation was accomplished.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Through contemplation I came to rest in no-thought, still and unmoving. How long should one keep prolonging even that? The time of silence has come upon me now. Not even a trace of speech is left. Whatever there was to do was done at once, leaving no room for doubt. Tuka says: attachment simply would not retreat. And so by renunciation itself, renunciation was accomplished.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the far end of the inner journey, where even contemplation has done its work and left him in motionless stillness, and he wonders how long one should keep dwelling there. Silence has now overtaken him, so complete that no residue of speech remains. Everything that needed doing was finished swiftly, with no doubt left to linger. The final paradox is the heart of it: attachment would not let go on its own, so the very act of renouncing had itself to be renounced, until renunciation completed itself. He is naming a state past method, where the means dissolve into the end.

GATHA 0948 The Necessity of Experience

Inner experience, the formless and the form

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The nirguna must take darshan of the saguna. Suddenly, separateness and difference arise.

Between You and me, no such thing falls now. We are as we are, wherever we are.

There should be no distance from one's own self. The answer has been spent, and so it is.

Says Tuka, firmness has come upon this body. Our Ananta, such is Your nature.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The formless must take darshan of the form. All at once, separateness and difference arise. Now nothing of that kind falls between You and me. We are as we are, wherever we are. There should be no distance from one's own self. The answer has been spent, and so it stands. Tuka says: a firmness has come upon this body. Our Ananta, such is Your own nature.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from the meeting point of the nirguna and the saguna, the formless God and God with form. The moment the formless looks upon a form, separateness and difference spring up, the very gap between worshipper and worshipped. But he says that gap has now closed between him and God: they simply are as they are, with no distance left, since there can be no separation from one's own self. He reports a firmness, a settledness, that has come over his whole being. The closing turn gives the reason: this unshakable nature is God's own, Ananta's, and Tukaram has come to share in it, so the steadiness in him is really the steadiness of God.

GATHA 0949 The Necessity of Experience

Inner experience, made of You, nothing lacking

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

From You alone I have come into being. Why should what is, be separate from You?

Look, having deliberated here: there is nowhere any excess or lack at all.

In the place where I was kept, nurturing it, preserving it carefully, I have remained.

Says Tuka, now I speak plainly. I have become kriyaanashta, like You.

IN PLAIN WORDS

From You alone I came into being. Why should what is be separate from You? Look, after thinking it over here: there is nowhere any excess or any lack at all. In the place where I was set, I have stayed, tending it, guarding it with care. Tuka says: now I speak plainly. I have become free of all doing, just like You.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram traces his whole being back to a single source: he arose from God alone, so he asks why anything that exists should stand apart from God at all. He invites a calm inspection and reports the finding, that nowhere is there any surplus or any want; all is full and complete as it is. He has simply stayed where he was placed, keeping watch over it. The plain confession at the end carries the weight: he has become kriyaanashta, emptied of all sense of being the doer, and in this he says he has become like God. The claim is bold and not to be softened: identity with the divine through the loss of doership.

GATHA 0950 Longing and Separation

Wounded love, the open nerve

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You have broken my love, O Panduranga. Why did You reveal the bhakti-rasa, sir?

Therefore I keep nothing in reserve. I have come to the vital point suddenly.

I see nothing going back at all. Whatever remainder remained is not there at the root.

Says Tuka, a rupture has come to the inner being. And so my face has grown bitter.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You have broken my love, Panduranga. Why did you ever show me the sweetness of bhakti, tell me that? So now I keep nothing back in reserve. All at once I have come to the raw and vital spot. I see nothing of me turning back; whatever was left in me is not there at the root anymore. Tuka says: a rupture has come to my inmost being, and so my mouth has turned bitter.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is accusing God of cruelty for a strange reason: God let him taste devotion in the first place. Once the sweetness of bhakti was shown, the longing it woke could not be unfelt, and now its breaking cuts to the nerve. He says he has held nothing in reserve and has nowhere to retreat; the very root of him has been emptied out. The bitterness in his mouth is not turning away from God but the wound of a love that has been opened and not yet answered.

Doubt in devotion, the restless mind

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे ताळी नाहीं । एके ठायीं चपळत्वें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When one calls God false like this, it feels like something resembling doubt.

Such has come to experience, even to me, while doing seva.

In the form of the void, very loose: these praises are a bundled skein.

Says Tuka, there is no taal. In one place, with quickness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When a man calls God false, it feels like something close to doubt. This is what has come to my own experience, even while I am doing my service. In the shape of emptiness there is a great loose tangle; these praises are a bundled skein. Tuka says: there is no steady beat. In one single place the mind keeps darting about.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is honest about a doubt that rises in the middle of his own devotion. Even while serving, the thought comes that God seems unreal, and he admits this feels uncomfortably like real doubt. He sees his own praises as a tangled skein wound around an emptiness, and he cannot hold a steady rhythm: the mind keeps darting even when fixed in one place. The poem names the unsettled inner state that devotion does not automatically cure, and refuses to pretend the restlessness is not there.

GATHA 0952 Longing and Separation

Bold complaint, matching God's indifference

मराठी मूळ

जैशासाठीं तैसें हावें । हें बरवें कळलेंसे ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For whatever purpose, one must become accordingly. This good thing has become known.

You are udasina, O Narayana. I too, I say, am You Yourself.

Cheat, great cheat, a pair. The direct one is the one who gets it.

Says Tuka, I argue alone, on one side. There is no danger to the jiva.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You must become whatever the situation asks of you; I have learned this well. You stay indifferent, Narayana, so I say I too am only You yourself. Cheat and great cheat, we make a pair; the one who comes at it straight is the one who gets caught. Tuka says: I will quarrel alone, one against you, and there is no risk to my life.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers God's coldness by mirroring it back. If God can stay detached and aloof, then Tukaram will claim he is no different from God himself, and meet indifference with indifference. He casts the two of them as a matched pair of tricksters, where the one who approaches honestly is the one who gets fooled. The defiance is the point: he will press his case alone, unafraid, because in his own life there is nothing left to lose.

GATHA 0953 Longing and Separation

Severance, love that meets only in thought

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have come pleading in many ways; still You do not hold me in Your chitta.

Why then, O God, should I nourish this vain longing any further?

Between You and me the bond has broken. Now our meeting will be only in thought.

Says Tuka, it is a matter of shame: a life that leans upon desire.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have come pleading in many ways, and still you do not hold me in your heart. Then why, God, should I go on feeding this empty longing? The bond between you and me has snapped. Now our meeting will happen only in thought. Tuka says: it is a shameful thing, a life that leans on its own desire.

WHAT IT MEANS

After pleading again and again without response, Tukaram decides to stop. He chooses to break off the visible bond rather than keep nourishing a longing that God seems not to return. The meeting will now happen only inwardly, in thought, since outwardly there is nothing. The closing line turns the blade on himself: a life propped up by its own wanting is something to be ashamed of, so the renunciation is also a confession about the neediness of his own desire.

GATHA 0954 Longing and Separation

Betrayed prayer, calling God back

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One strange thing has come to my mind.

I showed compassion to a dead thing, and that compassion went entirely to waste.

How can one not feel anger upon seeing such falseness?

Says Tuka, where are Your words now? Come, search for me, O my Vitthal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One strange thing has come into my mind. I poured out my compassion before a dead thing, and it went entirely to waste. How can a man not feel anger when he sees such falseness? Tuka says: where have your words gone now? Come, search me out, my Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the shock of pouring his heart out and getting nothing back, as if he had spent his tenderness on something lifeless. The anger he names is the anger of feeling deceived after trusting. Yet the bitterness does not end in rejection: he turns and demands that God keep his word. The last line reverses the whole complaint into a summons, telling Vitthal to come and seek him out, which is itself an act of refusing to let the bond go.

GATHA 0955 The Moral Ideal

Integrity in service, no flattery for hire

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have no desire to beg. I hold myself back in this way.

I will not offer false praise while holding desire in my chitta.

What comes by honest reckoning, that one should accept. Everyone knows this much.

Says Tuka, this is the Lord's own service. What room is there for reward here, O God?

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have no wish to beg; this is how I hold myself back. I will not offer false praise while hiding a want in my heart. What comes by honest reckoning, that one should take; everyone knows this much. Tuka says: this is the Lord's own service, so what room is there here for any reward, God?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets a code for how he will serve God: no begging and no flattery offered to get something in return. He will accept only what comes through honest dealing, the way anyone settles a fair account. The closing turn raises the whole thing higher: serving the Lord is not a transaction at all, so the question of payment does not even belong here. The poem holds devotion clean of the bargaining instinct, and quietly examines the self that would otherwise praise in order to be paid.

GATHA 0956 Longing and Separation

Silence over ritual, only the true meeting counts

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sending messages and falling at feet: what liberation comes of it? All of it is wasted.

What truly happens, happens in the meeting itself. Only that will look right to everyone.

Without seeing each other face to face, all talk is dry and hollow.

Says Tuka, I remain in silence. Hear the witness within.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sending messages, falling at the feet: what rescue ever comes of it? All of it is wasted. What truly happens, happens in the meeting itself; only that will look right to everyone. Without seeing each other face to face, all the talk is dry and hollow. Tuka says: I stay in my silence. Hear the witness within.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram dismisses the outward motions of devotion, the messages sent and the prostrations made, as getting no one anywhere on their own. What matters is the real meeting, the direct seeing of God face to face; without that, every word is dry. So he chooses silence over more empty talk and gestures. He appeals instead to the inner witness, the one who sees the heart directly, since that is the only audience before whom his case is honestly settled.

GATHA 0957 Devotion to Vitthal

Refuge found, the fearless place

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This is the one immovable place of fearlessness.

Therefore I placed my trust here and became a servant.

My longing is fulfilled; sweetness has taken hold at Your feet.

Says Tuka, Your name is on my throat, and love has filled my every limb.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is the one unshakable place of fearlessness. So I placed my trust here and became a servant. My longing is fulfilled; a sweetness has taken hold at your feet. Tuka says: your name is in my throat, and love has filled my every limb.

WHAT IT MEANS

After so much complaint and ache, this poem rests. Tukaram has found a place that does not move and does not threaten, and on that ground he commits himself as a servant. The restless longing of the other poems is here answered: a sweetness settles at God's feet and the wanting is stilled. The Name on his throat and the love filling his body are the signs that the search has arrived, that refuge has been taken and held.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If doubt is dispelled, then there is relish in it. For what is bland, there is no savour, no esteem.

Now do not dupe me with falsehood. Where am I to keep coming and going, again and again?

If the jiva departs, what of it? Having survived thus far, what work remains ahead?

Says Tuka, please judge rightly, O Lord. These children You have made fall at Your feet in supplication.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If the doubt is cleared away, then there is real taste in it; what stays bland holds no relish and no honor. Now do not cheat me with falseness. Where am I to keep coming and going, again and again? If this life departs, what of it? Having survived this far, what is left to do? Tuka says: judge it rightly, Lord. These children you have made are falling at your feet, pleading.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram refuses to settle for a tepid, half-felt devotion; only the doubt cleared away gives the thing real savor. He presses God to stop putting him off with empty promises, tired of the endless coming and going with no resolution. He even waves away the loss of life itself, asking what more there is to wait for. The closing turns it into a plea for fairness: he and the others are God's own children, fallen at the feet, and he asks the Lord to judge their case honestly.

GATHA 0959 Confession and Sin

Confession, habit against true experience

मराठी मूळ

वदे वाणी परि दुर्लभ अनुभव । चालीचा चि वाहो बहुतेक ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The tongue speaks, yet genuine experience is rare. The flow of habit carries most people along.

How are we to remain steady and still? Time pursues from behind and keeps defeating us.

In feeding the belly with the spread of hypocrisy, the principal itself will come back as loss.

Says Tuka, it is good to keep the mind awake. By Your fearless grace, O Narayana, let us act.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The tongue speaks, but real experience is rare; for most people it is only the drift of habit carrying them along. How are we to stay steady and still? Time hunts us from behind and keeps defeating us. Feed the belly with the spread of hypocrisy, and even the principal comes back as loss. Tuka says: it is good to keep the mind awake. By your fearless grace, Narayana, let us act.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram draws the line between talk and real experience, admitting that most lives, including the danger in his own, run on mere habit rather than truth. He names two threats: time, which keeps wearing the soul down, and hypocrisy, the show of piety used to feed the belly, which ends up costing more than it earns. The cure he points to is wakefulness, keeping the mind alert rather than drifting. The closing leans on God's fearless grace, since the strength to act rightly is asked for, not assumed.

GATHA 0960 Longing and Separation

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If this mind were to remain still and unmoving, why would torment and restlessness arise as exchange?

Who knows what playful devices are Yours? You play with supreme excellence.

You make us jivas dance in various compulsions, inflating desires before all manner of things.

Says Tuka, You are busy with the sport of enlarging Your own prestige and glory.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If this mind would simply stay still and unmoving, why would all this torment and churning arise instead? Who knows what playful tricks are yours? You play, and you play supremely well. With one device after another you make us living souls dance, swelling our cravings in front of every kind of thing. Tuka says: you are busy with this sport, enlarging your own prestige and glory.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram throws the blame for human restlessness back onto God, half in accusation and half in awe. If the mind could just be still, there would be no torment; since it cannot, he reasons that the unrest must be God's own doing. He pictures God as a master player who makes the living souls dance through their cravings, dangling desire before them at every turn. The sharp last line says God does all this to magnify his own glory, naming the suspicion that the whole restless world is the Lord's game while keeping it inside the relationship of devotee and Lord.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We have grown strong again, having turned back. In Your own words, we shall now ensnare You.

What happened then, happened; let the past be past. Now the vital point has become known to us.

To sever the connection with all strivings, one must become purely awakened beside the Pure.

Says Tuka, for us there is the path of atmatva. You Yourself are just exactly that.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We have grown strong again, having turned back. With your own words we will now bind you. What happened then is done; let the past stay in the past. Now the vital point has become known to us. To cut the link with all our strivings, one must become pure and awake beside the Pure. Tuka says: for us there is the way of the Self. You yourself are exactly that.

WHAT IT MEANS

After the wounds and complaints, Tukaram comes back stronger and turns the relationship around: he will hold God to God's own promises. He lets the painful past go and points to what he has now grasped, the vital secret. The way forward is to sever the tie with all anxious effort and stand clean and awake beside the Pure. The closing names the heart of it, the path of atmatva, selfhood, where the devotee realizes that God is not other but is exactly what he himself is.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I trust You. You are true; You will not pass me by. You know how impatient I am. Why has my deliverance been put off so long? Set this friction aside; stop the endless quarreling. I see it clearly now: there is no escape. So why must I keep being called back again? Tuka says: You are fortunate, O God. What loss is it to You to take charge of me?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses Vitthal on a promise he believes is owed and overdue. He starts from trust, then turns it into a complaint: if God is faithful, why is liberation deferred and why all this back and forth? He says he already knows there is no other way out, so being thrown back into the world makes no sense to him. The closing line is pointed almost to the edge of cheek: God risks nothing by saving him, so the delay is God's to answer for. It is the prayer of a soul that loves enough to argue.

Holding God to his title

मराठी मूळ

तुह्मां होईल देवा पडिला विसर । आह्मीं तें उत्तर यत्न केलें ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Perhaps You have forgotten, O God. We have tried our best with every word.

You parade the title Purifier of the Fallen. Now give an account of it.

I am not hungry for wealth. I will ward off that hunger with whatever word comes.

Says Tuka, I shall offer up this body, and with it all pride, waving it as an offering.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Maybe You have forgotten me, O God. We have tried everything we can say. You wear the title Purifier of the Fallen. Now give an account of it. I am not hungry for wealth. Any small word from You would end that hunger. Tuka says: I will give up this body. I will wave it away as an offering, and all my pride with it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes God's own reputation and holds it up as a debt. The title "Purifier of the Fallen" is a claim about who God is; Tukaram demands that God live up to it now, on him. He insists he wants nothing material, only a word, a sign of being received. The last line shows the price he will pay: he offers his body and, harder still, his pride, surrendering the very self that has been bargaining. The poem turns God's name into a promise that cannot be left unkept.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have clung to You, body against body. Now keep me close at hand. There is enough still to manage in this world.

First remove the obstacles. Clear a space, and that space itself is buddhi. Once the opportunity is seized, who has the strength to resist?

I shall bind myself to Your feet. I will not let You stir from that spot. The reckoning comes after one has been humbled.

Says Tuka, I know You well, O Vithoba. Loud crying out is in Your very nature, from the root.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have clung to You, body against body. Now keep me close. There is still enough left to manage in this world. First clear away the obstacles. Make me some room, and that room itself is wisdom. Once I have seized the chance, who has the strength to push me off? I will bind myself to Your feet. I will not let You stir from that spot. The reckoning comes after one has been brought low. Tuka says: I know You well, O Vithoba. Crying out loud has been Your nature from the very start.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a grip he has no intention of loosening. He has pressed himself against God and now refuses to be set down until the work of his life is done. He asks God to clear his obstacles, then quietly redefines the cleared space as wisdom itself. Having caught hold of God's feet, he says he will pin God in place and not let him move. The final line is knowing and warm: he tells Vithoba that loud crying out has always been part of God's own way, so God can hardly fault him for crying out in turn.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We are without strength. We do not know what You will do. Entangled in worldly bonds, I have remained stuck.

O God, give me what is mine. Let the treasure You have kept remain. I do not covet anything extra or greater.

I have not become a burden hanging at Your neck. What is Your mouth is my mouth, in all four directions. This long delay is improper.

I have no more strength, O Gopala. Says Tuka, resolve this. I fall at Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We have no strength. We do not know what You will do. Tangled in worldly bonds, I have stayed stuck. Give me what is mine, O God. Keep the treasure You have stored away; I do not covet anything extra, anything greater. I have not hung from Your neck like a dead weight. Your mouth and mine are one, in all four directions. This long delay is not right. I have no strength left now, O Gopala. Tuka says: untangle this. I fall at Your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a careful, almost legal plea: he asks not for riches but only for what is rightfully his. He admits he is weak and snared in the world, unable to free himself. He insists he has not been a burden or a beggar at God's neck; his voice and God's are one, so the delay in answering shames them both. The closing surrender is plain: his strength is gone, and he drops at Gopala's feet asking only that the knot be loosed. It is the prayer of someone claiming a birthright, not a favor.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Without Your grace, what pressure can I bring? Let there be a final verdict, one way or another.

Let me remain as I am, in all my lowliness, expending words of compassion.

Should I carry fear now? Should I bear worry? What use now is claiming kinship?

Says Tuka, we are jivas devoid of devotion. That is why God stays far, far away.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Without Your grace, what pressure can I bring? Let there be a final verdict, one way or the other. Let me stay as I am, in all my lowliness, spending words of pleading. Should I hold fear now? Should I carry worry? What use is it now to claim kinship with You? Tuka says: we are souls empty of devotion. That is why God stays far, far away.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks for a final answer and then sits down to wait in his own poverty. He sees that he has no leverage over God except grace itself, so he keeps spending the only thing he has, words of longing. He sets down fear, worry, and even the easy claim of being God's relative, since none of these can move God. The last line turns the gaze back on himself: God seems far away not because God is cold but because the soul is empty of real devotion. The honesty is the point, not the despair.

GATHA 0967 Longing and Separation

Longing, the servant left forgotten

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे तुह्मां लाज येत नाहीं । आह्मां चिंताडोहीं बुडवितां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have not transgressed anyone's word. Why then has Narayana become distant from me?

