Through many past births, this is what we have been doing. People are scorched by the heat of worldly sorrow; we go to cool them. Let us sing aloud the great deeds of Hari. Let the glad Vaishnavas gather. We will draw living water even out of stone. With pure hearts and the string of the Name, let us sing, dance, and clap for joy. By that strength we set our feet on the neck of Death. Tuka says: lust and anger, both, we have thrown into prison. We are masters of our senses now. We have become true renunciants.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells us his work is old and chosen: birth after birth he comes to cool people burning in the fever of worldly pain, and the cooling is the singing of Hari's name with other devotees. The promise that they will draw water from stone names what this joy can do; nothing is too hard or too dead for the Name to soften. Clapping and dancing are not mere happiness here; they are the strength by which Death itself is trampled. The closing turn is the proof: lust and anger, the two jailers of the soul, are now the prisoners, and Tuka has become the owner of his senses rather than their slave. That is what he means by renunciation, not flight from the world but mastery within it.

Ecstatic dispute, I share what You are

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You claim to be immortal. How am I not the same, O generous Lord? Come, let us go before the saints and have this dispute settled with a clear verdict.

If You have no name, then show me mine. If You have no form, then show me mine.

If You dissolve Your play, how am I separate from that? If You are both true and false, says Tuka, then so am I.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You are truly immortal. How then am I not the same, O generous Lord? Come, let us go before the saints. I will lay out the argument and let them judge. If You have no name, then show me where mine comes from. If You have no form, then show me where mine comes from. If You dissolve Your play, how am I anything separate from it? You are at once true and false, Tuka says: and so am I, just the same.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses a lover's argument all the way to identity. He challenges Vitthal: if You are deathless, beyond name, beyond form, then I have no separate name or form either, because I have nothing that did not come from You. He even offers to take the case before the saints for a verdict, the way two disputants would seek a judge. The point is not pride but surrender carried to its limit: there is no line where God ends and the devotee begins. Whatever can be said of God, true and false alike, the devotee shares, because the devotee has no being of his own apart from God.

GATHA 2299 The Power of the Name

The Name, easy where everything else is hard

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A mantra, if performed incorrectly, can bring on madness quickly. But many who uttered the Name without discipline were saved.

Other syllables cause harm if spoken carelessly, yet one who takes the Name even in sleep is liberated. If melody, knowledge, or rhythm go wrong, there may be delay, but the Name is auspicious at all times.

Other forms of worship have prohibitions, but the Name may be spoken by all, without restriction. Says Tuka, austerities cause people to stumble and fall, but the Name alone uplifted even the courtesan.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A mantra said wrong brings madness, and quickly. Yet many who said the Name with no skill at all were carried across. Other syllables, said carelessly, do harm. But take the Name even half asleep, and you are saved. If the tune slips, or the knowledge, or the beat, there is only delay. The Name is good at every hour. Other worship has its rules and its forbidden things. The Name has no such bar; every mouth may speak it. Tuka says: austerities make people stumble and fall. The Name lifted up even the courtesan.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is contrasting the danger of the spiritual technologies with the safety of the Name. A mantra mispronounced, a rite done wrong, an austerity attempted, these can break the one who tries; they demand precision and earn punishment for error. The Name asks none of that: spoken badly, sleepily, by anyone at all, it still carries the speaker across. The stakes he is naming are who is allowed to come close to God. Where the rule-bound paths shut most people out and trip even the careful, the Name opens the door to everyone, which is why he points to the courtesan, the one the rules would exclude, as the very proof of its reach.

GATHA 2300 The Saints

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who compose poetry are not saints thereby. The relatives of saints are not saints either.

Here, outward appearance and borrowed titles do not suffice; one must bear the mark of transformation in one's own being. Those who carry a gourd are not saints by that; those who wrap themselves in a blanket are not saints.

Those who perform kirtan are not saints on that account; those who recite Puranas are not saints. Those who chant the Vedas are not saints; those who perform rituals are not saints.

Those who practice austerities and pilgrimage are not saints; those who live in forests are not saints. Those who adorn themselves with rosaries and sacred marks are not saints; those who smear themselves with ash are not saints.

Says Tuka, so long as the body-sense has not been transcended, all such people are merely worldly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Writing poems does not make you a saint. Being a saint's relative does not make you one. Here a costume will not pass, nor a borrowed name; the mark of real change must be in you. Carrying a begging gourd does not make you a saint. Wrapping in a patched blanket does not. Performing kirtan does not make you a saint. Reciting the Puranas does not. Chanting the Vedas does not make you a saint. Doing rituals does not. Austerities and pilgrimage do not make you a saint. Living in the forest does not. Rosaries and sacred marks do not make you a saint. Smearing on ash does not. Tuka says: as long as the body-sense has not been worn away, all such people are still only worldly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips away one badge of holiness after another, and the list is long on purpose. Poetry, lineage, kirtan, scripture, ritual, austerity, pilgrimage, prayer beads, ash, the whole visible inventory of a holy life, none of it makes a saint. The single test he gives is inward: has the sense of being a separate body and self been dissolved. Until that happens, every outer practice, however impressive, belongs to a worldly person playing a part. The poem is not contempt for these practices but a warning to look past the costume, including one's own, and ask whether the change is real.

GATHA 2301 Prayers

Prayer, only that I never forget You

मराठी मूळ

हें चि दान देगा देवा । तुझा विसर न व्हावा ॥1॥
गुण गाईन आवडी । हे चि माझी सर्व जोडी ॥ध्रु.॥
न लगे मुक्ति आणि संपदा । संतसंग देई सदा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे गर्भवासीं । सुखें घालावें आह्मासी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O God, grant me this one boon: may I never forget You. May I sing Your praises with love; this alone is my entire wealth.

I have no need for liberation or worldly prosperity; grant me the company of saints always. Says Tuka, even if You place us in the womb again, we shall go there happily.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Grant me just this one gift, God: that I never forget You. Let me sing Your qualities with love. This alone is all my wealth. I do not want liberation. I do not want riches. Give me the company of saints, always. Tuka says: if You must put us in the womb again, we will go there gladly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram refuses the two prizes most people pray for, release from rebirth and worldly prosperity, and asks instead only that he never lose the memory of God. To sing God's praises with love is, he says, his entire fortune; he needs no other. The last line carries the stakes: he is so unconcerned with escaping rebirth that he will accept the womb again without complaint, as long as the love and the saints' company come with him. The whole prayer reverses the usual aim of religion. He is not asking to get out; he is asking only never to forget.

GATHA 2302 Faith and Trust

Faith, each receives by his own heart

मराठी मूळ

भाग्यवंता हे परवडी । करिती जोडी जन्माची ॥1॥

इच्छाभोजनाचा दाता । न लगे चिंता करावी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आल्या था†या । वस्तु ब†या मोलाच्या ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This abundance belongs to the fortunate; they make the most of their birth. Each receives according to his own faith; whatever is meant for each, that is what comes.

God is the giver of whatever one desires; there is no need to worry. Says Tuka, precious things come to those who arrive at the right place.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This abundance belongs to the fortunate; they make a true gain of their birth. Each receives by his own faith; whatever is meant for someone, that is what comes to him. God gives the food each one desires. There is no need to worry. Tuka says: precious things come to the one who reaches the right place.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is saying that the spiritual harvest of a human life is real wealth, and it falls to those who know how to use the chance of being born. What each person draws from God is measured by the faith he brings; what is meant for him arrives, no more and no less. Because of that, anxiety is pointless: the Giver already provides what each truly desires. The closing line names the one condition, that you arrive at the right place, the company of God and the saints, where the precious things are kept.

GATHA 2303 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the stingy show-off

मराठी मूळ

वंचुनियां पिंड । भाता दान करी लंड ॥1॥
जैसी याची चाली वरी । तैसा अंतरला दुरी ॥ध्रु.॥
मेला राखे दिस । ज्यालेपणें जालें वोस ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे देवा । लोभें न पुरे चि सेवा॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who starves his own body yet boasts of giving charity is shameless. As he struts on the surface, so deep is the distance he has created from God.

He observes death rites yet, in his living, has turned life desolate. Says Tuka, O God, greed ensures that true service can never be fulfilled.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He cheats his own body, then makes a loud show of giving charity; the shameless man. As his conduct is on the surface, so far has he fallen away inside. He keeps the rites for the dead, while his own living life has gone to waste. Tuka says: God, where there is greed, service is never complete.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram exposes the man who starves himself to look generous, who performs death-rites and public charity while his inner life is empty. The poem's edge is the gap between the polished outside and the distance from God within; the showy surface is exactly the measure of how far he has drifted. The sharpest line turns the rites against him: he honors the dead but has let his own living turn desolate. The lesson is aimed at the pattern of greed dressed as piety, a thing to watch for in oneself, because where greed remains, no act of service is ever truly finished.

GATHA 2304 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the anxious mind and the chataka bird

मराठी मूळ

अधीरा माझ्या मना ऐक एकी मात । तूं कां रे दुश्चत निरंतर ॥1॥
हे चि चिंता काय खावें ह्मणऊनि । भले तुजहूनि पिक्षराज ॥ध्रु.॥
पाहा ते चातक नेघे भूमिजळा । वरुषे उन्हाळा मेघ तया ॥2॥
सकळयातींमध्यें ठक हा सोनार । त्याघरीं व्यापार झारियाचा ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे जळीं वनीं जीव एक । तयापाशीं लेख काय असे ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O impatient mind, listen to this one thing. Why are you perpetually anxious? Your only worry is about what to eat.

The chataka bird is wiser than you, for it refuses ground water and waits for the rain cloud even through the hottest summer. Among all castes, the goldsmith is the greatest trickster, yet in his own home, the business runs on a sieve.

Says Tuka, creatures in water and forest have but a single life; what account book do they keep?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Restless mind of mine, listen to one thing. Why are you forever anxious? Your whole worry is only this: what will I eat. The bird is wiser than you. Look at the chataka: it will not touch water from the ground; it waits for the rain cloud right through the burning summer. Of all the trades, the goldsmith is the great cheat, yet in his own house the work runs through a sieve. Tuka says: a creature in the water, a creature in the forest, has a single life and no other; what account-book does it keep?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram scolds the anxious mind for spending all its strength on the one fear of where the next meal comes from. He holds up the chataka bird, which by legend drinks only rain from the cloud and refuses water on the ground, as the image of trust: it waits through the hottest season rather than grasp at the lower supply. The goldsmith, the cleverest cheat, still ends up with his gains slipping away through a sieve, so cunning buys no security. The wild creatures keep no ledger and yet are fed. The point is not to stop working but to stop the gnawing anxiety, since the One who feeds bird and beast is not going to forget you.

GATHA 2305 Faith and Trust

Faith, the One who feeds the whole world

मराठी मूळ

बाळा दुधा कोण करितें उत्पत्ती । वाढवी श्रीपति सवें दोन्ही ॥ध्रु.॥
फुटती तरुवर उष्णकाळमासीं । जीवन तयांसी कोण घाली ॥2॥
तेणें तुझी काय नाहीं केली चिंता । राहे त्या अनंता आठवूनि ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे ज्याचें नाम विश्वंभर । त्याचें निरंतर ध्यान करीं ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why do you not remember the compassionate Lord? He alone feeds the whole world. Who produces milk for the infant? Shripati nurtures both the child and the milk together.

Trees crack open in the scorching heat of summer; who waters them? Has He not taken care of you as well? Remain in the remembrance of that Infinite One. Says Tuka, He whose name is Vishvambhara, the Sustainer of all, meditate on Him always.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why do you not remember the merciful God? He alone feeds every creature. Who makes milk for the infant? Shripati raises both the child and the milk together. The trees split open in the heat of summer; who gives them water then? Has He not already taken thought for you too? Stay in remembrance of that Endless One. Tuka says: His name is Vishvambhara, the one who holds up all. Meditate on Him without stopping.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers worry with the plain evidence of providence. The same God brings milk into being for the newborn and raises the child to drink it; the same God waters the trees that crack in the dry heat when no one else can reach them. If care like that is at work everywhere, then it is already at work for you, and remembrance, not anxiety, is the right response. The name he ends on, Vishvambhara, the sustainer of all, is the whole argument in a single word. Because the One who carries the universe is carrying you, the only thing left to do is to keep your mind on Him.

GATHA 2306 The Nature of God

Nature of God, being all yet nothing

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O generous One, O merciful Savior of the fallen, Your titles are true, O Narayana. As You have been described by the knowing and the unknowing alike, so You truly are, O Infinite Lord.

To demons You are Death; to devotees You appear as the dark-hued form, four-armed, bearing conch and discus. You take whatever form desire and devotion call forth; You nursed at Yashoda's breast.

Being everything, You are yet nothing at all. Says Tuka, the Vedas themselves bear witness to this.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Generous One, merciful One, savior of the fallen: these titles are truly Yours, Narayana. However the knowing and the unknowing have described You, that is what You truly are, O Endless One. To the demons You are Death itself. To devotees You come as the cloud-dark form, four-armed, conch and discus in Your hands. As desire and longing call for, so You become; You drank milk at Yashoda's breast. You have become everything, and yet You are nothing at all. Tuka says: to this the Vedas themselves bear witness.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contemplates how God can be all the things people say of Him at once. The titles are true: He is generous, merciful, the rescuer of the fallen, and He is exactly as both the wise and the simple have pictured Him, because He meets each according to their seeing. To the demon He is destruction; to the devotee He is the beautiful child of Vrindavan who nursed at Yashoda's breast; He takes the very form that love and desire reach for. The deep claim is the last one: having become everything, He is in Himself nothing that can be pinned down, and Tukaram does not advance this on his own authority but says the Vedas testify to the same.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Listen, O saintly ones, to my stammering, childish words. I speak with the liberty of a child before you; let no one be angry.

Hear the means and the path; learn what leads upward and what leads to ruin. Sit firm and attentive and hold these truths in your chitta.

Dharma belongs to the one who has mastered the senses. Karma bears fruit for the one who has no fear or shame.

Know that true merit lies in helping others, while true sin is in harming others and slandering them. Profit belongs to the one who utters God's name; the one chasing worldly pursuits suffers great loss.

True happiness is the company of saints; true sorrow is where that company is absent. Spiritual practice succeeds for the one whose intellect is self-governed; the dependent one faces ruin in all dealings.

True honor belongs to the one who controls the senses; the sensual one earns only disgrace. The wise one is the one who knows contentment; the ignorant one argues for the sake of ornament.

The truly good one is the one who abandons what is harmful; the truly wicked one hoards ill-gotten wealth and enters others' homes. The righteous one cooks and gives a portion to the guest; the unrighteous one eats without witness or company.

Self-benefit belongs to the one who sees God in all beings; ruin comes to the one who carries the ego. Blessed are those births that produced servants of Hari; cursed are those who remain tangled in sense pleasures and waste their lives.

The truly discerning one knows the marks of perfection; the fool is dazzled by surface adornments. The truly brave one carries firm devotion in the body; the coward is the one who holds no single-pointed faith.

The deep one swallows the Guru's word and sits still with it; the shallow one has no patience and wonders how it will all work out. The generous one places body and jiva at God's feet; the miser is the one who falls into the pit of worldly strife.

True goodness is inner purity; the impure one is double-tongued inside. The only sweet thing is Vitthal's Name; bitter is this world of eighty-four hundred thousand births.

Says Tuka, O mind, go home to the company of saints. Nothing more needs to be done; simply remain at Vitthal's feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Listen, saintly ones, to my stammering, childish words. I play like a child before you; let no one be angry. Hear the means and the path. Learn what raises a man and what ruins him. Sit firm, sit attentive, and hold this in your heart. Dharma belongs to the one who has mastered his senses. Karma bears fruit for the one without fear or shame. Know, my brothers, that true merit is helping others; the real sin is to hurt others and slander them. Gain belongs to the one whose mouth speaks God's name; the one tangled in worldly affairs takes great loss. Know, brothers, that true happiness is the company of saints; true sorrow is where that company is not. Practice succeeds for the one whose mind is his own; for the one ruled by his cravings there is ruin, know this well. True honor goes to the one who guards his senses; the man given to the senses tastes only the bitter dregs of disgrace. Call him wise who knows contentment; call him a fool who argues to show off. Know the one good man: he leaves behind what is harmful. The bad man hoards ill-gotten wealth and breaks into others' homes. The decent one cooks and sets aside a portion for the guest; the indecent one eats alone, with no witness, no company. He has done himself good who has seen God in all beings; he has done himself harm who carries the ego. Blessed are the births that brought forth servants of Hari; shame on those tangled in the senses who throw their lives away. Know the true judge: he reads the marks of the perfected. The fool is dazzled by surface ornament. Know the strong man: devotion is firm in his body. Call him a coward who holds no single faith. The deep one swallows the Guru's word and sits still with it; the shallow one has no patience and frets, how will this ever turn out. The generous one lays his very life at God's feet; call him a miser who falls into the pit of worldly trouble. Goodness is just this: a heart that is pure. The foul one is double-tongued inside, his speech carrying filth. There is only one sweet thing: the essence, Vitthal's Name. Bitter is this world and its eighty-four lakh births. Tuka says: O mind, go home to the company of saints. Nothing else need be done. Just stay at Vitthal's feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a long teaching abhanga, and Tukaram begins by calling his words childish and stammering so the saints will hear him gently, not as a man lecturing them. What follows is a paired ledger of the true and the false in the spiritual life: dharma and merit go to the one who masters his senses, helps others, and speaks God's name, while ruin goes to the slanderer, the greedy, the self-displaying, the ego-bound. Again and again he separates the surface from the substance, the man dazzled by ornament from the man who reads the real marks of perfection, the loud arguer from the quiet contented soul, the double-tongued from the inwardly pure. The single thread under every pair is this: what counts is the inner state, seeing God in all beings and holding firm devotion, not the outward show. He closes by collapsing the whole catalogue into one instruction, that the mind should go home to the saints and stay at Vitthal's feet, and nothing more is required.

ख्याति केली विष्णुदासीं । तुका ह्मणे पाहा कैसी ॥35॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Remember the God of Pandhari, holding devotion in your chitta. If you do not make the effort, ruin will come.

Untangle quickly the net that darkness has cast. The spinning wheel of birth and death is a relentless whirlpool.

Various occupations and their accumulations only bring scattered wandering through craving. Fix your mind on His feet and call yourself God's own.

Indulging in many diversions and tricks will not lead you to Hari. He is the Father of the world, the Giver of both enjoyment and liberation.

Do not say 'mine, mine' and carry that heavy burden. Why has their wisdom departed? There is no awareness of what lies beyond.

Even the smallest of the small find fulfillment in Vitthal. His mark is upon the three worlds; this generous One is the crown jewel.

The wavering one goes to waste; without patience, he sinks. If you do not waver, the reward comes right to your door.

Nothing of this body endures; it is wholly perishable. The blessed one who revels in Hari's kirtan is truly fortunate.

He takes you from this bank to the far shore; strive hard and become a hero. Compassion means letting the ego go.

The craving for wealth and grain misleads; serving family becomes a trap. Take the Name of Govinda; this alone is true fortune.

Spend your strength in serving others; ward off slander. Fruit and pleasure come as God sees fit for each.

Let this be your cherished practice: sing Govinda, Govinda. Never yield your devotion into the hands of pretenders.

Once you begin, do not abandon the path; laziness only puts mud in your mouth. Fame, glory, and honor come through joining with Narayana.

If His light eclipses all else, then this duality disappears. Desiring nothing existent or non-existent leads to stillness.

It is desire itself that binds, in chains, ropes, and fetters. One cannot see the end through closed eyes.

Do not worry; otherwise you become an animal. The harvest of honest labor ripens from the cultivated field.

Welfare is in your own hands, yet you do not act. Wear the ornaments of tulsi beads and sacred marks.

Says Tuka, see the fame the servants of Vishnu have earned.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Remember the God of Pandhari; hold devotion in your heart. Make the effort, or ruin comes upon you. Darkness has trapped you; untangle the net at once. The household turns like a wheel, the whirlpool of birth and death. The pile of many cravings only scatters you, driven from place to place by thirst. Set your mind on His feet; call yourself God's own. With all your many amusements you will not reach Hari. He is the Father of the world, the Giver of both pleasure and release. Do not say 'mine, mine' and carry that weight as a burden. Why has their good sense left them? They have no clear thought of crossing over. Even the smallest of the small are made complete in Vitthal. His mark is on the three worlds; this generous One is the crown jewel. The wavering man is wasted; with no patience he sinks. If you do not waver, the gain comes home to your own door. Nothing of this body lasts; the body is wholly perishable. Blessed and fortunate is the young one who plays in Hari's kirtan. He throws you from this bank to the far shore; strike out with your arms and be a hero. Its name is compassion, the moment the ego goes. Greed for wealth and grain misleads; service of family becomes a snare. Take the Name of Govinda; this alone is the true fortune. Spend your strength helping others; drive off slander. Fruit and pleasure come to each as God sees fit. Let this be your good habit: on the tongue, Govinda, Govinda. Never hand your worship over to pretenders. Once you start, do not leave the path; laziness only fills your mouth with dirt. Fame, glory, honor come if Narayana is gained. As the sun blots out lesser lights, so this duality disappears. Wanting nothing, existent or non-existent, brings you to stillness. It is craving itself that binds you, in chains and ropes and fetters. You cannot see the end with your eyes shut. Do not grieve; otherwise you become a donkey, a dog. The harvest of honest labor ripens from the tended field. The good is in your own hand, yet look, you will not act. Put on the ornaments: tulsi beads, the sacred mark. Tuka says: see the fame the servants of Vishnu have won.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is an alphabet poem, a teaching strung verse by verse, and its single command is to remember the God of Pandhari and untangle yourself from the net of darkness before life runs out. Tukaram names the trap precisely: the spinning household, the whirlpool of birth and death, the scattering pull of many cravings, and above all the 'mine, mine' of the ego that loads you down. Against it he sets the cure, devotion fixed on Vitthal's feet, the Name of Govinda on the tongue, service of others in place of greed, and the patience not to waver. The stakes are stated bluntly: the body is perishable, the chance is now, and a wavering man simply sinks while the steady one finds the gain delivered to his own door. He ends by pointing to the devotees of Vishnu and the fame they have earned, as living proof that this path carries a person from this bank to the far shore.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

God Himself has taken up residence in the temple, yet the water within remains dry. This is no secret to be guessed at; look within yourself.

Behind, the flood has surged and overflowed, filling the rivers and the sea. In the barren woman's home, a newborn cries, and one earring hangs from two ears.

Says Tuka, this sweetness of inner taste is known only to the one who has experienced it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

God himself has come to live in the temple, yet the water there stays dry. This is no hidden thing you must guess at. Look within your own self. Behind, the flood has burst and overflowed; the rivers and the sea stand brimful. In the barren woman's house a newborn baby cries. One earring hangs from two ears. Tuka says: this is the wide open secret. The sweetness of the inner taste is known only to the one who has tasted it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is stacking up impossible images on purpose: a temple where God lives but the water is dry, a flood that fills the sea from behind, a child born to a barren woman, one earring on two ears. He is not posing puzzles to be solved by cleverness; he says plainly that there is nothing hidden here. The point is that the inner reality cannot be reached by guessing or argument; you have to turn and look within yourself. The contradictions break the grip of ordinary logic so that the real thing can be seen directly. And what is seen is a taste, not a theory: only the one who has actually experienced this sweetness knows what it is.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Nothing is impossible for You, O Narayana. You can bring life to the lifeless.

Who knows the past deeds of our Lord? But why not display them openly right now? It is great fortune that we are at the side of the Capable One. To call ourselves His servants, is that any small thing? Says Tuka, satisfy my eyes; show me the splendors of Your power.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Nothing is impossible for you, Narayana. You can bring life to the lifeless. I do not know your old deeds of long ago; why not show them to me right now, plainly? It is great good fortune that we hold to the side of the Capable One. To be called your servants, is that any small thing? Tuka says: cool my eyes; let me see the splendor of your power.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is asking God to act in the present, not only in legend. He grants that nothing is beyond Narayana, who can even revive the dead, and then presses the request home: the wonders of the past are hearsay to him, so let them be shown openly here and now. He counts it pure fortune to be on the side of the all-capable Lord and to be called his servant. The closing plea, cool my eyes with the sight of your power, is the prayer of someone who wants living proof, not stored-up reputation. According to the editorial note, the abhanga was composed when a child who had died during a kirtan at Lohagaon was restored to life.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The true giver is the one who inspires remembrance of Narayana. What use are perishable things that cannot last? One should beseech those who show the true path.

Says Tuka, the one whose help leaves nothing remaining to be done, his are the real blessings.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Know this: there is one true giver, the one who makes you remember Narayana. What use are other things that perish, things by which the ache is never eased? Go and beg from those who show you the good path. Tuka says: the one whose help leaves nothing left to be done, his are the real blessings.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is redefining who deserves to be called generous. The true giver is not the one who hands you perishable goods, which never end your deeper longing, but the one who turns you toward remembering God. So he says the thing worth begging for is the company of those who point out the right path, the saints. Their help is complete in a way no worldly gift is: it leaves nothing further to be done, because it settles the soul itself. The editorial note ties the verse to a brahmin who sat in protest-fast for forty-two days at Alandi and was told in a vision to go to Tukaram at Dehu.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Lord of Pandhari, Savior of the fallen, I make one petition at Your feet. You are the Champion of the helpless; this is Your renown throughout creation.

You know the secret of every being without being told; now, O God, the responsibility is Yours. You give comfort and the gift of fearlessness to whoever makes a heartfelt plea.

Says Tuka, You are the player on both sides; if faith falters, then give courage to the mind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Lord of Pandhari, purifier of the fallen, I lay one petition at your feet. You are the helper and champion of helpless souls; this is your renown through all that moves and does not move. You know the secret of the heart without being told; now, God, your honor is your own concern. To anyone who pleads from the heart you give peace and the gift of fearlessness. Tuka says: you are the one playing on both sides. If faith fails, then give my mind its courage.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram brings a single request and then quietly hands the whole burden back to God. He addresses Vitthal of Pandhari by his known title, savior of the fallen, and reminds him that his fame across all creation rests on rescuing the helpless. So, he reasons, since God already knows every secret of the heart, keeping that promise is now God's own affair, a matter of God's honor. The striking turn is at the end: he says God is the player on both sides, the one who gives the prayer and the one who answers it, so even his faltering faith is God's to repair. The prayer becomes total dependence: if I cannot hold steady, you steady me.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O generous One, O Sustainer of the world, O Husband of Rakhumai, O Panduranga. O Supreme One, O Krishna, O Rama, O dark-hued Creator of the universe.

O compassionate Giver of life, O Holder of all power. O All-knowing Narayana, lend Your ear to these words of sorrow.

Says Tuka, I do not have the proper qualifications, but I have settled myself at Your feet, as I have done before.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O generous one, O sustainer of the world, O husband of Rakhumai, Panduranga. O best of all, O Krishna, O Rama, O dark cloud-hued one, maker of the universe. O merciful one, giver of life, O holder of all power that upholds everything. O all-knowing Narayana, give your heart to these words of sorrow. Tuka says: I have no worthiness of my own, yet I have settled myself at your feet, as I have done before.

WHAT IT MEANS

This abhanga is almost entirely a litany of names, and the naming is itself the prayer. Tukaram calls on God as generous, as world-sustainer, as Rakhumai's husband Panduranga, as Krishna and Rama, as the dark-hued maker of all, as the giver of life who holds every power. Having gathered all these titles, he asks one thing: that the all-knowing Lord lend his attention to a grieving plea. The close is his constant note of humility: he claims no qualification, no merit that earns a hearing. He simply takes his old place at the feet of God and rests his case there.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am not a true servant, yet this proclamation has been made. What can be done about it now? You know everything.

I have no store of merit to spend on anyone's behalf. Says Tuka, why have You increased this worldly complication, O Treasury of mercy? We know what it means to be Your servants; that is why we have become detached. You gave us courage, and thereby our minds became steady.

Says Tuka, I have stood in Your way; that was Your own playful wish.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am not a true servant, yet this announcement has gone out about me. What can I do about it now? You know all of it. I have no store of merit saved up; what would I spend, and on whose behalf? Tuka says: why have you piled up this trouble for me, treasury of mercy? This is how we have come to know what being your servants means; that is why we have grown detached. You gave me courage, and by that my mind grew steady. Tuka says: I got in your way; this was your own playful doing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram protests that his reputation as a devotee has outrun the truth of him; the name servant of God has been proclaimed about a man who feels he has not earned it. He owns that he has no hoard of good works to draw on, and asks, half complaining, why God would burden him with such a role. But the protest turns into surrender: it is precisely by being claimed as God's servant that he has learned what that means and let go of the world. He credits the steadiness of his mind not to himself but to the courage God gave him. In the end he calls his own resistance God's playful arrangement: even getting in the way was God's doing.

GATHA 2315 Longing and Separation

Longing, my tongue bolder than you

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What do I know more than You, O Infinite One? When I make this excess of effort, does compassion not stir in You? Do You lack mercy, O Mother and Father of the world? Says Tuka, my tongue speaks more boldly than You do.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What do I know, more than you do, Infinite One? When I strain this hard, why does compassion not stir in you? Have you no mercy, mother and father of the world? Tuka says: my tongue speaks more boldly than you do.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is pressing God with a lover's complaint. He admits he knows nothing that the Infinite does not already know, so his hard effort is not about teaching God anything; it is about why God stays silent. He appeals to God as the mother and father of all the world and asks how such a parent can withhold mercy. The sharp last line turns the charge inward and outward at once: his own tongue is bolder in asking than God is in answering. It is the freedom of intimacy, complaining straight to the one he trusts.

GATHA 2316 Autobiography

Autobiography, a petitioner sent to the door

मराठी मूळ

काय ज्ञानेश्वरीं उणें । तिंहीं पाठविलें धरणें ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे ठेवा । होतां सांभाळावें देवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Was something lacking in Dnyaneshwar that he sent a petitioner to our door? Having heard it written, this matter has been brought to our notice. The Master knows; the servant's tongue merely conveys.

Says Tuka, when a treasure is placed in trust, it must be looked after, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Was anything lacking in Dnyaneshwar, that he should send a petitioner to my door? Hearing the writing, this matter was made known to me. The master knows; the servant's tongue only carries the word. Tuka says: when a treasure is placed in your trust, you must look after it, God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reacts with humble surprise that a seeker has been directed to him, as if on the authority of the great saint Dnyaneshwar, who surely lacks nothing himself. He is puzzled why such a one would be sent to his door. He deflects the credit immediately: the master, God, is the one who knows and acts; the servant only relays what he is given to say. The closing line hands the responsibility back to God: if a precious soul has been entrusted to me, then it is yours to keep safe, not mine to manage. The note marks this among verses tied to a brahmin's coming to Tukaram.

GATHA 2317 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, only a gatekeeper

मराठी मूळ

ठेवूनियां डोई । पायीं जालों उतराई ॥1॥
कारण तें तुह्मीं जाणां । मी तराळ नारायणा ॥ध्रु.॥
प्रसंगीं वचन । दिलें तें चि खावें अन्न ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे भार । तुह्मी जाणां थोडा फार ॥3॥
उपदेश अभंग ॥ 11 ॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Having placed my head at Your feet, I have discharged my obligation. You know the reason, O Narayana; I am but a gatekeeper.

Whatever food was given at the occasion, that is what should be eaten. Says Tuka, You know whether the burden is great or small.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have laid my head at your feet, and so I have paid off my debt. You know the reason for it, Narayana; I am only a gatekeeper. Whatever word was given at the moment, that is the food I should eat. Tuka says: you know whether the burden is great or small.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes his discipleship as a debt discharged by one act: bowing his head at God's feet. He refuses any larger claim about himself, calling himself merely a gatekeeper, a doorman who lets others through rather than the master of the house. Living by whatever was given at the time is his image for trust: he takes what the moment provides as the only food meant for him, asking for nothing more. The close leaves the whole weight with God, who alone knows whether the load laid on this servant is heavy or light. The editorial note marks it as a verse of instruction.

GATHA 2318 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, take the plunge into the Name

मराठी मूळ

नको कांहीं पडों ग्रंथाचे भरीं । शीघ व्रत करीं हें चि एक ॥1॥
देवाचिये चाडे आळवावें देवा । ओस देहभावा पाडोनियां॥ध्रु.॥

रोकडी पातली अंगसंगें जरा । आतां उजगरा कोठवरि ॥4॥
तुका ह्मणे घालीं नामासाठी उडी । पांडुरंग थडी पाववील ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not burden yourself with the weight of scriptures. Take up this one swift vow alone.

For the sake of God, call upon God, emptying yourself of all body-consciousness. Salvation on credit, whether it comes or not, is uncertain, but the certainty of falling is guaranteed.

Old age has arrived in person, pressing against the body; how long will you keep vigil? Says Tuka, take the plunge for the sake of the Name; Panduranga will bring you safely to shore.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not get buried under the weight of scriptures. Take up this one swift vow alone. For the sake of God, call out to God, laying your body-feeling waste. Liberation on credit may come or may not; the falling is sure. Old age has already arrived, pressing against your body; how long will you stay watchful? Tuka says: leap in for the sake of the Name. Panduranga will carry you to the far shore.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram urges a tired seeker to stop piling up book-learning and to take one fast, single vow instead: call on God, for God's own sake, emptying out the sense of being only this body. He warns against trusting deferred results, salvation bought on credit, which may or may not arrive, while the downward pull of decline is guaranteed. He points to the present fact that old age is already here, pressing on the body, so the time for delay is gone. The remedy is not more striving but a plunge: throw yourself into the Name. He promises that Panduranga himself will see you across to the far shore.

GATHA 2319 True Worship

True worship, the fruit lies at the root

मराठी मूळ

नाहीं देवापाशीं मोक्षाचे गांठोळें । आणूनि निराळें द्यावें हातीं ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे फळ आहे मूळापाशीं । शरण देवासीं जाय वेगीं ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

God does not keep bundles of liberation in a separate storeroom to hand over to you. When the senses are conquered and the mind is purified, the state of desirelessness is found right there.

Fasting, feasting, and the toil of recitation bear fruit only through righteous action. Beware of excess in resolve and desire; know that whatever comes naturally is not suffering.

Why waste yourself grieving over wounds received in a dream, or weeping alongside another's tears that are all illusion? Says Tuka, the fruit lies at the root. Go quickly, take refuge in God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

God keeps no bundle of liberation in a back room to bring out and hand to you. Master the senses and still the mind, and there itself is the cause: the state where no desire remains. Fasting, breaking fasts, the toil of reciting letters: such good acts bear fruit only in the end. Watch out for piling up too much resolve and craving; know that what comes naturally is no suffering. Why ruin yourself over a wound taken in a dream, or weep along with another's weeping that is all unreal? Tuka says: the fruit is right there at the root. Go quickly, take refuge in God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram corrects the idea that liberation is a separate object God stores up and then delivers to the deserving. It is not somewhere else: when the senses are won and the mind grows quiet, the desireless state is already present right there. He does not throw out fasting, feasting, and recitation, but he says their fruit comes only at the end and only when joined to right action, so they are not the heart of the matter. He warns that even spiritual effort can become a trap when resolve and craving are pushed too far, and he calls grief over illusory losses as foolish as weeping over a wound suffered in a dream. The whole pointing is inward and immediate: the fruit is at the root, so do not search far; take refuge in God now.

GATHA 2320 True Worship

True worship, the witness within

मराठी मूळ

तजिलें भेटवी आणूनि वासना । दाविल्याचे जना काय काज ॥1॥
आळवावें देवा भाकूनि करुणा । आपुलिया मना साक्ष करीं ॥ध्रु.॥
नाहीं जावें यावें दुरूनि लागत । आहे साक्षभूत अंतरींचा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे हा आहे कृपासिंधु। तोडी भवबंधु तात्किाळक ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

That which was renounced, desire brings back again. What use is it to display renunciation to the world? Call upon God with genuine sorrow and make your own mind the witness.

You need not go anywhere far; God is the witness dwelling within. Says Tuka, He is an ocean of mercy; He breaks the bonds of worldly existence in an instant.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What you renounced, desire fetches back again. What is the use of parading your renunciation before people? Call out to God, pleading your sorrow, and make your own mind the witness. There is nothing to go to from far away; the witness lives inside your own heart. Tuka says: he is an ocean of mercy. He cuts the bonds of worldly existence in an instant.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram exposes the hollowness of renunciation done for show. Whatever you give up outwardly, desire quietly brings back, so display before other people proves nothing. The real work is private: cry out to God with honest sorrow and let your own mind be the witness of your truth, since there is no one else to fool. He insists you need not journey anywhere, because the witness is not far off; God already dwells within the heart. And this inner Lord is no harsh judge but an ocean of mercy who, the moment you genuinely turn to him, cuts the bonds of worldly existence at once.

GATHA 2321 The Necessity of Experience

Union, the Name dissolving difference

मराठी मूळ

गोविंद गोविंद । मना लागलिया छंद ॥1॥
मग गोविंद ते काया । भेद नाहीं देवा तया ॥ध्रु.॥
आनंदलें मन । प्रेमें पाझरती लोचन ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आळी । जेवी नुरे चि वेगळी॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the mind has caught the rhythm of 'Govinda, Govinda,' then the body itself becomes Govinda; there is no difference between God and that person. The mind is enraptured, and tears of love flow from the eyes.

Says Tuka, no trace of separation remains, as if it were a meal so satisfying that no hunger lingers.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Govinda, Govinda. My mind has caught the song of it. Then this body itself becomes Govinda. There is no difference between God and that one. The mind is full of joy. Tears of love run from the eyes. Tuka says: no separateness is left, the way hunger is gone after a full meal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes what happens when the Name is no longer something the mind merely does but something the mind has become. Say Govinda, Govinda until the mind catches its rhythm, and the body that says it turns into what it names; the line between God and the devotee falls away. The sign of it is in the body itself: joy floods the mind and tears come without being summoned. He ends with a plain image: as a full meal leaves no hunger behind, this union leaves no trace of separation.

GATHA 2322 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, you become what you hold

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whatever one meditates upon, the mind becomes that very thing. Therefore, resolve all matters by holding firmly to Panduranga.

His feet stand evenly upon the brick; He is the all-pervading One, standing on that single spot. Says Tuka, He is beyond the sky, yet the core of even the smallest atom.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever you meditate on, your mind becomes that very thing. So settle every matter; hold firmly to Panduranga. His feet stand level on the brick. He stands on that one spot, yet he fills everything. Tuka says: he is beyond the sky, and he is the core inside the smallest atom.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram states a law of attention and tells you what to do with it. The mind takes the shape of whatever it dwells on, so the choice of object is the whole game; he says fix it on Panduranga and let that settle everything else. He points to the paradox of the form he loves: Vitthal stands on a single brick at Pandhari with his feet set evenly, yet that same one is all-pervading. Larger than the sky and smaller than the smallest atom, the God you can hold in one fixed image is the God who is everywhere at once.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Study the scripture and then perform kirtan; only then does the scripture bear its fruit. Otherwise, all the recitation was mere lip-beating, and the remainder stays unfinished.

Having recited the Vedas, one should sing the praises of Hari; only then is knowledge truly known. Austerity and pilgrimage reach their purpose only when the mind rests steadily in Hari's Name.

What are sacrifices, ceremonies, and acts of charity worth if the Name does not stay on one's lips? Says Tuka, do not get buried under the load of strenuous practices; hold on to this one essence alone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Study the scripture, then sing kirtan; only then does the scripture bear fruit. Otherwise it was only beating your mouth, and the rest is left undone. Recite the Vedas, then sing the praises of Hari; only then is what you know truly known. Austerity and pilgrimage reach their purpose only when the mind rests steady in Hari's Name. What are sacrifices and ceremonies and charity worth if the Name does not stay on your lips? Tuka says: do not get buried under the load of hard practices; hold to this one essence alone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is ranking the whole machinery of religion and putting one thing at the top. Reading scripture, reciting the Vedas, austerity, pilgrimage, sacrifice, charity: none of them is rejected, but each only bears fruit when it leads to and rests in the Name of Hari. Study that never becomes living praise is just lip-work, and effort without the Name stuck in the throat comes to nothing. The warning is against mistaking the load of practices for the goal. He tells you to drop the burden and keep the single essence, the Name.

GATHA 2324 Faith and Trust

Faith, eat and trust the Sustainer

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Eat your food happily and contemplate Him. What is given by Him returns to Him, and the fruit comes naturally to you.

This is the basis of all support; His very name is Vishvambhara, the Sustainer of all. Says Tuka, there is no empty place in existence; simply spread the cloth of faith.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Eat your food happily, and think of him. What he gives reaches back to him, and the fruit comes to you on its own. This is the one support. His name is Vishvambhara, who carries the world. Tuka says: no place is empty of him; just spread out your faith.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram offers a quiet trust that asks for no strain. Eat in peace and remember God while you do, because everything given comes from him and returns to him, and your own share arrives without your grasping for it. The ground of this ease is who God is: Vishvambhara, the one who sustains and carries the whole world. Since no place in existence is empty of him, the only thing asked of you is to open out your faith, like spreading a cloth to receive what is already being given.

GATHA 2325 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, drink the whole universe

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why have you contracted and made yourself small? Drink up the entire universe in one draft. Having broken your fast, rinse out this worldly life.

Do not delay any longer. The darkness of this small dwelling had caused great distress.

Fling it far away, hide it under your arm. Says Tuka, these are the wonders of divine play.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why have you shrunk and made yourself small? Drink the whole universe in one mouthful. Break your fast on it, then rinse this worldly life away. Do not put it off any longer. The darkness of this little house had made you very anxious. Fling it far, hide it under your arm. Tuka says: these are the wonders of divine play.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns on the soul that has cramped itself into smallness and dares it to its true size. Instead of cowering, swallow the entire universe in a single draft and use it to break a long fast, then rinse the whole worldly life out of your mouth, and do it now, without delay. The little dwelling whose darkness kept you anxious is the narrow self; he says throw it away, tuck it aside, be done with it. What looks like an impossible boast is really the playful largeness of God, in whom such reversals are wonders.

GATHA 2326 Autobiography

Autobiography, the toy and the teacher

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My Father has given me a toy; with delight I play with it. I made my demands, I spoke my words, and from that, supreme knowledge came.

Take your share and go swiftly to your own rightful place. Says Tuka, let Dnyanadeva gather his assembly. I shall come to bow at his feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My Father gave me a toy, so I play with it in delight. I made my demands, I spoke my words, and from that the highest knowledge came to me. Take your share and go quickly to your own place. You have come here to what is yours. Tuka says: let Dnyanadeva gather his assembly; I will come to bow at his feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as a child who was simply handed something to play with and finds that the play itself bore fruit. The Name, given by the Father, is the toy; out of nothing more than a child's demanding and a child's words came supreme knowledge, unearned and given. He invites others to take their own portion and go to their rightful place, the place that already belongs to them. At the close he bows to the lineage, vowing to come and lay his head at the feet of Dnyanadeva and the assembly of saints.

GATHA 2327 The Saints

Saints, the shoe stays on the foot

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे नेणे युक्तीची ते खोलीं । ह्मणोनि ठेविली पायीं डोई ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Guru of the wise, King of kings, such is the title by which they call Dnyaneshwar. For a wretch like me, what is this greatness? A shoe belongs on the foot, and that is where it should remain.

When even Brahma and the other gods attend upon you as servants, what comparison can any lesser being offer? Says Tuka, I do not know the depths of subtle reasoning; that is why I have placed my head at His feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Guru of the wise, King of kings: that is what they call Dnyaneshwar. What is such greatness to a wretch like me? A shoe belongs on the foot, and on the foot it is rightly placed. Where even Brahma and the gods wait on you as servants, what comparison can any lesser one offer? Tuka says: I do not know the depths of subtle reasoning, so I have laid my head at his feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures the distance between himself and Dnyaneshwar and refuses to flatter himself across it. Dnyaneshwar is named Guru of the wise and King of kings; against that, Tukaram calls himself a wretch and uses a homely image, a shoe belongs on the foot, to keep himself in his proper low place. When even Brahma and the gods serve such a master, no lesser being can stand beside him as an equal. Not knowing the depths of subtle reasoning, he chooses the one move he can make: he lays his head at the saint's feet.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Like a child, I have spoken crooked and stammering words. Forgive my transgressions, O great lords, you who are perfected beings.

I did not first examine my own qualification. Says Tuka, O Dnyaneshwar, keep this humble servant at your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Like a child, I have spoken crooked, stammering words. Forgive my faults, O great lords, you who are perfected. I did not first weigh my own fitness. Tuka says: O Dnyaneshwar, keep this servant at your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks pardon for daring to speak at all before the perfected saints. He likens his own words to a child's crooked babble, knowing they are clumsy beside their greatness. His confessed fault is that he spoke without first measuring whether he was qualified to speak. Having admitted it, he does not withdraw but asks for the only place he wants: to be kept as a servant at Dnyaneshwar's feet, where unfitness is covered by the master's grace.

GATHA 2329 The Saints

Saints, the seed shows in the fruit

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do you think, O Narayana, that You can simply ignore us? Then let this falsehood be tested in another court. One's inner quality cannot be known until it has been fully proven.

Dnyanadeva brought this truth to the experience of the world. Others too have found peace through contemplation of such saints.

Says Tuka, the seed in the womb produces the same fruit at the end.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do you think, Narayana, that you can just turn us away? Then let this falsehood be tested in another court. The quality hidden inside cannot be known until it is fully proved. Dnyanadeva brought this truth into the world's own experience. Others too have found rest by contemplating such saints. Tuka says: the seed in the womb is the same as the fruit at the end.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses a near-legal claim on God and on the proof of true saints. He challenges Narayana, half in boldness, half in love: you cannot simply dismiss your devotees, and if you try, the case can be carried to another court. His point is that inner quality stays unknown until it is tested and proved in the open, and this is exactly what Dnyanadeva did, bringing the truth of God into the lived experience of ordinary people. Others have found peace by dwelling on such saints. The closing image seals it: what is hidden in the seed is what shows in the fruit, so a true saint's end reveals what was always within.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The body of one without faith is impure from birth; he carries the taint of difference and defilement. How can his vine ever reach the canopy? Whatever he had stored up has come before him unchanged.

The mother's wish is that the child be handsome, but the stone written on the forehead stands firm. Says Tuka, such a one is like an unripe grain that, even after cooking, will never mingle with the rest of the food.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The body of one without faith is impure from birth; he carries the taint of division and sin. How can his vine ever reach the canopy? Whatever he had stored comes back to him unchanged. The mother may wish her child to be handsome, but the stone written on the forehead stands firm. Tuka says: he is like an unripe grain that, however long you cook it, will never blend with the rest of the food.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the condition of a life closed to faith, and the warning is meant to be turned on oneself, not used to despise a person. The one without faith carries division and stored-up wrongdoing from the start, so his growth never reaches the canopy; what he laid up returns to him unaltered. A mother's wish cannot rewrite what is written, the fixed bent of a hardened heart. The closing image is the sharpest: like a grain that stays raw no matter how long it is cooked, such a heart will not soften and mix in. The question it leaves is whether one's own faith is alive or hardened.

GATHA 2331 Social Criticism

Social criticism, austerity without God

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The austerities of the tamasic are only provisions of sin, filled and loaded by the quality of darkness. The pride of power and the comforts of kingship cause them to overstep all bounds and plunge into hell.

Even when the senses are subdued, if desire remains alive within, it deceives them, and no path lies ahead. Says Tuka, what they endure apart from the worship of Hari should not even be looked upon.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The austerities of the dark-natured are only a packed lunch of sin, loaded full by the quality of darkness. The pride of power and the comforts of kingship make them overstep all bounds and fall into hell. Even when the senses are subdued, if desire still lives inside, it robs them, and no path lies ahead. Tuka says: what they suffer apart from the worship of Hari is not worth even looking at.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks a religion of effort that is hollow at the center, and the target is the pattern, not any single person. When austerity is done in the grip of tamas, it does not burn sin away but packs it as provisions for the road, and the pride of power and comfort drives such a one past all limits straight toward hell. Even outward control of the senses fails if desire stays alive inside; it quietly robs the practitioner and leaves no way forward. The test he offers is simple and worth turning on oneself: any discipline cut off from the worship of Hari is wasted toil, not worth a glance.

GATHA 2332 Appeals and Exhortations

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who seek their own welfare without Hari's stories should not be given the company of Hari's devotees. Their own faith will break, and the means they rely upon will be destroyed.

One should eat only in the company of those at whose table one can sit without shame. Says Tuka, have you become so wise that you think yourselves greater even than God?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those who want their own good without Hari's stories should not be given the company of Hari's devotees. Their own faith will break, and the things they depend on will be ruined. Eat only in the company of those at whose table you can sit without shame. Tuka says: have you grown so wise that you think yourselves greater even than God?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram warns about the company one keeps and where the heart is really aimed. Those who chase their own welfare while skipping the stories of Hari should not be set among Hari's devotees, because the mismatch breaks their faith and ruins the very supports they leaned on. He gives a homely rule: eat only where you can sit at the table without shame, that is, share life only with company that does not corrupt you. The closing question is aimed at the proud, and at the proud part of oneself: have you become so clever that you imagine you stand above God himself?

GATHA 2333 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the servant's place

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे तो ज्ञानाचा सागर । परि नेंदी अगर भिजों भेदें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A servant should follow the master's command. Self-importance has no place in service.

Whether the Lord takes one's life or grants deliverance, one who is broken in spirit joins the crowd. A firefly cannot show the sun its way; one should simply keep one's own affairs in order.

Says Tuka, He is an ocean of knowledge, yet He does not let the pride of distinction wet even an edge.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A servant should do what the master says. There is no room for self-importance in service. Whether the Lord takes my life or pushes me away, a heart that breaks falls back into the crowd. A firefly cannot show the sun its road; let me just keep my own affairs in order. Tuka says: He is an ocean of knowledge, yet He does not let the pride of separateness wet even an edge of Him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out the whole logic of service in one stroke: the servant obeys, and self-importance has no place at all. He tests this against the hardest cases. If the Lord takes his life or shoves him away, the broken heart that protests has simply rejoined the ordinary crowd; true service does not bargain. The firefly trying to light the sun's path is his picture of the small self presuming to instruct God; better to keep one's own house in order and leave the rest to Him. He ends by naming the trap precisely: God is an ocean of knowing, and the pride that wants to be a separate, distinguished someone cannot so much as touch its edge.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

At whose door stands a golden Peepal tree and in whose being a bull speaks with strength, what can such a great one not accomplish? Yet he examines the seed for purity in his own body. He who laid the foundation of liberation and gathered the assembly of Vaishnavas, at his place, what joy can be lacking? Says Tuka, the mind rests there in perfect contentment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

At whose door a golden pippal tree stands, in whose body there is such power that a buffalo speaks: what can such a great one not do? Yet he looks for a pure seed in himself. He who marked out the courtyard of liberation and gathered the crowd of Vaishnavas: at his place, what could joy be lacking? Tuka says: there the mind rests in full contentment.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram praises a great master by his wonders and then turns the praise inward. He points to signs of power, a golden pippal at the door, a buffalo made to speak, and asks what such a one could not accomplish. Yet even he watches that the seed in his own being stays pure; greatness does not excuse self-examination. This is the one who opened the way to liberation and drew the company of Vaishnavas together, so at his place no joy is missing. The settled mind, Tuka says, finds its rest there and nowhere else.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The world is full of people with many whims; one should not scatter one's mind in their company. Guard your own faith; let the flavor of devotion permeate your being.

The bliss of Hari's story is like a mother, a cool shade for the weary. Says Tuka, one who dives with a stone tied to him drowns. What sense is there in rushing to join such a one?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The world is full of people with many whims. Do not scatter your mind in their company. Guard your own faith; let the taste of love soak into you. Hari's story is a mother, the bliss that is deep stillness, a cool shade for the weary. Tuka says: a man with a stone tied to him sinks. What sense is there in rushing to join him?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram warns against losing yourself to the crowd's countless moods. People are full of passing whims, and to mix your mind with theirs is to scatter it; instead, guard the one faith that is yours and let devotion's flavor soak in. He sets the alternative beside it: hearing Hari's story is a mother to you, a deep restful bliss, cool shade for the tired soul. Then comes the sharp image of the drowning man. Someone who has tied a stone to himself is going to sink, so there is no sense in running to keep him company; choose what holds you up, not what pulls you down.

GATHA 2336 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the deaf ear

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who has no faith in Hari's story has a tongue that is impure. His ears are like the burrows of mice.

Abandoning this nectar, they pursue other vain endeavors. Says Tuka, how many such mad ones have gone to waste in this way.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The one who has no faith in Hari's story: his speech is foul. His ears are a rat's hole. Leaving this nectar, they labor at other things. Tuka says: how many such mad ones have gone to waste this way.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures a person by one thing: whether the story of Hari has any place in them. Where that faith is missing, the speech turns foul and the ears are no better than a rat's burrow, openings that hear nothing of worth. Such people set aside the nectar that was right there and pour their effort into other, empty labors. He calls this madness and counts the cost: how many have simply gone to waste this way. The sting is aimed at the pattern of turning a deaf ear, not at hatred of any single person, and it asks the listener to check his own hearing.

GATHA 2337 The Power of the Name

The Name, the upward river

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A stream of pure love, the nectar of devotion, flows even before God Himself. Hari-katha rises upward like a river flowing to the sky, the crown jewel of all sacred places.

Kirtan is the life-sustenance of Shiva; it burns away the greatest sins. Says Tuka, Hari Himself praises its glory; the tongue falls short in extolling it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A stream of the nectar of love flows, and it flows even before God Himself. Hari's story is a river that runs upward, the crown jewel of all holy places. Kirtan is Shiva's very life; it burns away the greatest sins. Tuka says: Hari Himself praises it; the tongue is too small for its greatness.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram exalts the singing of Hari's story above every other holy thing. Love pours out like a stream of nectar, and it flows toward God Himself; the story is a river that runs upward, against the ordinary downward pull, and so it crowns all places of pilgrimage. He calls kirtan the very life of Shiva and says it burns up even the gravest sins. The final turn is the boldest: Hari Himself praises this practice, and the human tongue is simply too small to measure its greatness.

GATHA 2338 Prayers

Prayer, may worship take hold

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now, O my mind, may this worship come to pass. O Panduranga, let love overflow from my very being.

May no weariness, revulsion, or fear come in the way at any time. Says Tuka, the company of Vaishnavas, that is my worship, my feast of devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now, O my mind, may this worship come to pass. Panduranga, make it so love overflows from my body. Let no weariness, no disgust, no fear ever come in the way. Tuka says: the company of Vaishnavas, that is my worship, the feast where I sit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns to his own mind and prays that this worship of Hari's story actually take root in him. He asks Panduranga directly to make love overflow from his whole being, not as a mood but as something bodily and full. Then he names the obstacles he fears, the weariness, the revulsion, the dread that creep in over time, and prays that none of them ever block the way. He closes by saying where the worship happens: the company of the Vaishnavas is itself his devotion, the shared feast at which he takes his place.

GATHA 2339 Devotion to Vitthal

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let the ascetics and the harsh practitioners make their severe penances. We are the servants of Vitthal; we cast away worry and worldly hope.

In the exaltation of devotion, we have no obsession with liberation. Says Tuka, all strength resides within us.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let the fasters and the harsh penance-doers do their poor severe deeds. We are Vitthal's servants; we throw away worry and craving. In the rising joy of devotion, we have no madness for liberation. Tuka says: all the strength is in us.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the bhakta's path against the path of grim self-mortification. Let the fasters and the hard ascetics keep at their severe practices; he calls them poor, pitiable things. Being Vitthal's servant, he simply flings away both worry and worldly craving, the two ends that usually drive a person. He goes further and refuses even the prize the ascetics chase: in the swelling joy of devotion there is no obsession with liberation, no fever for moksha. Strength is not earned by punishing the body; for those who belong to Vitthal, all of it already lives in them.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whatever commotion has been caused, it was caused by His will. Whether it was crooked or straight, God alone knows.

For whose sake has all this creation been brought forth? God's purpose is known only to God. Says Tuka, I am separate from this ego. I have placed the entire burden upon Gopala and remain at rest.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever fuss has been made, it was made as He had it made. Crooked or straight, God knows. For whose sake all this was created, God knows the reason. Tuka says: I stand apart from this pride. I have laid the whole load on Gopala and I rest.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram hands every worry about outcomes back to God. Whatever commotion his life has stirred up was stirred as God moved it; whether it came out crooked or straight is for God alone to judge. He widens the question to the whole of creation, asking for whose sake it was made, and answers that only God knows the purpose. The point is release from the burden of being the doer. By stepping out of the pride that claims authorship, Tuka sets the entire load on Gopala's shoulders and lets himself rest.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You sent a petitioner here; hear what became of him. Now, without expanding the story further, hear the outcome.

As was fitting for God, eleven abhangas were composed; he departed having made the great sacrifice. Says Tuka, having offered my service at Your feet, I have discharged my debt. Let this be known.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You sent a man here to sit in demand at my door. Hear what became of him. Now, without stretching the story out, hear how it ended. As was right for God, eleven abhangas were made; he gave up the great prize and went away. Tuka says: having offered my service at Your feet, I have paid off my debt. Let this be known.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reports back to God about a man God had sent to him, someone who came and pressed his demand at the door. He keeps the account short, saying simply that he will tell how it ended rather than expand the tale. What he gave was fitting for God: eleven abhangas were composed, and the visitor, having let go of the greatest prize, departed. The closing line states the whole transaction plainly. By laying his service at God's feet, Tuka has cleared his debt, and he asks that this be on record.

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My death itself has died; I have been made immortal. All ground has been erased, all foundation dissolved; the sense of being a body has been emptied out.

The flood that had come has passed, and steadiness has been found in the waters of life. Says Tuka, the original foundation has been truly settled and celebrated.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My death itself has died. It has made me immortal. The ground is wiped away, the bottom is wiped away; the sense of being a body is emptied out. The flood that had come has passed; steadiness is found in the waters of life. Tuka says: the foundation has been truly settled and made bright.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing what happens when the fear of dying is itself undone. He says his own death has died, and that very ending has left him deathless. Every ground he once stood on, and the bottom under it, is wiped clean, and the deep conviction of being only a body is emptied out. The flood that had swept over him has now passed, and he has found steadiness in the very waters that once threatened to drown him. What he had as his base, Tuka says, is at last truly settled and lit up; the realization is complete.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In my reckoning, God has died. Let Him be whatever He may be.

I will not speak of Him, I will not take His name; both of us have parted ways and broken off. Along with praise, slander was dealt out abundantly.

Says Tuka, I have become still and quiet, having spent the currency of my entire life.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In my reckoning, God has died. Let Him be whatever He may be. I tell no stories of Him, I do not take His name; the two of us have broken off and parted. Praise and slander both, I dealt out plenty of that trade. Tuka says: I have gone quiet, having spent away my whole life.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is Tukaram speaking from the dry, severed side of longing, and the words are deliberately stark. He declares that as far as he is concerned God is dead, and lets Him be whatever He will; he will not tell the old stories or even take the Name, because the two of them have broken apart. He looks back on all his loud devotional business, the praising and the blaming alike, and counts it as so much trade he carried on at length. Now he has fallen silent, his whole life spent like coin paid out. The harshness is the cry of one who feels abandoned, not a rejection of God, and the silence is where it leaves him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who bow, everything bows with them; pride cannot catch hold of them. The ornament of innocence suits the servants of Vishnu; there, duality and all other sentiments vanish.

Worship, prostration, the ninefold forms of devotion, compassion, forgiveness, and peace all dwell in that place. In that land, there is no dwelling for sorrow; Narayana is seen in all beings.

The entire universe has become pure; the face of pollution is never seen. Says Tuka, the celebration resounds in Vaikuntha, and its fame fills this earthly world as well.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The one who bows, everything bows along with him; pride cannot get hold of him. The ornament of innocence suits the servants of Vishnu; there all other feelings vanish. Worship, bowing, the nine kinds of devotion, mercy, forgiveness, peace: all live in that place. In that town sorrow has no home; in every creature, only Narayana. The whole universe has turned pure; they never see the face of defilement. Tuka says: the festival resounds in Vaikuntha, and its fame fills this earth too.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the inner country of the true devotee. The one who truly bows finds that everything bows with him, and pride can no longer take hold; the simple ornament that suits Vishnu's servant is innocence, and in it all rival feelings dissolve. He lists what fills this place instead: worship, prostration, the ninefold devotion, and the moral fruits of mercy, forgiveness, and peace. Because the devotee sees only Narayana in every creature, sorrow can find no house there and defilement never shows its face; the whole universe has gone pure. Such a life, Tuka says, sets a festival ringing in Vaikuntha, and its fame spreads across this earth as well.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The pilgrimage to Pandhari is within my own home; I need no other sacred place or vow. I shall observe the Ekadashi fast and sing the Name day and night.

Says Tuka, I shall utter Vitthal's Name with my voice; that is the seed that endures through the final dissolution.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The pilgrimage to Pandhari is here in my own home. I need no other holy place, no other vow. I will keep the Ekadashi fast. I will sing the Name day and night. I will say Vithoba's Name with my own mouth. Tuka says: that is the seed that lasts till the end of all things.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram brings the pilgrimage indoors. The famous walk to Pandhari, the holy places, the vows: he sets them all aside, because the journey he means is the one he can make at home with his voice. What he keeps is the fast of Ekadashi and the constant singing of Vithoba's Name. He calls the Name the seed that endures through the final dissolution of the world, when every shrine and rite has been swept away. The claim is that the Name in the mouth outlasts the cosmos itself.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Wealth and festivity hold no appeal for my mind; it thinks only of Pandhari. The longing to go to Pandhari fills my mind.

When will the Ashadhi Ekadashi come? Says Tuka, Chakrapani Himself watches the road, waiting for the one whose mind carries such yearning.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wealth does not please my mind. Festivals do not please it. It thinks only of Pandhari. My mind loves to go to Pandhari. When will the Ashadhi Ekadashi come? Tuka says: when this ache is in someone's mind, Chakrapani himself watches the road for that one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures his longing against the things people usually crave. Riches and celebrations leave him cold; his whole mind leans toward Pandhari and counts the days to the Ashadhi Ekadashi. Then he turns the longing around. The one who aches like this is not chasing an absent God; God is the one who waits. Chakrapani, Vishnu of the discus, stands watching the road for the devotee whose heart carries that yearning, so the wanting itself is already answered from the other side.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What use is mere recitation and study without living it? Without true practice, everything goes to waste. Sweet words on the tongue mean nothing if one still writhes in spiritual hunger.

No amount of grinding and cooking will make a stone edible. The bee gathers honey, but it is the hunter who takes it.

The miser hoards wealth and gathers only dust; what ends up in his mouth is the same dust. Says Tuka, only the one who acts upon what he knows truly reaps the reward; I bow at such a one's feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What use is reciting and studying? Without living it, it all goes to waste. Sweet words are on the tongue, but the false hunger still writhes inside. Grind a stone and cook it; it stays a stone. The bee gathers the honey, but the hunter takes it. The miser gathers wealth and gathers only dust; dust is all that reaches his mouth. Tuka says: the one who eats what he himself has made, I bow at his feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram aims this at the gap between knowing and doing. Recitation and study are worthless if you do not live them; honeyed words on the tongue do not feed a soul that is still starving. He stacks up plain images to drive it home: a stone stays inedible no matter how long you cook it, the bee that hoards honey only loses it to the hunter, the miser ends with dust in his mouth. Read it as a question to put to yourself, not a verdict to throw at others. Only the one who acts on what he has learned truly reaps it, and to that one Tukaram bows.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Words arise bearing the sound of the Name. This beneficial service should be offered generously, again and again.

The story should be seen as straightforward, gentle, and uplifting. Says Tuka, as I go about singing, listen to this one teaching.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Words rise up. They seem to carry the sound of the Name. Such service does good; offer these words, offer them again. Let the telling be straight and gentle, and let it lift the heart upward. Tuka says: as I go along singing, listen to this one teaching.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing what good speech about God should sound like. When words rise truly, they carry the ring of the Name in them, and to offer such words again and again is a service that benefits all who hear. He names the marks of it: the telling should be straightforward and gentle, and it should raise the listener rather than impress them. As he sings his way along, he asks people to take in this single teaching about how the holy story should be spoken.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hear the etiquette of the sacred gathering; I shall tell it, so receive it with devotion. What Govinda loves is this alone.

Cymbals, instruments, song, and dance; the inner being filled with love. One who sings should be honored according to his devotion.

Do not lazily stretch your limbs during the discourse or sniff about the kirtan with contempt. The one who shows disdain is a wretch.

The one who chews betel, sits proudly, swollen with self-importance, and lets his mind wander from the Name while engaging others in gossip is a wretch. The one who seeks honor at the discourse, making a display of his dignity, adjusting his garments instead of listening, is a wretch.

The one who sits on a cushion while making Hari's servants hold his belongings deserves to be put on the stake, in all certainty. The one who does not bow with folded hands when arriving, who does not call himself humble without being asked, and who walks over others, is a wretch.

Says Tuka, I implore the people: do not bring faults into the sacred gathering. Surrender to Narayana with whole-chitta devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will tell you the rule for the time of the discourse; receive it with devotion. This alone is what Govinda loves. Cymbals, instruments, song, dance, the heart full of love: honor the singer according to his devotion. Do not lazily stretch your body, and do not sniff at the kirtan with contempt; the one who shows scorn is base. The one who chews betel, sits stiff and swollen with self-importance, lets his mind drift from the Name and pulls others into gossip, is base. The one who hunts for honor at the discourse, who shows off his rank, who fusses with his clothes instead of listening, is base. The one who sits on a cushion and makes Hari's servants hold his belongings deserves the stake, for certain. The one who does not bow with folded hands when he comes, who will not call himself humble, who tramples over others, is base. Tuka says: I beg you, do not bring your faults into the gathering. Surrender to Narayana with a whole heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out the etiquette of the kirtan hall and what spoils it. The thing Govinda loves is the gathering done with full feeling: cymbals, song, dance, and a heart soaked in love, with the singer honored for his devotion and not his polish. Then he names the postures that ruin it: the bored body, the contemptuous sniff, the betel-chewing self-importance, the wandering mind that drags neighbors into gossip, the man who comes hunting status and fusses with his clothes, the grandee who sits on a cushion and treats God's devotees as porters. His sharp word base, and even the figure of the stake, is pointed at the pattern of pride, not at hating a person; the test he sets is whether you came to be honored or to surrender. He asks each listener not to carry such faults into the gathering, but to give themselves wholly to Narayana.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Katha is meditation on God. Katha is the adornment of all spiritual practice.

There is no merit anywhere that compares with the merit of katha. Such is the true and honest reality: God stands present in the midst of katha.

Even a small mantra, when uttered by the tongue and mind, when one says 'Narayana,' burns away great sins in an instant. Says Tuka, when kirtan is performed with devotion, it saves the performer and saves others too. Narayana is met; there is no doubt about it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The telling of God's story is meditation on God. It is the ornament of all practice. There is no merit anywhere that equals it. This is the true and honest fact: God stands present in the midst of the story. Even a small mantra, when the tongue and mind say 'Narayana,' burns great sins away in a moment. Tuka says: kirtan done with love saves the one who does it and saves others too. Narayana is met; there is no doubt of it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram raises katha, the telling of God's story, above every other practice. To recite the story is itself meditation on God and the adornment of all sadhana, with no merit anywhere to match it, because God does not merely listen from far off; he stands present where the story is told. Even a brief utterance of 'Narayana,' said with tongue and mind together, burns away great sins in an instant. And kirtan done with real love is not a private gain: it carries across, saving the singer and the listeners alike, until Narayana himself is met.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Katha is the confluence of three sacred rivers: God, the devotee, and the Name. The dust of the feet at that place is supremely holy.

Mountains of sin are burned away, and men and women are purified, those who sing and those who listen with reverence to this holy Hari-katha. The sacred places themselves come to that spot to be sanctified.

The holiest hours of the calendar rest beneath the feet of the Vaishnavas. Says Tuka, this glory is beyond comparison; there is no metaphor adequate to describe it. Even Brahma cannot fully praise this bliss.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The telling of God's story is the meeting of three sacred rivers: God, the devotee, and the Name. The dust of the feet there is the most holy thing; honor it. Mountains of sin burn away, and women and men are made pure, who sing and who listen with care to the holy Hari-katha. The sacred places themselves come to this spot to be made clean. The holy hours of the calendar rest under the feet of the Vaishnavas. Tuka says: this glory has no equal; there is no image to compare it to. Even Brahma does not know how to praise this joy.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram likens Hari-katha to a triveni, the confluence where three rivers meet, the three here being God, the devotee, and the Name. Where those three join, the very dust of the gathered feet is holier than any shrine. Singing and listening with reverence burns mountains of sin and purifies whoever takes part, so completely that the famous holy places and sacred hours come to be cleansed here rather than the other way around. He ends by confessing the limit of all praise: the glory has no comparison, and even Brahma, the creator, cannot find words equal to this bliss.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Giving up everything else, I shall do nothing but kirtan. I shall dance without shame, lost in Your divine rapture.

Fulfill the longing of my chitta, O Lord of Pandhari. I come to Your feet for this one thing alone.

Clapping my hands, I shall cry 'Vitthal,' and by that I shall conquer the weariness of worldly existence. Says Tuka, O God, do not neglect us. Take us to Your own abode.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Leaving everything else, I will do nothing but kirtan. I will dance without shame in Your rapture. Fulfill the longing of my heart, O Lord of Pandhari. I come to Your feet for this one thing alone. Clapping my hands, I will cry 'Vitthal,' and by that I will drive off the weariness of this world. Tuka says: O God, do not neglect us. Take us to Your own home.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes his whole vocation a single act. He drops every other task and keeps only kirtan, ready to dance without shame because he is lost in the Lord's rapture, not minding how it looks. From Vitthal, the Lord of Pandhari, he asks one thing: that this longing be filled. The means is plain and bodily, hands clapping and the cry of 'Vitthal,' and he claims that this alone wears away the exhaustion of worldly existence. He closes by asking God not to overlook him but to carry him home to God's own abode.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Through kirtan, sins are burned and obstacles flee. This is the mightiest fortress of all.

Let us rejoice and march in procession before the dindi. Sin is the enemy in bodily form; let us take the sword of the Name in our hands.

Says Tuka, let us go forth boldly and sound the drums of triumph.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Kirtan burns sins; the obstacles flee. This is the mightiest fortress of all. Let us rejoice and march in front of the dindi. Sin is the enemy in bodily shape; let us take the sword of the Name in our hands. Tuka says: let us go forth boldly and sound the drums of triumph.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the devotional procession into a battle. Kirtan burns away sins and scatters every obstacle, so the singing band is itself the strongest fortress one could stand inside. He calls the company to rejoice and march at the head of the dindi, the pilgrim procession, as if to war. Sin is named the enemy in bodily form, and the Name is the sword carried in hand. The closing line is a war cry: go out boldly and beat the drums of victory, treating devotion not as retreat from the world but as an advance against what enslaves it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Yama tells his messengers: You have no authority where the Name is chanted in continuous devotion. Do not go near the boundaries of those who bear the Name.

The Sudarshana discus whirls around their homes like a sentinel. Hari stands at their door with discus and mace, accompanied by Lakshmi and all mystic powers.

They are the bravest heroes of this earth, the devotees of Hari. Says Tuka, Yama himself counsels his messengers to stay away.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Yama tells his messengers: you have no power there, where the story is told and the Name is always sounding. Do not go near the homes of those who bear the Name. The Sudarshana discus circles their houses, going around them on guard. Hari stands at their door with discus and mace, with Lakshmi and all the powers beside him. They are the bravest of all on this earth, the devotees of Hari. Tuka says: Yama himself says this in the ears of his messengers.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram dramatizes death's own helplessness before devotion. Yama, the lord of death, instructs his messengers that they hold no authority where God's story is told and the Name sounds without ceasing, and he warns them to stay clear of the homes of those who keep the Name. The reason is guarded plainly: the Sudarshana discus patrols their houses, and Hari himself stands at the door, armed and attended by Lakshmi and every mystic power. Such devotees are the true heroes of the earth, and the point is told from death's own mouth, so that the protection of the Name needs no other witness than Yama himself.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Krishna, Lord of the world, grant me Your darshan just once. Why have You released me in the forest, surrounded by wild beasts? Up to a point, You were with me.

Then You concealed Yourself, body behind body. Says Tuka, when I looked behind me, You had vanished at great speed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O Kanha, Lord of the world, give me Your meeting just once. Why have You left me in the forest, ringed by wild beasts? Until now You were with me. Then You hid Yourself, body behind body. Tuka says: when I looked behind me, You had slipped away so fast.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from the moment God seems to withdraw. He calls Krishna, the Lord of the whole world, and begs for a single meeting. The complaint is sharp: he feels abandoned in a forest of wild beasts, when only a moment ago God was at his side. He describes the loss in a startling way, as God hiding body behind body, then vanishing with great speed the instant Tukaram turned to look. The poem holds the experience of divine absence without softening it, the ache of one who knew nearness and now finds the place beside him empty.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have not asked about our own affairs because of You. I came running behind You; that is why I speak.

For many days this longing has been in my mind: to have my fill of You in solitude. Says Tuka, stand still, O Krishna, and look toward me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I did not ask about my own affairs; it was for Your sake. I came running behind You; that is why I speak. For many days it has been in my mind: to have my fill of You in solitude. Tuka says: stand still, O Kanha; look toward me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks in the tone of an intimate who has been chasing the beloved. He says he never came to settle his own business; he ran after Krishna for Krishna's own sake, and that is the only reason he is speaking now. The wish he has carried for many days is simple and tender: to be alone with God and take his fill of him. The poem ends not in a grand demand but in a small one, asking Krishna only to stop and turn and look at him, the whole longing pressed into a single glance.

The gopis, stealing away to God

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे जीवासाठीं । दुर्लभ भेटी ते देवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Blessed are those women who live as wives and householders, yet manage to steal away to You without their families knowing. To keep both spheres content at once is exceedingly difficult.

Says Tuka, for the sake of the jiva, the meeting with God is the rarest of all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Blessed are those women. They live in their homes as wives and keep their households. Yet they steal away to You, and their families never know they have gone. To keep both worlds content at once is very hard. Tuka says: for the sake of the soul, the meeting with God is the rarest thing of all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram blesses the gopis, who run two lives at once. In the house they are faithful wives and mothers; in secret they slip out to be with Krishna, and the household never finds out. He marks how hard this is, to keep the world satisfied and still keep the tryst. Then he names the stakes: of everything a soul could want, the meeting with God is the rarest. The hidden love is worth the difficulty, because nothing else is this scarce.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The indifferent gopis, once they arrived, clung to Him body to body. Hari was surrounded on all sides; they danced around Him like peacocks.

They did as they pleased, many against one. Says Tuka, these women have dissolved into Narayana, merged in that ultimate light.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The women who came indifferent are soon caught fast. Body clings to body. Hari is surrounded on every side; they dance around Him like peacocks circling. They do as their hearts please, many of them against the one. Tuka says: these women have melted into Narayana, merged into that one light.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram watches the rasalila and traces what happens to the soul that draws near God. The gopis come cool and detached, and at once they are gripped, body pressed to body, ringing Krishna on every side like peacocks at their dance. They have their way with the One who is alone among them. The point lands at the end: the many have dissolved into Narayana, merged into a single light. Drawing close in love is not finally keeping company; it is being absorbed into God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There is fear that something may go wrong; joy comes only when equals meet. That is why they stole away from the world and came to the wilderness in private.

Others should not come to know of this, those who have no part in it. Says Tuka, when the mind is free and open, Narayana is there for the taking.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There is a fear that something may go wrong. Joy comes only when equals meet. So they stole away from the crowd and came alone into the wilderness. Others must not find out, those who have no share in this. Tuka says: when the mind is free and open, Narayana is there to be had.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram explains why the gopis hide their love and what the hiding is really about. There is a fear of being seen, and joy is only sure when like meets like, so they slip away from the public into the lonely wilderness. The ones kept out are simply those with no part in this love. The closing line opens the frame: when the mind is unguarded and free, God is there for the taking. The secrecy is not shame; it is the clearing of the mind in which God can be met.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

An embrace, throat to throat, a clasp with the whole body. The mind cannot turn back when Narayana is in this intimate union.

Words merge into words; eyes enter into eyes. Says Tuka, deep in inner contemplation, the jiva has dissolved into its very life-source.

IN PLAIN WORDS

An embrace, throat against throat. The whole body clasps and holds. The mind cannot turn back, not when Narayana is the lover. Word meets word; eyes enter into eyes. Tuka says: deep in the inner stillness, the soul has dissolved into its very life.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures the union and lets it stand for the soul's meeting with God. There is a full embrace, throat to throat, the whole body holding on; once Narayana is the beloved, the mind has no way back. Speech answers speech, gaze sinks into gaze. The last line turns the embrace inward: in deep contemplation the jiva dissolves into Narayana, who is its own life-source. Closeness with God is not two staying two; the soul melts back into the ground it came from.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Some were daughters-in-law, some were daughters, some were mothers of families. All of them alike were talked about by the world; equal scandal fell upon them all.

They were all alike in being thieves of love, apart from the one Beloved, their Mother and Father. Says Tuka, serve Him even if it costs your life.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Some were daughters-in-law, some daughters, some mothers of families. The world talked about every one of them; the same scandal fell on them all. They were all alike thieves of love, stealing toward the one Beloved, who is their Mother and Father. Tuka says: serve Him, even if it costs your life.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names the cost the gopis pay and tells the listener to pay it too. Whatever their place in the household, daughter, daughter-in-law, mother, the world gossiped about all of them equally. He calls them thieves, but what they steal toward is the one Beloved, who is parent to them all. The instruction at the end is blunt: serve God even at the price of your own life. The disgrace of the world is the ordinary cost of loving God openly, and it is worth paying.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A single moment here is worth more than any treasure. Their worldly homes are like a hard in-laws' house; what sweetness can be found there? All the days spent here have purified their very births.

Says Tuka, do not release these absorbed women, O Krishna.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A single moment here is worth more than any treasure. There is no end to that gain. Their worldly homes were like a hard in-laws' house; what sweetness was ever there? All the days spent here have made their very births clean. Tuka says: do not let these absorbed women go, O Krishna.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram weighs one moment of nearness to God against everything else and pleads for the gopis to be kept. A single moment here outweighs any treasure, and its gain is endless. Their ordinary homes were a hard place, like a bride's harsh in-laws' house, with no real sweetness in them. The time spent with Krishna has purified their whole existence. So he asks Krishna outright: now that they are absorbed in You, do not release them. The soul that has finally come home should not be sent back.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the village of Vishnu's servants, there is no anxiety. The sound of triumph resounds always.

Narayana's Name is the wealth stored in every home; all goods are contained within it. It is plentiful for all, enough for everyone, for women, men, and children to partake.

Says Tuka, in this joy upon joy, Govinda Himself has made Govinda's harvest bloom.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the village of Vishnu's servants there is no worry. The shout of victory sounds there always. Narayana's Name is the wealth stored in every home; all goods are held inside it. It is cheap and plentiful, enough for everyone, for women, men, and children to take. Tuka says: in this joy upon joy, Govinda Himself has grown a harvest of Govinda.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the life of God's devotees as a place with no anxiety, where the cry of victory never stops. The treasure stocked in every house is the Name of Narayana, and every good thing is contained in it. Unlike worldly wealth it is cheap and abundant, freely available to all, women and men and children alike. The closing image makes the point complete: in this overflowing joy, God has raised a whole crop of Himself. The Name is a wealth that does not run out and that excludes no one.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who labor at this enterprise find support here. Let each one help the other.

Singing and listening both yield the same reward; gain upon gain accumulates abundantly. Wrap yourself in the garment of love and dance with clapping hands and the courage of a warrior.

Says Tuka, the debts of many births will be cancelled, and all suffering will be removed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those who work at this enterprise find support here. So help one another, each of you. Singing and listening both earn the same reward; gain piles on gain. Wrap the flood of love around your body, and dance with clapping hands and a warrior's courage. Tuka says: the debt of many lives will be cancelled, and all this weariness lifted.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram calls the listener into the shared work of kirtan and names what it does. Those who labor at it are upheld, so he tells them to support each other. The reward is the same whether you sing or only listen, and it keeps accumulating. He urges the devotee to put on love like a garment and to dance with clapping hands, bold as a fighter. The payoff is the stake: the karmic debt of many births is wiped out and all suffering removed. Praise sung together, by singer and hearer alike, settles a debt no single act could.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There is nothing to prepare; a single grain shows the quality of the rice. The swan sifts milk from water with its beak alone.

Tearing a fine cloth to make a coarse blanket brings only ruin. Says Tuka, the grain separates from the chaff without any toil.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There is nothing to prepare. One grain shows the quality of the whole rice. The swan separates milk from water with its beak alone. Tear a fine garment to make a coarse blanket, and you only ruin it. Tuka says: the grain falls clear of the chaff. Where is the labor in that?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says true worth shows itself plainly, with no effort and no faking. One grain tells you what the whole pot of rice is; the swan, by old image, draws milk out of water using only its beak. To shred something fine into something coarse is pure waste. The closing line ties it off: the good grain comes free of the husk on its own. Genuine quality declares itself and cannot be manufactured by struggle, and this sets up his attack on those who steal others' words to seem worthy.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

These imitators call themselves servants of Hari and thereby ruin everything. They have created a general mess, claiming the works of others as their own.

Breaking the words of the saints, they fashion ornaments for themselves from the fragments. Says Tuka, the poet reveals this fraud, which has become commonplace in the world.

IN PLAIN WORDS

These imitators call themselves servants of Hari, and so they ruin everything. They have made a general mess, claiming what others made as their own. They break the words of the saints and turn the pieces into ornaments for themselves. Tuka says: the poet shows up this fraud, which has become common all over the world.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks the pattern of dressing up in borrowed holiness. Pretenders take the name servant of Hari while wrecking what that name means, and they pass off other people's work as their own. Worse, they break apart the saints' true words and wear the fragments as decoration for themselves. He says the poet's task is to expose this counterfeit, which has spread everywhere. The warning is to watch for the same theft in oneself: the urge to seem holy by quoting and claiming, instead of becoming what the words ask.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who steal a wife's ornaments become thieves. The fitting reward for them is a beating, and that is what destiny arranges.

In the pleasure of coveting, their faces turn black at the end. Says Tuka, the only ornament fit for a thief is dust.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those who steal a wife's ornaments become thieves. The fitting worship for them is a beating; that is what fate arranges. In the pleasure of their coveting, their faces go black in the end. Tuka says: for a thief the only ornament is dust.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses the same charge, now in the figure of a jewel thief. To steal what is not yours makes you a thief, and the only honor such a one earns is the beating destiny brings him. The sweetness of grabbing what you covet ends in a blackened, disgraced face. The closing line strips the thief bare: the only ornament that suits him is dust.

Aimed at the borrower of holy words, it warns that stolen finery never adorns; it only exposes, and the wanting that drove it ends in shame.

Mixing poison into nectar destroys its value. Such is the intellect of the unfortunate, suppressing truth without awareness.

Cutting off the nose and replacing it with gold; what kind of adornment is that? Says Tuka, one who demolishes a well to build a tomb. The grain depends on the chaff, yet when you sift, they separate.

How does one churn butter from buttermilk without a churning rod? You cannot hide your tricks before a midwife. Says Tuka, such knowledge is nothing but the buzzing of arrogance.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Mix poison into nectar and you destroy it. Such is the mind of the wretched, hiding the truth and never clean. Cut off the nose and fasten on a gold one. What ornament is that? Tuka says: he is one who pulls down a well to build a tomb. The grain rests on the chaff, yet sift them and they part cleanly. How will you churn butter from buttermilk with no churning rod? You cannot hide your tricks in front of a midwife. Tuka says: such learning is only the buzzing of conceit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram piles up images for false, stolen, ruined wisdom. To drop poison into nectar wrecks it; the corrupt mind buries the truth and stays unclean. A gold nose on a cut-off face is no ornament; tearing down a well to raise a tomb is no gain. Then he turns to what cannot be faked: chaff and grain look joined but sift apart, and you cannot churn butter out of mere buttermilk, just as a midwife sees through every concealment. The closing verdict is flat: this kind of learning is nothing but the buzzing of arrogance. The pattern to examine is the impulse to pass off appearance for substance, which any clear eye will catch.