With an undoubting mind I keep calling out, yet the certainty of His reassurance does not come.

To forget one's servant is not fitting. All right conduct and justice reside at Your feet.

Says Tuka, are You not ashamed to drown us in this deep pool of worry?

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have not broken anyone's word. Why then has Narayana grown distant from me? With an unwavering mind I keep calling out, yet the peace of being reassured never comes. To forget Your servant is not fitting. All right conduct and justice rest at Your feet. Tuka says: are You not ashamed to drown us in this deep pool of worry?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram protests an absence he has done nothing to earn. He has kept faith and broken no promise, so God's distance feels like injustice rather than punishment. He keeps calling without doubt, but the answering calm never arrives. He reminds Narayana that forgetting one's own servant goes against the very justice that lives at God's feet. The last line is bold to the edge of accusation: he asks whether God feels no shame at leaving his devotees to drown in worry. The boldness is itself a form of trust.

GATHA 0968 Longing and Separation

Longing, weaker than a mother's love

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे नाहीं वचनासी रुचि । फल कटवें चि तें तें होय ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A mother endures to the point of giving up her very life for the sake of her child. Such is the wonder of an infant's power.

Is He weak then, that He does not hear with His own ears? What deficiency has arisen in Narayana?

Moment by moment, You must keep watch over me. The time of the ill-fated one has come to this.

Says Tuka, my own words have lost all relish. Whatever fruit comes now is bitter and astringent.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A mother will give up her own life for her child. Such is the power of an infant. Is He weak, then, that He cannot hear with His own ears? What lack has come over Narayana? Watch over me from one moment to the next. The unlucky one's hour has come to this. Tuka says: my words have lost all their relish. Whatever fruit comes now tastes bitter and sharp.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures God against an ordinary mother and finds God strangely lacking. A mother will die for her infant; the helpless child commands that much love. So why does Narayana, who is not weak, seem not to hear? He begs for moment by moment care, naming himself the unlucky one whose time has turned hard. The closing image is bleak: even his own words have gone flat, and everything tastes bitter. He is not denying God's power; he is pleading that it be turned toward him as a mother's is toward her child.

GATHA 0969 Longing and Separation

Longing, calling out and getting silence

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे अगा चतुरा शिरोमणी । विचारावें मनीं केशीराजा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Therefore I have become like one who is no longer truly a servant. I speak before my Lord from my own experience.

Why is there no word, no reply? I alone exhaust myself in loud, brazen outcry.

Without some sweetness, without the very rasa of love, how can faith or affection take root?

Says Tuka, O crown jewel of the wise, O Keshiraja, reflect upon this in Your mind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

And so I have become like one who is no longer truly a servant. I speak before my Lord out of what I have lived. Why is there no word, no reply? I wear myself out alone in this loud, stubborn crying. Without some sweetness, without the very taste of love, how can faith take root, how can affection grow? Tuka says: O crown jewel of the wise, O Keshiraja, turn this over in Your mind.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as a servant who feels he has stopped being one, since service without an answer hardly counts as service. He has cried out long and hard with no reply, and he names the cost: he is exhausting himself alone. Then he makes a quiet argument about how love works. Faith and affection cannot grow without some sweetness, some taste of being loved in return. He ends by appealing to God's intelligence, asking the "crown jewel of the wise" to simply consider the matter. He is asking God to be reasonable about love.

GATHA 0970 Confession and Sin

Confession, refusing a hollow vocation

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Should I now merely fill my belly and go on deceiving the world, calling myself a devotee?

If so, then tell me this clearly, sir, for I am deeply, sorely distressed.

Should I make a show of poetic craft, merely stitching letters together?

Says Tuka, should I stay enmeshed in this shop, O Narayana, and bring only ruin upon myself?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Should I just fill my belly now and go on fooling the world by calling myself a devotee? If that is all, then tell me plainly, sir; I am deeply, sorely distressed. Should I make a show of poetry, just stitching letters together? Tuka says: should I stay tangled in this shop, O Narayana, and bring nothing but ruin on myself?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram interrogates his own calling and rejects every counterfeit version of it. He refuses to be a devotee in name only, someone who lives off the role while deceiving people. He refuses to treat his poems as mere craft, clever arrangements of words with no living God behind them. The image of a "shop" names the danger sharply: turning devotion into a trade that profits him and ruins his soul. He puts the question to Narayana directly, asking for clarity rather than letting himself drift into a comfortable fraud. The poem is a vow against spiritual self-deception.

GATHA 0971 Prayers

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Show me the secret, O God. What do I know of it?

I have become lowly across so many colours of life, and so I have come to Your refuge.

If You would grant me steadiness, my mind would settle in its own place.

Says Tuka, by the force of Your sovereign authority, protect these beloved, pampered children of Yours.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Show me the secret, O God. What do I know of it? I have grown lowly across so many turns of life, so I have come to Your refuge. If You grant me steadiness, my mind will settle in its own place. Tuka says: by the force of Your sovereign power, protect these pampered children of Yours.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram admits he does not know the hidden key to the path and asks God to show it to him. Worn down through many phases of life, he comes not as an expert but as a refugee. His one request is steadiness, because a settled mind would come to rest on its own. The closing line leans on God's authority and tenderness at once. He calls the devotees God's spoiled, beloved children and asks God to use sovereign power simply to keep them safe. Humility and trust carry the whole prayer.

GATHA 0972 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the love of speaking to God

मराठी मूळ

सांगों काय नेणा देवा । बोलाची त्या आवडी ॥1॥
वांयां मज चुकुर करा । विश्वंभरा विनोदें ॥ध्रु.॥
आवडीच्या करा ऐसें। अंतर्वासें जाणतसां ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे समाधानें । होइन मनें मोकळा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You know everything, O God, yet this love of words keeps arising.

In Your playfulness, O Vishvambhara, You slip away from me for no reason.

Do as Your affection dictates. You who dwell within already know.

Says Tuka, through contentment, my mind shall become open and free.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What can I tell You, O God, that You do not know? Still this love of words keeps rising in me. In Your playfulness You slip away from me for no reason, O Vishvambhara. Do as Your affection moves You. You who dwell within already know my heart. Tuka says: through contentment, my mind will become open and free.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram knows God needs no information from him, yet he cannot stop speaking, because love wants to talk to the beloved. He reads God's apparent absences as play, not rejection, the teasing of one who is sure of being loved. He hands the matter over to God's affection and notes that God, dwelling within, already knows everything he could say. The resolution is inward: contentment, not a louder demand, is what will leave his mind open and free. The poem turns longing into a settled, playful trust.

GATHA 0973 Prayers

Devotion, only Your love sets me dancing

मराठी मूळ

निर्धाराचें अवघें गोड । वाटे कोड कौतुक ॥1॥
बैसलिया भाव पांयीं । बरा तई नाचेन ॥ध्रु.॥
स्वामी कळे सावधान। तरि मन उल्हासे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आश्वासावें । प्रेम द्यावें विठ्ठले ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Everything of firm resolve is sweet. It feels like delight and wonder.

When bhava has settled at Your feet, only then will I dance properly.

When it becomes known that the Lord is attentive, the mind exults.

Says Tuka, give me reassurance; give me Your love, O Vitthal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the resolve is firm, everything is sweet. It feels like delight and wonder. When my devotion has settled at Your feet, only then will I dance as I should. When I know the Lord is watching with care, my mind leaps up. Tuka says: reassure me; give me Your love, O Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes how everything tastes sweet once the heart is set with firm resolve. But he is honest that the resolve depends on God. His devotion has to settle at God's feet before he can truly dance, and his mind only lifts when he knows the Lord is attentive to him. So the poem ends as a request, not a boast. He asks Vitthal for reassurance and for love, since the joy he longs to feel can only come once that love is given. Delight here is a gift waiting on God's response.

GATHA 0974 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the cut bond

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The cutting has happened. I have fallen exposed before all.

I belong to no one now; I am carried in Your current.

This worldly life has withered away; my seat within it is broken.

Says Tuka, O God, do not keep me at a distance now.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The cutting has happened. I have fallen open before everyone. I belong to no one now. I am carried in Your current. This worldly life has withered. My seat in it is broken. Tuka says: God, do not keep me at a distance now.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from the moment the old ties have already snapped. Whatever held him to ordinary life has been cut, and he stands exposed, claimed by no person and no station. He does not grieve this; he reads it as God carrying him away in a current he cannot resist. His one fear is that, having been emptied of every other belonging, he might still be left without God, so he asks only not to be kept at a distance.

GATHA 0975 Prayers

Prayer, the only support

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

May You become my support, O God. Such is the longing I hold.

What is lacking with You? What does it cost You to grant peace?

In the longing for Your service, the mind has gone quite mad.

Says Tuka, O Narayana, You who are bound by the offenses of Your devotees.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Be my support, O God. This is the longing I hold. What is lacking with You? What does it cost You to grant peace? In longing for Your service, my mind has gone quite mad. Tuka says: O Narayana, You are bound by Your devotees' faults.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks God to be the one thing he leans on, and then presses the request with a kind of holy logic. God lacks nothing, so granting peace costs Him nothing; why withhold it? He admits his mind has gone mad with wanting to serve. The closing line is the boldest move: he reminds Narayana that God has bound Himself to His devotees, so their failings are now His responsibility to bear, not grounds to turn away.

GATHA 0976 Longing and Separation

Longing, holding God to His own descent

मराठी मूळ

तुमचा तुह्मीं केला गोवा । आतां चुकवितां देवा ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे आतां । न सरे हवाले घालितां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You have entangled Yourself in Your own doing. Now You are trying to escape, O God.

How long will this game of teasing go on? Why did You make us wise at all?

Why did You take on form? Why did You come into name, O Father?

Says Tuka, now it will not do to hand this off to another.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You tangled Yourself in Your own doing. Now You are trying to slip away, O God. How long will this teasing go on? Why did You make us wise at all? Why did You take on form? Why did You come into name, O Father? Tuka says: now it will not do to hand me off to someone else.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the tables and holds God accountable for getting involved in the first place. God chose to take form, to take a name, to draw His devotees close and make them long for Him; that entanglement was His own act. So the present distance feels like teasing, an attempt to slip free of a bond God created. Tukaram refuses any substitute: having been awakened by God Himself, he will not be passed off to another and accept anything less than God in person.

GATHA 0977 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, single-pointed and waiting

मराठी मूळ

माझी भक्ती भोळी । एकविध भावबळी ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे जोडुनि पाय । पुढें उगा उभा राहें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My bhakti is simple and innocent, single-pointed, strong in bhava alone.

Why should I fall apart and be left out, having abandoned such a celebration?

Let there be no difference here now, not even once.

Says Tuka, joining my feet in supplication, I stand quietly before You.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My bhakti is simple and innocent, single-pointed, strong only in bhava. Why should I fall apart and be left out, having let go of such a celebration? Let there be no distance here now, not even once. Tuka says: joining my hands at Your feet, I stand quietly before You.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes his devotion plainly: it is not clever or many-sided, only single-hearted, leaning entirely on feeling for God. Having given up everything else for this one joy, he cannot bear to be the one left outside it. So he asks that no gap open between him and God, not even for an instant. He ends in the posture of total dependence, hands joined at God's feet, standing silent and waiting.

Devotion, intimacy without fear

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे रुची । येथें भिन्नता कैची ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I speak with the authority born of closeness. Such are the tidings I declare.

These are the words of bodily intimacy, like children through familiar service.

We dwell in such nearness that there is no room for timidity.

Says Tuka, where there is such relish, how can there be any separateness?

IN PLAIN WORDS

If there is the right, I speak with such boldness. These are the words of bodily closeness, a child's freedom in familiar service. Living so near, let there be no timidity. Tuka says: where there is such relish, how can there be any separateness?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram explains the freedom behind his bold address to God. He speaks the way a small child speaks to its parents, with no formality, because long and intimate service has earned that nearness. Such closeness leaves no room for hesitation or fear. And where there is this much shared sweetness between devotee and God, the idea of two separate beings simply dissolves; intimacy itself has erased the distance.

GATHA 0979 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, the shape of a devout day

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Spend your days in contemplation, bathing in the Ganga of solitude, worshipping God, circumambulating the tulsi.

Eat moderately, conduct yourself with discipline, govern your senses. Avoid excess sleep and too much talk.

The great wealth of spiritual life is won by earning God's feet. These are the means to gain that profit.

Surrender the body to God; carry no burden at all. Says Tuka, then all will become joy.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Spend your days in contemplation, bathe in the Ganga of solitude, worship God, circle the tulsi. Eat in measure, live with discipline, hold the senses in check. Do not sleep too much or talk too much. The great wealth is won by earning God's feet. These are the means to that gain. Surrender the body to God; carry no burden at all. Tuka says: then everything becomes joy.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out a plain rule of life for one who wants God. The day is filled with contemplation, solitude treated as a holy bathing-place, simple worship around the tulsi, moderate food, restraint of the senses, and the avoidance of idle sleep and chatter. He frames all of it as the practical means to one end: earning God's feet, the only real wealth. The final step is the largest: hand the whole body over to God and stop carrying any burden yourself, and then the whole of life turns to joy.

We Vishnu-servants are softer than wax, yet such that we can pierce the hardest diamond.

Dead yet alive, asleep yet awake: whatever anyone asks of us, that we give.

To the worthy we give the loincloth off our arse; to the obstinate we deal a knot on the head.

More loving than mother and father, yet more capable of striking down than an enemy.

What is nectar's sweetness before us? How bitter, after all, is poor wretched poison?

Says Tuka, we are altogether sweet, in the manner of one whose longing is fully met.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We servants of Vishnu are softer than wax, yet able to pierce the hardest diamond. Dead yet alive, asleep yet awake: whatever anyone asks of us, that we give. To the deserving we give the loincloth off our body; to the stubborn we deal a knock on the head. More loving than mother and father, yet more able to strike down than an enemy. What is nectar's sweetness before us? How bitter, after all, is poor wretched poison? Tuka says: we are wholly sweet, taking the form each one's longing calls for.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the strange double nature of God's servants. They are tender past softness toward the humble, and at the same time strong enough to break what is hardest; they are beyond the usual states of living and dead, sleep and waking. To the deserving they will give everything, down to the cloth on their body, but to the obstinate they answer with a blow that wakes them up. They outdo a mother in love and an enemy in striking power, beyond both nectar and poison, because they simply become whatever shape each seeker's longing requires.

GATHA 0981 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the inconstant base man

मराठी मूळ

गाढवाचें तानें । पालटलें क्षणक्षणें ॥1॥
तैसे अधमाचे गुण । एकविध नाहीं मन ॥ध्रु.॥
उपजतां बरें दिसे । रूप वाढतां तें नासे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे भुंकते वेळे । वेळ अवेळ न कळे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The braying of a donkey shifts and changes moment to moment.

Such are the qualities of the base: the mind is never of one kind.

At birth it appears good; as the form grows, that goodness is destroyed.

Says Tuka, when it barks, it knows not the right time from the wrong.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A donkey's braying shifts and changes moment to moment. So are the traits of the base man: his mind is never of one kind. At birth he looks fine; as he grows up, that goodness is ruined. Tuka says: when he barks, he does not know right time from wrong.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures the base character by its inconstancy. Like a donkey's braying that lurches from one pitch to another, such a person's mind never holds a single shape; you cannot trust it from one moment to the next. The promise that showed at birth gets spoiled as the person grows. And like a dog that barks heedless of the hour, this kind of person speaks and lashes out with no sense of fitness or timing. The point is to recognize this driftiness, in others and in oneself, not to despise a man.

GATHA 0982 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, true purity is inward

मराठी मूळ

विटाळ तो परद्रव्य परनारी । येथुनि जो दुरी तो सोंवळा ॥1॥
गद्यें पद्यें कांहीं न धरावी उपाधी । स्वाधीन चि बुद्धि करुनी ठेवा ॥ध्रु.॥
विचाराचें कांहीं करावें स्वहित । पापपुण्यांचीत भांडवल ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे न लगे जावें वनांतरा । विश्व विश्वंभरा सारिखें चि ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Pollution is another's wealth and another's wife: one who keeps distant from these is truly pure.

In prose or verse, take on no entanglement; keep your buddhi sovereign, under your own sway.

Through discernment, attend to your own good: the capital of sin and merit is what matters here.

Says Tuka, no need to go to the forest. The world and Vishvambhara are one and the same.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Defilement is another's wealth and another's wife. Whoever stays far from these is truly pure. In prose or verse, take on no entanglement; keep your own mind free, under your own command. Through discernment, attend to your real good. The account that matters is the ledger of sin and merit. Tuka says: no need to go off to the forest. The world and Vishvambhara are one and the same.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram redefines purity away from outward ritual cleanness and toward conduct. The only real defilement is coveting what is not yours, money or another's wife; keep clear of that and you are clean. Do not get tangled in clever talk or argument; keep your own mind sovereign and use discernment to weigh what actually helps you, since the true ledger is one of right and wrong deeds. And there is no need to flee to the forest to find God, because the world itself is none other than Vishvambhara, the one who fills and sustains all.

Saints, the rare wish-granting one

मराठी मूळ

कल्पतरु रुया नव्हती बाभुळा । पुरविती फळा इच्छतिया ॥1॥
उदंड त्या गाई ह्मैसी आणि शेळ्या । परि त्या निराळ्या कामधेनु ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे देव दाखवील दृष्टी । तया सवें भेटी थोर पुण्य ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Wish-fulfilling trees are not thorny acacia. They give fruit to all who desire it.

There are many cows, buffaloes, and goats in abundance, yet the wish-fulfilling cow is distinct from them all.

Says Tuka, God will reveal Himself to the sight; the encounter with Him is great merit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wish-granting trees are not thorny acacia. They give their fruit to all who long for it. There are plenty of cows and buffaloes and goats, yet the wish-granting cow stands apart from them all. Tuka says: God will show Himself to the sight. To meet Him is great merit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is marking how rare the true giver is. Most trees are thorn-scrub that yield nothing; the wish-granting tree, by contrast, gives fruit to every longing heart. Herds of ordinary cattle are everywhere, but the wish-granting cow, Kamadhenu, is of another order entirely. So too the saint, or God Himself, stands apart from the common run. And the promise lands plainly: God will reveal Himself to the one who seeks, and that meeting is the greatest merit a life can hold.

GATHA 0984 Worldly Metaphors

Hypocrisy, the show of false devotion

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे सर्प डोले । तैसा कथेमाजी खुले ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Cursed be the love that is mere show, like the moth that goes, deluded.

A daughter-in-law weeps for her mother-in-law, but the feeling within is different.

The monkey is soft-mouthed on the surface, but its nature within is something else.

Like the beauty of the Vrindavan shrine, excellent to take up in hand.

The crane holds the pose of meditation, performing its act, hunting for fish.

Says Tuka, the serpent sways to music; in the same way, a hypocrite blooms within the katha.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Cursed be love that is only show, like the moth that flies into the flame, deluded. A daughter-in-law weeps for her mother-in-law, but the feeling inside is something else. The monkey is soft-mouthed on the surface, but its nature within is otherwise. Like the painted beauty of a Vrindavan shrine, fine to hold in the hand. The crane holds the pose of meditation, putting on an act while it hunts for fish. Tuka says: the snake sways to the music; in just that way a fraud blooms in the holy katha.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips the mask off counterfeit devotion. He stacks up images of inner and outer not matching: the fake mourner, the soft-mouthed monkey, the pretty shrine you only hold for show, the crane standing still as if meditating while it stalks fish, the snake swaying as if charmed by the music. Each one performs holiness while something else moves inside. The target is the hypocrite who comes alive in the sacred gathering, the katha, as a stage for display. The warning is to examine whether one's own devotion is felt within or merely performed.

GATHA 0985 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, conduct over costume

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे शूर तो चि पावे मान । आणीक मंडण भार वाही ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

These words do not fault the garment; they fault the character within. Do not be offended by such plain speech.

Everyone knows that food is the life of the jiva, but when poison is mixed in, it becomes deadly.

Everyone knows gold is pure; alloying it with base metal debases it.

The birth may be pure but the conduct is low; even that pretence is wasted.

Says Tuka, only the truly brave one earns respect. Others merely carry the burden of adornment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

These words do not blame the robe. They blame the bad character within. Do not take offense at such plain speech. Everyone knows food is the life of the body; but mix poison in, and it turns deadly. Everyone knows gold is pure; alloy it with base metal, and it is debased. The birth may be pure, but the conduct low, and even that disguise is wasted. Tuka says: only the truly brave one earns honor. The rest just carry the weight of their ornaments.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes clear he is not attacking the outward sign, the holy garb or the high birth, but the rotten character it can hide. Just as nourishing food becomes poison once poison is stirred in, and pure gold loses its worth once alloyed, a pure pedigree is wasted when the conduct beneath it is low; the costume cannot redeem it. Real honor is earned by the genuinely brave and true person, not by the trappings. Everyone else is merely lugging around decoration that proves nothing. The plain speech is offered as correction, not insult, and asks each listener to check the inside, not the dress.

GATHA 0986 The Necessity of Experience

Realization, the self made small and vast

मराठी मूळ

अणुरणीयां थोकडा । तुका आकाशाएवढा ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Tuka is smaller than the smallest atom, yet as vast as the sky.

Having swallowed it, I have cast away the whole form of worldly illusion and fear.

The triputi has been cast away; the lamp blazes in the vessel.

Says Tuka, now I remain only for the benefit of others.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Tuka is smaller than the smallest atom, and as wide as the sky. I have swallowed it and thrown it away: the whole shape of worldly delusion and fear. The triputi is gone. The lamp is burning inside the vessel. Tuka says: now I am left only to be of use to others.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is reporting what is left of him after realization. He has lost the fixed size of a separate self: he is now both finer than an atom and as boundless as the sky, because he no longer ends where his body ends. The form of the world, with its delusion and its fear, has been swallowed and cast off, and the triputi, the split between knower, knowing, and known, is gone, so the lamp burns clear inside him. With nothing left to gain for himself, the one thing that remains is usefulness to others.

GATHA 0987 The Saints

The saints' darshan, a festival day

मराठी मूळ

धन्य आजि दिन । जालें संताचें दर्शन ॥1॥

जालें समाधान । पायीं विसांवले मन ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आले घरा । तो चि दिवाळीदसरा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Blessed is this day, for I have had the darshan of the saints.

All suffering of sin and affliction is cut away; all wretchedness vanished at once.

The mind has come to rest at their feet; this is my peace.

Says Tuka, the day the saints come to one's home is itself Diwali and Dussehra.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Blessed is this day. I have had the darshan of the saints. The pain of sin and affliction is cut off. My wretchedness left me at once. I am at peace. My mind has come to rest at their feet. Tuka says: the day the saints come to your home is itself Diwali and Dussehra.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming what the sight of holy people does to a person. Their darshan, simply seeing them, cuts off the burning of sin and lifts off the misery he was carrying, and it happens all at once, not by slow effort. His restless mind finally settles, laid down at their feet. He ends by saying their visit outshines the great festivals: where the saints come, that ordinary day is already Diwali and Dussehra.

Surrender, the servant's only wealth

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This alone is my wealth: to bow at Your feet.

By this good fortune may I live, having offered my entire chitta.

You have watched over this helpless jiva, O God.

Says Tuka, with folded hands, this servant makes his supplication.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This alone is my wealth: to bow at Your feet. By this good fortune may I stay alive, having given You my whole mind. You have watched over me, O God, a helpless creature. Tuka says: with folded hands, this servant makes his plea.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips his life down to one possession and one request. He owns nothing he counts as wealth except the act of bowing at God's feet, and he asks only to go on living for the sake of that, having already handed over his entire mind. He calls himself helpless, an orphan creature, and credits God alone with having kept him safe. The poem ends as a servant's petition, made with folded hands, claiming no merit of his own.

GATHA 0989 Appeals and Exhortations

Self-correction, harden the mind

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O disgraced and shameless mind, how many times must I tell you? Do not follow after anyone.

Through attachment, suffering has clung to the body. Faithless is the pleasure of worldly love in this world.

Let anyone praise or blame; O compassionate Lord, do not hold any longing for pleasure or pain.

Why do the great yogis not remain seated on one seat? It is precisely for this quality that they do.

Says Tuka, O mind, think it over. Become hard as a thunderbolt.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Shameless, disgraced mind, how many times must I tell you? Do not go running after anyone. Through fondness, suffering has stuck to the body. The pleasure of worldly love has no faith in it. Let anyone praise or blame. O compassionate one, do not long for pleasure or for pain. Why do the great yogis stay seated, unmoving, on one seat? It is exactly for this. Tuka says: mind, think it over. Become hard as a thunderbolt.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is scolding his own mind for chasing after people and attachments. He points out the trap: it is fondness itself that has glued suffering to the body, and the comforts of worldly love cannot be trusted to last. The cure is to stop reacting to either praise or blame and to stop craving pleasure or fearing pain, which is exactly why the great yogis can sit unmoved on one seat. He tells the mind to weigh this and grow as hard and unbreakable as a thunderbolt, not from coldness but from steadiness.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let such a buddhi of mine be burned, for it casts me into You. I love this way: even prohibition itself becomes beautiful.

You are the Master and I the servant; one exalted and one lowly. Maintain this beautiful play and do not break it.

Water does not consume water; a tree does not eat its own fruit. The enjoyer is separate, and by that separation, sweetness is tasted.

A diamond is adorned by its setting; gold is displayed through ornament. Yet being one, what second thing is there to know?

In heat one delights in shade; at the sight of her babe, a mother's milk flows. When one meets the other, what joy is in that hour!

Says Tuka, my chitta considers this its truest good. Now mukti shall not come: so firm is this conviction.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let this thinking of mine be burned, the thinking that throws me into You. I love this way: even the no, the prohibition, is good to me. You are the master, I am the servant. One high, one low. Keep this play going. Do not break it. Water does not eat water. A tree does not eat its own fruit. The enjoyer stays apart, and by that the sweetness is tasted. A diamond shines in its setting. Gold is shown off in the ornament. But if there is only one, what second thing is there to know? In the heat, shade feels sweet. When the baby comes, the mother's milk lets down. One meets the other: what a joy in that moment. Tuka says: my mind holds this as its real good. Now mukti will not come to me. So sure am I of this.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is refusing oneness in favor of relationship. He wants God to keep the difference of master and servant, high and low, because only when two stand apart can love be tasted, the way water cannot drink water and a tree cannot eat its own fruit. His images all need two, the diamond and its setting, the heat and the shade, the baby and the mother whose milk flows at the sight of it: the sweetness lives in the meeting, not in the collapse. So he openly says he no longer wants mukti, liberation into the One, because that would dissolve the very relationship that is his joy. The radical claim is that he prefers being God's servant forever over being absorbed into God.

Longing for the devotees of Hari

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे माझ्या जीवाचें जीवन । सोइरे हरिजन प्राणसखे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The words of one who dwells in the mind are always dear. One longs to know their news.

Those who are kindred by nature pine for each other ceaselessly; even separation cannot sever their bond.

The longing for meeting, the reverence growing ever greater: one asks again and again, unable to be patient.

Says Tuka, the devotees of Hari are the very life of my life, companions of my very prana.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The words of the one who lives in my mind are dear to me. I feel I must hear news of them. Those who are kin by their nature pine for each other without stop. Even being apart can never cut the bond. The wish to meet, the growing respect: I ask after them again and again, and cannot wait. Tuka says: the devotees of Hari are the life of my life, my kin, the friends of my very breath.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing how he loves God's devotees, with the ache of someone separated from family. Their words stay dear and he keeps wanting word of how they are, because those who share the same inner nature pine for each other and distance cannot break the tie. The longing to meet only deepens his respect, so he asks after them over and over, unable to be patient. He ends by calling the devotees of Hari the life of his life and the friends of his very breath: this is kinship of the spirit, not of blood.

GATHA 0992 Faith and Trust

Faith, hold Pandhari in the mind

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे देह पडो या चिंतनें । पुढें लागे येणें याजसाटीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It may not bring rest, yet if one holds it in the mind, Panduranga sustains.

Keep the resolve to go to Pandhari alive in the mind. If you hold fast, you will reach Him; there is no doubt.

Even if the body lacks strength and is in another's power, do not abandon this contemplation.

Says Tuka, let the body fall in this very contemplation. It is for this purpose alone that what comes next follows.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It may bring no rest, but I carry it in my mind. Panduranga will support the one who does. Keep the longing to go to Pandhari alive in your mind. Hold it, and you reach Him. There is no doubt. Let the body have no strength. Let it be in another's power. Even so, do not give up this remembering. Tuka says: let the body fall while remembering this. What comes after follows for exactly this reason.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is teaching a faith that does not depend on circumstances. Even when the wish to reach Pandhari brings no ease and the journey looks impossible, he says simply holding it in the mind is enough, for Panduranga himself sustains the one who holds it. The body may be weak or trapped under someone else's control, but the inner remembering must not be dropped. The final stake is death itself: let the body fall while still remembering, because it is for the sake of this remembering that whatever comes next will come.

GATHA 0993 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, distrust of one's own greatness

मराठी मूळ

कोठें देवा आलें अंगा थोरपण । बरें होतें दीन होतों तरीं ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Where has this greatness come upon me, O God? It would have been better had I remained lowly.

The best practice is the service of saints. With love I shall sing the Name.

Even if no one asks after me, wherever I may be, I have the contentment of chitta's own ease.

Says Tuka, even if the world rejects me, Keshiraja is my protector.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Where did this greatness come over me, O God? It would have been better if I had stayed lowly. The best practice is to serve the saints. With love I will sing the Name. Even if no one asks after me, wherever I am, I have the contentment of a quiet mind. Tuka says: even if the world casts me off, Keshiraja keeps watch over me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is uneasy at being held in high regard, and treats it as a danger rather than a reward. He says he was better off when he was lowly, because importance pulls a person away from God. So he sets his course by the humblest things: serving the saints and singing the Name with love, asking nothing from anyone's notice. His security does not depend on the world's approval at all; even if everyone rejects him, Keshiraja, Krishna, is the one who looks after him, and that is enough for a settled mind.

तुका हमणे करूं उपदेश लोकां । नाहीं जालों एका परता दोषा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have become clever only around my own self, yet empty within, without bhava.

Now, what is this, going forward uselessly? Lust and anger have made their home within.

The faults and virtues of the world have entered within me, and my buddhi is fixed on envy of other beings.

Says Tuka, I preach to the world, yet I myself have not transcended a single flaw.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have grown clever around myself, but empty inside, with no real feeling. Now what is this, going on uselessly ahead? Lust and anger have made their home in me. The faults and virtues of the world have entered my heart, and my mind sits on envy of other beings. Tuka says: I preach to people, yet I myself have not gotten past a single flaw.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is confessing the gap between his teaching and his own state. He admits he is clever on the surface but hollow within, without true devotional feeling, while lust and anger have settled in and made themselves at home. His attention has soured into judging the world's faults and virtues and into envy of other creatures. The sting falls on himself: he stands up to instruct others while he has not risen above even one of his own faults, and the poem turns the spotlight on that self-deception rather than on anyone he teaches.

GATHA 0995 The Saints

The compassionate saints, blessed in the world

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Blessed, truly blessed are those in this world who carry compassion within.

They have come here from Vaikuntha solely for the sake of helping others.

Their words are never false, and they are indifferent to the body.

Says Tuka, sweet speech held close. Says Tuka, expansiveness in the belly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Blessed in this world are those who carry compassion within. They have come here from Vaikuntha only to help others. Their words are never false. They are not bound to the body. Tuka says: sweet speech on the tongue, and openness within.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praising the truly compassionate as the blessed ones of this world. He treats them as having descended from Vaikuntha, God's own realm, for one purpose only: to do good for others. Their mark is integrity, never a false word, and a freedom that comes from not being tied to their own bodily comfort. He closes with the simple test of such a person: the speech on the lips is sweet, and inside there is a wide, generous openness, with no gap between the two.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Without kneading, no sweet manda can be made. With laziness, one falls like a stone.

Do not hold anger in your mind. I am telling you this crudely, straight out.

Before the rough rope, even the pestle of grief dances well.

Says Tuka, the stick is the essential thing. It makes even the foolish wise.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Without kneading, no sweet manda is made. With laziness you fall like a stone. Do not hold anger in your mind. I am telling you this bluntly. Before the rough rope, even the pestle dances well. Tuka says: the stick is the main thing. It makes even the foolish wise.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is making a plain, almost rough case for discipline. Just as dough must be kneaded before a sweet can be made, a person who stays lazy goes nowhere and drops like a dead stone. He warns against taking offense and admits he is speaking crudely on purpose. His blunt images, the rope and the pestle made to move, lead to the point: it is firm correction, the stick, that does the real work and can bring even a fool to sense. The poem defends hard treatment as kindness aimed at the lazy pattern, not contempt for the person.

Says Tuka, what is to come is false and crooked. Karma is great and powerful.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If the truth can be seen, then why does it not get through? Still you fall into the snares of delusion. Even when you know, ruin comes. Hear this view of mine, O God. For a morsel of bait, you put your neck in the noose. The hunger for wealth pulls you down. Tuka says: what is coming is false and crooked. Karma is great and strong.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is puzzling over why people destroy themselves even when they can see the truth. Knowing better, they still walk into delusion's traps, and he lays this riddle before God himself. His image is the fish: for one bite of bait it hands its neck to the noose, and in the same way the craving for wealth drags a person down to ruin. He ends by naming the force behind it: karma, the momentum of past action, is huge and powerful, so the destiny bearing down feels false and crooked, and mere knowing is not enough to break its grip.

GATHA 0998 The Moral Ideal

Praise of the good soul, true wealth

मराठी मूळ

मोकळें मन रसाळ वाणी । या चि गुणीं संपन्न ॥1॥
लक्ष्मी ते ऐशा नावें । भाग्यें ज्यावें तरि त्यांनीं ॥ध्रु.॥
नमन नम्रता अंगीं । नेघे रंगीं पालट ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे त्याच्या नांवें । घेतां व्हावें संतोषी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

An open mind and a tongue full of rasa: one is rich in these very qualities alone.

Let those who are fortunate live by such wealth, bearing the name of Lakshmi herself.

Humility and gentleness dwell in the body; they never change their color.

Says Tuka, at the very mention of such a person's name, one should feel contentment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

An open mind and a tongue full of sweetness: be rich in these qualities alone. Let this be called wealth. Let the fortunate live by it. Humility and gentleness live in the body, and they never change their color. Tuka says: at the very mention of such a person's name, you should feel glad.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is renaming what counts as wealth. He sets aside money and standing and points instead to an open heart, a kind tongue, humility, and gentleness, and he calls these the real riches, the true Lakshmi to live by. The mark of these qualities is that they do not change their color: they are not a performance you can switch off, but something steady in the person. He ends by saying that such a soul is so good that even hearing their name should make you happy.

Final plea, shade of grace

मराठी मूळ

शेवटची विनवणी । संतजनीं परिसावी ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O saints, please hear this final plea.

May You never forget me, O God.

What more shall I say? Everything is already known at Your feet.

Says Tuka, I have fallen at Your feet. Spread the shade of Your grace over me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O saints, please hear this last request. My God, may You never forget me. What more shall I say? Everything is already known at Your feet. Tuka says: I have fallen at Your feet; spread the shade of Your grace over me.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is Tukaram laying down a last, stripped request and asking the saints to witness it. His whole prayer narrows to one thing: that God should never forget him. He says there is nothing more to add, because at God's feet everything about him is already known; explaining himself would be pointless. So he simply falls at the feet and asks for the cool shade of grace to be spread over him, the posture of someone who has nothing left to offer but surrender.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If anyone says I compose poetry, these words are not my own; they do not come from my own store.

This manner of things does not arise from my own skill. Vishvambhara Himself makes me speak.

What do I, a wretch, know of the layers of meaning? What Govinda inspires, that alone I utter.

I am placed here as an instrument at the scales. I am nothing; the power belongs to the Lord alone.

Says Tuka, I am truly a foot-soldier, nothing more, carrying the seal of His Name.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If anyone says I compose poetry, know that these words are not mine; they do not come from my own store. This is not the work of my skill. Vishvambhara Himself makes me speak. What does a wretch like me know of the layers of meaning? What Govinda makes me say, that alone I say. I am only set here as the scale's pointer; I am nothing, the power is the Lord's. Tuka says: I am truly only a foot-soldier, carrying the seal of His Name.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is refusing the credit for his own poems. He insists the words are not his property and do not come from his talent; it is Vishvambhara, the all-sustainer, who speaks through him. He pleads ignorance of the deep meanings the verses carry, saying he only utters what Govinda inspires. The images make the point sharp: he is the needle on the weighing scale, moved by the load, not the owner of the power; he is a foot-soldier who merely carries the seal of the Name. The poem hands all authorship back to God.

तुकाराम गाथा

Original Marathi with English translation, a plain-language reading, and an explanation of what each abhanga means

Volume 3: Gatha 1001-1500 - 463 abhangas

About This Edition

This reading edition brings together four layers for every abhanga: the original Marathi, an English translation, a rendering in plain words, and a short explanation of its meaning.

The English layers are devotional reading aids. No translation can fully carry Tukaram's Marathi music, wordplay, cultural setting, or spiritual force. Readers are encouraged to return to the original and to consult Marathi teachers and established scholarly editions.

Marathi source: Tukaram Gatha on Marathi Wikisource. The source dataset identifies the Marathi text as public domain. English reading layers are from the Ananta Satsang online edition.

Editorial note: We ask forgiveness for any inaccuracies in rendering Tukaram Maharaj's original Marathi.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We shall sing, and let none object. God has not told us to hold back.

Chant Rama, Rama, clap your hands. Dance and sway with love, for your own highest good.

When something arises so naturally, why be lazy about it? A child plays at cooking with fire; why pull back the hand?

Here there is no shame, no outward show of devotion, no worldly decorum. Whoever laughs at this incurs the sin of brahmahatya.

Express your bhava however you feel it. This God has no interest in keeping beat or keeping count.

Says Tuka, blessed are those for whom hearing the sacred stories fills their days. All others have been born into this life as stones.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We will sing, and let no one object; God has not told us to hold back. Say Rama, Rama, clap your hands. Dance and sway with love, for your own good. When something comes so naturally, why be lazy about it? A child plays at cooking with fire; why pull the hand back? Here there is no shame, no show of devotion, no worldly manners. Whoever laughs at this takes on the sin of killing a brahmin. Pour out your love however you feel it; this God does not care about keeping beat or keeping count. Tuka says: blessed are those whose days are filled with hearing the sacred stories. The rest are born into this life as stones.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is defending loud, bodily, unembarrassed devotion against anyone who would police it. He gives the marching orders directly: chant the Name, clap, dance, sway with love, because this is for your own highest good and God never asked you to restrain it. He brushes off the demand for polished form, saying this God cares nothing for keeping time or count; only the love matters. The warning is deliberately fierce: to mock devotees pouring out their hearts is treated as a grave sin, and a life with no taste for the sacred stories is no better than being born a stone. The harshness is aimed at the scorn that would shame open love, not at any one person.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Will someone take God? Will someone take God? He has come asking after the house, inquiring at every door.