The swaddling cloth of pretense has only fattened the belly with rags. Tuka says: I know how to set the true apart from the false, the genuine apart from the counterfeit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is warning the religious pretender and naming the test he cannot pass. He tells the fraud to take his goods to a market that does not see clearly; here, in the company of those who know God, mud cannot be passed off as the powder used in worship. He calls this the place of final reckoning, where truth is sorted from falsehood by the heart's real disposition. The outward costume of piety, he says, only feeds the belly with rags, with nothing of worth inside. Tuka claims for himself the discernment to tell the counterfeit from the genuine, so the disguise will not work on him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who claims oneness with the Absolute while indulging the senses should not be touched by us. God stands apart from such a one, dwelling in desirelessness.

Where desire wraps itself around like a cloak, how can there be any state of Brahman-realization? Says Tuka, as long as one dwells in the body in such a manner, liberation is nowhere to be found.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One who claims oneness with the Absolute while indulging the senses, we should not touch. God stands apart from such a one. God dwells in desirelessness, separate from him. Where desire wraps itself around like a cloak, how can there be any state of Brahman? Tuka says: as long as one lives in the body in this way, liberation is nowhere to be found.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns on the person who talks of nondual realization while still feeding every appetite, and refuses him fellowship. The point is not the theory but the life: God lives where there is no craving, so the indulgent talker has placed himself far from God by his own conduct. Desire wrapped around a person like a cloak leaves no room for the state of Brahman he boasts of. Tukaram lands it plainly: while a man lives in the body in that double way, claiming the heights and serving the senses, liberation is simply not there. The poem asks the listener to examine whether his own life matches his words.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Janardana dwells among the people; to Him I make full prostration as my witness. Tuka says: while grinding at the mill, the stones rumble and the pebbles are sorted from the grain.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram fixes his worship on one God and refuses to scatter it. He asks that worth and worthlessness be told apart honestly, the way a beast is named for what it plainly is. Because God, Janardana, lives within all people, his full prostration to that indwelling presence is itself his witness that he serves the one and not the many. The closing image is from daily labor: as grain is ground at the mill, the rumbling stones throw out the stones and grit and keep the grain. So too, he suggests, the work of devotion separates the true from the false within a person.

The sun shines equally upon all, yet it is the life of the lotus alone. Says Tuka, a mother bears the burden of worry for her nursing child.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Fish live by the water; to be parted from it is their death. As the faith in one's heart, so is God near to that person. The sun shines equally on all, yet it is the life of the lotus alone. Tuka says: a mother carries the worry for her nursing child.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses three plain images to say that God answers each soul in the measure of its longing. The fish lives only in the water and dies when parted from it, so a heart cannot live cut off from God. The sun falls on everything alike, yet it is the lotus, which opens to it, that draws its very life from the sun; God is near to each according to the faith they hold. The last image turns it tender: as a mother bears the constant worry for the child still at her breast, so God carries the helpless devotee. The nearness is real, but it answers the trust we bring.

Says Tuka, whoever cares about his own well-being will naturally be drawn to the sacred story.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who goes searching for an ant's home? Seeing the jaggery, the ant rushes toward it on its own. Does the giver wait for the beggar? He Himself runs toward His own welfare. Do water and food say 'come, eat me'? The hungry one goes seeking on his own. One sick with disease runs to the doctor's house, for the cure of his own suffering. Tuka says: whoever cares for his own true good will love the sacred story of God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers a quiet objection: why must I seek God, why not wait for Him to find me? With everyday pictures he shows that the one who needs the thing is the one who moves toward it. The ant smells the jaggery and runs; nobody comes hunting the ant's nest to bring it. The hungry man goes to the food, the sick man goes to the doctor, because the gain and the cure are his own. So the listener who truly cares about his own welfare will be drawn, of his own accord, to hearing and dwelling on God. The seeking is not a burden laid on you; it is simply what a person does when he understands where his good lies.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks the habit of slander by exposing what the slanderer is really doing. The man wears the outward marks of caste and piety, the sacred thread and the tuft carried from birth to birth, yet inside he is unclean. His trade, says Tukaram, is the washerman's: he busies himself scrubbing other people's dirty linen, forever handling the faults of others. Such speech is poison to hear, sanctioned by no scripture, and once it starts it floods everything around it. The closing warning is sharp but aimed at the pattern: the saints simply ignore the slanderer, and death's own messengers are waiting for the tongue that lives this way. The poem invites the listener to ask whether his own mouth has taken up that trade.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Having attained a human birth, they shut their eyes as if by force, willingly making themselves blind. Even in the daylight, they will not walk the path, knowing well what lies ahead.

Many rounds of suffering have already been endured; such a chance will not come again. Says Tuka, let me go forth calling out along the road. Let whoever will meet me, meet me along the way.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Having been given a human birth, they shut their eyes, as if by force making themselves blind. Even in daylight they will not walk the path, though they know well what lies ahead. Many rounds of suffering have already been endured; such a chance will not come again. Tuka says: let me go forth calling out along the road. Whoever will meet me, let him meet me along the way.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram grieves over people who have been given the rare gift of a human birth and then deliberately waste it. They close their eyes against what they could plainly see; even in broad daylight, knowing where the road leads, they refuse to walk it. He reminds them they have already passed through many rounds of birth and suffering, and that this opening will not come again. Then he names his own response: rather than despair, he will go down the road calling out, hoping that whoever is willing will come and join him. The poem is both a lament over willful blindness and a vow to keep summoning anyone who will listen.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He is not Jokhai or Jokhai, nor Mayarani, nor Mesabai. My mighty Lord is the King of Pandhari, the God of all gods.

Those fierce goddesses demand offerings of liquor and meat. Bhairav and Khanderav are gods who serve only for bread and butter.

Ganoba is fearsome, a terror who devours only laddoos and modakas. Munja and Mhasasur, who even considers these childish spirits? As for ghosts and ghouls, let their faces burn black.

Says Tuka, hold in your chitta the Husband of Rakhumai alone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He is not Jokhai, not Jokhai, not Mayarani, not Mesabai. My mighty Lord is the King of Pandhari, the God even of these gods. The fierce goddesses beg for liquor and meat. Bhairav and Khanderav are gods who serve only for bread and a bit of butter. Ganoba is fearsome, a terror only to laddoos and modakas. Munja and Mhasasur, who even counts such childish spirits? As for the ghosts and ghouls, let their black faces burn. Tuka says: hold in your heart the Husband of Rakhumai alone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram clears the crowded field of local deities to point at the one he worships. He lists the village goddesses and spirits people fear and feed, and he deflates each: the fierce goddesses only want offerings of liquor and meat, Bhairav and Khanderav are bought with bread and butter, the dreaded Ganoba is a terror only to the sweets set before him, and the petty ghosts are not worth counting. Above all of them stands the King of Pandhari, Vitthal, the God even of these gods. The point is not mockery for its own sake but the cutting of dependence on powers that take and give nothing real. His counsel is single: hold in your heart only the Husband of Rakhumai.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the burden becomes heavy, servants should remember Hari. Then He will not let weariness prevail; He places the Sudarshana discus as a shield before them.

By the contemplation of the Name, obstacles flee in twelve directions. Says Tuka, offer your very life to God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the burden falls heavy, let the servants remember Hari. Then He will not let weariness win; He sets the Sudarshana discus across the way as a shield. By dwelling on the Name, obstacles flee in twelve directions. Tuka says: offer your very life to God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells the devotee what to do when trouble grows too heavy to bear: simply remember Hari. He promises that God does not leave His servant to be worn down; He places His own weapon, the Sudarshana discus, between the devotee and the danger. Holding the Name in the mind scatters obstacles in every direction. The closing line turns it into a full surrender: offer your life itself to God. The remembering is not a small charm but the giving over of everything to the one who then guards it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Where can a child go by its own strength when the mother lets it loose? Its own power cannot sustain it. It runs off in a sulk, leaving its plate behind, yet keeps looking back, hoping the mother will come.

Our very capital is this: the right to make demands. O Mother, You Yourself will come running.

Says Tuka, after the petulant plea is done, You will come with a toy to console me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the mother lets it loose, where can the child go by its own strength? Its own power cannot carry it. It runs off in a sulk, leaving its plate behind, yet keeps looking back, hoping she will come. This is all our wealth: the right to make our demands. O Mother, You Yourself will come running. Tuka says: when the petulant pleading is done, You will come and console me with a toy.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays in the voice of a small child to God as Mother. He admits he has no strength of his own; if she lets go, he cannot manage. Like a child who sulks and runs off, abandoning his food, he still keeps glancing back, sure the mother will follow. His only capital, he says, is the child's privilege of making demands, of crying and insisting, because the Mother cannot help running to him. The closing line is full of trust: after all the petulant fuss, she will come and quiet him with a small gift. The poem makes helplessness itself the ground of confidence.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

That gracious, sweet, childlike form is the very form of the Dark One. In the company of cowherds and cows, He came, drawn by Pundalik.

That is the very object of meditation: standing unclothed, hands resting on the waist. In His innocence, He stands quietly still, held there by His love for devotees.

He pays no attention to outward pomp; He stands with feet even upon the brick. His hands rest naturally at His hips; His provision is curds and rice.

A flute, a horn, a quiver on His back, and a staff He once held. The beautiful place of the Chandrabhaga river is His playground, O Panduranga.

The Bhima flows southward, and His gaze falls straight ahead. He made a promise to Pundalik to save the ignorant.

Says Tuka, the Dweller of Vaikuntha has remained here, close to His devotees.

IN PLAIN WORDS

That gracious, sweet, childlike form is the very form of the Dark One. In the company of cows and cowherds He came, drawn by Pundalik. This is the form to meditate on: standing bare, hands resting on the waist. In His innocence He stands quietly still, held there by love for His devotees. He pays no heed to outward pomp; He stands with feet even upon the brick. His hands rest easily at His hips; His provision is curds and rice. A flute, a horn, a quiver on His back, and a staff He once held. The lovely bank of the Chandrabhaga is His playground, O Panduranga. The Bhima flows southward, and His gaze falls straight ahead. He gave His word to Pundalik to save the ignorant. Tuka says: the Dweller of Vaikuntha has stayed here, close to His devotees.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contemplates Vitthal as He stands on the brick at Pandhari and traces the whole image with love. The sweet child-form is none other than Krishna, the Dark One, who came among cows and cowherds and was drawn here by His devotee Pundalik. He describes the well-known posture: standing bare and still, hands on the hips, feet even on the brick, fed simply on curds and rice, the flute and herdsman's gear about Him. The setting is named too, the Chandrabhaga and the Bhima flowing south by the shrine. Tukaram dwells on why He stays: not for any pomp, but held by love and by the promise He made Pundalik to rescue the ignorant. The Lord of Vaikuntha has chosen to remain here, within reach of those who love Him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who has no faith in Vitthal's Name dwells in a desolate hell. Even speaking to such a person brings contamination that does not wash away with bathing.

One who has no love for Vitthal's Name is being counted moment by moment by Death. Says Tuka, I swear by Vitthal: I shall not even answer such a one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One who has no faith in Vitthal's Name dwells in a desolate hell. Even speaking to such a person brings a defilement that no bathing washes away. One who has no love for Vitthal's Name has his every moment counted off by Death. Tuka says: I swear by Vithoba, I will not even answer such a one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram states bluntly how much the Name matters to him. The person who has no faith in Vitthal's Name is already living in a barren hell, and merely talking with him leaves a stain that ritual bathing cannot rinse off. For the one who has no love for the Name, time itself is only Death counting down his moments. The harshness is aimed at the condition, faithlessness, not at the man's worth; it measures the gulf the Name opens. Tukaram seals it with an oath in Vithoba's own name: he will not so much as answer such a person, so completely does he stake his life on devotion.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All disciplines are fulfilled for the one who has Vitthal's Name on his lips. There is no need to toil at anything else or adopt any separate practice.

Simply utter with your voice: Rama, Krishna, Govinda. You shall effortlessly attain the fruit, the enjoyment and celebration of Vaikuntha.

Says Tuka, by His Name, one naturally becomes like Him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For the one who keeps Vithoba's name on his lips, every discipline is already done. You need not toil at anything else. You need not take up any other practice. Just say it with your voice: Rama, Krishna, Govinda. You will gain the fruit with no effort, the joy and the festival of Vaikuntha. Tuka says: by His name, you naturally become like Him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram collapses the whole ladder of religious effort into one act: the name on the lips. He is not saying the disciplines are good and the name is a shortcut; he is saying the name fulfills them all, so the separate striving becomes needless toil. The two syllables, said with the voice, carry the speaker into Vaikuntha without labor. And the closing claim is the sharpest: you do not just reach God by His name, you take on His nature. Repeating what He is, you become like Him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The saving power of the Name is well-established in the Puranas. It burns away great sins from the past and ensures there is no future birth in the womb.

What was condemned by the scriptures has become venerable by the Name alone. Says Tuka, such is the seal of the Name upon all three worlds.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The saving power of the name is set down in the Puranas. It burns away great sins behind you. It leaves no birth in the womb ahead of you. What the scriptures condemned has become worthy of worship by the name alone. Tuka says: such is the seal of the name upon all three worlds.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram puts the name above the very texts that rank and condemn. The Puranas attest its saving power, yet the name does something the law could not: it lifts a person the scriptures had cast down and makes that person venerable. So the name overturns the verdict of caste and code, not by argument but by its own force. Past sin is burned, future rebirth cut off. He calls it a seal stamped across all three worlds, an authority nothing can revoke.

The Name, free and open to all

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Taking the Name costs nothing; the Name-mantra is not obscure. It is the work of just two syllables: say Rama, Rama.

There is no high or low station before the Name; all are equal in it. Says Tuka, the Name is pure consciousness, the true abode.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Taking the name costs nothing. The name-mantra is not hidden or hard. It is the work of just two syllables: say Rama, Rama. Before the name there is no high birth and no low one; in it, all are equal, all pass through. Tuka says: the name is pure consciousness, the true home.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers the world's gatekeeping with the cheapness of the name. It asks no fee, no secret initiation, no scholarship; two syllables are the whole practice. Then he names the stake plainly: before the name, the ranks of birth, high and low, simply do not hold. Everyone enters equally. And the name is not a mere sound pointing elsewhere; he calls it pure consciousness itself, the true abode, so that to take the name is already to stand where God lives.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Has anyone ever heard of the Name being taken in vain? I ask you humbly, O saints, sages, and perfected ones. Show me a single person who was not saved by the Name.

Says Tuka, forgive these frank words spoken out of familiarity.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Has anyone ever heard of the name being taken in vain? I ask you humbly: O saints, O great ones, O perfected souls, O sages, tell me. Show me one single person whom the name did not save. Tuka says: forgive these frank words; I speak them out of nearness to you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns his certainty into a challenge and lays it before the whole company of the holy. He is not asking whether the name works; he is daring anyone, even the greatest, to produce a single soul it ever failed. The silence is the proof. The closing line softens the boldness without taking it back: he asks pardon for speaking so plainly, calling it the frankness of one who feels close enough to press the question. The familiarity is real; so is the claim.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Loot this free treasure, the essence of all. Become immortal forever.

There will be no more birth in the womb; mountains of sin will burn to ash. Take abundantly, with abundant devotion; sing the Name with love.

Says Tuka, right here in your own home, without tiring yourself wandering to distant lands.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Loot this free treasure, the heart of everything. Become deathless, for all time. There is no more birth in the womb ahead of you; the mountains of your sins burn to ash. Take of it abundantly, with abundant love; sing the name with longing. Tuka says: right here, at home in your own house, with no wearing yourself out wandering to far countries.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram throws open a treasury and tells the listener to plunder it, because it costs nothing and is the essence of all. He names what is gained: deathlessness, the end of rebirth, sins burned away like mountains turned to ash. The instruction is simple and large at once: take much, love much, sing with longing. And the last line removes the final excuse: no pilgrimage to distant lands is required. The whole treasure is reachable at home, on your own lips.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A queen who has fallen out of the king's favor is still his wife, and her authority over the realm remains. Similarly, even if we have become devotees merely in outward appearance, the messengers of Yama will not look our way.

Even a prince who commits offense cannot be punished by outsiders. Says Tuka, there may be seventy-two faults in him, yet the gem of God's Name hangs at his throat.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A queen who has lost the king's love is still his wife, and her power over the realm still holds. So even if I have become a devotee only in show, the messengers of Yama do not look my way. A king's son who does wrong cannot be punished by outsiders. Tuka says: there may be seventy-two faults in him, yet the jewel of God's name hangs at his throat; so he belongs to the Lord of the worlds.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses an uncomfortable comfort: belonging counts even when the love has gone cold and the conduct is poor. The fallen queen keeps her standing because she is the king's; the wayward prince is beyond outsiders' punishment because he is the king's son. By the same logic, one who wears God's name, even a hypocrite full of faults, is shielded from Yama's agents, because the name marks him as God's own. He is not excusing the seventy-two faults; he is saying that the claim of belonging, the jewel at the throat, is stronger than the flaws, and the one who wears it is the Lord's to deal with, no one else's.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Either grant deliverance or let me accept defeat; just be firm in one word, O God. By Your decisive answer, my doubt will be resolved; everything rests at the root of Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Either lift me up or let me lose; just be firm in one word, O God. When You decide, my doubt will be gone; everything rests at the root of Your feet. I stay stuck, and I cannot understand anything. I do not know whose time is dark and whose fortune is rising.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is done with suspense and asks God simply to settle it. Save him or let him be defeated, he says, but speak one firm word, because the not-knowing is worse than either outcome. He admits the whole matter lies at God's feet, not in his own hands. Then he names his real condition: stuck, baffled, unable to read his own situation, unsure whether this is his dark hour or the turn toward fortune. The prayer is for a verdict, any verdict, to end the limbo.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Says Tuka, my jiva is greatly distressed. I plead for mercy, O God-King.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Tuka says: my soul is greatly troubled. I plead for mercy, O God-King.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the bare cry that closes a prayer. Tukaram drops all argument and reports his state: the jiva is deeply distressed. He asks for one thing, mercy, and addresses God as King, the one with the power to grant it. Short as it is, it holds the whole posture of surrender, a soul at the end of its own resources turning the matter over to God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Face whatever comes with equanimity, placing the burden upon God. Then that Ocean of Mercy will remove all difficulties.

What can a poor wretch do otherwise? When fear fills the chitta and mountains of sorrow surround you, it is good to take refuge in God. Says Tuka, is there anything He cannot do? Now think upon the Sustainer of all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever comes to be borne, meet it ready, and lay the weight on God. Then that Ocean of Mercy will clear the trouble away. What can a poor helpless soul do otherwise? When fear fills you and heaps of sorrow close in, it is good to go for refuge to God. Tuka says: is there anything He cannot do? Now think on Him, the Sustainer of all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram offers a practice for hard times: accept what comes and hand its weight to God, who, being an ocean of mercy, will remove the difficulty. He is honest about why, because on your own you are a helpless wretch who can do nothing. When fear and piled-up sorrow surround you, refuge is the wise move, not the weak one. The closing question is the ground of the whole counsel: there is nothing the Sustainer of all cannot do, so turn your thought to Him now.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Nothing happens without the fruition of past karma. Therefore, keep the mind at peace.

For this reason, do not harbor grief. Repeat the name of Govinda at every moment.

There is no need to be angry with many others; nothing comes apart from one's own accumulated deeds. Says Tuka, once the burden is placed upon Him, Narayana becomes your champion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

No experience comes to you except by your past deeds; so keep the mind at peace. For this reason, do not hold grief in the heart. Say Govinda's name again and again. There is no need to be angry at so many others; nothing reaches you apart from what you yourself have stored up. Tuka says: once the weight is laid upon Him, Narayana becomes your defender.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram gives a settled way to carry the world. Whatever befalls you is the ripening of your own past karma, so let the mind rest rather than rage. From this he draws two practical moves: refuse grief, and keep Govinda's name on the tongue. He also cuts off blame; since nothing comes except from your own store of deeds, anger at others is misplaced. And he adds the turn that makes acceptance more than fatalism: hand the burden to Narayana, and God himself takes up your side as champion.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Be free of enmity toward all beings. This alone is the best of spiritual practices.

Only then will Narayana accept you. Without this, all talk is mere weariness.

Let friends and foes be treated equally. Let the mind be drawn only to that which benefits others.

Says Tuka, only when the mind is truly purified does everything one has done bear fruit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Be without enmity toward every living being. This alone is the good practice, the one that matters. Only then will Narayana take you as His own; without it, all the chatter is just weariness. Let friend and slanderer count the same to you; let the mind lean only toward helping others. Tuka says: only when the mind has become clean does everything you have done bear fruit. Then powers and attainments come to your door and make their show. But for the sake of honor and display, the bond with God is broken. Tuka says: how can there be any sweetness in fruit picked by force.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names the one practice he will rank above all others: freedom from enmity toward every being. Without it, he says, the rest is noise that only tires you, and God will not own you; with it, Narayana accepts you. The test is concrete, treat the one who praises you and the one who slanders you alike, and bend the mind toward others' good. Only such a cleaned mind makes all your past effort finally fruitful. He then warns of the trap that follows success: when powers and attainments arrive, using them for honor and display snaps the bond with God. The closing image lands it, fruit seized by force has no sweetness; what is taken for show is no longer a gift from God.

Metaphor, the mind tempered in fire

मराठी मूळ

तापल्यावांचून नव्हे अळंकार । पिटूनियां सार उरलें तें ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे मन करावें पाठेळ । साहावे चि जाळ सिजेवरि ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Without heating in the fire, no ornament can be fashioned. Only what survives the hammering endures.

Once tested, the pure essence never degrades; enemies are turned into friends. One should allow the gross to be consumed by experience.

That which is refined endures and is freed from disease. Says Tuka, make the mind as tough as leather. Endure the burning until it is fully cooked.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Without being heated, gold becomes no ornament; only what survives the hammering is left. Once tested, the pure kind never spoils; what was an enemy turns into a friend. Let the body spend its given experience to the full; what is so consumed slips free of disease. Tuka says: make the mind tough as leather. Bear the burning until you are fully cooked.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the goldsmith's fire to explain why suffering is not punishment but making. Gold cannot become an ornament without being heated and hammered; only the part that endures the blows remains and becomes the true shape. Once it has passed through the fire, the pure metal no longer degrades, and what attacked it now serves it. So with a life: let experience burn through you completely, and what is consumed lets you go free. The closing instruction is stark, make the mind as tough as leather and endure the burning to the end, because only the fully cooked is finished.

The seasoning of the self, blows that ripen

मराठी मूळ

आपणां आपण हे चि कसवटी । हर्षामर्ष पोटीं विरों द्यावें ॥ध्रु.॥
नवनीत तोंवरी कडकडी लोणी । निश्चळ होऊनी राहे मग ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जरी जग टाकी घाया । त्याच्या पडे पायां जन मग ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

While the hide is being cured, it cannot withstand the wind. But once toughened, the ox bears the sack without complaint.

Test yourself against yourself. Let joy and sorrow dissolve within.

Butter churns and hardens from the curd. Once it becomes still, it stays firm.

Says Tuka, if the world beats you with blows, the world will fall at your feet in the end.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the hide is still being cured, it cannot bear even the wind. Once it has toughened, the ox carries the loaded sack and does not complain. You are your own touchstone. Let joy and resentment dissolve inside you. Butter sputters and crackles out of the curd; once it grows still, it stays firm. Tuka says: if the world beats you with blows, then in the end the world falls at your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers the soul that flinches at every hardship by pointing to how things are made strong. Raw hide tears in the wind, but once cured it carries the heavy sack; butter forms only after the curd is churned and then settles into something firm. So the self is tested against itself, and the test is whether joy and resentment can be let go rather than clung to. The blows of the world are not the enemy here; they are the curing and the churning. The one who lets them dissolve pride and irritation is the one the world will finally honor.

तुका ह्मणे विष सांडूं नेणे साप । आदरें तें पाप त्याचे ठायीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Jaundice knows no gratitude or kindness; its inner darkness remains a defilement. Similarly, the life of wicked wealth is impure.

Its speech is foul and filthy. No amount of preparation can make a bitter gourd palatable; one who consumes it gets only a headache.

Says Tuka, a snake cannot abandon its venom; sin is inherent in its very nature.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Jaundice has no gratitude and gives no kindness; its darkness stays inside as a stain. So too the life lived on wicked wealth is foul. Its speech is filthy and unclean. No amount of cooking makes a bitter gourd sweet; eat it and you get only a splitting head. Tuka says: a snake does not know how to give up its venom. Sin sits at home in such a one, honored there.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing a pattern that does not change from the outside, not condemning a person beyond hope. Jaundice tints everything it touches; a bitter gourd stays bitter however carefully you prepare it; a snake carries its venom by its very nature. He uses these to name a way of living that is rooted in ill-gotten gain and foul speech: dress it up however you like, the inner stain remains. The warning is meant to be turned inward, so a listener checks whether the rot is being carried within rather than merely cooked over. Where harm is held as a guest and made welcome, no surface remedy reaches it.

GATHA 2395 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, the profit that cannot be lost

मराठी मूळ

मग न लगे पारखी। अवघीं सकट सारखीं । तुका ह्मणे वोळे । रूपें भुलविले डोळे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

True profit cannot be lost. There is no obstacle to this meeting.

It travels to every land, yet remains exactly as it is. Then no appraiser is needed; all vessels measure the same.

Says Tuka, His forms enchant the eyes.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The true profit cannot be lost. There is no obstacle to this meeting. It goes to every land, and here it stays just as it is. Then no appraiser is needed; every vessel measures the same. Tuka says: it overflows. His forms have charmed my eyes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is speaking from experience about a gain unlike any worldly one. Ordinary profit can be lost, blocked, or weighed differently by each appraiser; this profit cannot be lost, faces no obstacle to the meeting, and remains the same wherever it goes. Because it is one and full everywhere, no expert is needed to assay it and every measure comes out equal. The poem ends in wonder rather than argument: it overflows, and God's forms have so charmed the eyes that the seeker no longer counts the gain at all.

GATHA 2396 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, go to Pandharpur

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Ask no more questions now; seek rest without delay. Go quickly to Pandharpur.

He is the true kinsman of the wretched. Do not get entangled in the snare of words; take refuge in God directly.

Says Tuka, the Compassionate One has great care for the lowly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Ask no more questions now; rest quickly. Go at once to Pandharpur. He is the kinsman of the helpless. Do not get tangled in words; go straight and take refuge in God. Tuka says: the Compassionate One cares greatly for the lowly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram urges someone to stop deliberating and act. The endless questions and clever talk are themselves the snare; what is needed is to set them down and go directly to Pandharpur, to Vitthal. The reason given is the only one that matters: God is the kinsman of the wretched and carries great care for the lowly. Refuge, not reasoning, is the path he points to, and he tells the listener to take it without delay.

GATHA 2397 Prayers

Prayer, do not pass us over

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O God, do not disregard the dull-witted and the inert jivas. Hear this petition from us, Your lowly servants.

Those who have come contemplating Your feet, will You deceive them? Says Tuka, O Supreme Being, forgive our transgressions.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O God, do not pass over the dull-witted and the inert souls. Hear this petition of ours, Your lowly servants. Those who have come thinking of Your feet, will You cheat them? Tuka says: O Supreme Being, forgive our wrongs.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays on behalf of the slow and the spiritually inert, the ones least able to plead for themselves. He asks God not to overlook them and to hear the petition of His lowly servants. His leverage is God's own character: those who have come holding His feet in mind cannot be deceived by Him. So the prayer ends by simply asking the Supreme to forgive the transgressions, trusting that mercy, not merit, is what answers.

GATHA 2398 Prayers

Prayer, the treasury is in Your hands

मराठी मूळ

ह्मणऊनि काकुळती । येतों पुढतों पुढती । तुह्मां असे हातीं । कमळापती भांडार ॥1॥
फेडूं आलेती दरिद्र । तरी न लगे उशीर । पुरे अभयंकर । ठाया ठाव रंकाशी ॥ध्रु.॥
कोठें न घली धांव । याजसाठीं तजिली हांव । घेऊं नेदी वाव । मना केला विरोध ॥2॥
कारणांच्या गुणें । वेळ काळ तोही नेणें । तुमच्या कीर्तनें । तुका तुह्मां जागवी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Therefore I come again and again with folded hands. The treasury is in Your keeping, O Lord of Lakshmi.

We have come to end our poverty; then let there be no delay. Grant us a place of fearlessness.

We run nowhere else; for this reason, we have abandoned all craving. We do not allow the mind any room for resistance.

Says Tuka, by Your own kirtan, I keep calling You awake at every hour and season.

IN PLAIN WORDS

So I come pleading again and again. The treasury is in Your hands, O Lord of Lakshmi. We have come to end our poverty; then do not delay. It is enough, Giver of fearlessness, to grant the destitute a place to stand. We run nowhere else; for this I have given up all craving. I let the mind take no room to resist. By the power of the need, He forgets even time and season. Tuka says: with Your own kirtan, Tuka keeps You awake.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram comes back to God again and again because the whole treasury is in God's keeping; the poverty he wants ended is spiritual, and the gift he asks for the destitute is a place to stand and freedom from fear. He has cut off every other refuge and craving, and he refuses to let his own mind argue him out of this dependence. The closing image is bold and tender: the urgency of the need pulls God past all sense of the right time, and Tuka, through ceaseless kirtan, keeps singing until he rouses the Lord himself. It is prayer as loving insistence, not polite request.

GATHA 2399 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the many names and the one sweetness

मराठी मूळ

बहु नांवें ठेविलीं स्तुतीचे आवडी । बहुत या गोडी आली रसा ॥1॥
बहु सोसें सेवन केलें बहुवस । बहु आला दिस गोमटएाचा ॥ध्रु.॥
बहुतां पुरला बहुतां उरला । बहुतांचा केला बहु नट ॥2॥
बहु तुका जाला निकट वृत्ती । बहु काकुलती येऊनियां॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Many names have been given to You out of the pleasure of praise. Such sweetness has come into this nectar.

Many have served You abundantly and with great devotion. A beautiful day has dawned.

You have sufficed for many, outlasted many, and entertained many as a great actor. Says Tuka, I have drawn very near, coming with earnest supplication.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Many names have been given to You out of the love of praise; great sweetness has come into this nectar. With much longing and in many ways You have been served; a beautiful day has dawned. You have been enough for many, have outlasted many, and have played the great actor for many. Tuka says: Tuka has drawn very near to You, coming with much pleading.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is delighting in how the one God answers to countless names, each given out of the sheer pleasure of praising Him, and how all that praise has turned into a single sweetness, a nectar. He sees that God has been served by many in many ways, and that this devotion has ripened into a good day. The one God is enough for all, outlasts all, and plays His many roles like a great actor on the stage of the world. For himself, Tuka claims only that through earnest pleading he has at last come close.

GATHA 2400 Renunciation

Renunciation, a guest in this world

मराठी मूळ

येहलोकीं आह्मां वस्तीचें पेणें । उदासीन तेणें देहभावीं॥1॥
कार्यापुरतें कारण मारगीं । उलंघूनि वेगीं जावें स्थळा ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे वेंच लाविला संचिता । होइल घेतां लोभ कोणां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In this world, our stay is but a temporary shelter. We are therefore detached from bodily existence.

For the journey, only what is needed; one must cross over quickly to the true destination. We carry on worldly transactions as a formality, a performance; there is no deep attachment to it all.

Says Tuka, we have set our accumulated karma to spend itself. Let anyone take it who wishes; what should we covet?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In this world our stay is only a night's lodging. So we are detached from the sense of being the body. On the road we take only what the journey needs, and cross over quickly to our true place. We carry on our affairs as a performance, a costume kept up; there is no deep attachment in it. Tuka says: I have set my stored-up karma to spend itself. Let anyone take it who wishes; what is there to covet?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram treats this life as an overnight stop, not a home, and so loosens his grip on the body and its claims. A traveler carries only what the road requires and hurries on to the real destination; in the same way he keeps up his worldly dealings as a kind of costume, going through the motions without clinging to them. He has decided to let his accumulated karma simply burn off rather than hoard or guard it. The closing question, what is there to covet, is the whole stance: when the stay is brief and the self is not the body, there is nothing here worth grasping.

GATHA 2401 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, liberation tied in the bundle

मराठी मूळ

साकरेचें नाम घेतां कळे गोडी । तैसी आह्मां जोडी वैष्णवांची ॥1॥
मोक्ष गांठी असे ठेविला बांधोनी । सोस तो भजनीं आवडीचा ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे आह्मी देहउपकारें । गाऊं निरंतर नाचों लागों ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even by just saying the name 'sugar,' one can recall its sweetness. Such is the gain we find in the company of Vaishnavas.

Liberation lies tied up and ready in our bundle, yet our real longing is for the delight of devotion itself. A mother worries about feeding her child, but we children care only for play.

Says Tuka, as a service to this body, we sing, dance, and devote ourselves ceaselessly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Just saying the word 'sugar' lets you taste its sweetness; such is the gain we have in the company of Vaishnavas. Liberation lies tied and ready in our bundle, but our real longing is for the joy of devotion. A mother frets over feeding her child, but our minds are set only on play. Tuka says: as a use for this body, we sing without stopping and we fall to dancing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says the company of the devotees is so full that even speaking of it carries its sweetness, the way the word sugar already brings the taste to mind. Liberation, the thing others strive for, is already tied up and waiting in his bundle, so he no longer hungers for it; his whole longing is for the delight of devotion itself. Like children absorbed in play while the mother worries about their meals, the devotees leave the matter of release to God and care only for the singing and dancing. He ends by naming the body's true purpose: to sing the Name ceaselessly and to dance.

GATHA 2402 The Saints

The saints, the final audit

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे नाहीं पापपुण्य खतीं । झाडएाची हुजती हातां आली ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The distinct paths of the three kinds of action have been sorted and their places shown. What has come and what has settled is evident.

The saints carry within them grace and honor. What is established by honest reckoning is the authority for all; no alternative can prevail against it.

Says Tuka, there is no sin or merit on the ledger; the final audit has come into our hands.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The different fruits of the three kinds of action have been sorted out and each one's place has been shown. What has come due and what still stands is made clear. The joy and the honor rest in the bodies of the saints. What the honest reckoning brings is the measure for all; nothing else can pass there. Tuka says: there is no sin or merit left on the ledger; the closing of the account has come into our hands.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks of a settling of spiritual accounts. The fruits of the three kinds of action have been separated and assigned, what is owed and what remains made plain, and the whole reckoning is honest, so no false claim can stand against it. The grace and honor of this settlement live in the bodies of the saints, who embody its truth. The freeing conclusion is that for the devotee the books are now clear of sin and merit alike: the final audit has been handed over and closed, and one is no longer bound by the old ledger of deeds.

GATHA 2403 Renunciation

Renunciation, only Your feet hold still

मराठी मूळ

करूं जातां सन्निधान । क्षणि जन पालटे ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे केला त्याग । सर्वसंग ह्मणऊनि ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When you try to get close to people, they change in an instant. Therefore, O Mother Vitthal, Your feet alone are beautiful.

This truth has come through experience; one must test it at the cost of one's life. Says Tuka, that is why I have renounced all worldly attachments.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When you try to draw close to people, they change in an instant. Now Your feet alone are beautiful, O Mother Vitthal. This has come to me through experience; it must be tested at the cost of one's life. Tuka says: that is why I have renounced every attachment.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram has learned the unreliability of people the hard way: get close and they turn on you in a moment. Against that shifting ground he sets the one thing that does not change, the feet of Vitthal, whom he addresses tenderly as Mother. He insists this is not a borrowed idea but a truth proven through lived experience, the kind one tests with one's whole life. That proof is the reason he gives for letting go of every worldly attachment and resting only there.

GATHA 2404 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the wrong thing in the wrong place

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे नेणें समयो ठाया ठाव । राहाडी ते वाव नरकाडी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When milk is requested, he serves buttermilk instead; such is the conduct of a fool. Know the right occasion; do not put the wrong thing in the wrong place.

An impure tongue speaks auspicious words; what is unclean and inauspicious parades as sacred. Says Tuka, the one who does not know the proper time and place turns a shrine into a cesspool.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Ask him for milk and he serves you buttermilk; a fool earns such a name. Know the occasion, know the occasion; do not put the wrong thing in the wrong place. He makes an impure tongue speak the auspicious words; the foul and unclean is paraded as fine. Tuka says: the one who does not know the right time and place turns a holy shrine into a cesspool.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is warning against the failure to fit the act to the moment. Serving buttermilk when milk was asked, speaking sacred words with an unclean tongue, dressing up the foul as fine: each is the right thing put in the wrong place, or the wrong thing where the right belonged. The repeated call to know the occasion is the heart of it. He drives the point home with a sharp image: without that sense of time and place, even what should be a shrine is turned into filth, and the failing is meant to make the listener examine his own sense of what fits where.

GATHA 2405 Worldly Metaphors

Self-examination, the fault is your own

मराठी मूळ

विंचा पीडी नांगी । ज्याचा दोष त्याचे अंगीं ॥1॥

मधुरा उत्तरीं । रांवा खेळे उरावरी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे रेडा । सुखें जाती ऐशा पीडा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A scorpion stings with its own tail; its fault resides in its own body. One must reflect carefully; the mind can be both friend and accuser.

With sweet words, a cobra plays upon your chest. Says Tuka, a bull endures all such torments without complaint.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A scorpion stings with its own tail. Its poison is in its own body; the fault is its own. So you must reflect. The mind can be your friend, and the mind can be the one who accuses you. With sweet words a snake will play upon your chest. Tuka says: a bull carries every such torment, and bears it without a sound.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the eye inward and names where harm really comes from. Like the scorpion whose poison is in its own body, what wounds you is carried in yourself, and the mind is the place to look: it can be a friend or it can turn into your accuser. He warns that danger comes dressed in sweetness; soft words can be a snake resting on your chest. The bull who bears every blow without complaint is held up not as a victim but as the one who learns to carry what comes, while the work of watching the mind goes on.

GATHA 2406 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the worth of remembrance

मराठी मूळ

तीथाअची अपेक्षा स्थळीं वाढे धर्म । जाणावें तें वर्म बहु पुण्य ॥1॥
बहु बरी ऐसी भाविकांची जोडी । काळ नाहीं घडी जात वांयां ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे ऐसे परउपकारी । त्यांच्या पायांवरी डोई माझी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

At sacred places, the desire for merit increases; know this to be the secret of great virtue. Blessed indeed is the fortune of the devout; not a single moment of theirs goes to waste.

One who contemplates and inspires others to do so earns a name that echoes across the world. Says Tuka, my head is upon the feet of such selfless benefactors.

IN PLAIN WORDS

At holy places the longing for merit grows. Know this secret: there is great virtue in it. The company of the faithful is good indeed; for them not a single moment is wasted. One who remembers God, and leads others to remember too, earns a name across the world. Tuka says: such people live for the good of others. My head rests upon their feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praising the inward worth of pilgrimage and good company, not the outward show. The pull toward merit at a sacred place is itself a sign pointing to something deeper: that no moment among the faithful is ever wasted. The real saint is the one who not only remembers God but draws others into that remembrance, and so leaves a name that carries through the world. Tukaram ends by bowing his own head at the feet of these people who live for the good of others, making their service, not their fame, the thing he honors.

GATHA 2407 Ecstasy and Joy

Fearlessness after surrender

मराठी मूळ

भयाची तों आह्मां चिंत्तीं । राहो खंती सकेना ॥1॥
समपिनलों जीवें भावें । काशा भ्यावें कारणें ॥ध्रु.॥
करीन तें कवतुकें। अवघें निकें शोभेल ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे माप भरूं । दिस सारूं कवतुकें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We once harbored fear and anxiety within us, but that distress cannot remain any longer. We have surrendered with body and jiva.

What cause is there now for fear? Whatever I do, I shall do it as a joyful game; everything will turn out well. Says Tuka, I shall fill the measure and pass the days in playful delight.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Once fear and worry lived in my mind. Now that grief cannot stay. I have given myself away, life and heart. What is left to be afraid of, and why? Whatever I do, I will do it as play, and all of it will turn out well. Tuka says: I will fill the measure full. I will pass my days in delight.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes what happens on the far side of surrender: fear loses its place to stand. Having handed over his very life and heart, he finds the old anxiety can no longer remain, because there is nothing left of his own to defend. From here even action changes character; what he does he does as play, trusting that it will come out well. The closing image of filling the measure full and spending his days in delight names the new tone of a life no longer ruled by dread, but lived lightly in God's keeping.

GATHA 2408 The Nature of God

The Name, God comes running

मराठी मूळ

पाचारितां धावे । ऐसी ठायींची हे सवे ॥1॥
बोले करुणा वचनीं । करी कृपा लावी स्तनीं ॥ध्रु.॥
जाणे कळवळा । भावसिद्धींचा जिव्हाळा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नाम । मागें मागें धांवे प्रेम॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When called, He comes running; that is His nature from the very beginning. He speaks words of compassion, He bestows grace, He nurses like a mother.

He knows the innermost yearning, the living warmth of a devotion fulfilled from within. Says Tuka, when the Name is uttered, love comes running close behind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When you call him, he comes running. That has been his way from the very start. He speaks words of mercy; he shows kindness; he holds you to the breast like a mother. He knows your inmost ache, the warmth of a love made true from within. Tuka says: when the Name is spoken, love comes running close behind.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the nature of God as a mother who cannot help but come. Calling is enough; God's settled habit is to run to the one who cries out, to speak tenderly and to nurse the soul at the breast. What moves him is not ritual correctness but the inner ache of genuine devotion, which he reads exactly. The last line lands the claim:

utter the Name and you do not get the Name only, for love itself comes running right behind it.

GATHA 2409 Confession and Sin

Confession, the sin of sloth

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे मन । कळवळी वाटे सीण ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why, O Lord, have You placed laziness in my jiva? What greater harm could there be? It obstructs my contemplation of You. The body-worshipping intellect has wrought this ruin.

Says Tuka, the mind trembles and feels great pain.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why, Lord, have you set this laziness in my heart? What greater harm could there be than this? It blocks me from remembering you. The mind that worships the body has done this ruin. Tuka says: my mind aches, and I feel the pain of it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a confession that treats sloth as no small flaw but as the gravest harm, because it stands between him and the remembrance of God. He half blames the Lord for placing it in him, then names the true source: an intellect that takes the body and its comfort as the self, and so will not bestir itself toward God. The poem points the accusation at this pattern of body-clinging laziness rather than at any other person. He ends not with excuse but with felt pain, the ache of a mind that knows it is failing the one thing that matters.

तुका ह्मणे जाणवलें । आह्मां भलें एवढेंच॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The longing in my jiva for Your darshan is immense, O God. Now do what You see fit; what can be lacking for the Sustainer of the world? If worry remains even after this, what greater benefactor could there be? Says Tuka, I have made my plea. This much is enough for us.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The longing to see you, Lord, has built up huge in my heart. Now do whatever you know is best. What can be lacking for the One who holds up the world? If worry is still left after this, then who is a greater giver than you? Tuka says: I have made my plea. For us, this much is enough.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram brings a deep ache for God's sight and then lays the whole matter down at God's feet. Having confessed how strong the longing has grown, he refuses to dictate terms and asks only that God do what God knows to be right. His reasoning is simple trust: the Sustainer of all worlds can lack nothing, so if any worry still remains, the fault cannot be in God's power to give. The closing line marks the limit of the devotee's part: he has spoken his need, and that is all that is asked of him; the rest belongs to God.

Intimacy, the Mother is never cold

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I may sit with my back turned and act as my mind pleases. But You know the love within; You are the Mother to many children.

Each wants to ask according to his own desire and need. Says Tuka, You are not indifferent, O Mother Vithabai.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I may sit with my back turned to you and do as my mind pleases. But you know the love inside me. You are the Mother of many children. Each one asks for what he wants, in his own way and as he needs. Tuka says: you are never cold to me, Mother Vithabai.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from the freedom of a child who can sulk and turn away and still be sure of the mother's heart. Even when he sits with his back turned and follows his own moods, he knows God reads the love hidden underneath the behavior. He pictures Vitthal as a mother to countless children, each of whom comes with his own clamor and his own particular need, and none of whom is turned away. The poem rests on the certainty named at the end: Mother Vithabai is never indifferent, whatever the child does.

GATHA 2412 The Nature of God

Nature of God, all-seeing, all-hearing

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The Sustainer of the world overflows with many hands, ears, and eyes. Wherever He is, He sees; whatever is asked, He hears.

Whatever seems sweet to the chitta, He fulfills that desire. Says Tuka, He never allows any break in the meeting.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The Sustainer of the world overflows. He has many hands, many ears, many eyes. Wherever he is, he sees. Whatever is asked, he hears. Whatever seems sweet to you, that longing he fulfills. Tuka says: once he meets you, he lets nothing break the meeting.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a God whose presence and attention have no edges. The image of many hands, ears, and eyes says that there is nowhere God does not see and no cry God does not hear. This God reaches into the heart's own preferences, fulfilling the very desire that seems sweet to the devotee rather than imposing something foreign. The final claim is one of constancy: once the meeting between God and soul has happened, God will not let it be cut off, so the relationship is kept unbroken from his side.

Ecstasy, beyond sin and merit

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे येथें पाहिजे सौरस । तुह्मांविण रस गोड नव्हे॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My throat chokes and tears stream from my eyes; an endless rain of Your virtues pours from above. In that joy and devotion, I shall take my celebration, having become free of both sin and merit.

May Your enchantment make me forget all that came before. I shall make my throat sing sweetly in melodious verse.

Says Tuka, what I need here is intimacy. Without You, no sweetness is truly sweet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My throat chokes, tears stream from my eyes. An endless rain of your virtues pours down on me. In that joy I will take up the festival, having become free of both sin and merit. Let your love make me forget all that came before. I will tune my throat and sing you sweetly. Tuka says: what I need here is closeness. Without you, no sweetness is sweet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is caught in the bodily signs of devotional rapture: choked throat, streaming tears, the felt downpour of God's qualities. In that flood he speaks of rising past both sin and merit, not by license but because absorption in God leaves the old ledger of good and bad deeds behind. He prays for God's love to wash away all his former memory and to turn his throat into an instrument of sweet song. The poem ends by naming what alone makes any of this real: intimacy with God, for apart from God no pleasure has any sweetness at all.

GATHA 2414 Longing and Separation

Longing, arms held open

मराठी मूळ

पसरूनि राहिलों बाहो । सोयी अहो तुमचिये ॥1॥
आतां यावें लागवेगें । पांडुरंगे धांवत ॥ध्रु.॥
बैसायाची इच्छा कडे। चाली खडे रुपताती ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कृपाळुवा । करीन सेवा लागली ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have spread my arms wide, facing Your direction. Now come quickly, O Panduranga, come running.

I long to sit on Your lap; my feet stumble upon the rough stones of the path. Says Tuka, O Merciful One, the longing for Your service has taken hold of me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I stand with my arms spread wide, turned toward you. Now come quickly, Panduranga, come running. I long to sit upon your lap; the path's sharp stones cut into my feet. Tuka says: O Merciful One, the longing for your service has taken hold of me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram paints himself as a child standing with arms flung open, facing God's direction and begging Panduranga to come at a run. The wish to be lifted onto God's lap is set against the pain of the road, the rough stones cutting his feet, which gives the longing its urgency. He is not asking for ease alone but for nearness and for the chance to serve. The closing line names the force driving the whole poem: a longing for God's service has gripped him, and he can only call the Merciful One to come.

GATHA 2415 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, settling the account with God

मराठी मूळ

आह्मी जालों एकविध । सुद्या सुदें असावें ॥1॥

घेतलें तें उसणें द्यावें । कांहीं भावें विशेषें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे क्रियानष्ट । तरी कष्ट घेतसां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We have become single-minded in our intent; let accounts be settled squarely. Beyond that, Your ways, O Gopala, are unfathomable.

What is borrowed must be repaid, and with some added devotion. Says Tuka, if You default on Your word, then You are the one who suffers the loss.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We have become single-minded toward you. Let what is plain be kept plain; let the account be settled straight. Beyond that, your ways, Gopala, no one can fathom. What was borrowed must be paid back, and with some added love. Tuka says: if you break your word, then it is you who bears the loss.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses his claim on God in the bold language of a debt to be settled. Having given God his whole single-minded heart, he asks for a straight reckoning, even while admitting that God's deeper ways are beyond anyone's grasp. The devotee's logic is that of a loan: what God has taken in love must be returned, and returned with interest of love. The closing line keeps the daring edge intact: if God should default on the bargain, the loss falls on God, for a Lord who fails his devotee damages his own name.

GATHA 2416 Longing and Separation

Longing, the complaint of the abandoned

मराठी मूळ

आह्मी आर्तभूत जिवीं । तुह्मी गोसावी तों उदास॥1॥
वादावाद समर्थाशीं । काशानशीं करावा ॥ध्रु.॥
आह्मी मरों वेरझारीं। स्वामी घरीं बैसले ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे करितां वाद । कांहीं भेद कळेना॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We are desperate and yearning within us, while You, O Lord, sit in comfortable detachment. What is the point of arguing with the Capable One? We are perishing out in the wilderness while the Master sits comfortably at home.

Says Tuka, the more I argue, the less I understand any difference.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We are aching and desperate inside. You, Lord, sit untouched and at ease. What is the use of arguing with the All-powerful? We are dying out in the wilderness while the Master sits at home. Tuka says: the more I argue, the less I can see any difference it makes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram voices the raw complaint of one who suffers while God seems calm and far off. He sets the burning, desperate heart of the devotee against the Lord who sits in untroubled comfort, and admits how unequal the contest is: what can a helpless soul gain by quarreling with the All-powerful? The image of perishing in the wilderness while the Master stays safe at home gives the grievance its sting. Yet the poem ends in honest exhaustion rather than resolution, confessing that all the arguing changes nothing he can see, which is itself a kind of surrender wrung out of longing.

GATHA 2417 The Necessity of Experience

Self-inquiry, words against the root

मराठी मूळ

येर वाग्जाळ मायेचा अहंकार । वचनाशीं थार अज्ञान तें ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे अवघे गव्हांचे प्रकार । सोनें अलंकार मिथ्या नांव ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Ask yourself, within yourself, having emptied the ego. All other verbal webs are the ego of Maya.

Such wordiness is a shelter for ignorance. The fruit is the seed, and the seed is the fruit; at the root, the names change nothing.

Says Tuka, all are forms of wheat. Gold and its ornaments bear different names, but the substance is one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Ask the thing where it lives, in yourself, by yourself. First empty out the ego. Everything else is a tangle of words; it is the ego of Maya. Such wordiness is only a hiding place for ignorance. The fruit is the seed, and the seed is the fruit. The names change, but the root does not change. Tuka says: it is all forms of wheat. Gold and its ornaments carry different names, but the substance is one; the names are false.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is telling the seeker where the real question gets answered and what blocks it. The answer lies within, but only after the ego has been set aside; as long as it remains, all the clever talk is just Maya wearing the mask of words, a shelter where ignorance can hide. He drives the point home with two images. Fruit and seed are one thing under two names, and gold stays gold whether you call it a bangle or a chain; the labels shift while the substance never does. So he is warning against mistaking the changing names for the unchanging reality, and against using argument as a substitute for emptying the self.

GATHA 2418 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the holy claim on God

मराठी मूळ

माझी आतां सत्ता आहे । तुह्मां पायां हे वरती ॥1॥
एकाविण नेणें दुजा । पंढरिराजा सर्वांगें ॥ध्रु.॥
पुरवावी केली आळी । जे जे काळीं मागण तें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे सुटसी कैसा । धरूनि दिशा राहिलों ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My authority now rests entirely at Your feet. I know no one else but You, O King of Pandhari, with my whole being.

Fulfill whatever plea I make, at every turn. Says Tuka, how will You escape me? I have taken my position in every direction.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now I hold a right; it rests here, upon Your feet. I know no second one. O King of Pandhari, You fill my whole being. Grant the demand I have made, whatever I ask, whenever I ask it. Tuka says: how will You get free of me? I have taken hold of every direction, and there I stay.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns surrender into a kind of loving siege. Because he knows no one but the King of Pandhari and has placed himself wholly at His feet, he claims that very surrender as a right: God now owes him an answer to every plea. The closing lines are playful and fierce at once; he has blocked every exit and asks how Vitthal could possibly escape him. The stakes are the devotee's confidence that total dependence is not weakness but a hold on God that He cannot shake off.

GATHA 2419 Longing and Separation

Longing, arrived at last to settle accounts

मराठी मूळ

फावलें तुह्मां मागें । नवतों लागें पावलों ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे धडफुडा । जालों झाडा देई देवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You had it easy before; I had not yet arrived. Now I have come.

Stand still and face me. I was caught up in household affairs, and speech could not flow freely.

Says Tuka, now I have become decisive. Give me a clear account, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You had it easy before, while I had not yet come; now I have arrived. Stand still and face me; let me see You close, before me. There were entanglements at home; the work kept me from speaking freely. Tuka says: now I have become plain and ready. I have come to settle the account. Give it to me, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks like a man who has finally cleared his obligations and arrived to face God directly. While he was tangled in household duties, God had it easy and could keep His distance; now that he has come, he asks Him to stand still and be seen face to face. He calls himself decisive and demands a clear reckoning, a settling of the account between them. The stakes are the moment of full presence: the devotee will no longer let domestic distraction or God's evasions postpone the meeting.

GATHA 2420 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, a child asking not to be tested

मराठी मूळ

आतां नये बोलों अव्हेराची मात । बाळावरि चित्त असों द्यावें ॥1॥
तुज कां सांगणें लागे हा प्रकार । परि हें उत्तर आवडीचें ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे मोहो राखावा सतंत । नये पाहों अंत पांडुरंगा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now do not speak words of neglect. Let Your attention remain upon this child.

Why should it be necessary to tell You this? Yet these words come from deep affection. Do not withhold anything, not even a single gesture.

Do not put distance between Yourself and me. Says Tuka, keep this loving bond perpetual, O Panduranga. Do not test my patience.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now do not speak words of neglect. Keep Your attention on this child. Why should I have to tell You this? Yet these are words of love. Do not hold back even one small thing from me; put no distance between Yourself and me. Tuka says: keep this bond of love unbroken always. Do not test me to the end, O Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pleads with God as a child pleads with a parent who might look away. He asks Vitthal not to speak of neglect and to keep watching over him, then admits that such a reminder should not even be necessary; it comes only from the ache of affection. He begs that nothing be withheld and no distance opened, and that the loving bond never be allowed to lapse. The closing line names the real fear: do not test my patience to its limit, for a soul this dependent cannot bear to be made to wait.

GATHA 2421 Devotion to Vitthal

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if I resolve to make the Self my only truth, the mind will not stay still. What can I do? Without actually eating, what is the value of a belch? The ways of words remain merely words.

Enough, enough of your Brahma-knowledge. We will not let go of His feet.

Conflict only breeds more conflict, endlessly. The womb of rebirth lies in the hands of lingering desire.

Merit and demerit cling to the body; bondage is the very name of mental resolve. Says Tuka, there is no such thing as easy, outright liberation. Who is powerful enough to truly transcend the body?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even if I resolve to make the Self alone my truth, the mind will not hold still. What can I do? Without eating, what is a belch worth? Words about words are only words. Enough, enough now of your Brahma-knowledge. We will not let go of His feet. Conflict only breeds more conflict, on and on. Rebirth in the womb lies in the hands of lingering desire. Merit and demerit cling to the body; mental resolve itself is the very name of bondage. Tuka says: there is no easy, ready-made liberation. Who is strong enough to truly be done with the body?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram refuses dry knowledge in favor of holding fast to God's feet. He grants that one may declare the Self the only reality, but the mind still will not settle, and he mocks talk without realization: a belch without a meal, words that are only more words. So he pushes the abstract Brahma-knowledge aside and clings to Vitthal instead. Then he names the trap honestly. Argument breeds more argument, desire keeps pulling the soul back into the womb, merit and demerit both stick to the body, and even the mind's resolve is itself a form of bondage. The stakes are sobering: liberation is not a cheap trick of thought, and almost no one is strong enough to be truly free of the body on their own. The unspoken conclusion is that only surrender to God's feet remains.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My tongue is not worthy of praising You. I place my head at Your feet.

If devotion were my destiny, I would offer even a tulsi leaf. With folded hands, I stand before You.

What fortune could bring me so close to You? I do not know how to observe proper form; I simply cry for mercy. At the end of the saints' feast, I wait, hoping for a taste of their leftover grace.

My one desire is that someone call me their own, even through a chance word. Says Tuka, having come to You in surrender, that is my spiritual practice. I contemplate You day and night.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My tongue is not worthy to praise You. I lay my head at Your feet. If devotion were my portion, I would offer even one tulsi leaf. With folded hands I stand before You. What fortune could let me come so near? I do not know how to keep the proper forms; I only cry for mercy. At the end of the saints' feast I wait, longing for a taste of their leftovers. My one wish is that someone call me their own, even by a chance word. Tuka says: I have come to You in surrender, and that is my whole practice. I think of You night and day.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram approaches God as one with nothing to offer but need. He confesses his tongue cannot praise worthily and he does not know the correct rituals; all he can do is bow and beg for mercy. He reaches not even for God directly but for the saints' leftovers, hoping a scrap of their grace might fall to him, and he aches for someone, anyone, to claim him as their own. The point is that surrender and ceaseless remembrance are themselves his only spiritual practice; he stakes everything on humility and the company of the holy rather than on his own worthiness.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In all our endeavors, this alone is what we have achieved: we have secured service at the Lord's feet. We never once looked back.

Every moment and every instant was conquered in the act. We allowed no entanglement of deliberation to delay us.

We did not let envy come from behind. We pressed forward with all urgency and speed, banishing every false impulse.

Where then was there time for leisure? Let the craving for worldly dealings burn. Says Tuka, the profit has been tucked safely in our garment. Now there is no entanglement of any kind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In all our striving, this alone is what we gained: we secured service at the Lord's feet. We never once looked back. Every moment, every instant, was won in the doing. We let no tangle of deliberation slow us down. We let no envy come at us from behind. We pressed forward with all haste and speed, and drove off every false impulse. Where then was there room for leisure? Let the craving for worldly dealings burn. Tuka says: the profit is tucked safe in the fold of our garment. Now there is no entanglement of any kind.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the seeking life as a single decisive transaction that has now paid off. The one gain worth having was service at God's feet, and it was won by refusing to look back, by moving fast, and by letting no second thought, no envy, no false feeling get in the way. He treats hesitation and worldly business as enemies and wishes the craving for them burned away. The closing image makes the win concrete: the profit is tucked safely into the fold of his garment, and the soul is now free of every entanglement. The stakes are wholehearted urgency: half-measures and deliberation lose what single-minded surrender secures.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

With this mouth, let me praise Your qualities and Name. Grant me that love, O God.

Let my eyes drink in the sight of Your face. Grant me that joy, O God.

Let my ears be filled with Your glory. Grant me that peace, O God.

Let my hands clap in rapture and my feet dance in abandon; give these limbs the strength to serve. Says Tuka, let my entire bodily existence be for this alone. Let my mind seek no other dwelling.

IN PLAIN WORDS

With this mouth let me speak Your qualities and Your Name. Grant me that love, O God. Let my eyes fill with the sight of Your face. Grant me that joy, O God. Let my ears be filled with Your glory. Grant me that rest, O God. Let me clap my hands in the rapture and dance free of all care; give my hands and feet that strength. Tuka says: let my whole bodily being be for this alone. Let my mind look for no other dwelling.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram offers God his entire body, sense by sense, asking that each be turned wholly toward Him. The mouth is for the Name, the eyes for His face, the ears for His glory, the hands and feet for clapping and dancing in worship; and for each he asks the matching gift of love, joy, rest, and strength. He does not want these senses for any other use. The closing lines name the stake: the whole bodily existence is to be devoted to God alone, and the mind is to seek no other home, so that nothing in him is left over for the world.

GATHA 2425 Surrender and Acceptance

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You are my mother and father, my entire wealth and kin. You alone are the one who ensures my welfare, O God.

You are my God, You are my life, You are my very devotion, O Panduranga. You are my conduct, You are my reflection, You carry my every burden.

In every way, You are my sole authority. I swear by You that this is so.

Says Tuka, I have sold You my life and jiva. Now do whatever You deem fit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You are my mother and father, all my wealth and kin. You alone are the one who works my good, O God. You alone are my God, You alone are my life, You alone are my devotion, O Panduranga. You are my conduct, You are my thought, You carry my every burden. In every way You are my one authority; this I swear by You. Tuka says: I have sold You my very life and self. Now do whatever You see fit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram empties himself of every other support and names God as all of them at once: parent, wealth, kin, life, devotion, conduct, even his own thinking. There is nothing left that he claims as his own doing; God carries the whole burden and is his single authority. The closing line completes the surrender as an absolute sale: he has handed over his life and self entirely, and tells Panduranga to do with him whatever He judges best. The stakes are total dependence, a soul with no fallback outside of God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I keep reminding You again and again. Hear the nature of my devotion.

Days once gone do not return; there is no counting on the future. Blows of fortune and misfortune strike constantly, making the mind restless.

I see no sign of Your support anywhere, and so the jiva has no courage. Says Tuka, You are the life of the universe. Then why must we keep pleading for Your compassion?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Again and again I keep reminding You. Hear the nature of my devotion. Days once gone do not come back; the future cannot be counted on. Blows of good and bad fortune keep falling, and the mind is left in distress. I see no sign of Your support anywhere, and so the jiva has no courage. Tuka says: You are the life of the whole universe. Then why must we keep begging You for Your compassion?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses his case to God with growing urgency, asking Him to hear how he truly feels. He names the pressure of time: spent days never return, the future is uncertain, and the constant strokes of fortune leave the mind in turmoil. Worst of all, he sees no visible sign of God's support, and without it the soul loses heart. The closing line carries a near-complaint with deep faith inside it: if God is the very life of the universe, it should not take so much begging to win His mercy. The stakes are the ache of a devotee who believes utterly yet feels left without any felt assurance.

GATHA 2427 The Power of the Name

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let all Your ways be as they are; why should I fret and argue? We know our own welfare. Your secret lies in Your own Name.

When I consider it, life is passing away to no purpose; day by day, one gets tangled further in the net of birth. I shall remain remembering Your feet and allow nothing else to enter my mind.

Says Tuka, You come here effortlessly when kirtan is performed; You have a great passion for it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let all Your ways be whatever they are; why should I make a fuss and argue? We know our own good. Your secret lies in Your own Name. When I think about it, life is wasting away to no purpose; day by day one gets tangled deeper in the net of birth. I will stay remembering Your feet and let nothing else enter my mind. Tuka says: You come here without effort when kirtan is sung. You have a great madness for it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram drops all argument about God's mysterious ways and goes straight for what works. He does not need to debate; he knows where his good lies, and the open secret of God is His own Name. He sees clearly that life slips away uselessly and that each day binds him further to the cycle of birth, so he resolves to keep his mind on God's feet alone. The closing line lands the claim with affectionate confidence: God comes effortlessly wherever His Name is sung, because He has a wild fondness for kirtan. The point is that the Name and the kirtan, not clever inquiry into God's conduct, are the sure path.

Complaint, the servant who still suffers

मराठी मूळ

विष्णुदासां भोग । जरी आह्मां पीडी रोग ॥1॥
तरि हें दिसे लाजिरवाणें । काय तुह्मांसी सांगणें ॥ध्रु.॥
आह्मां काळें खावें । बोलिलें तें वांयां जावें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे दास । आह्मी भोगूं गर्भवास ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If we who call ourselves servants of Vishnu are still afflicted by disease, then this is truly embarrassing. What need is there to tell You? If we must eat filth and our words go to waste, if we who claim to be Your servants must still endure the womb, then says Tuka, something is deeply amiss.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If we who are servants of Vishnu are still struck down by disease, then it looks shameful. What is there to say to You? If we must eat what is dark and bitter, then all that was spoken goes to waste. Tuka says: we are Your servants, and yet we go on suffering the womb of rebirth.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lodges a frank, almost reproachful complaint with God on behalf of His own devotees. If those who call themselves servants of Vishnu still fall sick, suffer hard portions, and keep being thrown back into the cycle of birth, then it makes both servant and master look bad. He is not doubting God so much as holding Him to His word: the promises made to devotees seem to go to waste if their lives differ so little from anyone else's. The stakes are the honor of the relationship itself; a servant's suffering reflects on the Lord he serves, and Tukaram is daring to say so out loud.

The simplest path to God

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sing the divine song with devotion, purifying the mind. If you truly want God, this is the simplest path.

Do not bring the faults and virtues of others into your mind through your ears. Bow your head low before the feet of the saints.

Spend only those words that bring peace to the chitta. Says Tuka, render service to others, whether great or small.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sing the song with love, and make your mind clean first. If you truly want God, this is the easy way. Do not let other people's faults and merits into your ears, and do not turn them over in your mind. Bow your head low at the feet of the saints. Spend only the words that leave the heart at peace. Tuka says: do others some good, even a little if not much.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out a path simple enough that no one can claim it is beyond them. Wanting God is the only requirement; the method is to sing with feeling, clean the mind, and stop letting gossip about who is good and who is bad take up room inside. He adds three small disciplines: bow low to the saints, speak only words that leave others at peace, and be useful to people even in small ways. The point is that devotion is not an elaborate technique but a few plain habits anyone can begin today.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Words do not cut the body, yet they pierce the inner being like a thunderbolt. Nothing else should be endured for any reason.

The body, that stronghold of doubt, is powerful. Words do not taste sharp in the mouth, nor do they make the belly heavy.

Says Tuka, if one can swallow the ego, Narayana takes up residence in the home.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A word does not cut the body, yet it pierces the inner being like a thunderbolt. This above all must not be endured; why even do such a thing? A sharp word leaves no taste in the mouth, and it does not make the belly heavy. Tuka says: if you can swallow your own ego, then Narayana comes to live in the house.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram weighs a harsh word and finds it both nothing and everything. It costs the speaker nothing, no taste on the tongue, no weight in the stomach, yet it strikes the listener's inmost being like a thunderbolt, so cruel speech is the one thing he says should never be inflicted. Then he turns the knife inward: the same tongue that wounds others is driven by ego. Swallow that ego, hold the sharp word back, and the house you have emptied of pride becomes a place where Narayana can dwell.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let no more deceit dwell in the chitta. Then whom would one need to beg? When the measure of truth is applied, no fraud can slip through.

Narayana is sweet from beginning to end. The truly clean one is untouched by pollution; the genuine naturally falls into the genuine mold.

The path of reflection is cool and restful. Before wisdom, brute strength is no more than a blade of grass.

Even the food one eats is digested and absorbed, but residual desire still lingers. Says Tuka, let me put the lock of silence on my lips. You are my Mother, O Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let no more deceit live in my heart now; then I will not have to beg anyone for help. When the measure of truth is used, no fraud passes through the knot. Narayana is sweet from beginning to end. The clean one takes no wound from pollution; the genuine settles into the genuine mould. The path I have thought through is cool and restful. Before clear understanding, brute strength is light as a blade of grass. The food I eat is digested and passes, but desire still stays behind. Tuka says: let me lock my lips in silence. You are my mother, Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes inner honesty the whole of his practice. Once deceit no longer lives in the heart, he owes nothing and need plead with no one; truth is a measure fine enough that no falsehood can slip through it, and the genuine soul slides naturally into the mould of the genuine. He notices that food is eaten and digested away, but craving outlasts the body, so the real work is on desire, not on the belly. The path of reflection he has chosen is cool and restful, and before clear understanding sheer force counts for nothing. He ends by asking for the lock of silence and calling Panduranga his mother, leaning on God the way a child leans, not as a strategy but as the last truth left.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

These are not my ornaments nor my wife's finery. Narayana has bestowed them as He saw fit.

Stringing words like garlands of gems, the original living warmth flows from the source. Within the layers of meaning lies the savor of direct experience; the ripened mind bears witness.

Says Tuka, the Infinite One has not allowed anything to remain unsettled for me. The voice speaks of the unspeakable through its beginning; it knows no bondage anywhere.

Darkness is destroyed, yet He stands apart from worldly transactions; the world moves by the sun's light. Says Tuka, here all excess has departed. Now the face should not show itself again.

IN PLAIN WORDS

These ornaments are not mine, nor my wife's finery; Narayana has given them as he thought fit. The words strung like garlands of gems flow from the living warmth at the source. Inside their meaning is the taste of real experience; the ripened mind is the witness. Tuka says: the Infinite One has left nothing unsettled for me. The voice speaks the unspeakable from the start, and knows no bondage anywhere. Darkness is destroyed, yet he stands apart from the world's dealings, while people move by the sun's light. Tuka says: here every excess is gone. Now this face need not show itself again.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram disowns his own poems even as he speaks them. The verses, strung like jewelled garlands, are not his ornaments to be proud of; Narayana gave them, and the warmth that runs through them rises from the source, not from Tuka. He says the words carry the taste of direct experience, and his ripened mind is only the witness, not the author. With nothing left unsettled by the Infinite, the ego that would step forward to take credit has burned away; like the sun that destroys darkness yet stays apart from what it lights, God works through him without belonging to the transaction. The closing line, that this face need not appear again, is the disappearance of the self that wanted to be seen.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Speak now for yourselves. As for me, the Infinite One has claimed me.

Though I shake Him off, He will not release the hem of my garment. He has pierced my jiva with an irresistible enchantment.

Your words are dry, mere talk. But I have His embrace, body to body.

Says Tuka, you too will experience this in time. The proof will come to the surface eventually.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Speak now only for yourselves; as for me, the Infinite One has tied me up. Shake him as I may, he will not let go of the hem of my garment; he has pierced my soul through and through. Your words are dry, just talk; I have his embrace, body to body. Tuka says: you too will know this one day, when the proof rises up in you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers people who argue with him about God by saying argument is beside the point. He has been seized: the Infinite holds the hem of his garment and will not let go however he shakes, and the soul itself has been pierced through. Against that, the others' clever words are dry, secondhand talk, while what he has is direct contact, body to body. He does not scorn the doubters but tells them their turn will come; the only real answer to this is the experience itself, and it will surface in them in time.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Stay as far away as you are. Keep your distance.

Do not come and bring blame upon me. Gopala is fastened to my being.

Guard yourselves against this Time; the fearsome one prowls all around. Says Tuka, seeing me in this state of divine madness, the world condemns me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Stay as far off as you already are; keep your distance. Do not come and lay blame on me: Gopala is fastened to my body. Guard yourselves against this Time; the terrible one prowls all around. Tuka says: seeing me in this state, a madman, the world condemns me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram waves off the people who crowd in to judge him. He tells them to keep the distance they already keep, because God, Gopala, is fastened to his very body, and their blame cannot reach what God has claimed. He turns their warning back on them: it is they who should be on guard, for fearsome Time prowls around everyone. He knows the world calls him mad and condemns him for it, and he accepts the name; the madness is simply that God has taken him over, and that is not something the onlookers' opinion can touch.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To take up the vow of a sati is exceedingly hard in the end. True glory grows only through the sacrifice of one's life; it is not cheaply won.

If one's gaze is open and clear, then the real battles begin. Says Tuka, when the moment arrives, the power of courage shows itself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To take up the sati's vow is very hard in the end. Glory grows only by laying down your life; it is not won cheaply. If the eyes are open and clear, then the real battles begin. Tuka says: when the moment comes to the body, then the power of courage shows itself.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures the cost of the spiritual path against the most extreme vow he can name, the sati who gives her whole life. Real glory, he says, is not won cheaply; it grows only where life itself is offered. To see clearly is not the end of the struggle but its beginning, because clear sight opens onto the real battles. The closing line is sober rather than boastful: courage is not proven in talk but only when the moment actually reaches the body, when the demand becomes real and a person either has the power to stand or does not.

GATHA 2436 The Nature of God

God fills all; untangle craving

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Horizontally, vertically, His radiance stands filling everything. God is not a single, simple thing; only pure devotion is single and constant.

The effort to resolve difference and non-difference, there is not too much distance or too much severance anywhere. Says Tuka, untangle the knot of worldly craving and desire.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sideways and upright, his light stands crowding everything full. God is not just one plain thing; only pure devotion is single and constant. The struggle of difference and no-difference: there is no great gap anywhere, no real break. Tuka says: untangle the knot, undo the craving for worldly dealings.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sees God's radiance packed into every direction, filling all space, so that God is not some single object set apart from the rest. What stays single and constant is not God reduced to one form but the devotion that holds steady. He waves away the endless dispute over whether the soul and God are different or not different, saying there is no real gap and no real break to fight over. The one thing that needs doing, then, is practical, not theoretical: untangle the knot of craving for worldly transactions, because that craving, not any metaphysical distance, is what keeps a person from the God who already fills everything.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A mark is made with one finger, but there is no real testing in the mind. Then it is all a performance, an embrace without any cause.

The dharma of the Vaishnavas is that the whole world is Vishnu, but people do not know this secret. Says Tuka, where sin is excessive, truth becomes the measuring standard.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A mark made with one finger, but no real testing in the mind. Then the whole thing is a costume put on, an embrace with no reason behind it. The Vaishnava's dharma is this: the whole world is Vishnu; people do not know the secret. Tuka says: where sin is great, truth is the measure that weighs it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at outward religion and finds it hollow when the inside is empty. A devotee can paint the sect-mark on the forehead with one finger, but if the mind has done no real self-examination, the mark is only a costume and the show of devotion is an embrace with nothing behind it. The real Vaishnava dharma he names is to see the whole world as Vishnu, a secret the world walks past. He warns that the gesture cannot hide the heart: where sin runs deep, it is truth, not the painted mark, that does the weighing, and the measure is exact.

GATHA 2438 The Necessity of Experience

Devotion proven slowly, by truth

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे आधीं न करीं तांतडी । पायीं जाली जोडी तेणें शुद्ध ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The experience of devotion must be taken with truth. I desire the glory of my Lord.

Then that experience is inexhaustible, never breaking, never turning back once it has spread. Whose words can be trusted? Only when one's actions confirm it does the servant become truly free of fear.

Says Tuka, do not be hasty in the beginning. The foundation that is laid at His feet must be clean.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The taste of devotion must be taken with truth; I long for the glory of my Lord. Then it cannot be spoiled or broken; once it spreads, it does not know how to turn back. Whose words can be trusted? Only when the deeds confirm them does the servant become truly fearless. Tuka says: do not be in a hurry at the start. The bond made at his feet must be a clean one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram insists that devotion only counts when it is held with truth, and warns against rushing it. Taken honestly, the taste of devotion is inexhaustible; once it spreads through a person it cannot be spoiled, broken, or reversed. But words alone earn no trust; a servant becomes truly fearless only when actions back the words up. So he cautions himself and the listener not to hurry at the beginning: the bond laid at God's feet has to be clean from the start, because a foundation built fast and false will not hold the weight that true devotion brings.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who can steal from me the sense of being present in all? My mind's desire is devotion; I wish for such a treasure that others might envy. I will take births again and again to make this real.

Says Tuka, O God, let me keep You in my debt through service.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who can take from me this sense of being present in all things? My mind's one love is devotion; I want such a treasure that others would envy it. I will take birth after birth just to make this real. Tuka says: O God, let me keep serving you, so that you stay forever in my debt.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram guards a single possession that no one can steal: the sense of God present in everything. Devotion is his mind's whole desire, and he wants it so richly that it would be the envy of others, a holy greed for the one worthwhile thing. He is willing to be born again and again, not to escape rebirth but to keep living this out. The closing turn is striking: instead of asking God to repay him, he asks to keep serving so that God remains in his debt, because for the lover the joy is in the giving, and to owe God nothing while God owes you would end the very service he treasures.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

No matter what status you assign them, swans do not become crows. Leave this place, you pretenders; here, the genuine come with their credentials.

A pearl without a nose-ring is a disgrace in the open market. Says Tuka, I am the enforcer of order here; let no one try to squeeze in.

IN PLAIN WORDS

However you rank them, swans do not turn into crows. Clear out, clear out, you frauds; here the real ones come with their credentials in hand. A pearl with no nose-ring is a disgrace in the open market. Tuka says: I am the one who keeps order here; let no one try to squeeze in.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram draws a hard line between the genuine devotee and the pretender. No amount of borrowed rank can turn a crow into a swan; what a person truly is shows through, and the true devotee arrives carrying real proof, not borrowed status. The pearl without its setting being shamed in the open market is his image for the fraud exposed once the crowd can see clearly. He casts himself as the keeper of order at this gate and tells the pretenders to clear out. The sharpness is aimed at the pattern of faking devotion, and it is a warning to examine whether one's own credentials are real before pushing to the front.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A bedbug on a throne; what a contrast. Yet character reveals itself as it truly is, and the inner emptiness comes to light.

A worm lives inside a berry, circling only the pit. For the sake of his belly, one sells peanuts yet calls himself a king.

A frog that eats mud, what does it know of the ocean? Says Tuka, such is the way of things; look for what is truly inside.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A bedbug on a throne; what a climb up, what a fall down. Sooner or later the true nature shows itself, and the emptiness inside comes out into the open. A worm lives inside a berry and circles only the pit. A man sells peanuts to fill his belly, yet says with his mouth, I am a king. A frog eats mud; what does it know of the ocean? Tuka says: this is how it is. What is there to look for in such people? Look at what is truly inside.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is taking apart the boaster whose station does not match his size. The bedbug on the throne, the worm that circles only the pit of its berry, the peanut seller calling himself king, the mud-eating frog with no idea the ocean exists: each is small, and each pretends to be large. His point is that station and noise cannot hide the inner truth; given time, the real nature surfaces and the emptiness shows. The turn is inward at the end: do not be fooled by the front, and ask what is actually inside, in others and in yourself.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Run, run, O Bearer of the Garuda banner. Come to the aid of us helpless ones.

I am greatly distressed and look only for You. I gaze down the road to see if someone comes for my sake.

Though You are so close, why this aloofness? Do not delay any further. I do not know why You have held back.

Says Tuka, do not walk; run to me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Run, run, you who bear the Garuda banner. Come for the sake of us who have no one. I have grown sick with distress, so I keep looking down the road for you. I watch and watch that path, to see if anyone is coming for me. You are right here, a refuge like you, so close. Do not be late any longer. I do not know why you have held yourself back. Tuka says: do not walk. Do not walk; come running.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praying in the voice of someone at the end of his strength, calling on Vishnu, the bearer of the Garuda banner, to come. He names himself among the helpless who have no other protector, and he is sick with waiting, eyes fixed on the road for any sign of rescue. The ache in the prayer is that the Lord is so near and yet seems to hold back, and he cannot understand the delay. The final line refuses any leisurely arrival: walking is not enough, the need is now, so come running.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Panduranga, O Panduranga, my Ganga, my Mother. Pour forth the stream of love; let the flood of milk flow freely.

Press Your body against mine and satisfy this longing fully. Says Tuka, I shall take the leap and abandon all false pretenses.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Panduranga, Panduranga, my Ganga, my Mother. Let down your milk, the stream of love; let the flood of it pour over me freely. Press your body against mine and satisfy this longing fully. Tuka says: I will take the leap. I will throw away all my false pretenses.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays to Panduranga not as a distant lord but as mother and sacred river at once, the source he drinks from. He asks for the milk of love to be let down as a nursing mother lets it down, a flood he wants poured over him without measure, and for the closeness of body against body that finally satisfies the longing. The last line names the cost on his side: he will leap, and in leaping he will let go of every false front he has been holding up. The prayer is for union so complete that pretense simply falls away.

तुका ह्मणे ब्रीद बांधलें यासाठीं । भक्तांसी संकटीं रक्षावया ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The elephant Gajendra, abandoned by his own kin, cried out to You, O Panduranga. For his sake, You left Garuda behind and came running, O Lord of the lowly.

Just as a cow rushes toward her calf, so did You rescue Gajendra. Says Tuka, this is the pledge You have bound upon Yourself: to protect Your devotees in their hour of peril.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The elephant Gajendra was a beast, left by his own people. He remembered you, Panduranga. For his sake you left Garuda behind and came running, you who love the lowly; your power surged out like a flood. As a cow leaps toward her calf, so you set Gajendra free. Tuka says: you bound this vow upon yourself for this very reason, to guard your devotees in their hour of danger.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells the story of Gajendra, the elephant seized in the water and abandoned by his herd, who cried out the Name and was saved. He stresses how the Lord came: leaving even Garuda behind, rushing as a cow rushes to her calf, the lover of the lowly moving with the urgency of a parent. The poem then names why this happens at all. The Lord has bound a pledge upon himself, a vow to protect his devotees in danger, and he keeps it. The comfort is that the same vow still stands for anyone who calls.

GATHA 2445 The Power of the Name

The Name, the essence to hold

मराठी मूळ

चारी वेद जयासाटीं । त्याचें नाम धरा कंठीं ॥1॥
अठरा पुराणांचे पोटीं । नामाविण नाहीं गोठी ॥2॥
गीता जेणें उपदेशिली। ते ही विटेवरी माउली ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे सार धरीं । वाचे हरिनाम उच्चारीं ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The four Vedas exist for His sake. Hold His Name on your lips.

At the core of all eighteen Puranas, there is no talk apart from the Name. She who taught the Gita is the same Mother who stands on the brick.

Says Tuka, hold fast to this essence and utter Hari's Name with your voice.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He for whose sake the four Vedas exist: hold his Name in your throat. In the belly of all eighteen Puranas there is no talk apart from the Name. The one who taught the Gita is the same Mother who stands on the brick. Tuka says: hold fast to the essence. With your tongue, say Hari's Name.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram gathers the whole weight of scripture and points it at one practice. The four Vedas exist for the Lord; the eighteen Puranas, at their core, speak of nothing but his Name; and the very one who spoke the Gita is the same Vitthal who stands waiting on the brick at Pandhari. He flattens the distance between the highest teaching and the simplest act. You do not need to master the texts; you need to do what the texts are for. So hold the essence and let the tongue speak Hari's Name.

GATHA 2446 True Worship

True worship, seek Him among people

मराठी मूळ

पाहातां ठायाठाव । जातो अंतरोनि देव ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे धीरें- । विण कैसें होतें बरें॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When you look for God in place after place, He recedes into the distance. One should not get lost in judging qualities and faults; the mind must be carefully guarded in this regard.

In serving the body's threefold needs, one finds that Janardana truly dwells among the people. Says Tuka, without patience, how can anything turn out well?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When you look for God in place after place, he keeps slipping away into the distance. Do not get lost in weighing other people's merits and faults; guard your mind carefully in this. Serving the body's threefold needs, you find that Janardana truly lives among people. Tuka says: without patience, how does anything turn out well?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram corrects the search that keeps God always elsewhere. The more you hunt for him in one holy place after another, the further off he recedes, and the habit of judging the good and bad in others only scatters the mind. The turn is that God, Janardana, is found in serving real people in their ordinary needs, not in spiritual sightseeing.

He closes on the quiet discipline that makes this possible: without patience, nothing comes right. Worship is steadiness and service close at hand, not restless seeking far away.

GATHA 2447 The Power of the Name

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Singing the Name is the easiest of all spiritual practices. The sins of many lifetimes will burn away.

There is no need for painful effort or retreat into the forest. Narayana comes happily to your very home.

Sit right where you are, focus your mind, and call upon the Infinite One with love. Chant always: Rama, Krishna, Hari, Vitthal, Keshava.

There is no other practice beyond this; I swear it by Vitthal. Says Tuka, this is the simplest of all paths. The wise one seizes the opportunity here and now.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Singing the Name is the easy practice. The sins of past births will burn away. You need no hard effort, no going off into the forest. Narayana comes happily to your house. Sit right where you are, gather your mind into one point, and call on the Infinite One with love. Chant always: Rama, Krishna, Hari, Vitthal, Keshava. There is no other practice beyond this; I swear it by Vithoba. Tuka says: this is the simplest of all. The wise one takes his fill here.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out singing the Name as the open door that asks for nothing you cannot give. No forest retreat, no painful austerity: you stay where you are, steady the mind, and call on God with love, and the sins of many lifetimes burn off. He even names the chant, Rama, Krishna, Hari, Vitthal, Keshava, so there is no mystery about what to do. The oath he swears by Vithoba is the radical claim: there is no practice higher than this. So the wise person does not wait or wander; he seizes the chance and takes his fill of it now.

GATHA 2448 The Nature of God

Nature of God, He loves the artless

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

God personally attends to the affairs of the faithful. He ate the leftovers at Dharma's house.

He ate the half-tasted fruit offered by the tribal woman Shabari; such is God's great love for His devotees. As if God's own household lacked food, He begged Draupadi for greens and scraps.