No one wants God, no one wants God. All the storage places are already full.

God has gone slack, God has gone slack. Bhava has drowned. What shall I do?

Take God for free, take God for free. No coin, no price is needed.

Says Tuka the feeble, without bhava, I have taken God on debt.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Will anyone take God? Will anyone take God? He has come ready, asking at every door. No one wants God, no one wants God; all their storage spaces are already full. God has gone slack, God has gone unwanted; faith has drowned, what shall I do? Take God for free, take God for free; no coin, no price is needed. Tuka says: feeble and without faith, I have taken God on credit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram stages God as a vendor going door to door, and the joke turns bitter: no one will take him even for free. The reason is given plainly: people's hearts are already crammed full of other things, with no room left, so God goes begging and unwanted while devotion itself has drowned. The price is nothing, not a single coin, which makes the refusal absurd and exposes how little the world actually wants God. At the close Tukaram puts himself in the picture too, calling himself feeble and faithless, saying he could only take God on debt, owning his own poverty rather than standing apart in judgment.

GATHA 1003 Faith and Trust

Faith, the secret found in devotion

मराठी मूळ

विष्णुमय सर्व वैष्णवांसी ठावें । येरांनीं वाहावे भार माथां ॥1॥
भाव हा कठीण वज्र हें भेदवे । परि न छेदवे मायाजाळ ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The Vaishnavas know that everything is pervaded by Vishnu. Others must carry the burden of ignorance upon their heads.

This bhava is hard; it can pierce even the thunderbolt. Yet even so, it cannot cut the net of maya.

Says Tuka, the secret is found only through devotion. For all others, the directions remain empty.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The Vaishnavas know that everything is filled with Vishnu. Others carry the load of ignorance on their heads. This faith is hard; it can pierce even the thunderbolt, yet even so it cannot cut the net of maya. Tuka says: the secret is found only through devotion. For everyone else, all directions stay empty.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts two ways of standing in the world. Those who love Vishnu see him filling everything, while everyone else simply carries the dead weight of not-knowing on their heads. He admits faith is hard, strong enough to pierce a thunderbolt, yet he names its limit honestly: by sheer force it still cannot cut through the net of maya. The resolution is that the real opening is not force but devotion; that alone finds the secret, and without it every direction a person looks remains empty.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The sweetness of kirtan is something God Himself selects. Let someone become worthy, and Hari will give Himself to that one.

Through the strength of detachment, conquer the six inner enemies.

Says Tuka, I shall make the proclamation. Nothing will remain in this chest.

Everything has entered and fallen into the belly, settled there. Having set it all aside, I have become certain, O God.

I have nothing left to give now, not a tola or a masa. You know my earlier account.

Many greater than I have gone, bound by their debt to You.

Says Tuka, whatever is entangled in Your ledger, make it Your own, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The sweetness of kirtan is something God Himself chooses. Let someone become worthy, and Hari will give Himself to that one. By the strength of detachment, conquer the six inner enemies. Tuka says: I will cry it out; nothing will be left in my chest. Everything has gone in and settled in the belly; having set it all aside, I have grown certain, O God. I have nothing left to give now, not a tola, not a masa; You know my old account. Many greater than I have gone, bound by their debt to You. Tuka says: whatever is tangled in Your ledger, make it Your own and take it, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram moves from how devotion begins to how he settles his whole account with God. He says the joy of kirtan is God's own gift, given to whoever becomes fit, and that detachment is the weapon for conquering the six inner enemies of lust, anger and the rest. Then he turns to his own state: he has held nothing back, poured everything out, swallowed and absorbed it all, and so he stands certain, with nothing left to offer, not even the smallest weight of merit. He admits the debt openly, noting that even souls far greater have died still bound by what they owed. His final move is total surrender of the books: whatever is entangled in God's ledger, let God simply claim as His own and take.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Will You accept me or will You not? This question has come to me, O God.

Will You show me Your feet or will You not? My mind cannot be still.

Will You speak to me, O God, or will You not? Fear grips my jiva.

Will You remember me or will You not? This is the very doubt that sits with me.

Says Tuka, I am lacking in spiritual merit, and so I grow weary, O God.

Is my service upright, is there any power in it? O Temple, show me grace.

Is my birth pure, my family karma right? Through that, does the vital point of You become reachable?

Who possesses the wealth of austerity, the virtue of charity and dharma? Is there any strength or authority in my being?

Says Tuka, I have become a useless burden on the earth. What will come of this, I do not know.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Will You accept me or not? This question has come to me, O God. Will You show me Your feet or not? My mind cannot be still. Will You speak with me, O God, or not? Fear grips my life. Will You remember me or not? This is the very doubt that sits with me. Tuka says: I am poor in merit, and so I grow weary, O God. Is my service sound, is there any strength in it? O Temple, show me grace. Is my birth pure, my family's karma right, so that the heart of You becomes reachable? Who here has the wealth of austerity, the virtue of charity and dharma? Is there any strength or standing in me at all? Tuka says: I have become a useless burden on the earth. What will come of this, I do not know.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the prayer of a soul who cannot get hold of any assurance. Tukaram presses God with a string of yes-or-no questions, will You accept me, show Your feet, speak to me, remember me, and confesses his mind will not stay still and that fear has hold of his life. Then he turns the doubt on himself, auditing everything he might offer: his service, his birth, his family's karma, his austerity, charity, and dharma, and finding nothing he can lean on. The honesty is the point: he refuses to claim merit he does not have, calling himself a useless burden on the earth. Stripped of every credential, he is left with the question itself and a plea to the Temple, Panduranga, for grace.

GATHA 1006 Prayers

Prayer, leaving the choice to God

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Truly, why can I not come to know, O God? Why does Your service not come about for me?

Do what brings contentment. Serve this forest, and speak not.

If my bhava at Your feet becomes pure, then grant it, having discerned.

What is proper and what is not has become clear by Your gracious glance, O Panduranga.

Says Tuka, I care only for Your feet. Whatever You tell me is sweet to me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Truly, why can I not understand, O God? Why does Your service not come about for me? Do whatever brings peace; let me serve in this forest and not speak. If my love at Your feet becomes pure, then grant it, having sorted it out. What is right and what is wrong has become clear by Your gracious glance, O Panduranga. Tuka says: I care only for Your feet. Whatever You tell me is sweet to me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram begins baffled, asking why understanding and true service keep eluding him, then stops pushing and hands the matter over. He tells God to do whatever brings real peace, even if that means quiet service in the forest with no words of his own. He asks only that, if his love at the feet is genuine, God himself sort it out and grant it. He credits whatever discernment he has of right and wrong to God's gracious glance, not his own wisdom. The ending settles the whole prayer: he wants nothing but the feet, and so whatever God tells him he receives as sweet.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am not wearied, yet I feel afraid, for I do not know what to do.

Town and forest have become the same to me. Lust and anger have gone by the wayside.

The six waves as enemies have been conquered, O Ananta, by the power of Your name.

Therefore the chief duty of us servants is this: whatever the Master commands, we obey, placing it upon our heads.

Says Tuka, gazing upon Your feet, I wait for the scent of that one word.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am not tired, yet I feel afraid, not knowing what to do. Town and forest have become the same to me; lust and anger have fallen away by the wayside. The six waves, my enemies, have been conquered, O Ananta, by the power of Your Name. So this is the chief duty of us servants: whatever the Master commands, we obey, placing it on our heads. Tuka says: gazing at Your feet, I wait for the trace of that one word.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a strange place in the path: he is not worn out, yet he is afraid, because he no longer knows what to do next. He has come far. Town and wilderness feel the same to him, lust and anger have dropped away, and the six inner waves have all been conquered, which he credits entirely to the power of God's Name, not his own effort. Having reached this stillness, he names the servant's whole duty as simple obedience: to take whatever the Master commands and carry it on his head. So he waits, eyes fixed on the feet, listening for the single word of instruction that will tell him what to do.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I built up this worldly reputation for nothing and brought a false quarrel upon us both.

God has not become real to me in the way I expected. What does the hungry one truly know while eating?

Through verbal cleverness I adorned my vaikhari, but the truth does not reflect itself within.

I have become a stranger in both places: the world and Your feet, O God, are both lost to me.

Says Tuka, had I known this beforehand, I would never have taken on this madness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For nothing I built up this worldly name, and brought a false quarrel between us both. By my reckoning, God has not become real to me. What does the hungry one know while he is eating? With clever words I dressed up my speech, but the truth does not reflect inside me at all. I have become a stranger in both places; the world is gone, and Your feet too, O God. Tuka says: had I known this beforehand, I would never have taken on this madness.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is Tukaram turning on himself with hard honesty. He admits he built a reputation for piety that was worth nothing and in doing so set up a false quarrel between himself and God. He confesses that, by his own measure, God has not yet become real to him, and that his fine, clever speech was only ornament: the truth never actually settled inside. The result is a frightening in-between: he has let go of the world but has not reached the feet either, so he is a stranger in both places at once. The closing line is rueful, not self-pitying: if he had foreseen this state, he would never have set out on the path, and the verse names the cost rather than glamorizing the journey.

GATHA 1009 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the dull mind that only meditates

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I do not understand the subtleties of philosophy; my intellect is dull. Yet I meditate on the lotus feet in my chitta.

I do not understand the distinctions of scripture. I pass my time in contemplation.

I know nothing, yet I call myself a servant. Whatever pride arises from this, let it rest with Him.

I have abandoned the ways of the world and cut off from society in one stroke.

The old attachments have been severed; I have kept my mind fixed on the One alone.

Says Tuka, O Lord of Rakhumai, O compassionate one toward Your devotees, protect me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I do not understand philosophy; my mind is dull. Yet I meditate on the lotus feet in my heart. What do I know of the fine distinctions of scripture? I pass my time in contemplation. I know nothing, yet I call myself His servant; whatever pride comes from that, let it rest with Him. I have left the ways of the world and abandoned its road; in one stroke I have put the world far away. The old attachments I have cut off; all at once I have kept my mind fixed on the One. Tuka says: O Lord of Rakhumai, compassionate to Your devotees, protect me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a virtue of admitting he is no scholar. He says philosophy is beyond his dull mind and the subtleties of scripture are closed to him; all he can do is meditate on the lotus feet and let his days pass in remembrance. He even hands the title of servant back to God, saying if there is any pride in calling himself one, let that be God's affair, not his. Then he reports a decisive break: in a single stroke he has dropped the world, cut its road, severed his old attachments, and fixed his mind on the One alone. Owning nothing but this surrender, he closes by appealing to the Lord of Rakhumai, the one compassionate to his devotees, to protect him.

GATHA 1010 Prayers

Prayer, burn the ego to its root

मराठी मूळ

इतुलें करीं देवा ऐकें हें वचन । समूळ अभिमान जाळीं माझा ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do this much for me, O God, hear this word: burn my ego-pride to its very roots.

Do this much, O God, hear this request: let me behold You with equal vision in all.

Do this much, O God, I implore You: let me bow my head to the dust of the saints' feet.

Do this much, O God, hear this plea: let the Lord of Pandhari dwell in my heart day and night.

Says Tuka, save me now in whatever way You will, O Lord of Pandhari. I have come to Your refuge.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do this much for me, O God. Hear this word: burn my pride to its very root. Do this much, O God. Hear this: let me see You, the same, in everyone. Do this much, O God. I beg You: let me bow my head to the dust of the saints' feet. Do this much, O God. Hear this: let the Lord of Pandhari live in my heart, day and night. Save me however You will, O Lord of Pandhari. Tuka says: I have come to Your refuge now.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks for four things and nothing else, and each one is a request to be unmade. First, that his pride be burned out completely, not trimmed but pulled up by the root. Then that he be given equal sight, so he sees the same God in every person. Then the dust of the saints' feet on his head, and the Name of Pandhari kept in his heart around the clock. Having asked, he hands over the method too: save me in whatever way You choose. The prayer ends where it can only end, at the feet, in surrender.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The guardians of the world call me Your servant. Therefore watch over me, O Lord.

You are called the Lord of the helpless, the Purifier of the fallen. Uphold this name of Yours.

If You examine my virtues and faults, there would be no end to them. My own chitta bears witness to this.

I do not know how to serve You. But You, O God, know what lies within.

Says Tuka, You are the ocean of mercy. Sever my bonds of worldly existence, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The guardians of the world call me Your servant. So watch over me, O Lord. You are called the Lord of the helpless, the one who lifts the fallen. Keep that name of Yours now. If You count my virtues and my faults, there is no end to them. My own heart tells me so. I do not know how to serve You. But You, O God, know what is inside me. Tuka says: You are the ocean of mercy. Cut my bonds to this world, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes God's reputation the basis of his plea: You are called Lord of the helpless and lifter of the fallen, so live up to Your own name by saving me. He admits he cannot pass an honest audit; his faults are endless and he says so himself. He also admits he does not even know how to serve, but leans on the fact that God already sees everything within him. The argument is that mercy, not merit, is the door. He asks for the one thing he cannot do himself: the cutting of his bondage to worldly existence.

Devotion, only Your feet matter

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे तूं करिसी तें सोपे । पुण्यें होती पापें आमुच्या मतें ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What is there to know, what is there not to know? To meditate on Your feet is the essence of all.

What is there to do, what is there not to do? To meditate on Your feet is the essence.

What to say, what not to say? To meditate on Your feet is the essence.

Where to go, where not to go? It is good simply to remember Your name.

Says Tuka, what You do becomes simple. By our own reckoning, merits turn to sins.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What is there to know, what is there not to know? To meditate on Your feet is the whole of it. What is there to do, what is there not to do? To meditate on Your feet is the whole of it. What to say, what not to say? To meditate on Your feet is the whole of it. Where to go, where not to go? It is good simply to remember Your name. Tuka says: whatever You do becomes easy. By my own reckoning, my merits turn into sins.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes the great anxious questions, what to know, do, say, where to go, and dissolves every one of them into a single answer: meditate on the feet, remember the name. The poem is not lazy; it is choosing. He is saying the mind's endless sorting of right and wrong is beside the point next to that one fixed practice. The last line cuts deeper: when he scores himself, even his good deeds come out as sins, because they carry his pride. So he stops scoring and rests in what God does, which alone becomes easy.

Devotion, refusing knowledge for the lover's God

मराठी मूळ

नको ब्रह्मज्ञान आत्मिस्थतिभाव । मी भक्त तूं देव ऐसें करीं ॥1॥

पुसतां सांगेन हितगुज मात । बैसोनि एकांत सुखगोष्टी ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे यासी न लावीं उशीर । माझें अभ्यंतर जाणोनियां ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I do not want the knowledge of Brahman or the state of Self-realization. Simply make me the devotee and You the God.

Show me Your form, O beloved of the gopis, that I may lay my head upon Your feet.

Seeing Your blessed face, I shall embrace You, and with my very life I shall ward off the evil eye from You.

When You ask, I shall share my innermost confidences with You. We shall sit together in solitude and speak of joyful things.

Says Tuka, do not delay in this. You know what lies within me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I do not want the knowledge of Brahman, nor the state of the Self. Make me the devotee and You the God; do this much. Show me Your form, O beloved of the gopis. I will lay my head on Your feet. Seeing Your blessed face, I will embrace You. With my very life I will ward off the evil eye from You. When You ask, I will tell You my heart's secrets. We will sit alone together and speak of happy things. Tuka says: do not be slow in this. You know what is within me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram openly refuses the highest goals of philosophy, knowledge of Brahman and absorption in the Self, because they erase the very thing he loves: the difference between worshipper and worshipped. He wants to stay the devotee so he can have a face to see, feet to touch, a body to embrace. The images are tender and domestic: shielding the beloved God from the evil eye, sitting alone to share secrets, like family. This is the bhakta's deliberate choice of intimacy over merger. He closes by pressing God for haste, trusting that God already knows the longing inside him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the past You saved many who came to You for refuge. They call You the Lord of the wretched, O God.

You looked not at their sins, nor at their caste or lineage. You saved Ajamela, the courtesan, and the tribal woman.

You seated the child Dhruva on an eternal throne. You gave Upamanyu an ocean of milk.

The elephant, that creature of the earth, was seized by a creature of the water, and You brought him across the ocean of existence.

You protected Prahlada in fire and in water. By Your name, poison became nectar.

When the Pandavas were in grave danger, You became their advocate, O Narayana.

Says Tuka, You are the Lord of the helpless. Hearing this, I have come to Your refuge.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Long ago You saved many who came to You for refuge. They call You the Lord of the wretched, O God. You did not look at their sins, or their caste, or their family line. You saved Ajamela, the courtesan, the tribal woman. You seated the child Dhruva on an eternal throne. You gave Upamanyu an ocean of milk. The elephant, a creature of the land, was seized by a creature of the water, and You carried him across the ocean of existence. You kept Prahlada safe in fire and in water; by Your name the poison turned to nectar. When the Pandavas were in grave danger, You stood up for them, O Narayana. Tuka says: You are the Lord of the helpless. Hearing this, I have come to Your refuge.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram recites a roll call of those God rescued and turns it into his own claim on grace. The point of the list is what God refused to weigh: not sins, not caste, not lineage. A fallen brahmin, a courtesan, a tribal woman, a frightened child, a trapped elephant, a boy thrown into fire and poison, a royal family in danger, all were lifted. If God saved them on no qualification but their need, then Tukaram, who has nothing better to offer, can come on the same terms. The whole poem is an argument that ends in arrival: hearing this record, I too have come to Your refuge.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have become Your surrendered servant, O Panduranga. Look after my welfare.

Purifier of the Fallen is Your banner of glory. Uphold it now, O Father and Mother.

The saints say You are the Lord of the helpless. Hearing their words, I have come to faith in You.

Do not leave me desolate; do not turn away in indifference. Give the gift of Your grace to this beggar.

Says Tuka, I am a heap of sins. Give me a place at Your feet, O God.

One who lives truthfully conducts the whole of life untouched, like a lotus in water.

One in whom compassion and service to all beings dwell, the state of abiding in the Self lives within that one.

One who neither speaks nor listens to the faults or virtues of others is Janardana himself, moving among the people.

Says Tuka, without knowing the inner secret, one only tires oneself out with starts and stops.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have become Your surrendered servant, O Panduranga. Look after my good. Purifier of the Fallen is the banner of Your glory. Hold it up now, O Mother and Father. The saints say You are the Lord of the helpless. Hearing this, I trusted You. Do not cast me off; do not turn away cold. Give this beggar the gift of Your grace. Tuka says: I am a heap of sins. Give me a place at Your feet, O God. The truthful one lives through the whole of worldly life untouched, like a lotus in water. The one in whom service and compassion for all beings happen, the state of the Self lives in that one's body. The one who neither speaks the faults and merits of others nor takes them in through the ear, that one is Janardana himself, moving among people. Tuka says: without knowing the inner secret, you only tire yourself with starting and stopping.