Ananta washed Arjuna's horses and rescued him from countless dangers. Says Tuka, God loves such innocent, childlike devotees. The face of calculated knowing is blackened before Him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

God himself does the work of the faithful. He carried out the leftover scraps in Dharma's house. He ate the half-tasted berries of the tribal woman; his love for such people is great. As if there were no food in God's own house, he begged greens and scraps from Draupadi. Ananta washed Arjuna's horses and turned away many dangers. Tuka says: he loves these simple, childlike ones. The face of clever calculation is blackened before him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram piles up the stories where God does the lowly, undignified work for those who love him simply: clearing scraps in Yudhishthira's house, eating Shabari's already-tasted berries, asking Draupadi for a few greens, washing Arjuna's horses, warding off danger after danger. The thread is that the Lord stoops gladly for the artless and trusting, and that their plain love draws him close. The sting is in the last line. The face of calculated cleverness, the one who comes with knowledge to bargain rather than love, is blackened, shamed, before him. He warns against the calculating posture, not against any person, and points to childlike trust instead.

GATHA 2449 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the thief of the mind

मराठी मूळ

सांवळें रूपडें चोरटें चित्ताचें । उभें पंढरीचे विटेवरी॥1॥
डोळयांची धणी पाहातां न पुरे । तया लागीं झुरे मन माझें ॥ध्रु.॥

चित्त मोहियेलें नंदाच्या नंदनें । तुका ह्मणे येणें गरुडध्वजें ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

That dark, beautiful form, the thief of chittas, stands upon the brick at Pandhari. My eyes can never have their fill of gazing upon Him.

My mind pines for Him ceaselessly. Nothing else in this world tastes sweet to me; Your feet alone have settled within my chitta.

My very life-breath seeks to leave this body because it cannot bear not seeing Your holy face. Says Tuka, my chitta has been stolen by the Son of Nanda, by this Bearer of the Garuda banner.

IN PLAIN WORDS

That dark, lovely form, the thief of the mind, stands on the brick at Pandhari. My eyes gaze and gaze and are never full; for that my mind wastes away. Nothing else in this world tastes sweet to me; your feet have settled inside me. My breath wants to leave this body when my eyes cannot see your holy face. Tuka says: my mind has been stolen by the Son of Nanda, by this bearer of the Garuda banner.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes being captured by the dark beauty of Vitthal standing on the brick at Pandhari, calling him the thief who has stolen the mind. The longing is bodily: eyes that look and are never satisfied, a mind that pines, a world that has lost all other sweetness because the Lord's feet have lodged inside him. He goes to the edge, saying his very breath wants to leave the body when it cannot see that face. The closing names the thief plainly as Krishna, the Son of Nanda, the same Vitthal, so the loss of the self to him is owned as joy, not complaint.

GATHA 2450 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, choose the Name over debate

मराठी मूळ

ऐका ऐका भाविकजन । कोण कोण व्हाल ते ॥1॥
ताकिकांर्चा टाका संग । पांडुरंग स्मरा हो ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Listen, listen, O faithful ones. Who among you will come? Abandon the company of cynics and logicians.

Remember Panduranga. Do not go searching through various doctrines; you will drown without finding the truth.

Says Tuka, in this age of Kali, this servant goes about telling the people.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Listen, listen, you faithful ones. Which of you will come along? Drop the company of arguers and logic-choppers. Remember Panduranga. Do not go hunting through this doctrine and that; you will drown without ever reaching the truth. Tuka says: in the age of Kali, this servant goes about telling people just this.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram calls out to the faithful and asks who will walk this road with him. His instruction is blunt: leave the company of the clever debaters and remember Panduranga instead. He warns that wandering from one doctrine to another does not arrive anywhere; you sink before you ever touch the truth. He names his own task in the age of Kali: he is a servant going from person to person saying exactly this. The poem sets simple remembrance of the Name against endless intellectual searching, and chooses the Name.

GATHA 2451 Worldly Life

Worldly life, the false claim of freedom

मराठी मूळ

आपुलिया आंगें तोडी मायाजाळ । ऐसें नाहीं बळ कोणापाशीं ॥1॥
हर्षामर्ष जों हे नाहीं जों जिराले । तोंवरि हे केले चार त्यांनीं ॥2॥
मुक्त जालों ऐसें बोलों जाये मुखें । तुका ह्मणे दुःखें बांधला तो ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

No one has the strength to break Maya's web by one's own effort. As long as joy and sorrow have not been digested, those impulses rule the person.

Says Tuka, the one who claims 'I am liberated' with his mouth while still bound by suffering is still in chains.

IN PLAIN WORDS

No one has the strength to tear Maya's net by his own power. As long as delight and resentment are not yet burned out in him, those forces keep moving him about. A man may say with his mouth, I have become free. Tuka says: while bound by his sorrows, he is still in chains.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram punctures the easy claim of liberation. The web of Maya cannot be cut by your own muscle, and as long as the pulls of pleasure and offense are still alive and undigested, they go on steering the person whatever he says. So the man who declares with his mouth, I am liberated, has only made a noise. The test is not the words but the condition: if he is still held fast by his own griefs, he is still bound. The poem turns the listener back to honest self-examination rather than to a flattering verdict.

GATHA 2452 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, the hollow show of generosity

मराठी मूळ

आलिया अतीता ह्मणतसां पुढारें । आपुलें रोकडें सत्त्व जाय ॥1॥
काय त्याचा भार घेऊनि मस्तकीं । हीनकर्मी लोकीं ह्मणावया ॥ध्रु.॥
दारीं हाका कैसें करवतें भोजन । रुची तरि अन्न कैसें देतें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे ध्वज उभारिला कर । ते शक्ति उदार काय जाली ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When a guest arrives, you say 'come back later,' and your own goodness drains away on the spot. Why carry his burden on your head just to be called generous in public? How can one enjoy a meal while turning away the hungry at the door? Does food taste good under such conditions? Says Tuka, one raises a flag and holds up a hand, but has that generosity actually amounted to anything?

IN PLAIN WORDS

A guest comes, and you say, come back later; and right then your own goodness drains away. Why carry his burden on your head only to be called generous in front of people, while your deeds stay low? When you turn away the hungry calling at your door, how can the meal be eaten? How can the food have any taste? Tuka says: you raise a flag and lift up your hand; but has that generosity ever amounted to anything?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram exposes generosity that is only for show. The moment you tell an arriving guest to come back later, your real goodness has already drained out, whatever reputation you keep. He asks why anyone would shoulder the appearance of charity in public while the actual deeds stay mean, and he makes it visceral: with the hungry calling at the door, how can your own meal taste good? The closing image of a raised flag and a lifted hand is the public gesture of giving, and the question cuts it down. If the act behind the gesture is empty, the generosity is worth nothing. The poem points at the pattern of performed virtue, and asks for the real thing.

GATHA 2453 The Saints

Adoration, the saints' company

मराठी मूळ

जेथें लक्ष्मीचा वास । गंगा आली पापा नास ॥1॥
तें म्यां हृदयीं धरिलें । तापें हरण पाउलें ॥ध्रु.॥
सेवा केली संतजनीं। सुखें राहिले लपोनि ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे वांकी । भाट जाली तिहीं लोकीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Where Lakshmi dwells, there the Ganga comes to destroy sins. I have held that in my heart, and my afflictions have been relieved.

The saints have served, and joys have remained hidden within them. Says Tuka, the path has been cleared across all three worlds.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Where Lakshmi dwells, the Ganga comes and washes sins away. I have held that in my heart, and his feet take my burning away. The saints have served, and they rest hidden in their joy. Tuka says: the road has been opened across all three worlds.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praising the feet of God as the place where every grace gathers. He names two great gifts, Lakshmi's wealth and the Ganga's washing of sin, and says both meet at those feet, which is what he keeps in his heart; once he holds them, the fever of his suffering is lifted. The saints have done their part by serving God, and they live quietly inside the joy that service brought them. The last line widens the claim: the path they cleared is open now in all three worlds, so the way home is no longer hidden from anyone.

GATHA 2454 Devotion to Vitthal

Absorption, lost in the form

मराठी मूळ

रूपीं जडले लोचन । पायीं ि◌स्थरावलें मन ॥1॥
देहभाव हरपला । तुज पाहातां विठ्ठला ॥ध्रु.॥
कळों नये सुखदुःख। तान हरपली भूक ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नव्हे परती । तुझ्या दर्शनें मागुती ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My eyes are fixed upon Your form, and my mind has become steady at Your feet. All sense of body has been lost in beholding You, Vitthal.

Neither pleasure nor pain is felt, and hunger and thirst have vanished. Says Tuka, I shall not turn back from Your sight ever again.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My eyes are stuck to your form. My mind has come to rest at your feet. The sense of having a body is gone, while I look at you, Vitthal. I cannot tell pleasure from pain. Thirst and hunger have vanished. Tuka says: I will not turn back. Once I have seen you, I will not look away again.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing what happens when sight of God takes hold completely. His eyes fasten on Vitthal's form and his restless mind finally settles at the feet; in that looking, the constant pull of the body drops away. With it go the ordinary measures of life, the swing between pleasure and pain, the press of hunger and thirst, all dissolved in the seeing. The closing vow is the point: having once been given this darshan, he refuses ever to turn back from it.

GATHA 2455 Prayers

Prayer, do not push me away

मराठी मूळ

जाणतें लेकरूं । माता लागे दूर धरूं ॥1॥
तैसें न करीं कृपावंते । पांडुरंगे माझे माते ॥ध्रु.॥
नाहीं मुक्ताफळा । भेटी मागुती त्या जळा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे लोणी । ताक सांडी निवडूनि॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A mother keeps a knowing child at a distance. Do not do so with me, O gracious Panduranga, O my mother.

The pearl once detached from its shell does not return to those waters. Says Tuka, butter, once separated, cannot rejoin the buttermilk.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A mother lets a grown child go far from her. Do not do that to me, merciful one, Panduranga, my mother. The pearl, once taken from the shell, does not return to that water. Tuka says: butter, once churned out, leaves the buttermilk for good. It will not go back in.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays to God as a mother and asks not to be set at a distance. A mother trusts a knowing, grown child to fend for itself and keeps it a little apart; he begs God not to treat him that way, but to hold him close. The two images carry the fear underneath the prayer: a pearl drawn from its shell does not slip back into the sea, and butter once churned out cannot be poured back into the buttermilk. Some separations are final, so he pleads to be kept near now, before the parting becomes one that nothing can mend.

GATHA 2456 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, no refuge but you

मराठी मूळ

तुजविण कोणां । शरण जाऊं नारायणा ॥1॥
ऐसा न देखें मी कोणी । तुजा तिहीं त्रिभुवनीं ॥ध्रु.॥
पाहिलीं पुराणें । धांडोळलीं दरुषणें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे ठायीं । जडून ठेलों तुझ्या पायीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To whom shall I surrender but You, O Narayana? I see no one like You in all the three worlds. I have searched through the Puranas and examined all the scriptures.

Says Tuka, I remain rooted at Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To whom shall I go for refuge, Narayana, if not to you? I see no one like you anywhere in the three worlds. I have looked through the Puranas. I have searched the scriptures everywhere. Tuka says: I am fixed here. I have settled fast at your feet, and there I stay.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram declares that his search has ended at one place only. He asks where else he could surrender, and answers that nowhere in the three worlds is there another like Narayana. This is not said blindly; he has gone through the Puranas and searched the scriptures, and the searching only confirmed it. So he stops looking outward and roots himself, fastened at God's feet, with no thought of going elsewhere.

GATHA 2457 Longing and Separation

Longing, to see all as Brahman

मराठी मूळ

ऐसें भाग्य कई लाहाता होईन । अवघें देखें जन ब्रह्मरूप ॥1॥
मग तया सुखा अंत नाहीं पार । आनंदें सागर हेलावती ॥ध्रु.॥
शांति क्षमा दया मूतिनमंत अंगीं । परावृत्त संगीं कामादिकां ॥2॥
विवेकासहित वैराग्याचें बळ । धग्धगितोज्ज्वाळ अग्न जैसा ॥3॥
भक्ति नवविधा भावशुद्ध बरी । अळंकारावरी मुगुटमणि ॥4॥
तुका ह्मणे माझी पुरवी वासना । कोण नारायणा तुजविण ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When will such fortune be attained, that I may see all beings as Brahman? Then there would be no end to that bliss, and oceans of joy would overflow. Peace, forgiveness, and compassion would dwell in every limb, and all desires would turn away.

Discrimination joined with the strength of dispassion would blaze like a brilliant fire. Ninefold devotion, pure in sentiment, would be the crown jewel upon all virtues.

Says Tuka, who but You, O Narayana, can fulfill my deepest longing?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When will I be lucky enough to see every person as Brahman, as God's own form? Then that joy would have no end, no shore; oceans of bliss would rise and overflow. Peace, forgiveness, and mercy would live in my whole body, and every craving would turn away. Discrimination joined to the strength of dispassion would blaze like a bright, roaring fire. The ninefold devotion, pure in feeling, would be the crown jewel on all that. Tuka says: who but you, Narayana, can fill this longing of mine?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praying for a single fortune, to see every living being as God's own form. He spells out what that vision would bring: a bliss with no end or far shore, oceans of joy spilling over. In such a state, peace, forgiveness, and mercy would fill his whole being and desire would fall away, while clear discernment and dispassion would burn in him like a fierce, bright fire. He crowns the list with the ninefold path of devotion, pure in feeling, as the jewel above every other virtue, then turns it all back into a plea: only Narayana can grant a longing this deep.

GATHA 2458 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the free wealth of kirtan

मराठी मूळ

कासया करावे तपाचे डोंगर । आणीक अपार दुःखरासी॥1॥
कासया फिरावे अनेक ते देश । दावितील आस पुढें लाभ ॥ध्रु.॥
कासया पुजावीं अनेक दैवतें । पोटभरे तेथें लाभ नाहीं ॥2॥
कासया करावे मुक्तीचे सायास । मिळे पंढरीस फुका साटीं ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे करीं कीर्तन पसारा । लाभ येईल घरा पाहिजे तो ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why heap up mountains of penance and endless suffering? Why wander through countless lands, lured by promises of future gain? Why worship many deities when no real profit comes from them? Why struggle for liberation when it can be had freely at Pandhari? Says Tuka, spread the practice of kirtan, and every treasure you desire will come to your door.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why pile up mountains of penance and heaps of pain on top? Why wander through one country after another, lured on by the promise of gain ahead? Why worship many gods, when filling the belly is all you get there and no real profit comes? Why struggle and strain after liberation, when at Pandhari it is given free? Tuka says: spread out the singing of kirtan. The gain you are after will come home to you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips away the costly roads people take toward God and points to the free one. One by one he questions them: harsh austerities that only add suffering, restless pilgrimage chasing a promised reward, the worship of many deities that feeds the stomach but yields nothing lasting, and the strenuous quest for liberation. Each, he says, is needless effort when what they seek is handed over for nothing at Pandhari. His counsel is simple and direct: take up kirtan, the open singing of God's name, and every treasure those hard paths chased will arrive at your own door.

GATHA 2459 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, honor the holy, not yourself

मराठी मूळ

वैष्णवमुनिविप्रांचा सन्मान । करावा आपण घेऊं नये ॥1॥
प्रभु जाला तरी संसाराचा दास । विहित तयासी यांची सेवा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे हे आशीर्वादें बळी । जाईल तो छळी नरकायासीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One should honor the Vaishnavas, sages, and brahmins, but should not seek such honor for oneself. Even if one becomes a ruler, one is still a servant of worldly life, and it is ordained to serve these holy ones.

Says Tuka, those who torment these blessed ones, strong in their benedictions, shall go to hell.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Honor the Vaishnavas, the sages, and the brahmins. Do not take such honor for yourself. Even one who has become a ruler is still a servant of worldly life; serving these holy ones is his proper duty. Tuka says: these blessed ones are strong in their blessing. Whoever torments them will go to the torments of hell.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets out a rule about where honor belongs. The devotees, the sages, and the brahmins are to be honored, but a person must not turn that honor toward himself. Even a king, who looks like a master, is still bound as a servant within worldly life, and his fitting work is to serve these holy ones rather than to be served. The warning at the end points at a pattern, not a person: the blessing of such people is a real power, and to harm them is to call down on yourself the very suffering you deal out.

GATHA 2460 The Saints

The saints, ask only for their company

मराठी मूळ

देव वसे चित्तीं । त्याची घडावी संगती ॥1॥
ऐसें आवडतें मना । देवा पुरवावी वासना ॥ध्रु.॥
हरिजनासी भेटी । नहो अंगसंगें तुटी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जिणें । भलें संतसंघष्टणें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Seek the company of one in whose chitta God dwells. This is what the mind loves; O God, fulfill this desire.

Let there be meeting with Hari's devotees, and may that bond never be broken. Says Tuka, a life spent in the company of saints is a life well lived.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Seek the company of one in whose heart God lives. This is what my mind loves; God, grant me this one craving. Let me meet the devotees of Hari, and let that closeness never be cut off. Tuka says: a life is good when it is worn smooth by rubbing against the saints.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks God for one thing only, the company of people in whose hearts God dwells. He names it as the desire his mind truly loves and begs that this craving, and not the others, be fulfilled. He wants to meet Hari's devotees and stay in unbroken closeness with them. The last line gives the reason: a life is well spent when it is pressed and rubbed against the saints, the way a rough stone is smoothed by constant friction.

GATHA 2461 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the leftover grace

मराठी मूळ

भाग सीण गेला । माझा सकळ विठ्ठला ॥1॥
तुझा ह्मणवितों दास । केली उच्छिष्टाची आस ॥ध्रु.॥
राहिली तळमळ । तई पासोनी सकळ ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे धालें । पोट ऐसें कळों आलें॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All my weariness and exhaustion have departed, O Vitthal. I call myself Your servant and have set my hope on Your leftover grace.

All my restlessness has ceased from that time onward. Says Tuka, I have come to feel that my hunger is truly satisfied.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All my tiredness and strain are gone, Vitthal, every bit of it. I call myself your servant. I have set my hope on the food left over from your plate. Since then all my restlessness has stopped. Tuka says: I have come to know it. My belly is full.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the rest that comes from being claimed by God. His weariness has fully lifted, and he calls himself Vitthal's servant whose whole hope rests on God's leftover grace, the prasad from the master's own plate. From the moment he took that lowly place, the inner restlessness that drove him stopped. The closing image is bodily and plain: he now knows, the way a fed man knows, that his belly is full and his hunger truly satisfied.

GATHA 2462 Prayers

Prayer, the name against death

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A king's servant ends up oppressing the poor. Whose shame is this? Do You not know, O Narayana? When iron meets the philosopher's stone, its nature as iron does not simply vanish.

Says Tuka, with Your name on my lips, let me meet even Death without fear.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A king's servant ends up grinding down the poor. Whose disgrace is this? Do you not know, Narayana? When iron touches the philosopher's stone, its old iron nature is not simply lost. Tuka says: with your name in my throat, let me meet death itself and not be afraid.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram opens with a hard observation and turns it into a plea. A king's own servant comes to oppress the helpless poor, and he asks God whose shame that really is, as if to say the master is answerable for the servant. He then sets against this the image of iron meeting the touchstone that turns it to gold, noting the change is real and not a mere hiding of the old metal. His own prayer follows the same hope: with God's name held in his throat, he wants to face even death without fear, transformed past the dread that death holds over ordinary people.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Tell me, who else is the embodiment of bliss like my Panduranga? There is no need for wandering or shaving one's head, no painful austerities to perform. Bathe in the Chandrabhaga, let the sacred hari-katha be your ritual, and the mind will find contentment at all times.

Says Tuka, even in Vaikuntha this would be rare; the greatest gain is the company of saints.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Tell me, who else is bliss itself, the way my Panduranga is? There is no need to wander, no need to shave the head, no harsh straining at practices. Bathe in the Chandrabhaga; let hari-katha be your rite; and the mind is at peace at all times. Tuka says: this is rare even in Vaikuntha. The greatest gain of all is the company of saints.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram praises Panduranga as bliss embodied and contrasts him with the hard religion people take on. There is no call to wander far, to shave the head as a renunciate, or to grind through painful disciplines. A bath in the river Chandrabhaga at Pandhari and the hearing and telling of God's story, hari-katha, are rite enough, and they keep the mind settled all the time. He ends by raising the stakes: this ease is something rare even in Vaikuntha, God's own heaven, and the highest gain within it is the company of the saints.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Forcing instruction upon one who has no readiness is like performing tricks with a monkey and a snake charmer. Wealth, grain, kingdom, and pleasing words are hollow entertainments.

Where there is no receptive soil, the fool wastes his seed. Says Tuka, who teaches like the rain cloud, listen: what comes naturally and without contrivance, that alone is excellent.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To force teaching on one who is not ready for it is like the tricks of a monkey and a snake charmer. Wealth, grain, kingdom, fine talk: pleasing people with these is empty, just husk. Where the soil is not moist, the fool throws his seed away. Do not tie such a thing in the corner of your cloth; that knot only tears it; let your touchstone be the conduct and the experience of the wise. Tuka says: teach the way the cloud teaches, by raining. Forcing the outcome is the danger; what comes of itself is best.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is warning against pushing spiritual teaching onto people who are not ready to receive it. Forced instruction, he says, is mere showmanship, like the trained antics of a monkey and a snake charmer, and pleasing crowds with wealth, grain, power, or clever words is hollow husk. The farming image carries the heart of it: scattering seed on dry, unreceptive ground is the act of a fool. So do not hoard or force such teaching; let your test be the lived conduct and experience of the wise. His closing picture is the cloud, which does not aim its rain at one field but lets it fall; in the same way, teaching that comes naturally, without contrivance, is the best, while straining to control the result is where the harm lies.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

False devotees have sat measuring devotion by outward show, yet their inner lives topple over. They claim authority they do not possess, and are themselves hollow.

God has now come; let this pretense be dissolved at once. They have been pressed into forced service, carrying burdens without truth.

Caught in slumber, their hut of sincerity stands empty. Along the Godavari's bank they create mischief.

Says Tuka, by force they blacken the face of true teaching.

IN PLAIN WORDS

False devotees sit measuring devotion by outward show. Inside, their lives topple over. Each one falls in his own way. They claim authority they do not have. They are hollow within. Now God has come; let this pretense be dissolved at once. They have been pressed into forced labor, carrying loads with no truth in them. They are caught asleep. The hut of sincerity stands empty. Along the bank of the Godavari they make mischief. Tuka says: by force they blacken the face of true teaching.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is exposing the religion that lives on the surface. People weigh devotion by what can be seen and counted, but the inner life has nothing under it and collapses. They take on a teacher's authority they were never given, and the pose is empty. The poem names the cost of this: such people carry their religious duty as forced labor, a load without truth, and they spread confusion even at the holy bank where others come to pray. The harshness is aimed at the pattern of empty display, the temptation to perform piety, not at any one soul; the warning is to look whether your own devotion has anything inside it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The insect inside a fig thinks the fig is the whole universe. But how many such figs hang on trees, and how many such trees stand in the nine continents? We think this is our universe, yet countless such cosmic eggs exist beyond counting.

Upon the body of the Cosmic Being, these are as innumerable as hairs. Crores of such cosmic forms are contained in His belly.

And yet He is Nanda's child, the little Mukunda, who calls Himself the infant of supreme bliss. Such is the unfathomable divine play, and Says Tuka, by the grace of Brahmananda, it becomes knowable.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The insect inside a fig thinks the fig is the whole universe. But how many such figs hang on a tree? And how many such trees stand across the nine lands? So it is with us: we think this is the whole universe. Yet countless such cosmic eggs exist beyond counting. On the body of the Cosmic Being they are as many as the hairs. Crores of such vast forms are held inside His belly. And He is Nanda's child, the little Mukunda, the infant who is supreme bliss itself. Such is the unfathomable divine play. Tuka says: by the grace of Brahmananda, it becomes known to me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets two scales side by side to break the mind that thinks it sees the whole. The insect in the fig takes its fig for the universe; we do the same with our own cosmos, never guessing how many universes there are. He piles up the immensity, countless cosmic eggs, all of them mere hairs on the body of the Cosmic Being, crores of such forms held in a single belly. Then he drops the whole weight onto its opposite: this same all-containing Lord is Nanda's small son, Mukunda, the infant who is bliss. The point is that the unmeasurable and the cradled child are one, and that this play is not solved by counting but given, here as Tuka's own knowing through grace.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The knowledge of Brahman may dawn in a single day, and at once pride dissolves. Yet pride clung even to Shuka's back, so Vyasa turned his gaze upon him differently.

Vyasa sent Shuka to meet King Janaka, and thereby rendered that counterfeit pride worthless. Having exposed it, Vyasa set Shuka to practice, and Shuka ascended to the peak of Mount Meru.

Going there, Shuka attained samadhi. Says Tuka, we too were present at that time.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The knowledge of Brahman can dawn in a single day, and at once pride dissolves. Yet pride still clung to Shuka. So Vyasa turned his gaze upon him another way. Vyasa sent Shuka to meet King Janaka, and so made that counterfeit pride worthless. Having exposed it, Vyasa set Shuka to practice. Shuka climbed to the peak of Mount Meru. Going there, Shuka attained samadhi. Tuka says: we too were present then.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the old story of Vyasa and his son Shuka to make one point about realization and pride. Even when the knowledge of Brahman dawns, a subtle pride in having it can remain, and it remained in Shuka. The father does not argue; he sends the son to King Janaka, who shows him that his attainment is counterfeit while pride is still in it. Only after that exposure is the real practice begun, ending in Shuka's samadhi on Mount Meru. The closing line, that Tuka too was present then, claims this is not distant history but his own lived ground; the lesson is that pride must be emptied before the knowing is true.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

God is attained so naturally, yet people turn back because of doubts. Why not hold this free remembrance in your chitta? Hari pervades everything; this is the principal teaching of Vedanta.

Keep your mind alert and absorbed in contemplation. The offering into the sacred fire means knowing 'I am not this body.' Then why should fresh desires arise again? When body and senses are consumed in desire and anger, what merit can come from ritual oblations? The true remedy lies in exclusive devotion to Vithoba's feet; one who meditates on Him will never lose the way.

Says Tuka, I tell you this one thing: do not err. Abandon all hesitation and take refuge; that alone is beautiful.

IN PLAIN WORDS

God is reached so naturally, yet people turn back because of their doubts. Why not hold this free remembrance in the heart? Hari pervades everything; this is the chief teaching of Vedanta. Keep the mind awake and absorbed in His remembrance. The true offering into the fire is to know: I am not this body. Then why let fresh desires rise again? When the body and senses are burned up in desire and anger, what merit can come from your oblations? The mantra-worshipped sacrifice is not the same as shaving the mind clean. The real remedy is single devotion to Vithoba's feet. One who meditates on Him never loses the way. Tuka says: I tell you this one thing, do not go wrong. Drop all hesitation and take refuge; that alone is good.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is correcting people who make God hard to reach when He is near. He says reaching God is natural, and the only obstacle is doubt; the remembrance that Hari fills everything is free for the taking, and Vedanta says no more than this. Then he turns the language of ritual inward: the real fire-offering is the knowledge I am not this body, not a ceremony, and outward oblations are worthless while desire and anger keep burning the senses.

Shaving the head is not shaving the mind. The settled remedy he names is exclusive devotion to Vithoba's feet, and the closing charge is plain: stop hesitating and surrender, because that is the one move that does not go wrong.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How can I know Your secret, and where does it reside? The scriptures themselves declare You are without end or limit. Then become for me small and tender, O Hrishikesha; show me Your four-armed form and fulfill my longing.

You extend below the seven nether worlds and tower beyond the heavens. How then can I behold You with these small eyes? I have this faith that You become whatever Your devotee needs.

Says Tuka, O Vithoba, dweller of Pandhari, I trust in this.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How am I to know Your secret, and where does it lie? The scriptures themselves say You are without end or limit. So become small and tender for me, O Hrishikesha. Show me Your four-armed form and fulfill my longing. You reach below the seven nether worlds and rise above the heavens. How then can I see You with these small eyes? I hold this faith: You become whatever Your devotee needs. Tuka says: O Vithoba, dweller of Pandhari, I trust in this.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram admits a real difficulty and answers it with faith. The scriptures call God endless and limitless, so there is no secret he could grasp and no place he could locate Him. A being that stretches below all the nether worlds and above all the heavens cannot be taken in by small human eyes. So instead of straining toward the infinite, he asks God to come down to his scale, to be small and tender, to show the four-armed form a devotee can actually behold. The ground under the request is the conviction that God shapes Himself to whatever the devotee needs, and on that trust he rests at Vithoba's Pandhari.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Trees and vines are our kinfolk, and the birds of the forest call to us in sweet voices. In such happiness the solitary life becomes dear; neither virtue nor fault clings to us there.

The sky is our canopy, the earth our seat, and the mind delights and plays freely. A patched garment and a water-pot serve the body, and the wind reminds us of life's impermanence.

The feast of hari-katha is our banquet, prepared in many flavors to be savored with relish. Says Tuka, here the mind converses with itself, debating its own truths in sweet solitude.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Trees and vines are our kin, and the forest birds call to us in sweet voices. In this happiness the solitary life grows dear. Here neither virtue nor fault clings to the body. The sky is our canopy, the earth our seat, and the mind delights and plays here freely. A patched cloak and a water-pot serve the body, and the wind reminds us how brief all things are. The telling of Hari's story is our feast, spread in many flavors to be tasted with relish. Tuka says: here the mind talks with itself, debating its own truths.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing the contentment of the renounced life by what it does and does not contain. In the forest the trees, vines, and birds become companions, and solitude turns sweet because here the play of merit and demerit no longer sticks to a person. He needs nothing but sky for a roof and earth for a seat; a single patched garment and a begging-bowl are enough body-care, and the passing wind keeps reminding him that everything is fleeting. His one banquet is hari-katha, the story of God told and savored. The final image is inward conversation: alone, the mind keeps company with itself and works out its own truth, and that is shown as fullness, not loneliness.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Infinite universes rest on a single hair of His body, like a tiny ball. Yet this same Lord, in the home of cowherd folk, clings to the threshold as He tries to climb over it.

He slays mighty demons whose great deeds fill the Puranas. Says Tuka, all powers reside within His being.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Infinite universes rest on a single hair of His body, like a tiny ball. Yet this same Lord, in the house of the cowherds, clings to the threshold as He tries to climb over it. He slays mighty demons whose great deeds fill the Puranas. Tuka says: all powers live within His being.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the vast against the small in one short stroke. The Lord who carries infinite universes on a single hair, as if they were a little ball, is the same child in the cowherds' home who has to grip the doorsill to climb over it. He is the one who kills the great demons the Puranas sing about, and yet he toddles at a threshold. The poem is not solving the paradox but holding it up to wonder: every power rests in this one being, and the same God is both the unfathomable and the small child of Gokul.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Be alert and consider this carefully, all you who have come into this world. You must reflect upon your final hour, for moments and seconds are being spent ceaselessly.

The so-called blessings of sons and daughters are not truly auspicious; worldly customs are merely a curtain. Says Tuka, God has become distant, and darkness has fallen over our eyes.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Be alert and think on this carefully, all of you who have come into this world. You must reflect on your final hour, for the moments and seconds are being spent without stopping. The blessings of sons and daughters are not truly auspicious; worldly custom is only a curtain. Tuka says: God has been pushed far away, and darkness has fallen over our eyes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram calls everyone alive to a sober reckoning. Time is being spent every instant and cannot be recalled, so the one thing worth weighing is the hour of death and what you bring to it. He challenges what people count as blessings: children and family ties feel auspicious but are only a curtain over the real account, a worldly show. The closing line names the true loss in plain terms: in living for that show, people have let God slip far off and let darkness cover their sight. The push is to wake up now while the moments still remain.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When salt dissolves in water, nothing remains separate. In the same way, I have become one with You and have dissolved into You.

When camphor meets fire, what residue of soot remains? Says Tuka, Your flame and mine have become one single light.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When salt is mixed into water, what is left standing apart? In the same way I have become one taste with You. I have vanished into You. When camphor meets the fire, what soot is left behind? Tuka says: Your flame and mine have become one single light.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes union with God through two images that leave nothing of the smaller thing behind. Salt poured into water keeps no separate body; it becomes the water. Camphor set to flame burns away whole and leaves not even soot. By these he tells what has happened to him: he has dissolved into God so completely that there is no longer a separate self standing apart. The final image makes it mutual and complete, two flames becoming one light; this is not the devotee admiring God from a distance but the very disappearance of the line between them.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There is no happiness anywhere in this worldly life; do not be carried away by vain ambition. This world is a colony of suffering; there is no place here for lasting joy.

Even one whose life spans fourteen cosmic ages ended up crushed beneath death's door. Says Tuka, free yourself quickly by holding Hari within your heart.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There is no happiness anywhere once you have come into this worldly life. Do not be swept away by vain craving. This world is a prison-house of sorrow; there is no real joy to be found here. Even one whose life lasts fourteen cosmic ages was still crushed beneath the door of death. Tuka says: free yourself quickly by holding Hari within your heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips away the hope that worldly life can be made to yield happiness. He calls the world a prison of sorrow and warns against vain craving, because the search for lasting joy here always comes up empty. To show how absolute death's reach is, he points to the one whose life spans fourteen cosmic ages: even that vast lifetime ended crushed under death's door, so length of days saves no one. The single way out he names is to hold Hari in the heart, and he urges that it be done quickly, before the moments run out. The harshness is meant to turn the hearer toward the one thing that lasts.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Nothing is impossible for You: You make paupers into kings, and mountains into level ground. Turning the inauspicious into the auspicious is no difficulty for You, O Panduranga.

You remained a celibate among sixteen thousand queens; that Durvasa fasted was nothing remarkable. Draupadi with five husbands was yet called a chaste woman, and her merit blessed her ancestors.

Even Dasharatha bore sins as grave as the slaying of a Brahmin, yet it was a wonder that You were born from his lineage. When great sages in anger caused the destruction of clans, no fault touched them.

Says Tuka, what then are my sins? I have surrendered at Your feet, O Lord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Nothing is impossible for You. You make paupers into kings, and mountains into level ground. To turn the inauspicious into the auspicious is no hard thing for You, O Panduranga. You stayed a celibate among sixteen thousand queens; that Durvasa fasted is no great wonder beside this. Draupadi had five husbands and was still called a chaste woman, and her merit blessed her ancestors. Dasharatha bore sins as heavy as the killing of a Brahmin, yet the wonder is that You were born in his line. When great sages in anger destroyed whole clans, no fault touched them. Tuka says: what then are my sins? I have been received at Your feet, O Lord.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram builds his case for his own acceptance out of God's power to overturn every measure. He begins with the rule: nothing is impossible for Panduranga, who lifts paupers to thrones and levels mountains, and who can turn the inauspicious into the auspicious. Then he reads the old stories the same way, as places where the usual reckoning was overturned: Krishna chaste among thousands of queens, Draupadi chaste with five husbands, even sin-laden Dasharatha made worthy of God's birth in his line, and angry sages left blameless after great destruction. The argument lands on himself: if God can do all that, his own sins are no obstacle, for he has already been received at God's feet. It is a plea built on God's freedom, not on his own worth.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The mother has placed her infant in the cradle, woven of the five elements and watched over by the four guardians of speech. She shows the child playthings of devotion through the power of articulate speech.

'Sleep now, sleep,' says the mother, cradling the child. 'You have tired yourself with play, O unknowing babe, sleep now.' Playing outside with worldly people, the child does not know that the dark-faced demon of death may carry him away.

Seeing the heedless child at play, death may seize him; so she urges: obey my words swiftly. Past merit was your companion that saved you from the clutches of tormentors.

Who knows how many others were carried away before; only by great merit have you come this far. Playing, Shuka was pursued by desire, and he hid twelve years in his mother's womb.

Emerging, he ran clutching his loincloth, and in that same manner, take shelter behind the door of devotion. Playing, the emperor Janaka was seized by fear; one foot fell into the fire.

His body trembled, and neither joy nor sorrow could be felt. The emperor Shibi was tested unexpectedly; fearless, he cut flesh from his own hand.

When all was tested, his divine parents snatched him back. Ajamela was bound to a courtesan's company; in terror he cried out, and his divine parents heard.

They rushed to save him and drew the pair to themselves. So, O child, hold fast to this remembrance and remain still.

Do not wander heedless in play. Death counts your days and tallies them; then it blinds your eyes and gives no chance to remember.

Such are those compassionate parents who have captivated the child's chitta, singing sweetly in melodious voice. By that singing the mind becomes calm and still.

Says Tuka, those who lack faith are destroyed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The mother has laid her child in the cradle, woven of the five elements and watched at its four corners. With the power of speech in her hand she shows the child the playthings of devotion. 'Sleep now, sleep,' the mother says, rocking the child. 'You have worn yourself out with play, O unknowing babe. Sleep now.' Playing outside with worldly people, the child does not know that the dark-faced demon of death may carry him off. Seeing the heedless child at play, death may seize him; so she says, obey my words at once. Past good deeds were your companion and saved you from the hands of your tormentors. How many others were carried off before, who can say? Only by great merit have you come this far. While he played, desire chased Shuka, and he hid twelve years in his mother's womb. He came out and ran clutching his loincloth; in that same way, master, take shelter behind the door of devotion. While he played, the emperor Janaka was seized by fear; one foot fell into the fire. His body shook; he could feel neither joy nor sorrow. No self, no other, no sense of the body remained. The emperor Shibi was tested without warning; fearless, he cut the flesh from his own hand. When all had been tested, his divine parents snatched him back and took him by the hand. Ajamela was bound to a courtesan's company; in terror he cried out, and his divine parents heard. They rushed to him at once, and drew the pair back to themselves. So, O child, hold fast to this remembrance and stay still. Do not wander heedless in play. Death is counting your days and reckoning your time; then it blinds your eyes and gives no chance to remember. Such are those merciful parents who have charmed the child's heart, singing sweetly in a melodious voice. By that singing the mind grows calm and still. Tuka says: those who have no faith are destroyed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram frames the whole spiritual life as a mother singing her child toward sleep, where the mother is grace and the child is the soul, the cradle being the body woven of the five elements. The mother's lullaby is the warning underneath: the dark-faced demon of death watches the child who plays heedlessly among worldly people, and only past merit has kept it from being carried off, as so many others were. He stacks up the old examples to show what saved each one: Shuka pursued by desire who hid and then ran for shelter, Janaka unshaken even with a foot in the fire, Shibi cutting his own flesh, Ajamela crying out God's name from a courtesan's house; in each case the divine parents seized the soul back at the end. The charge to the child is to hold the remembrance and stay still, because death is tallying the days and will at last blind the eyes so no remembrance is possible. The closing line gives the stakes without softening them: the soul that will not trust this singing mother is lost.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Performing katha in the open marketplace does not please Pandharinath. It is all pretense for the sake of the belly; where is Panduranga in that? One fixes one's attention hoping someone will give something.

Says Tuka, what have you accomplished, you wretch? Tuka is not pleased with you.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Telling the sacred story out in the open marketplace: Pandharinath does not love that. It is all a show for the sake of the belly. Where is Panduranga in that? You fix your attention on the crowd, hoping someone will give you something. Tuka says: what have you done, you wretch? Tuka is not pleased with you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns on the performer who recites holy katha as a way to earn. The marketplace is not the problem; the motive is. When the story is told to fill the belly and the eyes are watching the crowd for a coin, Vitthal is simply not there in it, however pious the words sound. The poet does not spare himself the harsh word, and the danger he names is one any reciter or teacher can fall into: the moment the audience becomes a source of income, attention slides off God and onto what they might give. He ends by withholding the one approval that matters, his own honest verdict, because God is not pleased with worship done for pay.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let the words of the world rest upon my head; my Vithabai is good to me. She has embraced me; she is gracious, full of compassion from within.

The Vedas, Shastras, and Puranas all sing her praise; I am her pampered child. She whose name is the Wish-fulfilling Cow and the Wish-granting Tree, Says Tuka, I am her little one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let the words of people sit on my head; my Vithabai is good to me. She has taken me up; she is kind, full of mercy within. The Vedas, the Shastras, the Puranas all sing of her; I am her pampered child. Her name is the wish-granting cow, the wish-granting tree. Tuka says: I am her little one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers slander with belonging. He lets the world's words rest on his head, neither fighting them nor minding them, because his standing does not come from people but from his Mother Vithabai. The scriptures that the world reveres are themselves only praising her, so her child has nothing to prove to anyone. He calls her Kamadhenu and Kalpataru, the cow and the tree that give whatever is asked, and then sets all that grandeur aside for one small word: he is simply her child. The poem's claim is that being held by God makes the opinion of the crowd weightless.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have visited Varanasi, Gaya, and Dwaraka, but none can compare to Pandhari. In Pandhari no one holds pride; people bow at one another's feet.

Says Tuka, whoever visits Pandhari even once, the lord of death will never come to his door.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have seen Varanasi, Gaya, Dwaraka; but none comes near to Pandhari. In Pandhari no one carries pride; people fall at one another's feet. Tuka says: go to Pandhari even once, and the lord of death will not come to that one's house.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram ranks the holy places and puts Pandhari first, naming the great pilgrimage cities he has actually visited only to set them below it. What makes Pandhari highest is not its fame but its spirit: there is no pride there, and devotees bow to one another instead of competing for rank. That mutual bowing, equals lowering themselves before equals, is the mark of true pilgrimage. The closing line is the high promise of the bhakti path: one true visit, made in that spirit, frees a person from the fear of death itself.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Abandoning all worldly shame, call upon Yaduraja with devotion. Go looking at trees, stripping their bark, and eating what you find, and still call upon Vitthal.

Gather rags, twist them into thread, wrap them around your waist, and call upon Him. Says Tuka, when one sets out with such utter resolve, Narayana will never forsake that soul.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Throw away all the world's shame, and call on Yaduraja with the cry of a beggar. Look for trees, strip their leaves, eat them, and still call on Vitthal. Gather rags, twist them into thread, wrap them around your waist, and call. Tuka says: when you stage your last stand like this, Narayana will not pass that one by.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the cost of calling on God for real, and he does not soften it. Worldly shame is the first thing to drop; then comfort goes, until a person is eating stripped leaves and clothed in rags twisted from scraps. He is not glorifying poverty for its own sake; he is naming the depth of surrender at which the cry becomes total. The Marathi word nirvana here means a last stand, the point past which there is nothing held back. That is the claim: when someone gives up everything down to dignity and food and still keeps crying out, Narayana does not ignore them.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

From the same cow come both buttermilk and butter; one should not demand both for the price of one. In the belly of the sky dwell both the moon and the stars; one should not regard them as equal.

In the belly of the earth lie both diamonds and common pebbles; one should not treat them alike. Says Tuka, so it is with saints and ordinary folk; one should not worship them in the same way.

IN PLAIN WORDS

From the same cow come buttermilk and butter; you cannot ask for both at one price. In the sky's belly are the moon and the stars; do not look at the two as equal. In the earth's belly lie the diamond and the pebble; do not treat the two as the same. Tuka says: so it is with saints and ordinary people; do not worship the two the same way.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram teaches discernment through three plain pictures: buttermilk and butter, moon and stars, diamond and common stone. In each pair the two things come from one source and share a place, yet they are not of one worth, and pretending otherwise cheats the higher thing. He then lands the point: saints and ordinary folk are like this. The teaching is not contempt for ordinary people; it is a warning against flattening the difference, against giving a saint and a crowd the same regard and so missing what a saint actually is.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Thirteen days have passed as I stand here waiting, and still You do not come, O Ananta, my mother and father. You sit there wrapped in a shell of stone.

What has happened to You, O Hrishikeshi? I will now give up my life before You. I will lay the blame of my death upon You, O Panduranga.

I have placed all my hope in You, Vithabai; I will destroy my very life, O Panduranga. Says Tuka, I have resolved utterly. I will lay down my life at Your door.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Thirteen days have passed as I keep my fast and watch, and still you do not come, Ananta, my mother and father. You sit there wrapped in a shell of stone. What has happened to you, Hrishikeshi? Now I will give up my life upon you. I will lay the guilt of a death on you, Panduranga. Long, Vithabai, I have held my hope on you; I will destroy my own life, Panduranga. Tuka says: now I have made my last stand. I will lay down this life at your door.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the lover's threat, the boldest move in bhakti, spoken to a God who seems to have gone silent and still as the stone image he stands in. Thirteen days of fasting and waiting have brought no answer, so Tukaram turns to the one weapon a child has against a parent who will not respond: he threatens to die on God's doorstep and lay the blame for that death on God himself. The harshness is not unbelief; it is the opposite, the certainty that he is truly God's child and that God cannot finally bear the guilt of letting him perish. It is despair used as the last, most desperate form of prayer.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The world has grown foul and inauspicious, so I have renounced it, O Panduranga. I have forsaken sense pleasures, given up my ego, and come to Your shelter, O Panduranga.

I have abandoned home and family, O Narayana, O life of my life, Panduranga. Says Tuka, I have fallen at Pundalik's feet. Rush to me, O Hrishikeshi, and embrace me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

People have grown many and foul and unholy, so I have left them, Panduranga. I have been cheated of the senses' pleasures, I have lost my I-ness, I have come to your shelter, Panduranga. I have given up house and door, all of it, Narayana, life of my life, Panduranga. Tuka says: I have fallen here at Pundalik's feet. Run, Hrishikeshi, take me in your arms.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram traces a withdrawal that ends in surrender. He has turned from a world he finds foul, given up the pleasures of the senses, let go even of his ego, and walked away from home and family. But the poem is not about what he renounced; it is about where he landed. Having emptied his hands, he falls at Pundalik's feet at Pandhari, the very spot that brought Vitthal there, and begs God to come running and embrace him. Renunciation here is only the clearing away; the whole weight of the poem rests on the open-armed welcome he is asking for.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Narayana made me a slave of the senses. That is why I endure such suffering.

To whom can I even tell my plight? I have no strength in my body to renounce everything. Says Tuka, my destiny has been exceedingly cruel.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Narayana made me a slave of the senses. So I bear it like this; to whom shall I even tell it? There is no strength in my body to renounce it all. Tuka says: in a great heap my destiny has come out crooked.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a confession of helplessness, and it dares to lay the bondage at God's own door: it was Narayana who made him a slave of the senses. There is no one to complain to, because the maker of the trouble is also the only one who could end it. Tukaram admits plainly that he does not have the strength in himself to renounce everything, so he cannot lift the burden by willpower. Naming his destiny as crooked is not self-pity for its own sake; it is the honesty that comes before grace, the admission that he cannot save himself and must be carried.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whatever I reach for slips away from my hand. What wretched fate is this, the lot of the ill-fortuned? I belong neither to God nor to worldly life; I find no shelter in either place.

Says Tuka, the land yields no harvest, and even begging brings nothing.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I go to hold a thing in my hand, and by that very reaching it slips away. Why has such a lot come to me, the empty share of a luckless man? Not God, not the world: in neither place do I find a footing. Tuka says: the land gives no crop, and begging brings nothing either.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from the worst middle place, where nothing holds. Whatever he reaches for slides off, and he calls himself the luckless one whose share has come out empty. The sharp ache is that he fits nowhere: he has not arrived in God, and he has let go of the world, so neither side gives him ground to stand on. The closing images, a field that yields no harvest and a begging bowl that stays empty, name a hunger with no relief from either direction. It is the honest cry of a seeker caught between two worlds, owning the barrenness rather than pretending he is settled.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hiring someone to weep does not bring real tears or genuine love. In the same way, what value has mere talk of devotion? It is the logic of colored glass, not true gems.

Under compulsion one makes a show of feeling, but behind it lies the urge to flee. Says Tuka, the light of a firefly needs no wick.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hire someone to weep, and there is no real grief and no love in it. Just so, what is mere talk of devotion worth? It is the logic of colored glass passed off as a jewel. Held to it by force, a person makes a show of feeling, but behind it the foot is already turned to run. Tuka says: the light of a firefly needs no wick.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram exposes counterfeit devotion with two cutting pictures. A hired mourner weeps on cue, but there is no grief and no love behind the tears; talk of bhakti without real feeling is exactly that, colored glass sold as a gem. He notices the tell of the fake: a person pressed into devotion will perform the look of feeling while inwardly already turning to flee. The closing image catches the difference between forced and genuine: a firefly carries its own light and needs no wick, no outside fuel, just as true devotion glows from within and does not have to be propped up by show or pressure.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Only then is this birth worthwhile: if one becomes a servant of Vitthal. Otherwise, what scarcity is there of wretched dogs and pigs? The fruit of being born should be that no impurity clings to you.

Says Tuka, blessed are those in whose name humanity finds its honor.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Then alone is it worth coming to birth: to become the servant of Vitthal. Otherwise, is there any shortage of poor dogs and pigs? The fruit of having lived should be that no filth clings to your body. Tuka says: blessed are those by whose name humanity itself is honored.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks what a human birth is actually for. His answer is blunt: it is worth taking only if it is spent as a servant of Vitthal, because if mere living were the point, the world has no shortage of animals already doing that. The fruit he names is purity, a life that leaves no defilement clinging to it. He ends by lifting up the rare souls who reach that mark, saying their very name brings honor to the whole human kind. The poem's edge is its low comparison: without devotion, a human life is no higher than a stray animal's.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The saints are God; the saints are God. Images are only a representation.

I say this with true feeling; let it be known to all. In the formless absolute, the directions stand empty; but here in the saints, all desires are fulfilled.

Says Tuka, this is ready nourishment. Partaking of it, one's hunger is truly satisfied.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The saints are God, the saints are God; the image is only an occasion. I am telling you this in true feeling; let it be known to everyone. In the formless, the directions stand empty; here, with the saints, the wish is fulfilled. Tuka says: this is ready goods. Take it, and the belly is filled.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a bold claim and stands behind it openly: the living saints are God, and the stone image is only a starting point, an occasion for worship rather than the fullness of it. He does not hide this teaching; he wants it known to all. His reason is practical, not abstract: the formless absolute is real but empty to the seeker, with no direction to turn toward, while the saint is God in a form that meets you and answers. The closing image is of food ready at hand: the company of saints is nourishment you can take now and be filled, not a far promise.

His illusions are beyond understanding. A sage sought a single bedsheet and spent sixty years gestating in a womb for it.

How can one grasp the swift and playful One, O mother, who pervades all three worlds? In His meeting with Hanuman, the pride of both was dissolved. Through Satyabhama's form, He humbled Garuda.

He fulfilled Draupadi's need at the critical moment and restored fruits to their stems for the sages. When Arjuna set a monkey upon his chariot banner, God resolved the wager and humbled both parties' pride.

Says Tuka, He plays with all beings according to their temperament, whether they be virtuous or wicked.

IN PLAIN WORDS

His illusions cannot be understood. A sage once wanted a single bedsheet, and for it he lay sixty years in a womb. How can you grasp him, O mother? He is swift; he is playful; he fills all three worlds. When he met Hanuman, the pride of both was taken away. Through Satyabhama's form he humbled Garuda. He met Draupadi's need at the moment she cried out. He set the fruits back on their stems for the sages. On Arjuna's chariot he placed the monkey on the banner. He settled the wager between the two and took away the pride of both. With love and devotion even a wicked man turns good. Tuka says: he plays with everyone, each in their own way.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praying about a God who cannot be measured, and he piles up old stories to show it. He names how this Lord pervades all three worlds yet stays swift and playful, dissolving pride wherever he meets it: Hanuman's, Garuda's, the wager on Arjuna's banner. He meets Draupadi at the breaking point and restores the sages' fruit, small mercy and great power side by side. The point is that the same God who humbles the proud also turns the wicked good through love, and that no one stands outside his play. Tukaram leaves you not with a doctrine but with the sense that the One you cannot grasp is already handling each person according to their own nature.

Generous one, compassionate one, God of gods: now my contest is with you. Tell me, how will you get away from me now? You have overturned everything; you have drowned my worldly life. I have gathered all my attachments and set them on your trail. Now forget those debates of 'I am He' and 'Who am I.' Tuka says: I have seized your feet in a tight embrace. Let whatever falls, fall; even if it breaks the bond between us.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns prayer into a wrestling match he intends to win. Having let God drown his worldly life, he refuses to let God slip away, and he sics all his old attachments onto God's trail so the Lord cannot escape. He sets aside the lofty Vedantic questions of identity, 'I am He,' 'Who am I,' as debates he no longer needs once he has the feet themselves. The closing line is the stake: he has clamped onto God's feet and will not let go, even if the grip itself snaps the bond. It is the boldness of total surrender, where clinging becomes its own argument.

GATHA 2491 The Power of the Name

The Name, the body made clean

मराठी मूळ

जाली होती काया । बहु मळीन देवराया ॥1॥
तुमच्या उजळली नामें । चित्त प्रक्षिाळलें प्रेमें ॥ध्रु.॥
अनुतापें झाला झाडा । प्रारब्धाचा केला तोडा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे देह पायीं । ठेवूनि झालों उतराई ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My body had become very impure, O Lord. But it was cleansed and illumined by Your name, and my chitta was washed pure by love.

Through remorse, the burden of past destiny was swept away and cut loose. Says Tuka, I placed my body at Your feet and became free of all debt.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My body had grown very impure, O Lord. Your name made it bright again; love washed my mind clean. Through remorse the whole account was swept clear; the knot of past karma was cut. Tuka says: I laid my body at your feet, and my debt was paid.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a cleansing he did not work by his own merit. A body grown impure is made bright by the Name; the mind is washed not by ritual but by love. He names remorse as the broom that sweeps the old account away and cuts the binding thread of past karma. The final act is to lay the whole body at God's feet, and in that surrender the debt is settled. The poem holds out the Name and remorse as enough, with no penance added.

GATHA 2492 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, every day a festival

मराठी मूळ

आजि आनंदु रे एकी परमानंदु रे । जया श्रुति नेति नेति ह्मणती गोविंदु रे ॥1॥
विठोबाचीं वेडीं आह्मां आनंदु सदा । गाऊं नाचों वाऊं टाळी रंजवूं गोविंदा ॥ध्रु.॥
सदा सन सांत आह्मां नित्य दिवाळी । आनंदें निर्भर आमचा कैवारी बळी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नाहीं जन्ममरणांचा धाक । संत सनकादिक तें आमचें कवतुक॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Today there is bliss, supreme bliss. The Vedas call Him 'not this, not this,' and yet He is Govinda.

We who are mad for Vithoba live in constant joy; we sing, we dance, we clap, and we delight Govinda. Every day is a festival for us, every day a Diwali.

Our mighty protector fills us with boundless joy. Says Tuka, we have no fear of birth and death. The saints like Sanaka are our kin and our delight.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Today there is bliss, the one supreme bliss. The Vedas say of him 'not this, not this,' and he is Govinda. We who are mad for Vithoba are always glad. We sing, we dance, we clap, we delight Govinda. Every day is good for us; every day is Diwali. Our strong protector fills us full with joy. Tuka says: we have no fear of birth and death. The saints like Sanaka are our kin and our play.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the dry negations of the Vedas, 'not this, not this,' beside a name you can sing, and the singing wins. He says the One the scriptures can only point to by denial is simply Govinda, near enough to dance for. To be 'mad for Vithoba' is not loss but constant festival, every ordinary day a Diwali. The reward he names is concrete: because their protector is strong, the lovers lose the fear of birth and death. The saints of old become not distant authorities but kin in the same joy.

GATHA 2493 The Power of the Name

The Name, the seed-mantra that costs nothing

मराठी मूळ

प्राणियां एक बीजमंत्र उच्चारीं । प्रतिदिनीं रामकृष्ण ह्मण कां मुरारि ॥1॥
हें चि साधन रे तुज सर्व सिद्धींचे । नाम उच्चारीं पां गोपाळाचें वाचे ॥ध्रु.॥
उपास पारणें न लगे वनसेवन। न लगे धूम्रपान पंचाअग्नतापन ॥2॥
फुकाचें सुखाचें कांहीं न वेचें भांडार । कोटी यज्ञां परिस तुका ह्मणे हें सार ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O beings, chant this one seed-mantra: every day say Rama, Krishna, Murari. This alone is the means to all perfections.

Let your mouth utter the name of Gopala. No fasting or feasting is needed, no retreat to forests, no burning of sacred fires, no five-fire penance.

This treasure is free and joyful, and costs nothing at all. Says Tuka, it surpasses tens of millions of sacrifices; this is the essence.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O living beings, say this one seed-mantra. Every day say Rama, Krishna, Murari. This alone is the means to every perfection. Let your mouth speak the name of Gopala. You need no fasting, no breaking of fasts; no going off to the forest; no breathing of smoke; no penance among five fires. This treasure is free and full of joy; it costs you nothing. Tuka says: it surpasses ten million sacrifices. This is the heart of it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram puts the whole apparatus of religion on one side and a single name on the other. He lists the hard disciplines, fasting and feasting, forest retreat, smoke and the five-fire penance, and waves them all away as unnecessary. Against them he sets the bare repetition of Rama, Krishna, Murari, Gopala, which he says reaches every perfection. The selling point is the price: this means is free, joyful, and open to anyone with a mouth, while the costly sacrifices it outstrips are not. He calls it the essence, the one thing that need not be earned.

GATHA 2494 The Power of the Name

The Name, the fruitful birth

मराठी मूळ

विठ्ठल कीर्तनाचे अंतीं । जय जय हरी जे ह्मणती॥1॥
बैसोनि हरिकथेसी । होय सावध चित्तासी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे त्याचा जन्म । सुफळ जाला भवक्रम ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who at the end of Vitthal's kirtan say 'Jai Jai Hari,' and those who sit attentively at hari-katha with a focused mind, Says Tuka, their birth has become fruitful and their cycle of worldly existence is complete.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those who, at the end of Vitthal's kirtan, say 'Jai Jai Hari'; those who sit at hari-katha and keep their mind awake and attentive: Tuka says: their birth has borne fruit, and their round of worldly life is fulfilled.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lowers the bar of salvation to the reach of an ordinary listener. He names two small acts: joining the cry of 'Jai Jai Hari' as the kirtan ends, and sitting through the telling of God's story with an awake, attentive mind. To these he attaches the largest possible reward, a birth made fruitful and the whole cycle of worldly existence brought to its completion. The point is that presence and attention at the singing are themselves the saving deed; nothing grander is required.

GATHA 2495 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, say Rama or perish

मराठी मूळ

न चलवे पंथ वेच नसतां पालवीं । शरीर विटंबिलें वाटे भीक मागावी ॥1॥
न करीं रे तैसें आपआपणां । नित्य राम राम तुह्मी सकळ ह्मणा ॥ध्रु.॥
राम ह्मणवितां रांडा पोरें निरविशी । पडसी यमा हांतीं जाचविती चौ†याशी ॥2॥
मुखीं नाहीं राम तो ही आत्महत्यारा । तुका ह्मणे लाज नाहीं तया गंव्हारा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The path cannot be walked without provisions in hand; the body suffers, and one must beg along the way. Do not do this to yourself.

All of you, constantly say Rama, Rama. If you waste time pampering wife and children without uttering Rama's name, you will fall into Yama's hands and be tormented through eighty-four lakh births.

One whose mouth never holds Rama's name is a self-slayer. Says Tuka, such a fool has no shame at all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You cannot walk the road with no provisions in your bundle; the body is ruined, and you end up begging along the way. Do not do this to yourselves. All of you, say Rama, Rama, every day. If you spend your time fussing over wife and children and never call Rama's name, you will fall into Yama's hands, and the eighty-four lakh births will torment you. The one whose mouth never holds Rama is his own murderer. Tuka says: such a fool has no shame at all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the image of a traveler with an empty bundle to warn about a life without the Name. The provisions for the road are Rama's name said daily; without them the journey ends in ruin and begging. He names the stake plainly: time spent only on family while the Name goes unsaid leads to Yama and the long torment of countless rebirths. His sharpest word, that the nameless man is his own killer, points not at any one person but at the self-neglect of anyone who lets the days pass without it. The shamelessness he scorns is a pattern to catch in oneself, the slow squandering of the one provision that matters.

GATHA 2496 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the moth and the raft of stone

मराठी मूळ

थडियेसी निघतां पाषाणांच्या सांगडी । बुडतां मध्यभागीं तेथें कोण घाली उडी ॥1॥
न करी रे तैसें आपआपणा । पतंग जाय वांयां जीवें ज्योती घालूनियां ॥ध्रु.॥
सावधपणें सोमवल वाटी भरोनियां प्याला । मरणा अंतीं वैद्य बोलावितो गहिला ॥2॥
तुकाह्मणे करीं ठायींचा चि विचार । जंवें नाहीं पातला यमाचा किंकर ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A raft of stones may carry you near the shore, but when it sinks in midstream, who will leap in to save you? Do not do this to yourself. A moth dies in vain by rushing into the flame.

One who carelessly drinks poison in a full cup calls for a physician only when death draws near. Says Tuka, make your resolve now, while Yama's messenger has not yet arrived.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A raft of stones may carry you to the edge of the water, but when it sinks midstream, who will leap in to save you? Do not do this to yourself. The moth dies for nothing, throwing its life into the flame. Carelessly you fill the cup and drink the poison, and only when death is near do you send for the doctor in a panic. Tuka says: settle the matter now, here, before Yama's servant has arrived.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strings together three pictures of a danger entered with open eyes. A raft of stone looks like passage but sinks in deep water, and no one will dive after you; the moth flies straight into the flame; the careless drinker swallows poison and calls a doctor only when it is too late. Each names the same pattern: trusting what cannot save, and waking to it past the hour of rescue. The urgency is the point. He tells you to settle the matter of your life now, while there is still time, before death's messenger stands at the door. It is a warning aimed at the habit of delay in oneself, not at any particular sinner.

GATHA 2497 Longing and Separation

Longing, demanding one's due from God

मराठी मूळ

द्या जी माझा विचारोनियां विभाग । न खंडे हा लाग आहाचपणें ॥1॥
किती नेणों तुह्मां साहाते कटकट । आह्मी च वाईट निवडलों ते ॥ध्रु.॥
करवितां कल्हें जिवाचियेसाटीं । हे तुह्मां वोखटीं ढाळ देवा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे धीर कारण आपुला । तुह्मीं तों विठ्ठला मायातीत ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Give me my due portion after fair consideration. This persistent longing does not cease by itself.

I do not know how long You can endure this pestering. Perhaps it is I alone who have been found wanting.

You make me quarrel for my very life, yet You find such importuning distasteful, O God. Says Tuka, this patience serves Your own purpose, for You, O Vitthal, are beyond all illusion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Weigh it fairly and give me my share, Lord. This longing will not stop on its own; it will not be shaken off lightly. I do not know how long you can bear my pestering. Perhaps it is only I who have been judged worthless. You make me quarrel for the sake of my own life, and yet such begging is distasteful to you, O God. Tuka says: this patience serves your own purpose. You, Vitthal, are beyond all illusion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses a claim on God and refuses to pretend the longing is bearable. He asks for his rightful portion, weighed out fairly, because the ache will not cease by itself. He even turns the discomfort on God: it is you who set me quarreling for my life, and you who find this begging unwelcome. But the last turn is trust, not accusation: he reads God's slowness as deliberate, a patience that serves God's own purpose, since Vitthal stands beyond the illusion that fools the rest. The poem holds complaint and faith together, demanding while still bowing.

GATHA 2498 The Nature of God

Nature of God, the One who set it in motion

मराठी मूळ

आमुचे ठाउके तुह्मां गर्भवास । बिळवंत दोष केले भोग ॥1॥
काय हा सांगावा नसतां नवलावो । मैंदपणें भाव भुलवणेचा ॥ध्रु.॥
एका पळवूनि एका पाठी लावा । कवतुक देवा पाहावया ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे ज्याणें असें चेतविलें । त्याच्यानें उगळें कैसें नव्हे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You know our sufferings in the womb; our powerful sins have caused the experiences we endure. Why speak of this as though it were some marvel? With trickery You create bewilderment.

You set one running and another chasing, just to watch the spectacle, O God. Says Tuka, the One who set all this in motion surely has the power to undo it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You know our time in the womb; our heavy sins brought on the suffering we bear. Why tell it as if it were some wonder? With your trickery you bewilder our hearts. You set one running and another chasing behind, just to watch the show, O God. Tuka says: the One who lit all this can surely put it out.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays the whole machinery of suffering at God's own feet. The pain of birth and the weight of sin are real, he grants, but they unfold inside a bewilderment that God himself spreads, a trickery that no one should mistake for a marvel. He pictures God as a watcher setting one creature to flee and another to chase, staging the spectacle for his own amusement. The poem's quiet demand is its last line: if you kindled this fire, you have the power to quench it. It hands responsibility back to the One who started the game, and asks him to end it.

GATHA 2499 Longing and Separation

Longing, pleading with the silent Lord

मराठी मूळ

निदनयासी तुह्मी करितां दंडण । तुमचें गा†हाणें कोठें द्यावें ॥1॥
भाकितों करुणा ऐकती कान ।उगलें चि मौन्य धरिलें ऐसें ॥ध्रु.॥
दीनपणें पाहें पाय भिडावोनि । मंजुळा वचनीं विनवीतसें॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे गांठी मनाची उकला । काय जी विठ्ठला पाहातसां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You punish the innocent, and to whom shall I take my complaint against You? I cry out for mercy; my ears hear, but You maintain a stony silence. I gaze at Your feet with humility, and I entreat You in gentle words.

Says Tuka, untie the knot of Your chitta. What are You waiting for, O Vitthal?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You punish the innocent; where am I to take my complaint against you? I cry out for mercy. Ears hear me, and yet you keep this stubborn silence. Humbly I gaze at your feet and press close; in soft words I keep on begging. Tuka says: loosen the knot in your heart. What are you waiting for, O Vitthal?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram stands before a God who will not answer and names the bind directly: if the judge himself wrongs you, there is no higher court to appeal to. He has done everything a suppliant can, crying for mercy, clinging to the feet, pleading in gentle words, and still meets a silence he calls stubborn. The closing line is part rebuke, part plea: untie the knot in your own heart, the withholding is yours, not mine. He does not abandon the door; he keeps knocking and asks, simply, what God is waiting for. The poem is the patience of love that refuses to be turned away.

GATHA 2500 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, the face that glows with grace

मराठी मूळ

नसतों किविलवाणें । कांहीं तुमच्या कृपादानें ॥1॥
हे चि तयाची ओळखी । धालें टवटवित मुखीं ॥ध्रु.॥
वांयां जात नाहीं । वचन प्रीतीचें तें कांहीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे देवा । सत्य येतें अनुभवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I would not appear so pitiful were it not for Your grace. The mark of Your blessing is this: my face glows with contentment.

A word spoken with love never goes to waste. Says Tuka, O God, this truth comes through direct experience.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I would not be so pitiful but for your gift of grace. This is the sign of it: a face grown bright and content. A word spoken in love is never wasted; nothing of it is lost. Tuka says: O God, this proves true in living experience.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram points to a quiet, visible mark of grace rather than to any argument for it. Whatever poverty or helplessness he still wears, he says it would be worse without God's gift, and the gift shows itself plainly in a face turned bright and content. He adds a small certainty: a word spoken in love goes nowhere to waste. The closing line is the whole ground of the poem, that none of this is theory but something tested and found true in his own experience. It is the calm testimony of a man reporting what he has lived.

Tukaram Gatha

तुकाराम गाथा

Original Marathi with English translation, a plain-language reading, and an explanation of what each abhanga means

Volume 6: Gatha 2501-3000 - 490 abhangas

About This Edition

This reading edition brings together four layers for every abhanga: the original Marathi, an English translation, a rendering in plain words, and a short explanation of its meaning.

The English layers are devotional reading aids. No translation can fully carry Tukaram's Marathi music, wordplay, cultural setting, or spiritual force. Readers are encouraged to return to the original and to consult Marathi teachers and established scholarly editions.

Marathi source: Tukaram Gatha on Marathi Wikisource. The source dataset identifies the Marathi text as public domain. English reading layers are from the Ananta Satsang online edition.

Editorial note: We ask forgiveness for any inaccuracies in rendering Tukaram Maharaj's original Marathi.

GATHA 2501 Prayers

Prayer, the servant's claim on God

मराठी मूळ

जालों तंव साचें । दास राहवणें काचें ॥1॥
हें कां मिळतें उचित । तुह्मी नेणा कृपावंत ॥ध्रु.॥
सिंहाचें ते पिलें । जाय घेऊनियां कोल्हें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नास । आह्मां ह्मणविलियां दास॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Having truly become Your servant, my hold on the world has grown fragile. Does this seem right to You, O compassionate One, that You do not see? A lion's cub is carried off by a jackal.

Says Tuka, if we are called Your servants, then our destruction would be Your shame.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Once I truly became Yours, my grip on the world went soft. Is this fair, then, O compassionate One, that You do not see? The lion's own cub is carried off by a jackal. Tuka says: it would be Your ruin if those who are called Your servants are let go to waste.

WHAT IT MEANS

Having given himself to God, Tukaram finds his hold on worldly things has loosened, and he turns this into an argument back at God. He asks the compassionate Lord why he is being left unseen, then sharpens it with an image: a lion's cub, which is to say one who belongs to the strong, should never be dragged off by a jackal. The poem presses a bold logic: a servant's neglect is the master's disgrace. So Tukaram stakes his safety not on his own merit but on God's honor, making God responsible for what happens to those who bear His name.

GATHA 2502 True Worship

True worship, the cleansed mind

मराठी मूळ

देवाच्या उद्देशें जेथें जेथें भाव । तो तो वसे ठाव विश्वंभरें ॥1॥
लोभाचे संकल्प पळालियावरी । कैंची तेथें उरी पापपुण्या ॥ध्रु.॥
शुद्ध भक्ती मन जालिया निर्मळ । कुश्चळी विटाळ वज्रलेप ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे ज्याचें तयासी च कळे । प्रांत येतो फळें कळों मग ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Wherever devotion is directed toward God, there the Lord of the Universe makes His abode. When the impulses of greed have fled, what question remains of sin or merit? When pure devotion makes the mind spotless, all notions of impurity become as unbreakable as a diamond seal.

Says Tuka, only the one who experiences it truly knows; the proof comes in its own time through the fruit it bears.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wherever the heart turns toward God, there the Lord of the universe makes His home. Once the schemes of greed have run off, what room is left for sin or merit? When pure devotion makes the mind clean, all the old marks of defilement are sealed away as hard as diamond. Tuka says: only the one who lives it knows it; the proof comes in time, through the fruit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing where God truly dwells and what happens to the mind that loves Him. God settles wherever devotion is aimed, so the place of worship is the heart, not a site. When greedy plans drain away, the whole bookkeeping of sin and merit loses its footing, because that ledger ran on craving. Pure devotion does not merely cover impurity but seals it shut, fixed like a diamond. He ends by refusing to argue the point: this is known only by tasting it, and time will show the fruit.

GATHA 2503 Renunciation

Renunciation, holding nothing back

मराठी मूळ

कडसणी धरितां अडचणीचा ठाव । ह्मणऊनि जीव त्रासलासे ॥1॥
लौकिकाबाहेरि राहिलों निराळा । तुजविण वेगळा नाहीं तुजा ॥ध्रु.॥
संकोचानें नाहीं होत धणीवरी । उरवूनि उरी काय काज ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे केलें इच्छे चि सारिखें । नाहींसें पारिखें येथें कोणी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Holding to restraint in a place of difficulty has wearied my jiva. I have stepped outside all worldly convention.

Apart from You, there is nothing separate from You. Satisfaction does not come through holding back; what use is it to keep something in reserve? Says Tuka, I have done exactly as my desire prompted. Here, no one is a stranger.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Trying to hold myself in check, in this hard place, has worn my life out. So I have stepped outside the world of opinion, set apart. Apart from You there is nothing that is not You. Holding back never brings me to fullness; what use is it to keep some part in reserve? Tuka says: I have done exactly as my longing pushed me. Here no one is a stranger.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram explains why he has dropped the careful restraint that public life demanded. Trying to keep himself measured and proper exhausted him, so he stepped clear of worldly convention and convention's judgment. His reason is a clean nondual claim: nothing exists apart from God, so there is nowhere and no one to be guarded against. Hedging and keeping a portion in reserve can never satisfy; only full self-giving does. He has followed his desire for God all the way, and in a world that is wholly God, no one stands outside as an alien.

GATHA 2504 Prayers

Prayer, asking only to keep His feet

मराठी मूळ

हें चि जतन करा दान । धरुनी चरण राहिलों तो॥1॥
आणीक कांहीं न घलीं भार । बहुत फार सांकडें ॥ध्रु.॥
घ्यावी माझ्या हातें सेवा । हे चि देवा विनवणी ॥2॥
तुका तुमचा ह्मणवी दास । तेणें आस पुरवावी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Guard this one gift: I have grasped Your feet and remain there. Do not burden me with anything more; there is hardship enough already.

Accept my service from my own hands; this alone is my prayer, O God. Says Tuka, I call myself Your servant; fulfill that aspiration.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Guard just this one gift: I have caught hold of Your feet and I stay here. Do not load me with anything more; the hardship is already too great. Take my service from my own hands; this alone is my plea, O God. Tuka says: I call myself Your servant; let that hope be fulfilled.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays for one thing and asks God not to add to it. The single gift he wants kept is the hold he already has on God's feet; he is not asking for more, only to keep what he has. He pleads against further burden, since his load is heavy enough, and asks that his offered service be accepted directly from his own hands. The closing turns his self-naming into a claim on God: he calls himself a servant, so let God honor that bond by granting the one hope.

GATHA 2505 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the famine of truth

मराठी मूळ

आपल्या च स्कुंफ्दें । जेथें तेथें घेती छंदें ॥1॥
पडिला सत्याचा दुष्काळ । बहु फार जाली घोळ ॥ध्रु.॥
विश्वासाचे माठ । त्याचे कपाळीं तें नाट ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे घाणा । मूढा तीथाअ प्रदिक्षणा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By their own scheming, wherever they go, they pursue their whims. A famine of truth has fallen upon the land; great confusion abounds.

Those who are trusting become the stage for trickery upon their foreheads. Says Tuka, for the foolish, pilgrimages and circumambulations become nothing more than grinding at the mill.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By their own scheming, wherever they are, people chase their own whims. A famine of truth has fallen; the muddle has grown vast. The trusting become the stage on which fraud is played out across their foreheads. Tuka says: for the fool, pilgrimage and circling the shrine are only turning the oil-press.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names a sickness in the religious world around him: people act on private scheming and appetite while truth has dried up like a famine. He points to how the guileless and trusting get used, made into the surface on which others stage their deceit. The sting at the end falls on empty ritual: pilgrimage and walking circles around a shrine, done without truth, are no better than an ox plodding the oil-press, hard labor that goes nowhere. The poem aims at the pattern of hollow show, calling the listener to ask whether his own devotion has any truth in it.

GATHA 2506 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the burden laid down

मराठी मूळ

उद्वेगाची धांव बैसली आसनीं । पडिलें नारायणीं मोटळें हें ॥1॥
सकळ निंश्चती जाली हा भरवसा । नाहीं गर्भवासा येणें ऐसा ॥ध्रु.॥
आपुलिया नांवें नाहीं आह्मां जिणें । अभिमान तेणें नेला देवें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे चेळें एकाचिया सत्ता । आपुलें मिरवितां पणें ऐसें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The rush of anxiety has settled into stillness, and this bundle of cares has been laid down before Narayana. All uncertainty is resolved; I have this assurance that I shall not return to the womb.

I no longer live by my own name; God has taken away my pride. Says Tuka, I am moved by the will of one Master alone; such is what it means to abide in His sovereignty.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The running of my anxiety has sat down at last. This whole bundle of cares I have dropped before Narayana. Every uncertainty is settled; I have this assurance: I will not come back through the womb. I no longer live under my own name; God has carried off my pride. Tuka says: I move only by the will of one Master. This is what it is to live in His rule.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the peace that follows complete surrender. The restless motion of worry has finally come to rest, and he has set his whole load of cares down before Narayana rather than carrying it himself. From this comes certainty, including the assurance that he will not be born again. The change goes deep: he no longer lives in his own name, because God has taken away the pride that was the self he used to defend. What is left is a life moved only by God's will, which he names as living inside God's sovereignty.

GATHA 2507 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, free wealth at the door

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे करूनि अंतीं । निंश्चती हे ठेवावी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A wealth sufficient for many has arrived at our door. Take it freely, without any cost.

Do not forget Narayana. Listen with a clear and settled mind, attentively and with care.

Says Tuka, after all is done, hold fast to this certainty.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A wealth enough for many has come to our door. Take it, for free, at no cost. Do not forget Narayana. Listen with a settled mind, with open and careful ears. Tuka says: when all is done, keep this one certainty laid by.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram calls his hearers to seize an abundance that asks nothing in return. The wealth at the door is the Name of God, and unlike worldly riches it is given freely, so the only failure is not taking it. He presses two things: do not forget Narayana, and listen with a clear, attentive mind rather than half-hearing. The closing turns the appeal into a parting instruction: of everything one might keep at the end of life, hold on to this certainty, the assurance that the Name gives.

GATHA 2508 Prayers

Prayer, fear-bound surrender examined

मराठी मूळ

माझी मज जाती आवरली देवा । नव्हतां या गोवा इंिद्रयांचा ॥1॥
कासया मी तुझा ह्मणवितों दास । असतों उदास सर्व भावें ॥ध्रु.॥
भयाचिया भेणें धरियेली कास । न पुरतां आस काय थोरी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आपआपुलीं जतन । कैचें थोरपण मग तुह्मां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My own nature has ensnared me, O God. Had there not been this entanglement of the senses, why would I call myself Your servant? I would have remained indifferent to all things.

Out of fear I clutched Your hem; if my hope is not fulfilled, what is the use of Your greatness? Says Tuka, each must look after his own; without that, where is Your glory?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My own nature has trapped me, O God. If there were no tangle of the senses, why would I call myself Your servant? I would have stayed indifferent to everything. Out of fear I caught at the hem of Your robe; if my hope is not granted, what is Your greatness worth? Tuka says: each of us must be kept by You. Without that, where is Your glory?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes an unusually honest confession and then turns it into a plea. He admits his own nature snared him, and that he might never have called himself God's servant at all if the senses had not entangled him; left to himself he would have stayed cool and uninterested. He owns that it was fear that made him grab God's hem. Yet from that low place he still presses his claim: a greatness that does not rescue its frightened suppliant is no greatness, and a Lord whose own people are not kept has no glory. The honesty about his motive does not weaken the demand; it grounds it in God's reputation rather than his own worth.

GATHA 2509 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the giver needs the beggar

मराठी मूळ

विनवितों तरी आणितोसि परी । याचकानें थोरी दातयाची ॥1॥
आमुचे ही कांहीं असों द्या प्रकार । एकल्यानें थोर कैचे तुह्मी ॥ध्रु.॥
नेघावी जी कांहीं बहु साल सेवा । गौरव तें देवा यत्न कीजे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नाहीं आमुची मिरासी । असावेंसें ऐसीं दुर्बळें चि ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When I entreat You, You respond in kind; the beggar proclaims the greatness of the giver. Let something of our exchange remain as well; by Yourself alone, how can You be called great? Do not exact too much devoted service, O God; honor and worth require some gentle effort.

Says Tuka, I have no claim to authority; we are meant to remain humble and lowly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When I plead, You answer in the same measure; it is the beggar who makes the giver great. Let some part of the exchange be ours too; by Yourself alone, how could You be called great? Do not demand too much hard service, O God; worth and honor want a gentler effort. Tuka says: I hold no claim of my own. We are meant to stay weak and lowly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram plays with the strange mutual need between God and devotee. He notes that the giver's greatness only shows because there is a beggar to receive, so the lowly soul is not nothing in the exchange. He asks God to leave room for the devotee's part, since glory alone, with no one to give to, would be empty. Then he gently bargains: do not lay on a crushing load of service, for honor is better drawn out by a kinder demand. He closes by disowning any merit of his own; his only standing is weakness, and that very lowliness is what calls forth God's grace.

GATHA 2510 Faith and Trust

Faith, resolve to conquer the inner foes

मराठी मूळ

एका ऐसें एक होतें कोणां काळें । समर्थाच्या बळें काय नव्हे ॥1॥
घालूनि बैसलों मिरासीस पाया । जिंकों देवराया संदेह नाहीं ॥ध्रु.॥
केला तो न संडीं आतां कइवाड । वारीन हे आड कामक्रोध ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जाळीं अळसाची धाडी । नव्हती आली जोडी कळों साच ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One thing leads to another in due course; by the strength of the Capable One, what is impossible? I have planted myself firmly at the foundation of my claim. I shall conquer, O Lord; there is no doubt.

I shall not abandon the effort I have begun; I shall drive away the obstacles of desire and anger. Says Tuka, I shall burn down the army of laziness. Let it be known truly that such a treasure was never before attained.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One thing leads to another in its time; by the strength of the Capable One, what cannot be done? I have set myself down firmly at the ground of my claim. I will win, O Lord; there is no doubt. I will not let go of the work I have begun; I will drive off these blocks, desire and anger. Tuka says: I will burn down the army of laziness. Let it be known for truth: such a treasure was never won before.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks with the resolve of someone settling in for a long inner campaign. He trusts that with God's strength nothing is impossible, and he has planted himself on his rightful claim to God, sure of victory. He names the enemies plainly: desire and anger are the obstacles he will drive off, and laziness is an army he means to burn down. The poem treats the spiritual life as steady, deliberate effort rather than a single leap, and it ends by naming the prize, a treasure greater than any won before, to keep the fight worth its cost.

GATHA 2511 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, rest at His feet

मराठी मूळ

जाले समाधान । तुमचे धरिले चरण ॥1॥

सुरवाडिकपणें । येथें सांपडलें केणें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे भाग । गेला निवारला लाग ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Contentment has come from holding Your feet. Now, O Narayana, the mind has no wish to rise and leave.

Such ease and comfort have been found here. Says Tuka, all weariness is gone, and all restless longing has ceased.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Peace has come from holding Your feet. Now, O Narayana, the mind has no wish to get up and go. Such ease, such comfort, I have found here. Tuka says: the weariness is gone, and the restless chasing has stopped.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the contentment of arrival. Simply by holding God's feet, his mind has found rest and no longer wants to rise and wander off after anything else. He calls the place one of ease and comfort, a refuge where the seeking can stop. The closing names what has lifted: the fatigue of the long search is gone, and the restless pursuit that drove him is finally at an end. The whole poem is the quiet of a search that has come home.

GATHA 2512 Prayers

Prayer, the beggar at the door

मराठी मूळ

मुखाकडे वास । पाहें करूनियां आस ॥1॥
आतां होईल ते शिरीं । मनोगत आज्ञा धरीं ॥ध्रु.॥
तुह्मीं अंगीकार । केला पाहिजे हें सार ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे दारीं । उभें याचक मीं हरी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I gaze toward Your face, waiting with hope. Whatever shall come, I shall bear it upon my head; I hold Your command within me.

You must accept me; that is the essential thing. Says Tuka, I stand at Your door as a beggar, O Hari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I gaze toward Your face, waiting in hope. Whatever comes, I will carry it on my head; I hold Your command inside me. You must take me up; that is the one thing that matters. Tuka says: I stand at Your door as a beggar, O Hari.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays as one who has stopped bargaining and simply waits. He keeps his eyes on God's face, full of hope, and pledges to bear whatever God sends, carrying His command as a thing held above the head. His single request is that God accept him, which he names as the one essential. The image he leaves us with is stark and humble: he stands at Hari's door as a beggar, having nothing to offer but his waiting and his readiness to obey.

GATHA 2513 Longing and Separation

Complaint of love, the unfair distance

मराठी मूळ

नाहीं माथां भार । तुह्मी घेत हा विचार ॥1॥
जाणोनियां ऐसें केलें । दुरिल अंगेसी लाविलें ॥ध्रु.॥
आतां बोलावें आवडी । नाम घ्यावें घडी घडी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे दुरी । देवा खोटी ऐसी उरी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You do not take the burden upon Yourself; this is Your deliberate plan. Knowing this, You have placed the difficulty upon my shoulders.

Now let me speak with love and take Your name again and again. Says Tuka, O God, this sort of remaining distant is unfair.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You carry no weight on Your head. You arranged it this way on purpose. You knew, and so You did it: You laid the hard part on my shoulders. Now let me call out with love, and take Your name again and again. Tuka says: O God, this staying far off is a wrong thing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks to God like one who has been treated unfairly, and says so plainly. He charges that God keeps Himself free of all burden by design, deliberately placing the difficulty of the search on the devotee instead. He does not let the complaint curdle into despair: in the same breath he turns to calling on the Name with love, over and over. The closing line names the stakes without softening them, that for God to stay at a distance after all this is simply not fair.