WHAT IT MEANS

This poem turns on a hinge. It opens as a pure surrender: Tukaram throws himself on Panduranga's title, Purifier of the Fallen, calling God to live up to His own banner for a beggar who is a heap of sins. Then it shifts to describe what a truly surrendered life looks like from inside. The truthful person lives in the world like a lotus on water, wetted but not soaked. Where compassion and service to all beings actually happen, the abiding in the Self is already there, and one who refuses to trade in others' faults and virtues is God walking among people. The closing warning is the key: without grasping this inner secret, all the outward starting and stopping of practice is just self-exhaustion.

GATHA 1016 The Moral Ideal

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Family duty is knowledge; family duty is spiritual practice. Through family duty, the treasure comes into one's hands.

Family duty is devotion; family duty is the path forward. Family duty will grant the ultimate repose.

Family duty is compassion; family duty is service to others. Family duty is the very essence of all practice.

Family duty is honor; family duty is respect. Family duty purifies one for the world beyond.

Says Tuka, family duty reveals God in the divine, if one's inner disposition is true to the proper way.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Family duty is knowledge; family duty is the practice. Through family duty the treasure climbs into your hands. Family duty is devotion; family duty is the way forward. Family duty will bring you to rest. Family duty is compassion; family duty is service to others. Family duty is the essence of all practice. Family duty is greatness; family duty is honor. Family duty makes you fit for the world beyond. Tuka says: family duty shows God within the gods, if the inner feeling is true to the proper way.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses one claim from every angle: the duty given to you by your own station in life is itself the complete path. He refuses to set ordinary obligation against high spirituality; faithfully kept, family duty is at once knowledge, devotion, practice, compassion, service, and the road to repose. Lived rightly, it is what makes a person fit for the world beyond. But the last line carries the condition that saves it from mere conformity: this only works if the inner disposition is true. Done with a real heart, ordinary duty reveals God shining inside the very forms of worship.

GATHA 1017 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, good and harm laid open

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे उघडें आहे हित घात । जयाचें उचित करा तैसें ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Merit is helping others; sin is causing others pain. There is no second equal to these two.

Truth alone is dharma; falsehood is binding karma. There is no other secret than this.

Liberation comes through the name upon one's lips. Downfall comes from turning away from it.

The company of saints is heaven itself. Hell is indifference and lack of restraint.

Says Tuka, both benefit and harm lie open before you. Act as is fitting for you.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Merit is helping others; sin is causing others pain. There is no second pair to match these. Truth alone is dharma; falsehood is the karma that binds. There is no other secret than this. Liberation is the name on your lips; downfall, know it, is turning your face away from it. The company of saints is heaven itself. Hell is cold indifference and a life without restraint. Tuka says: benefit and harm both lie open before you. Do what is fitting for you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips morality down to its plainest core so no one can claim it is hidden or hard to find. Good is simply helping; evil is simply hurting; truth is the only real religious duty and lies are the only chains. Liberation is nothing more mysterious than the Name on the lips, and ruin is just turning your face from it. He locates heaven and hell not in other worlds but in present company and conduct: the saints' fellowship is heaven, while a cold, unrestrained life is already hell. Having made the choice this clear, he hands it back to you: it is all open, now act as befits you.

GATHA 1018 True Worship

True worship, nothing good is ever wasted

मराठी मूळ

न वजे वांयां कांहीं ऐकतां हरिकथा । आपण करितां वांयां न वजे ॥1॥
न वजे वांयां कांहीं देवळासी जातां । देवासी पूजितां वांयां न वजे ॥ध्रु.॥
न वजे वांयां कांहीं केलिया तीर्थ । अथवा कां व्रत वांयां न वजे ॥2॥
न वजे वांयां जालें संतांचें दर्शन । शुद्ध आचरण वांयां न वजे ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे भाव असतां नसतां । सायास करितां वांयां न वजे ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Nothing is wasted by hearing the harikatha of Hari. Nothing goes in vain by performing it yourself.

Nothing is wasted by going to the temple. Nothing is wasted by worshipping God.

Nothing is wasted by visiting sacred places or by keeping a vow.

Nothing is wasted by the sight of saints, nor by righteous conduct.

Says Tuka, whether devotion is present or absent, nothing is wasted by making the effort.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Nothing is lost by hearing the harikatha of Hari. Nothing is lost by telling it yourself. Nothing is lost by going to the temple. Nothing is lost by worshipping God. Nothing is lost by going on pilgrimage, or by keeping a vow. Nothing is lost by the sight of saints, nor by clean and righteous conduct. Tuka says: whether the feeling is there or not, nothing is lost by making the effort.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reassures the beginner who fears that worship without perfect feeling is wasted breath. He runs through the whole range of devotional acts, hearing and telling the stories of Hari, going to the temple, worshipping, pilgrimage, vows, the company of saints, upright living, and stamps each one: nothing here goes to waste. The bold closing line meets the real worry head on: even when the inward devotion is not yet present, the effort itself still counts. This is not a license for hollow ritual but an encouragement to begin; the doing draws the feeling along behind it, and nothing offered toward God is ever thrown away.

GATHA 1019 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the mind clings like a child

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In my chitta I shall hold those tender feet, the entire treasury of all blessings.

At my throat I shall hold the Name, the vine of nectar. My body shall remain cool with its touch.

I shall gaze upon that lovely, radiant face, the storehouse of all beauty.

Like a child, I shall cling to Him in embrace and not come down from His lap.

Says Tuka, He becomes as you fashion Him. My mind has found its bearing toward Vithoba.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In my heart I will hold those tender feet, the whole treasury of every blessing. At my throat I will hold the Name, the vine of nectar; my body will stay cool with it. I will gaze on that lovely, radiant face, the storehouse of all beauty. Like a child I will cling to Him in embrace, and once I am up I will not come down from His lap. Tuka says: He becomes whatever you make of Him. My mind has set its course toward Vithoba.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes how he will hold his God in every part of himself: the feet in his heart, the Name at his throat like a cooling vine, the face before his eyes. The childlike image is the center of it; he means to climb into God's lap and simply refuse to get down, the way a small child clings and will not be put aside. The closing line carries the bhakta's quiet teaching: God takes the form your love gives Him, He becomes whatever you make of Him. So Tukaram fixes his whole mind on one bearing, toward Vithoba, and lets that loving thought shape the God he holds.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A child tells its mother of its hunger and thirst, knowing nothing of the remedy.

In the same way, look after me, taking upon Yourself all the weight and burden.

Why bring faults and merits to mind, O Narayana? All have erred before You.

I am without service, I am lowly, I am a heap of sins. What will You now reckon against me?

The moment my chitta turned to Your feet, I knew for certain that my good was assured.

Says Tuka, You have saved so many. Let my worry rest with You as well.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A child tells its mother it is hungry and thirsty. It knows nothing of the remedy. Care for me like that, taking on Yourself all my weight and burden. Why call my faults and merits to mind, O Narayana? Everyone has erred before You. I have no service to show, I am lowly, I am a heap of sins. What is there now for You to weigh against me? The moment my mind turned to Your feet, I knew for certain my good was secured. Tuka says: You have saved so many. Let my worry, too, rest with You.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes himself as helpless as he can: a baby that can cry its need but cannot lift a finger toward the cure. So he asks God to carry the whole load, the way a mother does for an infant. He waves away any accounting of his record; everyone falls short before God, and he openly calls himself a heap of sins with no service to his name, so what is left to judge? His one ground of confidence is the moment his mind turned to the feet, which he treats as the settled guarantee of his good. He ends by folding even his anxiety into God's keeping, leaning on the long record of others already saved.

तुका ह्मणे तूं हें जाणसी सकळ । यावरि कृपाळ होई देवा ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A fish writhes without water. Just so does my jiva feel.

Like a man who knows buried treasure lies near but cannot find it, my mind thrashes with longing.

It is like the anguish of a child separated from its mother. Know this pain, O God.

How many ways can I describe it to You? Show me the essence: Your holy feet.

This worry has scorched me within. I know not why You have forgotten me.

Says Tuka, You know all of this. Now be gracious, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A fish writhes without water. That is how my soul feels. Like a man who knows treasure lies buried near but cannot reach it, my mind thrashes with longing. It is the anguish of a child torn from its mother. Know this pain, O God. How many ways can I describe it to You? Show me the essence of all: Your feet. This worry has scorched me inside. I do not know why You have forgotten me. Tuka says: You know all of this. Now be gracious, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram piles up images for a longing that has become physical pain: a fish flopping out of water, a man who knows where treasure is buried but cannot dig it up, a child wrenched from its mother. Each one says the same thing, that without God's nearness he cannot rest or even breathe easy. He stops trying to explain it and asks for the one thing that would end it, a sight of the feet. The ache has burned him from within, and he cannot tell why God seems to have forgotten him. He leaves it where the bhakta always does: You already know all of this, so now simply be gracious.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not turn Your back on one who has come seeking refuge. Hear this petition, O Lord of the universe.

Give a swift reply to those who call upon You. Hear this petition, O Hari.

Come running to the crushed and oppressed. Hear this petition, O Narayana.

Be the resting place of the weary. Hear this petition, O Keshava.

Bear the burden of Your devoted ones upon Your head. Hear this petition, O Ananta.

Says Tuka, never forget us, O God. Hear this petition, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have come seeking refuge. Do not show me your back. Hear this petition, O Lord of the universe. When your people call you, answer them quickly. Give a swift reply, O Hari; hear this petition. Come running to the crushed and the oppressed. Hear this petition, O Narayana. Be the resting place of the weary. Hear this petition, O Keshava. Carry the burden of your devoted ones on your head. Hear this petition, O Ananta. Tuka says: never forget us, O God. Hear this petition, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

This abhanga is one long plea, the same line returning at every turn: hear this petition. Tukaram comes as a refugee and asks God to do the things a refuge is for, answer the cry quickly, run to the oppressed, give rest to the weary, carry the devotee's burden. He calls God by a new name each verse, Hari, Narayana, Keshava, Ananta, as if pressing the same request against every face of the same God. The one thing he asks above all is not to be forgotten. The poem leaves God no room to be aloof: if he is Lord of the universe, then these are his obligations to the one who has surrendered.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who asks after us, the weary and worn, if not You, O Panduranga?

To whom shall we tell our joys and sorrows? Who will quench our thirst and hunger?

Who will relieve the heat of this affliction? Who else can carry us to the far shore?

From whom shall we ask for the provisions our longing craves? Who will soothe us with gentle coaxing?

Upon whom shall we place our demands? Who else can bear them?

Says Tuka, O Master who knows all, I prostrate at Your feet, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who asks after us, the weary and worn, if not you, O Panduranga? To whom can we tell our joys and our sorrows? Who else will quench our thirst and hunger? Who will cool the heat of this affliction? Who else can carry us to the far shore? From whom can we ask for the things our longing craves? Who will soothe us with gentle coaxing? On whom else can we lay our demands? Who else can bear them? Tuka says: O Master, you know everything. I bow down at your feet, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

The whole abhanga is built out of one question asked over and over: who else, if not you? Tukaram lists everything a person needs, someone to ask after them, to hear their joys and sorrows, to feed them, to cool their fever, to ferry them across, to indulge and soothe them, and after each one he answers that there is no second who can do it. This is not flattery; it is the logic of total dependence, the deliberate stripping away of every other support until only God is left. The closing bow is what such helplessness becomes when it stops protesting: he simply lays himself at the feet of the One who already knows all of it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Our belly was filled the moment we sat in that assembly. What need have we now for the craving of liberation?

The call has been made; the rescue will come. What else is there to do right now?

Where is there any time left for singing? The fullness of joy has arrived.

When God's friendship is present, where is there room for anything adverse?

All obstacles were brought to ruin the moment love entered this heart.

Says Tuka, we have won this trust. God does not abandon His servant anywhere.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My belly was filled the moment I sat down in that company. Now what use have I for the craving after liberation? The cry was raised, and now the rescue is coming; what else is there left to do right now? Where is there any time left for singing? The whole of me has been flooded with joy. When God's friendship is here, where is there room for anything against me? The moment love entered this heart, every obstacle was blown to pieces. Tuka says: we have won, for certain. Where does God ever abandon his servant?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing the moment after the longing is answered, when the hunger itself is gone. Sitting in the company of God and his people has filled him so completely that he no longer even wants liberation, the goal that usually drives the seeker. He says the rescue is already on its way, joy has flooded everything, and there is no more room left for fear or for anything that opposes him. The arrival of love did not negotiate with the obstacles; it destroyed them. The closing line names the stake plainly: this is certainty, not hope, because a God who lets love in does not abandon his own.

God's greatness is his bending to the devotee

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Then why do the Puranas resound with His great deeds, if Narayana were truly without power?

Without glory, the Name would not be proclaimed far and wide. Of course it reaches all others.

Therefore, know that He is the eternal living One. The nature of the good deed done brings happiness to the jiva.

This excellence of character, this helplessness before devotion, has become part of Shrirang's very being.

This is why He is great: He does whatever His devotee asks. There is no pride in Hari.

Says Tuka, that is why they serve Him. There is no envy and no guile in God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If Narayana were truly without power, why would the Puranas thunder with his great deeds? Without his glory the Name would never be cried far and wide; why else would everyone proclaim it? So know this: he is the eternal living One, and the good he does brings happiness to the jiva. This goodness, this helplessness before his devotees, has become part of Shrirang's very nature. This is why he is great: he does whatever his devotee asks. There is no pride in Hari. Tuka says: that is why they serve him. In God there is no envy and no guile.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram argues, almost like a debater, from the evidence back to the truth: the scriptures resound with God's deeds and the whole world cries his Name, and that could not be so if he were powerless. But the proof he cares about is moral, not metaphysical. What makes God great, he says, is not raw power but a kind of willing helplessness before those who love him, that he does whatever his devotee asks, carries no pride, holds no envy or guile. The radical claim is that God's greatness is measured by how completely he bends to the devotee. That, and not fear, is why people serve him.

GATHA 1026 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the milk of Hari-katha

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The inexhaustible milk of Hari-katha is the Divine Mother. The Vaishnava people have drunk of it and continue to drink.

Even nectar has retreated in shame before this great bliss of Brahman.

The fallen and the sinful sit in the purifying assembly and become four-armed like God Himself.

All joys gather wherever the Vaishnavas press together.

The Nirguna has taken on the guise of the quality-bearing one, and with love, sings and dances.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The story of Hari is inexhaustible milk; she is the Divine Mother. The Vaishnava people have drunk of it and go on drinking. Even nectar drew back in shame before this, the great bliss of Brahman. The fallen and the sinful sit down in this purifying company and become four-armed, like God himself. All joys gather to the place where the Vaishnavas press close together. The formless one has put on the guise of the one with form and qualities, and holding love, he sings and dances.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram praises the telling and hearing of Hari's story as the one food that never runs out, calling it the milk of the Divine Mother, sweeter even than the nectar of immortality. The stakes he names are who gets fed: the fallen and the sinful, who are not turned away but transformed in this company until they take on God's own form. Wherever devotees crowd together, every joy comes to that spot. The closing image is the boldest claim: the formless absolute has voluntarily taken shape and stepped into the gathering to sing and dance with them, as if God will not stay distant while his people make this music.

GATHA 1027 Faith and Trust

Faith, the burden is God's

मराठी मूळ

संसारसोहळे भोगितां सकळ । भक्तां त्याचें बळ विटोबाचें ॥1॥
भय चिंता धाक न मनिती मनीं । भक्तां चक्रपाणि सांभाळीत ॥ध्रु.॥

नव्हती ते मुक्त आवडे संसार । देव भक्तां भार सर्व वाहे ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे देव भक्तां वेळाईत । भक्त ते निंश्चत त्याचियानें ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

While devotees enjoy all the celebrations of worldly life, their true strength comes from Vithoba.

They harbor no fear, worry, or dread in their minds, for the discus-bearing Lord watches over them.

Sin and merit cannot touch their being, for Shrirang is wholly theirs.

Liberation is not their aim; they love this worldly life, for God carries all their burdens.

Says Tuka, God waits upon His devotees, and by His power, the devotees dwell carefree.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The devotees taste all the celebrations of worldly life, yet their true strength is Vithoba's. They carry no fear, no worry, no dread in their minds, for the discus-bearing Lord guards over them. Sin and merit cannot lay hold of their bodies, for Shrirang is wholly theirs. They are not after liberation; they love this worldly life, because God carries all of their burden. Tuka says: God waits upon his devotees, and by his power they live without a care.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the strange freedom of the true devotee, who lives fully inside ordinary worldly life yet is untouched by what usually rules it. Their security does not come from themselves; it is Vithoba's, which is why fear, worry, and even the accounting of sin and merit cannot get a grip on them. He pushes the claim further than most piety dares: such devotees do not even want liberation, because when God carries the whole burden there is nothing left to escape from. The closing reversal is the sharpest point: God waits upon the devotee, serves them, and it is by his power, not their own effort, that they are carefree.

GATHA 1028 The Nature of God

Nonduality, devotee is God

मराठी मूळ

देवासी अवतार भक्तांसी संसार । दोहींचा विचार एकपणें ॥1॥
भक्तांसी सोहळे देवाचिया अंगें । देव त्यांच्या संगें सुख भोगी ॥ध्रु.॥

एका अंगीं दोन्ही जालीं हीं निर्माण । देवभक्तपण स्वामिसेवा ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे येथें नाहीं भिन्नभाव । भक्त तो चि देव देव भक्त ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

God takes incarnation; for devotees, there is worldly life. Both are considered as one.

The devotees experience joy through God's own being, and God savors bliss in their company.

God gave His devotees form and shape, and they in turn proclaimed His boundless nature.

From one body, both came into being: the state of being God-and-devotee, the way of Lord and service.

Says Tuka, here there is no sense of separation. The devotee is God, and God is the devotee.

IN PLAIN WORDS

God takes incarnation; the devotee takes worldly life. Look closely, and the two are one. The devotee feels joy through God's own being, and God tastes that joy through the devotee. God gave the devotee form and shape; the devotee proclaimed God's boundlessness. From one body both of these came into being: the state of being God-and-devotee, the way of Master and service. Tuka says: here there is no sense of separation. The devotee is the very God, and God is the devotee.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes the relationship of God and devotee and collapses the distance in it. He sets the two side by side, God descending into incarnation, the devotee descending into worldly life, and says that on close inspection they are a single thing. Joy passes back and forth between them so completely that neither feels it alone; God even depends on the devotee to be given form and to have his greatness spoken aloud. The closing line is the full nondual claim, stated without hedging: the devotee is God and God is the devotee, with no real seam between them. Love has dissolved the very separation that made the relationship possible.

GATHA 1029 Krishna Leela

Krishna, the absolute become love-struck

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The cows lowed for Him, and He, the treasury of kaivalya, stood ready to bestow.

He relished the leftover morsels of the cowherd boys, and the forest-garland-bearing Lord was delighted.

He stole and ate milk, curds, and butter; by devotion, the discus-bearing Lord was bound.

Though desireless by nature, He became love-struck, sitting and waiting for the gopis' path.