GATHA 2514 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the burden handed over

मराठी मूळ

माझें जड भारी । आतां अवघें तुह्मांवरी ॥1॥
जालों अंकित अंकिला । तुमच्या मुकलों मागिला ॥ध्रु.॥
करितों जें काम। माझी सेवा तुझें नाम ॥2॥
तुका पायां लागे । कांहीं नेदी ना न मगे॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My heavy burden now rests entirely upon You. I have been claimed and marked as Yours; I have let go of all that was mine before.

Whatever work I do is my service, and Your name is my sustenance. Says Tuka, I bow at Your feet; I neither give nor ask for anything.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My burden is heavy. Now all of it rests on You. I have become Yours, marked and claimed. I have let go of all that used to be mine. Whatever work I do is my service. Your name is my food. Tuka says: I fall at Your feet. I give nothing, and I ask for nothing.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the act of total handover, stated as fact. Tukaram declares that the weight he could not carry now sits entirely on God, because he has been claimed and stamped as God's own and has released everything he once called his. His ordinary work becomes worship, and the Name becomes the thing that keeps him alive. The last line marks the completeness of the surrender: at God's feet he neither offers nor begs anything, because there is no longer a separate self left with terms to set.

GATHA 2515 Ecstasy and Joy

Contentment, the matter settled

मराठी मूळ

तुह्मी आह्मी भले आतां । जालों चिंता काशाची॥1॥
आपुलाले आलों स्थळीं । मौन कळी वाढेना ॥ध्रु.॥
सहज जें मनीं होतें । तें उचितें घडलें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नसतें अंगा । येत संगा सारिखें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now You and I are both well; what worry remains? We have each arrived at our rightful place; quarrels born of silence will not grow. What was naturally in the mind has come to pass as it should.

Says Tuka, nothing alien clings to the body when one walks in the right company.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now You and I are both well. What is there to worry about? Each of us has come to his own place. No quarrel grows out of this silence. What was simply in the mind has come to pass, as it should. Tuka says: nothing strange clings to the body when you keep the right company.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing a settled peace, the quiet after a long reaching is finally answered. He and God have each arrived where they belong, and the silence between them is not the silence of distance but of resolution, so no quarrel can take root in it. What the heart had always wanted has come about naturally, in its right time. The closing note names how it happened: in true company nothing foreign sticks to you, the right association keeps the self clean.

GATHA 2516 The Moral Ideal

Moral counsel, a cool and forgiving heart

मराठी मूळ

चित्ता ऐसी नको देऊं आठवण । जेणें देवाचे चरण अंतरे तें ॥1॥
आलिया वचनें रामनामध्वनि । ऐकावीं कानीं ऐसीं गोडें ॥ध्रु.॥
मत्सराचा ठाव शरीरीं नसावा । लाभेंविण जीवा दुःख देतो ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे राहे अंतर शीतळ । शांतीचें तें बळ क्षमा अंगीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not give the mind such memories as would distance it from God's feet. When words of Rama's name resound, let the ears drink in their sweetness.

Let no envy dwell in the body; without gain it only brings suffering to the jiva. Says Tuka, let the chitta remain cool within. The strength of peace lies in bearing forgiveness in every limb.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not feed the mind such memories as would carry it away from God's feet. When words come and the sound of Rama's name rises, let the ears drink in that sweetness. Let no envy find a place in the body; it gives the jiva pain for no gain at all. Tuka says: keep the heart cool within. The strength of peace is forgiveness held in every limb.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out the inner discipline that keeps a person near God. He warns against letting the mind dwell on whatever pulls it from God's feet, and tells it instead to feast on the sweetness of Rama's name whenever it sounds. He singles out envy as the poison to refuse: it only brings the soul suffering and yields nothing in return. The close turns from warning to the positive ideal, a heart kept cool inside, where the real strength of peace shows itself as forgiveness carried in the whole body.

GATHA 2517 The Saints

Praise of saints, the company that frees

मराठी मूळ

कोण पुण्य कोणा गांठी । ज्यासी ऐसियांची भेटी॥1॥
जिहीं हरी धरिला मनीं । दिलें संवसारा पाणी ॥ध्रु.॥
तुका ह्मणे त्यांचे भेटी। होय संसारासी तुटी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What great merit brings one the company of those who have held Hari in their minds and renounced the world? Says Tuka, in meeting such souls, one's bondage to worldly life is broken.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What great merit, stored up in whom, lets a person meet souls like these? They have held Hari in their minds. They have poured water on the world and let it go. Tuka says: in meeting them, the bond with worldly life is cut.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram marvels at the rare good fortune of meeting true saints. He asks what immense store of merit a person must carry to be granted such company, those who keep Hari fixed in their minds and have poured the funeral water over the world, treating it as already dead to them. The stake he names is liberation itself: simply meeting such souls severs one's bondage to samsara. The poem makes the saints' company, not one's own effort, the door that opens.

GATHA 2518 Longing and Separation

Longing, the thread He pulls

मराठी मूळ

तरि च हा जीव संसारीं उदास । धरिला विश्वास तुह्मां सोई ॥1॥
एके जातीविण नाहीं कळवळा । ओढली गोपाळा सूत्रदोरी ॥ध्रु.॥
फुटतसे प्राण क्षणांच्या विसरें । हें तों परस्परें सारिखें चि ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे चित्तीं राखिला अनुभव । तेणें हा संदेह निवारला ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The jiva became disenchanted with worldly life because it placed its trust in You. Without kinship of the same kind, there is no genuine concern; You have pulled the guiding thread, O Gopala.

My life breaks apart at even a moment's separation from You; this is true for us both equally. Says Tuka, the experience held within the chitta has dispelled all doubt.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This life turned cold to the world only because it set its trust on You. Without kinship of one kind there is no real ache of care; You have pulled the guiding thread, O Gopala. My breath breaks at even a moment's forgetting of You. This is the same for us both. Tuka says: I have kept the living experience in my heart, and by it this doubt is cleared away.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram traces his disenchantment with the world back to its true cause: he turned cold to it only because his trust had already moved to God. He says real concern arises only between those of one kind, and so it is God who has drawn the thread that pulls him, like a puppeteer drawing his own. Then he makes the bold claim that the longing runs both ways, that a moment's forgetting breaks his breath and that this is equally true for God. The close grounds it all not in argument but in lived experience kept in the heart, which has settled the doubt for good.

GATHA 2519 Prayers

Prayer, take me and drown me in love

मराठी मूळ

किती विवंचना करीतसें जीवीं । मन धांवडवी दाही दिशा ॥1॥
कोणा एका भावें तुह्मी अंगीकार । करावा विचार या च साटीं ॥ध्रु.॥
इतर ते आतां लाभ तुच्छ जाले । अनुभवा आले गुणागुण ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे लागो अखंड समाधि । जावें प्रेमबोधीं बुडोनियां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How much more deliberation must I carry in my mind? The mind races in all ten directions. By some way or another, please accept me, O Lord; this is my only purpose.

All other gains now seem worthless; their qualities and flaws have been experienced. Says Tuka, may unbroken absorption take hold, and may I drown in the ocean of divine love.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How much weighing and figuring do I carry in my heart? My mind runs off in all ten directions. By some one feeling, take me as Your own; consider it, for this alone. All other gains look worthless to me now. I have tasted their good and their bad. Tuka says: let an unbroken absorption take hold, and let me go down, drowning, into the knowing of love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is worn out by the mind's endless calculation and asks God to end it by simply accepting him. He pleads that God find some single ground of feeling on which to claim him, since that is the one thing he wants. He explains why nothing else will do: he has tested every other gain, weighed its merits and faults, and found them all worthless. The closing prayer names what he is reaching for instead, an unbroken samadhi in which he drowns completely in the knowledge of divine love.

GATHA 2520 Renunciation

Renunciation, burn the seeds of desire

मराठी मूळ

दिक चि या नाहीं संसारसंबंधा । तुटेना या बाधा भवरोगाची ॥1॥
तांतडींत करीं ह्मणऊनि तांतडी । साधिली ते घडी सोनियाची ॥ध्रु.॥
संकल्पाच्या बीजें इंद्रियांची चाली । प्रारब्ध तें घाली गर्भवासीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे बीजें जाळुनी सकळ । करावा गोपाळ आपुला तो ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There is truly no remedy for the disease of worldly attachment; the affliction of this mortal sickness does not cease. In urgency I acted urgently and seized the golden moment.

The senses move according to the seeds of desire, and past destiny casts one into the womb again. Says Tuka, burn all those seeds to ash and make Gopala your own.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There is truly no cure for the tie to worldly life. This sickness of the world will not let go of me. So in haste I made haste, and I won that golden moment. The senses move by the seed of desire, and past karma throws one back into the womb. Tuka says: burn all those seeds to ash, and make Gopala your own.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram faces the disease of worldly attachment squarely: there is no half-cure for it, the affliction does not loosen on its own. So he acted with urgency, seizing the precious moment before it passed. He names the mechanism that keeps the trap running, that the senses move on the seed of desire and past destiny keeps casting the soul back into birth. The remedy he gives is total, not partial: burn every such seed to ash, and in its place make Gopala your own.

GATHA 2521 Longing and Separation

Longing, the devotee's sit-down protest

मराठी मूळ

आतां होइन धरणेकरी । भीतरीच कोंडीन ॥1॥
नाही केली जीवेंसाटी । तों कां गोष्टी रुचे तें ॥ध्रु.॥
आधी निर्धार तो सार । मग भार सोसीन ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे खाऊं जेवूं । नेदूं होऊं वेगळा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now I will become one who sits in determined protest. I will confine Him within.

Until this is done with all my life's force, how can mere talk satisfy me? First comes firm resolve; that is what matters. Then I will bear whatever burden comes.

Says Tuka, we shall eat and feast together; I will not let Him become separate from me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now I will sit down in protest and not move. I will shut Him in. Until this is staked on my very life, how can mere talk please me? First comes the firm resolve; that is the heart of it. Then I will bear whatever weight comes. Tuka says: we will eat and feast together. I will not let Him become separate from me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram threatens God the way a creditor sits at a debtor's door and refuses to leave until paid. He vows to mount such a sit-down protest, to shut God in and not be put off by words, because nothing less than staking his whole life will satisfy him. He insists the firm resolve must come first, and only then will he take on whatever hardship follows. The close turns the demand intimate: he will share his food with God and will not allow any separation between them to stand.

GATHA 2522 Faith and Trust

Faith, leaving it to the silent Lord

मराठी मूळ

होइल तरि पुसापुसी । उत्तर त्यासी योजावें ॥1॥

जाणेनियां अंतर देव । जेव्हां भेव फेडील ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे धरिला हातीं । करील खंतीवेगळें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If questions arise, fitting answers should be given. Until then, I shall not put forth anything of my own before Him.

God knows the inner truth, and when He dispels all fear, Says Tuka, once He has taken me in hand, He will free me from all sorrow.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If questions come, the answer should be fitted to them. Until then I put nothing of my own forward. God knows the heart within. When He clears away all fear, Tuka says: once He has taken me by the hand, He will set me free of every sorrow.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the patience of a faith that waits and does not press its own case. He resolves to answer only what is asked and otherwise to advance nothing of his own, trusting that God reads the inner truth without being told. He rests on God's timing: when God chooses to lift the fear, the change will come. The close names the assurance underneath it all, that once God has taken him by the hand, He will free him from every sorrow.

GATHA 2523 Faith and Trust

Faith, the silent Lord understood by signs

मराठी मूळ

हा तों नव्हे कांहीं निराशेचा ठाव । भलें पोटीं वाव राखिलिया ॥1॥
विश्वंभरें विश्व सामाविलें पोटी । तेथें चि सेवटीं आह्मी असों ॥ध्रु.॥
नेणतां चिंतन करितों अंतरीं । तेथें अभ्यंतरीं उमटेल ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे माझा स्वामी अबोलणा । पुरवूं खुणे खुणा जाणतसों ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This is no place of despair, so long as there is room kept in the chitta. The Lord of the Universe has gathered the entire world into His belly, and we too abide there in the end.

Though unknowing, I carry on contemplation within; it will one day manifest in the inner depths. Says Tuka, my Lord is one of silent understanding; I know how to communicate through His subtle signs.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is no place for despair, so long as there is room kept in the heart. The Bearer of the worlds has gathered the whole world into His belly, and there too, in the end, we abide. Without knowing it, I keep up the contemplation within, and there in the depths it will rise up clear. Tuka says: my Lord is one of silence. I know how to fill the space, sign answering sign.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram refuses despair as long as the heart keeps even a little room open. His ground is that the Sustainer of all has taken the entire universe into Himself, so that we too rest within Him in the end and are never truly lost. He keeps up an inner contemplation even without fully grasping it, trusting that it will one day surface clearly from the depths. The close pictures his bond with a wordless God: the Lord stays silent, and Tukaram answers in the same language, understanding the exchange through subtle signs rather than speech.

GATHA 2524 The Nature of God

Nature of God, the formless and the loving form

मराठी मूळ

निष्ठ तो दिसे निराकारपणें । कोंवळा सगुणें प्रतिपाळी॥1॥
केला च करावा केला कइवाड । होईल तें गोड न परेते ॥ध्रु.॥
मथिलिया लागे नवनीत हातां । नासे वितिळतां आहाच तें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आतां मनाशीं विचार । करावा तो सार एकचित्त ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The formless appears stern in its impersonal aspect, but the One with form tenderly nurtures through gracious qualities. The effort already made must be continued and carried through; what is sweet cannot be abandoned.

When milk is churned, butter comes to hand, but if melted carelessly it simply dissolves. Says Tuka, now deliberate with the mind and fix upon the essence with single-pointed attention.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The formless looks stern in its bare, shapeless aspect. The One with form tenderly cares for us through His gracious qualities. What is begun must be done; the work taken up must be carried through. What turns out sweet should not be let go. Churn the milk and butter comes to your hand; but melt it carelessly and the thin stuff is lost. Tuka says: now reason it out with the mind, and fix on the essence with one undivided heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram compares two ways of meeting God and points toward the one he trusts. The formless absolute strikes him as austere and forbidding, while God with form, saguna, tenderly nurtures the devotee through His loving qualities. He urges that the path once begun be carried through, since what proves sweet must not be abandoned. The image of churning makes the point: steady effort yields butter, the real substance, but careless handling loses even what you had. The close calls for clear, single-pointed reflection that settles on this essence and holds to it.

GATHA 2525 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, purity undone

मराठी मूळ

बहु देवा बरें जालें । नसतें गेलें सोंवळें ॥1॥
धोवटाशीं पडिली गांठी । जगजेठीप्रसादें ॥ध्रु.॥
गादल्याचा जाला जाडा । गेली पीडा विकल्प ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे वरावरी । निर्मळ करी निर्मळा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It is truly well, O God, that false notions of ritual purity have departed. By the grace of the Lord of the world, we have encountered the Washerman of souls.

The thick quilt of doubt has been thinned out, and the pain of inner conflict is gone. Says Tuka, layer by layer, the Pure One purifies what is already pure.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It is good, O God, that all these things are gone. My false notions of ritual purity have left me. By the grace of the Lord of the world, I have met the Washerman of souls. The thick quilt of my doubt has been thinned out. The pain of my inner conflict is gone. Tuka says: layer by layer, the Pure One cleans what is already pure.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is rejoicing that his anxious bookkeeping about ritual purity has fallen away. He names God as a washerman, the very caste that purity rules would push to the margin, and says it is that washer of souls who has cleaned him. The thick quilt of doubt and the ache of being divided against himself are both gone. The closing image presses the point: God scrubs the soul layer after layer, even though the soul was never truly soiled. The purity rules were measuring a stain that was not there.

GATHA 2526 Prayers

Prayer, lay down the load

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Though the secrets of mastery lie close at hand, we go on carrying bundles of qualities on our backs. Free us from this drudgery, O Benefactor; do not make us vessels for any more burdens.

The wealthy one has the strength of authority to sever all afflictions. Says Tuka, a fresh shoot has appeared where the old was broken; let the old bypaths be forgotten.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The secrets of mastery lie close by, yet I keep carrying bundles of my own virtues on my back. Free me from this drudgery, O Giver. Do not make me a vessel for one more burden. The rich one holds the power to cut away every affliction. Tuka says: a fresh shoot has come up where the old stem was broken; let the old bypaths be forgotten.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sees that liberation is near at hand, yet he keeps hauling loads he made for himself, even the load of his own good qualities. He begs God, the true wealthy one with real authority, to release him from this labor instead of adding to it. The point is that even spiritual achievements can become baggage we carry with pride. He ends with hope: a new shoot has sprouted where the old growth snapped off, so the old detours can be let go.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To repay my debt, I have entered Your service; grant me relief, O Narayana. Through the offering of this body I have become free of obligation; let all past sins be forgiven.

Until now I was clinging to life, and that usurious grip caused me great distress. Says Tuka, I have brought devotion into my chitta; Your place is right there, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To clear my debt I have entered Your service; grant me release, O Narayana. I have settled what I owe by giving up my claim on this body; let all my sins be cancelled. Until now I clung to my life, and that grasping, like interest on a loan, kept me in great distress. Tuka says: I have brought devotion into my mind, and Your place is right there, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram frames his life as a debt owed to God and surrender as the way to settle it. By offering up the body and his claim to it, he declares himself square and asks that the whole account of sin be wiped clean. He confesses that holding tight to his own life was the source of his suffering, like a loan whose interest only deepens the trouble. The poem ends inward: he has set devotion in his own mind, and that is exactly where God already dwells, so the place of meeting was never far off.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

With this intention I shall remain at Your feet with unwavering resolve. I shall perform whatever service is commanded, offering complete servitude, O God.

The shackle of bondage has been broken; this freedom is now our true gain. Says Tuka, I shall not be separated from Your feet even for a moment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

With this longing I will stay at Your feet; I have made up my mind. I will do whatever service You command; I offer You complete servitude, O God. The shackle of my bondage has broken, and that freedom is now my one gain. Tuka says: not for a moment will I be apart from Your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram resolves to stay at God's feet and accept any service asked of him. He calls this total servitude, yet in the same breath he says it is what has broken the shackle of his bondage. The paradox is the heart of it: binding himself wholly to God is the very thing that sets him free. So he refuses any separation, even for an instant, because the feet he is bound to are also his release.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Settle Your own entanglements Yourself. Why would You make my burden heavier? Debt upon debt is no way to work; one should not keep multiplying labor, O God.

Now make room for me in Your generous belly; there is no place left for disputes in this world. Says Tuka, once the account is cleared, I shall not fall back into the commerce of accumulated karma.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Untangle Your own knots Yourself. Why would You make my load heavier? Debt piled on debt is no way to do business; do not keep adding to the labor, O God. Now make room for me in Your wide belly; there is no place left in this world for these disputes. Tuka says: once the account is cleared, I will not fall back into the trade of accumulated karma.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks to God in the blunt language of accounts and trade. He refuses to take on yet more burden and tells God to resolve the tangle Himself, since piling debt on debt settles nothing. He asks to be taken in completely, swallowed up where there is no more room for argument. The closing vow is the stake: once this account is finally cleared, he will never again enter the marketplace of karma, never start a fresh ledger of births and merits.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have grown weary of all company; You alone are dear to me. I have clasped Your feet, O Lord of the world, and I shall not let go.

I have become greatly weakened and worn; by this weariness, suffering itself is destroyed. Says Tuka, like one who longs for life by the Ganga, my yearning is for that sacred place alone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am sick of all company; You alone are dear to me. Now I have clasped Your feet, O Lord of the world, and I will not let go. I have grown very weak and worn out, and by this very weariness my suffering is destroyed. Tuka says: like one who longs to live by the Ganga, my yearning is for that holy place alone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram has tired of every other attachment and turned to God as the one thing he still wants. He grips God's feet and refuses to release them. Then he says something striking: his exhaustion is not a defeat but a cure, for by being worn down he is emptied of the very thing that suffers. He compares his longing to the wish to spend one's life beside the Ganga; he wants only the holy nearness of God and nothing else.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Cooler than coolness itself is the water that has washed Your feet. I bear that holy water upon my head and hold it within my chitta.

It destroys all sin; it is the supreme pilgrimage, the father of my soul. Says Tuka, sitting beneath the waves of that grace, I am immersed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Cooler than coolness itself is the water that has washed Your feet. I take that holy water on my head and hold it within. It destroys every sin; it is the highest pilgrimage, the father of my soul. Tuka says: sitting down beneath those waves, Tuka is steeped and overflowing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram exalts the water that has washed God's feet as cooler than anything cool, a relief beyond all relief. He places it on his head and keeps it in his heart, treating this humble act as worth more than any journey to a sacred river. He calls it the supreme pilgrimage and even the father of his soul, naming a single devotional gesture as greater than the famous holy places. At the end he sits down under those waves of grace and is completely soaked, swept fully into them.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By the bank of the Godavari there was a well, dug as a playful labor of love. Those with discerning eyes gathered and channeled its water, bringing it to serve life.

They guarded the place and offered their meager lives to the task. Says Tuka, the owner is relieved; this is the rest that the righteous enjoy.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By the bank of the Godavari there was a well, dug in playful love. People with seeing eyes did something with it: they led its ready water out to serve life. They guarded the spot and gave their small lives to the work. Tuka says: the owner is set free, and this is the rest the good ones find.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells a small parable of a well dug beside the Godavari almost as play. Those with discernment did the real work: they channeled its waiting water out so it could nourish life, kept watch over the place, and poured their modest lives into the task. The closing turn carries the meaning: when the work is rightly tended by such people, the owner is relieved of his burden. This is the quiet rest that the righteous come to, the peace of a life spent in faithful service rather than for itself.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I shall not look back now or retrace my steps; my jiva is weary of this worldly life. Come forward to receive me, O Benefactor; I cannot endure the summons of death.

My mind will become steadfast if given support; even at play it will feel well. Says Tuka, my throat is choked with this yearning. How is it that nearness does not come?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will not look back now or retrace my steps; my soul is sick of worldly life. Come forward and gather me up, O Giver; I cannot bear the summons of death. My mind will hold steady if it is given support; even at play it will feel well. Tuka says: my throat is choked with this longing. How is it that the nearness still does not come?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram has set his face away from worldly life and refuses to turn back. He asks God to come toward him and take him in, because he dreads death's call and cannot face it alone. He admits his mind can only stay steady when it has God to lean on; with that support even ordinary living feels well. The poem ends in raw ache: his throat is tight with yearning, and he cries out at the puzzle of it, that God who is so near has still not let Himself be reached.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The butter obtained from churning is beneficial to all. Let my prostration be like the churning rod, leaving nothing held back.

Why spread out more words when the urgency is right here at hand? Says Tuka, O Lord of the world, lift me up and place me at Your throat.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The butter that comes from churning does good to everyone. Let my bowing down be like the churning rod, with nothing held back behind it. Why spread out many words when the urgency is right here at my head? Tuka says: O Lord of the world, lift me up and hold me at Your throat.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays for a surrender that keeps nothing in reserve. He takes the homely image of churning: as butter rises only when the rod works the milk fully, his prostration should be complete, leaving no part of himself withheld. He cuts off long speech, saying the need is too pressing for many words. The final plea is intimate and bold: he asks God not merely to accept him but to pick him up and hold him close at His throat, near the heart, like something cherished.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Suddenly, without my performing any service, a treasure was placed in my hands. My fortune has blossomed, and a meeting has occurred; I will not accept any parting hereafter.

Misery has departed and anxiety has been swept away; from now on, all days are auspicious. Says Tuka, a share has been allotted; now I may speak freely with God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Suddenly the treasure was placed in my hands, given though I did no service for it. My fortune has flowered; the meeting has happened; I will accept no parting after this. My poverty is gone, my worry is swept away; from now on every day is blessed. Tuka says: a share has been allotted to me, and now I can speak freely with God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram marvels that the great treasure was dropped into his hands without his having earned it by any service. He names it pure grace: good fortune has bloomed, the meeting with God has come, and he refuses to imagine ever being parted again. With that, his inner poverty and anxiety are simply gone, and every coming day turns auspicious. The closing line shows the new footing: he has been granted a share, a place at the table, so now he can speak with God plainly, as one who belongs.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have grasped the hem of the Capable One; what destruction can touch me now? Rush to my aid, and I will praise You; I am Yours, O Vitthal. I need not look in any direction; the moment I call, You draw me near.

Says Tuka, I cannot hold my patience, yet Your patience, born of compassion, is steady and unwavering.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have grasped the hem of the Capable One; what can destroy me now? Run to my aid and I will rejoice; I am Yours, O Vitthal. I do not need to look in any direction; the moment I call, You pull me near. Tuka says: I cannot keep my patience, yet Yours, born of compassion, stays steady.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram rests his whole confidence on God, the all capable one whose garment he has seized; with that grip, he asks, what ruin could touch him. He calls God to hurry to him and declares he belongs to Vitthal entirely. He does not need to search any direction, because God draws him close the instant he calls out. The poem ends in an honest contrast: Tukaram's own patience fails under his longing, but God's patience never wavers, because it is made of compassion.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let us recite from memory the compassionate words of those saints who made God manifest. They cleared and straightened the paths for those who follow.

Says Tuka, let us run with zeal and earn through our eagerness the same treasure they attained.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let us recite their words by heart, the compassionate speech of the saints. They are the ones who made God take form. Such is the grace they gave. They cleared the paths and made them straight. They left them ready and smooth for those who come after. Tuka says: let us run to take it. Let us long for it, and let us win that treasure.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is thanking the line of saints who went before him and telling us what to do with their gift. By their devotion they made the formless God manifest, and by their lives they cut a road through the wilderness and left it open and easy for everyone who follows. His instruction is simple: do not let that road sit unused. Keep their compassionate words alive by reciting them, and run hard toward the same goal they reached. The treasure is not handed over for free; it is won by eagerness to take the path already made.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My mind has become immovable and unshakable. Holding fast to my own inner truth, I remain.

A deep love for His qualities has settled within my chitta; let me partake of them to my full satisfaction. My single-pointed devotion does not turn into faithlessness, nor does it mix with any other quality.

Says Tuka, my mind has been captivated; my meditation is fixed upon Him who stands upon the brick.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My mind has become still; it does not move. I have caught the inner sign and I stay there. A love for his qualities has settled in my heart; let me drink them in to the full. My devotion has one direction only; it does not slip into doubt, and it does not mix with anything else. Tuka says: I have been taken captive. My meditation rests on him who stands on the brick.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing a mind that has finally come to rest. Once it wandered; now it holds fast to the inner mark and will not move from it. What holds it there is love, a settled relish for God's qualities that he wants to drink without limit. He names the quality of this devotion: it is single, undivided, neither thinning into unbelief nor diluting itself with other objects. The poem ends on its cause: his attention has been captured by Vitthal standing on the brick at Pandhari, and meditation now simply stays there on its own.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How can I, a lowly one, describe Your greatness? You are the ocean of mercy, the embodiment of grace. No one else possesses compassion like Yours; this is Your singular marvel, O Hrishikeshi.

On the battlefield of Kurukshetra, birds had nested in the grass. Suddenly, war pillars were set up there, and the place was marked for combat.

Kauravas and Pandavas, two mighty armies, arrived to fight. At that moment the birds remembered You, crying, 'Save us, O Lord.' Elephants, horses, and chariots would rush across that ground, and stones would be crushed to powder.

In such a catastrophe, how could we survive? Rush to us, O Hari, without delay. How could we abandon our young and fly away? Come quickly, O Lord of the universe.

At that moment compassion arose in Your chitta, O protector of the helpless, O Narayana. A bell hung from an elephant's neck; it fell upon the birds by chance.

For eighteen days the great battle raged, yet neither wind nor sun touched them. After the war ended, You showed Arjuna: 'Look how I have sheltered these birds.

See how I protected My own in the midst of battle.' Such is Your love for Your devotees. Says Tuka, You are our mother.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What greatness of yours can I, a lowly man, describe? You are the giver of mercy, the ocean of grace. No one else has compassion like yours; this is your one great wonder, Hrishikesha. On the field of Kurukshetra birds had hatched their young in the grass. Suddenly the war posts were planted there; the place was fixed for battle. Kauravas and Pandavas, both great armies, came there to fight. In that hour the birds remembered you, crying, 'Come, O Lord of Lakshmi.' Elephants, horses, chariots would charge across this ground; stones would be crushed to powder. In such terror, how could we live? Run to us, O Hari, quickly. How can we leave our chicks and fly away now? Come quickly, Lord of the world. In that hour mercy rose in your heart, O protector of the helpless, Narayana. A bell hung from an elephant's neck; by chance it fell down over the chicks. For eighteen days the great battle raged there, yet no wind, no sun touched them. When the fighting was over you showed Arjuna the birds. 'Look, I sheltered my own. See how I saved them alive in the midst of the battle.' Such is your love for your devotees. Tuka says: you are our mother.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram retells an old tale of the war at Kurukshetra to show what kind of God he serves. Birds had nested their fledglings in the grass right where the eighteen-day battle would be fought, and when the armies arrived they cried out to the Lord in helpless fear, unable to abandon their young. God's answer was small and exact: a bell, knocked loose from an elephant, dropped over the chicks like a dome, and under it they survived the slaughter untouched by wind or sun. Afterward he lifts the cover and shows Arjuna what he has done. The point Tukaram draws is not the marvel itself but the heart behind it: a mercy that stoops to the smallest creature in the worst place, a God whose care for his own is a mother's care. He opens by confessing he is too lowly to praise such greatness, and ends naming God his mother.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the company of Vaishnavas my jiva feels joy; I know nothing else, O God. I sing, I dance, I leap about in my own delight, moved by the happiness within.

Shame, fear, doubt, and pride have all been cast aside; I know no practice higher than this. Says Tuka, now by Your own effort, O Lord of the world, take care of us. Guarding this body, I fall prostrate at Your feet.

Says Tuka, humbly entreating the saints, I cannot repay their honor.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the company of the Vaishnavas my soul feels joy; I know nothing else, O God. I sing, I dance, I leap to my own tune, in the gladness and love of my heart. Shame, fear, doubt, and the wish for respect, I have pushed them all away; I know no practice higher than this. Tuka says: now by your own effort, Lord of the world, take care of us. Guarding this body, I fall full length at your feet. Tuka the lowly entreats the saints: I cannot repay their honor.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the one thing that gives him joy and what it has cost and won. Among the devotees of God he sings and dances and leaps freely, carried by the gladness inside him, and he says plainly he knows nothing else and wants nothing else. To get there he had to throw off four heavy things: shame, fear, doubt, and the craving to be honored; once those are gone, this open delight is itself the highest practice, with no technique above it. Having let go of his own efforts, he asks God to be the one who now takes care of him, and bows flat at the feet of the Lord and the saints, admitting their kindness is more than he can ever repay.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A mother adorns her child with ornaments; her love knows no end. I am nourished by your grace; today the company of saints is my mother and father.

Even at babbling words the mother is delighted; she clasps the child to her heart. She does not judge the merits or faults of what her womb has borne; she wishes only for its welfare.

The course of the heart flows in the direction of love, just as the Ganga does not know how to turn back. Says Tuka, how can the thirst of the chataka bird compare to the generous might of the rain clouds?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A mother dresses her child in ornaments; her love has no end, no edge. I am a poor child fed by your grace; today the saints are my mother and father. Even at babbling, broken words the mother is glad; she gathers the child to her heart. She does not weigh the merits or faults of what her own womb bore; she wants only its good. The heart's course runs along the channel of love, the way the Ganga does not know how to turn back. Tuka says: how generous is the might of the rain clouds; how small is my thirst, a chataka bird's thirst.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes the saints into a mother to say how their love works. A mother decks her child and folds it to her chest, delighted even by its broken babble, and never sits in judgment on the child her own body bore; she simply wills its welfare. He is that child, kept alive by their grace, with the saints as both father and mother. Love, once it starts, only flows forward, like the Ganga that cannot reverse its current. He closes with a humble proportion: their generosity is the whole sky of rain clouds, while his need is only the chataka's small thirst for a drop, so there is no fear that the gift will fall short.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All strategies have been exhausted; only this one art of spiritual living remains. I have placed my head at the feet of the saints with devotion, and I remain there with folded hands.

Through knowing I have come to know nothing at all; the inner witness testifies to the inner truth. Says Tuka, you have granted me the gift of fearlessness, and by that, contentment has taken root.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Every scheme of mine has run out and stopped; only this one art of living is left. I have laid my head at the feet of the saints with feeling, and I stay there with folded hands. By all my knowing I have come to know nothing; the inner witness alone bears witness within. Tuka says: you have given me the gift of fearlessness, and by it my peace has held.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing the moment when planning gives out and surrender begins. He has tried every strategy he had and they are all exhausted; what remains is the single art of resting in God. So he lays his head at the saints' feet and stays there with folded hands, no longer maneuvering. His learning has emptied into knowing-nothing, and the only true testimony left is the inner witness within the heart. The fruit of letting go is named at the end: they have granted him fearlessness, and on that gift his peace stands firm.

Longing, half-help is not enough

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When someone merely says 'Here, I have come' to a drowning person, how much strength does that give? You have truly taken on our entire burden and reassured us, Your children, with the hand of fearlessness. Showing food to a hungry person and giving assurances, how much patience and peace does that bring? Says Tuka, in exchange for the wish-fulfilling gem, a fitting offering of prostration and a glass bangle is all I can give.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Someone calls out to a drowning man, 'Here, I have come.' How much strength does that give him? You have truly taken on the whole burden and comforted me, your child, with the hand that gives fearlessness. To show food to a hungry man and only promise it, how much patience and peace does that bring? Tuka says: in return for the wish-granting gem you have given me, a fitting gift would be prostration and a glass bangle.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is contrasting words of help with help that arrives. A shout of 'I am coming' does almost nothing for a man going under, and a meal merely shown to the hungry brings no real ease; both leave the heart still waiting. Against this he sets what God has actually done: lifted the whole burden onto himself and reassured his child with a hand that takes away fear, not just a promise. The last line measures the exchange and confesses how lopsided it is: God has handed over the wish-fulfilling gem, the chintamani, and all Tukaram can lay down in return is his prostration and a cheap glass bangle. Devotion can never pay back grace in kind.

Longing, to see his face among the cowherds

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे वाटे देसी आलिंगन । अवस्था ते क्षणाक्षणां होते ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How must those blessed ones have seen You among the cowherds, O Narayana, with their fortunate eyes? That longing makes my jiva cry out: when will we ever attain such a treasure? What must be the joy of that divine vision, experiencing Your radiant face through direct experience? Says Tuka, it seems You would give an embrace, and the state of longing changes moment to moment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How those blessed ones must have seen you among the cowherds, O Narayana, seen you with their fortunate eyes. That longing has made my soul cry out like a beggar: when will I ever come into such wealth? What must that joy of seeing be, to taste your blessed face in living experience? Tuka says: it seems you would give me an embrace, and the longing rises and falls in me moment after moment.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is aching over a sight he did not get to share. He imagines the cowherds and the blessed ones of old who saw Krishna with their own fortunate eyes, and the thought turns his soul into a beggar pleading for the same wealth. He cannot stop wondering what that direct vision of God's face would actually feel like to taste. The poem stays in the unsteady middle of longing: at one breath it seems God is about to step close and embrace him, and at the next the certainty drops away, so the state swings back and forth moment by moment. It is the honest restlessness of one who has not yet seen but cannot stop wanting to.

GATHA 2545 Longing and Separation

Longing, the one fixed aim

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे करीं आवडीसी ठाव । नको माझा भाव भंगों देऊं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why has this longing made my chitta so restless, O Narayana? Like the chataka bird, I have fixed my aim on one thing alone; like an arrow aimed at its mark, it does not know how to turn aside. That dark-hued form, that four-armed figure, the name of Krishna in my heart, this is my only resolve.

Says Tuka, make room for my devotion; do not let my faith be shattered.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why has this longing made my heart so wretched and restless? Tell me, Narayana. Like the chataka bird I have one resolve only; like an arrow loosed at its mark, it does not know how to turn aside. The dark-hued form, the four-armed image, the name of Krishna in my heart, this is my whole intent. Tuka says: make a place for my love; do not let my faith be broken.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks God why this longing has left his heart so distressed, and in asking he reveals how single his desire has become. He compares himself to the chataka bird that drinks only from the rain, and to an arrow that, once released, cannot swerve from its target. His whole intent has narrowed to one thing: the dark four-armed form and the name of Krishna held in the heart, with no room for any rival aim. The closing prayer is the vulnerable part: give my love a place to rest, and do not let this single-pointed faith be shattered. He knows that a heart fixed this completely on one object has everything to lose if that hope fails.

GATHA 2546 Prayers

Prayer, hold my pledge true

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Will my vow prove false? Will the pledges I have declared before the world come to nothing? Make my plea come true, O Panduranga; come to me with compassion. Whom else can I call upon for help? I cannot beg at another's door.

Says Tuka, my only acquaintance is here; I shall find happiness at Your feet alone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Will my vow turn out false? I have shown the world your roll of titles. Make my claim come true; come, Panduranga, and caress me. Whom else can I send for help? I cannot go begging at another's door. Tuka says: my one acquaintance is here; I will be happy at your feet alone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is staking his own honor on God's response. He has gone about proclaiming God's titles and greatness to the world, and now he fears being made a liar: if God does not act, his public vow falls to the ground. So he asks Panduranga to come and make his claim true with a caress. He insists he has nowhere else to turn; he refuses to beg at any other door, because God is his only acquaintance and his happiness is fixed at these feet alone. It is the bold, almost demanding prayer of one whose reputation and his Lord's name now stand or fall together.

GATHA 2547 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, keep the loving distance

मराठी मूळ

तुह्मां आह्मां जंव जालिया समान । तेथें कोणां कोण सनमानी ॥1॥
उरी तों राहिली गोमटें गौरव । ओढे माझा जीव पायांपाशीं ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे लळे पाळीं वो विठ्ठले । कां हे उरविले भेदाभेद ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When You and I become equal, who will honor whom? So long as some distance remains, there is grace and dignity; my jiva is drawn toward Your feet. In my innocence I call out to You with affection, stringing together words like jewels of feeling.

Says Tuka, O Vitthale, indulge my childish ways. Why have You preserved these distinctions of difference?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If you and I were made equal, then who would honor whom? While some distance still remains, there is sweetness and grace, and my soul is drawn toward your feet. In my not-knowing I call out to you with affection; I coax you with words strung like jewels. Tuka says: indulge my childish wishes, O Vitthala. But why have you kept up this difference between us?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram plays with the paradox of nearness and distance in devotion. If devotee and God became simply equal, the whole relation of honoring and being honored would dissolve, and so would the sweetness of it; the small remaining gap is exactly what draws his soul toward God's feet and lets love happen. From his side of that gap he calls out in loving ignorance, coaxing God with words he strings together like jewels. He asks Vitthal to humor his childlike pleading, and then teasingly turns the question back: why have you yourself kept this difference between us in place? He half-suspects God preserves the distance on purpose, because love lives in it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not take my impulsive words at face value; I am only trying to convey what I feel. With what strength can I press my case at Your feet? We servants can only appeal for mercy.

What do I care for worldly reputation? Yet the experience itself is precious. Like one lured by a promise, my mind hovers close, hoping to catch Your word.

It seems as if You will fulfill my longing, and so the frenzy has entered my body. Says Tuka, my only desire is this: I long for the treasure of Your divine face.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not take my hasty words as empty; I am only trying to say what I feel. With what strength can I press my case at your feet? We servants can only cry out for mercy. What do I care for worldly fame? But the real experience, that is precious to me. Like one lured by a promise, my mind hovers close, turning your word over and over. It seems you will fulfill my hope, and so a madness has taken hold of my body. Tuka says: my one desire is here. I long for the treasure of your blessed face.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks God not to dismiss his blurted, impulsive words as worthless; behind the rough speech is real feeling. He admits a servant has no power to argue or press a claim; all he can do is beg for mercy. He sets aside any care for reputation in the world and says plainly that what he wants is the genuine experience of God, not its appearance. His mind keeps circling close like someone hooked by a half-given promise, replaying God's word and growing almost frantic with the sense that the longing might actually be granted. The whole pleading lands on one desire he names at the end: the priceless treasure of seeing God's face.

GATHA 2549 Prayers

Prayer at the hour of death

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Therefore I contemplate Your feet with urgency. Death follows close behind, and You are my compassionate mother.

I have grown weary through long delay and am frightened of that dreadful station. Says Tuka, You are my mother; come now at this final hour, O Vitthale.

IN PLAIN WORDS

So I hold your feet in my mind, and I hurry. Death is coming up behind me. You are the merciful mother. I have grown tired with all this delay. I am afraid of that place. Tuka says: you are my mother; come now, at the end, O Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays as a frightened child who knows time is short. He fixes his mind on Vitthal's feet with urgency, because death is already on his heels. The word that carries the whole poem is mother: he does not ask God for a verdict but for the arms a child runs to. He admits he wasted time in delay, that the place death leads to terrifies him, and that he has no merit to bargain with. So he asks only that the mother come at the last moment, when nothing else can help.

GATHA 2550 The Moral Ideal

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whatever increases ill repute should be thoroughly avoided. Truthful speech and goodness are what the world values.

One should be valiant through renunciation and set aside all that is worthless. Says Tuka, falsehood is a shameful stain, and sinful action brings only darkness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever brings you a bad name, give it up entirely. The world values truth and goodness; let your word be that. Be brave through giving up; set aside whatever is useless. Tuka says: a lie is a shameful stain, and a wrong deed leaves only a black mark.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out a short rule of conduct, plainly. He tells you to drop anything that earns disgrace, because what truly lasts in the world is truthful speech and goodness. He redefines courage: the brave person is the one who can renounce and let go of what is worthless, not the one who grabs and holds. The closing line names the stakes without softening them. A lie is not a small slip but a stain on you, and a shameful act leaves a lasting black mark on the life that does it.

GATHA 2551 Longing and Separation

Longing, love that cannot be undone

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My jiva has grown attached to His company; there is a sweet envy for that companionship. I cannot bear to be apart from Hari even for a moment.

Whatever may come of it, this attachment will not be undone. Says Tuka, like a spinning wheel set in motion, the force of love keeps turning.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My life has grown used to him. There is a sweet, jealous hunger for his company. I cannot stand to be apart, not for a moment, from Hari. Whatever quarrel it brings, it does not matter now; this clinging will not come loose. Tuka says: like a turning wheel, the force of it keeps spinning me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a love that has passed the point of return. His very life has grown accustomed to Hari's nearness, and the longing for it is sweet and possessive, jealous of any distance. He confesses he can no longer bear even a moment apart, and that whatever trouble this attachment costs him, he will not and cannot pry it loose. The closing image is honest about its own helplessness: he is not steering this, he is being turned, like a wheel set spinning by a force greater than his will.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This has always been His way; I have seen it abundantly with my own eyes. Once He enters, He does not let you turn back; He permeates you body and soul.

Do you not know His ways? Why do you befriend Him then? What He wraps around you is a dark blanket from the start. He has neither shame nor regard for anyone.

As the all-seeing witness, He remains silent, so that no one should feel anxious. Says Tuka, once Hari has taken you in hand, then rest in complete assurance.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This has always been his way; I have seen it again and again with my own eyes. Once he enters, he will not let you turn back; he soaks through you, body and being. Do you not know his trick? Yet you go on making friends with him. The blanket he wraps you in is dark, and his from the start. He has no shame in him; he asks no one's leave. As the witness of all he stays silent, so that no one need feel afraid. Tuka says: once Hari has taken you by the hand, then rest, fully at ease, in him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram half teases and half warns about the way God takes hold of a soul. He has watched it happen many times: once God enters a person, He does not allow a retreat, but seeps through them completely. With mock surprise he asks why anyone befriends such a one, knowing His habits; the dark blanket He throws over you was His all along, and He acts without shame or anyone's permission. Then the tone turns to comfort. That same God is the silent witness of everything, and His silence is so that no one should be anxious. The point lands in the last line: being seized like this is not a loss but a safety, so once Hari holds your hand, you can finally stop struggling and rest.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He is famous throughout the world for His play of colors. Yet no one truly walks His path; people remain mired in Narayana's household of illusion.

He has done this to many in the past, yet no attachment to His way takes hold. Be it man or woman, young or old, all hold Him in regard.

Once He draws you apart from the world, nothing of the old self remains. No one can tell what He is, in which direction He stands, whether vast or small.

Says Tuka, through any other approach, even His shadow cannot be perceived.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Everyone in the world knows him; he is famous for his play of colors. Yet no one walks the road to him; people stay sunk in Narayana's house of illusion. He has done this to many before, and still no one's heart fastens to his way. Man or woman, small or great, all give him respect. Once he draws you apart from the crowd, then nothing of the old self is left. No one can tell what he is, in which direction he stands, whether he is vast or very small. Tuka says: by any other way, you cannot see even his shadow.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram points at a strange fact: God is famous everywhere, praised by everyone, and yet almost no one actually goes to Him. People stay stuck in the household of illusion that is itself His doing, giving Him respect without ever turning onto His road. The poem names the real cost and the real reward together. When God finally pulls a person out of the crowd, the old self is destroyed root and all, and what He is then cannot be located or measured by anyone. The closing line names the one condition. There is no side door. Without that single true approach, you will not even glimpse His shadow.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I feel I should not leave this place; it offers a remedy for fear, a shield of protection. Therefore, the mind has dissolved into the mind; there is no concern for cause or occasion.

Through various modifications and disturbances at their root, preserving purity only produces more impurity. Says Tuka, words are of no use here. In the depths of the self, the self's own truth has been found.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now it feels I must not leave this place. It is the remedy for fear, the shield that guards me. So the mind has dissolved into the mind; there is no need now for cause or occasion. You can pile up endless disturbances at the root, but trying to keep yourself clean only makes you the very stain. Tuka says: no words are spent here. In my own self I have found my own mark.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from a place he has finally reached and refuses to leave. He has found a resting ground that is itself the cure for fear and his only protection, and once the mind sinks into its own source there is nothing left to chase or arrange. He warns about the trap of self-effort: when you fuss endlessly to keep yourself pure, that very straining makes you the impurity you were fleeing. The closing line is the quiet end of the search. This cannot be argued or talked into being; deep within himself he has recognized his own true sign.

GATHA 2555 The Necessity of Experience

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The feast of authority presents itself at the right moment, and the partaking happens with true relish. Through earnest effort, weariness has been overcome and oneness has been attained; the heart has found its union with the indwelling Lord.

What has been measured and gathered is stored within; the accounting of what was apportioned is now settled. Says Tuka, I have become the master now; whatever I choose to do, that power is mine.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the hour comes, the feast of true power is set before me, and I eat it with real relish. The effort wore down the weariness; all has become one. In my heart I have found the way, and the company. What was stored up is gathered in the bag; the count of what was measured out is settled. Tuka says: I have become the owner now. Whatever I choose to do, that authority is mine.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the moment when long practice ripens into possession. The hard work has finally consumed the weariness, the inner division has closed into oneness, and the heart has found both the path and the companionship it sought. He uses the plain images of a household ledger: the harvest is in the bag, the accounts are squared, nothing is still owed or pending. The bold last line is not arrogance but the report of an heir who has come into his inheritance. Having given himself fully to God, he now speaks as the master of his own house, the power to act at last truly his.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whatever He gives, there is no shortage. Nothing is lacking on His part.

What is needed now is accumulated merit to exercise authority here. He fills each vessel according to its quality; whatever He provides becomes one's gain.

Says Tuka, God takes the form each deserves; one's own destiny bears fruit accordingly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever he gives is never too little; nothing is missing on his side. What is needed now is gathered merit, to claim a share here. He fills each vessel to its quality; whatever he feeds you, that is your gain. Tuka says: God meets each as God; your own life bears its own fruit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram explains why people seem to receive different things from the same God. There is no lack on God's side; His giving is full and never falls short. What sets the difference is what we bring, the merit we have stored, which alone lets us draw on the supply. He uses the image of vessels: God fills each one according to its capacity, and what He pours into you is exactly what becomes yours. The closing line names the law without complaint. God appears to each person as that person is fit to meet Him, and one's own life ripens into its own fruit.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I was once subject to sensory pleasures, separate from You. Now I should not speak in that old, different way.

I have turned to face my Master; worldly bonds stand apart on their own. The wish-fulfilling gem grants whatever is contemplated; give until full satisfaction is reached.

This poise abides naturally in the body and does not deceive in times of need. I have grasped Your hem, O God, and destroyed my worldly attachments.

Says Tuka, knowing the inner truth, I have laid aside both action and inaction.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Once I was a slave to pleasures, cut off from you. Now I should not speak in that old, separate way. I have turned to face my Master, and the bonds of the world fall away on their own. The wish-stone gives whatever you think of; give to me until I am wholly full. This poise rests easily in me; it does not fail me when I need it. I have caught hold of your hem, O God, and ruined my whole worldly affair. Tuka says: now that I know the secret, I have laid down both action and inaction.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram marks the turning of a whole life. He used to be ruled by the senses and kept apart from God, and he resolves never again to live or speak from that old separateness. The moment he turns to face his Master, the ropes of the world drop away by themselves, and he asks the wish-fulfilling Lord to keep giving until he is completely satisfied. He testifies that this new steadiness is not borrowed for the occasion but lives in him and will not betray him in need. The closing lines name what he has done and why. Holding God's hem, he has deliberately wrecked his worldly career; knowing the inner secret, he has set down the whole anxious accounting of right deeds and wrong.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By the support of saints I pursued this effort, and through experience the truth became clear. Why cling to life and risk returning to the womb out of fear? One should go boldly to that fearless place; weeping and wailing serve no purpose.

Says Tuka, one who offers himself completely gains a treasure. Who gives away a kingdom for the sake of begging?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

With the saints to lean on I made the attempt, and through living it the truth grew clear. Why cling to staying alive, only to deserve another birth in the womb out of fear? Go boldly to the fearless place; do not waste yourself in weeping and wailing. Tuka says: the one who offers himself fully gains the treasure. Who gives away a kingdom in order to keep begging?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram, steadied by the company of the saints, reports what he learned by actually doing it rather than by hearsay. He confronts the fear that makes us cling to this life, and warns that such clinging only earns another trip through the womb, another birth. So he urges courage: go straight to the fearless place and stop wasting yourself in tears and lament. The final line drives it home with a sharp question. The one who gives himself away completely wins the hidden treasure; only a fool would trade away a whole kingdom just to go on begging, which is what holding back the self really is.

Saints, the mark of the good

मराठी मूळ

संगतीनें होतो पंगतीचा लाभ । अशोभीं अनुभव असिजेतें ॥1॥
जैसीं तैसीं असों पुढिलांचे सोई । धरिती हातीं पायीं आचारिये ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे तरीं सज्जनाची कीतिन । पुरवावी आतिन निर्बळांची ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Through good company, one gains a seat at the feast of grace. Even in disgrace, experience must be lived through as it comes.

However we may be, let us follow in the footsteps of those ahead; the practitioners guide us by hand and foot. The selfless one does not see hardship as his own; his mind always dwells on compassion for others.

Says Tuka, let the glory of the righteous prevail, and may it fulfill the longings of the weak.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By keeping good company you win a seat at the shared meal of grace. Even through disgrace, what comes must be lived through. However we are, let us follow where those ahead have gone; the elders take us by hand and foot and lead us. The kind one does not count hardship as his own; his mind always rests on mercy for others. Tuka says: let the good name of the righteous stand, and let it answer the need of the weak.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes how the soul is carried along by good company and what true goodness looks like in it. Keeping the company of holy people earns you a place at the table of grace, but the path still passes through disgrace and difficulty that must simply be lived through. He counsels humility: follow the footsteps of those further along, who guide the beginner hand and foot. Then he names the mark of the genuinely good person, the one who does not treat his own hardship as a grievance and whose mind is always turned toward mercy for others. The closing prayer asks that the honor of such righteous people endure, so that it may meet the longing of the weak who depend on them.

GATHA 2560 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, life exchanged for life

मराठी मूळ

करितां विचार सांपडलें वर्म । समूळ निश्रम परिहाराचें॥1॥
मज घेऊनियां आपणांसी द्यावें । साटी जीवें जीवें नारायणा ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे माझें खरें देणें घेणें । तुह्मी साक्षी जाणें अंतरींचें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Upon reflection, the essential truth has been found: the remedy that uproots all effort completely. Take me and give me to Yourself; let us exchange life for life, O Narayana.

Then no veil remains between us; why should any barrier arise when both parties agree? Says Tuka, my transaction is genuine; You are the witness who knows the chitta.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When I thought it through, I found the secret: the remedy that pulls up all effort by the root. Take me, and give yourself to me; let us trade, life for life, O Narayana. Then nothing is held back, so why has any curtain come between us? With your own mouth, you yourself once owned the quarrel. Tuka says: my giving and taking is genuine; you are the witness, you know what is in the heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the bargain that ends all striving. Reflecting on it, he finds the one remedy that uproots effort completely, and states it as a trade: take me entirely, and give yourself entirely to me, life for life. He reasons that once both sides give themselves with nothing held back, there can be no veil left between them, and he gently presses God on a promise God Himself once made. The closing line is his pledge and his appeal at once. His side of the exchange is real and total, and he calls on God, the witness who reads every heart, to verify it and answer in kind.

GATHA 2561 The Saints

Refuge in the saints, dancing

मराठी मूळ

कुळींची हे कुळदेवी । केली ठावी संतांनीं ॥1॥
बरवें जालें शरण गेलों । उगविलों संकटीं ॥ध्रु.॥
आणिला रूपा ही बळें । करूनि खळें हरिदासीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे समागमें । नाचों प्रेमें लागलों ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This is our family deity, made known to us by the saints. It is well that I took refuge; I was rescued from distress.

The devotees of Hari pulled me firmly into their fold. Says Tuka, through their company I have begun to dance in love.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is the deity of our house. The saints made her known to me. It is good that I went for refuge. I was pulled out of my trouble. The servants of Hari took hold of me. They drew me firmly into their fold. Tuka says: in their company I have begun to dance, dancing in love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names what the saints gave him: not a new god, but the knowledge of the God who was always his own house deity. He calls his turning to them a refuge, and says it pulled him out of distress. The force is theirs, not his: the devotees of Hari did not coax him, they gripped him and dragged him in. And the end of that grip is not duty but dancing; the company of the saints turns into love that breaks out as dance.

GATHA 2562 Devotion to Vitthal

Vow of devotion, pressing forward

मराठी मूळ

आतां देह अवसान । हें जतन तोंवरी ॥1॥
गाऊं नाचों गदारोळें । जिंकों बळें संसार ॥ध्रु.॥
या चि जीऊं अभिमानें। सेवाधनें बळकट ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे न सरें मागें । होईन लागें आगळा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Until this body reaches its end, this devotion is my safekeeping. Let us sing and dance with fervent uproar and conquer this worldly existence.

Let us live by this pride alone: strong in the wealth of service. Says Tuka, I shall not retreat. I shall press forward and surpass all limits.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Until this body reaches its end, I will guard this devotion. We will sing. We will dance with a great noise. We will conquer this worldly life by force. Let us live by this pride alone, made strong by the wealth of service. Tuka says: I will not fall back. I will press on and go beyond every limit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes devotion a lifelong vow: he will keep it safe until his body dies. He casts singing and dancing as a kind of war, a loud assault that conquers worldly life rather than retreating from it. The one pride he allows himself is the pride of service, and he calls service his wealth, the thing that makes him strong. The poem's drive is forward and excessive on purpose: he refuses to retreat and means to surpass all limits, because in love there is no measured middle.

GATHA 2563 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the mind won over

मराठी मूळ

ज्याने आड यावें कांहीं । त्याचें नाहीं बळ आतां॥1॥
मन येथें साहए जालें । हरिच्या धालें गुणवादीं ॥ध्रु.॥
चुकुर तो गेला काळ । जालें बळ संगाचें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे धरूं सत्ता । होईल आतां करूं तें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whatever might have come to obstruct has no power now. The mind has become an ally here, having drunk its fill of Hari's praise.

The treacherous era has passed, and the strength of good company has prevailed. Says Tuka, let us seize our sovereignty; whatever we set out to do shall now be accomplished.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever might have come to block me has no strength now. Here my mind has become my ally. It has drunk its fill of Hari's praise. The treacherous time has passed. The strength of good company has come. Tuka says: now we will hold the power. Whatever we set out to do will get done.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the moment the inner struggle is over. The obstacles that used to stop him have lost their power, and the deciding reason is that his own mind, once the enemy, has changed sides; it grew full on Hari's praises and became his ally. He credits the company of the devotees for this turn, saying their strength is what carried the day. From that footing he speaks with quiet authority: with the mind won and good company holding him, whatever he undertakes will now be accomplished.

GATHA 2564 Devotion to Vitthal

Sincerity is enough, the unbreakable embrace

मराठी मूळ

देवासी तो पुरे एकभाव गांठी । तो चि त्याचे मिठी देइल पायीं ॥1॥
पाहोनि राहीन कवतुक निराळा । मी मज वेगळा होऊनियां ॥ध्रु.॥
कांहीं नेघें शिरीं निमित्त्याचा भार । न लगे उत्तर वेचावें चि ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जीवें पडिलिया गांठी । मग नाहीं मिठी सुटों येत ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For God, a single thread of sincere devotion suffices; that alone earns the embrace of His feet. I shall stand apart and watch the spectacle, having become separate from my own self.

I shall not take upon my head the burden of intermediaries; no answer need be spoken. Says Tuka, once the bond with the jiva is truly knotted, that embrace can never be undone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For God, one knot of sincere love is enough. That alone wins his feet's embrace. I will stand apart and watch the wonder, having made myself separate from myself. I will not carry on my head the burden of go-betweens. No answer needs to be spoken. Tuka says: once the bond with the soul is tied, then the embrace can never be loosened.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips devotion down to one thing: a single thread of sincere feeling is all God asks, and that alone earns the embrace of his feet. He then sets himself to one side to watch as a spectator, become separate from his own self, letting God do the work. He refuses every intermediary; he will carry no middleman on his head and owes no spoken answer to anyone. The closing claim is the sharp one: once God knots himself to the soul, that embrace can never be undone.

GATHA 2565 True Worship

Against show-worship, God lifts the devotee

मराठी मूळ

लौकिकासाटीं या पसा†याचा गोवा । कांहीं नाहीं देवा लागों येत ॥1॥
ठेवावा माथा तो नुचलावा पायीं । ठांयींचिये ठांयीं हालों नये ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे देव प्रीतीनें कवळी । ठेवील जवळी उठवूनि ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The entanglement of ritual formality for the sake of appearances is of no use to God. The head once bowed at His feet should not be lifted again; one should not stir from that place.

A distracted mind distorts the divine form; the very name of worldly attachment is sin. Says Tuka, God lovingly embraces and lifts up the devotee, keeping him close.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The tangle of ritual done for appearance is of no use to God. The head once laid at his feet should not be lifted again. Do not stir from that place. A shaken mind blurs his form. The very name of worldly clinging is sin. Tuka says: God lovingly takes the devotee in his arms, raises him up, and keeps him close.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram rejects worship performed for the eyes of others; the elaborate show of ritual gets no traction with God. He sets the true posture against it: a head once bowed at the feet should stay there, the devotee fixed in that place and not stirring. He warns where the danger is, in the mind: a distracted, agitated mind smears the very form of God, and he names worldly attachment itself as sin. The poem ends in tenderness; to the one who stays bowed, God does not stand off but gathers him in his arms, lifts him, and holds him close.

GATHA 2566 Faith and Trust

Faith, the burden laid down is light

मराठी मूळ

नाहीं होत भार घातल्या उदास । पुरवावी आस सकळ ही ॥1॥
ऐसा नाहीं मज एकाचा अनुभव । धरिला तो भाव उद्धरलें ॥ध्रु.॥
उतावीळ असे शरणागतकाजें । धांव केशीराजे आइकतां ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे हित चिंतन भरवंसा । नेदी गर्भवासा येऊं देवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A burden laid down in devotion never becomes heavy; let every hope be fulfilled. I have never known any instance where this failed.

Whatever faith was held led to liberation. He is eager on behalf of those who surrender; the moment He hears their cry, Lord Keshiraja rushes forth.

Says Tuka, He thinks of our welfare with such trust that He does not let us come to the womb again.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A burden laid down in trust never grows heavy. Let every hope be fulfilled. I have not known one case where this failed. Whatever faith was held, it lifted the soul. He is in a hurry for the one who surrenders. The moment he hears the cry, Lord Keshiraja runs. Tuka says: he thinks of our good with such sure care that he will not let us come to the womb again.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram states a law of faith from his own experience: a burden handed over to God in trust stops being heavy, and he has never once seen this fail. The frame he leaves implied is the cost of carrying it yourself; the relief comes only when you actually let go. He paints God as eager and quick, not slow to be persuaded: at the sound of the surrendered soul's cry, Keshiraja comes running. And the final care is total, reaching past this life: God watches over our welfare so surely that he will not let us be born into the womb again.

GATHA 2567 Longing and Separation

Bold complaint, demanding release from rebirth

मराठी मूळ

उपजों मरों हे तों आमुची मिरासी । हें तूं निवारिसी तरी थोर ॥1॥
उभा राहीं करीं खरा खोटा वाद । आह्मी जालों निंद लंडीपणें ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे हातीं सांपडलें वर्म । अवघाची भ्रम फेडिन आतां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Birth and death are our rightful inheritance. If You can put a stop to this, that alone would be great.

Stand firm and let us have a fair debate; I have grown weary of this cowardly existence. Both of us have equal work to do; I say I am as much God as You are.

Says Tuka, the secret is now in my hands; I shall dispel all illusion from this point forward.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To be born and to die is our family inheritance. If you can put a stop to this, that would be a great thing. Stand up and let us have it out, true against false. I am worn down by this cowardly life. The work falls equally on both of us. I say to you, God, that I am as much as you are. Tuka says: the secret is now in my hand. From here I will clear away every illusion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns prayer into a bold demand: birth and death are the inheritance he was handed, and he challenges God to be great enough to end the cycle for him. He summons God to an open argument, true against false, because he is exhausted by a life he calls cowardly. Then he says the audacious thing, that the work is shared equally and that he stands as much as God stands, refusing the posture of a beggar. He does not retract it; instead he claims the secret is now in his own hand, and from here he means to dispel every illusion. The heat is the point: a devotee close enough to argue as an equal, not bow at a distance.

GATHA 2568 Worldly Life

Death is the one truth, the mind turns

मराठी मूळ

मेलियांच्या रांडा इच्छती लेकरुं । लाज नाहीं धरुं प्रीती कैशी ॥1॥
मागिलां पुढिलां एकी सरोबरी । काळाची पेटारी खांदा वाहे ॥ध्रु.॥
आन दिसे परी मरणें चि खरें । सांपळा उंदिरें सामाविलीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जाली मनाची परती । निवळली ज्योती दिसों आली ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Widows who have lost their husbands still desire children; how shameless is this clinging to affection. Past and future are equally yoked; one carries the box of death upon one's shoulder.

Things may appear otherwise, but death alone is real; like mice caught in a trap, all are gathered in. Says Tuka, the mind has finally turned around, and the clear light has become visible.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Widows whose husbands are dead still long for children. There is no shame in them. What kind of love is this? Those behind and those ahead are yoked the same. Each one carries the box of death on his shoulder. Things look otherwise, but only death is real. Like mice gathered into a trap, all are caught. Tuka says: the mind has finally turned around. The clear light has come into view.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses a harsh image to expose a pattern in everyone, not to shame a person: people keep craving more even when the ground for that craving is already gone, clinging on past all sense. He flattens every distinction, saying past and future generations are yoked alike, each person carrying his own coffin on his shoulder without knowing it. Behind the busy appearances of life, he says, only one fact is real, death, and all of us are already gathered into its trap like mice. The turn comes at the end: once the mind grasps this and turns away from the trap, the clear light becomes visible.

GATHA 2569 Autobiography

Autobiography, made hard by God's own doing

मराठी मूळ

सांडियेली तुह्मी गोत परिसोय । फोडविली डोय कर्मा हातीं ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे तुज काय ह्मणों उणें । नाहीं अभिमानें चाड देवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have become hard through excessive quarreling. Can this be unknown to You, O Narayana? You abandoned all arrangements for family and care, and handed my destiny over to the hands of karma.

Seizing the opportunity, I staked my very life to bring about this final severance. Says Tuka, what fault can I ascribe to You? You have no concern for pride, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have become hard through too much quarreling. Can this be hidden from you, Narayana? You let go of all care for kin and keeping. You handed my fate into the hands of karma. You seized the chance and, for my soul's sake, brought about this final break. That breaking was the reason. Tuka says: what fault can I lay on you? You have no use for pride, God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at his own hardness, the contentious edge he has earned through endless quarreling, and says God knows it well. Then he reframes his ruin as God's deliberate work: God let his family ties and worldly security fall away and handed his destiny over to karma's bare workings. He reads even this loss as love, a cut made for the sake of his soul, the severance that was needed to free him. So he refuses to blame God; the final line dissolves the whole complaint into surrender, conceding that God has no interest in a man's pride and will strip it away.

GATHA 2570 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, what is mine returns clean

मराठी मूळ

माझें माझ्या हाता आलें । आतां भलें सकळ ॥1॥
काशासाटीं विषम थारा । तो अंतरा विटाळ ॥ध्रु.॥
जालीं तया दुःखें तुटी । मागिल पोटीं नसावें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे शुद्धकुळ । तेथें मळ काशाचा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What is mine has come into my own hands; now all is well. Why dwell in the inhospitable shelter of impurity and inner defilement? Let those sufferings be cut away; let nothing of the past remain in the belly.

Says Tuka, in a pure lineage, what place is there for stain?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What is mine has come into my own hands. Now all is well. Why dwell in the unsteady shelter of impurity? That is a stain on the heart. Let those sorrows be cut off. Nothing of the past should stay in the belly. Tuka says: where the lineage is pure, what stain can there be?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says he has recovered what was always his own, and with that recovery everything is set right. He questions why anyone would go on lodging in the shaky refuge of impurity, since that residence is itself a defilement of the heart. He calls for a clean break: the old sufferings cut away, with nothing of the past left held inside. The closing line lands the assurance: once the lineage is pure, once one belongs truly to God, there is no place left for any stain to take hold.

GATHA 2571 Prayers

Prayer, leaving the verdict to God

मराठी मूळ

समर्थपणें हे करा संपादणी । नसतें चि मनीं धरिल्याची॥1॥
दुस†याचें येथें नाहीं चालों येत । तरि मी निवांत पाय पाहें ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे तुह्मां सवें करितां वाद । होईजेतें निंद जनीं देवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Accomplish this with the strength of authority; do not cling to what need not be held. Nothing foreign prevails here; that is why I quietly gaze at Your feet.

What is false You call true, and what is true You call false; You approve whatever pleases You. Says Tuka, when one argues with You, O God, one inevitably earns blame in the eyes of the world.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In your full strength, settle this matter. Do not hold in mind what need not be held. Nothing of another's prevails here. So I quietly watch your feet. You call the false true and the true false. Whatever pleases you, you approve. Tuka says: when one argues with you, God, one only earns blame before the world.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram hands the whole dispute to God's authority, asking him to settle it with his own strength and to drop whatever does not need holding. He admits that nothing outside of God carries weight here, so rather than press his case he simply keeps his eyes on God's feet and waits. He notes, half in protest and half in surrender, that God overturns human judgments at will, calling the false true and the true false, approving only what pleases him. The closing line is the resigned wisdom: to argue with such a God is pointless, for the one who quarrels with him only ends up blamed in the eyes of the world.

GATHA 2572 Longing and Separation

Longing, done with false courtesy

मराठी मूळ

तुह्मां आह्मांसवें न पडावी गांठी । आलेति जगजेठी कळों आतां ॥1॥
किती ह्मणों आतां वाइटा वाइट । शिवों नये वीट आल्यावरी ॥ध्रु.॥
बोलिल्याची आतां हे चि परचित । भीड भार थीत बुडवील ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आली रोकडी प्रचिती । झांकणें तें किती कोठें देवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let us hope that You and I never come into conflict again, O Lord of the world; this much is clear now. How many times must I call evil by its name? Once disgust has come, one should not touch it again.

The cost of what has been spoken will be this: if one clings to false courtesy, it will drown everything. Says Tuka, direct experience has arrived. How much longer, O God, can one keep covering it up?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let you and I never come to a quarrel again, Lord of the world. This much is clear now. How many times must I call the bad thing bad? Once disgust has come, one should not touch it again. Here is the lesson of all that was said: clinging to false courtesy will drown everything. Tuka says: plain proof has come, here in the hand. How much longer, God, and where, can one keep it covered up?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as one who has had enough of inner conflict and wants no more quarrel between himself and the Lord. He has learned, after naming the bad thing over and over, that once true disgust for worldly clinging arises one must not go back and touch it again. The hard lesson he draws is that polite hedging, keeping up appearances out of social regard, will drown a person; deference to what one knows is false is itself the danger. He ends with the force of firsthand experience: the proof is now in his own hand, plain and undeniable, and he asks how long anyone can keep covering over a truth that has already been seen.

GATHA 2573 Devotion to Vitthal

Adoration, the giver who plays at needing

मराठी मूळ

सकळ सत्ताधारी । व्हावें ऐसें काय हरी ॥1॥
परि या कृपेच्या वोरसें । कुढावयाचें चि पिसें ॥ध्रु.॥
अंगें सवौत्तम । अवघा चि पूर्णकाम ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे दाता । तरि हा जीव दान देता॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You are the master of all powers. What more could You possibly need, O Hari? Yet out of overflowing compassion, You feign a longing to give even more.

In every way You are supreme, complete in all things. Says Tuka, You are the giver, and yet this jiva offers its very life as a gift in return.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You hold all power, Hari. What could You possibly need? And yet, out of overflowing compassion, You act as if You long to give still more. In every way You are the highest. You are complete; You lack nothing. Tuka says: You are the giver, and so this jiva gives back its own life as the gift.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at a God who already has everything and asks the obvious question: why would such a one want anything? His answer is that the wanting is itself a kindness. The Lord pretends to a hunger to give, because pure giving is how His grace overflows. Since God is the giver of all, the devotee has only one thing left that is truly his own to offer back, and that is his very life. The poem turns the logic of a gift inside out: the complete one stoops to receive, so that the empty one may have something to give.

GATHA 2574 Ecstasy and Joy

Nondual ecstasy, the burden lifted

मराठी मूळ

कोणापाशीं द्यावें माप । आपीं आप राहिलें ॥1॥
कासयाची भरोवरी । काय दुरी जवळी ॥ध्रु.॥
एकें दाखविले दाहा। फांटा पाहा पुसून ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे सरलें वोझें । आतां माझें सकळ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To whom shall I offer a measure? The Self has merged with the Self. What question remains of far or near? One has been shown as ten; wipe away the illusion and see.

Says Tuka, the burden is finished; now everything is mine.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To whom would I hand over a measure now? The Self has settled into the Self. What talk is there of far or near? The one was shown as ten; wipe the illusion away and look. Tuka says: the load is finished. Now everything is mine.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the moment when measuring stops, because there is no longer a second thing to measure against. The Self has merged into the Self, so distance, near and far, has no meaning. What looked like many, the ten, was only the one appearing as many; rub away that mistake and you see it. With duality gone, the weight he had been carrying is set down, and what remains is not loss but total possession: everything is now his, because nothing stands apart from him.

GATHA 2575 The Necessity of Experience

Nondual experience, water in the sky

मराठी मूळ

नभोमय जालें जळ । एकीं सकळ हरपलें ॥1॥
आतां काय सारासारी । त्याच्या लहरी तयांत ॥ध्रु.॥
कैचा तेथ यावा सांडी । आप कोंडी आपण्यां ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कल्प जाला। अस्त गेला उदय ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Water has become one with the sky; everything has merged into a single unity. What need is there now for any sorting? Its waves belong to it alone.

How can any separation arise? The self contains the self. Says Tuka, a cosmic cycle has turned; the setting has become the rising.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The water has become sky; in the one, everything has vanished. What sorting is left to do? The waves belong only to that. Where can any separation come from here? The self is enclosed within itself. Tuka says: a whole cosmic age has turned; the setting has become the rising.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a state where the line between the seer and the seen has dissolved, like water rising into sky until you cannot tell one from the other. Once all has merged into the one, there is nothing left to sift into real and unreal; the waves are not other than the sea they rise in. Separation cannot even begin, because the self is sealed within itself with no outside to escape to. He calls it a cosmic turning, where setting and rising are no longer opposites: the end and the beginning have become a single thing.

GATHA 2576 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, grace lifts the lowly

मराठी मूळ

राजा करी तैसे दाम । ते ही चाम चालती ॥1॥
कारण ते सत्ता शिरीं । कोण करी अव्हेर ॥ध्रु.॥
वाइले तें सुनें खांदीं । चाले पदीं बैसविलें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे विश्वंभरें । करुणाकरें रिक्षलें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A king stamps coins as he pleases; even leather currency circulates. The real force is the authority upon one's head; who dares to disregard it? Even that which was carried on the shoulder now walks upright, once it has been seated in its proper place.

Says Tuka, the Lord of the Universe, the compassionate One, has sheltered and saved us.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The king stamps the coin as he wishes, and even leather then passes as money. The force is the authority over it; who dares refuse it? What was carried like a load on the shoulder now walks upright, once it is seated in its place. Tuka says: the Lord of the universe, the compassionate one, has sheltered and saved us.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the image of royal coinage to explain how grace raises the worthless. A king's stamp can make even a scrap of leather circulate as currency; the value comes not from the material but from the authority behind it. In the same way, what was once a mere burden is set in its rightful place and made to stand upright by a power above it. The point lands on the last line: it is the compassion of the Lord, not any worth of our own, that has sheltered us and given us standing.

GATHA 2577 Longing and Separation

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You are God, we are God; in between, the sense of separation grows. Through the urgency of this struggle, I follow You relentlessly, O Vitthale.

Startled by the sound of my call, the wall of separation has been broken. Says Tuka, stand still and look back at me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You are God, we are God; in the middle, the fear of separation only grows. In the urgency of this struggle I run after You, behind and behind, Vitthale. Startled by the sound of my cry, the wall of difference is broken. Tuka says: stand still, and look back at me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram holds two truths at once: in essence there is no difference between God and the soul, yet in the middle stands the felt fear of being apart, and it keeps growing. So he chases, running behind Vitthal with the desperation of someone who cannot bear the gap. His cry does its work: the sound itself startles God and cracks the wall of separation that the sense of difference had built. The poem ends not in union but in a plea poised right at its edge, asking the fleeing God to stop and turn His face back toward the devotee.

GATHA 2578 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, same form, different lot

मराठी मूळ

हीनसुरबुद्धीपासीं । आकृतीसी भेद नाहीं ॥1॥
एक दांडी एक खांदी । पदीं पदीं भोगणें ॥ध्रु.॥
एकाऐसें एक नाहीं । भिन्न पाहीं प्रकृती ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे भूमी खंडे । पीक दंडे जेथें तें॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Between the lowly and the divine intellect, there is no outward difference in form. Yet one carries burdens while another rides; step by step, each meets different experiences.

No two are alike; each has a distinct nature. Says Tuka, the earth is divided into regions, and the harvest flourishes wherever conditions permit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Between the low mind and the godly mind, there is no difference in outward shape. One carries the load, one rides above it; at each step they meet different fates. No two are alike; look, each nature is its own. Tuka says: the land is divided into fields, and the crop grows only where the ground allows.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram observes that the base mind and the noble mind can look exactly the same from the outside, with no visible mark to tell them apart. The difference shows only in what becomes of them: one is yoked to burdens, one is carried, and step by step their experiences diverge. Inner nature, not appearance, decides this, and no two natures are identical. His closing image is agricultural: the same earth is parcelled into fields, but the harvest rises only where the soil is fit, a quiet call to tend the ground of one's own mind rather than trust the surface.

GATHA 2579 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, a plea for the gift of grace

मराठी मूळ

काय बोलों सांगा । याउपरी पांडुरंगा ॥1॥
कांहीं आधारावांचून । पुढें न चले वचन ॥ध्रु.॥

कोरडएा उत्तरीं । नका गौरवूं वैखरी ॥4॥
करी विज्ञापना । तुका प्रसादाची दाना ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What more shall I say beyond this, O Panduranga? Without some support, words cannot proceed further. If the nectar of feeling grows, it must be given proper form.

The boundary of devotion and good fortune should be offered with love joined together. Do not decorate empty speech with hollow grandeur.

Says Tuka, I make this petition for the gift of Your grace.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What more shall I say, tell me, beyond this, Panduranga? Without some support, the words will not go forward. Let the nectar grow; let some sweetness be made. Give the fullness of devotion and good fortune, joined with love. Do not dress up empty words with hollow grandeur. Tuka says: I make this petition for the gift of Your grace.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram admits he has reached the end of his own speech and cannot go a step further without help from God. He asks not for clever words but for the inner sap of feeling, the rasa, to swell and ripen into something real. What he wants given is love joined to devotion, the very fullness of grace, not the empty ornament of grand-sounding talk. He even warns against hollow eloquence, then states the whole prayer plainly: this is a petition, and the only thing asked for is the gift of grace itself.

GATHA 2580 The Moral Ideal

Moral counsel, keep clean company

मराठी मूळ

आहाच तो मोड वाळलियामधीं । अधीराची बुद्धि तेणें न्यायें ॥1॥
ह्मणऊनि संग न करीं दुसरें । चित्त मळीन द्वारें दोड पडे ॥ध्रु.॥
विषासाटीं सर्पा भयाभीत लोक । हें तों सकळीक जाणतसां ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे काचें राहे कुळांकुड । अवगुण तो नाड ज्याचा तया ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A fresh shoot among the withered is conspicuous; so too is the restless mind among the steadfast. Therefore do not keep the company of the impure; the mind grows soiled when it passes through tainted doors.

People fear the serpent because of its venom; everyone knows this well. Says Tuka, a flaw in character clings like a stain; it ruins whoever harbors it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A fresh green shoot stands out among the withered; the restless mind shows the same way among the steady. So do not keep company with the wrong sort; the mind is soiled when it passes through tainted doors. People dread the serpent for its venom; everyone knows this well. Tuka says: a fault clings like a flaw in glass; the bad quality ruins the one who holds it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram warns how easily the mind is colored by the company it keeps. A single green sprout among dry stalks is conspicuous, and so is an unsteady mind set among the steadfast; you become visible by your difference. His counsel is to avoid corrupting company, because the mind takes a stain simply by passing through tainted doorways. He likens a moral flaw to venom and to a crack in glass: people rightly fear the snake's poison, and a defect of character clings just as surely. The whole pointing is at self-examination, since the fault ruins no one but the one who carries it.

GATHA 2581 Longing and Separation

Longing, come quickly and embrace me

मराठी मूळ

क्षणक्षणां जीवा वाटतसे खंती । आठवती चित्तीं पाय देवा ॥1॥
येई वो येई वो येई लवलाहीं । आंळगूनि बाहीं क्षेम देई ॥ध्रु.॥
उताविळ मन पंथ अवलोकी । आठवा ते चुकी काय जाली ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे माझ्या जीवींच्या जीवना । घाला नारायणा उडी वेगीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Moment by moment the jiva aches with longing, and Your feet, O God, arise in my mind. Come, come, come quickly, embrace me in Your arms and give me the joy of reunion.

My eager mind scans the road ahead. Was there some mistake in my remembrance? What has gone wrong? Says Tuka, O life of my life, O Narayana, leap forth and come to me swiftly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Moment by moment my soul aches; Your feet, O God, keep rising in my mind. Come, come, come quickly; take me in Your arms and give me the joy of meeting. My restless mind keeps watching the road. Remember, was there some mistake of mine? What went wrong? Tuka says: O life of my life, Narayana, leap up and rush to me at once.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is in the steady ache of separation, where every passing moment brings God's feet back to his mind and deepens the want. He cries out three times for God to come, and asks not just for arrival but for embrace, for the felt joy of reunion. His mind keeps scanning the road for any sign, and then turns anxious and inward: has some fault of mine caused this delay? The poem ends by calling Narayana the very life of his life and begging Him to abandon dignity and leap into motion, to come without a moment more of waiting.

GATHA 2582 Longing and Separation

Longing, the child who need not explain

मराठी मूळ

आळी करावी ते कळतें बाळका । बुझवावें हें कां नेणां तुह्मी ॥1॥
निवाड तो तेथें असे पायांपाशीं । तुह्मांआह्मांविशीं एकेठायीं ॥ध्रु.॥
आणीक तों आह्मी न देखोंसें जालें । जाणावें शिणलें भागलेंसें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे तुह्मां लागतें सांगावें । अंतरींचें ठावें काय नाहीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A child's fussing is understood by the parent; why do You not know how to console me? The settlement of our matter lies there at Your feet, where You and I come together in one place. I can see nothing else anymore; know that I am exhausted and spent.

Says Tuka, must I keep telling You? Do You not already know what lies within my chitta?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A parent understands a child's fussing; why do You not know how to soothe me? The whole matter is settled there at Your feet, where You and I come together in one place. I can see nothing else now; know that I am worn out and spent. Tuka says: must I keep saying it? Do You not already know what is in my heart?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses God with the logic of a child before a parent: a child does not have to explain its crying, because the parent simply knows, so why must the devotee spell out his need? He insists that the only place his case can be settled is at God's feet, the one spot where the two of them are truly together. He has stopped looking anywhere else and confesses he is exhausted from the longing. The poem leans on intimacy as its argument: a love this close should not require words, and he gently rebukes God for making him beg what God already reads in his heart.

GATHA 2583 Longing and Separation

Longing, the impatient child at feast-time

मराठी मूळ

तांतडीनें आह्मां धीर चि न कळे । पाळावे हे लळे लवलाहीं ॥1॥
नका कांहीं पाहों सावकाशीं देवा । करा एक हेवा तुमचा माझा ॥ध्रु.॥
वोरसाचा हेवा सांभाळावी प्रीत । नाहीं राहों येत अंगीं सदा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे मज नका गोवूं खेळा । भोजनाची वेळा राखियेली ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In my urgency I cannot even muster patience. Indulge my childish demands quickly, O God.

Do not keep me waiting at Your leisure. Let there be a sweet rivalry of love between us.

Nurture this affection with the care of intimate kinship; love cannot stay contained within the body forever. Says Tuka, do not detain me in idle play; the hour of the feast has been set.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In my hurry I cannot even hold any patience; satisfy these childish demands of mine at once. Do not take Your time, God; make this one a shared longing, Yours and mine. Keep this overflowing love alive; it cannot stay shut inside the body forever. Tuka says: do not tangle me in idle play; the hour of the feast has been set.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram comes to God with frank impatience, unable to summon any composure and demanding that his childlike cravings be met now, not at God's leisure. He wants the longing to be mutual, a love that both of them share rather than one that he alone carries. He warns that this kind of overflowing affection cannot be bottled inside the body indefinitely; it must be answered. His closing image is of a feast whose hour is fixed: he asks God not to detain him in pointless games, because the appointed time for the meeting and its nourishment has already come.

GATHA 2584 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, virtue cannot be hidden

मराठी मूळ

नाहीं लोपों येत गुण । वेधी आणीकें चंदन ॥1॥
न संगतां पडे ताळा । रूप दर्पणीं सकळां ॥ध्रु.॥
सारविलें वरी । आहाच तें क्षणभरी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे वोहळें । सागराच्या ऐसें व्हावें॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A virtue cannot be hidden; sandalwood perfumes all that comes near. Without being told, every face finds its match in the mirror.

What is merely rubbed on the surface lasts only a moment. Says Tuka, a stream should strive to become like the ocean.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A virtue cannot be kept hidden; sandalwood scents everything that comes near it. Without a word, every face finds its match in the mirror. What is only smeared on the surface lasts a mere moment. Tuka says: a stream should become like the ocean.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram observes that real quality announces itself without effort, the way sandalwood lends its fragrance to whatever lies beside it. A mirror needs no instruction to return the exact image set before it; true nature simply shows. By contrast, anything merely applied on the outside, a borrowed or painted-on goodness, wears off in an instant. The closing line gives the aspiration: a small stream should not be content as a stream but should strive to become the ocean, an inner growth into vastness rather than a surface display.

GATHA 2585 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, set your life straight

मराठी मूळ

वंचिलिया काया येतसे उपेगा । शरीर हें नरकाचें चि आळें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जीव जितां थारे लावा । पडिलिया गोवा देशधडी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Through words alone one can become generous; the Lord of the Universe needs no enrichment. The fruits of a true resolve are like the seed itself: pure, they can never be destroyed.