Says Tuka, this is the dark-hued Consciousness that, having pervaded all things, yet remains apart.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The cows lowed, and he turned his ear to them, and the treasury of liberation stood ready to give. He ate the cowherd boys' leftover scraps, and the forest-garland-wearing Vanamali was delighted by it. He stole and ate the milk and curds and butter; by their love the discus-bearer let himself be bound. He who has no desire became hungry with desire, and sat watching the path for the gopis to come. Tuka says: this is the dark-hued Consciousness that fills all things and yet stays apart from them.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram gathers the homely stories of Krishna's childhood and reads them as a single astonishing fact: the absolute let itself be made small by love. The very treasury of liberation answers a cow's lowing; he who needs nothing relishes the boys' leftovers, gets bound for stealing butter, and the desireless one sits aching with longing, watching for the gopis. Each scene is a deliberate scandal to philosophy, God behaving like a love-struck child. The closing line holds both truths at once: this is the dark-hued supreme Consciousness, which pervades everything and yet remains untouched, choosing out of love to play at being bound.

GATHA 1030 The Nature of God

Generosity, the host who refuses no one

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For the Capable One, there is no distinction of high or low station. All provision stands ready in His home.

Where there is honor, He returns far greater honor. Where more is asked, He gives even more.

He does not distinguish between friend and kin, between king and pauper; all are the same to Him.

Where He sees sincere feeling, He bustles about with eager care. Where He finds dullness, He leaves it aside.

No one forfeits the supplicant's place. The devotee implores, and God removes all doubt.

Says Tuka, He fills the belly full and to overflowing, and by direct experience shows that one is truly satisfied.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For the Capable One there is no high station and no low; every provision stands ready in his house. Where you bring him honor, he gives back far greater honor; where you ask for much, there he piles on more. He does not weigh whether you are friend or kin or stranger; king and pauper are the same to him. Where he sees real feeling, he bustles about with eager care; where he finds dullness, he leaves it aside. No one loses their place as a beggar at his door; the devotee pleads, and God clears away every doubt. Tuka says: he fills the belly full and over the brim, and by direct experience shows you what it is to be truly satisfied.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures God as a boundlessly capable host who keeps an open table and turns no one away by rank. The point is that God's giving is measured by the seeker's sincerity, not by their status: honor him and he returns far more, ask much and he gives more still, and king and pauper stand on equal ground at his door. The one thing he answers to is genuine feeling; where he meets only dullness he simply lets it be, not in scorn but because there is nothing there to feed. The closing claim is experiential, not theoretical: God does not fill you halfway, he fills you to overflowing, and you come to know real satisfaction by tasting it, not by being told.

GATHA 1031 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, Pandhari the marketplace

मराठी मूळ

आले भरा केणें । येरझार चुके जेणें ॥1॥
उभें केलें विटेवरी । पेंठ इनाम पंढरी ॥ध्रु.॥
वाहाती मारग । अवघें मोहोरलें जग ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे माप । खरें आणा माझे बाप ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He came in fullness, He by whom the weary rounds of coming and going are cut off.

He was made to stand upon the brick. Pandhari, freely granted, is His market-town.

Paths stream toward it; the whole world has gathered.

Says Tuka, bring honest measure, O my father.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Come, load up your goods here, where the weary rounds of coming and going are cut off. He was made to stand upon the brick; Pandhari, given free, is his market-town. The roads all run toward it; the whole world has gathered here. Tuka says: bring honest measure, O my father.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns Pandharpur into a marketplace and the devotee into a trader come to do business. The goods worth carrying are the only ones that end the endless cycle of birth and death, of coming and going; Vitthal stands on his brick as the merchant of that one commodity, and the market itself is given freely, no entry fee. Every road in the world leads to this town, and the whole world is already crowding in. The closing line is the catch and the moral: come to this trade, but come with honest measure, bring true devotion, not a rigged scale, for this is one market that cannot be cheated.

GATHA 1032 Prayers

Prayer, run to me quickly

मराठी मूळ

लक्ष्मीवल्लभा । दिनानाथा पद्मनाभा ॥1॥
सुख वसे तुझे पायीं । मज ठेवीं ते चि ठायीं ॥ध्रु.॥
माझी अल्प हे वासना। तूं तो उदाराचा राणा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे भोगें । पीडा केली धांव वेगें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Beloved of Lakshmi, Lord of the distressed, O Padmanabha.

Happiness dwells at Your feet. Keep me always in that place.

My desire is small, but You are the King of generosity.

Says Tuka, the pain of experience has struck me. Run swiftly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O Beloved of Lakshmi, Lord of the helpless, O Padmanabha. Happiness lives at your feet; keep me always in that one place. My longing is a small thing, but you are the King of the generous. Tuka says: the suffering of this life has struck me hard. Come, run quickly.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a short, direct cry for help. Tukaram names God by his titles of power and tenderness, Beloved of Lakshmi, Lord of the helpless, Padmanabha, and asks for only one thing: to be kept always at the feet where happiness lives. He frames the request shrewdly, calling his own desire small while calling God the King of generosity, as if to say that granting it would cost such a giver nothing. The last line drops the framing and lets the pain speak plainly: I am being crushed, so come, and come fast.

GATHA 1033 Prayers

Prayer, reckless love for God

मराठी मूळ

करीं ऐसें जागें । वेळोवेळां पायां लागें ॥1॥
प्रेम झोंबो कंठीं । देह धरणिये लोटीं ॥ध्रु.॥
राहे लोकाचार पडे अवघा विसर ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे ध्यावें । तुज विभीचारभावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Grant me this: that I may fall at Your feet again and again, awake in devotion.

Let love seize me by the throat. Let this body be cast to the ground.

Let all worldly custom fall away; let all else be forgotten.

Says Tuka, I would worship You with the reckless, illicit ardour of one who has crossed every boundary for love.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Make me this awake: that I fall at your feet again and again. Let love seize me by the throat; let this body be flung down to the ground. Let worldly custom fall away; let everything else be forgotten. Tuka says: I would worship you with the reckless, illicit ardour of one who has crossed every boundary for love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks not for calm devotion but for a love that overwhelms him completely. He wants to be kept so awake to God that he falls at his feet over and over, to be gripped by love at the throat, to be thrown bodily to the ground, to lose all sense of propriety and forget everything that is not God. The startling image in the last line names the intensity exactly: he wants to love God the way an adulterous lover loves, with the reckless, all-risking ardour of one who has thrown decency and reputation to the wind. The claim is that respectable, measured worship is too small; only a love that breaks the rules is fierce enough for God.

GATHA 1034 Devotion to Vitthal

The pilgrim road, one word on the way

मराठी मूळ

टाळ दिडी हातीं । वैकुंठींचे सांगाती ॥1॥
जाल तरी कोणा जा गा । करा सिदोरी ते वेगा ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

With cymbals and hand-drum in hand, they become companions on the road to Vaikuntha.

If you would go, go with them. Prepare your provisions quickly.

They call out as they walk. Keep your mind fixed upon their words.

Says Tuka, as they walk, they speak only one word: Vitthal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

They carry cymbals and a hand-drum, and they become your companions on the road to Vaikuntha. If you want to go, then go with them; pack your provisions quickly. They call out as they walk; keep your mind fixed on what they say. Tuka says: as they walk, the one word they speak is Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is pointing at the company of singing pilgrims and telling you how to join them. They walk to Vaikuntha with cymbals and drum, and the road is open to anyone willing to ready their provisions and set out now. The instruction is simple: keep your attention on their words while they walk. And the words are not many; the whole song reduces to one Name, Vitthal, repeated on the road.

GATHA 1035 Confession and Sin

Confession, empty-handed surrender

मराठी मूळ

वांयां जातों देवा । नेणें भक्ती करूं सेवा ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am going to waste, O God. I know not how to perform bhakti, how to serve You.

Now I simply stand with folded hands, quiet and still.

What should I do? I do not know. So I gaze upon Your feet.

Says Tuka, whatever grace You bestow, I shall receive and hold close.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am going to waste, O God. I do not know how to do bhakti, how to serve you. So now I fold my hands and stand quiet and still. What should I do? I do not know; I gaze at your feet. Tuka says: whatever you give, I will receive it and hold it close.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram confesses that he has no skill in devotion and no method of service, and that on his own his life is being wasted. He stops trying to perform and simply stands still with folded hands at the feet. The not-knowing is not laziness; it is the end of self-effort, where gazing at the feet is all that is left to do. What remains is pure receiving: he asks for nothing in particular and promises to keep whatever grace is placed in his hands.

GATHA 1036 Longing and Separation

Possession, the wedge between self and God

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A divine force has devoured my life. This great elemental power has seized me entirely, and no effort can shake it loose.

What can I do now? No remedy avails. It has driven a wedge between You and me.

In my confusion I have fallen into delusion. The remembrance does not come to my chitta, try as I might to say "I" and "mine."

I babble at random, estranged from everyone. I forget my own children; self and other feel the same.

Says Tuka, we have not met, life meeting life. Look, while You are still near, open Your eyes and see.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A divine force has eaten my life. This great power has seized me completely, and nothing I do can shake it loose. What can I do now? No remedy works. It has driven a wedge between you and me. In my confusion I have fallen into delusion. The remembrance will not come to my mind, however hard I try to say "I" and "mine." I babble at random, cut off from everyone. I forget my own children; self and other feel the same to me. Tuka says: we have not yet met, life touching life. Look, while you are still near, open your eyes and see.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes longing as a force that has devoured him, seized him so completely that no effort can pry it loose. He cannot even hold his old footing in the world: the words "I" and "mine" no longer take hold, he forgets his own children, and self and other have collapsed into one. Yet he names the ache honestly: the same seizure has wedged itself between him and God, so that full union, life meeting life, has not yet happened. The poem ends as a cry for God to look back while he is still within reach, before the gap becomes final.

GATHA 1037 Devotion to Vitthal

Adoration, Vitthal alone is God

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let me see with my own eyes the warmth of my very life.

Vitthal alone is our God; everything else is empty.

He stands behind Pundalik, hands resting on His hips.

Says Tuka, I shall hold in my chitta the Lord of Rakhumai.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let me see the warmth of my own life with my own eyes. For us, Vitthal alone is God; everything else is empty. He stands behind Pundalik, his hands resting on his hips. Tuka says: I will carry the Lord of Rakhumai in my mind.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks for one thing: to see with his own eyes the One who is the warmth and dearness of his very life. He cuts everything else away as empty and lets Vitthal alone stand as God. He fixes the figure precisely: the Lord standing behind Pundalik with hands on his hips, the image at Pandharpur. To hold that single form in the heart, the Lord of Rakhumai, is the whole of his devotion.

GATHA 1038 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, sealed as his from the start

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My object of worship is the treasure of Pandharpur.

I know nothing other than the King of Pandhari.

I am a servant of Vitthal, marked and sealed as His from the very beginning.

Says Tuka, now there can be no change whatsoever.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What I worship is the treasure of Pandharpur. I know nothing other than the King of Pandhari. I am Vitthal's servant, marked and sealed as his from the very beginning. Tuka says: now there can be no change at all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names his one object of worship, the treasure hidden in Pandharpur, and says he knows nothing besides the King of Pandhari. He calls himself a servant who was stamped as Vitthal's own from the start, not by recent choice but by an original seal. The point is that this belonging is settled and cannot be revised. Having been marked from the beginning, he declares there is now no possibility of any change.

GATHA 1039 The Power of the Name

The Name, the burden laid on God's head

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now this alone is our work: never to forget Your name. Carrying the cymbal, we shall dance in the joy of love.

All hardship has ended, past and future both settled. The suffering of the triputi and the weight of prarabdha have been spent.

On the pure banks of the Godavari, amidst temples of gods, in the company of saints and sages, each day passes in joy.

Says Tuka, O Lord of Pandhari, I have no other worry. The burden of my welfare and provision I have placed upon Your head.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now this alone is our work: never to forget your name. Carrying the cymbal, we dance in the joy of love. All hardship is over, past and future both settled. The suffering of the triputi and the weight of prarabdha have been spent. On the clean banks of the Godavari, among the temples of the gods, in the company of saints and sages, each day passes in joy. Tuka says: O Lord of Pandhari, I have no other worry. The burden of my keeping and my provision I have laid upon your head.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reduces his whole task to one thing: never to forget the Name, and to dance to the cymbal in the joy of love. With that, he says, hardship is finished on both sides of time; even the suffering of the triputi, the split of knower, knowing, and known, and the weight of past karma are spent. His days now pass in joy on the clean banks of the Godavari, among temples and in the company of saints. The release comes because he has set down the one burden that breeds worry: his own welfare and livelihood, which he places entirely on God's head.

Social criticism, the incorrigible offender

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A thief caught and beaten still cannot abandon his tricks.

There is one such evildoer, O God, who destroys his own life.

Even when his nose is gone, he feels no shame and no remorse, wandering disgraced from door to door.

Says Tuka, karma runs deep and holds firm. It does not let one move forward or backward.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A thief who is caught and beaten still cannot give up his tricks. There is one such evildoer, O God, who destroys his own life. Even when his nose is cut off, he feels no shame and no second thought; he wanders disgraced from door to door. Tuka says: karma runs deep and holds firm. It will not let such a one move forward or back.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at the pattern of the incorrigible offender, the man who is caught and punished and still cannot drop his habit. The harm is turned inward: it is his own life he ruins. Even public disgrace, his nose cut off, the old mark of shame, does not stir shame or reflection in him, so he keeps wandering from door to door. The hard truth Tuka names is that deep-rooted karma can lock a person in place, unable to go forward or back; the warning is meant for our own examination, to catch the habit in ourselves before it sets that hard.

GATHA 1041 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the easy path for Vishnu's servants

मराठी मूळ

मुनि मुक्त जाले भेणें गर्भवासा । आह्मां विष्णुदासां सुलभ तो ॥1॥
अवघा चि संसार केला ब्रह्मरूप । विठ्ठलस्वरूप ह्मणोनियां ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे जनां सकळांसहित । घेऊं अखंडित प्रेमसुख ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sages sought liberation for fear of the womb. For us, the servants of Vishnu, He is easily accessible.

We have made the entire world into Brahman, seeing everything as the form of Vitthal.

The Puranas prescribe arduous practices, but for us the path to Vaikuntha is simple.

Says Tuka, together with all people, we shall receive the unbroken joy of love.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sages sought liberation out of fear of the womb. For us, the servants of Vishnu, he is easy to reach. We have made the whole world into Brahman, calling everything the form of Vitthal. The Puranas prescribe harsh practices, but for us the path to Vaikuntha is simple. Tuka says: together with all people, we will take the unbroken joy of love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts two ways. The sages strove for liberation out of fear of returning to the womb, treating God as hard to win and practice as severe. The servants of Vishnu, he says, have him within easy reach. By seeing the whole world as Brahman and everything as the form of Vitthal, the difficult prescriptions of the Puranas fall away and the road to Vaikuntha becomes simple. And the joy is not private: Tuka claims it for everyone, an unbroken joy of love taken in company with all people.

GATHA 1042 The Moral Ideal

Refusal of praise, the danger of pride

मराठी मूळ

न करावी स्तुति माझी संतजनीं । होईल या वचनीं अभिमान ॥1॥
भारें भवनदी नुतरवे पार । दुरावती दूर तुमचे पाय ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे गर्व पुरवील पाठी । होईल माझ्या तुटी विठोबाची ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O saints, do not praise me, for pride will arise from such words.

Under the weight of pride, one cannot cross the river of worldly existence, and your feet grow distant from me.

Says Tuka, pride will betray me in the end and sever my bond with Vithoba.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O saints, do not praise me, for pride will rise from such words. Under the weight of pride one cannot cross the river of worldly existence, and your feet grow far from me. Tuka says: pride will betray me in the end and break my bond with Vithoba.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks the saints to stop praising him, because he knows what praise does: it breeds pride. He names the cost plainly. Pride is a weight that sinks a person, so that the river of worldly existence cannot be crossed and God's feet, the only support, drift out of reach. The real fear behind the request is the deepest loss: he sees that pride, if it takes hold, will betray him and sever his bond with Vithoba.

GATHA 1043 Prayers

Prayer, servant of the servants

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Make me the servant of the servants of Your servants. Grant me this one blessing.

The nine forms of devotion that are spoken of, let these be placed into my hands by the saints.

Says Tuka, relying on the support of Your feet, I shall truly cross the river of worldly existence.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Make me the servant of the servants of your servants; grant me this one blessing. The nine kinds of devotion that are spoken of, let the saints place them into my hands. Tuka says: leaning on the support of your feet, I will truly cross the river of worldly existence.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays not for greatness but for the lowest place, to be servant of the servants of God's servants, and asks that single blessing. He wants the nine traditional forms of devotion handed to him by the saints, received from their hands rather than claimed on his own. His confidence rests entirely outside himself. With the support of God's feet to lean on, he is sure the river of worldly existence can truly be crossed.

Social criticism, the witless company

मराठी मूळ

चोर टेंकाचे निघाले चोरी । आपलें तैसें पारखे घरीं ॥1॥

बुद्धिहीन नये कांहीं चि कारणा । तयासवें जाणा तें चि सुख ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नाहीं ठाउकें वर्म । तयासी कर्म वोडवलें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Thieves full of bluster set out to steal, but in the end they are robbed themselves.

There is no profit; one only loses ears, hands, and feet.

The witless person is fit for nothing. To go along with such a one is to share that same fate.

Says Tuka, one who does not know the secret: karma has overtaken him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Boastful thieves set out to steal, but in the end they are robbed themselves. There is no profit; they only lose their ears, hands, and feet. The witless person is fit for nothing, and to go along with him is to share his very fate. Tuka says: one who does not know the secret has been overtaken by karma.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the figure of swaggering thieves who set out to rob and are stripped bare instead, losing ears, hands, and feet, the body's own punishments. The plain warning is about company: the witless person is good for nothing, and whoever walks with him inherits the same ruin. Behind the image is the spiritual point, the one who has missed the secret, the inner truth, is already in the grip of karma. The poem turns us to examine whose company we keep and whether we ourselves still lack that secret.

GATHA 1045 Faith and Trust

Faith, the marked child of the Capable One

मराठी मूळ

समर्थाचें बाळ कीविलवाणें दिसे । तरी कोणा हांसे जन देवा ॥1॥
अवगुणी जरी जालें तें वोंगळ । करावा सांभाळ लागे त्याचा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे तैसा मी एक पतित । परि मुद्रांकित जालों तुझा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if the child of the Capable One looks pitiful, who would dare to mock it?

Even if the child is full of faults and unclean, it must still be cared for and protected.

Says Tuka, in the same way I am a fallen one, yet I am stamped with Your seal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even if the child of the Capable One looks pitiful, who, O God, would dare to mock it? Even if the child is full of faults and unclean, it must still be cared for and protected. Tuka says: in the same way I am a fallen one, yet I have been stamped with your seal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram leans his whole case on belonging rather than worth. A great lord's child may look wretched, but no one dares mock it, and however faulty or unclean the child is, the parent is bound to care for it. He applies this to himself without softening his own state: he is a fallen one, full of faults. His security is not his merit but the seal stamped on him; because he bears God's mark, the care owed to a child is owed to him.

GATHA 1046 Social Criticism

Social criticism, nature does not change

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If you rub sandalwood paste on a donkey, it rolls in the ashes at once.

The inborn nature of a creature does not change.

If you hang a precious gem around a monkey's neck, it chews it and spits it out.

Says Tuka, the wicked have no taste for what is good. They only nurture their own ignorance.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Rub sandalwood paste on a donkey, and at once it rolls in the ashes. A creature's inborn nature does not change at all. Hang a precious gem on a monkey's neck, and it chews it and spits it out. Tuka says: the wicked have no taste for what is good. They only nurture their own ignorance.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming a hard limit: goodness offered to one who has no appetite for it is wasted. He gives two pictures. Fine sandalwood on a donkey, and the donkey goes straight back to the dust. A jewel hung on a monkey, and the monkey chews and spits it out. The point is not the donkey or the monkey but the pattern in a person who cannot receive what is good, and who turns it back into the very ignorance he prefers. Read it as a warning against the same refusal in yourself, the part that throws away what would lift it.