If the body is spent dishonestly, it serves no purpose; the body itself is but a frame for hell. Says Tuka, while still alive, set your life upon a firm course. Once entangled, one is driven here and there across lands.

IN PLAIN WORDS

With words alone you can be generous. The Lord of the Universe needs nothing added to him. The fruits of a true resolve are like the seed itself: pure, they cannot be destroyed. A body spent in fraud is of no use. Such a body is only a bed for hell. Tuka says: while you are still alive, set your life on a firm course. Once you are tangled, you are driven from land to land, with no home.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is telling you to fix your direction now, while you can. He starts gently: even your speech can be generous, and God himself gains nothing from your offerings, so the work is for your own sake. A true resolve carries its fruit inside it the way a seed carries the plant; what is pure in intention cannot be undone. Then he names the stakes plainly: a body lived dishonestly is wasted, no better than a frame built for hell. So set your course while you are alive, because once you are caught in your own deceptions you are dragged about with nowhere to rest.

GATHA 2586 Worldly Life

World's vanity, take refuge now

मराठी मूळ

उखतें आयुष्य जायांचें किळवर । अवघें वोडंबर विषयांचें ॥1॥
कोणासी हा लागे पुसणें विचार । मनें चि सादर करूं आतां ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे जाऊं अभयाच्या ठायां । रिघों देवराया शरण वेगीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Life is as uncertain as a crumbling wall; all the pomp of the senses is mere show. Who shall I ask, and whom shall I consult? Let the mind itself now serve attentively.

Creation and dissolution go on grinding like a mill; the seed of past action grows into future consequence. Says Tuka, let us go to the abode of fearlessness. Let us take refuge swiftly in the Lord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Life is uncertain, like a crumbling wall. The whole show of the senses is only pomp. Whom shall I ask? Whom shall I consult? Let the mind itself attend to this now. Creation and dissolution keep grinding on, like a mill. The seed of past action grows into what comes next. Tuka says: let us go to the place where there is no fear. Let us take refuge in the Lord, quickly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at how fragile a life is and decides to act on it. The body is a wall about to fall, and the pleasures of the senses are only display, not substance. He does not look outside for advice; he turns his own mind to face the truth. He sees the wheel of birth and death turning like a grinding mill, where each act sows the seed of its own consequence. The only sane response is to run, without delay, to the one refuge that fear cannot reach: the Lord.

GATHA 2587 Autobiography

The teacher's lament, few will receive

मराठी मूळ

बोलावे ह्मुण हे बोलतों उपाय । प्रवाहें हें जाय गंगाजळ ॥1॥
भाग्ययोगें कोणां घडेल सेवन । कैंचे येथें जन अधिकारी ॥ध्रु.॥
मुखीं देतां घांस पळवितीं तोंडें । अंगींचिया भांडे असुकानें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे पूजा करितों देवाची । आपुलिया रुची मनाचिये ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I speak these remedies because they must be spoken; these waters flow onward like the Ganga. By good fortune, some may partake of them; who here in this world is truly qualified? When food is placed in their mouths, they turn their faces away, burning with their own willfulness.

Says Tuka, I worship God according to the taste of my own mind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I speak these remedies because they have to be spoken. They flow on like the water of the Ganga. By good fortune some few may take them. But who here is really fit to receive them? When I put the morsel in their mouths, they turn their faces away, burning with their own willfulness. Tuka says: I worship God as my own heart likes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is grieving over teaching that falls on people who will not take it. He speaks because the truth must be spoken; like the Ganga, it pours out whether or not anyone drinks. Only a rare, fortunate soul actually receives it, and he wonders aloud who is even fit. He compares teaching to feeding someone: he holds the food to their lips and they turn away, too full of their own stubborn will. In the end he stops measuring himself against them and simply worships God in the way his own heart loves.

GATHA 2588 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the missed hour of grace

मराठी मूळ

लटिक्याचे वाणी चवी ना संवाद । नांहीं कोणां वाद रुचों येत ॥1॥
अन्याय तो त्याचा नव्हे वायचाळा । मायबापीं वेळा न साधिली ॥ध्रु.॥
अनावर अंगीं प्रबळ अवगुण । तांतडीनें मन लाहो साधी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे दोष आणि अवकळा । न पडतां ताळा घडे तसे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The speech of the false one has neither savor nor coherence; no one finds pleasure in disputing with it. The fault is his own, not mere idle chatter; he failed to seize the moment of grace from his divine parents.

When unruly faults grow strong in the body, the mind must quickly strive for what is beneficial. Says Tuka, faults and decline occur whenever things fall out of harmony.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The false man's speech has no savor and no sense. No one enjoys arguing with it. The fault is his own; it is not just idle chatter. He did not seize the moment of grace from his mother and father. When unruly faults grow strong in a person, the mind must quickly turn to what does good. Tuka says: faults and ruin come whenever a life falls out of tune.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is examining the pattern of a life gone hollow, not heaping scorn on a man. The speech of someone false rings empty, with neither flavor nor coherence, and no one even wants to argue with it. He locates the cause: not in chance, but in a moment of grace that was offered and not taken. When such faults are left to grow strong, the only cure is for the mind to turn quickly toward the good. The warning is for self-examination: ruin is simply what happens when a life slips out of tune with its own deepest aim.

GATHA 2589 Social Criticism

Social criticism, hollow show versus true character

मराठी मूळ

नये स्तवूं काचें होतें क्रियानष्ट । कुंफ्दाचे ते कष्ट भंगा मूळ ॥1॥
नाहीं परमार्थ साधत लौकिकें । धरुन होतों फिकें अंगा आलें ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे तरी मिरवतें परवडी । कामावल्या गोडी अविनाश ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One should not praise what is brittle and corrupt in practice; the troubles born of pretense are the root of ruin. Spiritual life cannot be attained through worldly show; I held on, but it proved hollow in the end.

One should not show one's face before a true appraiser; the loss of credit would shatter all standing. Says Tuka, then let the authentic display of character spread abroad; the sweetness of what has truly been accomplished is imperishable.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not praise what is brittle and corrupt in practice. The troubles born of pretense are the root of ruin. Spiritual life cannot be won by worldly show. I held on to it, but in the end it proved hollow. Do not put your face before a true judge. Your credit breaks, and your standing is cut down. Tuka says: let the real worth of your character shine instead. The sweetness of what you have truly attained never dies.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts the cheap glitter of pretense with the lasting weight of the real thing. He warns against admiring practices that look impressive but are inwardly rotten, because pretense itself is the seed of collapse. He admits the pull of it: he too clung to outward show, and found it empty in the end. Before a true appraiser, a man of God who can see, the fake is exposed and all borrowed reputation falls apart. So he urges that genuine character be what spreads abroad, for the sweetness of what you have actually realized is imperishable, while the show is not.

GATHA 2590 Prayers

Prayer, why is everything reversed?

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When will the thought of You enter my mind, O Narayana? Accept me and lift every burden from me. This restlessness has seized my chitta, yet I remain uncertain in worldly life.

I look only for comfort, while sins pile up behind me. Until my desire is wholly fulfilled, how shall this pain be eased? Do not grow weary of Your servants, O God.

Says Tuka, at my appointed hour, why does everything seem to go awry?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When will the thought of you enter my mind, O Narayana? Take me up as yours, and lift every burden from me. This restlessness has gripped my heart, yet I stay unsettled in worldly life. I keep looking only for comfort, while my sins pile up behind me. Until my longing is wholly filled, how will this pain be eased? Do not grow tired of us, O God. We are your servants. Tuka says: at my hour, why does everything turn out backward?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays out of a divided, honest heart. He asks when his mind will finally fill with God, and begs the Lord to claim him and take his whole load. He sees his own contradiction: restless for God, yet still tangled in the world, still chasing comfort while his faults accumulate. He reasons that the ache cannot stop until the longing is satisfied, and so he pleads with God not to tire of his servants. The closing cry is the prayer's sharpest point: at his own crucial hour, everything seems to come out the wrong way round, and he lays even that bewilderment before God.

GATHA 2591 Prayers

Prayer, the debtor of my love

मराठी मूळ

घ्यावी तरी घ्यावी उदंड चि सेवा । द्यावें तरी देवा उदंड चि ॥1॥
ऐसीं कैंचीं आह्मी पुरतीं भांडवलें । आल्या करीं बोलें समाधान ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे तुझें सख्यत्व आपणीं । अससील ऋणी आवडीचा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If You are to accept service, then accept it in abundance. If You are to give, then give abundantly, O God.

Where would we find such ample resources? Let us make peace with whatever comes. If You must be distant, then be very distant; but when You enter the chitta, make Your home there fully.

Says Tuka, Your friendship with me endures; perhaps You are indebted to my devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If you will accept service, then accept a great deal of it. If you will give, O God, then give without measure. Where would we get resources enough for this? We will make our peace with whatever comes. If you must stay far, then stay very far; but once you enter the heart, make your full home there. Tuka says: your friendship with me holds. Perhaps you are the one in debt to my love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram bargains with God in the language of the heart. He asks God, if he is going to take service or give gifts, to do it lavishly, all the way. Then he admits he himself has no great wealth to bring, and resolves simply to be content with whatever God grants. He sets a condition only on closeness: distance is bearable, but if God enters the heart at all, he must settle in completely and not visit halfway. The poem ends in tender boldness: their friendship endures, and Tukaram dares to say God may actually owe him something, indebted to the love freely given.

GATHA 2592 Longing and Separation

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What can I do? My life is suffocating; these imprisoned days feel unending. The entire universe appears empty and desolate; my very breath feels choked.

Says Tuka, O all-knowing One, O Lord of the Universe, cool this burning body.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What can I do? My soul is in agony. These shut-in days will not pass. The whole universe looks empty and barren to me. My breath chokes and will not move freely. Tuka says: O all-knowing one, O Lord of the Universe, cool this burning body.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the cry of a soul that cannot find God and cannot bear the waiting. Tukaram is suffocating; the days of separation feel like a prison that will not end. Without God present, the entire cosmos seems hollow and dead, and even his breath comes choked. He has no remedy of his own, so he turns it all over to the one who knows everything. His only plea is for relief: that the Lord of the Universe come and cool a body that is burning with longing.

GATHA 2593 Longing and Separation

Longing, the hungry child cannot wait

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे भूक न साहावे बाळा । जीवनांची कळा ओढलीसे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To dried-up sprouts, the rain cloud is everything; the same principle of justice applies here. If walking on foot is too slow, abandon even the eagle's seat.

Let the mind become swifter than itself for the sake of urgency. Says Tuka, a hungry child cannot endure; the art of sustaining life has been stretched to its limit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To withered sprouts the rain cloud is everything. The same law of fairness holds for me. If coming on foot is too slow, then leave even the eagle mount behind. Mind, become swifter than the mind itself, for the sake of haste. Tuka says: a hungry child cannot bear it. The thread of my life is stretched to its limit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pleads for God to come fast, with the urgency of one near collapse. He likens himself to dried sprouts for whom the rain cloud is life or death, and claims the same simple justice: a withering soul deserves rain. He tells God that walking is too slow, and that even Garuda, the eagle that carries Vishnu, is not fast enough; let the mind itself outrun the mind. He ends with the image that names the stakes: he is a starving child who cannot endure another moment, and the very thread of his life is pulled taut to breaking.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My words are not mere ornamentation; I call out from genuine anguish. Do not interpose any delay of desire between us; You are the self-born embodiment of compassion.

Says Tuka, the moment You turn Your face toward me and I see Your feet, I shall clasp them to my breast.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My words are not decoration. I am calling out from real distress. Do not put any delay of wanting between us. You are the self-born form of compassion itself. Tuka says: the moment you turn your face toward me and I see your feet, I will clasp them to my chest.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram insists that his cry is genuine, not poetic ornament. He is calling from real anguish and begs God to place no delay between them, no slow withholding. He appeals to who God is: not a distant judge but compassion in person, arisen of itself. The poem ends in a single vivid hope: the instant God turns his face and shows his feet, Tukaram will seize them and hold them against his heart. The whole abhanga presses toward that one touch.

You are my mother and You are my shade. I watch the road for You, O Panduranga.

You are my only elder and my only younger. You are my own dear kinsman and the life of my jiva.

Says Tuka, my life resides with You. Without You, all directions stand empty.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You are my mother. You are my shade. I keep watching the road for you, Panduranga. You are my only elder and my only younger. You are my own dear kinsman, the life of my life. Tuka says: my life rests with you. Without you, every direction stands empty.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a poem of total belonging, where God is the whole of one's family. Tukaram calls Panduranga his mother and his cool shade, and pictures himself waiting at the roadside for him to come. He hands God every relation at once: elder and younger, dear kinsman, the very life within his life. Nothing of his is held back from this one bond. And so without God present, his life has gone elsewhere with him, and the world in all directions is simply empty.

GATHA 2596 Faith and Trust

Faith, secure in the strong one's arms

मराठी मूळ

आतां कोठें काळ । करील देवापाशीं बळ ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे पंढरीराया । थापटितों ठोक बाहएा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whatever You wish to do, do it with Your own hands, O Benefactor. We are Your strong children; we rest secure in this confidence.

What power can death now exert against the Lord? Says Tuka, O King of Pandhari, I beat my arms in triumphant challenge.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever you mean to do, do it with your own hands, O Giver. We are the children of the strong one. We rest secure in that strength. Now what can death do, here beside God? Tuka says: O King of Pandhari, I slap my arms in challenge.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from fearless trust. He hands the whole outcome to God: do as you will, with your own hands, for you are the Giver. He calls himself a child of the mighty one and rests in that protection without anxiety. From inside that safety he throws a question at death: what power can it possibly have when one stands beside God? The closing image is a wrestler's gesture, slapping his arms before a bout: standing before the King of Pandhari, Tukaram strikes his arms in confident, joyful challenge to anything that would threaten him.

GATHA 2597 Devotion to Vitthal

Adoration, God seated within

मराठी मूळ

डोळां भरिलें रूप । चित्ता पायांपें संकल्प ॥1॥
अवघी घातली वांटणी । प्रेम राहिलें कीर्तनी ॥ध्रु.॥
भरूनियां भाग । तुका बैसला पांडुरंग ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My eyes are filled with Your form; my mind is fixed upon Your feet. Everything has been distributed: love has been given to kirtan.

Says Tuka, having filled every portion, Panduranga has taken His seat within me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My eyes are full of your form. My mind is set on your feet. I have shared everything out: love I have kept for kirtan. Tuka says: every portion is filled, and Panduranga has taken his seat in me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a self that has been wholly given away and wholly given over. His eyes are filled with Vitthal's form and his mind rests on the feet, so nothing is left for anything else. He says he has divided up all that he has, and the share he keeps back for himself is love, spent in kirtan. The result is not emptiness but occupancy: once every part is filled with God, Panduranga himself sits down inside him.

GATHA 2598 Longing and Separation

Longing, clasping the feet

मराठी मूळ

देसी पुरवुनी इच्छा । आतां पंढरीनिवासा ॥ध्रु.॥
नेणे भाग सीण । दुजें कोणी तुह्मांविण ॥2॥
आतां नव्हे दुरी । तुका पायीं मिठी मारी॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It is uncertain now whether I shall survive or not; please grant some favor. Fulfill my longing now, O dweller of Pandhari.

I know no weariness or suffering other than separation from You. Says Tuka, no more distance now; I clasp Your feet in a tight embrace.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now I do not know if I will live or not. I do not understand; do something about my plea. Fulfill my longing now, dweller of Pandhari. I know no other weariness, no other pain, than being apart from you. Tuka says: now there is no distance. I throw my arms around your feet and hold them tight.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a prayer made at the edge of survival, where the only ache that counts is separation from God. Tukaram tells the dweller of Pandhari that he no longer knows whether he will live, and he asks Vitthal to act on his plea and fulfill his longing. He names his one grief plainly: he knows no weariness or suffering except being apart from the Lord. So he closes the gap himself, clasping the feet in a tight embrace so that no distance can remain.

GATHA 2599 The Nature of God

The nature of God, the jiva made content

मराठी मूळ

उभय लोकीं उत्तम कीर्तिन । देव चित्तीं राहिलिया ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जीव धाय । नये हाय जवळी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Narayana is the beautiful foundation of all resolve. He fulfills everyone's desire and dissolves the heaviness of bodily existence.

When God abides in the chitta, excellent renown follows in both worlds. Says Tuka, the jiva is satisfied, and no sigh of regret can come near.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Narayana is the beautiful ground of every resolve. He fulfills everyone's wish and dissolves the heaviness of having a body. When God stays in the mind, good name follows in both worlds. Tuka says: the jiva is satisfied, and no sigh of regret can come near it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names what every intention and effort actually rests on: Narayana is the foundation beneath all resolve. Because of this, God both grants what people long for and lifts the dead weight of bodily existence. Keep God seated in the mind, he says, and honor follows in this world and the next alike. The final claim is the deepest: a jiva so filled is satisfied, and regret, the sigh over what was missed, can no longer reach it.

GATHA 2600 The Saints

The saints, wealth that never runs dry

मराठी मूळ

भाग्यवंता ऐशी जोडी । परवडी संतांची ॥1॥
धन घरीं पांडुरंग । अभंग जें सरेना ॥ध्रु.॥
जनाविरहित हा लाभ । टांचें नभ सांटवणें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे विष्णुदासां । नाहीं आशा दुसरी॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O fortunate one, what a treasure is the abundance of saintly company. The wealth in that home is Panduranga Himself, an inexhaustible store that never runs dry.

This gain is beyond the reach of ordinary people; it is like storing the sky in a container. Says Tuka, the servants of Vishnu harbor no other desire.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Fortunate one, what a treasure to gain: the abundance of the saints. The wealth in that house is Panduranga himself, unbroken, never used up. This gain is out of reach for ordinary people; it is like packing the sky into a small space. Tuka says: the servants of Vishnu have no other desire.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praising the company of saints as the one fortune worth having. The riches in their house are not goods but God: Panduranga himself, a store that is inexhaustible and never runs out. He warns that this gain is not available to worldly grasping; it is as impossible to seize as fitting the whole sky into a small container. So the servants of Vishnu want nothing else, because to want this is already to want everything.

GATHA 2601 Worldly Life

Worldly life, craving never rests

मराठी मूळ

जरी आलें राज्य मोळविक्या हातां । तरी तो मागुता व्यवसायी ॥1॥
तृष्णेचीं मंजुरें नेणती विसांवा । वाढें हांव हांवां काम कामीं ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे वाहे मरणाचें भय । रक्षणउपाय करूनि असे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if a kingdom falls into the hands of a bundle-carrier, he returns to his old trade. The offspring of craving know no rest; desire breeds desire, and work breeds more work.

The pleasures of wealth do not touch the body; worry about their enjoyment burns like a fire of obstacles. Says Tuka, such a one lives in the fear of death, constantly guarding and scheming for protection.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even if a kingdom falls into a porter's hands, he goes back to his old trade. The children of craving know no rest; desire breeds desire, and work breeds more work. The pleasures of wealth never really touch the body; worry over enjoying them burns like a fire of obstacles. Tuka says: such a person carries the fear of death, always guarding and scheming to keep himself safe.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sketches the treadmill of worldly craving and where it ends. Give a kingdom to a bundle-carrier and he returns to hauling bundles, because craving has no off-switch: each desire gives birth to the next, each task to more tasks. Even the pleasures of wealth never actually reach the man who owns them; the anxiety of holding and enjoying them burns like a fire. The look the poem invites is inward: the one bound this way lives in constant fear of death, forever defending what cannot finally be kept.

GATHA 2602 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the effortless seeing

मराठी मूळ

केला तो चालवीं आपुला प्रपंच । काय कोणां वेच आदा घे दे ॥ध्रु.॥
सहजें चि घडे आतां मोळ्याविण । येथें काय सीण आणि लाभ ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जालों सहज देखणा । ज्याच्या तेणें खुणा दाखविल्या ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who shall now be entangled in worldly affairs? Whatever needed to be resolved has resolved itself naturally. Carry on your life as it comes; what business is it of anyone to give or take? Everything now happens effortlessly without striving; here there is neither toil nor gain.

Says Tuka, I have become naturally clear-sighted; each truth has been revealed by its own sign.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who would get tangled in worldly affairs now? Whatever had to be settled has settled itself on its own. Carry on your own life as it comes; what is it to anyone, this giving and taking? Now everything happens by itself, without striving; here there is neither toil nor gain. Tuka says: I have become naturally clear-sighted. Each truth has been shown to me by its own sign.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from a state where the knot of worldly life has simply come undone. He asks who could still be entangled, since whatever needed resolving has resolved itself without his doing. Life continues, but he is no longer the anxious accountant of it: there is no toil to dread and no gain to chase, because action now flows effortlessly. He names the gift behind this freedom: he has become naturally clear-sighted, and every truth has revealed itself to him by its own sign rather than by his striving.

GATHA 2603 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, freedom from worry

मराठी मूळ

आह्मां शरणागतां । एवढी काय करणें चिंता ॥1॥
परि हे कौतुकाचे खेळ । अवघे पाहातों सकळ ॥ध्रु.॥
अभयदानवृंदें। आह्मां कैंचीं द्वंदें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आह्मी । हरिजन साधनाचे स्वामी॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why should we who have surrendered carry any worry at all? These are merely the playful sports of the divine, and we behold them all. Through the assurance of the gift of fearlessness, what conflict can touch us? Says Tuka, we are Hari's people, masters of spiritual practice.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We who have surrendered, why should we carry so much worry? These are only playful games, and we watch them all. Held in the gift of fearlessness, where could opposites touch us? Tuka says: we are Hari's people, masters of every practice.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers his own anxiety with the logic of surrender. If everything has already been handed over to God, then worry has no work to do; the events of the world are God's playful sport, and the surrendered one is free to simply watch them. Sheltered by the gift of fearlessness, he is untouched by the swings of opposites, gain and loss, pleasure and pain. So he can say without arrogance that Hari's people are masters of spiritual practice: not because they strive hardest, but because they belong to Hari.

GATHA 2604 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, forgiveness as wealth

मराठी मूळ

देवाचिये चाडे प्रमाण उचित । नये वांटूं चित्त निषेधासीं ॥1॥
नये राहों उभें कसमळापाशीं । भुंकतील तैसीं सांडावीं तीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे क्षमा सुखाची हे रासी । सांडूनि कां ऐसी दुःखी व्हावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For the sake of devotion to God, one must respect what is proper and not scatter the mind in censure. One should not stand near filth; let barking dogs be left alone.

Says Tuka, forgiveness is a heap of happiness. Why abandon it and choose suffering?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For the love of God, honor what is fitting; do not scatter your mind into faultfinding. Do not stand near filth. Let the ones that bark be left to bark, and walk on. Tuka says: forgiveness is a heap of happiness. Why throw it away and choose to be miserable?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram offers a quiet rule for keeping the heart clear. Devotion asks that we respect what is proper and not waste the mind by scattering it into censure of others. He uses a sharp image for this without cruelty: do not linger near filth, and let barking creatures bark while you move on, since arguing with them only soils you. The point is turned back on the listener: forgiveness is a whole storehouse of happiness, so abandoning it to nurse a grievance is simply choosing your own suffering.

GATHA 2605 The Saints

The saints, compassion as their capital

मराठी मूळ

खळा सदा क्षुद्रीं दृष्टी । करी कष्टी सज्जना ॥1॥
करितां आपुलाले परी । धणीवरी व्यापार ॥ध्रु.॥
दया संतां भांडवल। वेची बोल उपकार ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आपुलालें । उसंतिलें ज्यांणीं तें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The wicked always look with petty eyes and cause distress to the good. Each carries on in his own fashion, trading to his full satisfaction.

Compassion is the capital of the saints; they spend their words in service. Says Tuka, each one rests in whatever they have cultivated.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The wicked always look with petty eyes and trouble the good. Each one carries on in his own way, trading to his heart's content. Compassion is the capital of the saints; they spend their words in service. Tuka says: each person reaps whatever they have stored up.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets two ways of living side by side without contempt for the person. The wicked see small and so make trouble for the good, while everyone, good or wicked, simply does business in the currency that is his. He names the saints' currency plainly: their capital is compassion, and they spend it as words given in service to others. The closing line points at self-examination rather than judgment of anyone else: each of us draws on whatever we have actually cultivated and saved up.

GATHA 2606 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, guard the truth

मराठी मूळ

जग ऐसें बहुनांवें । बहुनावें भावना ॥1॥
पाहों बोलों बहु नये । सत्य काय सांभाळा ॥ध्रु.॥
कारियासी जें कारण। तें जतन करावें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे संतजनीं । हें चि मनीं धरावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The world goes by many names, and feelings take many forms. One should not look or speak too much; guard what is true.

Whatever serves the purpose is what should be preserved. Says Tuka, let the saintly hold this in their minds.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The world goes by many names; feelings take many forms. Do not look too much, do not speak too much; guard what is true. Whatever serves the real purpose is what you should keep. Tuka says: let the saintly hold just this in mind.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram counsels a disciplined economy of attention and speech. The world wears endless names and the mind dresses things up in endless moods, so looking and talking too much only multiplies confusion. The discipline is to keep watch over what is actually true and to preserve only what serves the real purpose, letting the rest fall away. He hands this as a single instruction for the saintly to hold in mind, a way of staying anchored amid the world's many appearances.

GATHA 2607 Renunciation

Renunciation, refusing the old fire

मराठी मूळ

निघालें तें अगीहूनि । आतां झणी आतळे ॥1॥
पळवा परपरतें दुरी । आतां हरी येथूनि ॥ध्रु.॥
धरिलें तैसें श्रुत करा हो । येथें आहो प्रपंचीं ॥2॥
अबोल्यानें ठेला तुका । भेउनि लोकां निराळा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What has emerged from the fire should not be touched again. Drive it far away from here, O Hari.

Declare openly to all in this worldly life what you have resolved. Says Tuka, he fell silent, keeping apart from the people out of reverence.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What has come out of the fire must not be touched again now. Drive it far, far away; keep it from here, Hari. Make plain to everyone what you have resolved: that you are done with this worldly life. Tuka says: he fell silent, and out of reverence he stayed apart from people.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks of a renunciation that refuses to relapse. Whatever he has been burned by and at last escaped, he will not touch again; he begs Hari to drive it far off and keep it away. The poem urges that such a resolve be declared openly, not held in secret, so that the break with worldly life is clear. Yet the close is quiet: Tukaram himself simply falls silent and, out of reverence rather than scorn, keeps apart from the crowd.

GATHA 2608 Renunciation

Renunciation, God the only kinsman

मराठी मूळ

आतां दुसरें नाहीं वनीं । निरांजनी पडिलों ॥1॥
तुमची च पाहें वास । अवघी आस निरसली ॥ध्रु.॥
मागिलांचा मोडला माग । घडला त्याग अरुची ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे करुणाकरा । तूं सोयरा जीवींचा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now there is nothing else in this wilderness; I have fallen into the pure and formless. I look only for Your presence; all other desires have been dissolved.

The old path has been abandoned; renunciation has come through disenchantment. Says Tuka, O compassionate One, You are the true kinsman of my jiva.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now there is nothing else in this forest; I have fallen into the pure, formless stillness. I watch only for your coming; every other hope has dissolved. The old road is broken behind me; renunciation came through losing all relish for it. Tuka says: compassionate one, you are the true kinsman of my soul.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the end of a long emptying out. He has come into a solitude where nothing remains but the pure and formless, and his whole attention is now a single watching for God's arrival, since every other hope has fallen away. He is careful about how this happened: the old path did not break by force of will but through losing all taste for it, a renunciation born of disenchantment. What is left when everything else is gone is a relationship: the compassionate Lord is the one true kinsman of his soul.

GATHA 2609 Longing and Separation

Drowning prayer, carry me across

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे वेग करावा सत्वर । पावावया तीर भवनदीचें ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Having set my course, my mind has turned back toward You; with eyes fixed upon Your feet, I proceed. Come, O Panduranga, guide me and carry me safely.

I cry out to You with words of compassion. My intellect has become my ally, but I lack the strength; tears flow from my eyes as I watch.

My legs will not move, and my body is being swallowed. Therefore, let mercy come forth.

I send my message to the winds in every direction, folding my hands, gazing toward Your coming. Says Tuka, hasten now, make haste, to reach the far shore of this river of worldly existence.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I had set out the other way, but my mind has turned back toward you. I keep my eyes on your feet and walk. Come, Panduranga, take me up, hold me safe. With tender words I call to you. My mind sees the way now, but I have no strength left; I watch, and water flows from my eyes. My feet will not move; my body is being swallowed. So let your mercy come. I send word to the winds in every direction. I fold my hands and watch for you to come. Tuka says: hurry, come quickly, so I may reach the far shore of this river of the world.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays as a man sinking in deep water, and the river is worldly life itself. He has finally turned his mind back toward God and fixed his eyes on Vitthal's feet, but understanding is not the same as strength: he sees the way and still cannot move, his legs locked, his body going under. So he stops trusting his own effort and cries out for mercy alone, folding his hands and sending his plea to the winds. The whole poem is the helpless urgency of one who knows he cannot save himself and begs Panduranga to come fast and carry him to the far bank.

GATHA 2610 Worldly Metaphors

Teaching by patience, not by force

मराठी मूळ

कौलें भरियेली पेंठ । निग्रहाचे खोटे तंट ॥1॥
ऐसें माता जाणे वर्म । बाळ वाढवितां धर्म ॥ध्रु.॥
कामवितां लोहो कसे। तांतडीनें काम नासे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे खडे । देतां अक्षरें तें जोडे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The marketplace is full of counterfeit goods, and stubborn disputes are worthless. A mother knows the secret of raising a child in righteousness.

If iron is hammered too hastily, the work is ruined. Says Tuka, by giving the child small pebbles of practice, the letters of wisdom are eventually mastered.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The marketplace is full of false goods. Stubborn quarrels are worthless. A mother knows the secret of it: you raise a child into right living slowly. Hammer iron too fast and the work is ruined. Tuka says: give the child small pebbles to play with, and in time the letters are learned.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is teaching how the soul is trained, and the lesson is patience over force. He sets the marketplace of counterfeit goods and stubborn argument against the quiet wisdom of a mother who shapes a child little by little. Forcing the work, like hammering iron in haste, only ruins it. The closing image is the gentlest: a child is handed small pebbles to count with and only later masters the letters, so the deepest practice is grown step by small step, not seized all at once.

GATHA 2611 Devotion to Vitthal

The road made light by singing

मराठी मूळ

चालिलें न वाटे । गाऊनियां जातां वाटे ॥1॥
बरवा वैष्णवांचा संग । येतो सामोरा श्रीरंग ॥ध्रु.॥
नाहीं भय आड । कांहीं विषमांचें जड ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे भक्ति । सुखरूप आदीं अंतीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The road does not feel long when one walks it singing. Blessed is the company of Vaishnavas; Shrirang Himself comes forward to meet them.

There is no fear or obstacle, no heaviness of hardship along the way. Says Tuka, devotion is pure bliss from beginning to end.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The road does not feel long when you walk it singing. The company of Vaishnavas is good; Shrirang himself comes forward to meet them. There is no fear in the way, no obstacle, no heavy hardship. Tuka says: devotion is pure joy, from the first step to the last.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes what changes when devotion fills the journey of life. The road is the same hard road, but singing the Name makes it stop feeling long, and the fellowship of devotees turns the walk into joy. He makes a striking claim: in that company God himself, Shrirang, comes out to meet the travelers, so the fear and heaviness that usually weigh down the path simply fall away. The poem lands on a plain promise, that the life of devotion is happiness from beginning to end.

GATHA 2612 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the fish in the net

मराठी मूळ

करितां विचार तो हा दृढ संसार । ब्रह्मांदिकां पार नुलंघवे सामथ्यॉ ॥1॥
शरण शरण नारायणा मज अंगीकारीं दीना। आलें तें वचनांपासीं माझ्या सामर्थ्य ॥ध्रु.॥

आतां करीन तांतडी लाभाची ते याच जोडी । तुका ह्मणे ओढी पायां सोई मनाची ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Upon reflection, this worldly life is firmly entrenched; even Brahma and the gods cannot cross it by their own power. I surrender, I surrender, O Narayana, accept this poor one.

Whatever power I had has come to nothing. The load on one's back is the same as the burden under one's feet; like a fish caught in a net, that is the reality.

Says Tuka, now I shall act with urgency and seize this gain. The mind's inclination is drawn toward Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When I think it over, this worldly life holds fast. Even Brahma and the gods cannot cross it by their own power. I surrender, I surrender, Narayana; take in this poor one. Whatever strength I claimed has come to nothing. The load on my back and the weight under my feet are one and the same; I am a fish caught in the net. That is the truth of it. Now I will be quick, for this is the one gain worth seizing. Tuka says: my mind is pulled toward your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reasons his way to surrender and names exactly why. He looks hard at worldly life and sees it gripping fast, so fast that even Brahma and the gods cannot cross it by their own power, let alone he. So his own boasted strength collapses to nothing, and he calls himself a fish already caught in the net, no escape by struggling. From that honest helplessness comes the only move left: he cries surrender to Narayana and turns with urgency toward the one gain that is real, his mind drawn at last to God's feet.

GATHA 2613 The Nature of God

God the inexhaustible giver

मराठी मूळ

बहुतां जातीचा केला अंगीकार । बहुत ही फार सवौत्तमें ॥1॥
सरला चि नाहीं कोणांचिये वेचें । अक्षोभ ठायींचें ठायीं आहे ॥ध्रु.॥
लागत चि नाहीं घेतां अंतपार । वसवी अंतर अणुचें ही ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे केला होय टाकीऐसा । पुरवावी इच्छा धरिली ते ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He has accepted beings of every kind in abundance, and in the best possible way. Yet His store has never been depleted by anyone's spending; it remains inexhaustible exactly where it is.

No one can fathom its end or limit, yet He fills even the tiniest atom within. Says Tuka, He becomes whatever is needed. May He fulfill whatever desire is held.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He has taken in beings of every kind, countless of them, and in the best of ways. Yet nothing he gives ever runs out; his store stays full, untroubled, right where it is. No one can reach its end or its edge, and still he dwells inside the smallest atom. Tuka says: he becomes whatever you need. May he grant the desire you hold.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the strange abundance of God: he gives without limit and is never diminished. However many beings he accepts, and however lavishly, his store is never spent; it stays whole and untroubled exactly where it is. Tukaram pairs the unfathomable, an end no one can reach, with the intimate, a presence filling the tiniest atom. The point is trust: a giver like this becomes whatever the devotee needs, so it is safe to hold a desire and ask him to fulfill it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now that my hunger is satisfied, let me share this nourishing love with the abundance of many. Why this urgency as if something will be snatched away? Let none suffer the hardships of the past.

The one who serves has vast room within; why hoard when there is a place to store everything? Things cannot be known without being shown; even there, one must not be anxious about standing alone. The burden of the boat rests upon the water; is it heavy for the water? Says Tuka, let us sing songs of Govinda and create one continuous stream of Brahmananda.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My hunger is fed now; the love within me has its delight. Let it be shared out among the many. Why this rush, as if it will be snatched away? Let no one go through the old hardships again. The one who serves has vast room inside; why hoard, when there is room to hold it all? A thing cannot be known until it is shown; even then, do not fret about standing alone. The boat's weight rests on the water; is it heavy for the water there? Tuka says: let us sing songs of Govinda and make one unbroken stream of the bliss of Brahman.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from fullness rather than need: his own hunger is satisfied, so now the love must be shared with everyone, not hoarded. He gently corrects the anxious grasping of the spiritual life, the fear that grace will be snatched away, since the one who truly serves has endless room within. His images make the point that giving costs the giver nothing: as a boat's weight is no burden to the water that holds it, the love poured out is no loss. The poem ends in communal song, the many singing Govinda's name together until it becomes one continuous stream of divine bliss.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Cymbals in one hand, clappers in the other; some raise a roar while others clap along. The intoxicated Vaishnavas adorn themselves in countless modes of delight; they care nothing for liberation, for their love is in devotion alone.

Shouts, songs, musical celebrations, and festivals of joy fill the air; day and night pass without anyone noticing. They have no longing for pilgrimage or retreat to forests.

Says Tuka, this entire earth is pervaded by Hari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Cymbals in one hand, clappers in the other; one raises a roar while another claps along. The Vaishnavas are drunk with joy and dance in a hundred ways. They have no use for liberation; their whole love is in singing his name. Shouts, cries, song and music, festivals of joy: in it, no one notices when night comes or day. They have no longing for pilgrimage, no need to go off into the forest. Tuka says: the whole earth is filled through and through with Hari.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram paints the abandon of communal kirtan, devotees lost in singing with cymbals and clappers, dancing, shouting, losing all track of night and day. The sharp claim is in the refrain: these singers care nothing for liberation itself; the joy of the Name is already enough, so the prize the whole tradition chases is set aside as beside the point. They feel no pull toward pilgrimage sites or forest retreats, because they need not go anywhere to find God. Tukaram gives the reason in the last line: the entire earth is already saturated with Hari, so the Name sung here is the destination.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now that God has become my friend, what is there that cannot be done? Through Him, all have become my kinfolk. I have become fortunate, with family made complete; now there is no end to merit and righteousness.

Wherever I look, all directions appear full; His imprint is stamped across all three worlds. This imperishable treasure has come to us, the fortunate ones; the power of accumulated merit has borne fruit.

The liberty to bow my head at His feet, the grace of being received with affection, has been given. Says Tuka, my jiva has found rest by calling itself His own.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now that God is my friend, what cannot be done? Through him, every one of these has become my kin. I have grown fortunate, my family made complete; now there is no end to merit and right living. Wherever I look, all the directions stand full; his mark is stamped across the three worlds. This treasure that does not perish has come to us, the fortunate ones; the power of long-stored merit has borne its fruit. The freedom to lay my head on his feet, the grace of being welcomed with love, has been given me. Tuka says: my jiva has found its rest by calling itself yours.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram counts his good fortune now that God has become his friend, and the whole world shifts around that one fact. With God as kin, every direction looks full and the divine mark is stamped across all three worlds, so he feels wealthy beyond counting. He names the gift as an imperishable treasure, the ripening of merit stored across lifetimes, and yet states it as something simply given, not earned. The deepest rest is in the last line: the soul finds its peace not by achieving anything but by daring to call itself God's own.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who now can bring any calamity or adversity to bear upon us? Sovereignty has been established across all three worlds; the wielder of the discus is our protector. He bears the burden of His dear ones, standing ready to labor for them.

Says Tuka, He does not leave us unattended even for a moment, day or night.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who now can bring any harm against us? Sovereignty has been set up over the three worlds; Chakrapani himself is our shelter. He carries the weight of his beloved ones; he stands ready to labor for them. Tuka says: he does not leave us unattended for an hour of the day, not even for a blink.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks the fearlessness of one who knows he is guarded. With Chakrapani, the wielder of the discus, as his protector and sovereign over all three worlds, no calamity has any power to reach him. He describes God not as a distant lord but as one who shoulders the burden of his dear ones and stands ready to work for them. The final line is the whole comfort: this protector never looks away, not for a day, not for the blink of an eye.

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे पांडुरंगे । अवघीं अंगें निवालीं॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We delight in taking His name, and our Father too is pleased. When both chittas are of one mind, love flourishes.

We shine in His close presence; no difference can be seen between us. Says Tuka, Panduranga has cooled and soothed every part of our being.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We love to take his name, and our Father too is glad of it. When both are of one mind, the love between them grows. We are made beautiful by living close to him; no difference can be seen between us. Tuka says: Panduranga has cooled and soothed every part of us.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the Name as a bond of love running both ways, between the devotee and God as child and Father. The devotee delights in saying the Name, and the Father delights to hear it, and when both hearts beat as one the love only deepens. From that closeness comes a startling claim: living near him, the devotee grows so like him that no difference can be seen between them. The poem ends in pure relief, Panduranga having cooled and soothed every part of his being.

The body fleeting, remember Narayana

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे येथें सकळ विश्रांति । आठवावा चित्तीं नारायण ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The body is subject to the pleasures it experiences; its joys and pains are fleeting and perishable. The imperishable treasure is devotion at God's feet; that is the abode of all blessedness.

All this worldly display is momentary; when the summons comes, everything must halt. Says Tuka, herein lies all rest and peace: remember Narayana in your chitta.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The body is bound to the things it enjoys; its pleasures and pains are thin and quick to break. The treasure that does not perish is love laid at God's feet; that is the home of all that is good. All this worldly show lasts only a moment; when the summons comes, everything stops. Tuka says: here is all rest and peace. Remember Narayana in your heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the perishable against the imperishable to show where to place one's trust. The body and its pleasures are real but fleeting, thin things that break and pass, and the whole worldly display halts the instant death's summons arrives. Against that he names the one treasure that does not perish: love offered at God's feet, which he calls the home of all blessedness. The poem closes with the practice that holds it all, to remember Narayana in the heart, because there alone is lasting rest.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now contentment must be made a necessity; there is no need to wait for final realization. If something is to be done, let it be done beautifully, in a manner that shines among the saints.

The great devotees have never left anything for later; they embodied the name in their very form. Says Tuka, the treasure my elders stored should not be kept secret by Narayana. What need is there for liberation now, O God, when the true entanglement is in beholding You? Once a vow is made, one must stand by it faithfully; what is pledged in devotion does not change.

Says Tuka, the longer You delay, the more You make me weep.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now you must grant me peace; do not make me wait for the final end. If it is to be done, then do it beautifully, in a way that shines among the saints. The great devotees left nothing on credit for later; they made the Name their very form. Tuka says: the treasure my elders stored, let Narayana not keep it hidden. What use is liberation to me now, God, when my one entanglement is the longing to see you? Once a vow is made, you must stand by it; what is pledged in love does not change. Tuka says: the longer you delay, the more you make me weep.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses God like a child demanding what was promised, refusing to be patient. He does not want liberation or some far-off final realization; he wants the sight of God now, and says the only thing binding him to the world is that very longing. He reminds God that the great devotees of old took the Name fully, holding nothing back for later, and asks that the treasure handed down by his elders not be kept hidden from him. The poem ends in open complaint, half tender and half insistent: a vow must be honored, and every delay only makes Tukaram weep harder.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My mind does not follow its own course; it has not imported any willful notion. The saints have made You stand here until now; they have placed the handle of devotion in my hands, O God.

I ask only for what already exists; this is no false pretense. One should not use force with a little child.

Says Tuka, my dealings are witnessed; yet You, O Lord, are exceedingly frugal. I have come this far through sheer persistence, holding no other desire.

Since You dislike the company of strangers, You keep Yourself apart. Says Tuka, after this, O Govinda, do not come to me with mere pleasantries.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My mind does not run after its own ideas. It carries no willful notion of its own. The saints have made You stand here until now; they put the handle of devotion into my hand, O God. I ask only for what already is; this is no false game. One should not strong-arm a little child. Tuka says: my dealings are all in plain sight; You, Lord, are very stingy, yet You are mine. I came this far by sheer persistence, holding no other wish. You dislike the company of strangers, so You keep apart, alone. Tuka says: from now on, Govinda, do not come to me with mere pleasantries.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram leans on the saints, not on himself. He says his mind is not chasing its own clever schemes; the saints are the ones who set Vitthal standing before him and pressed devotion into his hands. So he asks only for what is already his by right, and he warns God not to use force or evasion with him, since he is like a small child clinging to a parent. The tone turns half-teasing: he calls God close-fisted, admits he got this far only by refusing to leave, and asks God to drop the polite small talk and simply give Himself.

GATHA 2622 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the faithless eye

मराठी मूळ

वांजेच्या मैथुनापरी गेलें वांयां । बांडेल्याचें जायां जालें पीक ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे वरदळी ज्याची दृष्टी । देहबुद्धि कष्टी सदा दुःखी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The faithless one sees holy water as mere liquid and sacred images as mere stone. He regards the saints as ordinary human beings.

Like the intimacy of a barren woman, his efforts are wasted; like a crop on ravaged land, all is fruitless. The faithless one is perpetually impure, always restless, never at peace.

Says Tuka, one whose vision rests only on the surface, bound by body-consciousness, remains forever in sorrow.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The faithless one sees holy water as plain water and a sacred image as plain stone. He looks at the saints and sees only ordinary men. Like coupling with a barren woman, his effort comes to nothing; like a crop on ruined land, the harvest fails. Without faith he is always impure, an outcaste; his restlessness never ends. Tuka says: the one whose eyes rest only on the surface, bound to body-thinking, stays forever in sorrow.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names the lack that drains all religious effort: faith. Without it, holy water is just water, an image just stone, and a living saint just another man, so nothing sacred can reach the person. He drives this home with two hard images of wasted labor, a barren coupling and a crop on spoiled ground, to show that ritual without faith bears no fruit. The harshness is aimed at the pattern of surface-seeing, the eye that stops at the body and the object; whoever lives there, Tukaram says, lives in unending unrest. The mirror is for the reader: where does my own seeing stop short.

GATHA 2623 The Power of the Name

The Name, genuine coin

मराठी मूळ

नव्हे मतोळ्याचा वाण । नीच नवा नारायण ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे नेणों किती । पुरोनि उरलें पुढती ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The name of Narayana is not some cheap commodity offered by hawkers. It brings joy to the ear; it is genuine currency minted in the Lord's own treasury.

The profit is immediate, and it grows ever greater with each exchange. Says Tuka, I cannot tell how much there is; it overflows and still more remains.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is no cheap stuff sold by a hawker. Narayana is ever fresh, ever new. Joy springs up from the hearing. It is true coin, minted in the Lord's own treasury. The gain is immediate, hand to hand, and it grows greater with each turn. Tuka says: I cannot tell how much there is; it is spent in full and still more remains.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram praises the Name of Narayana as wealth of a different order. It is not a peddler's cheap goods but genuine currency struck in God's own mint, and merely hearing it brings joy. Unlike ordinary trade, the profit arrives at once and keeps multiplying with every repetition. He ends in wonder at its abundance: you can spend it without limit, and the supply only overflows, because the Name draws on an inexhaustible treasury.

GATHA 2624 The Saints

Saints, the shop that never empties

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे पोतें । देवें भरिलें नव्हे रितें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The saints have opened their shop and give freely to all who come. The saints are generous beyond measure; their storehouse is filled with infinity.

The one who asks is satisfied, and still abundance remains for others. Says Tuka, the bag that God has filled is never empty.

IN PLAIN WORDS

They have opened a shop and give a gift to everyone who comes. The saints are generous, generous; their storehouse is filled with the endless. The one who begs is filled, and still there is enough left over for others. Tuka says: the bag that God has filled is never empty.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures the saints as keepers of an open shop where everything is given away, never sold. Their store is filled with the infinite, so generosity has no ceiling: each beggar leaves satisfied, and the supply is undiminished for the next. The point lands in the closing line. Because it is God who fills their bag, it can never run dry, which is why the saints can give so freely.

GATHA 2625 Prayers

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not let me fall into flattering mortals or making a trade of sacred storytelling. For this mercy I pray to You; You are the king of the generous.

Do not let the desire for another's wife or another's wealth rise in my mind. Do not let me harbor malice toward any being or speak ill of the saints.

Do not let the pride of the body grow in me by any means. Says Tuka, do not let me forget Your feet again and again.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not let me flatter mortals, and do not let me make a trade of telling Your story, O Giver. For this mercy I beg of You; You are the king of the generous. Do not let the wish for another's wife or another's wealth rise in my mind. Do not let me envy any creature or speak ill of the saints, Govinda. Do not let pride of the body grow in me by any means; let it not rise at all. Tuka says: do not let me forget Your feet, again and again.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a prayer asked entirely in the negative: keep me from the faults I am prone to. Tukaram lists them one by one: flattering powerful men, selling sacred storytelling for gain, coveting another's wife or wealth, envy of others, slander of the saints, and the swelling pride of the body. He cannot trust his own strength against these, so he hands the whole guard to God, whom he calls the king of the generous. The last and largest plea holds the rest together: do not let me forget Your feet, because forgetting God is the root from which every other fault grows.

GATHA 2626 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, single-minded service

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My service is not merely for show; I am Your exclusive and devoted servant, O Keshava. Therefore I make my plea at Your feet; I know no other way.

I am single-minded in my devotion to the Master's service; the same oneness pervades my chitta and my outward actions. Says Tuka, I carry out the work You assign; matters of right and wrong are known to You alone, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My service is not just for show. I am Your own servant, given to none but You, O Keshava. So I make my plea at Your feet; I know no other way. I am single-minded in serving my Master, and the same one feeling fills my heart and my acts. Tuka says: I do the work You assign; right and wrong are known to You alone, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram disowns any outward, for-show piety and declares himself God's exclusive servant. Because he serves no one else, he has no other refuge to approach, so he comes to Vitthal's feet alone. He insists his devotion is undivided, with inner feeling and outer action carrying the one same intent. The closing line is the heart of his surrender: he simply performs whatever task God gives, leaving all judgment of right and wrong to God, since the servant's part is obedience, not verdict.

GATHA 2627 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, swept clean of bad company

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those whose company once led me into entanglement have been washed away and swept clean. Now I deliberate alone with my own mind; there is no burden of any second voice in this.

Through partaking of the Master's grace, the right moment came unexpectedly. Says Tuka, the secret has come into my hands; I have abandoned all worry and anxiety, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those whose company once dragged me into the round of the world have been washed and swept clean away. Now I think things over alone with my own mind; there is no weight of any second voice in it. By partaking of grace, the leavings came to me; the right moment arrived when I least expected it. Tuka says: the secret has come into my hand; I have thrown away that grief and worry, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes being freed from the companions who once entangled him in worldly life; they have been rinsed away, leaving him to deliberate alone, with no second voice pulling at him. He credits not his own effort but grace, which dropped the sanctified leftovers into his lap at a moment he did not arrange. What he has received he calls the secret, the inner key, and with it in hand his old grief and anxiety simply fall away. The mood is the relief and quiet joy of someone who has been unburdened.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A feast of love is spread out in many dishes; though the flavors differ, they are all of one essence. I have received the grace of those who sat at that banquet; they maintained no distinctions among themselves.

The cooking was done by the Master's own hand; each portion of love was prepared to perfection. Says Tuka, the sanctified leftover has come to me, and by that, my jiva rejoices.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A feast of love is laid out in many dishes; the flavors differ, yet they are all one taste. Sitting in that row of eaters, I was given grace; among them they kept no separation. The cooking was done by the Master's own hand; each portion of love was made perfect. Tuka says: the sanctified leftover has come to me, and by it my soul rejoices.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the image of a shared meal to speak of the company of saints. The dishes are many and their flavors differ, yet all are one essence, just as the saints are varied but undivided, keeping no rank or separation among themselves as they eat together. He stresses that the food was prepared by the Master's own hand, so every loving portion is perfect. Then he places himself low and grateful: he receives only the consecrated leftover from that table, and even that scrap fills his soul with joy.

GATHA 2629 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, grace seized unasked

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The treasure of the powerful is always at hand; the weak one's hope lies in what the future may offer. I shall receive whatever gift falls into my lap, and partake of the feast in solitude.

There is no need to wait for the proper occasion; the time of unsolicited grace has been seized. Says Tuka, once the belly is full, let us honor God with words of grateful reverence.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The strong one's store is always full and ready; the weak one's hope hangs on what may come later. I will take whatever gift falls into my lap, and eat the feast in solitude. There is no need to watch for the proper hour; the time of grace given unasked has been seized. Tuka says: once the belly is full, let us honor God with words of grateful praise.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts the powerful, whose provision is always at hand, with the weak, who can only hope for a future portion; he counts himself among the weak and resolves to take gladly whatever grace falls to him. He will not wait for the textbook right moment, because grace has come unsolicited and the moment is now, so he eats this gift in quiet. The closing turn shows the proper response: when the soul has been fed, the thing to do is to praise God with grateful words. It is a poem about receiving freely given grace and answering it with thanks.

GATHA 2630 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, bow to all, break no peace

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I shall gather together all my own traditions and ancestral ways. I shall bow at everyone's feet without seeing high or low.

I shall not let contentment be broken, and I shall steady everyone around me. Says Tuka, until the final clearing comes, I shall not abandon this path.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will gather together all my own family ways and the customs of my line. I will bow at everyone's feet, seeing no high and no low. I will not let anyone's contentment be broken; I will steady all people. Tuka says: until the final reckoning comes, I will not give up this path.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out a personal rule of conduct. He will honor the good ways of his own people, and he will bow before everyone alike, refusing to rank people as high or low. His care extends outward: he will not disturb anyone's peace, and he will work to settle and steady those around him. He binds himself to this for life, vowing to hold the path until the final clearing of accounts. It is a quiet ethic of humility and unbroken goodwill toward all.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have forgotten the anxiety of birth and death, for You are my mother and father, O Ananta. Whatever comes before my eyes, I shall witness it calmly; fear and burden have been dissolved.

The root of all entanglement was the five elements; what belongs to them has been returned to them. Says Tuka, worldly life has become something foreign; You alone are the companion of my soul, O Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have forgotten the fear of birth and death, for You are my mother and father, O Ananta. Whatever comes before my eyes, I will simply watch it; fear and burden are gone. The root of all entanglement was the five elements; what is theirs has been given back to them in full. Tuka says: worldly life has become a stranger to me; You alone are the friend of my soul, O Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from the peace of total trust. Once he takes God as mother and father, the dread of birth and death drops away, and he can simply watch whatever life brings without fear or weight. He explains the freedom: the body and its world were only the five elements, and he has handed back to them what was always theirs, so nothing in this realm still binds him. With worldly life now a stranger, the only real relationship left is with God, the one true companion of his soul. It is the calm of someone who has set down the whole burden of the self.

Devotion, my life is in Your hands

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You are generous, O Hari; this fame resounds throughout all creation. Your endless glory thunders forth in songs of praise.

What I ask of You, I ask with my whole being; what I tell You, I tell from the depths of my jiva. If I am to cling to anything, let me cling to Your feet, O Benefactor.

If I appear pitiable, that shortcoming is Yours, not mine. Says Tuka, my life is subject to You.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You are generous, O Hari; that fame rings through all that moves and does not move. Your endless greatness thunders out in songs of praise. What I ask, I ask of You with my whole being; what I feel, I tell to You. If I am to cling, then let me cling to Your feet, O Giver. If I am seen wretched, that lack is Yours, not mine. Tuka says: my life is in Your keeping.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram first names God's known reputation: Hari is famed throughout all creation as generous, his glory sung everywhere. On the strength of that fame, he brings his whole heart's asking and confiding to God and resolves to cling to nothing but God's feet. Then comes the bold turn: if he still looks poor and pitiable, the failure reflects on God, not on himself, since a generous Lord should not leave his devotee in want. He closes by placing his entire life under God's control, which is both surrender and a gentle pressing of the claim that God now owns the outcome.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

See how many have come to You for refuge, and You have treated them all alike. You have never examined anyone's virtues or faults.

O God, grant me a place among them, even at the very end. I harbor no envy and make no claim to greatness.

You never looked at caste, lineage, or conduct. Whoever came to lay down their burden, You never called them a mere stone.

Says Tuka, O all-knowing One, once Your mind has turned toward someone, all their accumulated sins are wiped away.

IN PLAIN WORDS

See how many have come to you for refuge. You treated them all the same. You never weighed anyone's virtues or faults. O God, give me a place among them, even at the very end. I am not jealous; I make no claim to greatness. You never looked at caste or lineage or conduct. Whoever came to lay down their burden, you never called them a mere stone. Tuka says: O all-knowing one, once your mind turns toward someone, all the sins they have piled up are wiped clean.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is asking for a place among the saved, and he names the only ground he can stand on: God's refusal to sort people by merit. He points out that everyone who came for refuge was received the same way, with no audit of their good and bad deeds, no inspection of their caste or family or behavior. That is why he dares to ask only for the last place, with no envy and no claim to be special. The line about the stone is the heart of it: whoever brings their burden is treated as a living soul, never written off. And once God's attention settles on a person, the whole accumulated weight of their wrongs is cancelled.

Ecstasy, the treasure found at home

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now bondage is broken and the thought of giving and receiving is forgotten. Let me sell my own wares at leisure.

An infinite profit has been gained; the treasure has been found within one's own house. It is immediately in hand, an unfathomable depth that never runs dry.

There was confusion and delay before, but the measure has now been settled all at once. While there was still wind in the sails, the gain was secured.

Says Tuka, to safeguard this inner treasure, I have made Narayana my helper; He does not let me forget even for a moment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now bondage is broken. The thought of giving and taking is forgotten. Let me sell my own goods at my leisure. The profit gained is endless. The treasure was found inside my own house. It is in my hand at once, a depth without a bottom that never runs dry. Before there was confusion and delay; now the measure is settled all at once. While there was still wind, I caught it and secured the gain. Tuka says: to guard this inner wealth I have made Narayana my helper. He does not let me forget it even for a moment.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the moment the spiritual account closes in his favor. The old bargaining of the world, what he owes and what he is owed, simply drops away once bondage breaks. The treasure turns out to have been inside his own house all along, not earned abroad but discovered within, and it is bottomless and instant. He uses a merchant's image: there was a long delay before, but the deal was sealed at once while the wind still blew, so the chance was not missed. The point of the closing line is that this wealth needs guarding, and the guard he has appointed is Narayana himself, who keeps him from ever forgetting what he has found.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let my body be filled with Your form, O King of Pandhari. Like a reflection in a mirror, one form appears as two, yet there is no real difference.

The stored-up joy spends itself slowly through authority. The four paths of life have opened up and the difficult corners have been cleared.

Like the pupil of the eye that embraces every shadow that falls upon it, once the collyrium of Krishna is applied, there is no turning back. Says Tuka, the jiva has been imprinted upon Shiva; wherever the mind wishes, there it may go. The branch has broken off in name only; in truth, all division is destroyed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let my body be filled with your form, O King of Pandhari. Like a reflection in a mirror, one form looks like two, yet there is no real difference. The stored-up joy spends itself slowly. The four paths of life have opened, and the difficult corners are cleared. Like the pupil of the eye that takes in every shadow falling on it, once the dark salve of Krishna is applied, there is no turning back. Tuka says: the jiva has been pressed into Shiva. Wherever the mind wishes to go, there it may go. The branch has broken off in name only; truly, all division is gone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays to be so filled with God's form that his own body becomes its mirror, where one reality only seems to split into two. He insists the doubling is appearance, not difference: like an image in a mirror, there is no second thing there. The eye is his other image, the pupil receiving every shadow once the dark collyrium of Krishna coats it, and from that there is no going back. The strong claim lands at the end: the individual soul has been stamped into Shiva, the absolute, so completely that the mind is now free to roam without danger. The separation between soul and God remains only as a word, while in truth every division has been destroyed.

GATHA 2636 The Power of the Name

The Name, calling at every breath

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Again and again I call out, fearing I might miss the moment. The distance between before and after is not even a breath.

The habit of the name has settled upon my lips; at every turn I verify it is still there. Says Tuka, Vitthal has made multitudes happy in this way.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Over and over I call out, afraid I might miss the moment. Between before and after there is not even a breath of distance. The habit of the name has settled on my lips. Again and again I check that it is still there. Tuka says: Vitthal has made many people happy in just this way.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the discipline of constant remembrance as something close to anxious tenderness. He keeps calling the name aloud, afraid of the smallest gap, because the interval between one moment and the next is so thin there is no room to let the name lapse. He has made it a settled habit on his lips, yet he still keeps checking that it is there, the way one keeps touching a precious thing. The closing line widens it from his own case: this is not a private trick but the path by which Vitthal has made multitudes happy.

Longing, running to the village

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Driven by eager longing, I shall come running to Your village. If You send word, I shall come at once, O Vitthale.

I shall dance in the joy of divine love and sing Your glory with my mouth. Says Tuka, in the gathering of saints, I shall bow to the dust of their feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Driven by eager longing, I will come running to your village. If you send word, O Vitthale, I will come at once. I will dance in the joy of that love. I will sing your glory with my mouth. Tuka says: in the gathering of the saints, I will bow to the dust of their feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a short cry of readiness from someone waiting to be called home. Tukaram says his longing is already pulling him toward Pandhari, and he only needs the summons; at the first word he will run. He pictures what he will do when he arrives: dance in the joy of divine love and sing God's glory aloud. The last turn is characteristic of him, that the goal is not only the Lord but the company of the saints, before whose very foot-dust he will bow.

GATHA 2638 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, fed at the mother's lips

मराठी मूळ

मायबापाचिये भेटी । अवघ्या तुटी संकोचा ॥1॥

उत्तम तें बाळासाटीं । लावी ओठीं माउली ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जाली धणी । आनंद मनीं न समाये ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the meeting with one's divine parents, all inhibition falls away. The joy that has been tasted is real and present; the mouth is free as it eats.

The mother offers the best to her child, placing it upon his lips. Says Tuka, full satisfaction has been reached, and the bliss within the mind overflows.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When you meet your mother and father, all shyness falls away. The joy that is tasted is real, and the mouth eats freely. The mother saves the best for her child and puts it to his lips. Tuka says: I have had my fill, and the bliss in my mind will not fit inside it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reaches for the plainest human picture of intimacy to describe meeting God. With one's own parents there is no holding back and no embarrassment, so he eats freely from the joy set before him. He sharpens it into the image of a mother feeding her child, choosing the best portion and placing it right on the child's lips, which is how God's grace comes to the devotee: directly, tenderly, without being earned. The closing line measures the result: he is completely satisfied, and the bliss is now too large to be contained in the mind that holds it.

GATHA 2639 Renunciation

Renunciation, dispassion as Brahman

मराठी मूळ

उदासीनाचा देह ब्रह्मरूप । नाहीं पुण्य पाप लागत त्या ॥1॥
अनुताप अंगीं अग्निचिया ज्वाळा । नाहीं मृगजळा विझों येत ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे जाय नासोनियां खंती । तंव चि हे चित्तीं बद्धता ते ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The body of one who is truly dispassionate becomes one with Brahman; neither merit nor sin clings to it. The fire of remorse blazes within; no mirage of illusion can extinguish it.

What is called fault is merely attachment to the body; the inner self has grown disgusted with the ego. Says Tuka, only when this sorrow is fully destroyed does bondage of the mind truly cease.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The body of one who is truly free of craving becomes one with Brahman. Neither merit nor sin clings to it. The fire of remorse blazes in the body. No mirage can put it out. What is called fault is only this: regard for the body. The inner self has grown sick of the ego. Tuka says: only when this sorrow is fully burned away does the mind's bondage truly end.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram defines real dispassion by its effect: the body of one who is genuinely free of craving becomes one with Brahman, so that neither good deeds nor bad ones can stick to it. He keeps the heat in the picture, a fire of remorse that no illusion can quench, because the burning itself is what purifies. Then he names the actual fault, which is not any particular act but simple attachment to the body, and he says the inner self has come to loathe the ego that feeds it. The last line is exacting: bondage does not end while any of this sorrow remains; only its complete burning frees the mind.

GATHA 2640 Renunciation

Renunciation, cutting the noose of desire

मराठी मूळ

बंधनाचा तोडूं फांसा । देऊं आशा टाकोनि ॥1॥
नाहीं तें च घेतां शिरीं । होइल दुरी निजपंथ ॥ध्रु.॥
नाथिलें चि माझें तुझें । कोण वोझें वागवी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे अंतराय । देवीं काय जिणें तें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let us break the noose of bondage by casting aside all desire. If we take upon ourselves what does not truly exist, the true path will grow distant.

This 'mine' and 'yours' is all a fiction; who would carry such a burden? Says Tuka, what kind of life is it that is lived in separation from God?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let us cut the noose of bondage by throwing away all desire. If we take on our heads what does not really exist, the true path grows distant. This 'mine' and 'yours' is all a fiction. Who would carry such a load? Tuka says: what kind of life is it that is lived apart from God?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram treats bondage as a noose and points to the single cut that frees us: dropping desire. His argument is that we tie ourselves up by taking unreal things seriously, loading our heads with what has no real existence, and every such burden pushes the true path further away. The 'mine' and 'yours' that we defend so fiercely is fiction, and he asks who would willingly haul a load that weighs nothing yet crushes everything. The closing question turns it from logic to longing: a life lived in separation from God is hardly worth calling life at all.

GATHA 2641 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the far treasure come home

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How many times should the same thing be repeated? Much has already been said. Now I offer my prostration to Your feet, O saints.

The love that ever feels fresh and new has made its dwelling in my chitta. Says Tuka, it is well; the treasure from far away has come home.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How many times should the same thing be said? Much has been said already. Now here is my prostration to your feet, O saints. The love that always feels new and fresh has made its home in my heart. Tuka says: it is well; the treasure from far away has come home.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram stops his own talking and falls instead into a gesture. He admits the same things have been said many times over, so he sets words aside and simply bows full length at the feet of the saints. The shift is the point: past explanation lies a love that never grows stale, that keeps feeling new, and it has now taken up residence in his heart. He closes with quiet relief, comparing it to a long-awaited treasure that has finally reached home, the soul's homecoming after a far journey.

GATHA 2642 Longing and Separation

Longing, hunger for the embrace

मराठी मूळ

उपासा सेवटीं अन्नासवें भेटी । तैसी माझी मिठी पडो पायीं ॥1॥
पुरवीं वासना साच सर्वजाणा । आह्मां नारायणा अंकिताची ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे धन कृपणा सोयरें । यापरि दुसरें नहो आतां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Like the meeting of food after a long fast, let my embrace fall upon Your feet. Fulfill the longing of one who is truly Yours, O all-knowing Narayana.

Like the meeting of a mother and child after long separation, let a flood of love swell in my chitta. Says Tuka, as wealth is dear to a miser, let there be no other attachment from now on.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Like meeting food at the end of a long fast, let my embrace fall on your feet. Fulfill this longing truly, O all-knowing one; I belong to you, Narayana. Like a mother and child meeting after many days apart, let a flood of love swell in my heart. Tuka says: as wealth is dear to a miser, let me hold nothing else dear from now on.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram stacks three images of hunger to convey how badly he wants to reach God. First the starving man finally given food, so his embrace should fall on God's feet with that same desperation. He grounds the request in belonging, reminding the all-knowing Lord that he is marked as God's own, so the longing is right to fulfill. The second image is a mother and long-lost child, letting love flood the chest at the reunion. The last is sharper and almost confessional: he asks to cling to God the way a miser clings to money, fixing all his greed on one object and wanting nothing else.

GATHA 2643 Faith and Trust

Faith, the warrior who will not turn

मराठी मूळ

रणीं निघतां शूर न पाहे माघारें । ऐशा मज धीरें राख आतां ॥1॥
संसारा हातीं अंतरलों दुरी । आतां कृपा करीं नारायणा ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे मज फिरतां माघारें । तेथें उणें पुरें तुह्मी जाणां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A warrior advancing on the battlefield never looks behind. Keep me steady with that same courage now, O Lord.

I have distanced myself from the hands of worldly life; now show me mercy, O Narayana. I wield the weapon of Your name; this is the banner I carry with pride.

Says Tuka, if I were to turn back, the shortcoming would be Yours to know.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A warrior going into battle does not look back. Keep me steady with that same courage now, O Lord. I have pulled away from the hold of worldly life, far from it. Now show me your mercy, Narayana. I carry the weapon of your name. This is the banner I march under with pride. Tuka says: if I should turn back, the failing will be yours to answer for.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram casts the spiritual life as a battle and asks God to give him a warrior's nerve, the kind that never glances over its shoulder once the charge begins. He has already cut himself loose from the world and stands far from its grip, so he is exposed and needs grace to hold the line. His only equipment is the name of God, which he calls both his weapon and the proud banner he marches under. The closing line is bold to the edge of audacity: he hands the responsibility to God, saying that if he ever does turn and run, the fault will lie with the Lord who failed to keep him steady.

GATHA 2644 The Saints

Saints, serving the saint is serving God

मराठी मूळ

सकळ पूजा स्तुति । करावी ते व्होवें याती ॥1॥
ह्मणऊनि वारा जन । संतपूजा नारायण ॥ध्रु.॥
सेवावें तें वरी । दावी उमटूनि ढेंकरीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे सुरा । दुधा ह्मणतां केवीं बरा॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All worship and praise should be offered appropriately, with the right intention. Therefore, know this, O people: worshipping the saints is worshipping Narayana.

What is truly consumed within reveals itself in a satisfied belch. Says Tuka, calling liquor by the name of milk does not make it wholesome.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All worship and praise should be offered in the right way, with the right intent. So know this, people: to worship the saints is to worship Narayana. What is truly taken in shows itself afterward in a satisfied belch. Tuka says: calling liquor by the name of milk does not make it good for you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is teaching where reverence should land and insisting it be real, not just correctly performed. His central claim is direct: honoring the saints is the same act as honoring God, so devotion to holy people is not a detour from devotion to Narayana. Then he turns to test sincerity with two earthy images. Real nourishment announces itself, the way a good meal shows up later as a contented belch, so genuine inner devotion will reveal itself in its fruits. And the warning that liquor renamed milk is still liquor points at self-deception: putting a holy label on a harmful thing changes the name, not the thing, and we should examine what we are actually consuming.

GATHA 2645 Prayers

Trust, casting the burden on Hari

मराठी मूळ

धीर नव्हे मनें । काय तयापाशीं उणें ॥1॥
भार घातलियावरी । दासां नुपेक्षील हरी ॥ध्रु.॥
याऐसी आटी । द्यावी द्रव्याचिये साटी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे पोटें । देवा बहु केलें खोटें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The mind lacks patience; yet what is lacking in the One who protects? Once the burden is cast upon Him, Hari will never forsake His servants. One should give as much effort for this as one would for wealth.

Says Tuka, O God, this belly of Yours has caused much mischief.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The mind has no patience. But what is lacking in the One I lean on? Nothing. Once you lay your burden on Him, Hari does not abandon His servants. Give yourself to this with the same effort you would spend to gain wealth. Tuka says: O God, this belly of mine has made me do much that is false.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts his restless mind with the One he has chosen to trust, and finds that all the lack is on his side, not God's. The whole abhanga turns on a single act: cast the burden onto Hari, who never forsakes those who depend on Him. He asks that we put as much labor into this surrender as we already pour into chasing money. The closing line is a confession of where the falseness comes from: the belly, the hunger of the body, has driven him into much dishonesty before God.

GATHA 2646 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, wealth buys nothing at death

मराठी मूळ

द्रव्याचिया कोटी । नये गांडीची लंगोटी ॥1॥

लोभाची लोभिकें । यांचें सन्निधान फिकें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे हितें । जग नव्हो पडो रितें॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Millions in wealth cannot buy even a loincloth for the afterlife. At the hour of departure, hold Panduranga close to your throat.

The possessions of the greedy have a feeble presence in their final hour. Says Tuka, let good counsel keep the world from perishing in emptiness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Millions in wealth cannot buy you even a loincloth for the next world. At the end, when you are sent off, hold Panduranga at your throat. The greedy and their hoard stand worthless in the final hour. Tuka says: I speak for your good. Do not let the world fall away empty.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures wealth against the one moment it cannot reach: the hour of death. No fortune buys passage onward, not even a scrap of cloth, so the only thing worth clutching at the throat as you depart is Panduranga, the Name and form of God. He names the greedy directly: when they need their riches most, those riches are hollow and absent. The last line frames the whole poem as counsel given out of love, a warning meant to keep people from dying into emptiness.

GATHA 2647 Longing and Separation

Anguish, the cry of one who sees

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To whom shall I cry out now? When will this constant turmoil end? When will there be relief for anyone, each entangled in their own net? My life-breath is bursting with this anguish, while people who do not perceive it live in comfort. Even before the suffering arrives, my mind dreads it; I look for a place to hide.

Says Tuka, I am pledging God's own word; my debt has been borne by Him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To whom shall I cry out now? When will this endless trouble end? When will anyone find rest, each one tangled in their own net? My life-breath bursts with this grief, while people who do not see it live at ease. Even before the suffering comes, my mind dreads it, and I look for a place to hide. There is none. Tuka says: I hand over God's own pledge; He has borne my debt.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is crying out from a pain that has no human ear to receive it, watching everyone caught in their own snare with no relief in sight. What sharpens the anguish is that others do not even feel it; they are comfortable precisely because they cannot see what he sees. His dread runs ahead of the suffering itself, and he finds nowhere to hide from it. The resolution comes only in the last line: he stops trying to carry it and pledges God as his security, trusting that God has already taken on his debt.

Those deluded by worldly life find only confusion before their eyes. Says Tuka, no one lifts their head from this stupor at all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have stepped aside and stand apart, watching the show with my own eyes. Let me watch the world's antics, looking on at its games. Those drunk on worldly life see only confusion before them. Tuka says: not one of them lifts their head out of the stupor at all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the stance of one who has withdrawn from worldly striving and now simply observes it, as a spectator watches a play. From that distance the busyness of the world looks like an amusement, a set of games people are absorbed in. He sees that those caught inside the delusion of worldly life can perceive nothing clearly; everything before them is a blur. The final line lands the verdict gently but firmly: no one trapped in that stupor manages even to raise their head and look up out of it.

Surrender, the single-minded heart

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For us who are single-minded, merit resides at all times in the Master's feet alone. The wanderings of the mind's desires have ceased; I abide by His command as my sole authority.

The mind has turned away from all else; whatever is given shall be my offering. Says Tuka, now my vow is fulfilled; without the One, everything else is barren.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For us who want one thing only, our merit lies always in the Master's feet, and nowhere else. The wandering of my mind's desires has stopped; I keep His command as my one authority. My mind has turned back from everything else. Whatever I give shall be my offering. Tuka says: now my vow is fulfilled. Without the One, everything else is barren.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the settled state of single-mindedness, where all merit is gathered into one place: the feet of the Master. The mind that once roamed after many desires has come to rest, and His command alone now governs the poet's life. Having turned away from every rival object, whatever he offers becomes an offering to the One. He closes by naming the fulfillment of his vow, and the plain truth behind it: stripped of the One, the whole of the rest is empty ground.

Prayer, abide at Your feet

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे शेवटींचें । वाटे साचें राखावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let me abide at Your feet, having grown weary of all other pleasures. Grant this steadiness to my mind, O Narayana; this is my prayer.

Within my chitta is Your dwelling; everything else is destined for destruction. Says Tuka, I wish to preserve this final truth as something genuine.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let me stay at Your feet, grown weary of every other pleasure. Grant my mind this steadiness, Narayana; this is my prayer. Within me is Your dwelling; all else is bound to perish. Tuka says: this last truth is what I want to keep, and keep it true.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays to be fixed at God's feet, having tasted other pleasures and found them tiresome. The single thing he asks of Narayana is steadiness of mind, the strength to stay put and not drift. His reason is simple: God dwells within the heart, while everything outside is headed for destruction. The closing line names this as the final truth he means to hold onto and guard as something genuine, not let slip away.

GATHA 2651 The Saints

The saints, fragrance by nature

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे कैंची खंती । सुजाती ते ठाकणी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sandalwood is naturally rich in fragrance; it is blessed by its very nature. Those fortunate ones who come before it are transformed by the encounter.

The philosopher's stone is permeated with its own miraculous quality; that power abides in it inherently. Says Tuka, where is the sorrow? A noble nature always finds its proper dwelling.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sandalwood is sandalwood; it is rich in fragrance by its very nature. Blessed are those who are drawn to it; by good fortune they come and stand before it. The philosopher's stone holds its power in itself; that quality has settled into it and stays. Tuka says: where is there any sorrow? A noble nature always finds its right place.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the saints through two old images: sandalwood that is fragrant simply by being itself, and the philosopher's stone that turns iron to gold by an inborn power. The point is that goodness in such a one is natural, not put on, and it gives itself away to whoever draws near. Those who are fortunate enough to come before such a presence are changed by the mere encounter. He ends by dismissing all worry: a noble nature carries its blessing within and always comes to rest where it belongs.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The mind, absorbed in dissolution, does not remain steady; the chief thing needed is the strength of firm posture. This is truly difficult for all people everywhere, yet it is good to call upon Narayana.

Renunciation of desire is what is meant by dispassion; one's family consists of all the sense objects. Action subsides as one walks the path, so long as body-consciousness persists.

Devotion means bowing to all living beings, calming the surge of desire and anger. Says Tuka, both the goal and the means are difficult; the body alone pays the price.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The mind, set on dissolving into stillness, will not stay still; what it needs most is the strength of a steady seat. This is truly hard for everyone, everywhere; yet it is good to call upon Narayana. Renunciation of desire, that is what dispassion means. Your family is the whole brood of sense objects. Action quiets down as you walk on, step by step, until body-consciousness comes to rest. Devotion means bowing to every living creature, cooling the boil of lust and anger. Tuka says: the goal and the means are both hard, and it is the body alone that pays the price.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out the discipline of inward absorption honestly, admitting that the mind refuses to hold still and that firm posture is only the beginning of the strength required. He redefines the key terms plainly: dispassion is the giving up of desire, and the real family one must leave is not relatives but the whole crowd of sense objects. The path is gradual, action falling away step by step as body-consciousness loosens, and devotion shows itself as reverence for every living thing and the cooling of lust and anger. He does not pretend it is easy: both the end and the way are difficult, and it is the body that bears the cost of the effort.

Exhortation, do the imperishable thing

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why do you not do something that will never perish? Bow before all beings and take refuge in the Lord of the Universe. Why not take the fruit of the scriptures, knowing their very root and essence? Says Tuka, beyond this point there is no further path to walk.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why will you not do the one thing that never perishes? Bow before all beings; take refuge in Vishwambhara, who holds the universe. Why not take the fruit of the scriptures, once you know their root and essence? Tuka says: beyond this there is no further road to walk.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses a single question: why spend yourself on things that decay when one imperishable act is available? That act is to take refuge in Vishwambhara, the sustainer of all, and to bow before every creature as His. He says the scriptures themselves, boiled down to their root, point to exactly this fruit, so there is no excuse of not knowing. The closing line shuts the door on alternatives: past this point there is no other path; this is where every road ends.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The body has become like a corpse; its place is marked in the cremation ground. Desire, anger, and illusion weep day and night, crying 'Alas, alas' before the lord of death.

The fuel cakes of dispassion are set upon the body, and the fire of knowledge blazes into life itself. The pot is turned around and broken at the feet; the great proclamation resounds in the world.

The water-oblation of sesame seeds has been offered to name, clan, and form; the body is surrendered to whom it belongs. Says Tuka, the final rites have happened of their own accord; the lamp of the Guru's grace shines brightly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My body has become a corpse; its place in the cremation ground is already marked. Desire, anger, and illusion weep night and day, crying out before Yama, the lord of death. The dung-cakes of dispassion are laid on the body, and the fire of knowledge blazes up over my living self. The pot is carried round and broken at the feet; the great word resounds aloud among people. The sesame and water are offered to clan, name, and form; the body is handed back to the One it belongs to. Tuka says: the rites have completed themselves, and the lamp of the Guru's grace burns bright.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells of dying while still alive, staging his own funeral as the death of the false self. The mourners are not relatives but desire, anger, and illusion, who weep because their hold is ending. He carries the cremation ritual through image by image: dung-cakes of dispassion for fuel, the fire of spiritual knowledge, the funeral pot broken at the feet, the great Vedic utterance proclaimed, the offerings made over the old identity of clan, name, and form. The whole rite happens on its own, and what it leaves behind is not ash but light: the lamp of the Guru's grace, burning where the self once stood.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I witnessed my own death with my own eyes, and it became a celebration beyond compare. All three worlds were flooded with bliss; through the realization of being the Self of all, that joy was experienced.

I was confined to one corner by the ego; by renouncing it, this abundance was born. The impurity of birth and death has been wiped clean; through the release of 'I' and 'mine,' all separation has ended.

Narayana granted me a dwelling place; I laid my devotion at His feet and remained. Says Tuka, what was given has been stamped upon the world; what was received has been absorbed into my very being.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I watched my own death with my own eyes, and it became a joy beyond compare. All three worlds were flooded with bliss; being the Self of all, I knew that delight. I had been shut into one small corner by the ego; by giving it up, this abundance was born. The defilement of birth and death is wiped away; with my 'I' and 'mine' let go, I have moved far from all separation. Narayana gave me a place to dwell; I laid my whole heart at His feet and stayed. Tuka says: what was given is stamped upon the world, and what I received I have pressed into my very being.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from the far side of the ego's death, which he experienced not as loss but as an incomparable celebration. Once the ego shut him into a narrow corner; surrendering it opened him into the bliss of being the Self of all, filling the three worlds. With 'I' and 'mine' released, the very impurity of birth and death falls away and separation ends. The state is not abstract: Narayana has given him a dwelling, and he has settled there with his whole heart at God's feet, what he received now absorbed into his being and shining out into the world.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I performed the last rites of the body with my own hands. The elements were offered into the fire of Brahman.

At once, all obligations were fulfilled; now there is only Narayana, Narayana. The nectar of immortality has been fed and the body has been soothed; all its parts have dissolved into that essence.

The Ekadashi ritual of fasting and vigil concluded; the twelfth day is for the feast. All karmic rites ended with the breaking of the vessel; the only remaining bond is with the Name.

Says Tuka, now there is bliss within bliss; Govinda has expanded into Govinda throughout all creation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I sent off my own body with my own hands; I offered the elements into the fire of Brahman. In one stroke every obligation was finished; now it is only Narayana, Narayana. The nectar of immortality was fed and the body grew calm; all its parts dissolved into that essence. The Ekadashi vigil and fast are over; the twelfth day is for the feast. Every karmic rite ended when the vessel broke; the one bond that remains is with the Name. Tuka says: now there is bliss within bliss; Govinda has spread out into Govinda everywhere.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram again describes performing his own funeral as the end of the false self, offering the bodily elements into the fire of Brahman. With that one act every ritual duty is discharged at once, leaving nothing but the repeated Name, Narayana. He maps the death onto the cycle of Ekadashi: the fast and vigil are the dying, and the feast of the twelfth day is the joy that follows. When the vessel of the old self breaks, all karmic obligation ends and the single remaining tie is to the Name. What is left is bliss within bliss, with Govinda alone expanding into Govinda through all of creation.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The ritual offering of the body-ball has been made; sesame and water have been offered at the three root centers. All resolves have been settled by a single utterance: 'All is offered to Brahman' at the very end.

The rites of the right hand and the left hand have been submerged; the one secret is: all is Vishnu. The relationship of father and son has reached its conclusion; in all beings, Janardana is realized without distinction.

Whatever worship existed has been accepted in full; the opportune moment has been naturally seized. Says Tuka, the deliverance of all has been accomplished. Now this is my final bow.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have made the offering of the body-ball. I have offered sesame and water at the three root centers. With one word I settle every resolve: at the very end, all is given to Brahman. The rites of the right hand and the left hand are sunk and gone. There is one secret: all is Vishnu. The bond of father and son has reached its close. In every being I see Janardana, with no difference. Whatever worship there was, it is all accepted now. The right moment has come of itself, and I have seized it. Tuka says: the deliverance of all is done. Now this is my last bow.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram performs his own funeral while still alive, naming each rite of death and then dissolving it into one act. He offers the body-ball, the sesame and water, the right-hand and left-hand rites, but instead of completing them as ceremony he settles them all in a single word: everything is given back to Brahman. With that, the very ground of the rituals collapses, because the difference they depend on is gone: father and son are no longer two, and in every being he sees only Janardana. The secret he has found is that all is Vishnu, so there is no one left outside to be saved separately. That is why he can say the deliverance of all is finished and offer his final bow.

GATHA 2658 The Nature of God

God as mother, overflowing with love

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Everything is settled now; He does not regard time or occasion. Vitthal is a compassionate mother, ever overflowing with the milk of love.

She does not consider weariness or fatigue; she is never harsh, never angry. Says Tuka, in her there is no trace of any distinction.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Everything is settled now. He does not ask the time or the occasion. Vitthal is a tender mother, always overflowing with the milk of love. She does not count my weariness or my tiredness. She is never harsh. She holds no anger. Tuka says: in her there is no difference at all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes God not as a judge but as a nursing mother whose love does not wait for the right moment. He calls Vitthal a mother whose milk of love is always flowing, so the giving never depends on the devotee deserving it or arriving on a fixed day. Such a mother does not weigh how tired or unworthy the child is, and she carries no harshness and no anger. The poem ends by naming the deepest point: in her there is no distinction at all, no sorting of high from low or worthy from unworthy.

GATHA 2659 Confession and Sin

Confession, the outer dress and the bare inside

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I hold the desire to behold You, but my conduct falls short of deserving it. If You take up my cause by Your own authority, only then shall I become one who truly sees Your feet.

The outer dress has been properly adorned, but the interior has not been stripped bare in the same way. Says Tuka, I am already lost unless You come to my aid, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I hold the longing to see You. But my conduct gives me no place to stand. If You take up my cause by Your own power, only then will I come to see Your feet. I have dressed the outside up well. The inside has not been stripped bare in the same way. Tuka says: I am already lost, O God, unless You stand by me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram confesses that his wish to see God is real but his life does not earn it, so he throws the whole matter onto grace. He admits a gap between outside and inside: the outer dress is well arranged, the religious appearance is in order, but inwardly he has not been laid bare and emptied in the same way. Because his conduct gives him no ground to stand on, the only path left is for God to take up his cause by sheer divine power, not by Tukaram's merit. He ends by naming the stake plainly: without God's support he is already a lost man.

GATHA 2660 Confession and Sin

Confession, surrender to the all-knowing

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My conduct has been flawed; my own mind is the witness. I know my own virtues and faults.

Now You are the all-knowing one, O Panduranga; do what the occasion demands. At a wedding feast, the poor are seated in a separate row; the moment that passes cannot be recalled.

Says Tuka, now I have become a refugee at Your door. What happens next is in Your hands.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My conduct has been bad. My own mind is the witness. I know my own merits and my faults. Now You are the all-knowing one, O Panduranga. Do what the moment asks. At a wedding feast the poor are seated in a row of their own. The moment that passes does not come back. Tuka says: now I have come to Your door for refuge. What comes next is in Your hands.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes his confession without excuses: his own mind stands as witness to his faults, and he claims no hidden virtue. He then hands the whole judgment to God, who already knows everything, asking only that God act as the situation demands. The image of the poor being seated apart at a wedding feast names his fear of being set aside, and the reminder that a passed moment never returns presses the urgency of being received now. His final move is pure surrender: he has come as a refugee to God's door, and whatever happens next is no longer his to control.

GATHA 2661 Faith and Trust

Faith, no one turned away

मराठी मूळ

आतां भय नाहीं ऐसें वाटे जीवा । घडलिया सेवा समर्थाची ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now the jiva feels no fear, having rendered service to the Capable One. Now let my mind hold firm to this certainty: let there be no lapse in contemplation.

No one has ever been turned away here; every seeker who came was met with grace. Says Tuka, here there is no other rule: at God's feet, kings and beggars stand alike.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now my soul feels there is no fear left, for I have served the Capable One. Now let my mind hold this certainty firm. Let there be no break in remembering Him. No one has ever been turned away here. Every beggar who came was met with grace. Tuka says: here there is no other rule. At God's feet the king and the beggar stand alike.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram declares that fear is gone once a person has given service to God, the one truly able to help. He turns to his own mind and asks it to hold this certainty steadily and never let the remembrance of God lapse, because the confidence has to be kept, not just felt once. The ground of that confidence is God's record: no one who came here has ever been refused, and every seeker met grace. The single rule of this door is that it makes no distinction of rank, so a king and a beggar stand equal at God's feet.

Saints as holy thieves, a warning in jest

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

These Vaishnava thieves have crept into the house of this unfortunate soul. Guard your belongings today: pots, covers, and all.

Those whose home you eat in, they will take everything you own. Says Tuka, they leave no trace of attachment behind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

These Vaishnava thieves have come into the house of this poor wretch. Guard your things today: your pots, your covering, all of it. In whoever's house they eat, they will carry off everything that person owns. Tuka says: they take it so that they leave no trace behind.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram opens his playful run of poems that praise the saints by calling them thieves. The mock alarm to guard your pots and your covering is the warning of a householder, but the saints are after something else entirely. Wherever they are fed and welcomed, they strip the host of all he owns, meaning they carry off his sense of mine. The closing line says they do it so cleanly that no trace of attachment is left, which is exactly the deliverance the warning pretends to fear.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I hear the uproar of certain people growing louder. Do not trust them any further; they are robbers of the body's comforts.

This alone is their treasure: they are always stripped bare and exposed. Says Tuka, they take from you what is yours, and you do not even know it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

These Vaishnava thieves have crept into the house of this poor wretch. Guard your things today: your pots, your covers, all of it. In whoever's house they eat, they carry off everything that person owns. Tuka says: they leave no trace of attachment behind.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram plays with the language of theft to praise the saints, calling the Vaishnavas thieves who break into the heart and steal it clean. The mock warning to guard your pots and covers turns serious at once: what they actually carry away is not property but your hold on it. Wherever they are welcomed and fed, they take everything, meaning they strip a person of the sense of mine. The closing line gives the secret away: what they leave behind is no trace of attachment, which is the very thing that frees you.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To serve other masters requires bodily labor, and their words are hollow. But Panduranga is so easy and accessible; He does not make His servants run back and forth.

Other masters place obstacles before a meeting; here, not even a word of barrier exists. Other masters fill the belly only occasionally; the bounty here never runs out, not even at the end of the ages.

Other masters punish for any lapse in service; here, there is neither jealousy nor resentment. Says Tuka, He transforms others into His own likeness, uplifting both the high and the low.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I hear the uproar of certain people growing loud. Do not trust them any further. They are robbers of the body's comforts. This alone is their treasure: they are always bare and open, holding nothing. Tuka says: they will carry off what is yours, and you will not even know it.

WHAT IT MEANS

This poem continues the playful image of the saints as thieves, now warning against trusting them if you mean to keep your comforts. They are robbers of the body's ease, because what they take is exactly the attachment a person wants to protect. Their own wealth is their nakedness: they keep nothing and hide nothing, which is why they can give everything away. The sly closing line says they will carry off what is yours so quietly that you will not even notice your bondage has gone.

Devotion, the easy and faithful Lord

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The nature of the wicked is such that dirt falls into their own mouths. Their own intellect misleads them, and their tongues utter what is improper.

They look upon the saints with eyes that see only faults, picking fights recklessly. Says Tuka, for the wicked, there is no sense of high or low.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To serve other masters takes the labor of the body, and their words turn out hollow. But Panduranga is so easy, so near. He does not make His servant run back and forth. With other masters obstacles fall before a meeting; here not even a word stands in the way. Other masters fill the belly only now and then; the bounty here never runs out, not even at the end of the ages. Other masters punish any lapse in service; here there is neither jealousy nor spite. Tuka says: He makes others into His own likeness. He lifts up the stranger, the high and the low alike.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts the world's masters with God point by point to show how much easier and surer divine service is. Worldly masters demand bodily toil, break their promises, block access, feed you only sometimes, and punish every mistake. Panduranga reverses each of these: He is near and easy to reach, places no barrier before a meeting, gives a bounty that never empties, and holds no jealousy or spite when His servant slips. The final claim is the largest: this Lord does not just reward service, He transforms the servant into His own likeness and uplifts everyone, high and low and even the outsider.

Prayer, You alone are my kin

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not leave me in despair; fulfill my hope. Listen, listen, O Narayana; hear my supplication.

You are my mother, my father, my kin; You alone are my true friend and well-wisher. Says Tuka, without You, who else would care for my welfare?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not leave me in despair. Fulfill my hope. Listen, listen, O Narayana. Hear my plea. Mother, father, kinsmen: You alone are my friend and my own. Tuka says: without You, who would care for my good?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays directly and plainly, asking God not to abandon him to hopelessness but to grant what he longs for. He calls out twice for Narayana to listen, the repetition carrying the urgency of a man with nowhere else to turn. He then collapses every human bond into one: mother, father, and kin are all God, who alone is his true relation and well-wisher. The closing question names the stake of the whole prayer: apart from God, there is simply no one who would seek his welfare.

Devotion, the feet that cure existence

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Your feet are the remedy and the sustenance, the physician's true prescription. That I do not remember them every moment is why I writhe in anguish.

Where the disease of worldly existence is cured, there all joys are found. Says Tuka, what has been held upon the sacred brick is truly beautiful.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Your feet are the remedy and the life, the physician's true cure. That I do not remember them moment by moment is why I writhe in anguish. There the disease of worldly existence is broken, and there every joy is found. Tuka says: what is held upon the brick is the truly beautiful thing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks of God's feet as medicine for the deepest sickness, the disease of worldly existence itself. He confesses that his suffering comes from his own failure to keep them in mind at every moment, so the anguish is self-inflicted, not God's withholding. Where those feet are found, the disease is cured and all true joy lies. He ends by pointing to the feet of Vitthal standing on the brick at Pandhari and calling that the one truly beautiful thing, the cure worth holding to.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hear these words of mine, O saintly ones. I entreat you with folded hands.

Those who speak from their own fancies and speculations, who can stop them? Only He knows the true feeling in our chitta: Panduranga, the lord of Rukmini. My mind is entangled at His feet; therefore nothing else appeals to me.

Says Tuka, I cannot bear entreaties from others; it pains my chitta and disturbs my mind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hear these words of mine, O saintly ones. I beg you with folded hands. Those who speak from their own guesses and fancies, who can stop them? Only He knows the true feeling in my heart: Panduranga, the lord of Rukmini. My mind is caught at His feet. That is why nothing else pleases me. Tuka says: I cannot bear the pleadings of others. They grieve my heart and break my mind.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram appeals to the saints with folded hands, the gesture of a man defending something dear to him. He admits he cannot silence people who judge from their own assumptions, so he stops arguing with them and turns to the one witness who matters. Only Panduranga, the lord of Rukmini, knows the real feeling in his heart, and that feeling is total: his mind is so entangled at God's feet that nothing else can attract him. Because of this single attachment he cannot bear the pleadings or pressures of others pulling him elsewhere, since they only wound and unsettle a heart already given away.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Is there anyone who does not desire daughters, sons, horses, wife, and wealth? The sick person takes the bitter neem willingly, enduring its taste only to overcome disease and pain. Why would a thief flee with joy while being chased? One should not block the path of the one who pursues him.

Only the one whose purpose it serves knows what must be done; no outsider should try to restrain him. Says Tuka, when a treasure is found, one should offer one's very life for it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Is there anyone who does not want daughters, sons, horses, a wife, wealth? The sick man swallows the bitter neem; he takes it gladly, only to be rid of his disease and pain. Does a thief run away laughing when he is chased? Do not put a stick in the path of the one who hunts him. Only the one whose work it is knows how to do it; no outsider should try to stop another. Tuka says: if you would find the hidden treasure, offer up your very life for it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming what it costs to want God above all else. Everyone wants the things of the world; he does not deny the pull of them. But he sets beside that the sick man who chokes down bitter neem because he wants the cure more than he wants comfort, and the hunter who will not be turned aside from his pursuit. The one who knows the purpose lets nothing block him, and no bystander has the right to restrain him. The treasure is found only by the one ready to spend his whole life, his very self, to reach it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If I am in the wrong, then point it out. Show me another path to walk.

I follow the same road that I see before me. Should I not walk it? Tell me why.

The open highway has proven strong and reliable. What hardship can you inflict upon me? Even if you try to frighten me, who will cower in fear? But I do tell you one thing.

Says Tuka, a true warrior is honored by both sides. Whether he dies or gains liberation, he wins glory either way.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If I am in the wrong, show me. Point me to another path to walk. I go by the same road I see in front of me. Should I not walk it? Tell me why. The open highway is firm and tested; what harm can you do me? You try to frighten me, but who here will cower? Still, I will tell you one thing. Tuka says: the brave man is honored on both sides; whether he dies or is set free, he wins glory either way.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers his critics by daring them to correct him. If his path is wrong, let them show him the wrong and offer a better one; otherwise their threats are empty. He calls his way the open, well-trodden highway, the plain road of devotion that has been walked safely before, and he refuses to be scared off it. The closing line names what he has to lose: nothing. Like a true warrior, he wins either way, for death and liberation both end in honor, so fear has no hold on him.

तुका ह्मणे हा तों संतांचा प्रसाद । लाधलों आनंद प्रेमसुख ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

These are not my own words; know this for certain. I am but a laborer of Vithoba.

The compassionate One has released the words through my mouth; He has preserved my honor. Now my fear in this world has been destroyed; I have become as boundless as the sky.

Says Tuka, this is the grace of the saints; through them I have attained the bliss of divine love.

IN PLAIN WORDS

These are not my words; know this for certain. I am only a laborer of Vithoba. He set the words loose through my mouth; the merciful One has guarded my honor. Now my fear of this world is destroyed; I have become as wide as the sky. Tuka says: this is the grace of the saints; I have come into the bliss, the joy of love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram refuses any credit for his songs. He calls himself a hired hand of Vithoba, and says the words were released through his mouth by God, not made by him. Because the work was never his own, his honor rests in God's keeping rather than in his own standing. From that surrender comes freedom: his worldly fear is gone and he feels as boundless as the sky. He traces the whole gift back to the grace of the saints, through whom he has reached the bliss of divine love.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Old age has whispered a secret into my ear: the meeting with death draws near. Now, O my mind, become alert.

Know that the art of offering everything is the key to accomplishing your purpose. The final moment can drown you in an instant; seize this time that has come so close.

Says Tuka, contemplate your family deity and turn away the idle noise of false words.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Old age has come and whispered in my ear: the meeting with death is near. Now, O my mind, be awake. Know this: offering everything is what gets the work done. The last hour can drown you in a moment; seize this time, for it has come close. Tuka says: hold your family deity in your thoughts, and turn away the false words around you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram hears in his own aging the warning that death is close, and he uses it to rouse his mind. Old age is the messenger; its message is to wake up while there is still time. He says the way to finish the real work is to offer everything, to hold nothing back, and to do it now, because the final moment comes without notice and can pull you under. So he tells himself to keep God in mind and to push away the idle, false talk that crowds the attention at the end.

Devotion, need is the true measure

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे ऋण फिटे एके घडी । अलभ्य ते जोडी हातां आल्या ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The past efforts all come together through this; like a single thread, the whole garment holds. The initial hospitality is only for the occasion; after that, the real service begins with earnest care.

Where there is genuine need, devotion exceeds all measure; even with little, it accomplishes much. Says Tuka, a debt is cleared in a single moment when the priceless treasure comes into one's hands.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All the past effort comes together in this; like a single thread, the whole cloth holds. The first welcome lasts only for the occasion; after that the real serving begins, with care. Where the need is real, the honor given is greater; even a little goes a long way. Tuka says: the debt is cleared in a single moment when the priceless treasure comes into your hands.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is contrasting surface courtesy with true service. The opening welcome is for show and lasts only as long as the occasion; what counts is the steady, earnest care that comes after. Where the need is genuine, devotion outdoes all measure, and even a small offering accomplishes much. He gathers all of one's past labor into this single thread that holds the whole garment together. And the long debt of many lives, he says, is wiped clean in one moment, the moment the priceless treasure finally comes into your hands.

Liberation, burning the seed of rebirth

मराठी मूळ

साधावा तो देव सर्वस्वाचेसाटीं । प्रारब्ध तुटी क्रियमाण॥1॥
मग कासयानें पुन्हा संवसार । बीजाचे अंकुर दग्ध होती ॥ध्रु.॥
जिणें दिल्हें त्यासी द्यावा पिंडदान । उत्तीर्ण चरण धरूनि व्हावें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे निज भोगईल निजता । नाहीं होइल सत्ता दुजियाची ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One should pursue God with everything one has. Through active effort, even the bonds of past destiny are severed.

Then what cause remains for worldly life to return? The seeds of future births are burned to ash. To the one who gave you life, offer the rites of release; become free of debt by holding fast to His feet.

Says Tuka, the Self shall enjoy its own true nature; the sovereignty of any second power shall cease.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Pursue God with everything you have. By present effort even the bonds of past destiny are cut. Then what cause is left for worldly life to come again? The seeds of future births are burned to ash. To the one who gave you this life, offer the funeral rite; hold fast to His feet and become free of the debt. Tuka says: the Self will enjoy its own true nature; no second power will hold any sway.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes how devotion ends the cycle of rebirth. He says to chase God with all you have, because present effort can sever even the cords of past karma. Once those are cut, nothing is left to bring worldly life back, for the seeds of future births are burned. In a startling image, he tells you to perform the death rite for the very self that gave you this bound life, clearing the old debt by clinging to God's feet. What remains is the Self resting in its own nature, with no other power left to rule over it.

GATHA 2675 The Power of the Name

The Name, costs nothing, pleases God

मराठी मूळ

जळों अगी पडो खान । नारायण भोक्ता ॥1॥

भोजनकाळीं करितां धंदा । ह्मणा गोविंदा पावलें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे न लगे मोल। देवा बोल आवडती ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if the food burns or falls into the fire, say 'Narayana is the enjoyer.' Whoever speaks thus reaches Narayana. At mealtimes, even amidst worldly work, say 'Govinda, we have received.' Says Tuka, it costs nothing at all, and God delights in such words.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even if the food burns or falls into the fire, say: Narayana is the one who eats. Whoever says this with his tongue reaches Narayana. While you work, even at mealtime, say: Govinda, it has come to us. Tuka says: it costs nothing at all, and God delights in such words.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram teaches the simplest practice of the Name woven into ordinary life. When the food is spoiled or lost, instead of complaint he says to name Narayana as the true enjoyer of all that is offered. Even in the middle of work and meals, a word given to Govinda turns the moment toward God. The point is that this remembrance asks no ritual, no payment, no special hour. It costs nothing, and yet God takes delight in these plain words spoken from the day's own tasks.

GATHA 2676 The Saints

The saints, trust them or lose both worlds

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे क्षीर वासराच्या अंगें । किंवा धांवे लागें विषमें मारुं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whoever offends the saints in any manner will find no good in either world. One who fails to maintain trust in the saints finds his sins growing powerful.

Says Tuka, a cow yields milk for the sake of her calf; would she not charge at a venomous creature that threatens it?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whoever angers the saints in any way will find no good in either world. The one who keeps no trust in the saints sees his sins grow strong. Tuka says: a cow gives milk for the sake of her calf; will she not charge at the venomous thing that comes to harm it?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram warns against offending the saints and against losing faith in them. To wound them in any way, he says, ruins a person in this world and the next, and once trust in them is gone, one's own faults gain power. Then he gives the saints' two faces in one image: the cow that yields gentle milk for her calf is the same cow that will charge a snake threatening it. The warning is meant to turn a person toward self-examination, to ask whether his own scorn is the venom the saints must meet, not to despise anyone.

GATHA 2677 The Saints

The saints, fouling your own rescue

मराठी मूळ

दुखवी तो बुडे सांगडीचा तापा । अतित्याई पापाची च मूतिन ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जेव्हां फिरतें कपाळ । तरी अमंगळ योग होतो ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who mixes filth and waste into water, how can that water be purified? The unfortunate one who turns away from the feet of the saints has no hope of deliverance. One who harms his own raft drowns; the inhospitable person is sin itself made flesh.

Says Tuka, when destiny turns against a person, inauspicious circumstances inevitably follow.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If someone stirs dung and filth into water, how can that water be made clean? The luckless one who turns his face from the feet of the saints has no place to be saved. The one who wounds them drowns in the heat of his own raft; he is sin itself made flesh. Tuka says: when a man's fortune turns against him, then the unlucky union comes about.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures the folly of harming the very ones who could save you. You cannot purify water by mixing filth into it, and you cannot be delivered while turning your back on the saints, who are the means of deliverance. The one who hurts them is sinking his own raft, the only thing keeping him afloat, so his cruelty is sin in bodily form. He reads such turning-away as the mark of a fortune gone bad. The poem points at the pattern of spurning your own rescue, inviting the listener to check for it in himself rather than to scorn another.

Longing, the silence of God

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Is it Your wish that I should grieve in this body? I do not know what You hold within. That is why You give me no reply, and You have kept my chitta in distress.

Should I then go to the wilderness, O Benefactor, with this intent? Says Tuka, must I make my home in the gorge of a mountain?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Is it Your wish that I grieve in this body? I do not know what You hold within. That is why You give me no answer; You have kept my heart in pain. Should I go away into the forest, O Giver, with this in mind? Tuka says: must I make the mountain gorge my home?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram cries out at God's silence and the ache it leaves in him. He does not know God's hidden intent, so the lack of any reply feels like a deliberate keeping of his heart in distress. He wonders aloud whether the answer is for him to abandon the world, to go into the wilderness, to make a mountain ravine his dwelling. The poem stays in the raw uncertainty of love that is not yet answered, asking the question without resolving it, holding the grief up to the one who gave him this body.

GATHA 2679 Longing and Separation

Longing, waiting wears thin

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I thought that when Your name came to my lips, I would call You Purushottama. I have waited with patience, but vexation has arisen in my mind.

The world hears only the story and the name; where there is no hope, no faith is born. Says Tuka, are You not a witness to all this, O Panduranga?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I thought when Your name came to my lips, I would call You Purushottama. I have held on with patience, but vexation has risen in my mind. The world hears only the story and the name; where there is no hope, no faith is born. Tuka says: You are the witness, are You not, O Panduranga?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses God with the strain of long waiting. He had trusted that taking the divine name would bring him to the Supreme Person, and he has waited patiently, but the delay is now turning to irritation. He observes a hard truth: the world hears only the tale and the name, and where no real hope is given, no living faith can take root in a person. So he turns the matter back to God, calling Panduranga the witness of his waiting, asking the silent one to acknowledge what He has seen.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I know neither japa, nor tapas, nor ritual, nor sacrifice. Time has already marked me for its own.

I have taken shelter behind God out of this fear; now it falls upon Him to protect what is His. The stakes keep rising, and when night falls, what recourse remains? Says Tuka, whatever was saved from the thief's hands has now yielded a profit over and above the loss.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I know no japa, no penance, no ritual, no sacrifice. Time has already marked me for its own. In this fear I have run and hidden behind God; now it is His to look after what is His. The stakes keep climbing higher; and when night falls, what move is left to play? Tuka says: whatever was saved from the thief's hands has turned out to be profit over and above the loss.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram admits he has none of the recognized merits, no recitation, austerity, rite, or sacrifice, and that death already has him in its sights. Out of that fear he has taken cover behind God, and he turns the duty around: having claimed him as His own, God must now protect him. The image of rising stakes and approaching night says the time for self-effort is running out. Yet the close turns hopeful: like goods snatched back from a thief, whatever has been rescued by taking refuge counts as pure gain, a profit beyond the loss he feared.

GATHA 2681 Longing and Separation

Longing, the complaint of dry love

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now I perceive that You lack the power to help. Your name has lost its potency; the stream of love runs dry.

Sin comes as an obstacle, and suffering grows greater still. Says Tuka, this Vitthal seems to have grown weak in strength.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now I see it plainly. You have no power left. Your name has lost its strength. The stream of love is breaking, running dry. Sin comes in like a wall across my path, and the burning grows worse. Tuka says: this Vitthal has gone weak; his strength has thinned.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram throws his pain straight at God in the language of accusation, which is itself a kind of fierce intimacy. He says the Name no longer works, the love has stopped flowing, sin keeps blocking him and the inner fire only grows. The harsh claim, that Vitthal himself has grown weak, is the devotee's way of forcing God to answer; it stakes God's own honor on rescuing the one who cries out. The poem does not resolve the complaint; it leaves the protest standing, trusting that the Lord cannot bear to be called powerless.

GATHA 2682 Longing and Separation

Longing, the unbearable affliction

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why did You let this attach itself to my body, being so close? By what sin was this upheaval raised, this destruction that I now witness? The sight of one tormented by a serpent evokes pity, yet the venom shows no mercy. Says Tuka, it would have been well, but I cannot endure what has been heaped upon me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why did you let this cling to my body, you who are so near? By what sin did this rising come, this ruin I now watch? When you see someone bitten by a snake you feel pity; but the venom shows no mercy. Tuka says: it would have been good, but I cannot bear what has been piled on me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is crying out under an affliction he cannot name and cannot escape. He turns to the God who is close at hand and asks why such suffering was allowed to fasten onto him, as if it rose from some sin. He pictures himself as a person bitten by a serpent: onlookers feel pity, yet the poison keeps working all the same. The poem ends not in answer but in confession of his limit, that this is more than he can endure, which is itself the cry that summons help.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Rush to me swiftly, or else accept my prostration. Your reputation is at stake while I am being diminished.

Do not take Your time; do not walk toward me steadily. Run.

Says Tuka, my voice is ashamed of its own weakness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Run to me at once, or else take my bowing down. Your good name is slipping while I am being brought low. Do not hold back. Do not walk to me at a steady pace. Run. Tuka says: my voice is ashamed of its own weakness.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram demands rescue and uses God's reputation as the lever. He tells the Lord to come quickly or at least accept his prostration, then warns that God's own fame is on the line if a devotee is left to sink. The image is urgent and physical: do not stroll, do not take your time, run. Beneath the boldness is humility, for Tuka admits his own voice is ashamed of how feeble it has become, so the command and the confession are one breath.

Surrender, the servant's claim on the master

मराठी मूळ

सेवकासी आज्ञा निरोपासी काम । स्वामीचे ते धर्म स्वामी जाणे ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे माझें करावें कारण । आपुलें जतन ब्रीद कशाला ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A servant follows commands; a messenger carries out his task. The duties of the master are the master's own to know.

One should sit quietly at the root of the mind and draw all the senses back toward the feet of the Lord. In the urgency of meeting Him, I would gladly offer my body.

Says Tuka, attend to my cause; why safeguard Your own reputation while I remain in need?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A servant obeys orders; a messenger does his errand. The master's duties are the master's own to know. Sit still at the root of the mind and draw all the senses back to his feet. In my hurry to meet him I would gladly wave my whole body before him as an offering. Tuka says: do my work, attend to my need. Why guard your own good name instead?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out the right relation between devotee and Lord, then presses his case. His part is the servant's part: to sit quiet at the source of the mind and pull every sense back to God's feet, longing only to meet him. The Lord's part, the master's part, is to look after the servant's true welfare. So Tuka ends by pressing God to act for him rather than merely protecting his own reputation, turning the logic of master and servant into a claim the Lord must honor.

GATHA 2685 Prayers

Prayer, frailty before anxiety

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे आहे वचनाची उरी । करितों तोंवरि विज्ञापना ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Many paths open up to anxiety, and my being was not made to withstand them. Now, who will deliberate upon this? Behold the truth of it, O Panduranga.

Says Tuka, so long as words remain, I shall continue to make my supplication.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Many roads open up that lead to dread, and I was not built to stand against them. Now who is to think this through? See the truth of it, Panduranga. Tuka says: as long as words are left in me, I will keep making my plea.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram admits he is not strong enough to face the many ways anxiety crowds in on him. He hands the whole problem over, asking who but God can work it out, and calls on Panduranga to see his condition as it truly is. The poem is a plain surrender of his own competence. Its closing vow is the heart of it: while a single word is still left in him, he will not stop pleading, making persistence itself his only strength.

GATHA 2686 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the one stable shelter

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who would love the company of sorrow? Let all of that stand apart. Let us befriend the beautiful dark One.

Those shelters that crumble in a moment should be built up and abandoned just the same. Says Tuka, I have arrived at a good and stable resting place.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who would love the company of sorrow? Let all of that stand aside. Let us make a friend of the beautiful dark One. The shelters that break in a moment are built up only to be thrown away. Tuka says: it is well; I have reached a good and steady resting place.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram weighs the company he keeps against the place he has finally found. He refuses to love sorrow and sets aside everything that crumbles, choosing instead to befriend the dark and beautiful Lord. He sees clearly that every worldly shelter is momentary, raised up only to be discarded, so resting in them is wasted labor. The poem closes in quiet relief: he has arrived at the one resting place that does not break, and that is enough.

GATHA 2687 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the worth of pure company

मराठी मूळ

मेला तरी जावो सुखें नरकासी । कळंकी याविशीं शिवों नये ॥1॥
रजस्वला करी वेलासी आघात । अंतरें तों हित दुरी बरें ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे लोणी घालोनि शेणांत । उपेगाची मात काय असे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let the stained one go to hell, if that is his lot; the tainted should not be touched. A woman in her impure days harms even the sacred vine; it is better to keep a safe distance.

Why ruin perfectly good fruit by contaminating it with defilement? Says Tuka, putting butter into dung serves no useful purpose at all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If the stained one dies, let him go gladly to hell; do not even touch the tainted. Keep your distance from what defiles; far off, your good is safe. Why bring sound fruit near, only to spoil it by mixing it with rot? Tuka says: dropping fresh butter into dung serves no purpose at all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is warning, in deliberately blunt images, against letting corrupting company contaminate what is whole. The point is not hatred of any person but the simple law that good is ruined when it is mixed with what spoils it, just as fruit rots in bad company and butter is wasted if dropped in filth. He is telling the seeker to guard the good they carry rather than expose it to what will defile it. Turned inward, the abhanga asks each of us to watch what we let near our own purer impulses, since one rotten thing can spoil the whole basket.

GATHA 2688 Faith and Trust

Faith, doubt is the only thief

मराठी मूळ

वर्णावे ते किती । केले पवाडे श्रीपति ॥1॥

भाव शुद्ध तरी । सांगितलें काम करी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे भोळा देव । परि हा नागवी संदेह ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How much can one describe the great deeds of the Lord? The faithful one receives the gain; if Padmanabha wills it, He gives. If one's devotion is pure, He accomplishes the work that is asked.

Says Tuka, God is guileless, but doubt strips one of everything.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How much can anyone tell of the great deeds of the Lord? The one who trusts receives the gain; if Padmanabha wills it, he gives. If your love is pure, he does the very work you ask. Tuka says: God is simple and trusting, but doubt strips you of everything.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets faith and doubt side by side and shows what each earns. God's deeds are beyond telling, yet the gain is reserved for the one who trusts; where devotion is pure, the Lord himself completes the work that is asked. He calls God guileless, easily won by simple faith. The sting lands at the end: it is doubt, not God's stinginess, that robs a person of everything, so the obstacle is always on our side, never his.

GATHA 2689 Worldly Life

Worldly life, merit clears the path

मराठी मूळ

संचितावांचून । पंथ न चलवे कारण ॥1॥

धन वित्त जोडे । देव ऐसें तों न घडे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आड । स्वहितासी बहु नाड ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Without accumulated merit, the path cannot be walked. Empty striving is all in vain; one merely swallows one's own spittle.

Wealth and possessions can be earned, but God is not attained so easily. Says Tuka, what a great obstacle stands in the way of one's own good.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Without stored merit the path cannot be walked; that is how it is. Dry striving is all wasted; you only swallow your own spit. Wealth and goods can be earned, but God is not won that easily. Tuka says: what a great hurdle stands in the way of your own good.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram draws a hard line between what effort alone can buy and what it cannot. Money and possessions can be gathered by labor, but God is not reached on the strength of effort without the merit gathered over time, and bare striving without it is like swallowing your own spittle, motion that feeds nothing. He is not denying effort; he is naming its limit. The closing line marks the real difficulty: the biggest obstacle to a person's own highest good is the lack of that inner readiness, not any shortage of worldly capacity.

GATHA 2690 Social Criticism

Social criticism, you reap your own nature

मराठी मूळ

अतित्याई बुडे गंगे । पाप लागे त्याचें त्या ॥1॥

अवचटें अग्न जाळी । न सांभाळी दुःख पावे ॥2॥
जैसें तैंसें दावी आरसा । नकटएा कैसा पालटे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even the river Ganga is polluted by the sins of the inhospitable; the fault belongs to the wrongdoer alone. This is the consequence of one's own nature, as one has fashioned it.

If fire is handled carelessly, it burns; one who fails to take care suffers pain. A mirror shows whatever is before it; how can it change the face of one whose nose is cut off? Says Tuka, each one's qualities produce their corresponding results.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The inhospitable man drowns even the Ganga in his sins; the fault stays his own. This comes from your own nature, the way you yourself have shaped it. Handle fire carelessly and it burns; the careless one suffers. A mirror shows just what stands before it; how can it change the face of one whose nose is cut off? Tuka says: each one's qualities bring their own matching fruit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram insists that consequences belong to the doer, not to anything outside. The hard-hearted man pollutes even holy water, but the sin clings to him alone, because it flows from the nature he himself has formed. The images make the law plain: fire burns the careless, and a mirror cannot flatter a disfigured face, it only reflects what is there. Turned on ourselves, the abhanga warns that we cannot blame the world or even sacred things for what our own qualities produce; the fruit always matches the seed.

GATHA 2691 Social Criticism

Social criticism, counsel wasted on the closed

मराठी मूळ

हेंद†याचें भरितां कान । हलवी मान भोंक रितें ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे फजितखोरा। ह्मणतां बरा उगा रहा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When worthless talk is poured into the ears, the head merely nods while the opening remains empty. I cannot speak plainly here, for the wicked will not receive it with sincerity.

When the mind has been squandered on bad qualities, good counsel cannot reach it. Says Tuka, to the shameless one, the best advice is simply to remain silent.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Pour worthless talk into his ears and the head just nods while the hole stays empty. I will not speak plainly here, for the wicked do not take it in good faith. When the mind is given over to bad ways, no good can reach it. Tuka says: to the shameless one, the best counsel is just to stay quiet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing the futility of advising someone who has closed himself off. Empty talk goes in and the listener only nods, while nothing actually lands; and good counsel is refused outright by one whose mind is already given over to its faults. He decides not to waste plain speech on the wicked, since it will be met without sincerity. The hard conclusion, that with the shameless silence is the wisest course, is aimed at the pattern of a hardened mind; read inward, it warns us not to become the ear that nods while staying empty.

GATHA 2692 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, truth over clever words

मराठी मूळ

नाहीं सरो येत जोडिल्या वचनीं । कवित्वाची वाणी कुशळता ॥1॥
सत्याचा अनुभव वेधी सत्यपणें । अनुभवाच्या गुणें रुचों येतों ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे येथे करावा उकल । लागे चि ना बोल वाढवूनि ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Cleverly crafted words and poetic skill do not suffice. True experience captivates through its own truthfulness; by the quality of that experience, one becomes appealing.

What use is adornment before a fire? What lies in the belly is revealed on the touchstone. Says Tuka, lay everything open here. Merely piling up words is of no use at all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Joined-up words and skill in verse do not carry you through. True experience holds you by its own truth; by the worth of that experience you become worth hearing. What use is ornament next to a fire? What is inside the belly comes out on the touchstone. Tuka says: lay it all open here. Piling up more words is no use at all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures real spiritual experience against mere verbal skill and finds the words wanting. Clever poetry cannot stand on its own; only lived truth grips the listener, and it is the genuineness of that experience that makes a person worth hearing. His images cut sharp: finery means nothing before a fire, and the touchstone reveals what metal you really carry inside. So he asks for everything to be opened honestly here, because stacking up more words adds nothing where truth is what is being tested.

GATHA 2693 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the worthless instructor

मराठी मूळ

लचाळाच्या कामा नाहीं ताळावाळा । न कळे ओंगळा उपदेश ॥1॥
वचनचर्येची न कळे चांचणी । ऐसी संघष्टनी अमंगळ ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे याचा धिक्कार चि बरा । बहुमति खराहूनि हीन ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A careless person's work has neither order nor discipline. The unclean one does not understand instruction.

There is no way to test the sincerity of his words; such company is inauspicious. He cannot sense the right moment; his intellect is foolish.

One of a foreign temperament, purity is beyond his grasp. Says Tuka, contempt for such a person is quite appropriate; one of many opinions is worse than the truly ignorant.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A careless person's work has no order, no discipline. The unclean one does not understand instruction. There is no way to test the truth of his words. Keeping such company is foul. He cannot sense the right moment; his mind is foolish. He is of a base temper; purity is beyond his reach. He is shallow, a windbag. Tuka says: contempt for such a one is fitting. A man of many opinions is worse than the truly ignorant.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is drawing a hard line around a kind of person: the careless, impure man whose words cannot be trusted and whose company corrupts. He has no sense of order, no sense of the right moment, no grasp of purity, only a flood of opinions. The sharp closing claim is that such a noisy, many-opinioned man is worse than someone who is simply ignorant, because the ignorant man at least does not mislead. The verse is best read as a warning to examine these patterns in oneself, not as license to despise a neighbor: the danger is in being the unteachable windbag, not in pointing at one.

GATHA 2694 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, one thing held

मराठी मूळ

एक धरिला चित्तीं । आह्मीं रखुमाईचा पती ॥1॥
तेणें जालें अवघें काम । निवारला भवश्रम ॥ध्रु.॥
परद्रव्य परनारी । जालीं विषाचिये परी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे फार । नाहीं लागत वेव्हार ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have held one thing in my chitta: the Lord of Rukmini. By that alone, everything has been accomplished, and the toil of worldly existence has been removed.

Another's wealth and another's spouse have become like poison to me. Says Tuka, no elaborate transaction is needed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have held one thing in my heart: the Lord of Rukmini. By that alone, every task is done; the toil of worldly existence is gone. Another's wealth, another's wife, have become like poison to me. Tuka says: no elaborate dealings are needed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names the single thing that settles everything: he holds Vitthal, the Lord of Rukmini, in his heart, and that one hold finishes all his work and ends the exhausting round of worldly life. From that one center, the two great temptations fall away on their own, for another's wealth and another's spouse have turned to poison in his mouth. The point is that devotion is not one more elaborate transaction added to life; it is the one hold that makes all the others unnecessary.

GATHA 2695 Worldly Life

Worldly life, death walks beside you

मराठी मूळ

भेणें पळे डोळसा । न कळे मृत्यु तो सरिसा ॥1॥

संसाराची खंती । मावळल्या तरी शक्ति ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे हीणा । बुद्धि चुकली नारायणा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A person with sight runs from death in fear, not knowing that death runs alongside. How has this bewilderment come about, that one walks a path from which there is no return? Even when one's worry over worldly life subsides, power itself wanes.

Says Tuka, the wretched one's intellect has missed Narayana entirely.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A man with eyes runs from death in fear. He does not see that death runs right beside him. How has this confusion come, that he walks a road from which there is no return? Even when his worry over worldly life dies down, his strength too is fading. Tuka says: the wretched one's mind has missed Narayana altogether.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram catches the absurdity of a sighted man fleeing a death that is already running at his side. The bewilderment he names is that we keep walking the one-way road of worldly life as though we could turn back, never facing where it ends. Worse, the calm that finally comes is not wisdom but exhaustion: the worry only quiets because strength itself is draining away. The closing line lands the loss: for all this running, the wretched man's attention has missed the one thing that mattered, Narayana.

GATHA 2696 Social Criticism

Social criticism, pride blackens the face

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे कुश्चळ मनीं । विटंबनीं पडिलीं तीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Pride blackens one's face and forcibly brings darkness. One should seize the profit at hand and rub dirt in pride's mouth.

Shame has begun to chase from behind, threatening to ruin everything accomplished. Says Tuka, those with impurity in their minds have fallen into utter degradation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Pride blackens a man's face and forces darkness on him. Seize the true gain in your own hands; rub dirt in pride's mouth. Shame comes chasing from behind, ready to ruin all you have done. Tuka says: those with filth in their minds have fallen into utter disgrace.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram treats pride as a thing that ruins the very face it puffs up, dragging the proud into darkness by their own strength. Against it he sets a blunt instruction: grasp the real gain while it is in hand, and humiliate pride itself, rub dirt in its mouth, before it speaks for you. He warns that shame is already at the heels of the proud, waiting to undo whatever good they managed. Read inwardly, the verse is about catching one's own pride early, because a mind that nurses it ends in plain disgrace.

GATHA 2701 Worldly Life

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the guilty thief's mind, the mark of his crime always dwells. What can we do about such people? Let the rain of justice fall as it will.

The record of each person's deeds pricks and pains the one who bears it. Says Tuka, one's own habits are one's own fortune, and one's own fortune is one's own affliction.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the guilty thief's mind, the mark of his crime always lives. What can we do about such people? Let the rain of justice fall as it will. The record of a man's deeds pricks and pains the one who carries it. Tuka says: a man's own habits are his own fortune, and his own fortune is his own affliction.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram observes that wrongdoing does not need an outside judge first; the thief carries the mark of his crime inside his own mind. He refuses to take the punishing into his own hands and leaves it to the rain of justice, which falls in its own time. The heart of the verse is that each person's record presses on the one who bears it, no one else. The closing line closes the circle: your habits become your fortune, and that fortune becomes the very thing that afflicts you, so the remedy is to examine the habits, not the world.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Giving instruction to the witless is like pouring nectar that turns to poison. One should not even sniff near a cattle-pen of folly; the only gain there is contamination.

The lazy one's inner nature is deceitful, like a corpse that has no desires. Says Tuka, save me from such hands, O Lord. I confess I am too feeble for Your service, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Giving instruction to the witless is like pouring nectar that turns to poison. Do not even sniff near a pen of fools; the only thing you gain there is defilement. The lazy man's inner nature is crooked, like a corpse that wants nothing. Tuka says: save me from such hands, O Lord. I will not manage Your service; I am too feeble for it, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the waste of pouring good teaching into a witless mind, where even nectar curdles into poison. He warns against keeping company with fools at all, since the only thing one takes away is contamination, and he names the lazy man's desirelessness not as peace but as the deadness of a corpse. The prayer turns the warning into a plea: keep me out of such hands, Lord. The closing confession is humble rather than proud, admitting his own weakness for the work and so leaning entirely on God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Bring to fruition all that You have spoken. What other work do You have? If You will not grant us love, how shall the laws of right and wrong stand firm? We have spent our bodies in Your cause; now sow Your seed in truth.

When both sides join, the fruit is sweet for us both. One hand alone cannot make a clapping sound.

However mighty one may be, without the Master, nothing shines. Come into visible form, O Ananta; I shall hold fast to the power of that vision.

Then I shall be sustained among the saints as Your cherished one. What has been kept on account, what use is the leftover? Says Tuka, a settlement in ready cash is best.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Bring to fruition all that You have spoken; let it all come to completion. What other work do You have? If You will not give us love, how will right and wrong stand firm at all? We have spent our bodies in Your cause; now sow Your seed in truth. When both join, the fruit is sweet for both. One hand alone makes no clapping sound. However mighty a man is, without the Master he does not shine. Come into visible form, O Ananta; I will hold fast to the power of that vision. Then I will be sustained among the saints as Your cherished one. What has been kept on credit, what use is the leftover? Tuka says: a settlement in ready cash is best.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses God to finish what He has promised, arguing that without God's love the whole order of right and wrong would lose its footing. He puts their relation as a partnership, the devotee has spent his body, so let God now sow His seed, since one hand cannot clap alone and even the mighty are nothing without the Master.

The repeated demand is for a present, visible meeting, not a deferred one: come into form now, let me hold that vision. The closing image is mercantile and bold, what is owed on credit is no comfort; pay it in ready cash, give the experience now rather than later.

GATHA 2704 Social Criticism

Social criticism, food for the dead, none for the living

मराठी मूळ

2704. भुके नाहीं अन्न । मेल्यावरी पिंडदान ॥1॥
नैवेद्याचा आळ । वेच ठाकणीं सकळ ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जड । मज न राखावें दगड ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There is no food for the hungry while alive, yet after death there is the offering of rice-balls. The excuse of food-offerings to God merely serves the occasion's expenses.

Says Tuka, do not keep me captive like a heavy stone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There is no food for the hungry while he is alive, yet after he dies there is the offering of rice-balls. The fuss over food offered to God only covers the cost of the occasion. Tuka says: do not keep me captive like a heavy stone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strikes at a plain hypocrisy: the living go hungry and unfed, but once a man is dead the family lavishes rice-ball offerings on the corpse. He sees the elaborate ritual food as mostly about the expense and show of the event, not real charity or devotion. The point is that ceremony has displaced living mercy. His closing plea asks God not to let him sink into that dead, stone-like weight of empty observance, but to keep him alive and free.

GATHA 2705 Prayers

Prayer, the lowly one cared for

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am bereft of all fortune, yet even in this lowly state I have been cared for. Let me keep my head at the feet of the saints, hands joined in prayer.

If You call me a servant, then know I am a poor and weak one, O God. Says Tuka, I offer my very life and beg for Your compassion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am stripped of all good fortune, yet even in this lowly state I have been cared for. Let me keep my head at the saints' feet, hands joined in prayer. If You will call me Your servant, then know I am a poor and weak one, O God. Tuka says: I offer my very life and beg for Your mercy.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram begins from total poverty of fortune, and then names the surprise: even so, he has been looked after. His response is to stay low, head at the feet of the saints with folded hands, asking for nothing higher. He does not hide his weakness; if God is to call him a servant, let it be understood that the servant is feeble and poor. The whole abhanga is an act of surrender: he hands over his life itself and asks only for compassion in return.

Be strong and bold, O my mind. Says Tuka, through prostrations and devotion, the hunger of my soul has been satisfied.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The dawn of good fortune is just this: reaching the feet of the saints. From here may my head never rise, not until death itself comes. Be strong, be bold, O my mind. Tuka says: through prostrations and devotion, my soul's hunger is filled.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures good fortune by one thing alone: arriving at the feet of the saints, which he calls the dawn of all luck. He vows to keep his head bowed there for life, refusing to lift it until death takes him. The middle line turns inward to steady his own mind, telling it to be strong and bold in this lowliness rather than restless. The close reports the result: bowing and devotion have satisfied a hunger of the soul that nothing else could fill.

Longing, the God who only takes

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If there is no direct experience, then You have become a God who only takes and never gives. Wherever I look, mountains of bribes are demanded; if one is to receive, the mind must first be at peace.

First the hand is extended, and the name of generosity is used; but these are merely borrowed favors that must soon be repaid. Says Tuka, I shall render whatever service I can; there is no real power at Your feet anyway.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If there is no real experience, then You have become a God who only takes and never gives. Everywhere I look, mountains of bribes are demanded; before I can receive, my mind must first be at peace. First the hand is held out, and it is called generosity; but these are only borrowed favors that must soon be repaid. Tuka says: I will do whatever service I can. There is no real power at Your feet anyway.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from a dry stretch where the living experience of God has not come, and he names his complaint sharply: a God who never gives is just a taker. He sees the whole world running on demanded bribes, and he protests that he is told to fix his own mind first before any grace will arrive. Even the so-called generosity feels like a loan that will be called back. The closing line is the cry of frustrated longing pushed to its edge, half accusation and half surrender: I will keep serving as I can, but where is the power I came to these feet for?

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We were never vigilant at all times; the mind was trained only through worldly effort. Having said that much, I have placed my bundle at Your feet; virtues and faults alike have left me distressed.

I call out at the top of my voice into Your ears: do not cut me off now in the middle. Says Tuka, in waking, dreaming, and deep sleep, You, O Lord, are the witness of it all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We were never watchful all the time; our minds were trained only by worldly effort. Even so, I have laid my bundle at Your feet; my virtues and faults alike have left me distressed. I am shouting straight into Your ears: do not cut me off now in the middle. Tuka says: in waking, in dreaming, in deep sleep, You, O Lord, are the witness of it all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram admits the honest truth that he was never constantly vigilant; his mind was schooled by worldly business, not by steady watchfulness. Yet he has still set his whole load, his good and his bad, at God's feet, worn out by carrying it. The urgent plea is that, having come this far, he not be abandoned partway through. He grounds the appeal in God's total knowledge: through waking, dreaming, and deep sleep, the Lord has been the one unbroken witness, so there is no part of him God has not already seen.

Autobiography, the fear that was nothing

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By showing a fear that did not exist, my life was made wretched. When the truth was revealed, people saw the alarm had been for nothing.

I was caught between ahead and behind, chased until the pursuer was reached. Says Tuka, those who were close and familiar brought me face to face with the Lord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I was shown a fear that was not even real. It made my life wretched. When I came through it, people understood: the alarm had been for nothing. I was caught between what lay ahead and what lay behind. They chased me until the one who pursued me was reached at last. Tuka says: those who were close and dear to me brought me face to face with the Lord.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks back on a stretch of his life that felt like terror and turns out to have been groundless. A fear was held up before him, it crushed his spirit, and only on the far side did everyone see there had been nothing to dread. He describes being driven, hemmed in front and back, hunted without rest, until the pursuit itself delivered him to its goal. The point lands in the last line: the very people and pressures that closed in on him, those near and familiar, were the ones who set him before God. What looked like persecution was the road to the meeting.

GATHA 2710 Longing and Separation

Longing, holding God to his word

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Is this what passes for service and offering, that I should witness this suffering of hardship? Guard Your own pledges, O Lord. Why do You act as if this were a dark age? The surrendered one is cast into the hands of fate.

Is this the certainty I was promised? Says Tuka, I long for the meeting, yet Your feet in my chitta seem turned upside down.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Is this what You call service and offering, that I must watch this hard suffering? Guard Your own pledges, Lord. Why do You behave as if this were a dark and faithless age? The one who has surrendered is thrown into the hands of fate. Is this the certainty You promised me? Tuka says: I long for the meeting, yet Your feet in my heart seem turned upside down.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praying as a complaint, holding God accountable to His own reputation. He has given service and offering and surrendered himself, and in return he sees only hardship, so he asks whether this is the protection that was promised. He invokes God's brida, the vows and titles God has earned as the rescuer of those who take refuge, and asks why God is acting as though no such promise binds Him. The ache is sharpest at the end: the very feet he has held in his heart now feel reversed, turned away from him. This is not loss of faith but faith pressing its claim, refusing to let God off the hook.

GATHA 2711 Longing and Separation

Longing, accusing God of pretending

मराठी मूळ

कां हो आलें नेणों भागा । पांडुरंगा माझिया ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What has come upon my share, O my Panduranga? Your ways seem turned upside down; the practice of truth has disappeared. My own mind is the witness; whose distress was it in the first place? Says Tuka, You have the power; do You pretend not to know what You are doing?

IN PLAIN WORDS

What has fallen to my lot, O my Panduranga? Your ways have turned upside down; the practice of truth is gone. My own mind is the witness: whose distress was this in the first place? Tuka says: You have all the power. Do You pretend not to know what You are doing?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses the same complaint into a direct charge against God. He cannot recognize the just dealing he expected; truth itself seems overturned, and he asks what kind of portion has been handed to him. He calls his own mind as witness to remind God that the longing and the distress were never his invention; they were stirred by God in the first place. Then comes the accusation that gives the poem its edge: God is all-powerful, so this neglect cannot be helplessness; it can only be a feigned ignorance. The poem refuses to excuse God, insisting that One who can do anything is answerable for what He withholds.

GATHA 2712 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, reading the omens of abandonment

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By omens one can read profit and loss from the very start. The mind has grown fearful; what trust can remain now? Says Tuka, I have been released. At least this much has become clear.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By the omens you can read profit and loss from the very start. My mind has grown afraid. What trust is left now? Tuka says: I have been let go. At least this much has become clear.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from a moment when the signs around him all point one way. He says that, like reading omens, you can tell from the outset whether a thing will bring gain or loss, and what he reads has filled his mind with fear and drained his trust. The hard conclusion is that he has been released, abandoned, dropped from the hand he was counting on. Yet even this he takes as a kind of mercy: at least he now sees his situation plainly, with no illusion left to cling to. Clarity, however bleak, is named as the one good he has been given.

GATHA 2713 Prayers

Prayer, the weak soul asking for the Name

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I cannot punish this body with austerity; I cannot endure hunger and thirst. Then let me call upon You ceaselessly every day.

Let my sense of self remain undisturbed. Says Tuka, I wish only for a support to help me cross this ocean of worldly existence.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I cannot subdue this body with austerity. I cannot bear hunger and thirst. So let me call on You without stopping, every single day. Let my sense of self be left undisturbed. Tuka says: I want only one thing, a support to carry me across the ocean of worldly life.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram admits plainly that the hard road of self-mortification is not for him; he has no strength for fasting or punishing the body. In its place he asks for the one practice he can keep, calling on the Name ceaselessly, day after day. His request that his abhiman, his sense of self, be left undisturbed is not pride but honesty: he asks God to work with the ordinary self he actually is rather than demand its destruction first. The whole prayer reduces devotion to its simplest form, a single dependable support to ferry a weak soul across the sea of birth and death. Tukaram makes incapacity itself the ground of his appeal.

GATHA 2714 Faith and Trust

Faith, hold the latecomer equal

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Having heard the saints' glory from their own mouths, I came to this sacred place. Treat the first and last comers alike; do not change, O God, for the outsider.

My faith rests on the support of the Name; if that is severed, I have no other refuge. Says Tuka, let nothing second abide here. May the King of Pandhari hear this prayer.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I heard Your glory from the mouths of the saints, and so I came and reached this holy place. Treat the first and the last the same; do not change Your face for the outsider, God. My faith rests on the support of the Name; if that support is cut, I have no refuge left. Tuka says: let there be nothing second here. May the King of Pandhari hear this prayer.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram came to Pandhari on the strength of what the saints told him about Vitthal, and now he asks that the welcome match the promise. His plea is for fairness: that God treat the latecomer and the outsider exactly as He treats the long-established devotee, never wearing a colder face for the newcomer. Everything he has is staked on the Name; if that single support is severed he has no second refuge, so he begs that no second thing, no rival or division, be allowed to stand between them. The poem ends as a formal petition laid before the King of Pandhari, asking only for an undivided, evenhanded grace.

GATHA 2715 Prayers

Prayer, untie the knot now

मराठी मूळ

मोलाचें आयुष्य वेचतसे सेवे । नुगवतां गोवे खेद होतो ॥1॥
उगवूं आलेति तुह्मीं नारायणा । परिहार या सिणा निमिस्यांत ॥ध्रु.॥
लिगाडाचे मासी न्यायें जाली परी । उरली ते उरी नाहीं कांहीं ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My precious life is being spent in service, and when the knot is not resolved, sorrow arises. You have come to untie it, O Narayana; put an end to this suffering in the blink of an eye.

Through the long months of entanglement, things have come to pass in their own way; nothing more remains to be said.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My precious life is being spent in serving You, and when the knot will not come loose, sorrow rises in me. You have come to untie it, Narayana; end this weariness in the blink of an eye. Through long months I have been stuck like a fly in glue. Things have run their own course; nothing more remains.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures the cost of his devotion in the one currency that cannot be refilled, his lifespan, and grieves that the entanglement binding him still will not release. He turns to Narayana not as a distant judge but as the one who has come precisely to loosen the knot, and he asks for it done at once, in a single instant, because the weariness has gone on too long. The image of a fly caught in sticky glue names his helplessness exactly: the more it struggles the more it is held. He ends by handing the whole tangled matter over, saying it has already played out as it would and there is nothing left for him to add.

GATHA 2716 Renunciation

Renunciation, surrender sealed in the act

मराठी मूळ

ह्मणऊनि जालों क्षेत्रींचे संन्यासी । चित्त आशापाशीं आवरूनि ॥1॥
कदापि ही नव्हे सीमा उल्लंघन । केलें विसर्जन आव्हानीं च ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे कार्यकारणाचा हेवा । नाहीं जीव देवा समर्पिनला ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Therefore I became a renunciant right here in this sacred place, reining in my mind from the snares of desire. Never shall I cross the boundary; the invocation was concluded in the very act of beginning.

What was foreign has now become a distant second; my devotion has been made single-pointed and firm. Says Tuka, there is no anxiety about cause or effect; my life has been surrendered to God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

And so I became a renunciant here in this holy place, drawing my mind back from the snares of desire. I will never cross the boundary again; the offering was sealed in the very moment I made it. What was once foreign has now become a distant second; my devotion is made single and firm. Tuka says: there is no anxiety left over cause or effect. My life has been surrendered to God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a vow taken not by leaving the world but by becoming a renunciant right where he stands, at Pandhari, pulling his mind out of the grip of desire. He insists the surrender is irreversible: the moment he made the offering it was sealed, and he will never step back across that line. What used to pull at him from outside has been demoted to a distant second, while his bhakti has been gathered into a single, unwavering point. The release in the last lines is the freedom from worry about consequences, about cause and effect, because once a life is truly given to God the calculating self has nothing left to manage.

GATHA 2717 Worldly Life

Worldly life, the panic of the deathbed

मराठी मूळ

विभ्रंशिली बुद्धि देहांत जवळी । काळाची अकाळीं वायचाळा ॥1॥
पालटलें जैसें देंठ सोडी पान । पिकलें आपण तयापरी ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे गळ लागलिया मत्स्या । तळमळेचा तैसा लवलाहो ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The intellect falters as death draws near; at the wrong hour, idle chatter is all that remains. Like a ripe leaf that drops from its stem, one falls of one's own ripeness.

Without being struck, a feeble mind suffers; the swollen one is caught in his own trap. Says Tuka, the fish that has swallowed the hook thrashes in desperate urgency.

IN PLAIN WORDS

As death draws near the mind falls apart; at the wrong hour, only idle chatter is left. Like a ripe leaf that lets go of its stem, a person drops of his own ripeness. Even without being struck, a weak mind suffers; the swollen, arrogant one is caught in his own trap. Tuka says: like a fish that has swallowed the hook, he thrashes in desperate urgency.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks hard at the hour of death and the panic of a person who never prepared for it. When the end comes the intellect collapses, and all that is left is useless, frightened talk, far too late to do any good. He sets two images against each other: the one who is ripe falls gently from the stem like a fallen leaf, while the unready mind suffers without any blow landing on it, trapped by its own swollen self-importance. The final picture, a fish that has swallowed the hook and thrashes, is meant to be examined in oneself: the agony comes from having taken the bait of worldly attachment, and the time to spit it out is now, not at the end.

GATHA 2718 Prayers

Prayer, let no time be wasted

मराठी मूळ

न वजावा तो काळ वांयां । मुख्य दया हे देवा ॥1॥

मोकळें हे मन कष्ट। करी नष्ट दुर्जन ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कांहीं नेणें । न वजें येणेंपरी वांयां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Time should not be allowed to pass in vain; God's chief quality is mercy. Therefore, however it may be, let me remain at His feet.

An unfettered mind causes damage; the wicked corrupt it. Says Tuka, I know nothing else; let me not go to waste in this manner.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not let this time slip away in vain; mercy is Your chief quality, God. So, however it must be, let me stay at Your feet. A mind left loose runs to harm; the wicked corrupt it. Tuka says: I know nothing else. Do not let me go to waste like this.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays for the most basic protection: that his short span of time not be squandered, and he grounds the appeal in what he calls God's defining trait, mercy. Whatever else happens, he asks only to be kept at God's feet, because he knows what an unguarded mind does when left to itself. Left loose, it drifts into harm, and bad company finishes the corruption. He confesses he has no other resource and no other skill, so the prayer is plain to the point of bareness: keep me, or I am wasted. The strength of it is the admission of total dependence.

GATHA 2719 Faith and Trust

Faith, the wish-tree and the eye that knows

मराठी मूळ

कल्पतरुअंगीं इच्छलें तें फळ । अभागी दुर्बळ भावें सिद्धी ॥1॥
धन्य त्या जाती धन्य त्या जाती । नारायण चित्तीं सांठविला ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The wish-fulfilling tree bears whatever fruit is desired; even the unfortunate and the weak attain fulfillment through sincere faith. Blessed, truly blessed are those who have stored Narayana in their hearts.

As a seed sprouts according to the water given, each one's qualities bear fruit in their own way. Says Tuka, a diamond is recognized only by the jeweler; the donkey merely carries the load of sandalwood on its back.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The wish-fulfilling tree gives whatever fruit you desire; even the unlucky and the weak reach their goal through sincere faith. Blessed, truly blessed are those who have stored Narayana in their hearts. As a seed sprouts by the water it is given, each one's qualities bear fruit in their own way. Tuka says: only the jeweler knows the diamond; the donkey just carries the load of sandalwood on its back.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram celebrates the kalpataru, the wish-granting tree, as the picture of God's grace: it withholds nothing, so even the unfortunate and the feeble reach their goal, provided the faith is real. The condition is sincerity of heart, which is why he calls blessed those who have stored Narayana within. The seed-and-water image insists that what grows depends on what is sown and how it is tended; grace meets each person according to their own bhava. The closing proverb sharpens the point toward self-examination: a diamond is worth everything but only the jeweler can recognize it, while the donkey hauls precious sandalwood and feels only the weight. The treasure is offered to all; whether you taste its value depends on what you bring to it.

GATHA 2720 Social Criticism

Social criticism, instruction wasted on the fool

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A dunghill was there from the start, and the body is steeped in the filth of hell; the nature of such a one dwells on nothing but its own kind. How would a blind man recognize a gem? Without taste, things go to waste, pale and flavorless.

Does anyone suppose that poison can be transformed by mere treatment? It is best kept far from the mouth. Says Tuka, what use is instruction to a fool? Keeping company with a buffalo brings only hardship.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It was a dunghill from the start, and the body is soaked in the filth of hell; such a nature dwells on nothing but its own kind. How would a blind man recognize a gem? With no taste for it, the thing is wasted, pale and flavorless. Does anyone think poison can be made safe by mere treatment? Better to keep it far from the mouth. Tuka says: what use is teaching a fool? Keeping company with a buffalo brings only hardship.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram piles up blunt images to describe a mind so closed that good counsel cannot land in it. A nature steeped in low craving dwells only on its own kind, the way a dunghill breeds only filth, and to such a one the highest teaching is wasted as a gem is wasted on a blind man or fine flavor on a tongue that cannot taste. He warns against the fantasy that such poison can be reformed by gentle handling; the prudent course is distance, keeping it away from the mouth. The point is not contempt for a particular person but a hard look at a pattern: where there is no openness, no taste for the truth, instruction only wears out the teacher, as plowing with a buffalo only exhausts the plowman. The summons is to examine whether one's own heart has any taste for the gem being offered.

GATHA 2721 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the leader sets the tone

मराठी मूळ

जया शिरीं कारभार । बुद्धि सार तयाची ॥1॥

आपणीयां पाक करी । तो इतरीं सेविजे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे शूर राखे । गाढ़ए वाखेसांगातें॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The one upon whose head rests responsibility, his wisdom is what counts. As the leader acts, so follow the people; the qualities of one shape the many.

One who cooks the meal provides for all who partake of it. Says Tuka, a hero protects even the cowardly who march alongside him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The one with responsibility on his head, his wisdom is what counts. As the leader acts, so the people act. The quality of one shapes the many. One cooks the meal, and many eat from it. Tuka says: a brave man protects even the cowards who march beside him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is saying that a whole group takes its character from whoever leads it. The person who carries the burden of decision sets the pattern, and the many fall in line behind that one. He gives plain images: one cook feeds the crowd, one brave man shields even the timid alongside him. The point is that leadership is not just a privilege but a weight, since the good or harm of many flows from the wisdom of one.

GATHA 2722 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, walk the path together

मराठी मूळ

एक एका साहए करूं । अवघें धरूं सुपंथ ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let us help one another and hold together to the good path. Who knows what lies ahead if we keep something in reserve? Let us all become blessed now, by reminding one another to remember the Lord.

Says Tuka, the true treasure is the love of His feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let us help one another and hold to the good path. Who knows what waits ahead if we keep something back? Let us all be blessed now, by reminding each other to remember the Lord. Tuka says: the whole treasure is the love of His feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is calling the community to travel the spiritual road as one, helping each other and remembering God together. He warns against holding something in reserve, hedging your devotion, because no one knows what the future holds; the time to be wholehearted is now. The work he names is simple and mutual: reminding one another to remember the Lord. And he locates the only wealth worth gathering in love for God's feet, not in anything kept back for later.

GATHA 2723 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the world is barren

मराठी मूळ

फळकट तो संसार । येथें सार भगवंत ॥1॥

अवघें निरसूनि काम । घ्यावें नाम विठोबाचें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे देवाविण । केला सीण तो मिथ्या ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This worldly life is barren; the essence here is the Lord alone. This is what I tell my mind and the people alongside.

Set aside all other concerns and take the name of Vithoba. Says Tuka, any effort made without God is utterly in vain.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This worldly life is hollow; the one real thing here is God. This is what I keep telling my mind, and the people with me. Set aside every other concern and take the name of Vithoba. Tuka says: any effort made without God is false.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram declares ordinary worldly life empty and names the one thing in it that has substance: God. He is rousing both his own mind and the people around him to the same waking. The instruction is direct: drop all the other business and take the name of Vithoba. The hard edge of the claim is the close, that any labor undertaken without God is not just less valuable but a lie, effort spent on nothing.

GATHA 2724 The Power of the Name

The Name, nectar that never sates

मराठी मूळ

सुधारसें ओलावली । रसना धाली न धाय ॥1॥
कळों नये जाली धणी । नारायणीं पूर्णता ॥ध्रु.॥
आवडे तें तें च यासी । ब्रह्मरसीं निरसें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे बहुतां परी । करूनि करीं सेवन ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Drenched in divine nectar, the tongue is satisfied yet never sated. One cannot tell whether the hunger has been quenched; in Narayana, fullness is complete.

Whatever this tongue loves, it seeks again and again, dissolving into the essence of Brahman. Says Tuka, prepare it in many ways and partake of it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wet with the nectar, the tongue is filled yet never full. You cannot tell if the hunger is ever met; in Narayana the fullness is complete. Whatever the tongue loves, it seeks again and again, dissolving into the taste of Brahman. Tuka says: prepare it in many ways and keep tasting it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the taste of God's name as a sweetness that satisfies and yet leaves you wanting more, a hunger that is content and unquenchable at once. He calls this paradox fullness in Narayana: you are complete and still drawn back. The tongue keeps returning to what it loves and melts into the very taste of Brahman. His counsel is to keep at it, to make the name in many forms, chanting, singing, repeating, and go on savoring it, since this is the one appetite that nourishes by never ending.

GATHA 2725 Renunciation

Discernment, dispassion is not hatred

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Turning away from the wicked is not hatred; Brahman is beyond all such disturbance. If you call it renunciation, know that it has been upheld since the beginning; this is the very nature of dispassion.

Cooked and raw are both called grain, but their uses are distinguished by the partaking. Says Tuka, Narayana dwells as witness in all beings: the virtuous are honored, and the sinful are corrected.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Turning away from the wicked is not spite; Brahman is beyond all such disturbance. If you call this renunciation, know it is old as the beginning; this is the very nature of dispassion. Cooked grain and raw grain are both called grain, yet their use is told apart by the eating. Tuka says: Narayana is the witness in all beings; the bad in them is corrected, the good is honored.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers a charge: that withdrawing from evil people is itself a kind of malice. He denies it. Drawing back is dispassion, an ancient and natural thing, and Brahman, in which he rests, is untouched by such ruffling of feeling. His image is sharp: raw and cooked are both grain, but you sort them by how they serve you, so the discerning soul distinguishes what to take in from what to refuse. He grounds it in God as the witness present in every being, who corrects the fault and honors the virtue. The turning away is from the pattern of wickedness, not from contempt for the person, and the same God indwells all.

True worship, the silence of the mind

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे गेला फिटोनियां भेव । मग होतो देव मनाचा चि ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One should know one's own welfare for oneself: that which brings the mind to contentment. Maya is scattered in many colors; it is well that her tricks are brought to a halt.

True worship is the silence of the inner chitta; one's devotion should be surrendered to the Lord of the Universe. Says Tuka, once fear has been dissolved, God becomes the very nature of one's own mind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Know your own good for yourself: the thing that brings the mind to peace. Maya is scattered in many colors; it is good when her tricks are stopped. True worship is the silence within the heart; offer your whole feeling to the Lord of all. Tuka says: once fear has melted away, God becomes the very nature of the mind.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells each person to take responsibility for their own welfare, defined as whatever settles the mind into peace. Maya, illusion, spreads itself out in countless attractive forms, and it is a mercy when her play is brought to a halt. He then redefines worship: not outward show but inward stillness, the heart fallen silent and its whole devotion surrendered to the Lord of the universe. The promised end is that once fear dissolves, God is no longer something sought outside; God becomes the very texture of the quieted mind.

GATHA 2727 Prayers

Prayer, helpless cry to Hari

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे धांव घेतलीसे सोई । आतां पुढें येई लवकरी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Though present, the ego stands detached, and one struggles under its burden for nothing. Rush in and free me quickly; I have grown powerless, O Hari.

In confusion, I appear as one who is bound, carrying my own weight upon myself. Says Tuka, I have set out in Your direction; now come to me swiftly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Standing here, do not keep apart in pride; for nothing I groan and groan under this weight. Run, set me free, quickly, fast; I have become powerless, O Hari. In my confusion I look like one who is bound, carrying my own weight upon myself. Tuka says: I have set out toward You; now come to me soon.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a cry for rescue. Tukaram confesses that the ego makes him stand aloof and groan pointlessly under a burden he himself heaps on. He begs Hari to rush in and free him, because his own strength is gone. He sees clearly that his bondage is self-made: deluded, he appears tied, loading his own weight onto himself. The prayer ends with movement from both sides, he has set out toward God, and he pleads for God to close the distance and come quickly.

GATHA 2728 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the deluded who feed their captor

मराठी मूळ

आपुल्याचा भोत चाटी । मारी करंटीं पारिख्या॥1॥

गळ गिळी आविसें मासा । प्राण आशा घेतला ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे बोकडमोहो । धरी पहा हो खाटिक ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A person's own spirit licks the butter while beating the stranger. The world is thus deluded, O God, nourishing a false envy.

The fish eagerly swallows the hook, and its life is taken by greed. Says Tuka, see how the goat nuzzles the very butcher who holds it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A person licks the butter that is his own undoing and beats the stranger instead. The world is fooled like this, O God, feeding a false envy. The fish swallows the hook with the bait, and greed takes its life. Tuka says: look, the goat nuzzles the very butcher who holds it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lines up images of creatures destroyed by what they crave. People lap up what ruins them while striking out at the harmless, and the whole world is deluded this way, fattening a false jealousy. The fish gulps the baited hook and dies of its own greed; the goat fondly nuzzles the butcher whose hand is already on it. He is naming the pattern of appetite that draws us toward our own death while we mistake it for pleasure, and asking us to see the trap we walk into willingly.

GATHA 2729 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the learned fool

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे ग्यानगड । सुखें देवा पावेना नाड ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sense pleasure clings until the moment of death; the unfortunate one knows no release. He has rolled up the scriptures into a bundle and stuffed a stone into his mouth.

He has absolutely no notion of liberation. What can one say to a donkey? Says Tuka, such a blockhead cannot reach God even through the fortress of knowledge.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sense pleasure clings to him right up to death; the wretched man knows no release. He has rolled up the scriptures into a bundle and stuffed a stone into his mouth. He has no notion of liberation at all. What can you say to a donkey? Tuka says: such a blockhead cannot reach God even from the fortress of knowledge.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks the figure who is full of learning yet enslaved to the senses to his dying day. The man has reduced the scriptures to a packed-up bundle and silenced their truth as if he had jammed a stone in his own mouth; of real liberation he has no clue. The bitter line, what can you say to a donkey, points at willful stupidity, not at any one person to be despised. The warning lands on us: knowledge piled up as a fortress is worthless if it never breaks the grip of craving, and even from there one cannot reach God.

GATHA 2730 Confession and Sin

Confession, I alone am at fault

मराठी मूळ

मी च विखळ मी च विखळ । येर सकळ बहु बरें॥1॥
पाहिजे हें क्षमा केलें । येणें बोलें विनवणी ॥ध्रु.॥
मी च माझें मी च माझें । जालें ओझें अन्याय ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I alone am impure, I alone am impure; everything else is perfectly fine. I ask for forgiveness; this is my humble plea.

My faults are mine and mine alone; I bear the burden of my own wrongs. Says Tuka, I was unworthy from the start, and I have become less than human.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I alone am corrupt, I alone am corrupt; everyone else is perfectly fine. Please let this be forgiven; with these words I make my plea. Mine and mine only, the faults are mine; I carry the burden of my own wrongs. Tuka says: I failed from the very start; Tuka has become less than human.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a confession that takes the whole blame onto itself. Tukaram insists that he alone is impure and everyone else is good, a refusal to point the finger outward. He asks plainly for forgiveness and owns his faults as entirely his own, a weight he alone bears. The closing self-judgment is severe: he says he was unworthy from the beginning and has sunk below even the human. The posture is not despair for its own sake but the radical honesty of one who lays himself open before God and asks mercy.

GATHA 2731 Prayers

Prayer, only mercy ends the cycle

मराठी मूळ

येणें जाणें तरी । राहे देव कृपा करी ॥1॥

भय निवारिता कोण वेगळा अनंता ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे वारे भोग । वारी तरी पांडुरंग ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If God shows mercy, the cycle of coming and going can cease. But I have no such merit when I search my own store.

Who else but You, O Ananta, can remove this fear? Says Tuka, if these karmic consequences are to end, only Panduranga can bring that about.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If God shows mercy, the coming and going can stop. But I have no such merit; when I look in my own purse there is nothing. Who but You, O Ananta, can take away this fear? Tuka says: if these consequences are to end, only Panduranga can end them.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram confronts the cycle of birth and death and admits he has nothing in his own account that could earn release. The only thing that can halt the coming and going is God's grace, not his own merit, which he finds empty when he searches it. He asks who besides the Infinite, Ananta, could possibly remove his fear, and the question answers itself. The whole burden of fruits and consequences, he concludes, can be lifted by Panduranga alone; his rescue rests entirely on God, not on himself.

The saints, gratitude for the path shown

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे तुह्मी बहु कृपावंत । आपुलें उचित केलें संतीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The duty of the good is to speak of what is beneficial, according to whatever understanding they possess. But we exist entirely in the hands of one Master; He moves the heart as He wills.

The merit of one who shows the path is beyond measure; his acts of kindness are innumerable. Says Tuka, you are truly compassionate, O saints; you have done what was right and fitting.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The good ones must speak of what helps, according to the understanding they have. But we are in the hands of one Master; He makes the heart dance as He pleases. The one who shows the way has merit beyond measure; his kindnesses are countless. Tuka says: you are full of compassion, O saints; you have done what was fitting and right.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram honors the saints who point others toward their true good, speaking from whatever light they are given. Yet he keeps the credit where it belongs: everyone, including the guide, rests in the hands of the one Master, who moves each heart as He wills. Even so, the one who shows the path earns merit past counting, his acts of help beyond number. The poem closes in gratitude, blessing the saints as deeply compassionate beings who have done exactly what was right and fitting toward him.

GATHA 2733 Worldly Metaphors

Keeping the kirtan, fretful affection

मराठी मूळ

लावूनियां पुष्टी पोरें । आणि करकर कथेमाजी ॥1॥
पडा पायां करा विनंती । दवडा हातीं धरोनियां ॥ध्रु.॥
कुर्वाळूनि बैसे मोहें । प्रेम कां हे नासीतसे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे वाटे चित्त । करा फजित ह्मणऊनि ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Bring the children, seat them, and if they make noise during the story, fall at their feet, entreat them, and lead them gently away by the hand. A parent who fondles the child with affection should not destroy the atmosphere of love.

Says Tuka, my chitta wants to cause a scene, for it feels disgraced.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Bring the children in, seat them down. And they fidget and chatter all through the story. So fall at their feet, beg them, take them by the hand, and lead them away. If you fondle a child out of love, do not then go and spoil the love. Tuka says: my mind wants to make a scene over this, to shame them and put them right.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram catches a small disturbance during the telling of God's story: children brought along grow restless and break the atmosphere. He counsels patience and even humility, that you should entreat them and lead them out gently rather than scold. The point is that affection cannot be switched off when it is inconvenient; the same tenderness that fondled the child must govern how you correct it. Then he turns the test inward, confessing that his own mind itches to make a public scene and shame the disrupters. He names that impulse honestly, so the warning lands on his own heart, not just on the noisy children.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

May the merit of the saints now stand forth for this purpose. Set out on the road to Pandhari, and Vitthal the friend will meet you.

May these resolves bear fruit, out of the concern of the many. Says Tuka, O Purushottama, forgive my offenses. He heard my plea and fulfilled the desires of my heart.

He increased our love, O God, by accepting our service. As I made my supplication, so was my hunger satisfied.

Says Tuka, the body was baked and sealed like a pot, finished to perfection.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let the merit of the saints stand up for this now. Set out on the road to Pandhari, and Vitthal the friend will meet you. Let these resolves bear fruit, out of the love of the many. Tuka says: forgive my offenses, O Purushottama. He heard my plea. He fulfilled the longings of my heart. He made our love grow, O God, by taking up our service. As I begged, so my hunger was filled. Tuka says: this body is baked and sealed like a pot, finished, given over to that taste.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays that the accumulated grace of the saints come to stand behind him, then points to the simple road: go toward Pandhari and the friend Vitthal will meet you on it. He folds in the longing of many devotees and asks Purushottama to forgive his faults. The second half is pure thanksgiving, that the prayer was heard and the heart's desires fulfilled, and that God deepened the love by accepting the service offered. He ends with the image of his body baked hard like a finished clay pot, completely set and given over to that taste of God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Praise of the saints should be offered as the occasion of meeting them arises. One's thoughts should always dwell upon the Master alone; the mind should not wander or break its steady flow.

Servitude means being of one single mind; no sense of separateness should survive within. Says Tuka, whoever is qualified for the essential seed should sow it at the appointed time.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Praise the saints when the chance to meet them comes; do it then, as the occasion arises. Let your resolve always rest on the Master alone; do not let the mind scatter, keep it unbroken. To be his servant is to be of one single mind; no sense of being separate should be left alive. Tuka says: whoever is fit for the true seed should sow it at the right moment.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram gives plain instruction on how to live toward God and the saints. Praise of the saints is to be offered freshly when you actually meet them, but the inward resolve must never leave the Master for a moment. He defines servitude sharply: it is not occasional duty but a mind made single, with every trace of separateness between the self and God allowed to die. The closing image is agricultural, that the one ready for this essential seed should sow it at the proper time, meaning the qualified seeker must act when the moment is given and not let it pass.

GATHA 2736 Faith and Trust

Faith, the verdict already passed

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे मज नाहीं जी भरवसा । तोवरि सहसा निवाडु तो ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The intimacy of the bed is known to the fire; closing one's eyes leads to a fall. Whether one survives or burns in the fire, the verdict was passed long ago.

There is no second refuge here born of sudden fright; the bold warrior's burden is his own weaponry. Says Tuka, until I have confidence, the verdict stands as it is.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What the bed hides, the fire knows; close your eyes and you fall. Whether I stand or burn in the fire, the verdict was already passed. There is no second refuge here, made up out of sudden fear; the bold one's burden is his own weapon. Tuka says: until I have real trust, the verdict still stands against me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the test of fire as an image of truth that cannot be fooled: what intimacy keeps secret, the fire exposes, and shutting your eyes only brings the fall. Whatever happens to him, survival or being consumed, the outcome was settled long before; there is no panic-made backup refuge to run to. He says the courageous one carries his own weapon, his own resolve, as his only burden. The honest sting at the end is self-directed, that as long as his trust in God is not yet whole, the verdict still hangs over him; the fault lies in his half-faith, not in God.

GATHA 2737 The Nature of God

Abundance, the inexhaustible store

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The storehouse does not run out; even with endless spending, it remains full. The narrator's belly is satisfied, and yet abundance remains for those who come next.

Each one draws just what he needs for his own benefit. Says Tuka, for God, whatever effort is made in the future will continue to prosper.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The storehouse never runs out; spend it without end and it stays full. The one who measures it fills his own belly, and still there is plenty left for those who come after. Each takes only as much as he needs for his own good. Tuka says: with God, whatever effort you put in for the days ahead keeps on growing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram praises the inexhaustible treasury of God, or of the Name and grace, which spending cannot empty. The image is of a store that feeds the one ladling it out and still overflows for everyone who comes next; nobody draws it down. Each person receives exactly what their own welfare requires. The closing line turns it into encouragement, that effort spent toward God is never wasted but compounds, so what you invest in the spiritual life keeps increasing into the future.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I undertook this immeasurable enterprise with the ambition to become wealthy all at once. I became a servant of Hari with the discipline of a warrior, and the secrets of the predecessors became known to me.

This is something entirely new, separate from the ways of the world; that is why I staked my very life. Says Tuka, having entered this pursuit, even the Master has become my debtor in these active days.

IN PLAIN WORDS

So I set out, greedy, for an endless trade; I wanted to be rich all at once. I became a servant of Hari with a warrior's discipline, and the secrets of those before me became known to me. This is something new, set apart from the ways of the world; that is why I staked my very life on it. Tuka says: once I entered this work, day by day even the Master has become my debtor.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells his own story in the language of a merchant and a soldier. He confesses a holy greed, that he wanted the whole fortune at once, and so he took up the service of Hari with a warrior's fixed discipline, until the inner secrets of the saints who went before him opened to him. He insists this path stands wholly apart from worldly ways, which is exactly why it demanded that he stake his life on it. The startling end is the devotee's boldness: having given everything, he claims that God himself has become indebted to him, bound by the love and surrender Tuka has poured out.

GATHA 2739 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, none generous but Hari

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who else, O Hari, would remove the weariness of a poor soul who comes for refuge? In all the three worlds, who but You, O Lord, bears such a stamp of generosity? Who else washes away sin and relieves the fever of repeated births? Says Tuka, who else rushes forth at the speed of thought?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who else, O Hari, takes away the weariness of a poor one who comes for shelter? Without you, O Lord of the world, who in all three worlds bears the mark of such generosity? Who else turns away sin, who heals the fever of birth after birth? Tuka says: who else comes running at the speed of the mind?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays by piling up questions that all have one answer: only Hari. He asks who else lifts the exhaustion of the helpless soul that takes refuge, who else in all three worlds carries that stamp of generosity, who else washes off sin and cures the recurring fever of being born again and again. Each question quietly rules out every other refuge. The last line gives the warm assurance behind the praise, that God alone comes running to the devotee as fast as a thought, needing no distance or delay.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

These wicked ones do not understand the meaning of the scriptures; they have become utterly unrestrained in sensual pursuits. Claiming there is no distinction, they do whatever they please, roaming freely with the mind.

Says Tuka, they call poison by the name of nectar; the vile one has no fear of sin or merit. One who places faith in the Master gains sovereignty over all; he becomes the enjoyer of everything that is the Master's own.

Says Tuka, purify the mind, and Gopala will come and dwell there.

IN PLAIN WORDS

These wicked ones do not know what the scriptures mean; they have run wild in the pleasures of the senses. Saying there is no difference between things, they do whatever they like, roaming loose with the mind. Tuka says: they call poison by the name of nectar; the vile one has no fear of sin or merit. The one who trusts and gives the Master full power gains everything; he comes to enjoy all that is the Master's own. Tuka says: make the mind clean, and Gopala comes and stays there.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks a misuse of high teaching: people who twist the scripture's word that all is one into a license to do as they please. They are unrestrained in sense-pleasure, claim there is no distinction, and so feel free to act however the mind wanders, calling poison nectar and losing all fear of right and wrong. The criticism is aimed at the self-deceiving pattern, the way lofty words get bent to excuse appetite, not at any single person. Against this he sets the true way, that one who hands real authority over to God gains everything that is God's, and that a mind made clean is the room where Gopala will come and live.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My caste is low, my intellect is low, my deeds are low. Abandoning all shame, I have come to Your shelter.

Come, O my mother and father, O King of Pandhari. Without You, my body is exhausted and my strength has wasted away.

You are rightly called the Lord of the meek, the brother of the lowly. Your pledge as the savior of the fallen resounds everywhere.

Says Tuka, standing upon the brick, hands upon the hips; this alone is our meditation, day and night.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My caste is low, my mind is low, my deeds are low. Throwing off all shame, I have come to your shelter. Come, O mother and father, O King of Pandhari. Without you my body is worn out, my strength is gone. You are rightly called Lord of the meek, brother of the lowly; your title as the one who saves the fallen rings out everywhere. Brick upon brick he stands, hands upon his hips. Tuka says: this alone is our meditation, without end.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips himself of every claim, naming his low birth, low understanding, and low deeds, and lays aside even shame to throw himself on God's mercy. He calls Vitthal mother and father and King of Pandhari, and tells him plainly that life is unbearable without him. Then he turns the Lord's own reputation into his plea, that God is famed as the protector of the meek and the savior of the fallen, so a fallen one like Tuka is precisely his rightful business. The poem rests at last on the image that is enough for him: Vitthal standing on the brick with hands on his hips, an image he holds as his ceaseless meditation.

Joy, bathing in the saints' dust

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The Ganga has come flowing over us in the beautiful footsteps of the saints. I shall bathe where the dust of their feet rises; all sacred waters and holy seasons gather there.