GATHA 1047 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the indiscriminate one

मराठी मूळ

नेणे सुनें चोर पाहुणा मागता । देखून भलता भुंकतसे ॥1॥
शिकविलें कांहीं न चले तया । बोलियेले वांयां बोल जाती ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A dog cannot tell a thief from a guest or a supplicant. Seeing anyone at all, it barks.

No training takes hold in such a creature; all words spoken to it are wasted.

It vomits up milk and eats filth, never departing from its own ways.

Says Tuka, what is the use of praising or blaming such misconduct? This is the nature of the wicked.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A dog cannot tell a thief from a guest or a beggar. It sees anyone at all and barks. No training takes hold in such a creature. All words spoken to it are wasted. It throws up milk and eats filth, and never leaves its own ways. Tuka says: what use is praising or blaming such misconduct? This is the nature of the wicked.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram draws the wicked person as a dog with no discernment: it barks at saint and thief alike, because it cannot tell them apart. Training does not stick; good words spoken to it fall away unused. Worse, it spits up the milk it is given and goes back to filth, never departing from its own habits. He ends by refusing the whole effort: praise or blame change nothing in such a one, because this is simply its nature. The mirror to hold up is the part of us that cannot distinguish what is holy from what is harmful, and keeps returning to what fouls it.

GATHA 1048 Confession and Sin

Confession, the gap between show and heart

मराठी मूळ

जन मानविलें वरी बाहएात्कारीं । तैसा मी अंतरीं नाहीं जालों ॥1॥
ह्मणउनी पंढरीनाथा वाटतसे चिंता । प्रगट बोलतां लाज वाटे ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे मी तों आपणांसी ठावा । आहें बरा देवा जैसा तैसा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have pleased the world through outward show, but inwardly I have not truly changed.

Therefore, O Lord of Pandhari, I am filled with anxiety. I feel ashamed to speak of it openly.

The saints see all persons as of the form of Brahman. They do not see my faults.

Says Tuka, I am known to myself. I am before You, O God, exactly as I am.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have pleased the world by outward show. Inwardly I have not truly changed. So, Lord of Pandhari, I am full of worry. I am ashamed to say it out loud. The saints see all people as the form of Brahman. They do not see my faults. Tuka says: I am known to myself. Before You, O God, I am exactly as I am.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram confesses a split he cannot hide from himself. Outwardly he has won the world's approval, but his inner self has not changed to match, and this fills him with shame and anxiety before the Lord of Pandhari. He notes that the saints, seeing everyone as Brahman, look past his faults, so their kindness does not reach the problem.

The reckoning he insists on is the one with himself and with God: he is fully known to himself, and he stands before God exactly as he is, with nothing covered. It is the prayer of someone who refuses to let a good reputation stand in for a changed heart.

GATHA 1049 Confession and Sin

Confession, asking to be made real

मराठी मूळ

काम क्रोध माझे जीताती शरीरीं । कोवळें तें वरी बोलतसें ॥1॥
कैसा सरतां जालों तुझ्या पायीं । पांडुरंगा कांहीं न कळे हें ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे मज आणूनि अनुभवा । दाखवीं हें देवा साच खरें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Lust and anger are alive in my body. On the surface, I speak only tender words.

How have I come to be counted at Your feet, O Panduranga? I cannot understand this at all.

The saints will speak the testimony of the Puranas, yet my chitta has not truly become pure.

Says Tuka, bring me into experience. Show me what is real and true, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Lust and anger are still alive in my body. On the surface I speak only tender words. How have I come to be counted at Your feet, Panduranga? I cannot understand it at all. The saints will quote the testimony of the Puranas, yet my mind has not truly become pure. Tuka says: bring me into real experience. Show me what is true, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram admits that lust and anger are not dead in him; they live on beneath his gentle speech. He cannot make sense of how someone like this has been granted a place at Panduranga's feet. He will not be consoled by scripture spoken over him: the saints may cite the Puranas in his favor, but he knows his own mind has not actually become pure. So he asks for the one thing words cannot give, real experience, the truth shown to him directly rather than asserted about him. It is a refusal to mistake borrowed testimony for genuine inner change.

GATHA 1050 Confession and Sin

Humility, living on God's remnants

मराठी मूळ

तुमचें मी दास संतांचें दुर्बळ । करूनि सांभाळ राखा पायीं ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे तुमचें सेवितों उच्छिष्ट । क्षमा करीं धीट होऊनियां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I offer praise for which I have no authority. I do not understand the measure of my own worthiness.

I am Your servant, the feeble one among the saints. Hold me, care for me, keep me at Your feet.

The mantra of Rama, Krishna, Hari is what I love to utter. My delight is in the feet of Vithoba.

Says Tuka, I live on Your blessed remnants. Forgive me for being so bold.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I offer praise I have no right to offer. I do not know the measure of my own worth. I am Your servant, the feeble one among the saints. Hold me, care for me, keep me at Your feet. The mantra of Rama, Krishna, Hari is what I love to say. My delight is in the feet of Vithoba. Tuka says: I live on Your leftovers. Forgive me for being so bold.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram approaches praise as something he is not qualified to give, since he does not know his own worth. From that low place he asks only to be kept: held, cared for, kept at God's feet as the weakest among the saints. What he can claim is love, the names of Rama, Krishna, and Hari on his lips, and delight in Vithoba's feet. He calls himself one who lives on God's remnants, the leftover prasad, and asks forgiveness for the boldness of even speaking. The register is the smallness of the devotee set against the largeness of what he loves.

GATHA 1051 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the burden lifted

मराठी मूळ

बहु दूरवरी । वेठी ओझें होतें शिरीं ॥1॥

पाईक - अभंग 11

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For a long time the burden of veth weighed upon my head. I bore that heavy load.

Now the burden has been lifted. You have taken me as Your own.

Again and again I came before You, pleading. How many times, in the past.

Says Tuka, O God, today my service has borne its fruit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For a long time a forced load weighed on my head. I carried that heavy burden. Now the burden is lifted. You have taken me as Your own. Again and again I came to You, pleading. So many times, in the past. Tuka says: O God, today my service has borne its fruit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as one freed from forced, unpaid labor, the weight that had pressed on his head for so long. Now that load is gone, because God has claimed him as His own. He recalls the long history behind this relief: how many times he came back, pleading, before this day. The poem lands on the moment of harvest: today the long service has finally borne fruit. It is the cry of someone who endured and begged for a long time and has now, at last, been received.

Metaphor, the soldier's joy in service

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Through service as a paika, the proven truth becomes clear. He holds the tone and the word of command within his chitta.

Without the paika, there can never be happiness. Among the people, suffering and trouble do not end.

Those who do not know the joy of a paika's service: fie on their living in vain.

Says Tuka, by even a moment's pledge, the paika enjoys boundless joy.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Through service as a paik, the proven truth becomes clear. He holds the command and its word within his mind. Without the paik there is never any happiness. Among the people, suffering and trouble do not end. Those who do not know the paik's joy: shame on their living in vain. Tuka says: by even a moment's pledge, the paik enjoys boundless joy.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the figure of the paik, the loyal foot-soldier who serves a lord, as the image of true devotion. Such service is how the proven truth becomes clear, because the servant carries his master's command in his heart. Without that kind of devoted servant, he says, there is no real happiness, and the suffering among ordinary people never ends. Those who have never tasted the joy of such service have lived in vain. The closing line is the heart of it: even a moment's true pledge of self to the Lord opens boundless joy, far more than a life lived without it.

GATHA 1053 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the soldier who pledges his life

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The joy of paiki is known only to the paik; and so he has pledged his very life as its price.

He endures the volleys of arrows and the endless downpour of rain upon his body.

Before the Master, he steps forward when battle breaks out, and then his adornment and splendor are revealed.

The paiks have enjoyed immeasurable joy, pure and steadfast, within and without.

Says Tuka, these are the marks of this truth: the one who knows it is wise; the one who acts on it reaps the fruit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The joy of the paik's service is known only to the paik. So he has pledged his very life as its price. He endures the volleys of arrows and the endless downpour of rain on his body. When battle breaks out he steps forward before the Master, and then his glory and splendor are shown. The paiks have enjoyed boundless joy, pure and steadfast, within and without. Tuka says: these are the marks of this truth. The one who knows it is wise. The one who acts on it reaps the fruit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram continues the soldier-image: only the paik himself knows the joy of his service, and that is why he stakes his very life on it. He stands under arrows and endless rain, enduring everything for his lord. The moment battle comes, he steps forward before the Master, and only then is his true splendor revealed. Such servants have known a joy that is pure and unshaken, inside and out. The verse closes with a test of seriousness: knowing this truth makes one wise, but only acting on it, only paying the price with one's life as the paik does, lets one actually taste the fruit.

GATHA 1054 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the soldier who masters the field

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The paik who knows the inner bhav of paiki gains his footholds through hidden paths and secret trails.

Protecting himself, he outmaneuvers all others, stripping and taking everything.

He gives no opening for pursuit and lets no one follow his track. The world regards such a paik as Swami.

Such paiks, to whom no one would give even alms, have become lords of the world.

Says Tuka, the one whose paiks are such as these, that commander is the Lord of all three worlds.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The paik who knows the inner heart of his service finds his footholds by hidden paths and secret trails. Guarding himself, he outmaneuvers all the rest, stripping and seizing everything. He gives no opening for pursuit and lets no one track him. The world regards such a paik as Master. Such paiks, to whom no one would give even alms, have become lords of the world. Tuka says: the one whose paiks are like this, that commander is the Lord of all three worlds.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pushes the soldier-figure into the language of skilled war: the paik who knows the inner heart of his service moves by hidden ways, protects himself, and overcomes all rivals, taking everything. He leaves no opening for pursuit and cannot be tracked, so the world comes to honor him as a master. The striking turn is the reversal of station: men so poor that no one would give them alms become lords of the world through this devoted skill. And the final line lifts the whole metaphor to God: the commander whose servants are such as these is the Lord of all three worlds. The hidden paths and seizing are the seeker's inwardness and total devotion, not literal plunder.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The paiks have kept the paths and routes of tradition in motion, breaking open the outsiders' stores of supply.

Taking provisions from the outsider's camp, they have protected their own people.

Whatever is spoken without inner foundation merely chatters; what is truly one's own is not recognized in such speech.

Those who stray from the path, the paiks punish, so that others may take heed.

Says Tuka, having taken the trust of the whole world, these paiks give happiness to all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The paiks have kept the paths and routes of the tradition moving, breaking open the outsiders' stores. Taking provisions from the outsider's camp, they have protected their own people. Whatever is spoken without inner foundation only chatters. What is truly one's own is not found in such speech. Those who stray from the path the paiks punish, so that others may take heed. Tuka says: having won the trust of the whole world, these paiks give happiness to all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram's soldier-image now serves the keeping of a living tradition. The paiks hold the routes open and break into the outsiders' stores to provision and protect their own people. He cuts in with the test that runs through these verses: speech without inner ground is only chatter, and what is genuinely one's own is never found in empty words. Those who wander off the true path are corrected, hard, so others learn from it. The verse ends in trust earned across the whole world, and the joy these faithful servants then give to all. The plunder and punishment are figures for guarding the way of devotion and the discipline that keeps a seeker on it.

A true paik guards the people and their lineage, and cuts the outsider at the root, destroying the wicked.

That one supreme paik is the leader of all paiks, whose entire bhav is for the Master's work alone.

For one to whom the body is as grass and gold is as stone, there is no separation between that paik and the Swami.

Without trust, a paik has no value at all; words spoken falsely are mithya, they are nothing.

Says Tuka, the Master should never be diminished. The paik who tends to the Master, the Master tends to in return.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A true paik guards the people and their lineage, and cuts the outsider at the root, destroying the wicked. That one supreme paik is the leader of all paiks, whose whole heart is for the Master's work alone. For one to whom the body is grass and gold is stone, there is no separation between that paik and the Master. Without trust a paik has no value at all. Words spoken falsely are mithya, they are nothing. Tuka says: the Master should never be diminished. The paik who tends the Master, the Master tends in return.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the ideal servant: he protects his people and their line and cuts evil off at the root. The supreme paik, leader of all the rest, is the one whose entire heart is given to the Master's work alone. For such a one, the body counts as grass and gold as mere stone, and so no distance remains between him and his Lord. Trust is everything: without it the servant is worthless, and false words are mithya, empty and unreal. The closing promise is mutual: never let the Master be diminished, for the servant who cares for the Master is cared for by the Master in return. It is a portrait of devotion that holds nothing back and is answered in kind.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The paik whom the Master acknowledges as His own is feared by all the world.

Those who are generous with their very lives shine as paiks; they are paraded as the crown-jewel of their commander.

Through the Master's own sovereignty, they enjoy His splendor, His honor, and every happiness.

Those of lesser merit come and go ceaselessly in great numbers, with no end to their coming and going.

Says Tuka, paiki is truly noble. Whether one has rendered much or little swami-seva, it is good.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The paik whom the Master acknowledges as His own is feared by all the world. Those who are generous with their very lives shine as paiks. They are paraded as the crown-jewel of their commander. Through the Master's own sovereignty they enjoy His splendor, His honor, and every happiness. Those of lesser merit come and go endlessly, in great numbers, with no end to their coming and going. Tuka says: paiki is truly noble. Whether one has rendered much or little service to the Master, it is good.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram closes the soldier sequence with the dignity of the claimed servant. The paik whom the Master openly owns is held in awe by everyone. Those who give their very lives shine and are displayed as their commander's crown-jewel, and through the Master's own power they share in his splendor, honor, and joy. Against them he sets those of little merit, who keep coming and going without end, an image of unliberated rebirth, of lives spent without that bond. The verdict is generous: such loyal service is genuinely noble, and whether one offers much of it or little, it is good. The whole metaphor points to surrender to God as the one service worth giving.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The true paik earns his true wages through genuine service. The real paik is known by paiki.

The real paik knows his body must take blows. No breach ever touches him.

One who takes wages from two masters is exposed. The true paik is recognized by his undivided pledge.

Having accomplished the task, he gives the glory to the Master. For the paik, truthfulness is his very nature.

Says Tuka, the paik's station is distinct. Without reaching the Master's own ground, there is no station at all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A true soldier earns his true wages by real service. You know the real one by his soldiering. The real soldier knows his body will take blows, and no breach ever touches him. The one who eats from two houses is found out. The true soldier is marked by his undivided pledge. He does the work, and gives the glory to his master. For him, this honesty is his very nature. Tuka says: the soldier's place is set apart. Without reaching the master's own ground, there is no place at all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes the soldier, the paik, a figure for the true servant of God. The genuine one is known not by his words but by his willingness to take the blows; he expects wounds and is not broken by them. The test is loyalty to one master alone: anyone who serves two, who eats from two houses, is exposed when the moment comes. The true servant does the work and hands the credit back to the master, and that honesty is simply who he is. The closing line names the stakes: the servant's standing is something distinct, and it is real only when he reaches the master's own ground; short of that there is no standing to speak of.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Among the paik's file, some stand high and some stand low. Who is truly brave, and who is a coward?

Some are utterly devoted to the Master's cause with their whole being. Others are crooked, bound by selfish hope.

Without a true crisis, some parade their vigor in vain. They wear the paik's name to no purpose.

Among the many counted in the ranks, high and low, the truly courageous are very few.

Says Tuka, the Master knows their worth. Seeing each paik, He sets the proper value.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the soldier's file, some stand high and some stand low. Who is truly brave, and who is the coward? Some give themselves wholly to their master's cause. Others are crooked, bound by their own hope of gain. Some, with no real crisis, parade their strength for nothing; they wear the soldier's name in vain. In the count there are many, high and low, but among them the brave are very few. Tuka says: the master knows their worth. Seeing each soldier, he sets the proper price.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks down the ranks of those who claim to serve God and asks who is real. Some are devoted with their whole being; others are crooked, held by private hope of reward; and some only put on a show of vigor when nothing is at stake, wearing the name without the substance. The point is that the crowd is large but the genuinely brave are rare, and a parade of zeal in safe times proves nothing. The reassurance and the warning together: the master is not fooled. He sees each one for what he is and sets his value accordingly, so the verdict that matters is his, not the soldier's own boast.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All are paiks of one Master. Each is valued according to his strength.

Some have an elevated place near the Master's feet. Others are kept apart, some near, some far.

One of meaner service earns a meaner, humbler post. One of full-hearted devotion receives the highest station.

Through true paiki, one becomes worthy in all quarters. But even a good paik who turns back earns only a coward's place.

Says Tuka, death awaits all of them. Fear earns disgrace. Fearlessness earns worth.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All are soldiers of one master. Each is valued as his strength deserves. Some have a high place near the master's feet. Others are kept apart, some near, some far. Mean service earns a mean, low place; full-hearted devotion receives the highest station. Through true soldiering a man becomes worthy everywhere. But even a good soldier who turns back earns only a coward's place. Tuka says: death waits for all of them. Fear earns disgrace; fearlessness earns worth.

WHAT IT MEANS

All who serve belong to one master, yet they are not all valued alike: the measure is the strength and wholeness each brings. Half-hearted service earns a low post, full-hearted devotion the place nearest the master's feet, and that closeness or distance is set by the servant's own giving. Tukaram adds a sharp line: a good soldier who turns back in the moment forfeits everything and is counted with the cowards. The frame underneath is mortality. Since death is coming for everyone alike, flinching from it only earns disgrace, while meeting it without fear is the very thing that earns worth.

The foot-paik stands in the file as commanded. Some serve only for the belly, going and coming as it suits them.

Those who take a step out of line are pulled back and severed. A blow on the back marks a shirker; one who stands firm with body forward earns honor.

The true paik raids at the cost of his own body, slays all, and takes everything.

Says Tuka, this is not a matter of words. The wager of one's service alone reaches fulfillment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The foot-soldier stands in the file as he is ordered. Some serve only for the belly, coming and going as it suits them. Those who step out of line are pulled back and cut down. A blow on the back marks the shirker; the one who stands firm with his body forward earns honor. The true soldier raids at the cost of his own body, kills all, and takes everything. Tuka says: this is not a matter of words. Only the wager of real service reaches its goal.

WHAT IT MEANS

The picture is a battle line, and the figure is the servant of God under command. Some are there only to be fed, drifting in and out as it suits them, and those who break ranks are pulled back and destroyed. Tukaram reads the wounds: a blow on the back marks the man who turned to run, while the one who took it from the front, body forward, is the one honored. Real service is like a raid that risks the whole body and holds nothing back. The closing line lands the claim: this cannot be done with talk. Only service actually staked, like a wager of one's life, ever reaches its end.

GATHA 1062 Worldly Metaphors

A true soldier knows his own kind

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A born paik recognizes another paik. His respect is reserved for that one alone.

Those who take up weapons for the belly are known for what they are: veth-men, not true paiks.

The living proof of the genuine one is in his wounds. Before a true discerner, nothing can be concealed.

Says Tuka, I bow to people, calling them God. Yet I know well the marks of those who have truly become this.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A born soldier recognizes another soldier. His respect is kept for that one alone. Those who take up weapons only for the belly are known for what they are: hired hands, not true soldiers. The living proof of the genuine one is in his wounds. Before a true judge, nothing can be hidden. Tuka says: I bow to people and call them God. Yet I know well the marks of those who have truly become this.