Sin has fled and been burned away; the sorrow of worldly existence has departed. Says Tuka, I am blessed; I have bathed in the seven oceans.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The Ganga has come over us in the lovely footsteps of the saints. There I will bathe, where the dust of their feet flies up; there all the holy waters gather, all the sacred seasons. Sin has fled and burned away; the sorrow of worldly life has gone far off. Tuka says: I am blessed; I have bathed in the seven seas.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram treats the arrival of the saints as a pilgrimage coming to him. Where their feet step, he says the Ganga itself flows, and the dust raised by their walking is the holy water he will bathe in; every sacred river and auspicious day is present there. The fruit of that bath is immediate, that sin is burned off and the grief of worldly existence is driven far away. He ends in plain gladness, counting himself blessed as one who has bathed in all seven oceans, simply by being where the saints have walked.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For the belly's sake you labor the whole day through, yet when it comes to saying Rama, Rama, your jaw locks tight. Why can you never bring Hari's name to your tongue? What does it cost you to say Rama, Rama? For the greed of wealth, ten directions cannot satisfy you, yet when it is time for kirtan, your legs turn to clay.

Says Tuka, what can be done for such a jiva? One who does not say Rama, Rama, his very parents are as witless as donkeys. Take what you need, each in your own way.

Do not hold back any reserve. When the tide recedes, it covers your face with sand.

The harbor of Dwaraka receives the merchandise; the shipment arrived for Pundalik. It was sold to the One alone, yet Sanakadika and others found it too.

Blessed, blessed is this earth where the garland of names has appeared. Those humble ones who take it become greater than all.

Measure it out with your own hands; no one can stop you. Make room in the chitta and take what benefits you.

Says Tuka, the giving does not diminish; it remains as full as ever. Only by not taking does it go to waste.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All day you toil and scrape for the belly's sake, but when it comes to saying Rama, Rama, your jaw locks shut. Why does Hari's name never come to your tongue? What does it cost your father to say Rama, Rama? In your greed for money the ten directions are not enough for you, but when it is time for kirtan your body turns to clay. Tuka says: what can be done for such a soul? Whoever will not say Rama, Rama, his parents are as foolish as donkeys. Take it, each in your own way; keep nothing back in reserve. When the tide pulls back, sand fills your mouth. The harbor of Dwaraka carries the goods; the cargo came for Pundalik. It was sold to the One alone, yet Sanaka and the others found it too. Blessed, blessed is this earth where the garland of names has appeared. The poor who take it become forever the greatest. Measure it out with your own hand; no one stops you. Make room in the mind and take what is good for you. The giving does not lessen it; it stays as full as before. Tuka says: it is lost only by your not taking it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram scolds the listener for the lopsided effort of life: tireless labor and endless greed for the belly and for money, yet the jaw locks and the body turns to clay the moment the free, costless Name is asked for. The sharp lines about the witless soul and the donkey-parents are pointed at the self-defeating habit of refusing what costs nothing and saves everything, not at contempt for any individual. He urges everyone to take the Name freely, each in their own measure, holding nothing back, warning that delay leaves only sand in the mouth when the tide of life withdraws. The treasury images follow: the Name is cargo landed at Pandhari, sold to the one devoted heart yet still found by the ancient sages, and a garland freely available to even the poorest, who become the greatest by taking it. The closing assurance is that this store never shrinks with giving; the only way to lose it is to refuse to reach out your hand.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the rhythm is lost, one sits rubbing one's eyes. In the same way, awaken your mind to your own welfare.

The mind is caught up wherever its treasure is hoarded. Says Tuka, for the sake of the perishable, why do you torment yourself so?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the beat is lost, you sit rubbing your eyes. In the same way, wake your mind up to your own good. Wherever your treasure is buried, there your mind stays caught. Tuka says: for the sake of what perishes, why do you wear yourself out?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram opens with the image of a musician who loses the rhythm and sits dazed, fumbling, to picture a mind asleep to its own welfare; he tells you to wake it. He notes the simple law of the heart, that the mind clings wherever it has stored its treasure, so it follows whatever you value. The closing question is the whole point, that you exhaust yourself laboring and fretting for things that will perish, when the same attention turned toward the imperishable would be your real good. The exhortation is to relocate the treasure, and the mind, to God.

GATHA 2745 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, no lasting bond

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे एका । हरीविण नाहीं सखा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

After guarding it carefully, of what use was that wealth? You know this well enough, yet you pretend not to know. Wife, son, brother: you have no lasting bond with any of them.

Says Tuka, apart from Hari alone, there is no true friend.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You guarded your wealth so carefully. In the end, what use was it to anyone? You know this. You know it well. So why do you keep acting as if you do not know? Wife, son, brother: you have no lasting bond with any of them. Tuka says: apart from Hari alone, there is no true friend.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is shaking awake someone who already knows better. He names the hoarded wealth and the closest family ties, the things a person leans on most, and shows that none of them holds: the money serves no one in the end, and the bonds of wife, son, and brother do not last past death. The sting is in the repeated 'you know this': the failure is not ignorance but pretending not to know what is plainly true. He lands it on the one bond that does last, telling you that Hari alone is the friend who does not fall away.

GATHA 2746 Longing and Separation

Longing, a lover's quarrel with God

मराठी मूळ

आह्मीं देतों हाका । कां रे जालासी तूं मुका ॥1॥
न बोलसी नारायणा । कळलासी क्रियाहीना ॥ध्रु.॥
आधीं करूं चौघाचार। मग सांडूं भीडभार ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे सेवटीं । तुह्मां आह्मां घालूं तुटी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am calling out to You. Why have You gone silent? You do not speak, O Narayana; I have found You to be one who does nothing.

First let us observe formal courtesies, and then let us drop all pretense of politeness. Says Tuka, in the end, let us settle the matter between us once and for all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I keep calling out to you. Why have you gone silent? Why have you become mute? You will not speak, Narayana. I have found you out: you are one who does nothing. First let us keep the polite formalities. Then let us drop all of that pretense. Tuka says: in the end, let us settle this matter between us once and for all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks to God the way a wronged friend speaks, blunt and aching. He has been calling out and getting only silence, so he accuses Narayana to his face of being one who acts not, who leaves him unanswered. The poem stages the quarrel in stages: a brief show of courtesy first, then he means to drop the politeness and have it out plainly. The 'settling once and for all' is not a threat to leave but the demand of a love that refuses to be ignored: he wants the relationship made real, not kept at a polite distance.

GATHA 2747 Longing and Separation

Longing, taking God to the saints

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे तूं निर्लज्ज । आह्मां रोकडी गरज ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This is not a matter of courtesy; let people think of it as they will. The more You try to maintain appearances, the more You make me weep.

Let us go before the saints; they will settle this plainly and at once. Says Tuka, You are shameless, and I have an urgent, pressing need.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is not about being polite. Let people think whatever they want. The more you try to keep up appearances, the more you make me weep. Come, let us go before the saints. They will settle this plainly, right now. Tuka says: you are shameless, and my need is real and pressing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses the quarrel further and names where it should be judged. He refuses to let the matter be smoothed over by courtesy or by what onlookers will say; God's keeping up appearances only deepens his weeping. So he proposes a court: take the dispute before the saints, who will rule on it plainly and at once. His closing charge, that God is shameless while his own need is urgent, is the cry of someone who will not let love be deferred; he wants the saints to hold God to account.

Mythology, blaming Maya the temptress

मराठी मूळ

नव्हतें आळवितें कोणी । इनें केला जगऋणी ॥2॥
ज्याचे त्यासी नेदी देऊं । तुका ह्मणे धांवे खाऊं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He was a very fine person, but this woman has ruined him. She has learned many tricks and masquerades; truth and falsehood are at her command.

No one was inviting her, yet she has made Him a debtor to the whole world. Says Tuka, she will not let anyone receive what is rightfully theirs; she rushes to consume it first.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He was a very fine person. But this woman has ruined him. She has learned many tricks and disguises. Truth and falsehood are hers to command, whenever she likes. No one invited her in. Yet she has made him a debtor to the whole world. She will not let anyone receive what is rightfully theirs. Tuka says: she rushes in to devour it first.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram personifies Maya, the world's deluding power, as a scheming woman who has spoiled one who was good. The point is not contempt for any actual person but a sharp picture of how delusion operates: it masters tricks and disguises, bends truth and falsehood at will, and arrives uninvited. It tangles even the divine in worldly debt and snatches away what should rightly reach a soul, consuming it first. The poem warns that this power does not wait to be welcomed; it seizes, so the seeker must see through its disguises rather than be charmed by them.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What should be done now? Things have been said that should not be spoken. The knot between the two cannot be tied in solitude.

So long as our purpose is served, let us set aside all modesty and shame. Says Tuka, O God, let us first untangle this confusion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What should be done now? Words have been said that should not have been said. The knot between the two of us cannot be tied in private, alone. So long as our purpose is served, let us set aside all modesty and shame. Tuka says: O God, first let us untangle this confusion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram stands in the awkward aftermath of strong words spoken to God and asks what to do next. He admits things were said that should not have been, yet insists the bond between them cannot be repaired in secret; it has to be worked out openly. He is willing to drop his own pride and embarrassment if that is what it takes to reach the goal. The prayer is to clear away the snarl first, to untangle the confusion between soul and God before anything else can move forward.

GATHA 2750 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the pampered child's plea

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We have been bold and impudent, for we are small and pampered children. Words that should not have been spoken have come forth; You must bear it, O God.

Among all the others, one is the fool, and everyone plays with him for amusement. Says Tuka, O my mother and father, do not be angry with me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have been bold, talking back too freely. We are small, pampered children. Words that should not have been spoken have come out. You must bear it, God. Among everyone, there is one fool. That is the one they all play with for fun. Tuka says: my mother, my father, do not be angry with me.

WHAT IT MEANS

After speaking too freely to God, Tukaram pleads not as an equal but as a small child before a parent. He owns the overstepping, the bold talk that came out as it should not have, and asks God simply to bear it because that is what a parent does. He casts himself as the one fool everyone teases, the one taken least seriously, which is exactly why he can be forgiven. Calling God his mother and father, he asks only that the affection not turn to anger; the closeness that let him be impudent is the same closeness he trusts to absorb it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He taught me what to say and created this wonderful spectacle. My father Vitthal has delighted Himself through me.

He placed the toy of divine love in my hands, giving it to me with tender care. Says Tuka, crying out in longing, I look for the lord of Rukmini.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He taught me the words to say. He made this wonderful, surprising show. My father Vitthal has delighted himself through me. He put the toy of love in my hands and gave it to me with care. Tuka cries out, longing, looking for the lord of Rukmini.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram refuses to take credit for his own songs and gives it all back to God. He says Vitthal taught him what to say and made the whole spectacle, so that the poet is the instrument and God is the one enjoying the play through him. The image of the toy of love placed in his hands shows the gift as something tender and freely given, not earned. Even so, the poem ends not in satisfaction but in crying out and searching for the lord of Rukmini: receiving the gift only sharpens the longing for the giver.

GATHA 2752 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the Name worth more than liberation

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There, in that place, happiness dwells. The Vaishnavas sing and dance.

Banners flutter, and the name of Hari thunders forth. All sins are driven out in a stampede, fleeing to the four directions, never to return; they have no means to come back.

Forgetting His own divinity, the King of Pandhari stands upon the brick. Renouncing the formless, He has taken on this beautiful form.

The belly is never satisfied with tasting Him; hunger remains ever hungry. Says Tuka, who cares for this liberation? Tell me, what is the use of it?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There, in that place, happiness lives. The Vaishnavas sing, and they dance. Banners flutter. The name of Hari thunders out. The sins panic and flee in all four directions. They run and never come back; there is no way back for them. Forgetting that he is God, the King of Pandhari stands upon the brick. He set aside the formless and took on this lovely form. Feeding on him, the belly is never full. The hunger stays hungry. Tuka says: who cares about liberation? What is the use of it?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram paints the kirtan as the dwelling place of joy, where singing, dancing, and the roar of Hari's name drive sin away so completely it has no road back. At the center stands Vitthal on the brick at Pandhari, God who forgot his own grandeur and left the formless behind to take a form a devotee can love. Then comes the radical turn: tasting this God never fills you, the hunger only deepens, and that endless hunger is itself the treasure. So Tukaram waves off liberation as worthless beside it; release would end the very longing he would rather keep forever.

GATHA 2753 Autobiography

Autobiography, low birth, God as everything

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I was born in a lowly caste, and so I was abandoned to my own pretensions. But now You alone are my everything, O Lord of Pandhari, my mother and father.

I have no right to recite the sacred syllables. Says Tuka, I am utterly humble, bereft of caste and station.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I was born in a low caste. Because of that I was left to my own pretenses. But now you alone are mine, lord of Pandhari, my mother and my father. I have no right to recite the sacred syllables. Tuka says: I am lowly in every way, with no caste and no standing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names the social wall placed in front of him: born low, he was shut out and left with nothing but empty show. Against that exclusion he sets a direct claim on God, who needs no qualification of birth: the lord of Pandhari is his and is mother and father to him. He admits he has no sanctioned right to chant the scriptural syllables, but turns that very lack into his standing before God. Owning his lowliness completely becomes the ground of refuge: where caste and station give him nothing, God receives him as he is.

GATHA 2754 Prayers

Prayer, hold me to your own pledge

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I may sing crookedly and out of tune, but I shall still call myself Yours. Save me, O Lord of the meek.

Make Your pledge come true right now. I have come to You carrying heaps of my offenses.

Says Tuka, save me, or else abandon Your own pledge.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I sing badly, crooked and out of tune. Still, I will call myself yours. Save me, lord of the helpless. Make your pledge come true, now. I have come to you carrying heaps of the wrongs I have done. Tuka says: save me. Or else, give up your own name as savior.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram comes with no merit, only a clumsy, off-key song, yet still claims to belong to God. He leans entirely on God's own reputation as the lord of the helpless and demands that this pledge be made good right now. He does not hide his faults; he brings the whole pile of them as the very reason he needs saving. The closing line is the daring move: save me, or else surrender your own title, since a savior who lets such a sinner sink is no longer worthy of the name. He binds God to act by God's own promise.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The devotees of Hari are the dear kinsmen of my soul. I shall hold their feet within my heart.

At the final hour, they will come to deliver me; I shall offer them the seat upon my head. I have no other relatives or well-wishers besides the Vaishnavas.

I shall embrace them and clasp their feet; by that, the fatigue of worldly life will vanish. Those who wear the tulsi garland at their throats and bear the name of Hari, they are my ferrymen across this river of mortal existence.

At their feet I shall cling fast; I have no desire even for Vaikuntha. Those who sing Hari's name, whether out of laziness, pretense, or genuine feeling, they are my companions for the world beyond.

If anyone makes me utter Hari's name, to that joy there is no limit at all. Says Tuka, I am bound by their kindness, and therefore I have come to take refuge with the saints.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The devotees of Hari are the dear kin of my soul. I will hold their feet inside my heart. At the last hour they will come to set me free. I will give them the seat upon my head. I have no other relatives or well-wishers but the Vaishnavas. I will embrace them and clasp their feet, and by that the weariness of worldly life will vanish. Those who wear the tulsi garland at the throat and carry the name of Hari, they are my ferrymen across this river of birth and death. At their feet I will cling fast. I have no desire even for Vaikuntha. Whether they sing Hari's name from laziness, from pretense, or from real feeling, they are my companions for the world beyond. If anyone makes me speak Hari's name, that joy has no limit at all. Tuka says: I am bound by their kindness, and so I have come to take refuge with the saints.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram declares that his only true family is the company of Hari's devotees, closer than any blood relative. He honors them past all measure, holding their feet in his heart and on his head, because they are the ones who will come at his death and ferry him over the river of birth and death. The startling line is that he wants their feet more than he wants heaven itself: even Vaikuntha holds no pull next to their company. He goes further still, saying that whoever sings the Name counts as his companion no matter the motive, and that anyone who simply gets him to speak the Name gives him boundless joy. Bound by such kindness, he takes refuge in the saints rather than in any reward.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This worldly life is false; Hari alone is true. Without Hari, all the senses are vain and empty.

The silence of delusion is false, and the dream of confusion is false. Without Hari, meditation itself is perishable.

Those who perform rituals without Hari, without Hari in their chitta, know them to be mere corpses. Says Tuka, if you hold Hari firmly in your conviction, you shall swiftly reach Vaikuntha.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Worldly life is false. Hari alone is true. Without Hari, all the senses are hollow and empty. The silence of delusion is false. The dream of confusion is false. Without Hari, even meditation is perishable. Those who perform rituals without Hari, without Hari in the heart: know them to be mere corpses. Tuka says: if you hold Hari firmly in your conviction, you will quickly reach Vaikuntha.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets one truth against everything else: only Hari is real, and apart from Hari the whole sensory world is empty. He refuses to spare even the respectable spiritual practices: a silence or meditation done without Hari is still delusion and still perishes. The hardest line calls ritual performed without Hari in the heart a corpse, a body going through motions with no life in it. The point is not to abandon practice but to put Hari at its center; with that conviction held firm, the way to Vaikuntha is short and sure.

GATHA 2757 Renunciation

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To win Hari, one must renounce everything, offering wealth, life-breath, and body itself. Burn away attachment, possessiveness, illusion, and the affliction of sense-pleasures.

Cast out worldly shame, pretense, and ego, and banish envy far away. Says Tuka, abandon pride in caste and learning, and take refuge at the feet of the saints.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To win Hari you must give up everything. Lay down your wealth, your breath, your very body. Burn off attachment, possessiveness, illusion; let no craving, no worry remain. Burn the fever of sense-pleasures. Cast out fear of what people will think, cast out show, cast out the ego. Drive envy out of the country. Call gently on your friends, peace and patience and mercy, and let the Lord himself send them to you. Tuka says: throw away your pride in birth and your pride in learning, and go take refuge in the saints.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names what it actually costs to win God, and refuses to discount it. The list is total: wealth, breath, body, and then the inner holdings, attachment, possessiveness, the fever of the senses, and the fear of looking bad in front of others. He treats pride of caste and pride of learning as the last two coins to surrender, not as credentials that help. In their place he asks for peace, patience, and mercy as companions, and says the Lord himself sends these. The poem ends not at the feet of God directly but at the feet of the saints, who are the door.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O God, grant me the joy of solitude and spare this jiva from calamity. Let Your form dwell in my meditation and Your name flow ceaselessly on my tongue; do not let me forget You.

Says Tuka, I am lowly and a heap of sin; shelter me, O Mother and Father.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O God, give me the joy of being alone with you, and turn the blows of life away from this jiva. Let your form stay in my meditation and your name on my tongue without a break; do not let me forget you. As a mother is glad to meet her child, give me that same sweetness, O God. I heard of your glory and came to surrender; you always do good for your servant. Tuka says: I am lowly, a heap of sin; hide me behind your back, my Mother, my Father.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a beggar's prayer that asks for nearness, not rescue from hardship as such. Tukaram wants the joy of solitude with God and an unbroken memory of him, form held in meditation, name on the tongue, so that forgetting becomes impossible. The image of a mother meeting her child names the sweetness he is after: not awe, but the ease of belonging. He grounds his hope on God's own reputation for caring for his servants, which is why he dares to surrender. Calling himself a heap of sin, he asks to be hidden behind God's back, the place a small child runs to.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

That knowledge is false, that meditation is false, if one has no love for Hari's kirtan. It is all mere pretense, a shop of deceit set up to fool people for the belly's sake.

Reciting the Vedas is futile if there is no genuine emotion at the sacred story. That austerity is false, that chanting is false, if one feels only laziness and drowsiness during the telling of God's deeds.

One who does not love the Name will only perform outward show; such a person has no true purity of chitta. Says Tuka, thus declare the Puranas, and such too are the words of the wise from ages past.

IN PLAIN WORDS

That knowledge is false, that meditation is false, if you do not love the kirtan of Hari. It is all just pretense, a shop set up to fool people for the sake of the belly. Reciting all the Vedas is false if no love stirs in you at the sacred story. That austerity is false, that chanting is false, if you only feel lazy and sleepy while God's deeds are told. One who does not love the Name will only do outward show; his heart is not truly pure. Tuka says: this is what the Puranas declare, and so do the words of the wise from long ago.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram applies a single test to every spiritual act: is there love in it. Knowledge, meditation, Veda-recitation, austerity, chanting, all of them fail the test and turn false if the heart stays cold at the story and song of God. He is sharp about the motive: religion done for the belly is a shop, a stall of pretense set up to fool people. The tell he points to is dozing and laziness during the kirtan, the body's honest report that the love is not there. He does not claim this as his private opinion; he says the Puranas and the old sages say the same, so the reader is being asked to examine his own coldness, not to look down on others.

GATHA 2760 The Nature of God

Non-duality, only One remains

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

See God in all beings; every creature with its life-breath is one with the formless Absolute, the non-dual Niranjana alone. Thus proclaim the Puranas, the voice of the Vedas, and all the saints who roar with the fullness of direct experience.

The notions of 'mine' and 'yours' are distortions; when dissolved, only Oneness remains. No great labor is needed; simply inquire within.

Says Tuka, duality has no real existence. Through the play of imagination alone, the One has seemingly multiplied itself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

God is present in all beings. Every creature, with its breath, is the one non-dual ground, the stainless One, alone. So the Puranas roar, so the Vedas speak, so all people say, and so the saints roar, full to the brim with their own experience. 'Mine' and 'yours' are only a distortion; when that clears away, only Oneness is left. It needs no great labor; you only have to inquire. Tuka says: a second thing simply does not exist on its own. By the work of imagination alone, the One has seemed to grow into many.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram states the non-dual claim plainly: the same single, stainless Reality is present in every living thing. He stacks his witnesses, Puranas, Vedas, common speech, and the saints who speak from direct experience, so this is presented as settled and tested, not as speculation. The dividing line 'mine and yours' he calls a mere distortion that dissolves under inquiry, leaving only Oneness. The point is that the work required is small: not heroic effort, but looking honestly. The apparent many, he says, is the One inflated by imagination, so duality has no standing of its own.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I do not know how to close my ears to the world; I have no knowledge born of solitude. O saints, please hear my humble account.

I have not seen God with my own eyes, yet I go about showing Him to all. Says Tuka, absorbed in the joy of contemplation, I know nothing of sorrow.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I do not know how to shut my ears to the world; I have no knowledge that comes from solitude. Listen, O saints, to my honest account. I have not seen him with my own eyes, yet I go about showing God to everyone. Tuka says: in the joy of remembering him, I know nothing of sorrow.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a frank confession before the saints rather than a boast. He admits he has not mastered the disciplines, he cannot close his ears to the world, and he has no knowledge born of solitary practice. He even owns the apparent contradiction in his work: he points others to a God he has not seen with his eyes. What he does have is the joy of constant remembrance, and he reports that this joy has emptied his life of sorrow. The honesty is the teaching: the path here runs through loving recollection, not through credentials he lacks.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If you would renounce, then renounce like this: drive away your ego. Then remain as you are; what else is left to seek? Do not let the deep and stubborn crookedness within come forward.

Says Tuka, a pure mind and true contentment are what is needed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If you want to renounce, then renounce like this: drive the ego away. After that, stay just as you are; what is left to look for? Do not let the deep, stubborn crookedness inside come forward. Tuka says: what is needed is a clean mind and quiet contentment.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram redefines renunciation away from outward giving-up and toward the one thing that matters, dropping the ego. Once that is gone, he says, there is nothing left to chase; you can simply remain as you are, in ordinary life. The danger he names is the deep, hardened crookedness within, which must not be allowed to rise up and act. The real fruit is inward: a clean mind and a settled contentment. So the test of renunciation is not your robes or your fasting but whether the ego and its twistedness have actually been put down.

The saints, a mother and her child

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A mother's chitta is wholly absorbed in her child. She forgets her own body; taking the little one close, all her weariness vanishes.

She offers love like nourishment, and the child climbs upon her. Says Tuka, before the saints I cling to their feet with fond and playful devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A mother's whole mind is taken up with her child. She forgets her own body; when she holds the little one close, all her tiredness leaves. She gives her love like food, and the child climbs up onto her. Tuka says: before the saints I cling to their feet, fondly, playfully, like that child.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the mother-and-child bond to describe how the saints hold a devotee. The mother's mind is wholly given to the child, she forgets her own body, and her weariness lifts the moment she draws the little one near; her love is feeding, and the child answers by climbing onto her without fear. He then places himself in the child's role before the saints, clinging to their feet with the same fond, playful trust. The point is the security of that relationship: with the saints there is no need for ceremony, only the closeness of a child who knows it is wanted.

GATHA 2764 The Saints

The saints, an undeserved gift

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By the fruit of what merit have I beheld these holy feet today? I cannot fathom it, O Narayana; the saints have cared for this lowly one. What a blessed and auspicious day this is for the poor.

Says Tuka, the gain of Vitthal has come to me effortlessly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By the fruit of what good deed have I seen these feet today? I cannot understand it, O Narayana; the saints have looked after this lowly one. What a moment of gain, what a blessed day for one so poor. Tuka says: the gain of Vitthal has come to me, and it came easily.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram receives the sight of the saints' feet as pure grace and cannot trace it to any merit of his own. He asks what good deed could have earned this, and admits he does not know, which keeps the gift from becoming a reward he claims. He counts it the most blessed and auspicious moment a poor man could have. The last line names the deeper meaning: through the saints, the gain of Vitthal himself has come to him, and it came without strain or earning. The whole abhanga turns on undeserved, effortless grace arriving through holy company.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He who craves honor receives only dishonor; misfortune is the constant companion of the unlucky. When one depends on another for fulfillment, desire leads only to ruin.

How can one reach the fruit when one walks the road of craving like a beggar? Says Tuka, can a donkey given the title of a royal swan know anything of ornaments? How will You free me from this worldly existence, O Hrishikesha? I cannot tell. The more I strive, the longer the road grows.

Thirst has exiled me far away. Devotion and worship find no place in me; I have been separated from Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The one who hungers for honor gets only dishonor; bad luck keeps company with the wretched. When you lean on another to fill you, desire only sets up your ruin. How can you reach the fruit when your craving walks the road like a beggar? Tuka says: call a donkey a royal swan, what would the donkey know of ornaments? How will you free me from this worldly life, O Hrishikesha? I do not know, and the more I try, the longer the road grows. Thirst has driven me out of my own country. Devotion and worship find no room in me; I have fallen away from your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram traces how craving turns back on itself: the man who hungers for honor reaps dishonor, and depending on others to fill you only prepares your ruin. His donkey-called-a-swan jibe is aimed at the pattern, not at any one person: a title cannot make craving noble, just as a fine name cannot teach a beast the meaning of ornaments. Then the tone turns inward and desperate. He asks Hrishikesha to free him from worldly existence and confesses that his own effort only lengthens the road. The closing line names the wound under all of it: thirst, restless desire, has exiled him from himself, crowding out devotion and carrying him away from God's feet.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Behind and ahead I see no way through; I am besieged on all sides. Now protect my honor, O Narayana, poor, lowly, and humble as I am.

Whatever merits or faults I may have unknowingly accumulated, please burn the whole store of my past karma. The senses rush wildly through every door: hands, feet, ears, mouth, eyes, nose, each chasing its own inclination without a moment's rest.

They tear me apart, and I have no power over them. Relatives, wife, sons, brothers, wealth, greed, and illusion; friends, guardians, and so-called well-wishers; all conspire through countless schemes to drown me.

Says Tuka, O Hari, save us by any means. We are Your surrendered ones.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I look behind and ahead and find no way through; I am surrounded on every side. Now guard my honor, O Narayana, low and lowly and humble beggar that I am. I cannot reckon what merits or faults I have gathered without knowing; make a bonfire of all my stored-up karma. The senses run wild through every door. I cannot control them by any effort: hands, feet, ears, mouth, the organ of sex, eyes, nose, look, each one bolts after whatever it likes, not still for a single moment. They tear me apart; this is their vice, and I have no power over them. Body-ties, son, wife, brother; wealth, greed, the illusion-bound; people, rulers, friends, kinsmen, the many so-called good folk; through all sorts of deeds and schemes they work to drown me, to trip me and strike me down. Tuka says: O Hari, save me by whatever means; we are your surrendered ones.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the prayer of a man who has run out of moves and admits it. Tukaram finds no road forward or back and is besieged on all sides, so he stops claiming any strength of his own and simply asks God to guard his honor as a helpless beggar would. He confesses he cannot even audit his own merits and faults and begs that the whole store of karma be burned in one bonfire. He then catalogs the forces against him, first the senses, which bolt through every door of the body and tear him apart faster than any effort can restrain, and then the web of relatives, wealth, and well-wishers, whose pull works to drown him. The only ground he can stand on is surrender: having no power, he throws himself on Hari to be saved by any means at all.

GATHA 2767 The Power of the Name

The Name, it cuts the world's bond

मराठी मूळ

नाम घेतां उठाउठीं । होय संसारासी तुटी ॥1॥
ऐसा लाभ बांधा गांठी । विठ्ठलपायीं पडे मिठी ॥ध्रु.॥
नामापरतें साधन नाहीं । जें तूं करिशी आणिक कांहीं ॥2॥
हाकारोनि सांगे तुका । नाम घेतां राहों नका ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By uttering the Name without delay, one's bondage to the world is severed. Tie this profit to your soul and embrace the feet of Vitthal.

There is no spiritual practice greater than the Name; whatever else you may do is of no avail. Says Tuka, calling out to all: do not hold back from taking the Name.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The moment you take the Name, your bondage to the world is cut. Tie this profit into the knot of your cloth, and fall and cling to the feet of Vitthal. There is no practice greater than the Name; whatever else you do is of no use. Tuka says, calling out to everyone: when you are taking the Name, do not stop.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes the Name the whole of the path and urges it without hesitation. He claims it works at once: the instant the Name is taken, the knot binding a person to worldly existence is cut. He tells the listener to treat this as treasure, tying it into the knot of the cloth the way one carries money, and to clasp the feet of Vitthal. He ranks the Name above every other practice and says the rest, by comparison, is wasted effort. The closing line is a shout to the crowd: once you have begun the Name, do not let it stop.

GATHA 2768 Longing and Separation

Longing, I have paid, now come

मराठी मूळ

प्राण समपिनला आह्मी । आतां उशीर कां स्वामी॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have surrendered my very life-breath; why then this delay, O Lord? Repay what is owed to me; the burden of this debt weighs heavily upon my mind. My throat is hoarse from calling out; I have drawn very near.

Says Tuka, how does my service appear to You, O God?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have handed over my very breath to you. Why this delay now, my Lord? Pay back what you owe me; do not let the weight of this debt sit on my mind. My throat has cracked from calling; I have come very near to you. Tuka says: how does my service look to you, O God? Is it good enough?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as a creditor who has already paid in full and is waiting on God. He has surrendered his very life-breath, so he feels entitled to ask, half in love and half in impatience, why God still delays. He frames God's response as a debt that ought to be cleared, a burden he wants lifted from his mind. His body backs the claim: his throat is cracked from calling out, and he says he has drawn very close. The final question is tender and a little anxious, asking whether his service has pleased God, which keeps the demand wrapped inside devotion rather than complaint.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who came this way before were left with nothing at all. So treacherous is this path; to whom can one cry out? He strips the traveler bare, not even leaving a loincloth.

Says Tuka, that thief stands right there, hands on His hips.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All who came this way before were left with nothing. The road is that hard. To whom can I cry out about it? He strips the traveler bare. He does not leave even a loincloth. Tuka says: that thief stands right there, his hands upon his hips.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks of the path to God as a road that takes everything from those who walk it. The travelers before us were left with nothing at all, and no one stands by to hear the cry of one who is being undone. He names the one who does this stripping: it is the Lord himself, the thief who robs the seeker of every possession, down to the last loincloth. The shock of the close is that the robber is not hidden; he stands openly, hands on his hips, the very God the traveler set out to reach. The path to him costs you all that you call your own.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The jackal roars only until he has not seen the lion. The ocean thunders only until it has not seen the sage Agastya.

One speaks of dispassion only until a beautiful woman has not fallen in one's sight. One boasts of valor only until one has not beheld the son of the supreme Lord.

One flaunts rosaries and ritual marks only until one has not had the darshan of Tuka.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The jackal roars only until he has seen the lion. The ocean thunders only until it has seen the sage Agastya. A man talks of dispassion only until a beautiful woman falls in his sight. A man boasts of valor only until he has beheld the son of the supreme Lord. A man flaunts his rosaries and his ritual marks only until he has had the darshan of Tuka.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strings together small parables to expose how a boast lasts only until it is tested. The jackal is loud while no lion is near; the ocean roars until the sage who can drink it dry appears; the man who preaches detachment forgets his speeches the moment desire walks past. The escalation lands on the religious performer: the one who shows off his prayer beads and forehead marks goes quiet the instant he meets someone who actually knows God. The pattern to watch in yourself is the display that only thrives in the absence of the real thing, and dissolves the moment the real thing arrives.

Pebbles appear splendid only until the diamond has not begun to shine. Lamps seem radiant only until the sun has not risen.

People talk of the saints only until they have not met Tuka in person.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Pebbles look splendid only until the diamond begins to shine. Lamps look bright only until the sun rises. People talk of the saints only until they have met Tuka in person.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses two plain images of light to make one point: the false impresses only while the true is absent. Glass pebbles can pass for jewels until a real diamond is set beside them, and small lamps seem radiant until the sun comes up and drowns their flame. Then he turns the figure on himself: secondhand talk about holy people satisfies until you actually meet one. The claim is bold, naming his own company as that meeting, yet the point is not pride but contrast: hearsay holiness fades the moment living holiness stands before you.

Holding both forms, He sustains and destroys: fierce as Rudra, compassionate as Vishnu. One wears matted locks, the other a crown; the Lord of Kamala and the Lord of Gauri are one.

One is smeared with ash, the other enjoys the company of Lakshmi; Shankara and Shrirang are both aspects of the same being. One wears the Vaijayanti garland, the other the serpent Vasuki; both are ornaments of Harihara.

One carries a skull and dwells in cremation grounds; the other is the Lord of the universe. Says Tuka, to me both forms are one. Settling all deliberation, I have come to surrender.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Holding both forms, he sustains and he destroys. He is fierce as Rudra, kind as Vishnu. One wears matted locks, the other a crown; the Lord of Kamala and the Lord of Gauri are one. One is smeared with ash, the other enjoys the company of Lakshmi; Shankara and Shrirang are both the same being. One wears the Vaijayanti garland, the other wears the serpent Vasuki; both are the ornaments of Harihara. One carries a skull and lives in the cremation ground; the other is the dwelling place of the world, Vishvambhar. Tuka says: to me both forms are one. I have settled all my deliberation and come to surrender.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays Shiva and Vishnu side by side, detail for detail, only to fold them into one. Where one is fierce, the other is gentle; where one wears matted hair and ash and a skull and haunts the burning ground, the other wears a crown and the Vaijayanti garland and dwells with Lakshmi as the support of the whole world. By naming these opposites as twin aspects of Harihara, he refuses the old quarrel over which deity is supreme. The poem ends not in argument but in rest: he has stopped weighing and choosing, dropped his deliberation, and simply surrendered to the one who wears both forms.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I was guarding my rightful share, but all those efforts now seem to have gone to waste. No taste for good counsel remains; like a wicked person, everything has turned foul.

Through false trust my household has been ruined; patience was maintained only up to this point. Says Tuka, in the end there is neither ground nor depth. How strangely You have fulfilled Your play.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I was guarding what was rightfully mine, and now all that effort looks wasted. No taste for good counsel stays in me; like a wicked man, everything I speak has turned sour. My trust ruined my house; I held my patience only this far. Tuka says: in the end there is no firm ground and no bottom. How strangely you have had your way with me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram cries out from inside a collapse, the wreck of a life he thought he was managing well. He had been protecting his fair share and keeping his patience, yet the effort has come to nothing, even his speech has gone bitter, and the trust he placed somewhere has brought his whole household down. The final turn hands the ruin to God: there is no solid footing left and no floor underneath, and Tuka says it is the Lord who has worked this strange undoing. The lament does not curse God; it confesses that even disaster is his doing, and stands bewildered before it.

तुका ह्मणे ऐसा सर्वस्वें बुडाला । त्यासी अंतरला पांडुरंग ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What use is growing long matted hair, seizing a staff, and marching about in anger? One who curses everyone and craves only to eat, what wisdom can such a pretender possess? He consumes hemp, opium, and tobacco in excess, yet remains perpetually lost in delusion. Says Tuka, one who is drowned in such ways in every respect is forsaken by Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What use is it to grow long matted hair, to take up a staff, and to march about in anger? He curses everyone and lives only to eat. What teaching can such a pretender hold? He swallows hemp and opium and tobacco without limit, yet he stays lost in delusion the whole time. Tuka says: a man drowned in such ways through and through is forsaken by Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips the costume off a fake holy man to show there is no holiness underneath. The matted locks, the staff, the stern bearing are props; behind them is a man who curses people, lives for his next meal, and stays stupefied on hemp, opium, and tobacco. None of the outward signs of renunciation have touched his delusion. The warning, aimed at the pattern and not at any one person, is severe: a man who lets his whole life sink into this performance has cut himself off from God, who does not come to the costume but to the heart it hides.

GATHA 2775 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, one sight is enough

मराठी मूळ

अवघीं च तीर्थॉ घडलीं एकवेळा । चंद्रभागा डोळां देखिलिया ॥1॥
अवघीं च पापें गेलीं दिगांतरीं । वैकुंठ पंढरी देखिलिया ॥ध्रु.॥
अवघिया संतां एकवेळा भेटी । पुंडलीक दृष्टी देखिलिया ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जन्मा आल्याचें सार्थक । विठ्ठल चि एक देखिलिया ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All pilgrimages are accomplished at once upon beholding the Chandrabhaga with one's eyes. All sins flee to the far corners upon seeing Pandhari, which is Vaikuntha itself.

Meeting all the saints happens at once upon beholding Pundalik. Says Tuka, the whole purpose of being born is fulfilled by seeing Vitthal alone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All pilgrimages are accomplished at once when the eyes behold the Chandrabhaga. All sins flee to the far corners when one sees Pandhari, which is Vaikuntha itself. Meeting all the saints happens at once when one beholds Pundalik. Tuka says: the whole purpose of being born is fulfilled by seeing Vitthal alone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram gathers every spiritual labor into a single act of seeing. To lay eyes on the river Chandrabhaga is to have made all the pilgrimages at once; to see Pandhari is to stand in Vaikuntha and watch every sin scatter; to behold Pundalik, the devotee whose love brought the Lord to that place, is to have met all the saints together. The climb ends where it began: just to see Vitthal is the reason a person was ever born. The whole world of merit, pilgrimage, and holy company is folded into one darshan at Pandharpur.

GATHA 2776 Social Criticism

Social criticism, do not fake the part

मराठी मूळ

सदा सर्वकाळ अंतरीं कुटिल । तेणें गळां माळ घालूं नये ॥1॥
ज्यासी नाहीं दया क्षमा शांति । तेणें अंगीं विभूती लावूं नये ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे ज्यासी नाहीं हरिभक्ति । तेणें भगवें हातीं धरुं नये ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who is always crooked within should not wear a garland around the neck. One who has no compassion, forgiveness, or peace should not smear sacred ash upon the body.

One who does not know the greatness of devotion should not speak of Brahman-knowledge. One whose mind is not yet under control should not abandon worldly duties.

Says Tuka, one who has no devotion to Hari should not take up the ochre robes of renunciation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A man who is always crooked inside should not put a garland around his neck. A man with no compassion, no forgiveness, no peace should not smear sacred ash on his body. A man who does not know the greatness of devotion should not speak of the knowledge of Brahman. A man whose mind is not yet in his own hands should not abandon his worldly duties. Tuka says: a man who has no devotion to Hari should not take up the ochre robes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lists the marks of the holy life and tells the unready to leave each one alone. The garland, the sacred ash, the talk of Brahman, the giving up of household duties, the renouncer's ochre robe: each is honest only when an inner reality stands behind it. Worn without the crookedness cured, without compassion, without true knowledge, without a mastered mind, without love for Hari, the sign becomes a lie. The teaching is aimed at the impulse to claim the role before living it, and it asks the listener to check whether the inside matches the outside before reaching for the costume.

GATHA 2777 Faith and Trust

Faith, the Name saves sinners

मराठी मूळ

आह्मी असों निंश्चतीनें । एक्या गुणें तुमचिया॥1॥

नाहीं तुह्मां धांव घेता। कृपावंता आळस ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे विसरूं कांहीं । तुज वो आई विठ्ठले ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We rest in perfect certainty, relying upon this one quality of Yours: that wrongdoers have been saved by taking Your Name with love. You are never slow to rush to our aid, O compassionate One.

Says Tuka, can I ever forget You, O Mother Vitthal?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We rest in perfect certainty. We rely on this one quality of yours: that wrongdoers have been saved by taking your Name with love. You are never slow to run to our aid, O compassionate one. Tuka says: how could I ever forget you, O Mother Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram explains where his calm comes from: not from his own goodness, but from one proven trait of God. He has seen that even wrongdoers are carried across when they take the Name with love, and on that single fact he rests without anxiety. He adds that the compassionate Lord never delays, never grows lazy about coming to help. The poem closes in tenderness, addressing Vitthal as Mother and asking how such a one could ever be forgotten; certainty here is the fruit of love, not of merit earned.

GATHA 2778 The Necessity of Experience

Discernment, speak from experience

मराठी मूळ

अनुभवें वदे वाणी । अंतर ध्यानीं आपुलें ॥1॥
कैंची चिका दुधचवी । जरी दावी पांढरें ॥ध्रु.॥
जातीऐसा दावी रंग। बहु जग या नावें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे खद्योत ते । ढुंगाभोंवतें आपुलिया ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One should speak from experience; let the inner state match one's words. Lime-wash may look white, but it has not the taste of milk.

The world puts on a color to match its nature and earns a reputation by that guise alone. Says Tuka, fireflies glow only around their own tails.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let the voice speak from experience, and let the inner state match the words. Lime-wash can look white, but it has not the taste of milk. The world puts on a color to match its nature and wins a name by that disguise alone. Tuka says: fireflies glow only around their own tails.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells the difference between true speech and mere appearance. Words are worth hearing only when they rise from what a person has actually lived; otherwise they are lime-wash, white like milk to the eye but with none of its taste. Most people simply wear the color of their own nature and earn a reputation from that surface show. The closing image is sharp and a little mocking: the firefly thinks it shines, but its little light circles only its own tail, a small glow with no reach. The thing to examine in oneself is whether the words have any lived light behind them, or only flatter the speaker.

GATHA 2779 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, the Lord in all beings

मराठी मूळ

परपीडक तो आह्मां दावेदार । विश्वीं विश्वंभर ह्मणऊनि॥1॥
दंडूं त्यागूं बळें नावलोकुं डोळा । राखूं तो चांडाळा ऐसा दुरि ॥ध्रु.॥
अनाचार कांहीं न साहे अवगुणें । बहु होय मन कासावीस ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे माझी एकविध सेवा । विमुख ते देवा वाळी चित्तें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who torments others is my adversary, for I see the Lord of the universe in all beings. I will punish such a one, shun him, and refuse even to look at him; I will keep that wretch at a distance.

My chitta cannot endure misconduct or cruelty of any kind. Says Tuka, my devotion is singular; one who turns away from God, I dismiss from my chitta.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One who torments others is my enemy, for I see the Lord of the world in every being. I will punish such a one, I will cast him out, I will not even let my eyes rest on him by force; I will keep that wretch far away. My heart cannot bear misconduct or any cruelty; it grows deeply troubled. Tuka says: my service is of one kind only. One who turns away from God, I cast out of my heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram draws his one hard line from his deepest tenderness. Because he sees the Lord of the universe in every living being, the person who torments others becomes his own adversary, and he refuses such a one his company, his glance, his nearness. His point is not personal hatred but a heart that cannot stay at peace in the presence of cruelty. He names his devotion as singular and undivided, so the one place he draws back is from those who turn their backs on God by harming what God indwells. The severity here serves the same vision of God-in-all that makes him gentle everywhere else.

GATHA 2780 The Saints

The saint, asks nothing, spares all

मराठी मूळ

कांहीं न मागे कोणांसी । तो चि आवडे देवासी॥1॥
देव तयासी ह्मणावें । त्याचे चरणीं लीन व्हावें ॥ध्रु.॥
भूतदया ज्याचे मनीं । त्याचे घरीं चक्रपाणी ॥2॥
नाहीं नाहीं त्यासमान । तुका ह्मणे मी जमान ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who asks nothing of anyone is dear to God. Such a one alone deserves to be called divine; at such a one's feet one should bow.

In whose mind there is compassion for all beings, in that person's home dwells the Lord. Says Tuka, there is none, none at all, equal to such a one; I am the guarantor of this truth.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One who asks nothing of anyone is the one God loves. Call such a one divine; bow low at his feet. In whose mind there is mercy for all beings, in that man's house the Lord with the discus dwells. Tuka says: there is none, none at all, equal to such a one, and I stand surety for it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram paints the true saint by two plain marks: he wants nothing from anyone, and he holds mercy for every living being. The first frees him from need, the second fills him with love, and these two are what draw God to him; the Lord himself, Chakrapani who bears the discus, takes up residence in such a person's home. Tukaram says such a one deserves to be called divine and to have us bow at his feet. He ends by putting his own name behind the claim, standing as guarantor that no one is equal to the soul who asks for nothing and spares all.

GATHA 2781 The Power of the Name

The Name, God stands at once

मराठी मूळ

नाम उच्चारितां कंटीं । पुढें उभा जगजेठी ॥1॥
ऐसें धरोनियां ध्यान । मनें करावें चिंतन ॥ध्रु.॥
ब्रह्मादिकांच्या ध्याना नये । तो हा कीर्तनाचे सोये ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे सार घ्यावें । मनें हरिरूप पाहावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When you utter the Name, the Lord of the world stands before you at once. Hold this vision in meditation and let the mind dwell in contemplation.

He whom even Brahma and the gods cannot reach in meditation is easily found on the path of kirtan. Says Tuka, grasp this essence: let the mind behold the form of Hari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When you say the Name, the Lord of the world stands before you at once. Hold this sight in your meditation. Let the mind dwell on it. He whom even Brahma and the gods cannot reach by meditation is found easily on the path of kirtan. Tuka says: take this essence. Let the mind look upon the form of Hari.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the shortest road to God. He says the moment you utter the Name, the Lord is already standing in front of you, so the work of meditation is just to hold that nearness and not let the mind wander from it. He sets the easy path against the hard one: what Brahma and the gods strain after in their meditations and cannot reach, the singer of kirtan finds without effort. The point is not that effort is bad but that the Name does what effort alone never could; that is the essence to keep, and to behold Hari with the mind.

GATHA 2782 The Nature of God

Refuge, champion of the helpless

मराठी मूळ

आडलिया जना होसी सहाकारी । अंधिळयाकरीं काठी तूं चि ॥1॥
आडिले गांजिले पीडिले संसारीं । त्यांचा तूं कैवारी नारायणा ॥ध्रु.॥

आपुलें चि अंग तुह्मी वोडविलें । त्याचें निवारलें महा दुःख ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे तुझे कृपे पार नाहीं । माझे विठाबाई जननीये ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You come to the aid of those in distress, O Narayana. You are the very staff in the hand of the blind.

Those who are obstructed, oppressed, and tormented by worldly existence, You are their champion. You rescued Prahlad from the greatest peril, though he was tortured in countless ways.

You put forth Your own body and removed his immense suffering. Says Tuka, the extent of Your grace knows no limit, O my mother Vithabai.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You come to help those who are stuck. You are the staff in the blind man's hand. Those who are blocked, crushed, and tormented in this world, you are their champion, Narayana. You saved Prahlad in his great danger; you protected him in many ways. You put forward your own body, and his great sorrow was taken away. Tuka says: there is no limit to your grace, O my mother Vithabai.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is leaning his whole weight on God as the one who stands up for the powerless. He names exactly who Narayana comes for: the stuck, the blocked, the crushed, the tormented, the people the world has no use for. Prahlad is his proof: a child tortured in every way, and God shielded him and even put forward his own body to take the suffering off him. From this he draws the conclusion that God's grace has no measurable edge, and he ends by calling God his mother, Vithabai, which is the most intimate name for that protecting tenderness.

GATHA 2783 The Power of the Name

The Name, the one safe essence

मराठी मूळ

तपासी तें मन करूं पाहे घात । धरोनि सांगात इंद्रियांचा ॥1॥
ह्मणोनि कीर्तन आवडलें मज । सांडोनियां लाज हें चि करी ॥ध्रु.॥
पाहातां आगमनिगमाचे ठाव । तेथें नाहीं भाव एकविध ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे येथें नाहीं वो विकार । नाम एक सार विठोबाचें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The mind conspires with the senses to destroy one's austerities. Therefore kirtan has won my chitta; casting aside all shame, this alone I do.

Even in the depths of scripture, one does not find single-pointed devotion. Says Tuka, here there is no trace of impurity; the Name of Vithoba is the one true essence.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The mind wants to wreck my austerity. It keeps the senses as its allies. So I have come to love kirtan. I throw away my shame and do only this. Look into the places of scripture and ritual, and even there single-minded devotion is not found. Tuka says: here there is no corruption. The one essence is the Name of Vithoba.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is explaining why he gave up the path of austerity for the path of song. He has seen that the mind, working with the senses, will sabotage any private spiritual effort, so he chooses kirtan, which is sung openly and refuses to be ashamed. He goes further and says that even the deep texts of scripture and ritual do not by themselves hold the one undivided devotion he is after. What is left, he claims, is a path with no corruption in it at all: the single Name of Vithoba is the whole of the essence, and he wants nothing else.

GATHA 2784 The Nature of God

Nonduality, no high or low

मराठी मूळ

गुरुशिष्यपण । हें तों अधमलक्षण ॥1॥
भूतीं नारायण खरा । आप तैसा चि दुसरा ॥ध्रु.॥
न कळतां दोरी साप। राहूं नेंदावा तो कांप ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे गुणदोषी । ऐसें न पडावें सोसीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The distinction between guru and disciple is actually a sign of spiritual immaturity. In truth, Narayana dwells in all beings; the other is no different from oneself.

Until one realizes the rope is not a snake, the trembling should not be allowed to persist. Says Tuka, one should not fall into the trap of judging virtues and faults in others.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To make a difference between guru and disciple: that is a low man's mark. Narayana truly lives in all beings. The other is just the same as yourself. Until you see that the rope is not a snake, do not let the trembling go on. Tuka says: do not fall into the habit of weighing good points and faults.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is striking at the pride that hides inside spiritual ranking. To stand on the title of guru over disciple, he says, is the sign of a small soul, because the same Narayana lives in every being and the other person is not different from you. He brings in the old image of mistaking a rope for a snake: the fear is real, but it rests on a false seeing, and you should not let it run on once you know better. The fault he points at is the habit of measuring others by their virtues and flaws, which is the same false seeing applied to people.

GATHA 2785 The Power of the Name

The Name, grace lifts the lowest

मराठी मूळ

अंगीकार ज्याचा केला नारायणें । निंद्य तें हि तेणें वंद्य केलें ॥1॥
अजामेळ भिल्ली तारीली कुंटणी । प्रत्यक्ष पुराणीं वंद्य केली ॥ध्रु.॥
ब्रह्महत्याराशी पातकें अपार । वाल्मीक किंकर वंद्य केला ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे येथें भजन प्रमाण । काय थोरपण जाळावें तें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whomever Narayana has accepted, even what was despised becomes worthy of reverence. Ajamila, the tribal woman, and the courtesan were all saved; the Puranas themselves have made them honored.

Valmiki, who bore the weight of countless sins including brahma-hatya, was made worthy of worship. Says Tuka, here devotion alone is the measure. What use is burning one's worldly greatness?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whomever Narayana has taken up, even what was despised, he has made worthy of honor. Ajamila, the tribal woman, the courtesan: all were carried across. The Puranas themselves have made them honored. Valmiki bore a heap of sins, even the killing of a brahmin, beyond counting. Him too God made worthy of worship. Tuka says: here devotion is the only measure. What is the use of greatness? Burn it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is showing that grace, not status, decides who is honored. Once God accepts a person, the very things that made them despised are turned around into reasons for reverence. He lists people the world wrote off: Ajamila, a tribal woman, a courtesan, and Valmiki, who carried sins as grave as killing a brahmin, and points out that the same scriptures now hold them up for worship. The lesson is that devotion alone is the standard here, and worldly greatness counts for nothing; the sharp closing line tells you to burn that greatness rather than prize it.

GATHA 2786 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, wealth does the work

मराठी मूळ

धनवंता घरीं । करी धन चि चाकरी ॥1॥
होय बैसल्या व्यापार । न लगे सांडावें चि घर ॥ध्रु.॥
रानीं वनीं दीपीं । असतीं तीं होतीं सोपीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे मोल । देतां कांहीं नव्हे खोल ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the home of the wealthy, wealth itself serves as the servant. All trade happens while sitting at ease; one need not even leave the house.

What is found in forests, islands, and remote places all becomes easily accessible. Says Tuka, when you offer the right price, nothing remains beyond reach.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the rich man's house, the wealth itself does the work. The trade happens while he sits; he does not even have to leave his home. What lies in forests, in wild places, on far islands becomes easy to reach. Tuka says: when you pay the price, nothing stays out of reach.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the picture of a rich household to teach how devotion works. For the wealthy man, money is itself the servant: business gets done while he sits at ease, and he never has to leave the house. Things that are otherwise far off, hidden in forests or on distant islands, come to him without trouble. The hidden meaning lands in the last line: the true wealth is devotion, and once you pay its price nothing remains beyond your reach, so God and his gifts come to the one who has it without straining after them.

GATHA 2787 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, burden laid on God

मराठी मूळ

हा गे माझा अनुभव । भक्तिभाव भाग्याचा ॥1॥
केला ऋणी नारायण । नव्हे क्षण वेगळा ॥ध्रु.॥
घालोनियां भार माथा। अवघी चिंता वारली ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे वचन साटीं । नाम कंठीं धरोनि ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This is my experience: devotion is the fortune of the blessed. I have made Narayana my debtor; He is never apart from me for even a moment.

Having placed the entire burden on His head, all worry has vanished. Says Tuka, holding the Name in my throat, I have fulfilled His promise.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is my own experience: devotion is the fortune of the blessed. I have made Narayana my debtor. He is not apart from me for a single moment. I placed the whole burden on his head, and all my worry is gone. Tuka says: holding the Name in my throat, I have kept his word.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is reporting from his own life, not arguing a theory. He says devotion is the real good fortune, and through it he has turned the relationship around so that Narayana is now in his debt and never leaves his side. The center of it is the act of handing God the entire load of his cares: once the burden is on God's head, his own anxiety simply ends. The proof is the Name held constantly in his throat, and he reads his own freedom from worry as God making good on his promise to those who trust him.

GATHA 2788 The Nature of God

Nature of God, near yet missed

मराठी मूळ

देव आहे सुकाळ देशीं । अभाग्यासी दुर्भिक्षा ॥1॥
नेणती हा करूं सांटा । भरले फांटा आडरानें ॥ध्रु.॥
वसवूनि असे घर । माग दूर घातला ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे मन मुरे । मग जें उरे तें चि तूं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

God is found in the land of plenty; for the unfortunate, there is only famine. They do not know how to store what they have and wander lost in wastelands.

He has made His home right here, yet the path to reach Him has been cast far away. Says Tuka, when the mind dissolves, whatever remains is God Himself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

God is here in a land of plenty. For the unlucky it is a famine. They do not know how to gather the store, so they fill up the side-paths and the wastelands. He has made his home right here, yet they have thrown the road to him far away. Tuka says: when the mind dissolves, then whatever is left, that itself is you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is explaining how God can be everywhere and still missed. There is a feast of grace at hand, a land of plenty, but the unfortunate live in famine inside it because they do not know how to take in what is offered, so they wander off into side-tracks and barren ground. God has set his home right where they stand; it is they who have flung the path to him far away. The closing turn names the way back: when the mind dissolves, what remains is God himself, so the distance was never in God but in the busy, scattered mind.

GATHA 2789 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the kite held by the string

मराठी मूळ

खुंटोनियां दोरी आपणियांपाशीं । वावडी आकाशीं मोकलिली ॥1॥
आपुलिया आहे मालासी जतन । गाहाणाचे ऋण बुडों नेणें ॥ध्रु.॥
बीज नेलें तेथें येईल अंकुर । जतन तें सार करा याची ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे माझी निंश्चतीची सेवा । वेगळें नाहीं देवा उरों दिलें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Having tied the string securely to myself, I have sent the kite soaring into the sky. I keep careful watch over what is mine; a pledged debt never drowns.

Wherever the seed is carried, there the sprout will appear; take care of this essence. Says Tuka, my service is offered with full assurance; I have not allowed anything to remain separate from God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I tied the string fast to myself and let the kite go up into the sky. I keep watch over what is mine; a pledged debt is never lost. Wherever the seed is carried, the sprout will come up there. Guard this essence well. Tuka says: my service is offered with full assurance. I have left nothing standing apart from God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses everyday images to describe a trusting surrender that is not careless. The soul is like a kite he has let soar, but the string is tied firmly to himself, so the freedom is held, not lost. He backs this with two homely truths: a debt secured by a pledge does not vanish, and a seed sown will sprout wherever it is carried, so what you have entrusted is safe. The point is that he serves God with complete assurance, having kept nothing of himself separate or held back, confident that what he has handed over is in safe keeping.

GATHA 2790 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, feeling over cleverness

मराठी मूळ

शाहाणपणें वेद मुका । गोपिका त्या ताकटी ॥1॥
कैसें येथें कैसें तेथें । शहाणे ते जाणती ॥ध्रु.॥
यज्ञमुखें खोडी काढी । कोण गोडी बोरांची ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे भावाविण । अवघा सीण केला होय ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Through cleverness the Vedas were left speechless, while the simple milkmaids of Gokul won the Lord with mere buttermilk. The wise understand how things work here and how they work there.

One who finds fault with rituals cannot know the sweetness of wild berries. Says Tuka, without true feeling, all effort is nothing but weary toil.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By cleverness the Vedas were left dumb, while the milkmaids won him with mere buttermilk. How it works here, how it works there, only the wise know. The one who picks faults with his mouth cannot taste the sweetness of the berries. Tuka says: without true feeling, all the effort is only wasted toil.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets devotion above intellect by holding two pictures side by side. Cleverness pushed the Vedas to the end of their speech, yet the simple milkmaids of Gokul won Krishna with nothing more than buttermilk, because they had love and not argument. The fault-finder, busy criticizing rituals and others, never tastes the sweetness, like someone who talks down humble berries and so never knows how good they are. The plain conclusion is that without real heart-feeling all the spiritual labor in the world is just weariness, and that feeling is what the wise have understood.

GATHA 2791 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, spend the body in honest toil

मराठी मूळ

मजुराचें पोट भरे । दाता उरे संचला ॥1॥
या रे या रे हातोहातीं । काय माती सारावी ॥ध्रु.॥
रोजकीदव होतां झाडा । रोकडा चि पर्वत ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे खोल पाया । वेचों काया क्लेशेसीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The laborer's belly gets filled, while the miser hoards and remains hungry. Come, come, hand over hand, why should you carry mere dirt? When each day's account is settled in full, the daily wage itself becomes a mountain of wealth.

Says Tuka, lay a deep foundation, and spend this body willingly through honest toil.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The laborer's belly is filled, while the miser hoards and stays empty. Come, come, hand to hand, why should you keep carrying mere dirt? When the day's account is settled in full, the daily wage itself grows into a mountain. Tuka says: lay a deep foundation. Spend this body gladly in honest toil.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns a building site into a lesson about how to spend a human life. The worker who labors and is paid eats his fill, while the miser who only hoards goes hungry, so giving and using is the way that feeds you. He calls you to keep passing the load hand to hand instead of clutching worthless dirt, because when the day's reckoning is done the small daily wage will have piled into a mountain. The closing charge is to dig a deep foundation and to spend this body willingly in honest devoted effort, since that labor, not hoarding, is what builds something lasting.

GATHA 2792 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the test of grace

मराठी मूळ

स्मशानीं आह्मां न्याहालीचें सुख । या नांवें कौतुक तुमची कृपा ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे आतां पाहे अनुभव । घेऊनि हातीं जीव पांडुरंगा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For us, the bliss of the cremation ground is like the joy of adorning ourselves; this is what Your grace amounts to. Without it, everything is barren and hollow, just empty words and chatter.

Trees, bushes, creatures, stones, all become dear companions when You bestow Your gift upon them. Says Tuka, now test this through experience, O Panduranga, taking my life in Your hands.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For us the cremation ground feels like the joy of lying on a soft bed. By that you can tell the wonder of your grace. Without it everything is barren and empty, just hollow chatter. Trees, bushes, creatures, stones all become dear kin when you give your gift. Tuka says: now put it to the test of experience. Take my life in your hands, Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes what grace actually feels like and dares God to prove it. The mark of grace is that even the cremation ground, the most fearful and desolate place, feels to him like resting on a soft bed; that turnaround is the wonder. Without grace, he says, all the rest is barren and just empty talk, while with it even trees, bushes, animals, and stones become beloved relatives, because the gift remakes how everything is seen. He ends with a bold, direct demand: do not let this stay theory, test it in lived experience, and take my very life into your hands, Panduranga.

Devotion to Vitthal

Adoration, wealth in the feet

मराठी मूळ

आमची जोडी ते देवाचे चरण । करावें चिंतन विठोबाचें ॥1॥
लागेल तरीं कोणी घ्यावें धणीवरी । आमुपचि परी आवडीच्या ॥ध्रु.॥
उभारिला कर प्रसिद्ध या जग । करुं केला त्याग मागें पुढें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे होय दरिद्र विच्छिन्न । ऐसे देऊं दान एकवेळे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Our true wealth is the feet of God; our work is to contemplate Vithoba. If anyone desires it, let them take it to their full satisfaction, in whatever way they love.

I have raised my hand before the whole world; I have renounced all else, past and future. Says Tuka, let us give such a gift, even once, that poverty itself is utterly destroyed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Our wealth is the feet of God. Our work is to think of Vithoba. If anyone wants this, let them take it to their fill, in whatever way they love it. I have raised my hand for the whole world to see. I have let go of everything, behind me and ahead of me. Tuka says: let us give such a gift, even once, that poverty itself is wiped out.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names his only treasure and offers it away freely. He owns nothing but Vithoba's feet, and his single labor is to keep his mind on them. Then he turns to the world with an open, raised hand, the gesture of one who hides nothing and keeps nothing, having released both past and future. The gift he wants to give is not coins but this remembrance, which when truly received ends a deeper poverty than any lack of money.

GATHA 2794 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the hidden must be drawn out

मराठी मूळ

दधिमाझी लोणी जाणती सकळ । तें काढी निराळें जाणे मथन ॥1॥
अग्न काष्ठामाजी ऐसें जाणे जन । मथिलियाविण कैसा जाळी ॥ध्रु.॥
तुका ह्मणे मुख मळीण दर्पणीं । उजिळल्यावांचूनि कैसें भासे ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Everyone knows that butter lies hidden within curd, yet only one who churns can bring it out. Everyone knows that fire dwells within wood, yet without friction it cannot blaze forth.

Says Tuka, a mirror smeared with grime cannot reflect anything until it is polished clean.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Everyone knows butter lies inside the curd. Only churning draws it out. Everyone knows fire lives inside the wood. Without rubbing, how can it blaze? Tuka says: a mirror smeared with dirt shows nothing until it is wiped clean.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers the easy objection that since God is already within us, nothing more need be done. Knowing the butter is in the curd does not feed you; only the churning does. Knowing fire sleeps in the wood gives no warmth; only the friction does. So the indwelling presence is real, but it must be worked for through effort and through cleaning the mind, the way a grimy mirror reflects nothing until it is polished.

GATHA 2795 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, only the Lord can save

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे तुला सोडवीना कोणी । एका चक्रपाणी वांचूनियां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not, O mind, get entangled in the net of illusion; Death has drawn near to devour you. When Death pounces, no mother or father can save you.

No king, no village chief, no relatives however dear can deliver you. Says Tuka, no one can rescue you except the Lord alone.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not, O mind, get tangled in the net of illusion. Death has come near to swallow you. When Death pounces, your mother and father cannot save you then. No king, no village chief, no relatives however fine can set you free. Tuka says: no one can rescue you except the Lord alone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks straight to his own mind about a fact it keeps avoiding: death is close, and the web of worldly attachment leaves it defenseless. He runs down the list of everyone we lean on for safety, parents, rulers, the local strongman, beloved kin, and shows each one powerless at the last hour. The point is not despair but redirection: since none of these can deliver you, take refuge now in the only one who can, the Lord.

GATHA 2796 Worldly Life

Worldly life, the self-deceiver

मराठी मूळ

पुढें जेणें लाभ घडे । तें चि वेडे नाशिती ॥1॥
येवढी कोठें नागवण । अंधारुण विष घ्यावें ॥ध्रु.॥
होणारासी मिळे बुद्धि । नेदी शुद्धी धरुं तें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जना सोंग । दावी रंग आणीक ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

That which would bring future gain is the very thing the foolish destroy. What greater self-deception is there than swallowing poison in the dark? Fate conspires with those destined for ruin, not letting them hold on to good sense.

Says Tuka, such people show one face to the world while harboring an altogether different color within.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The very thing that would bring gain ahead, the foolish destroy. Where is there a greater robbing of oneself than to drink poison in the dark? Fate falls in with those headed for ruin and will not let them keep their good sense. Tuka says: such people show one face to the world and carry another color inside.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at the way we sabotage our own welfare. What would help us most is exactly what folly throws away, and he calls this self-robbery sharper than knowingly swallowing poison in the dark. He notices too that once a person is bent on ruin, circumstances seem to close around them and clarity slips out of reach. The closing line names the root pattern: a divided life, one face turned outward to be seen and a different reality hidden within, which is itself part of the ruin.

GATHA 2797 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the human birth slips away

मराठी मूळ

ऐका गा ए अवघे जन । शुद्ध मन तें हित ॥1॥
अवघा काळ नव्हे जरी । समयावरी जाणावें ॥ध्रु.॥
नाहीं कोणी सवें येता । संचिता या वेगळा ॥2॥

कर्मभूमीऐसा ठाव । वेवसाव जाणावा ॥4॥
तुका ह्मणे उत्तम जोडी । जाती घडी नरदेह ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Listen, all you people: a pure mind is the true path to welfare. If you cannot devote every moment, then at least know the right time.

No one accompanies you in death except the store of your past deeds. While the opportunity is still at hand, bring the senses under control.

Know that this human realm is the field for earning merit; treat it as your place of enterprise. Says Tuka, the supreme gain is the human body, and its moments are slipping away.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Listen, all you people: a pure mind is your true good. If you cannot give every moment, then at least know the right time. No one comes with you in death except the store of your past deeds. The chance is still at hand; bring the senses under your hold. Know that this human place is the field for earning; treat it as your work. Tuka says: the supreme gain is the human body, and its moments are slipping away.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram addresses everyone at once, naming a clean mind as the real welfare and then meeting people where they are. If you cannot devote all your time, at least seize the right moments. He strips away every false companion for the final journey: nothing follows you but the account of what you have done. While the chance lasts, govern the senses, because this human life is the one field where such earning is possible. The urgency is that the body is itself the rare prize, and each moment of it is running out.

GATHA 2798 The Saints

Saints, service is the inheritance

मराठी मूळ

संतसेवेसि अंग चोरी । दृष्टी न पडो तयावरी ॥1॥
ऐसियासी व्याली रांड । जळो जळो तिचें तोंड ॥ध्रु.॥
संतचरणीं ठेवितां भाव । आपेंआप भेटे देव ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे संतसेवा । माझ्या पूर्वजांचा ठेवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who withholds oneself from serving the saints should never cross one's sight. Cursed be the mother who bore such a person.

By placing devotion at the feet of the saints, God Himself comes to meet you of His own accord. Says Tuka, service to the saints is the treasure of my ancestors.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One who holds back from serving the saints, let them never fall in my sight. Cursed, cursed be the mouth of the woman who bore such a one. Place your devotion at the feet of the saints, and God comes to meet you on His own. Tuka says: service to the saints is the treasure my ancestors left me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks with deliberate heat about a refusal he finds unbearable: shrinking back from the service of holy company. The harshness is aimed at the pattern of withholding oneself, not at any one person to be despised; it measures how much he treasures what is being scorned. His reason is plain: lay your love at the saints' feet and God arrives unbidden, the saints being the open door to Him. He ends by claiming this service as a family inheritance, a wealth handed down to him.

GATHA 2799 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, time runs out, take refuge

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे वेगें । पंढरिराया शरण रिघें ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The days and hours have fled and gone. Why do you still insist on calling things 'mine'? Death sits sharpening his weapon, not letting a single moment slip.

Why have you not yet understood, even as your hair turns grey and eyes and ears grow feeble? Even when your welfare is in your own hands, you stumble and eat dirt. You know well that you must leave, yet you build your house upon sand.

Says Tuka, hasten and take refuge in the Lord of Pandhari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The days and the hours have fled and gone. Why do you keep saying mine, mine? Death sits sharpening his blade and lets not a single moment slip. Why do you still not understand, when your hair has turned and your ears and eyes have failed? Even with your good held in your own hands, you stumble and fill your mouth with dirt. You know well that you must go, yet you dig the foundation and build your house. Tuka says: hurry, take refuge in the King of Pandhari.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram confronts the mind that clings to ownership while time drains away. The grey hair and dimming senses are evidence the body is already announcing the end, yet still it cries mine, mine and ignores the welfare lying right in its own hands. He sharpens the folly with two images: a person who fouls his own mouth with dirt, and one who keeps laying foundations and building a house when he knows he must leave it. Against all this delay he gives a single, urgent instruction: hurry now and surrender to the Lord of Pandhari.

GATHA 2800 Prayers

Prayer, You are my atonement

मराठी मूळ

आतां माझ्या मायबापा । तूं या पापा प्रायिश्चत्त॥1॥
फजित हे केले खळ । तो विटाळ निवारीं ॥ध्रु.॥
प्रेम आतां पाजीं रस । करीं वास अंतरीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे पांडुरंगा । जिवलगा माझिया ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now, O my Mother and Father, You alone are the atonement for my sins. The wicked have shamed me; remove that stain.

Fill me now with the nectar of love, and dwell within my chitta. Says Tuka, O Panduranga, my dearest one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now, O my Mother and Father, You are the atonement for these sins. The wicked have shamed me; clear away that defilement. Now pour the nectar of love into me and make Your home inside me. Tuka says: O Panduranga, my own dear one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram throws himself entirely on God as both parent and remedy. He does not list his own penances; he says God alone is the atonement for his sins. He asks for two things in one breath: that the stain of the shaming he has suffered be washed away, and that in its place the nectar of love be poured in so that God Himself dwells in his heart. The closing endearment, calling Panduranga his very own, shows the whole plea rests on intimacy, not on bargaining.

GATHA 2801 Longing and Separation

Longing, scolding the slow rescuer

मराठी मूळ

कां रे न पवसी धांवण्या । अंगराख्या नारायणा।।1।।
अंगीं असोनियां बळ । होसी खटएाळ नाठएाळ ।।ध्रु.।।

तुका ह्मणे कान्हा। क्रियानष्टा नारायणा ।।3।।

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why do You not come running, O Narayana, my bodyguard? You have the strength, yet You play truant and obstinate. If we go to hell, what gain will that bring to You? Says Tuka, O Krishna, O faithless Narayana.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why do You not come running, O Narayana, my shield? You have the strength in You, yet You act the rogue and the truant. If we go to hell, what will come into Your hands by it? Tuka says: O Krishna, O faithless Narayana.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays in the bold voice of love, scolding God for being slow to rescue. He calls Narayana his shield and bodyguard, then accuses Him of holding back his power and playing the truant rogue. The argument is shrewd and tender: if the devotee is allowed to fall into hell, God Himself loses, for what does He gain by abandoning His own? The blunt closing names, faithless Narayana, are the complaint of someone who feels close enough to demand, not an insult from one who doubts.

GATHA 2802 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the great reversal

मराठी मूळ

माझे पाय तुझी डोई । ऐसें करिं गा भाक देई ॥1॥
पाहतां तंव उफराटें । घडे तई भाग्य मोठें ॥ध्रु.॥
बहु साधन मोलाच। यासी जोडा दुजें कैचें ॥2॥
नका अनमानूं विठ्ठला । तुका ह्मणे धडा जाला ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Place my feet upon Your head; give me such a promise. Looking closely, it appears reversed, yet in that reversal great fortune is found.

This is the most precious of all spiritual practices; what else could match it? Says Tuka, do not hesitate, O Vitthal; the lesson has been learned.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Set my feet upon Your head; give me this promise. Looked at plainly it seems upside down, yet when it happens great fortune comes. Of all the costly practices, what other can match this one? Do not hesitate, Vitthal. Tuka says: the lesson is settled.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks for something that looks backward: that God place the devotee's feet on His own head. He admits the request seems reversed, since it is the worshipper who normally bows, yet he insists this very reversal is where the greatest fortune lies. It is, he says, the most precious of all spiritual practices, beyond price and beyond rival. He presses Vitthal not to waver, declaring the matter understood and decided: in true love God lowers Himself to lift the devotee.

GATHA 2803 The Power of the Name

The Name, food sanctified by remembrance

मराठी मूळ

पवित्र तें अन्न । हरिचिंतनीं भोजन ॥1॥
येर वेठए पोट भरी । चाम मसकाचे परी ॥ध्रु.॥
जेऊनि तो धाला । हरिचिंतनीं केला काला ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे चवी आलें । जें कां मिश्रित विठ्ठलें॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

That food is truly sacred which is eaten while remembering Hari. All other eating merely fills the belly like a leather water-bag.

He alone has truly dined who has spent the mealtime in contemplation of Hari. Says Tuka, the real flavor comes when the food is mixed with the presence of Vitthal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

That food is holy which is eaten while thinking of Hari. All other eating just fills the belly, like a bag of leather. He alone has truly eaten his fill who spent the mealtime remembering Hari. Tuka says: the real taste comes when the food is mixed with Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes the most ordinary act, eating, and shows where its worth actually lies. Food becomes sacred not by what is on the plate but by remembrance of Hari held during the meal; without that, eating merely stuffs the body like filling a leather water-bag. The truly satisfied person is the one whose mealtime was steeped in contemplation. The closing line gives the whole teaching its flavor: the food gains its real taste only when it is mingled with the presence of Vitthal, so that remembrance, not appetite, is the true nourishment.

GATHA 2804 Devotion to Vitthal

Adoration, the power of His feet

मराठी मूळ

चरणाचा महिमा । हा तो तुझ्या पुरुषोत्तमा ॥1॥
अंध पारखी माणिकें । बोलविशी स्पष्ट मुकें ॥ध्रु.॥
काय नाहीं सत्ता। हातीं तुझ्या पंढरीनाथा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे मूढा । मज चेष्टविलें जडा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Such is the glory of Your feet, O Purushottama. Through them the blind can appraise jewels, and the mute are made to speak clearly.

Is there anything beyond the power in Your hands, O Lord of Pandhari? Says Tuka, dull and ignorant as I am, You have set me in motion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Such is the glory of Your feet, O Purushottama. By them the blind appraise jewels and the mute are made to speak clearly. What is not within Your power, O Lord of Pandhari? Tuka says: dull and senseless as I am, You have set me in motion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram praises the feet of God by what they accomplish in the helpless. Through them the blind can judge gems and the mute can speak plainly, impossibilities that show grace doing what ability cannot. From these wonders he draws the obvious conclusion: nothing lies outside the Lord's power. Then he turns it on himself, the surest proof of all, for if a dull and inert person like him has been roused into speech and movement, the glory of those feet needs no further argument.

GATHA 2805 Worldly Life

Karma's weight, no refuge but God

मराठी मूळ

बिळवंत कर्म । करी आपुला तो धर्म ॥1॥

आचरणें खोटीं । केलीं सलताती पोटीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे देवा । नाहीं भजन केली सेवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One's powerful karma enforces its own law. It seizes authority and drags the fallen further into ruin.

Wrong actions, once committed, burn in the belly with regret. Says Tuka, without worship and service of God, there is no escape.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Your own strong karma does its work; it enforces its own law. It takes hold of you and drags the fallen one further down into ruin. Wrong actions, once done, burn in the belly with regret. Tuka says: without worship and service of God, there is no way out.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing how our own past deeds keep their grip on us. Karma is not a distant judge; it is a momentum we set in motion, and it carries the fallen further down rather than letting them up. The wrong things we have done do not stay outside us. They sit in the belly and burn as regret. He ends with the one door that this weight cannot block: turning to God in worship and service. Nothing else loosens the hold.

GATHA 2806 Surrender and Acceptance

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sometimes one must carry water; sometimes one may rest on a fine bed. Whatever the occasion demands, that is what must happen.

Sometimes there are feasts of many dishes; sometimes only dry bread. Sometimes one rides in a carriage; sometimes one walks barefoot.

Sometimes fine garments; sometimes worn-out rags. Sometimes full prosperity; sometimes suffering in adversity.

Sometimes the company of the good; sometimes the company of the wicked. Says Tuka, know that joy and sorrow are to be borne equally.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sometimes I must carry water; sometimes I rest on a fine bed. Whatever the moment asks, that is what happens. Sometimes there are many dishes to eat; sometimes only dry bread. Sometimes I ride in a carriage; sometimes I walk barefoot. Sometimes fine clothes; sometimes worn-out rags. Sometimes there is full wealth; sometimes I must bear hard times. Sometimes the company of good people; sometimes the company of the wicked. Tuka says: know this, joy and sorrow are to be borne the same.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out life as a series of opposites that arrive without our choosing: labor and rest, feast and dry bread, carriage and bare feet, riches and ruin, good company and bad. His point is that the moment decides, not us; we do not control which side comes. So the practice is not to chase one and flee the other. Take each as it comes, and bear joy and sorrow with the same steady heart. That evenness is the surrender the poem is teaching.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The Lord knows neither high nor low; He stands wherever He sees sincere devotion. He ate the scraps offered by the servant-maid's son Vidura, and protected Prahlad in the demon's house.

He dyed leather alongside Rohidas, and wove shawls behind Kabir. He sold meat with Sajan the butcher, and weeded the garden with Savata Mali.

He hammered gold with Narhari the goldsmith, and dragged carcasses with Chokhamela. He sold cow-dung cakes alongside Namdev's Jani, and carried water and swept the floor in Dharma's house.

He dined with Nama without hesitation, and bore the wall on His own body for the sake of a devotee. He drove Arjuna's chariot and ate the beaten rice of Sudama with love.

He herded cows for the cowherd folk and became the doorkeeper of Bali. He paid off Yankoba's debt and endured the womb for Ambarisha's sake.

He drank poison for Mirabai and stood as surety for Damaji. He carried clay for Gora the potter and honored the bill of Mahatma with His own person.

For Pundalik's sake He still stands waiting. Says Tuka, blessed indeed is His story.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The Lord knows nothing of high or low; He stands wherever He sees true devotion. He ate the scraps offered by Vidura, the servant-maid's son, and He guarded Prahlad in the demon's house. He dyed leather beside Rohidas, and wove shawls behind Kabir. He sold meat with Sajan the butcher, and weeded the garden with Savata Mali. He hammered gold with Narhari the goldsmith, and dragged carcasses with Chokhamela. He gathered cow-dung cakes beside Namdev's Jani, and carried water and swept the floor in Dharma's house. He dined with Nama without shame, and held up the wall with His own body for a devotee. He drove Arjuna's chariot, and ate Sudama's beaten rice with love. He herded cows for the cowherds, and became the doorkeeper at Bali's gate. He paid off Yankoba's debt, and entered the womb for Ambarisha's sake. He drank poison for Mirabai, and stood as surety for Damaji. He carried clay for Gora the potter, and honored Mahatma's bill with His own person. For Pundalik's sake He still stands waiting. Tuka says: blessed indeed is His story.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers the question of who God favors by listing the people God actually showed up for. The Lord recognizes no caste and no rank; He stands wherever the heart is true. So he names devotee after devotee, many of them low-born or outcaste, and shows God doing their humble work beside them: dyeing leather, weaving, butchering, sweeping, dragging carcasses, herding cows. The God of the Bhagavatas is not above the labor of the despised; He kneels in it. And He still stands waiting at Pandhari for Pundalik, a love that has not ended. The whole song is a refusal of the idea that holiness belongs to the high.

GATHA 2808 Longing and Separation

Longing, watching the road to Pandhari

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My jiva is gripped with longing for Your meeting; day and night I watch the road for You. As the chakora bird lives for the full moon, so my mind awaits You.

As a daughter yearns for the festive homecoming at Diwali, so I gaze down the road to Pandhari. As a hungry child cries bitterly, watching for its mother's return, so I wait.

Says Tuka, I am starving with hunger; come running and show me Your blessed face, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My soul is gripped with longing to meet You; night and day I watch the road for You. As the chakora bird lives only for the full moon, so my mind watches and waits. As a daughter aches for her Diwali homecoming, so I gaze down the road to Pandhari. As a hungry child cries hard, watching for its mother, so I wait. Tuka says: I am starving with hunger; come running, O God, and show me Your blessed face.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram puts his longing for God into images everyone knows the ache of. The chakora bird is said to live only for the moon; the married daughter counts the days to her festival homecoming; the hungry child wails and stares down the road for its mother. Each image is helpless and one-pointed: the waiting one cannot make the longed-for thing arrive. That is exactly his condition before Vitthal of Pandhari. He is not asking for teaching or boon, only the face. And he asks God to come running, the way a mother runs to a crying child.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The saints have come and placed their feet upon my head; they have made me fulfilled in both worlds. I will bow at their feet and roll upon the ground at their soles; today the longing of my heart will be satisfied.

All the merit of past lives has turned favorable; the meeting with the saints is wholly auspicious. Says Tuka, I have become blessed, O God. I know not how to serve, yet let my eyes behold this grace.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The saints have come and set their feet upon my head; they have made me complete in both worlds. I will bow at their feet and roll on the ground at their soles; today the longing of my heart will be filled. All the merit of my past lives has turned in my favor; the meeting with the saints is wholly blessed. Tuka says: I have become fulfilled, O God. I do not know how to serve, yet let my eyes behold this grace.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram treats the visit of the saints as the very thing he has been waiting for, and ranks it as high as meeting God. To have their feet laid on his head completes him in this world and the next, so he throws himself down at their soles. He reads the encounter as the fruit of merit gathered across past lives now ripening at once, which is why it feels wholly auspicious. He confesses he does not even know how to serve them properly. The one thing he asks is to keep this grace in sight, because in this tradition the company of the saints is itself the doorway to God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I go about my worldly tasks, yet my chitta cherishes Your feet. How can I describe my love to You, O God? I behold Your form with my eyes at all times, even while settling the affairs of the world.

My speech has been appointed solely to sing Your virtues. My mind is restless with longing for Your darshan; I have no greed for wealth or grain.

I trudge the path of duty like forced labor, but the pull of my jiva is toward You alone. Says Tuka, this is how I live out my days; my life is not separate from You.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I go about my work, yet it is Your feet I love. How can I tell You my love, O God? I see Your form with my eyes always, all the time, even while I settle the affairs of the world. My speech has been given only to sing Your virtues. My mind is restless with longing for Your darshan; my soul has no greed for wealth or grain. I trudge the path of duty like forced labor, but the pull of my life is toward You alone. Tuka says: this is how I live out my days; my life is not separate from You.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a devotion carried on inside ordinary householder life, not apart from it. His hands do the world's work and settle its affairs, but his attention stays fixed on God's feet and form the whole time. He treats his very voice as set aside for one use, to sing God's praise, and he says plainly that he has no hunger for money or grain. The world's duties he does like a man under forced labor, going through them while his heart pulls elsewhere. The closing line is the claim the rest builds to: his life is not a thing separate from God at all.

GATHA 2811 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the false ties of kinship

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why do you call your children cattle and say they are yours? What makes you a true parent? Why do you grieve and wail over one who has died? The mourning over the dead is all a false commotion. Why do you claim kinfolk as your own? They will not save you from the hands of Yama's messengers.

Why do you call yourself mighty? See how at the funeral pyre you must be lifted by others. Says Tuka, place no trust in any of this. Hasten and take refuge in Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why do you call your children yours, as a beast counts its calves? What makes you a true parent? Why do you grieve and wail when someone has died? The mourning over the dead is all a false uproar. Why do you call your kinfolk your own? They will not save you from the hands of Yama's messengers. Why do you boast that you are mighty? See how at the funeral pyre you have to be lifted by others. Tuka says: put no trust in any of this. Hurry and take refuge in Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses hard on the bonds we are most sure of: children, kin, our own strength. He asks what really makes them yours, and answers that none of them holds when death comes. The wailing over a corpse he calls a false commotion, because the relatives doing the mourning cannot stop Yama's messengers from taking you, nor can they keep you from taking the same road. Even the strong man, who thinks himself mighty, has to be carried to the pyre by other hands. The exhortation is not contempt for family; it is a warning against leaning your whole weight on what cannot bear it. Lean on Panduranga instead, and do it soon.