WHAT IT MEANS

Only one who is the real thing can recognize the real thing; the true servant reserves his respect for his own kind. The mercenary who carries weapons just to be fed gives himself away, and the proof of the genuine one is plain in his scars. No pretense survives a discerning eye. In the last lines Tukaram holds two things together. He bows to everyone and honors the God in all people, yet he is not naive: he knows the visible marks of those who have actually been transformed, and is not fooled by those who only wear the name.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Change your buddhi; hold fast to something. This human body will not come again.

You make no effort for your own good, chasing home, family, and wealth.

A treasure has fallen into your hands by chance. Otherwise you will suffer the calamity of the womb again.

Coming and going endlessly, falling into the pit of hell: this is what awaits.

Says Tuka, remember the Lord while you still have this body, or else nothing good will come of it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Change your mind; hold fast to something. This human body will not come to you again. You make no effort for your own good; you chase house, family, and wealth. A treasure has fallen into your hands by chance. Otherwise you must suffer the womb again. Coming and going without end, falling into the pit of hell: this is what waits. Tuka says: while you still have this body, remember the Lord, or else nothing good will come of it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is shaking the listener awake. The human birth is a treasure that has come by chance and will not be given a second time, yet people spend it chasing house, family, and wealth and make no effort for the one thing that is actually their good. He names the stakes plainly: the alternative to waking up is to be born again through the suffering of the womb, to keep coming and going, to fall into hell. The whole abhanga turns on one urgent instruction. Use this body, while you still have it, to remember God, because this is the only window in which that effort can be made.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It is the nature of the fallen to importune, and it is Your duty to resolve their plight, O God.

When I commit offenses, I cannot protect myself. The verdict and the settlement rest in Your hands alone.

Even without paying a single shell, I cry out to You for the sake of the Name.

The title "Ocean of Mercy" and "Purifier of the Fallen" has come into my possession.

Says Tuka, I shall commit wrongs by the million. You alone, O God, hold compassion deep within You.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It is for us, the fallen, to bring our troubles to you, and it is your work to untangle them, O God. When I do wrong I cannot save myself. The verdict and the settlement are in your hands alone. Without my paying a single shell, do my work; I call on you for the sake of the Name. The titles Ocean of Mercy and Purifier of the Fallen have come into my keeping. Tuka says: I will commit wrongs by the million. You alone, O God, hold compassion deep within you.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a bold prayer that turns its own unworthiness into a claim on God. Tukaram says it is simply the nature of the fallen to bring their troubles, and it is therefore God's own work to resolve them; the broken cannot fix themselves, so the verdict rests entirely with God. He presses harder: he pays nothing, he comes only in the name's name, and he holds God to the titles God already wears, Ocean of Mercy and Purifier of the Fallen. The audacious closing line, that he will sin by the millions, is not a license to sin but a measuring of mercy: he is staking everything on the truth that God's compassion is deeper than any count of his offenses.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He who is the resting place of devotees stands calling out to them.

In His hands He holds the toy of love, placing it tenderly in their mouths. With joy He carries them across the ocean of worldly existence, lifting them to His hip.

He greatly longs for His devotees, looking all around for them.

Says Tuka, He is the Giver of grace who fills the full measure of the devotee's longing.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He who is the resting place of his devotees stands calling them, running to them. In his hands he holds the toy of love, and he tenderly puts it in their mouths. With joy he carries them across the ocean of the world, lifting them onto his hip. He longs greatly for his devotees, looking all around for them. Tuka says: he is the Giver of grace, who fills the whole measure of the devotee's longing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram paints God as a tender parent rather than a distant judge. He is the place his devotees come home to rest, and he does not wait for them: he stands calling, he runs out to meet them. The images are domestic and intimate, the toy of love put gently into the mouth, the child lifted onto the hip and carried, and that crossing is over the whole ocean of worldly existence. The reversal is the heart of it: it is God who longs, scanning all around for his devotees. He gives grace freely and satisfies the devotee's longing to the full.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Grant me the company of those who love You without ceasing. Then, O Lord of Lakshmi, I shall never trouble You again.

I shall simply fall and lie still at the saints' feet, doing nothing, asking for nothing. I swear this by You, O Vithoba.

By this one remedy, the pain of both of us is resolved. I have sat down in protest at Your door, calling out.

Says Tuka, turn Your chitta to these words, O Vitthal. Do not reject me entirely.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Grant me the company of those who love you without ceasing. Then, O Lord of Lakshmi, I will never trouble you again. I will simply fall and lie still at the saints' feet, asking for nothing, doing nothing. I swear this to you, O Vithoba. By this one remedy the pain of us both is cured. I have sat down in protest at your door, calling out. Tuka says: turn your mind to these words, O Vitthal. Do not refuse me altogether.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks God for only one gift, the company of those who love him without break, and he frames it as a bargain that would free God of him: give me this, and I will trouble you for nothing else. He pictures himself simply lying at the saints' feet, wanting nothing more, and swears it by Vithoba. The wit is that one remedy heals both sides, the devotee's ache and the demands he keeps making on God. The closing has the posture of a sit-down protest at the door, a refusal to leave until heard, ending in a plain plea: attend to these words, Vitthal, and do not turn me away entirely.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The servants of Vishnu have purified offenders by the power of their own company.

Who can stand against them? They are the mighty warriors of Vitthal. Before them, the inauspicious becomes auspicious and stands still.

In those heaps of the joy of love, there is no sin, not even as a remedy.

Says Tuka, they have turned this earth into Vaikuntha itself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The servants of Vishnu have made offenders pure by their own company. Who can stand against them? They are the mighty warriors of Vitthal. Before them the inauspicious turns auspicious and stops. In those heaps of the joy of love there is no sin, not even a trace of it for medicine. Tuka says: they have turned this earth into Vaikuntha itself.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram praises the company of the Vaishnava saints as a purifying power; mere nearness to them makes the guilty clean. He calls them warriors, the strong men of Vitthal, because nothing inauspicious can hold its ground before them; what was ill-omened turns to blessing and is stilled. They are heaps of the joy of love, and in that joy there is not even a speck of sin left, not enough to use as medicine. The claim he lands is large and deliberate: by their presence the saints have made this ordinary earth into Vaikuntha, God's own heaven, here and now.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If someone is divine, bow at their feet. Have no craving for their nature.

The grace of fire is the removal of cold, yet you cannot tie fire in your garment and carry it away.

Says Tuka, a scorpion and a snake are also forms of Narayana. Salute them from a distance; do not touch them.

The devotees, the Bhagavatas, the jivanmukta saints: their glory throughout creation is beyond all wonder.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If someone is divine, bow at their feet. Do not crave their nature for yourself. The kindness of fire is that it drives off cold, yet you cannot tie fire in your garment and carry it away. Tuka says: a scorpion and a snake are Narayana too. Salute them from a distance; do not touch them. The devotees, the Bhagavatas, the liberated saints: their glory through all creation is beyond wonder.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram teaches reverence joined to discernment. Where there is true divinity, bow to it, but do not greedily want to possess its nature as your own. Fire shows the principle: it is good because it warms you, yet you cannot fold it into your clothes and carry it off; its blessing has its proper distance. So even a scorpion or a snake is a form of Narayana and deserves a salute, but from a safe distance, not a touch. The point is that honoring God in all things does not erase the differences between things; the right response to each is reverence shaped by what it actually is, and the glory of the true saints, set above all this, is beyond telling.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Among the infinite, You are the Infinite, O playful savior of the world. Says Tuka, who is one with the bliss of Brahman: he plays among the people like the sum of all the world. His conduct is irreproachable by scripture and tradition, and his devotion to You has been witnessed by all.

Having offered all desire and forbidden action as oblation, he performs only the rituals prescribed by Brahman. The saints, like a conjunction of planets, have swallowed up the world's noise.

Tuka rises like the sun on the eastern horizon. The saints form a holy gathering; the Godavari itself is the sacred story of Hari.

Peace and fidelity have been wedded; desire has been quenched by desirelessness. Forgiveness is famous in all the world as the mark of the forgiving.

Compassion, O Lord of the lowly, You have kept alive. Your glory has spread throughout the world.

You raised the banner of the Vedic word and honored God, the twice-born, and all creatures. The disease of irreligion had touched the body of righteousness; You cured it with the remedy of single-minded devotion.

You spread devotion in the spirit of oneness with Brahman and made the words of the Vedas bear fruit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Among the infinite you are the Infinite, O playful savior of the world. Tuka says: he who is weighed equal to the bliss of Brahman plays among the people as the whole sum of the world. His conduct is beyond reproach by scripture and tradition, and your devotion has been seen in him. Offering up all selfish desire and forbidden acts, he keeps only what Brahman ordains, dedicating all to God without clinging to mere rule. The saints, like a gathering of planets, swallow up the world's noise. Tuka rises like the sun on the eastern hill. The throng of saints is itself the holy ford, and the story of Hari is the sacred Godavari. Peace and faithfulness are wedded; desire is quenched by desirelessness. Forgiveness is famous through the world, and in your body it takes living form. Compassion, O Lord of the lowly, you have kept alive, and your fame has spread through all the world. You raised the banner of the Vedic word and honored God, the twice-born, and every creature. The wasting disease of unrighteousness had touched the body of dharma; you healed it with the medicine of single-minded devotion. In the spirit of oneness with Brahman you spread devotion, and you made the words of the Vedas bear fruit. By the pride of body and birth I have been cheated; do not pass me by. Let my mind never betray these feet. Rameshwar asks this of Ramachandra.

WHAT IT MEANS

This long abhanga celebrates the true saint as the place where God's own work becomes visible in the world. The saint, here named with Tuka, is weighed equal to the bliss of Brahman yet moves among ordinary people, his conduct blameless by scripture and his devotion plainly God's doing; he gives up selfish and forbidden action and keeps only what is rightly ordained, offering all to God without clinging to rule for its own sake. The great virtues are spoken of as living in him: peace wedded to fidelity, desire quenched by desirelessness, forgiveness and compassion taking bodily form, so that the saints together make the whole earth a place of pilgrimage. The frame is a healing: the wasting disease of unrighteousness had infected dharma itself, and it is cured by single-minded devotion, which makes the Vedic word bear fruit. The closing turn is personal and humble: the speaker confesses he has been cheated by pride of body and birth, begs not to be passed over, and asks that his mind never stray from these feet, signing as Rameshwar pleading to Ramachandra.

GATHA 1070 Renunciation

Renunciation, the snare of powers

मराठी मूळ

भूत भविष्य कळों यावें वर्तमान । हें तों भाग्यहीन त्यांची जोडी ॥1॥
आह्मीं विष्णुदासीं देव ध्यावा चित्तें । होणार तें होतें प्रारब्धें ॥ध्रु.॥
जगरूढीसाटीं घातलें दुकान । जातो नारायण अंतरोनि ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे हा हो प्रपंच गाढा । थोरली ते पीडा रिद्धसिद्धी ॥3॥
॥घोंगडएाचे अभंग-॥12॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Knowing past, present, and future belongs only to the fortune of the wretched.

We, the servants of Vishnu, meditate on God with the chitta. What is destined happens through prarabdha.

Setting up a shop for the sake of worldly convention only drives Narayana further away.

Says Tuka, this worldly entanglement runs deep. The greatest affliction is riddhi-siddhi, the powers of attainment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Knowing past, future, and present: that gift belongs only to the wretched. We, the servants of Vishnu, keep our mind on God. Whatever is destined happens through prarabdha. To set up a shop for the sake of worldly fashion only drives Narayana away from us. Tuka says: this worldly entanglement runs deep. The greatest affliction is riddhi and siddhi, the powers of attainment.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is refusing the very powers that most seekers crave. To foresee past, present, and future, he says, is no blessing but the lot of the unlucky, because it turns the eye away from God toward display. The servant of Vishnu does only one thing: he keeps his mind on the Lord and lets prarabdha, the ripened fruit of past action, run its course. To trade on such powers, to open a shop and draw a crowd, is to lose Narayana himself. So he names the real danger: riddhi and siddhi, the occult attainments that look like the summit of the path, are in truth its worst affliction.

GATHA 1071 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, casting off the body

मराठी मूळ

ठकिलें काळा मारिली दडी । दिली कुडी टाकोनियां ॥1॥
पांघुरलों बहु काळें । घोंगडें बळें सांडवलें ॥ध्रु.॥
नये ऐसा लाग वरी । परते दुरी लपालें ॥2 ॥
तुका ह्मणे आड सेवा । लाविला हेवा धांदली ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have tricked Kala himself and gone into hiding, casting off this body.

For long ages I wore that coarse blanket, but it has been shed by force.

It would pursue me still, but I have hidden far beyond its reach.

Says Tuka, envy and its commotion had blocked my service to the Lord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I tricked Kala himself and slipped into hiding. I threw off this body and gave it away. For long ages I wore that coarse blanket; now it has been shed by force. It would chase me still, but I have hidden far beyond its reach. Tuka says: envy and its commotion had blocked my service to the Lord.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks of escaping death by ceasing to be the body. Kala, Time and death, can only seize what wears the flesh; by casting off the body he calls his own, he slips out of death's grasp. The coarse blanket he wore for ages is that body and the long habit of identifying with it, now stripped away by force rather than by his choosing. Death would still pursue him, but he has hidden somewhere it cannot follow. He ends by naming what had kept him from God: envy and its noisy disturbance had been blocking his service all along.

GATHA 1072 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, exchanged into God

मराठी मूळ

घोंगडियांचा पालट केला । मुलांमुलां आपुल्यांत ॥1॥
कान्होबा तो मी च दिसें । लाविलें पिसें संवगडियां ॥ध्रु.॥
तो बोले मी उगाच बैसें । आनारिसें न दिसे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे दिलें सोंग । नेदी वेंग जाऊं देऊं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The blankets were exchanged among the children, among their own.

Kanhoba is who I now appear to be. He has set this madness among His companions.

He speaks; I sit silent. No difference is seen between us.

Says Tuka, He has given me His guise and leaves no gap for parting.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The blankets were swapped among the children, among their own. Kanhoba is the one I now seem to be. He set this madness loose among His playmates. He speaks; I just sit silent. No difference can be seen between us. Tuka says: He has given me His own guise, and leaves no gap for us to part.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses a children's game to tell of his union with Krishna. In the play, the boys trade blankets among themselves, and in the exchange Tukaram now looks like Kanhoba, the cowherd Krishna, himself. The Lord is the one who started this sweet madness among His companions. So complete is the swap that when He speaks Tukaram can stay silent, and no one can tell the two apart. The point is that the devotee has taken on God's own form, and God has joined them so closely that there is no longer any seam where they could be separated.

GATHA 1073 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the loss in the game

मराठी मूळ

खेळों लागलों सुरकवडी । माझी घोंगडी हारपली ॥1॥
कान्होबाचे पडिलों गळां । घेई गोपाळा देई झाडा ॥ध्रु.॥
मी तों हागे उघडा जालों । अवघ्या आलों बाहेरी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे बुद्धि काची । नाहीं ठायींची मजपाशीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

While playing the gambling game, my blanket was lost.

I have flung myself around Krishna's neck, pleading: Give it back, O Gopala. Give me a full reckoning.

I was squatting to relieve myself when I was left bare, exposed to everyone, out in the open.

Says Tuka, my wits were thin clay; I never truly had them.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I joined the gambling game, and my blanket was lost. I have flung myself around Kanhoba's neck and plead: Take it, Gopala, and give me a full reckoning. I was squatting to relieve myself when I was left bare, out in the open before everyone. Tuka says: my wits were thin clay; I never really had them.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram stages his self-surrender as a child who gambled and lost. The blanket is what he called his own, his body and standing, and in the play of the world it has slipped from him. So he throws his arms around Krishna's neck and demands a settling of accounts, half claim and half clinging. The image of being caught bare and exposed before all is his confession of helplessness, stripped of every covering he trusted. He closes by admitting his own foolishness: the cleverness he relied on was as fragile as unfired clay, and was never truly his to begin with.

GATHA 1074 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, pressing the claim on God

मराठी मूळ

घोंगडियांची एकी राशी । त्याचपाशीं तें ही होतें ॥1॥
माझियाचा माग दावा । केला गोवा उगवों द्या ॥ध्रु.॥
व्हावें ऐसें निसंतान । घेइन आन तुजपाशीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे लाहाण मोठा । सांड ताठा हा देवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All the blankets were piled in one heap, and His was among them too.

I press my own claim; let this tangle be sorted out.

May I be left without children, so solemn is this oath I shall swear before You.

Says Tuka, whether great or small, put aside Your stubbornness, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All the blankets were piled in one heap, and His was among them too. I press my own claim; let this tangle be sorted out. Let me be left without children: that is how solemnly I will swear it before You. Tuka says: great or small, put aside this stubbornness, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram keeps pressing his suit with Krishna over the lost blanket. Now all the blankets, the Lord's own among them, lie in a single heap, the two parties mingled past telling apart. He insists his claim be heard and the knot untangled, and he backs it with the gravest oath a householder can take, to be left childless if he speaks falsely. Beneath the playful quarrel is a devotee who will not let go of God until the matter between them is settled. He ends by chiding the Lord directly: drop the stubbornness, whether the stake is great or small, and deal with me.

GATHA 1075 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, demanding an equal footing

मराठी मूळ

नाहीं तुझे उगा पडत गळां । पुढें गोपाळा जाऊं नको ॥1॥
चाहाड तुझे दाविन घरीं । बोलण्या उरी नाहीं ऐसी ॥ध्रु.॥
तुह्मां आह्मां पडदा होता । सरला आतां सरोबरी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे उरती गोठी । पडिली मिठी न सुटे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I will not simply fall silent at Your feet, O Gopala. Do not walk ahead of me.

I shall expose Your tricks at home, and no words will be left unsaid. The veil between You and me has fallen away.

Now we stand on equal ground. Says Tuka, the account remains open. This embrace, once given, will not be released.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will not just fall silent at Your feet, Gopala. Do not walk on ahead of me. I will expose Your tricks at home, and no word will be left unspoken. The veil between You and me has fallen. Now we stand on equal ground. Tuka says: the account is still open. This embrace, once given, will not let go.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram refuses the meek, distant posture of the ordinary worshipper. He will not simply bow and go quiet; he tells Gopala not to stride off ahead, and threatens to tell everyone at home of His cunning, holding nothing back. The veil that once kept God remote has dropped, so devotee and Lord now meet face to face as equals. This is the boldness of intimate bhakti, where love earns the right to argue and to demand. He ends holding fast: the reckoning between them is unfinished, and the embrace he has caught God in will never be released.

GATHA 1076 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, no deceit between us

मराठी मूळ

तुह्मां आह्मां उरी तोंवरी । जनाचारी ऐसें तैसी ॥1॥
माझें घोंगडें टाकुन देई । एके ठायीं मग असों ॥ध्रु.॥
विरोधानें पडे तुटी । कपट पोटीं नसावें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे तूं जाणता हरी । मज वेव्हारीं बोलविसी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Between You and me, as long as something remains, we shall go on like this in the world's way.

Give me back my blanket, and then we shall be one.

Let no rift arise through quarreling. Let there be no deceit harbored in the belly.

Says Tuka, You are the knowing one, O Hari. You make me speak in this worldly tongue.