Longing, the cry for rescue without delay

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Lord of compassion, I cry out to You: come quickly and deliver me. Hearing my pitiful words, may Narayana be moved to haste.

All around, before and behind, I see only emptiness; placing my faith at Your feet, I watch the road. Let there be no more delay now, O Vitthal, my Mother and Father.

Only this one thing remains for me; upon reflection, all else has become void. Says Tuka, now bestow Your gift of grace and reveal those even feet before my eyes.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O Lord of compassion, I cry out to You: come quickly and set me free. Hearing my words of grief, may Narayana be moved to hurry. Before me and behind me, everything looks empty; I lay my faith at Your feet and watch the road. Do not delay now, O Vitthal, my Mother and Father. This one thing alone is left to me now; when I look, all the rest has become void. Tuka says: now give me the gift of Your grace, and show those level feet to my eyes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is at the end of his own resources, calling out for rescue and asking that it not be slow. He has looked around in every direction and found only emptiness; nothing in the world holds him up anymore. That stripping-away is not despair here but clearance: when all else has gone void, only God is left, and so God is now his whole hope. He addresses Vitthal as mother and father, the one bond that does not fail. The single thing he asks for is the sight of those feet, set level on the brick at Pandhari, given to him as grace.

GATHA 2813 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the title without the heart

मराठी मूळ

न मनीं ते ज्ञानी न मनीं ते पंडित । ऐसे परीचे एकएका भावें ॥1॥
धातू पोसोनियां आणिकां उपदेश । अंतरीं तो लेश प्रेम नाहीं ॥ध्रु.॥
न मनीं ते योगी न मनीं ते हरिदास । दर्शनें बहुवस बहुतां परीचीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे तयां नमन बाहएात्कारी । आवडती परी चित्तशुद्धीचे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I do not accept those who merely call themselves wise, nor those who claim to be scholars; I regard each according to their inner spirit. They fatten their own senses while giving sermons to others, with not a trace of love within.

I do not accept those who pose as yogis, nor those who call themselves Hari's servants; I have seen many forms of such display. Says Tuka, I bow outwardly to them, but my true affection is for those who are pure of heart.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I do not count as wise those who only call themselves wise, nor as scholars those who claim the name; I weigh each one by the spirit inside him. They feed their own appetites while preaching to others, and within there is not a trace of love. I do not count as a yogi the one who poses as a yogi, nor as Hari's servant the one who claims it; I have seen many kinds of such display. Tuka says: I bow to them on the outside, but my real love is for those who are pure of heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram refuses to take spiritual titles at face value. The labels he names, wise man, scholar, yogi, servant of Hari, can all be worn as a costume while the inner life stays empty of love. His test is what is inside: the person who lavishes care on his own appetites while handing out sermons fails it, however learned the speech or impressive the pose. The danger he is pointing at is not other people so much as the pattern itself, the temptation to settle for the appearance of devotion. He will offer such people an outward bow for the sake of courtesy, but his real reverence is reserved for the one whose heart is actually clean.

GATHA 2814 True Worship

True worship, feeling alone is the means

मराठी मूळ

काय करिशील कुशल गायन । अंतरीं मळीण कुबिद्ध ते ॥4॥
तुका ह्मणे भाव नाहीं करी सेवा । तेणें काय देवा योग्य होशी ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why worship stone, brass, or alloys of eight metals if there is no devotion behind it? Feeling alone is the cause; feeling alone is declared to be the means of liberation. What use is a rosary around the neck if you go on chanting the pleasures of the senses? What use is a scholar's speech if it only swells with pride in mere letters? What use is skillful singing if the mind within remains impure and corrupt? Says Tuka, without true feeling behind your worship, how will you become worthy of God?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why worship stone, or brass, or an alloy of eight metals, if there is no feeling behind it? Feeling alone is the cause; feeling alone is the cause; this is called the means of liberation. What good is a rosary at your neck if you keep chanting the pleasures of the senses? What good is a scholar's fine speech if it only swells with pride in its letters? What good is skillful singing if the mind inside stays dirty and crooked? Tuka says: if there is no true feeling behind your service, how will you become worthy of God?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips worship down to its one essential and repeats it for emphasis: feeling, bhava, is the cause, and it is the very means of liberation. The outward forms by themselves prove nothing. A rosary at the neck counts for nothing if the heart is busy chanting its cravings; learned speech only inflates pride; even beautiful singing is hollow if the mind behind it is impure. Each example shows a respectable religious form being used as a cover for an unchanged heart. The closing question turns it on the listener, and on oneself: without real feeling in the service, what makes you fit to stand before God?

GATHA 2815 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, guard the inner sweetness

मराठी मूळ

अंतरींचें गोड । राहें आवडीचें कोड ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे अभावना । भावीं मूळ तें पतना॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What is sweet within the chitta, let it remain as the cherished delight of love. Contact with the outer world brings virtues and faults that disturb the mind.

The subtle ways of propriety are not known to all. Says Tuka, disbelief within is the root of downfall, even amid outward devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What is sweet within, let it stay as the cherished delight of love. Rubbing against the world brings virtues and faults that break the mind. The fitting ways of things are not understood by everyone. Tuka says: disbelief within is the root of the fall, even where there is outward devotion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is counseling care for the tender inner life of devotion. There is a sweetness within, the delight of love for God, and he says to keep it safe and let it stay. Friction with the outer world stirs up judgments of good and bad in others and can shatter that inner peace; what is truly fitting is a subtlety most people miss. So the real danger is not outward failure but a lack of faith inside. He warns that even a person who performs devotion outwardly will fall if disbelief sits at the root, because the sweetness he told us to guard cannot survive there.

GATHA 2816 Faith and Trust

Faith, the sprout shows the fruit

मराठी मूळ

शिळा जया देव । तैसा फळे त्याचा भाव ॥1॥
होय जतन तें गोड । अंतरा येती नाड ॥ध्रु.॥
देव जोडे भावें । इच्छेचें तें प्रेम घ्यावें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे मोड दावी । तैशीं फळें आलीं व्हावीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To one for whom a stone is God, God rewards according to that faith. What is held dear with care becomes sweet; those who come between are obstacles.

God is won through feeling; the love of a sincere wish should be accepted. Says Tuka, the sprout reveals what fruit will follow.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To the one for whom a stone is God, God rewards according to that faith. What is kept with care turns sweet; those who come in between are obstacles. God is won through feeling; take up the love of a sincere wish. Tuka says: the sprout shows what fruit will come.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes faith, not the object, the thing that counts. If a person holds even a plain stone as God, God answers that faith and rewards it accordingly, which is why what we tend with care turns sweet. People who come between, sowing doubt, are obstacles to that ripening. God is reached by feeling, so the sincere longing of the heart is what to take up and hold. He ends with a simple farmer's image: just as the first sprout already tells you what fruit the plant will bear, the faith you plant now decides what it will grow into.

GATHA 2817 The Nature of God

Surrender, the puppeteer God

मराठी मूळ

कासया जी ऐसा माझे माथां ठेवा । भार तुह्मी देवा संतजन ॥1॥
विचित्र विंदानी नानाकळा खेळ । नाचवी पुतळे नारायण ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे करी निमित्य चि आड । चेष्टवूनि जड दावी पुढें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why, O God and saints, have You placed this burden upon my head? The Lord of wondrous design plays manifold arts and makes the puppets dance. What power did the monkeys possess in their own bodies? Yet stones floated on the water by His will.

Says Tuka, He merely places a pretext before the world, and through it makes even the inert move and act.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why have you set this weight on my head, O God, O saints? You carry it. The Lord of strange and wondrous skill plays his countless games; Narayana makes the puppets dance. What strength was in the monkeys' own bodies? Yet stones floated on the water by his will. Tuka says: he only sets up a pretext as a screen; he stirs even the dull and lifeless thing and makes it act before us.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is handing back a burden he was never carrying alone. He asks why the work was laid on his head, then answers his own question: God is the one moving everything. The monkeys did not float the stones at Lanka by their own power; the power was Narayana's, working through them. So God uses each creature as a pretext, a screen to act behind, and makes even the inert move. The point lands on the devotee: what looks like my doing is his doing, so the weight is his to carry, not mine.

GATHA 2818 The Saints

Surrender, the favored child

मराठी मूळ

पायां पडावें हें माझें भांडवल । सरती हे बोल कोठें पायीं ॥1॥
तरि हे सलगी कवतुक केलें । लडिवाळ धाकुलें असें बाळ ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे माझें उचित हे सेवा । नये करूं ठेवाठेवी कांहीं॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Falling at your feet is my only capital; these words of mine count for nothing beside your grace. If I have taken any liberty, it is the playful daring of a small and favored child.

What is lacking in the home of the saints? This is well known to all. Says Tuka, service is my rightful offering; one should not hoard anything away from it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Falling at your feet is all the capital I have; what are these words of mine, set beside your feet? If I have been too familiar, it was only play, the fond daring of a small, pampered child. What is ever lacking in the house of you saints? This is known to everyone. Tuka says: my proper place is service; I should hoard nothing back from it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures his whole worth and finds it is only his fallen-at-the-feet posture, not his words. He admits he has taken liberties with the saints, but frames it the way a small, indulged child takes liberties with a loving home: it is play, not insolence. He reminds himself that the saints' house lacks nothing, so he is not bringing them anything they need. What he owes is simple: to serve, and to keep nothing of himself back from that service.

GATHA 2819 Prayers

Prayer, laying down the burden

मराठी मूळ

वदवावी वाणी माझी कृपावंता । वागपुष्प संतां समर्पीशी ॥1॥
सर्वसंकटाचा तुह्मां परिहार । घालावा म्यां भार पांडुरंगा ॥ध्रु.॥
एकसरें चिंता ठेवूनियां पायीं । जालों उतराई होतों तेणें ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O gracious One, make my tongue speak and offer these word-flowers to the saints. All my difficulties are resolved by placing the burden upon You, O Panduranga.

Having laid all my cares at once at Your feet, I have become free of what weighed me down.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Make my tongue speak, O gracious one; offer these flowers of words to the saints. You are the one who removes every trouble; let me lay the whole weight on you, Panduranga. Setting all my care at once at your feet, I have paid my debt; by this I am made free.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks for the very words he is speaking, naming his speech as God's gift and his praise as flowers offered to the saints. Then he does the thing the prayer is for: he puts his whole load of trouble on Panduranga, who is the one who clears every difficulty. The relief comes not from solving the troubles but from handing them over. Once the care is set down at the feet, the account is settled and the weight is gone.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Bowing at your feet is my rightful duty; my welfare lies in your blessings. The flood of your grace cannot be contained within my chitta, and so these words pour out in seeming impertinence.

Your leftovers are my feast; sweeping the courtyard of your refuse is my honor. Yet I lack the merit to embrace your feet in a lasting hold.

Says Tuka, the saints have been so kind that their memory abides forever in my chitta.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Bowing at your feet is what is right for me; my good lies in your blessing. The flood of your grace will not fit inside me, and so these words spill out as if backwards. Your leftovers are my meal; let me sweep your courtyard clean of its refuse. But I have no such merit in hand that my embrace could close around your feet. Tuka says: the memory stays fixed in my heart; such grace you saints have shown me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram places himself at the lowest serving rung before the saints, and means it as honor, not shame. He eats their leftovers and sweeps their yard because being near them at all is his welfare. The strange, overflowing words come from grace too large to hold inside him. He confesses he lacks the merit to grasp their feet and keep them, yet says the saints gave him the one thing that lasts anyway: their memory, fixed permanently in his heart.

GATHA 2821 The Nature of God

Grace, the mother's love

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Does not a mother cherish her child? Does she not tenderly indulge its every whim? Does she not serve the child's needs? Is not everything she does for the child's good? She feels no disgust at its uncleanliness; she lifts it up and holds it to her bosom. She adorns it with ornaments from her own body and rejoices upon seeing it.

Says Tuka, I am unworthy of praise, yet you elders feel the dignity of caring for your own. Let a stone fall upon my self-importance; let this name of mine burn away.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Does a mother not cherish her child? Does she not tend its every want? Does she not do it service? Is anything she does not for its good? She feels no disgust at its filth; she lifts it in her arms and holds it to her throat. She dresses it in ornaments from her own body, and is filled with joy to see it. Tuka says: I am not fit to be praised, but the great honor of caring for your own is yours. Let a stone fall on my I-ness; let this name of mine burn away.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram explains God's care for the unworthy by holding up the plainest picture of love there is: a mother with her infant. She is not repelled by the child's dirt, she serves it, dresses it, lifts it to her body, and rejoices simply to look at it, and none of this depends on the child deserving it. So God's grace toward him is not earned; it is the dignity of caring for one's own. The poem ends turning on himself: let the self-importance be crushed under a stone, let his own name burn, since the love was never about him being worthy.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My sins are beyond measure, mountains of sorrow. I have become a burden upon this earth.

How much disgrace shall I recount? The suffering is enough to split a stone. All people, high and low, turn away from my face.

Slander, malice, betrayal, hypocrisy, and more besides. Intoxicated by wealth, I committed grave offenses.

I disregarded my father's word and acted with thoughtless cruelty. My tongue cannot speak further, and my mind trembles.

I had no compassion, no gratitude, no steadiness of speech; I was vile and base in sensual pursuits. O great saints, hear these words.

Through faults and folly my sins have multiplied. Says Tuka, settle my account in Panduranga's name. I have come to surrender, O Mother and Father.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My sins have no shore; they are mountains of sorrow. I have become a weight on this earth. How much shame shall I tell? The pain is enough to split a stone. All people, high and low, will not look at my face. Slander, malice, betrayal, breaking of trust, and how much more shall I name? Drunk on wealth, I committed grave wrongs. I disregarded my father's word; I acted blind and rash; I was crooked, foul, quarrelsome, fit to be blamed. How many more faults shall I tell? My tongue will not turn, my mind shakes. I had no mercy for living things, no gratitude, no steadiness in my word; I was low, a slave to my senses. Saints, great souls, hear these words. By faults and folly my sins have grown huge. Tuka says: set my account right in Panduranga, I have come to surrender, O Mother and Father.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out the whole ledger of his failings without softening any of it: slander, betrayal, pride in wealth, defiance of his father, cruelty, slavery to the senses. He does not perform humility; he names the pattern honestly, to the point where his tongue stalls and his mind trembles. But the long confession is not despair, it is the price of admission. Having seen that his sins are mountains beyond counting, he stops trying to clear them himself and brings the unpayable account to Panduranga, taking refuge as a child runs to its mother and father. The model is plain: name the wrong fully, then surrender it rather than excuse it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Both the daughter and the Lord were exchanged in the night. Joy overflowed with joy, for Govinda was born.

The bonds of Vasudeva and Devaki were broken at His sight. The pure, unmanifest Brahman came to Gokul.

Blessed Nanda and Yashoda beheld the Lord. On the eighth night of the dark moon, the divine cowherd was born.

The earth rejoiced, for its entire burden was lifted. Says Tuka, a noose was drawn tight around Kamsa's fate.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the night the two were switched, the girl-child and the wielder of the discus. Joy overflowed with joy: Govinda had come down. The chains broke; Vasudeva and Devaki saw him. The pure unmanifest Brahman, beautiful, had come to Gokul. Blessed Nanda and Yashoda saw Shripati. The birth-hour was at night; on the eighth the cowherd came. The earth rejoiced, for all its weight was lifted. Tuka says: around Kamsa a noose was drawn tight.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sings the night of Krishna's birth as the moment the whole earth's burden is lifted. He keeps the well-known turns of the story: the swap of the baby girl for the infant Krishna, the prison chains falling open, Vasudeva and Devaki given their first sight of him, and the child reaching Gokul to Nanda and Yashoda's joy. The point he presses is that this newborn is the unmanifest Brahman taken visible form. And the same birth that brings joy is already the end of the tyrant: with Krishna's coming the noose has begun to close on Kamsa.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The knots of their chittas came undone at the sight of Krishna. The women performed the welcoming ritual, offering their very jiva as a gift.

From the moment of His birth, His beauty enchanted everyone. Says Tuka, there one woman rushes in, only to be overtaken by another.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The knots came loose; at the sight, a meeting with Krishna. The women perform the welcoming rite; they give their very life and feeling as the offering. From the moment he was born, his forms enchanted them all. Tuka says: there one woman crowds in, and then another past her.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram watches the women of Gokul come to see the newborn Krishna, and what loosens in them is the inner knot, the tight grip of the separate self. Their welcome-ritual is not a formality: the gift they pour out is their own jiva, their life and feeling. His beauty has drawn every one of them from the first instant of his birth. The closing image is the crush at the door, one woman pressing forward and the next overtaking her, all pulled by the same enchantment.

Krishna's darshan, self emptied

मराठी मूळ

मुख डोळां पाहे । तैशी च ते उभी राहे ॥1॥
केल्याविण नव्हे हातीं । धरोनि आरती परती ॥ध्रु.॥
न धरिती मनीं। कांहीं संकोच दाटणी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणें देवें । ओस केल्या देहभावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Each woman gazes upon His face and remains standing just as she is. Nothing can be gained without holding out the lamp of worship and then stepping back.

They harbor no hesitation or restraint in their minds. Says Tuka, the Lord has emptied them entirely of body-consciousness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

She gazes at his face with her eyes, and stays standing just as she is. It cannot come into her hands without the doing: she holds out the lamp of worship, then steps back. They hold no hesitation in their minds, no crowding shyness. Tuka says: the Lord has emptied them of body-feeling.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram catches the moment one of the women is stopped still by Krishna's face, rooted where she stands. The waving of the lamp and the stepping back is the gesture of worship, the only way the darshan is received. What he notes is the absence of self-consciousness: no shyness, no holding back, no awareness of the body at all. That is the work of the Lord, who has emptied them of the body-sense, so nothing of the small self stands between them and him.

Gokul's joy, captivated by Govinda

मराठी मूळ

गोकुळीच्या सुखा । अंतपार नाहीं लेखा ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The joy of Gokul is beyond count or measure. The child Krishna is in Nanda's home; men and women are filled with delight.

They raise festive banners and arches, tell stories, and sing songs. Says Tuka, by this charm Govinda has captivated them all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The joy of Gokul has no end, no measure that can count it. The child Krishna is in Nanda's house; the men and women are full of delight. They raise festive poles and arches, they tell the story, they sing the song. Tuka says: by this play Govinda has caught them all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the whole village swept into a joy too large to count, all of it gathered around the child Krishna in Nanda's home. The festival banners, the arches, the storytelling and singing are the outward shape of a delight that has no edge. The deeper note is in the last line: this is not ordinary celebration but capture. By his charm and play Govinda has taken hold of every one of them, so their joy is really his pull on them.

Krishna's justice, the false within

मराठी मूळ

विटंबिलें भट । दिला पाठीवरी पाट ॥1॥
खोटें जाणोनि अंतर । न साहे चि विश्वंभर ॥ध्रु.॥
तें चि करी दान । जैसें आइके वचन ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे देवें । पूतना शोषियेली जीवें॥3॥ ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He humiliated the deceitful priest, placing a slab upon his back. The Lord of the universe cannot abide what is false within.

He gives only what accords with the words He hears. Says Tuka, the Lord drained Putana of her very life.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He shamed the priest and laid a slab on his back. Knowing the heart was false, Vishvambhara will not bear it. He gives exactly what matches the words he hears. Tuka says: the Lord drained Putana of her very life.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns to Krishna as the one who cannot abide falseness inside a person. He gives back to each exactly what their inner words deserve: humiliation and a stone on the back for the deceitful priest, and death drawn out of Putana, who came in a nurse's guise with poison in her breast. The stress is not on cruelty but on truth: the Lord who fills all things reads the heart, not the show. The warning lands on the listener to examine what is actually inside, since that, not the outward act, is what he answers.

GATHA 2828 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, love that dissolves the self

मराठी मूळ

प्रेम देवाचें देणें । देहभाव जाय जेणें । न धरावी मनें। शुद्धी देशकाळाची ॥1॥
मुक्त लज्जाविरहित । भाग्यवंत हरिभक्त। जाले वोसंडत । नामकीर्तिनपवाडे ॥ध्रु.॥

हे चि वाहाती संकल्प । पुण्यप्रसंगाचे जप । तुका ह्मणे पाप । गांवीं नाहीं हरिजना ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Love is God's gift; it is that which dissolves body-consciousness. In that state one should not cling to notions of place, time, or purity.

Blessed are the devotees of Hari who are freed from shame, overflowing with the glory of the Name. They have gained an imperishable union; having been born, they became servants of Hari.

For them there is no return to the womb; they revel in the supreme Brahman. They carry only holy resolves; their chanting is the recitation of auspicious occasions.

Says Tuka, sin does not exist in the village of those who belong to Hari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Love is God's gift; by it the body-feeling falls away. In that state the mind should not cling to purity of place or time. Freed, without shame, the lovers of Hari are blessed; they have overflowed in the songs and glory of the Name. The gain they have won cannot perish; having been born, they became servants of Hari. For them there is no return to the womb; they delight in the supreme Brahman. They carry only holy resolves; their chanting is the telling of sacred things. Tuka says: in the village of those who belong to Hari, sin does not live.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names love as something given by God, not worked up by effort, and its mark is that the body-sense drops away. Once it does, the old anxious bookkeeping about clean places and right times no longer binds the mind. The lovers of Hari lose their shame and overflow into the Name; what they have gained is imperishable, and being born this once, they will not be born into the womb again. The closing claim is radical and meant to stay sharp: where people truly belong to Hari, sin simply has no home.

Social criticism, the false guru

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He alone is a good man among liars who says, 'I have seen God.' How can the bonds of worldly existence be destroyed through the teachings of such pretenders? Puffed up with pride, they drag others down along with themselves. Says Tuka, there is no equal to the folly of those who wish to be called God, nor should one trust the words of such self-proclaimed leaders.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Only one liar among them is good: the one who says, 'I have seen God.' How can such teachers cut the bonds of this world? Puffed up with pride, they drag others down along with themselves. Tuka says: there is no folly to match these fools who want to be called God; and you should not trust the words of these so-called great ones.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is turning his scorn on the self-appointed spiritual teacher who claims to have seen God when he has not. He calls such a man the worst kind of liar, because his lie is dressed as the highest truth. A teacher still bound himself cannot loosen anyone's bonds; swollen with pride, he sinks and pulls his followers down with him. The test the poem implies is honest self-examination: do not chase the man who advertises his own greatness, and do not crave that title yourself.

GATHA 2830 The Necessity of Experience

Experience over hearsay

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who has truly become God in one's own being sees all people as God. Others should simply tell their worn-out tales to entertain the mind.

One who is satisfied does not feel another's hunger and thirst; one who is happy looks at the world through the eyes of one's own happiness. Says Tuka, what is needed here is direct experience. The grandeur of mere words is of no real use.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One who has truly become God in his own being sees all people as God. The rest only tell their tired stories to amuse the mind. A full man does not feel another's hunger and thirst; a happy man looks at the world through his own happiness. Tuka says: what is needed here is direct experience. The grandeur of mere words is of no use.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is drawing a hard line between realization and talk. The one who has actually become God sees God in everyone; everyone else is just retelling worn-out tales to entertain the mind. He names the danger of secondhand spirituality with a homely image: a man whose own belly is full cannot feel your hunger, and a man comfortable in his own happiness reads the whole world through it, blind to what he has not lived. The point lands on the listener: weigh teachings by lived experience, not by the splendor of the words, and ask whether your own knowing is tasted or merely borrowed.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why not sit and attend the sacred narrative? Listen, O devotees: Panduranga Himself stands present there. Therefore have courage, and with focused attention listen attentively, you who seek to cross the ocean of worldly existence.

During the discourse, not even the slightest irrelevant word should be spoken; the chittas of God and His devotees should merge in unison. Why should one honor a Vaishnava? Hear this: whosoever bows with devotion and places the dust of their feet upon one's head is worthy of reverence.

Know this with certainty: God belongs to the Vaishnavas. He remains aloof and detached for their sake alone.

Says Tuka, rolling on the ground and prostrating, I bow and place upon my head the dust from the saints' feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why not sit and attend the sacred telling? Listen, O hearers: Panduranga himself stands present there. So take courage, and with fixed and eager attention listen, you who want to cross the ocean of this world. During the telling, not one stray word should be spoken; the minds of God and his devotees should merge as one. Why should one honor a Vaishnava? Hear this: whoever bows with love and sets the dust of their feet on his head is worthy of reverence. Know this for certain: God belongs to the Vaishnavas. He stays aloof and detached for their sake alone. Tuka says: rolling on the ground, prostrate, I bow and place the dust from the saints' feet on my head.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is calling people into the kirtan and naming what it truly is: a place where Panduranga himself stands present, not a mere performance. So he asks for the right way to be there, courage and fixed attention, and silence from idle talk, so that the listeners' minds merge with God's in a single current. He then explains why a Vaishnava deserves honor: not for rank but for humble love, the one who lays the dust of others' feet on his own head. The closing claim is bold and tender at once: God is bound to his devotees, and Tukaram makes himself the lowest of them, prostrate, taking the dust of the saints' feet onto his head.

GATHA 2832 The Necessity of Experience

The witness of lived experience

मराठी मूळ

अनुभवें आलें अंगा । तें या जगा देतसें ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What has come through direct experience, that I offer to the world. These are not secondhand words; they spring from the living sap within.

What has been distilled with effort can only be rightly tested by the pure of taste. Says Tuka, there is nothing else to add; this is the witness my life has given.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What has come to me through direct experience, that I give to the world. These are not borrowed words; their root is the living moisture within. What has been distilled with effort can only be rightly tested by those of pure taste. Tuka says: there is nothing else to add; this is the witness my life has given.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is staking everything on the source of his words. He offers the world only what has passed through his own experience, not phrases picked up secondhand; he says their root is the wet, living sap of the inner heart, not dry repetition. He admits that what he has distilled can only be judged by those who themselves have a pure palate for it. The poem ends as a sworn statement: there is nothing more to add, because his own life is the witness standing behind every word.

GATHA 2833 The Moral Ideal

The aspirant's discipline

मराठी मूळ

साधकाची दशा उदास असावी । उपाधि नसावी अंतर्बाही ॥1॥
लोलुपता काय निद्रेतें जिणावें । भोजन करावें परमित ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे ऐसा साधनीं जो राहे । तो चि ज्ञान लाहे गुरुकृपा ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The state of a spiritual aspirant should be one of detachment, free from entanglement both within and without. One must conquer greed for sleep and eat only in moderation.

In solitude, in public, or with women, one should not speak freely even if it costs one's life. Keep the company of the good, let the Name be ever on your tongue, and let the sound of kirtan resound day and night.

Says Tuka, one who remains steadfast in such practice is the one who attains true knowledge by the guru's grace.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The seeker's state should be one of detachment, with no entanglement inside or outside. Conquer the craving for sleep; eat only in measure. Alone, in company, or with women, do not speak loosely even if it costs your life. Keep the company of the good, let the Name be spoken, let the sound of kirtan ring out day and night. Tuka says: the one who holds steady in such practice, he alone gains true knowledge by the guru's grace.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is laying out the plain discipline of a serious seeker, not lofty doctrine but daily conduct. Detachment within and without, mastery over sleep and appetite, and strict guard over the tongue, especially loose talk with women, which he says one should refuse even at the cost of life. The positive side is just as concrete: stay near good people, keep the Name on the lips, let kirtan sound around the clock. The closing line names the stakes: knowledge is not won by cleverness but by holding steady in this practice, and even then it comes as the guru's grace, not as a thing one seizes.

GATHA 2834 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the formless on the brick

मराठी मूळ

अंतरींची ज्योती प्रकाशली दीप्त । मुळींची जे होती आच्छादिली ॥1॥

तुरा ह्मणे आह्मां ब्रह्मांड पंढरी । प्रेमाची जे थोरी सांठवण ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The inner light has blazed forth in radiance, the light that was hidden from the very beginning. The bliss found there cannot be contained within the entire universe; to what can one compare such joy? What was churned through devotion has been distilled as the formless Absolute, and it stands upon the brick at Pandhari.

Says Tuka, for us the whole cosmos is Pandhari; it is the storehouse of the greatness of love.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The inner light has blazed into radiance, the light that was hidden from the very start. The bliss there cannot fit inside the whole universe; to what shall I compare such joy? What devotion churned, the formless gathered into itself, and it stands here upon the brick. Tuka says: for us the whole cosmos is Pandhari, the storehouse of the greatness of love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing the moment realization breaks open. A light that was always there, hidden from the beginning, blazes inside him, and the bliss of it overflows anything the cosmos could hold, so he gives up trying to find a comparison. Then he makes the great turn of his bhakti: the formless Absolute, churned out by devotion itself, has chosen to stand with form on the brick at Pandhari. The closing claim widens that until the whole universe becomes Pandhari, because wherever such love is stored, there the Lord stands present.

GATHA 2835 Longing and Separation

Longing, the useless body without God

मराठी मूळ

कासया गा मज घातलें संसारीं । चित्त पायांवरी नाहीं तुझ्या ॥1॥
कासया गा मज घातलें या जन्मा । नाहीं तुझा प्रेमा नित्य नवा ॥ध्रु.॥
तुका ह्मणे माझी जळो जळो काया । विठ्ठला सखया वांचूनियां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why, O Lord, have You cast me into this worldly life when my chitta does not rest upon Your feet? Why have You given me this birth if I do not feel ever-fresh love for You? Says Tuka, let this body of mine burn, burn away, if it be without You, O Vitthal, my beloved friend.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why, O Lord, have you cast me into this worldly life, when my mind does not rest on your feet? Why have you given me this birth, if I have no ever-fresh love for you? Tuka says: let this body of mine burn, burn away, if it is without you, Vitthal, my dear friend.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is pressing a complaint that is really a longing. He asks the Lord why he was thrown into the world and given a birth at all, if his mind will not stay on those feet and his love does not stay ever new. The questions are not idle; they make clear that he sees no point to existence apart from God. The final line is the sharp edge of that ache: he would rather his own body burn to nothing than go on living without Vitthal, the friend he cannot do without.

GATHA 2836 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender to destiny, worship instead

मराठी मूळ

प्रारब्धें चि जोडे धन । प्रारब्धें चि वाडे मान ॥1॥
सोस करिसी वांयां । भज मना पंढरीराया ॥ध्रु.॥
प्रारब्धें चि होय सुख। प्रारब्धें चि पावे दुःख ॥2॥
प्रारब्धें चि भरे पोट । तुका करीना बोभाट ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Wealth comes by destiny; honor grows by destiny. Your striving is in vain, O mind; worship the Lord of Pandhari.

Happiness arrives by destiny; suffering too comes by destiny. The belly fills by destiny alone.

Says Tuka, make no loud complaint about it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wealth is gained by destiny; honor grows by destiny. Your striving is wasted, O mind; worship the Lord of Pandhari. Happiness comes by destiny; sorrow too comes by destiny. The belly fills by destiny alone. Tuka says: do not cry out and complain about it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is telling the restless mind to stop straining after what is not in its hands. Wealth, honor, pleasure, pain, even a full stomach, all of it comes by prarabdha, the destiny already set in motion, so the effort to grab and arrange it is wasted. With that energy freed, he redirects the mind to the one thing worth doing: worship the Lord of Pandhari. The closing line cuts off the natural reaction of grievance: do not make a loud complaint about your lot, but let it be and turn to God.

GATHA 2837 Confession and Sin

Confession, the danger of praise

मराठी मूळ

हीन माझी याति । वरी स्तुती केली संतीं ॥1॥
अंगीं वसूं पाहे गर्व । माझें हरावया सर्व ॥ध्रु.॥
मी एक जाणता । ऐसें वाटतसे चित्ता ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My caste is lowly, yet the saints have praised me. Now pride seeks to enter my being and rob me of everything.

The thought arises in my mind that I alone am wise. Says Tuka, protect me, protect me, O Lord of Pandhari, lest I be ruined.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My birth is lowly, yet the saints have praised me. Now pride wants to settle in me and rob me of everything. The thought rises in my mind that I alone am wise. Tuka says: save me, save me, Lord of Pandhari, or I am ruined.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is confessing a danger that comes not from failure but from honor. He knows his birth is humble, yet the saints have praised him, and that very praise is now breeding pride that threatens to steal all he has gained. He catches the precise lie pride whispers: that he alone is the one who knows. Instead of trusting himself to handle it, he cries to the Lord of Pandhari to protect him, naming the plain stakes: left to this pride, he will be ruined, and only God can hold him.

GATHA 2838 The Power of the Name

The Name, austerity made needless

मराठी मूळ

तपाचे सायास । न लगे घेणें वनवास ॥1॥
ऐसें कळलें आह्मां एक । जालों नामाचे धारक ॥ध्रु.॥
जाळीं महाकर्में । दावीं निजसुख धर्में ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे येणें । किळकाळ तें ठेंगणें॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The labor of austerities and the ordeal of forest exile are not needed. This much has become clear to us: we have become bearers of the Name.

It burns away the mightiest karmas and reveals the bliss of one's true nature. Says Tuka, by this Name, even Death is brought low.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The labor of austerities is not needed, nor any exile in the forest. This one thing has become clear to us: we have become bearers of the Name. It burns up the mightiest deeds and shows the bliss of one's own true nature. Tuka says: by this, even Death is made small.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is setting the Name against the hard old roads to liberation. The grinding austerities and the long retreat into the forest are not required; the one thing that has become plain to him is simpler and greater, that he and his fellows now carry the Name. He claims the Name does what those labors aimed at: it burns away even the heaviest accumulated karma and uncovers the bliss that is one's own nature. The final stroke names the highest stake: held against the Name, even Death stands diminished and small.

GATHA 2839 Prayers

Prayer, all in God's hands

मराठी मूळ

माता कापी गळा । तेथें कोण राखी बाळा ॥1॥
हें कां नेणां नारायणा । मज चाळवितां दिना ॥ध्रु.॥
नागवी धावणें । तेथें साहए व्हावें कोणें ॥2॥

तुझ्या केल्याविण । नव्हे ि◌स्थर वश जन ॥4॥
तुका ह्मणे हरी। सूत्र तुह्मां हातीं दोरी॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When a mother herself cuts her child's throat, who will protect the infant? Do You not know this, O Narayana? Why do You toy with this helpless one? When the very guide leads one astray, who can come to the rescue? When the king himself plunders everything, who else can intervene? Without Your will, no one can be made still and obedient. Says Tuka, O Hari, the string and the thread of this puppet-show are in Your hands.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the mother herself cuts the throat, who will protect the child? Do you not know this, Narayana, that you toy with this helpless one? When the rescuer himself strips you bare, who is there to help? When the king himself plunders all, who else can stop it? Without your doing, no one is made steady or obedient. Tuka says: Hari, the strings and the cord are in your hands.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praying out of total helplessness, and he says it with stark images. If the very mother kills the child, there is no protector left; if the rescuer robs you, the king plunders you, then no other refuge exists. He is telling Narayana that God is exactly such a one, the only source of safety, and so it is cruel to play with a helpless devotee. The closing line resolves the complaint into surrender: nothing in him grows steady or obedient on its own, for the strings of this puppet are entirely in Hari's hands, so whatever happens to him is God's to do.

GATHA 2840 The Power of the Name

The Name that saved the fallen

मराठी मूळ

पृथिवी तारिली पाताळासी जातां। तुका ह्मणे आतां आह्मी किती ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I do not know how to sing, yet I will sing something and surrender to Panduranga. He is the Lord of the universe and I am His own; what can Yama and his servants do to me? By His Name alone, the courtesan was purified, and Ajamila, that heap of sin, was saved.

By the dust of His feet Ahalya was delivered, and Kubja was made beautiful in an instant. When the earth was sinking into the abyss, He saved her.

Says Tuka, if He rescued all of them, how much more easily can He save us?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I do not know how to sing, yet I will sing something and go for refuge to Panduranga. I am the servant of the Lord of the universe; what can the messengers of Yama do to me? By his Name the courtesan was carried across, and Ajamila, that heap of sin, was saved. By the dust of his feet Ahalya was delivered; Kubja was made beautiful in a moment. He saved the earth as she sank into the abyss. Tuka says: if he saved all of them, how much are we?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram begins by disowning any skill: he cannot really sing, but he will sing anyway and take refuge in Panduranga, because what he lacks the Lord supplies. Owning himself as the servant of the Lord of all worlds, he asks what Yama's death-messengers could possibly do to one who belongs to God. Then he piles up the old rescues, the courtesan, the sinner Ajamila, Ahalya, Kubja, the sinking earth, to show how far that saving power reaches, even to the most fallen. The closing turn is his comfort and ours: if God lifted all of those, then we are a small thing for him to save.

GATHA 2841 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the hollow holy man

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A trumpet made of a carrot: such are these newly-minted holy men. Through their reading and recitation they have only nourished their ego.

Their knowledge is meager, yet their pride and arrogance are immense. Says Tuka, such rascals deserve to have their mouths struck shut.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A trumpet made from a carrot: that is what these new holy men are. What did their reading do? It only fed their pride and kept it safe. Their knowledge is small; their stiffness and self-importance are large. Tuka says: such rascals deserve to have their mouths struck shut.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is mocking the freshly made ascetic whose holiness is all noise and no substance. A carrot trumpet looks like an instrument but cannot sound; the new jogi looks pious but is empty inside. He points out the trap directly: their study did not dissolve the ego, it nourished it, so the more they recite the prouder they grow. The aim of the warning is not to despise any particular man but to expose the pattern in which learning becomes a costume for arrogance, and to make us check whether our own practice is feeding the very self it claims to undo.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who covets another's wealth and another's wife, yet makes a show of piety by holding his nose in pious disdain: let such conduct burn. Like a donkey carrying a useless load, his observances are vain.

He sits in pretended composure, yet is polluted within by anger. Says Tuka, he merely puts on an outward display of color.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He covets another man's wealth and another man's wife, then holds his nose in pious disgust. Let such conduct burn. He carries a useless load, like a donkey. He sits as if calm, but inside his mind is fouled with anger. Tuka says: it is a costume. He shows only the color on the outside.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the inner reality against the outward show and lets the gap condemn the man. Someone greedy for money and lusting after another's wife performs disgust at impurity, as if he were the clean one. Tukaram calls his observances a dead weight, like a donkey hauling a load that benefits no one, because rituals without an inner change accomplish nothing. The pretended composure hides a heart polluted by anger; the holiness is only paint on the surface. The poem turns us toward our own divided life, where the face we present and the mind we carry do not match.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

With tall marks on the forehead and an imposing cap he proclaims, 'In all the world, I alone am a true renunciant.' It is all surface decoration, while desire for sense-pleasures has made its home within. He brands himself with ritual seals only to gain respect among people.

Says Tuka, countless such people have gone to hell, and more shall follow.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He shows a tall forehead mark and a high cap: in all the world, he says, I alone am a true renunciant. It is all surface decoration. Inside, desire for the senses has made its home. He brands himself with ritual marks only to win respect from people. Tuka says: countless such people have gone to hell, and more are going.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips the badges of renunciation down to what they are doing: buying status. The big forehead mark, the imposing cap, the branded seals all advertise a holiness that the inner man does not have, since sense-craving is still settled in the heart. The marks exist for the audience, to be honored by people, not to please God. The closing line is deliberately heavy: this road of religious display leads not upward but to hell, and the crowd taking it is endless. The poem asks whether our own observances are aimed at being seen or at being changed.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Such are the saints produced by this age of Kali: a tobacco pipe hangs from their lips. They have drowned their daily prayers and ablutions and have taken up hemp instead.

Hemp-eating and intoxicants are their spiritual practice, leading them inevitably to drink liquor. Says Tuka, it is all a masquerade; how could Panduranga be found there?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

These are the saints the age of Kali has made: a tobacco pipe hangs from the mouth. They have drowned their bath and their daily prayers, and put hemp in their place. Hemp and intoxicants are their practice; in the end it lands them in drink. Tuka says: it is all a costume. How can Panduranga be there?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a degraded holiness where intoxication has replaced devotion. The pipe in the mouth, the abandoned ablutions and prayers, the hemp taken as if it were spiritual practice, the slide into liquor: these are named plainly as what the age throws up in the shape of saints. He calls the whole thing a masquerade, a performance with no inner ground. The final question is the point: where the disciplines are drowned and the senses are drugged, Panduranga, the living God, simply is not present. The poem measures any practice by whether God can actually be found in it.

Social criticism, birth versus conduct

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One born of promiscuity has no lineage to speak of, no father's house nor mother's house, only adultery ruling chitta and mind. Even when the rightful husband is at her side in bed, her mind wanders to another's door.

Says Tuka, if you claim noble birth, then know that those who stake everything on caste alone end up eating dirt.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A woman born of a loose line has no lineage to name, no house of her own and no father's house, only adultery in her chitta and her mind. Even with her rightful husband beside her in bed, her mind goes to another man's door. Tuka says: if you boast of high birth, know this: those who stake everything on caste alone end up eating dirt.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses a stark image of an unfaithful woman to attack pride in birth and caste. Her wandering desire, present even when the husband lies beside her, stands for a heart that betrays its true bond no matter its claimed origins. He then turns the knife on the proud of caste: lineage means nothing if conduct is rotten, and those who rest on bloodline alone are brought low, eating dirt. The point is the pattern, not contempt for any person: worth is decided by what the heart actually does, not by the name one is born under, and the boaster should look first at his own faithfulness.

Social criticism, the cruelty of deceit

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To snatch the blind man's staff and push him over a cliff: is that the conduct befitting one who can see? Is there any gain or good in it? To place clay in someone's hand calling it sugar: is that a fair deception? Says Tuka, it is as if one spreads thorns on the path to God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To grab the blind man's staff and push him off the cliff: is that fit conduct for one who can see? Is there any gain in it, any good? To put clay in someone's hand and call it sugar, to cheat him into taking it: is that fair? Tuka says: it is like spreading thorns on the road that leads to God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram condemns the betrayal of those who trust us, especially the weak. Snatching the blind man's stick and shoving him over the edge is the picture of using one's advantage to destroy a helpless person, and he asks flatly what could possibly be gained by it. Handing someone clay while calling it sugar is the everyday version: deceiving the one who relies on your word. He names the cost in spiritual terms: such cruelty and fraud scatter thorns across the very path that goes to God, wounding the deceiver's own journey. The poem holds up honesty toward the trusting as a measure of true conduct.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Between those who love one another, there is no awkwardness of speech; whatever is said, love makes it sweet. So it is between You and me, O Vitthal; with love I sing Your Name.

A child's crooked, lisping words are a wonder and delight to its parents. Says Tuka, may You feel tender compassion for me, O companion of my jiva, my dearest one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Between those who love each other there is no awkwardness in speech; whatever is said, love makes it sweet. So it is between you and me, O Vitthal; with delight I sing your Name. A child's crooked, lisping words are a wonder to its mother and father. Tuka says: let your compassion come to me, O friend of my soul, my dearest one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the freedom that love gives to prayer. Where there is real affection, speech need not be polished; love sweetens whatever is said, and so he sings the Name however it comes. He likens himself to a small child whose broken, half-formed words delight its parents precisely because they are the child's own. On that ground he asks for grace, not as a stranger pleading with a distant power, but as one calling the closest friend of his soul. The poem reframes devotion as intimacy: God does not weigh our words, he loves the one who speaks them.

GATHA 2848 Prayers

Prayer, the helpless plea for grace

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I can see my own faults clearly, yet what can I do? This mind is beyond my control. Now stand before me as a shield, O Narayana; prove true to Your title of Ocean of Mercy.

Says Tuka, I am Your servant, just as I am. Do not cast me aside, O Mother and Father.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I can see my own faults clearly. What can I do? My mind will not be controlled. Now stand in front of me as a shield, O Narayana; make your name, Ocean of Mercy, come true. Tuka says: such as I am, I am your servant. Do not turn away from me, O Mother and Father.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram confesses an honest helplessness: he sees his faults plainly, yet cannot master his own mind. Instead of pretending to fix himself, he throws the whole problem onto God, asking Narayana to stand before him like a shield. He presses God on his own title, Ocean of Mercy, daring him to make the name true by actually showing mercy. He does not claim to be a good servant, only that he is God's, just as he is, flaws and all. The prayer rests entirely on grace and on God's role as parent, asking only not to be cast aside.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One should praise the greatness of Vitthal alone; the fame of mere mortals is not worth telling. Countless people have been born and have died, kings and paupers have come and gone.

No one in all creation takes their name, yet the six scriptures and four Vedas ceaselessly praise the Lord. He is imperishable, immovable, never wavering, never falling.

One should meditate upon that Narayana. Says Tuka, O Vitthal, when one contemplates You, the affliction of birth and death retreats far away.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Praise the greatness of Vitthal alone; the fame of mere men is not worth telling. Countless people have been born and have died; kings and beggars have come and gone. No one in all creation now says their names, yet the six scriptures and the four Vedas praise the Lord without end. He is unfading, unshakable; he never moves, never falls. Meditate on that Narayana. Tuka says: when you hold you in your mind, O Vitthal, the pain of birth and death goes far away.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram weighs human glory against the one thing that lasts. Kings and paupers alike are born, die, and are forgotten; no one in the world still speaks their names. Against this he sets Vitthal, whom the Vedas and scriptures never stop praising, because he alone is imperishable and unmoving, never rising to fall again. The lesson follows from the contrast: spend your attention on what passes and you pass with it, but meditate on Narayana, who endures, and you are joined to what endures. He ends with the promise that holding Vitthal in the mind carries the very pain of birth and death away.

GATHA 2850 Prayers

Prayer, the freedom of the fakir

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not give me children, O God, for in the web of family attachment I will forget You. Do not give me wealth and fortune, for that only brings torment to the soul.

Says Tuka, make me live like a fakir; then Hari will come to my door day and night.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not give me children, O God, for in the web of family love I will forget you. Do not give me wealth and fortune, for that brings only torment to the soul. Tuka says: make me live like a fakir; then Hari will come to my house day and night.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays against the very things most people beg God for. He asks not to be given children, because the bonds of family will tangle his attention and crowd God out of his memory. He asks not to be given riches, because possessions bring not peace but unrest. What he wants instead is the bare life of a fakir, owning nothing, attached to nothing. The reasoning is plain: with the hands and heart empty of the world, there is room for Hari to come and stay, day and night. The poem names the cost of remembering God: letting go of what we are taught to want.

GATHA 2851 The Moral Ideal

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who earns wealth by honest dealing and spends it with a spirit of detachment will surely attain the highest state and enjoy the noblest of births. One who serves others selflessly, never slanders, and regards all women other than one's wife as mothers and sisters; one who shows compassion to all creatures, tends to cows, and offers water to the thirsty in the wilderness; one who remains peaceful, never wishes ill upon anyone, and honors elders: Says Tuka, this is the fruit of a worthy life. The supreme goal and the strength of dispassion belong to such a one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One who earns wealth by honest dealing and spends it with a detached heart will reach the highest state and be born into the noblest of lives. One who helps others and knows no slander; who treats every woman but his wife as a mother or sister; who is kind to all creatures, tends the cows and cattle, and gives water to the thirsty in the wilderness; who stays peaceful, wishes ill on no one, and honors his elders. Tuka says: this is the fruit of a true life; the supreme goal and the strength of dispassion belong to such a one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram draws the portrait of a genuinely good life and tells us what it is worth. The marks are concrete: money earned honestly and held loosely, service without slander, purity in seeing other women as kin, mercy toward animals, water for the thirsty traveler, a peaceful temper, no ill will, respect for elders. None of these is showy; all of them are daily conduct. He calls this the real fruit of human life, and says the highest spiritual goal and the strength of true dispassion grow out of exactly such ordinary virtue. The poem locates the path to God not in display but in steady, honest, compassionate living.

GATHA 2852 The Power of the Name

The Name, even Death trembles

मराठी मूळ

हरि ह्मणतां गति पातकें नासती । किळकाळ कांपती हरि ह्मणतां ॥1॥
हरि ह्मणतां भुक्ति हरि ह्मणतां मुक्ति । चुके यातायाती हरि ह्मणतां ॥ध्रु.॥
तुका ह्मणे भावें जपा हरिचें नाम । मग काळयम शरण तुह्मा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By saying Hari, sins are destroyed and liberation is attained. By saying Hari, even Death trembles.

By saying Hari there is worldly well-being; by saying Hari there is liberation; by saying Hari the cycle of births and deaths is broken. Says Tuka, chant Hari's Name with devotion, and then even Yama and Death will bow down to you.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Say Hari, and sins are destroyed and the soul is freed; say Hari, and even Death trembles. Say Hari, and there is well-being; say Hari, and there is liberation; say Hari, and the round of births and deaths is broken. Tuka says: chant Hari's Name with love, and then Yama and Death will bow at your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram piles up the powers of the Name to show there is nothing it cannot do. Spoken sincerely, Hari's Name burns away sins, frees the soul, and makes even Death shake. The same Name gives worldly good and final liberation alike, and it cuts the long chain of birth and death at the root. The condition he names is devotion: the Name is to be chanted with feeling, not muttered as a charm. To one who does so the order is reversed: Yama, the lord of death who rules all others, comes and bows. The poem hands the helpless a single, sufficient practice.

GATHA 2853 Devotion to Vitthal

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not let the mind be divided; see nothing as separate from God. Let the feet of Vithoba rest in your chitta day and night.

One should not come begging or pleading to anyone for devotion to Hari. Says Tuka, be patient, and the gracious Vithai will surely bestow Her mercy.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not let the mind be divided. See nothing as separate. Keep the feet of Vithoba in your heart, day and night. Do not go begging anyone for devotion to Hari. Tuka says: be patient. The gracious Vithai will give Her mercy.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is laying out the whole discipline of bhakti in a few lines. First, do not split the mind: stop seeing things as separate from God, and let Vithoba's feet stay in your heart through every hour. Then he closes one door that seekers run to: do not go from person to person begging for devotion, as if someone could hand it to you. The only thing asked is patience; the grace is Vithai's to give, and She will give it when the heart waits steady instead of grasping.

GATHA 2854 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, plunder the treasure

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The deity of all the gods stands within the sacred hall. Plunder this treasure, O my people; a pure chitta is the true measure.

Many have plundered this bounty: Shuka, Narada, and all the saints. Says Tuka, as I plunder this divine treasure, Panduranga Himself becomes my helper.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The God of all gods stands here, inside the sacred hall. Plunder this treasure, O my people. A pure heart is the true measure. Many have plundered it: Shuka, Narada, all the saints. Tuka says: as I plunder this treasure, Panduranga Himself became my helper.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns worship into an open robbery that everyone is welcome to join. The deity of all the gods is standing right there in the kirtan hall, and the wealth is His presence, free to be taken. The one currency that buys entry is a pure heart, so the measure is inner sincerity, not rank or learning. He points to Shuka, Narada, and the saints who already carried this treasure off, and then says the strange thing: when he reaches in to plunder it, the Lord Himself helps him do it. Grace does not guard the door against the seeker; it hands over the goods.

GATHA 2855 Longing and Separation

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why have You delayed so long, O merciful Vitthal? Into whose hands have You placed me, and with what assurance do You rest? How long must I hold my patience and keep this mind steady? Says Tuka, my jiva pleads with such longing.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why have You delayed so long, merciful Vitthal? Into whose hands have You left me? What assurance lets You rest? How long must I hold my patience? How long must I keep this mind steady? Tuka says: my jiva is pleading like this.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the cry of a soul that feels abandoned mid-wait. Tukaram asks Vitthal straight out why the help is so late, and protests that he has been handed off to someone else's care, as though God has grown easy and unconcerned. The hard part is the holding: he is trying to keep patience and keep the restless mind steady, and he does not know how much longer he can. The poem does not resolve the wait; it simply names the ache and lays the whole plea at God's feet, which is itself the act of trust underneath the complaint.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Tuka is a madman of indiscretion, babbling on and on. This is the one constant refrain upon his tongue: Rama, Krishna, Hari, Govinda.

He fixes his devotion solely on Panduranga, knowing no other god. Through the guru's knowledge he sees the One in all places and considers nothing else.

He listens to no one's counsel and dances naked at the kirtan. He recoils from worldly comforts and rolls happily in any place at all.

No teaching reaches him; his mouth utters only Vitthal, Vitthal. Though many have tried to shame him, he does the same thing day after day.

O learned scholars, says Tuka, spit on me and cast me out.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Tuka is a mad fool. He babbles on and on. One refrain is always on his tongue: Rama, Krishna, Hari, Govinda. He holds his love on Panduranga. He knows no other god. By the guru's knowledge he sees the One everywhere. He weighs nothing else. He listens to no one's advice. He dances naked at the kirtan. He shrinks from comforts. He rolls happily on any ground. No teaching reaches him. His mouth only says Vitthal, Vitthal. Many have shamed him. Still he does the same thing every day. Tuka says: O learned scholars, spit on me and throw me away.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes himself through the eyes of the respectable world and refuses to defend the picture. By their measure he is a mad babbler who fixes on one God, follows no counsel, dances without shame, despises comfort, and repeats one Name no matter how often he is corrected. The point is that every trait the scholars count as madness is exactly his devotion working: single-minded love, the guru's vision of the One in all, indifference to status. When he invites the learned to spit on him and cast him out, the satire turns on them: their contempt is the proof he is free of the thing they cannot let go of, the need to be respected.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The holy bathing festival has arrived, a windfall for barbers and priests. Though sins lie heaped in crores within, people merely shave their heads and beards on the outside.

What has truly changed by this outward shaving? Tell me what has really been transformed. Where is the proof that sin has departed, when not a single bad trait has been altered? Says Tuka, without heartfelt devotion, all such effort is mere weariness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The great bathing festival has come. It is a windfall for barbers and priests. Inside lie sins by the crore. Outside, people only shave the head and beard. The hair is shaved off; it grows back. Tell me quickly, what has changed? Where is the sign that sin has left, when not one fault has been altered? Tuka says: without heartfelt devotion, all of it is only weariness.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks the assumption that an outward ritual can scrub an inward stain. At the Simhastha festival people shave their heads and beards and pay the priests, but the sins heaped inside them are untouched; the only ones enriched are the barbers and clergy. He drives it home with a plain fact: shaved hair simply grows back, so nothing has actually changed. The test he asks for is moral, not ceremonial: has a single fault in you been altered? Without real devotion of the heart, the whole pilgrimage is just tiring effort that leaves the person exactly as they were. The rebuke is aimed at the empty pattern, and it calls each of us to check our own inside against our outside.

GATHA 2858 The Nature of God

The nature of God, worship of the boundless

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I seat You in a shrine and worship You with offerings, yet fourteen worlds are contained within Your belly. I make You dance as a spectacle, yet You have neither form nor outline.

I sing songs for You, yet You transcend all words. I garland You with flowers, yet You stand apart from all doership.

Says Tuka, now please be gracious, and consider what is truly good for me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I set You in a shrine and worship You with offerings, yet the fourteen worlds lie inside Your belly. I make You dance for sport, yet You have no form, no outline. I sing songs to You, yet You are beyond all words. I hang garlands on You, yet You stand apart from all doing. Tuka says: now be gracious, and consider what is truly good for me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram holds two things at once: the small acts of worship and the immensity of the One they reach toward. He seats God in a shrine, yet that same God holds fourteen worlds in His belly; he makes the image dance, yet the Lord has no form to confine. Every devotional act is shadowed by its own impossibility: songs offered to what is past all words, flowers hung on what stands outside all action. He is not mocking worship but confessing how far the act falls short of its object. So he ends with the only sane request: since You are this boundless, You alone know what is good for me, so decide it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am a heap of sin, a thief of devotion lingering at Your feet. Punish me, O Narayana, and break the willfulness of my mind.

Says Tuka, I am a cheat on both sides.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am a heap of sin. I am a thief of service, loitering at Your feet. Punish me, Narayana. Break the willfulness of my mind. I take service done by others, and take the credit lazily, O God. I am not Yours, and not the world's. Tuka says: I am a cheat on both sides.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a confession with no excuse offered. Tukaram calls himself a heap of sin and, worse, a thief who steals even the appearance of devotion, claiming as his own the service others actually performed. He does not ask to be spared; he asks to be punished, because what he wants broken is the willful, self-serving mind itself. The sharp final charge is that he belongs nowhere: he has not truly given himself to God, and he has not honestly stayed with the world either, so he is a cheat on both sides at once. The point is the kind of merciless self-examination that real surrender begins with.

Longing, set my heart like a debtor's

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Just as one copper coin follows another and trade flows freely, may my meditation upon Your feet, O Hari, flow with the same steady ease. Just as a poor man waits eagerly for an invitation to a feast, and a greedy man counts the days and months until his interest comes due: let my longing for You be like that.

Says Tuka, O Lord of Pandhari, give me no further affliction.

IN PLAIN WORDS

As one coin follows another and the trader's wealth moves freely, let my meditation rest on Your feet, Hari, just like that. As a poor man longs for the feast he is invited to, as a greedy man counts on his fingers the days and months till his interest comes due, let my longing be. Tuka says: Lord of Pandhari, give me no other affliction.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays for a longing as steady and consuming as the world's own appetites. He reaches for unholy images on purpose: money piling on money in trade, a hungry pauper fixed on a promised feast, a lender counting the days until his interest matures. Each one names a desire that never lets the mind wander, and that is exactly the constancy he wants turned toward Vitthal's feet. The honesty is in admitting how reliably greed and hunger hold attention, and asking for that same grip to be aimed at God. His one closing request is to be spared every other affliction, so nothing competes for that focus.

GATHA 2861 The Power of the Name

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I fall at your feet and entreat you all: clap your hands and speak the Name with your mouths. Say Vitthal, Vitthal, again and again; this festival of bliss is not found even in heaven.

Krishna, Vishnu, Hari, Govinda, Gopal: this is the straight road to Vaikuntha. Everyone here has the authority for this; in the age of Kali, deliverance comes through Hari's Name.

Says Tuka, beside the Name dwell all four forms of liberation; so it is declared in the great scriptures.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I fall at your feet and beg you all: clap your hands, speak the Name with your mouths. Say Vitthal, Vitthal, again and again. This festival of joy is not found even in heaven. Krishna, Vishnu, Hari, Govinda, Gopal: this is the straight road to Vaikuntha. Everyone here has the right to it. In the age of Kali, the rescue is Hari's Name. Tuka says: beside the Name stand all four kinds of liberation. So the great scriptures have declared.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is calling everyone into the one practice he trusts above all others. He bows to his listeners and pleads with them simply to clap and chant the Name aloud, because that shared joy outstrips even heaven. The chanting of Krishna, Vishnu, Hari, Govinda, Gopal is the straight, unobstructed road to Vaikuntha, and his radical claim is that everyone holds the right to walk it: no caste, learning, or rank is required, for in the Kali age the Name itself is the rescue. He closes by saying the Name carries all four forms of liberation along with it, and grounds this not in his own authority but in what the scriptures already declare.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

False is the laughter, false is the weeping. False is the leaping about for false things.

False is 'mine,' false is 'yours.' False is the burden carried for what is false. False is the singing, false is the meditating; false is the going toward what is false.

False is the enjoyer, false is the renouncer; the yogi too is false, for the world is illusion. Says Tuka, false is Tuka with false devotion, speaking false words to those who are equally false.

IN PLAIN WORDS

False the laughter, false the weeping. False the leaping about for false things. False is mine, false is yours. False the burden carried for what is false. False the singing, false the meditating, false the going toward what is false. False the enjoyer, false the renouncer; false the yogi too, for the world is illusion. Tuka says: false is Tuka with his false devotion, speaking false words to those who are equally false.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lets one word, false, fall on everything in turn until nothing in the world is left standing. Laughter and weeping, mine and yours, the burdens we carry, even singing and meditation are all hollow because the things they chase are hollow. Then he refuses to spare the supposedly higher men: the enjoyer who indulges, the renouncer who walks away, the yogi who disciplines himself are all false too, since the whole stage is illusion. The most cutting move is the last: he names himself false, his own devotion false, his words false and spoken to people just as false. He will not stand outside the verdict he passes on the world; if everything is unreal, so is the one saying so, and only that which lies beyond all of it is left untouched.

GATHA 2863 The Necessity of Experience

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I marvel at those who claim they have attained; hear my words, for I cannot hold back. When food is cooked, the teeth and hands bear witness, yet somehow the tongue does not register the taste.

A single drop of sandalwood oil cools a cauldron of boiling oil in an instant. The true connoisseur knows the inner distinction; the foolish are captivated only by outward beauty.

Says Tuka, the touchstone reveals of its own accord what is pure, what is dull, and what is base, each exactly as it is.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those who say they have arrived: I marvel at it. Hear me, I cannot hold the words back. When food is cooked, the teeth and hands tell, but somehow the tongue does not taste it. One drop of sandal oil cools a whole cauldron of boiling oil in a moment. The true judge knows the inner difference. Fools are caught only by outward beauty. Tuka says: the touchstone sorts it of itself, the pure, the dull, the base, each just as it is.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is unmasking people who announce that they have reached the goal. His first image is sharp: with cooked food the hands and teeth do their work, yet the tongue never registers the taste, which is how empty attainment can look busy and devout while the inner relish is simply absent. Then the opposite case: a single drop of real sandal oil cools an entire vat of boiling oil at once, because what is genuine acts quietly and unmistakably. The difference is invisible to the crowd, who fall for surfaces, and visible only to the true connoisseur. He ends with the touchstone: tested, every claim shows its own grade by itself, pure or dull or base, and no one can talk their way past it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This is the highest devotion that God loves: to offer up all attachment to worldly existence. Whatever the Infinite has ordained, let it be; keep contentment in the heart.

To carry anxiety only multiplies sorrow; one must endure the fruit of one's past deeds. Says Tuka, place the whole burden upon Him, and carry on this worldly life with your heart set upon God's feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is the great devotion that God loves: to give up all clinging to worldly life. Whatever the Infinite has set in place, let it stay. Keep contentment in the heart. To carry anxiety only makes more sorrow. You must bear the fruit of past deeds. Tuka says: let us put the whole weight on Him, and carry this worldly life with our heart at God's feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram defines the devotion God actually prizes, and it is not ritual but release: letting go of the grip on worldly life. Whatever the Infinite has arranged, accept it as it stands, and hold steady contentment inside rather than fighting the arrangement. He gives the plain reasoning: worry does not lift the load, it only piles on more suffering, and in any case the fruit of past deeds has to be lived through. So the move he urges is to shift the whole weight onto God and keep living the ordinary worldly life, but with the heart resting at His feet rather than clenched around the outcome.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Birth itself happens because of past sin; it is the fruit of one's own accumulated karma. Then why carry useless sorrow? What good does it do to blame God? This worldly existence is known to be full of suffering; one should not brood upon it with a troubled heart.

Says Tuka, remember His Name; through it, forget the pain of birth.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Birth comes because of past sin. It is the fruit of what I have gathered. So I should not carry sorrow for nothing. What good is it to sulk against God? Everyone knows this worldly life is full of pain. I should not brood over it in my heart. Tuka says: remember His Name. By that, forget the pain of birth.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is talking himself out of self-pity. He starts from the hard fact that this birth and its troubles are the ripening of one's own past acts, not an injustice handed down by God, so blaming God or sulking against Him gains nothing. Suffering in worldly life is no surprise; everyone already knows it is built that way, and chewing on it only adds a second sorrow on top of the first. He names the one thing that actually helps: remembering the Name. Held there, the very pain of being born can be set down and forgotten.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now, do not enumerate my virtues and faults, nor say I am giving sermons to anyone. I swear by the feet of Vithoba: I do not harass anyone for the sake of honor or pretense.

Says Tuka, all this is known to You, O Panduranga. What can the world know of what lies within?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now do not count up my virtues and my faults. Do not say I am preaching at anyone. I swear by Vithoba's feet: I do not torment anyone for the sake of honor or show. Tuka says: You know this, Panduranga. What can the world know of what is inside?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is answering people who weigh him up and accuse him of preaching out of vanity. He refuses to let them tally his good and bad points or read pride into his words, and he swears by Vithoba's feet that he harasses no one to win status or to put on a display. Then he turns away from the court of public opinion altogether: the world only sees the surface and cannot read the inside of a person. He rests his case with the one witness who can, Panduranga, who already knows what lies within.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What will people take from me by calling me wicked? Why should I seek anyone's approval? People cannot take me to the afterlife; when the time comes, no one can prevent my going. I call no one good or bad; let them freely criticize me behind my back.

My entire burden rests upon Panduranga; what business have I with the world? Says Tuka, my one and only practice is the chanting of Vithoba's Name.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What can people take from me by calling me wicked? Why should I seek anyone's approval? People cannot carry me to the next world. When the time comes, no one can stop my going. I call no one good or bad. Let them gladly chew over me behind my back. My whole burden rests on Panduranga. What business have I with the world? Tuka says: my one practice is the singing of Vithoba's Name.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is loosening the grip that other people's verdicts have on him. Their praise or blame changes nothing real: they cannot escort him to the next world, nor hold back his death when it comes, so courting their approval is pointless. He drops the habit of ranking people good or bad and lets them gossip about him freely, refusing to be wounded by it. The reason he can let go is that he has handed his whole weight to Panduranga; with that one refuge and the chanting of the Name as his sole practice, the world's opinion simply has no claim on him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You are renowned for making even a barren cow yield milk, O God. Yet I do not ask that much of You; only show me Your feet.

The rain-cloud pours down water for the chataka bird. The royal swan receives priceless pearls.

Says Tuka, O God, why have You pierced my jiva and yet remain hidden?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You are famous, God, for making even a barren cow give milk. I do not ask You for so much. Only show me Your feet. The rain-cloud pours its water for the chataka bird. The royal swan is given priceless pearls. Tuka says: God, why have You pierced my heart and still stay hidden?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is pressing a small, sharp request against God's huge reputation. He recalls that God is known for the impossible, even drawing milk from a barren cow, and then says he wants none of that abundance: he asks only for the sight of God's feet. He points to how each creature is met in its own way, the cloud raining for the chataka, the royal swan given pearls, as if to ask why he alone is left waiting. The poem ends on the ache of a wound without a healer: You have pierced my very life with longing, so why do You keep Yourself hidden?

Lowliness, the outcaste before the brahmin

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I stand apart by nature, inherently distant, separate from name and form, a beggar. You need not feel offended or hold back; what is lowly has naturally come to my lot.

I eat leftovers wherever they fall; God Himself has arranged it so. Says Tuka, you are set apart from us. The Lord has created you as the twice-born, distinct from us.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I stand apart, far off by my nature, a beggar separate from name and form. You need not feel offended or hold back. What is low has fallen to me naturally. I eat the leftovers wherever they fall. God Himself has arranged it so. Tuka says: you are set apart from us. God made you the twice-born, different from us.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks to brahmins from inside the place society has assigned him, owning his low station rather than disputing it. He calls himself a beggar set apart, by nature distant, even from name and form, and tells them not to take offense at his company because lowliness fell to him on its own. He notes that he lives on leftovers and frames even this as God's own arrangement of the order of things. The closing line, naming the brahmin as the twice-born whom God set apart, carries a quiet edge: it lays the whole caste division at God's feet and asks who really drew that line, turning the listener back to examine the boundary they take for granted.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Bring Lord Ganapati of Chintamani to dine at a second plate. The gods said, 'O Tuka, from where did such boldness come? We were trapped by our own pride.' The hour grew late, the food turned stale, and the brahmins sat waiting.

Says Tuka, O gods, by the power of your merit, I shall swiftly bring Moraya here.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Bring Lord Ganapati of Chintamani; let Him eat at a second plate. The gods say: Tuka, where did such boldness come from? We are caught inside our own pride. The hour grew late, the food turned stale, the brahmins sat waiting. Tuka says: gods, by the power of your merit, I will bring Moraya here at once.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells a scene of a feast stalled by the gods' own self-importance. The food is ready, but a second plate is set and Ganapati, the Chintamani Moraya, must be brought before the meal can begin, and the great ones balk, admitting they are trapped inside their pride. As they hesitate the hour passes, the food goes cold, and the waiting brahmins are left sitting. Tukaram, with plain confidence, answers that he will fetch Moraya at once, on the strength of their merit and not his own: where rank and pride freeze the proud, simple faith moves and gets the work done.

GATHA 2871 The Nature of God

The Name at the meal, God the true enjoyer

मराठी मूळ

कवळोकवळीं नाम घ्या गोविंदाचें । भोजन भक्तांचें तुका ह्मणे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Narayana, the Lord of Lakshmi, is the true enjoyer of all offerings; therefore the ritual oblation is taken up. He is the sustainer and the enjoyer, the doer and the cause of all doing, Himself perfectly fulfilled.

The Lord of the universe graciously watches over all and honors the prayers of the brahmins. Says Tuka, with every morsel, take the Name of Govinda; that is the true meal of the devotees.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Narayana, the Lord of Lakshmi, is the one who enjoys every offering. So the offering of life-breath is taken up. He is the husband and the enjoyer, the doer and the one who makes others do. He Himself is full and wants for nothing. The Lord of the universe watches over all with a gracious eye and honors the prayers of the brahmins. With every morsel, take the Name of Govinda. Tuka says: that is the true meal of the devotees.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reframes the act of eating as worship by naming who really receives it. Narayana, Lakshmi's Lord, is the true enjoyer behind every offering, the doer and the mover of all doing, and yet wholly full in Himself, needing nothing from us. As the universe's sustainer He watches over all with grace and answers the brahmins' prayers. So the instruction lands simply: take the Name of Govinda with each mouthful, because for the devotees the food is not the meal; the remembrance of God woven through it is.

GATHA 2872 The Saints

Lowliness, the saint and the wrongdoer

मराठी मूळ

माझा स्वामी तुझी वागवितो लात । तेथें मी पतित काय आलों ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My master treads upon your feet with His stride; what place have I, a lowly wrongdoer, in all of this? All the sacred waters have become pure through contact with your feet; how can I, so lowly, presume to speak? Says Tuka, you who are revered by God and by the twice-born, what am I, of a despised caste, to say anything?

IN PLAIN WORDS

My master keeps your feet with His own step. What place have I, a fallen man, here? The holy waters became pure at your feet. What can I, so weak, presume to say? Tuka says: you are revered by God and by the twice-born. What am I, of a despised caste, to say anything?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is placing himself at the very bottom before someone holy, measuring the distance between a saint and a man counted as fallen. He says his own Lord holds these feet close, and that even the sacred waters are made pure by touching them, so what standing could he, a wrongdoer, have in such company. He calls the listener revered by God and by the twice-born alike, and himself a man of a despised caste with no right to speak. The posture is real humility before holiness, and it also lets the despised man stand in the same scene as the honored one, before the God who reveres saints rather than ranks.

GATHA 2873 The Moral Ideal

Steadfastness, finish what you begin

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे टाकीघायें देवपण । फुटलिया जन कुला पुसी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What is honored should be honored for the jiva's own sake; otherwise it is better to break the bond at the very outset. If your own welfare matters to you, hear these words: the true worth of everything lies in steadfastness.

A sapling well-watered thrives on the surface, but once dried up from within, no amount of tending will bring forth new growth. Says Tuka, it is through the sculptor's chisel-blows that divinity emerges from the stone; once broken, it is too late for the world to ask about the lineage of the fragments.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What you honor, honor for your own soul's sake; or else it is better to break it off at the very start. If your own good matters to you, hear these words: the whole worth lies in steadfastness. A watered sapling looks well on the surface, but once it dries from within, no tending brings out a new shoot. Tuka says: under the sculptor's blows the godhood comes out of the stone. Once it cracks, it is too late for the world to ask the lineage of the broken pieces.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is warning against half-hearted devotion, the kind taken up and then abandoned. Reverence is worth keeping only if it serves your own deepest good; if you will not hold to it, it is cleaner to never begin. The whole value, he says, is in steadfastness, and he gives two images for it: a sapling watered only on the surface looks healthy yet cannot sprout once it has dried inside, and a stone becomes a god only by enduring the chisel's blows. The closing edge is sober: if the stone cracks under the carving, no one afterward will care what it might have become, so see the work through or do not start it.

GATHA 2874 Devotion to Vitthal

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For us, the servants of Vishnu, Vitthal is our sole capital, our wealth and substance. We should not barter away what is ours; let the mind rest in contentment.

Says Tuka, whatever riches were amassed in the past have not accompanied anyone in the end.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For us, the servants of Vishnu, this is our whole capital: Vitthal alone is our wealth and our riches. Do not trade it away. Take it with your own hand and let the mind rest content. Tuka says: whatever riches were gathered before, none of it went with anyone in the end.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names the only fortune a devotee truly owns. For the servants of Vishnu, Vitthal Himself is the whole stock of wealth, not a means to something else but the thing itself. He warns against bartering it away for lesser gains; instead one should take hold of it directly and let the mind settle into contentment with that alone. The closing line cuts against all worldly hoarding: every fortune ever amassed stays behind at death and accompanies no one, so the Name is the single wealth worth holding.

GATHA 2875 Ecstasy and Joy

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In this commerce of joy, a profit of happiness has been gained; bliss overflows in every direction. Fellowship and feasting happen naturally with God; what recurs daily becomes the lasting truth.

In the house of the Capable One there is every abundance; there is never any shortage of anything. Says Tuka, here the profits run into crores, for the Capable One's heart holds infinite capacity.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In this trade of joy, a profit of happiness has come. Bliss is packed full, behind and ahead. Company and shared feasting happen with God Himself. What recurs each day becomes the lasting truth. In the house of the Capable One is every abundance. There is never any shortage of anything. Tuka says: here the profits run into crores, for the Capable One's heart holds room without end.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the life of devotion as a kind of joyful commerce that only ever turns a profit. Once you trade in this happiness, bliss fills time in every direction, behind and ahead, and the daily nearness of God, His company and the shared meal, becomes the one thing that lasts. He pictures God as the Capable One whose house holds every abundance and never runs short. The point is that this wealth cannot be exhausted: the gains run into crores because God's own heart has infinite room, so there is no ceiling on what the devotee receives.

GATHA 2876 The Power of the Name

The Name, your needless fear

मराठी मूळ

काय देवें खातां घेतलें हातींचें । आलें हें तयाचें थोर भय ॥1॥
ह्मणतां गजरें राम एकसरें । जळती पापें थोरें भयधाकें॥ध्रु.॥
काय खोळंबले हात पाय अंग । नाशिलें हें सांग रूप काय ॥2॥
कोण लोकीं सांगा घातला बाहेरी । ह्मणतां हरि हरि तुका ह्मणे॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What has God taken from your hands by eating? Why this great fear of Him? Saying Rama loudly and all at once, sins burn away in fright. Are your hands, feet, or limbs obstructed? Has your form been destroyed? Into what world have you been cast out? Says Tuka, what happens by saying Hari, Hari?

IN PLAIN WORDS

What did God take from your hand by eating? Why this great fear of Him? Say Rama loudly, all at once, and great sins burn away in their own fright. Are your hands or feet or body held back? Tell me, is your form destroyed? Into what world, tell me, have you been thrown out? Tuka says: what harm comes from saying Hari, Hari?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is shaming away the excuses people make for not taking the Name. He asks what it could possibly cost: God does not snatch anything from your hand, so the fear and reluctance make no sense. Said out loud and wholehearted, the Name Rama makes even great sins flee. Then he checks off the imagined harms one by one, your limbs are not bound, your body not ruined, you are not cast out of any world, and lands on the plain question: what damage could ever come from saying Hari, Hari? The challenge turns the listener back on the empty fear that keeps them silent.

GATHA 2877 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the noblest birth

मराठी मूळ

उत्तम त्या याति । देवा शरण अनन्यगति ॥1॥
नाहीं दुजा ठाव । कांहीं उत्तम मध्यम भाव ॥ध्रु.॥
उमटती ठसे । ब्रह्मप्राप्त अंगीं दिसे ॥2॥
भाविक विश्वासी।तुका ह्मणे नमन त्यांसी॥3॥ ॥10॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The noblest of all is one who surrenders to God with single-pointed devotion, holding no other refuge, whether high, middling, or low. The marks of Brahman shine forth on such a one's person.

Says Tuka, to such a faithful, trusting soul I offer my salutation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The noblest of all births is this: to take refuge in God with nothing else to turn to. There is no second place to go. There is no high, no middling, no low. The marks of it begin to show. The reaching of Brahman is seen on his very body. Tuka says: to such a one, faithful and trusting, I bow.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram redefines what makes a life noble. It is not caste or station; it is single-pointed refuge in God when you hold no other shelter at all. Once that surrender is real, distinctions of high, middling, and low simply fall away, because there is no second place left to stand. The proof is not in talk but in the person: the marks of reaching Brahman begin to show plainly on the one who has surrendered. To such a faithful, trusting soul Tukaram offers his own salutation.

GATHA 2878 True Worship

The Ekadashi vow, life or hell

मराठी मूळ

ज्यासी नावडे एकादशी । तो जिता चि नरकवासी॥1॥
ज्यासी नावडे हें व्रत । त्यासी नरक तो ही भीत ॥ध्रु.॥
ज्यासी मान्य एकादशी । तो जिता चि मुक्तवासी ॥2॥
ज्यासी घडे एकादशी । जाणें लागे विष्णुपाशीं ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे पुण्यराशी । तो चि करी एकादशी ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who does not observe Ekadashi lives in hell even while alive. One who does not cherish this sacred vow is feared even by hell itself.

One who honors Ekadashi dwells in liberation while still in this body. One who fulfills Ekadashi must go to the presence of Vishnu.

Says Tuka, only one who is a treasury of merit truly observes Ekadashi.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One who has no taste for Ekadashi lives in hell even while alive. One who does not love this vow, even hell is afraid of him. One who honors Ekadashi lives free even in this body. One who keeps Ekadashi must go into Vishnu's presence. Tuka says: only one who is a heap of merit keeps the Ekadashi.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses the Ekadashi fast as a sharp dividing line. To have no taste for it is already to be living in hell, and to scorn the vow makes a person so wretched that hell itself recoils from him. To keep it, by contrast, is to live free even while still in the body, and it carries you straight into Vishnu's presence. He closes by naming the cost: only a person who is already a treasury of accumulated merit actually manages to keep this vow. The point is to weigh whether your own life bends toward the discipline or away from it.

तुका ह्मणे धाकुटें व्हावें । निजवस्तूसी मागुनि घ्यावें ॥7॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Become an ant to eat the sugar; seek the meeting with your true self. When sugar lies scattered on the ground, what good does it do for an elephant to come and weep over it? One becomes a holy man or renunciant and puts on a show of illusory practice.

Learning, scholarship, and evening prayers all become mere entertainment for the crowd. Without genuine love in the mind, and without firm conviction in the mind, mere words of Brahman-knowledge on the tongue amount to nothing if the conduct belies them.

They inflate false grandeur and worship themselves. Says Tuka, become small and humble; then ask for the true treasure and receive it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Become an ant to eat the sugar; take the meeting with your own true self. When sugar lies scattered on the ground, what use is it for the elephant to come and weep over it? A man turns holy man, turns renunciant, and only puts on a show of false practice. Reciting, scholarship, evening rites: all of it becomes entertainment for the crowd. There is no love in him, no firm faith in the mind. He speaks Brahman-knowledge with his tongue, but watch his conduct and the eyes find no rest. They puff up false grandeur. They take worship for themselves. Tuka says: become small. Then ask for the true treasure, and receive it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts two ways of approaching the sweetness of God. The ant becomes small and so can eat the sugar; the elephant is too big to gather scattered grains and can only stand there weeping. He turns the same lens on the religious performer who takes the robe of a holy man or renunciant: the recitation, the learning, the evening prayers are all staged for an audience, with no love and no settled faith behind them. Brahman-knowledge on such a tongue is hollow, because the conduct contradicts the words; worst of all, the performer inflates his own grandeur and ends up accepting worship meant for God. The remedy, and the warning to examine oneself, is to become small like the ant and ask humbly for the real treasure rather than display a counterfeit.

GATHA 2880 Faith and Trust

Faith, no fear with God as friend

मराठी मूळ

भय हरिजनीं । कांहीं न धरावें मनीं ॥1॥

चित्त वित्त हेवा । समर्पून राहा देवा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे मन । असों द्यावें समाधान॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let the devotees of Hari hold no fear in their chitta. When Narayana is one's friend, what does the world's opinion matter? Offer your chitta, your wealth, and your longing to God, and remain at peace.

Says Tuka, let the mind abide in contentment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Devotees of Hari, hold no fear in the heart. When Narayana is your friend, what is the world's reckoning worth? Give your heart, your wealth, your longing to God, and stay there. Tuka says: let the mind rest in contentment.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks to those who belong to Hari and tells them to carry no fear inside. The reasoning is simple: when Narayana himself is your friend, the opinion and accounting of the world counts for nothing. He asks for a full handover, of mind, of wealth, of every craving, placed with God, and then for the soul simply to remain there. The fruit of that surrender is a mind that abides in settled contentment.

GATHA 2881 Appeals and Exhortations

Warning, death measures your days

मराठी मूळ

आयुष्य मोजावया बैसला मापारी । तूं कां रे वेव्हारी संसाराचा ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Death sits measuring out your lifespan; why then do you remain so busy with worldly trade? He will drag you away when you least expect it; without Hari, anxiety cannot be stilled. Terrible is the suffering when Yama torments you; who will save you in that place? Your good relatives and friends will all stand at a distance; remember Hari quickly.

Says Tuka, how long will you go on in careless indulgence? A great reckoning awaits you ahead.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The measurer has sat down to count out your lifespan. Why are you still so busy with the trade of this world? He will drag you off when you do not expect it; without Hari the anxious mind will not be stilled. Hard is this suffering; Yama will torment you. Who will save you in that place? Your good kin and friends will all stand far off. Remember Shri Hari quickly. Tuka says: how long will you go on in careless indulgence? A great reckoning waits for you ahead.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures death as a clerk already seated, measuring out the days of your life while you stay absorbed in worldly business. The seizure comes without warning, and only Hari can quiet the anxiety that the world cannot. At Yama's place the suffering is severe and no relative or friend stands close enough to help; they all keep their distance. So the urgent instruction is to remember Shri Hari now, without delay. The closing question and warning are aimed at the listener's own slackness: a great reckoning lies ahead, so how long will you keep indulging in carelessness?

GATHA 2882 Appeals and Exhortations

Warning, do not obey the mind

मराठी मूळ

होऊं नको कांहीं या मना आधीन । नाइकें वचन याचें कांहीं ॥1॥
हटियाची गोष्टी मोडून टाकावी । सोई ही धरावी विठोबाची ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे जाले जे मना आधीन । तयांसी बंधन यम करी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not become a slave to this mind; do not heed its counsel. Break the demands of its stubbornness and hold fast to the path of Vithoba.

Keep the mind under your own control; otherwise it will prove fatal to the jiva. Says Tuka, those who have surrendered to the mind's rule are bound by Yama in chains.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not become a slave to this mind. Do not listen to a word of its counsel. Break its stubborn demands and throw them away. Hold instead to the way of Vithoba. Keep the mind under your own control; if you do not, it is the killer of the jiva. Tuka says: those who became slaves to the mind are bound in chains by Yama.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram treats the mind as a master that must not be obeyed. Its counsel and its stubborn demands are to be refused and broken, and the path of Vithoba held in their place. The reason is stark: an uncontrolled mind is fatal to the jiva, the very thing that destroys the soul's life. He closes with the consequence, that those who surrendered their rule to the mind end up bound in Yama's chains. The call is to take back command of one's own mind rather than serve it.

GATHA 2883 The Power of the Name

Satire, life wasted without the Name

मराठी मूळ

नामाविण काय वाउगी चावट । वांयां वटवट हरीविण॥1॥
फुकट चि सांगे लोकाचिया गोष्टी । राम जगजेठी वाचे नये ॥ध्रु.॥

बळें यम दांत खाय तयावरी । जंव भरे दोरी आयुष्याची ॥4॥
तुका ह्मणे तुला सोडवील कोण । नाहीं नारायण आठविला ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Without the Name, all talk is empty chatter; without Hari it is a waste of breath. One freely gossips about other people's affairs, yet the name of Rama never comes to one's lips.

One gathers a crowd and indulges in drink, intoxicated by the pleasures of the senses. One sits and mocks others, with never a thought of Govinda.

Death bares his teeth, waiting for that person, until the rope of their lifespan is fully drawn out. Says Tuka, who will save you when you have never once remembered Narayana?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Without the Name, what is all this idle prattle? Without Hari it is wasted noise. For nothing he tells the world's gossip, while Rama, lord of the world, never comes to his tongue. He gathers a crowd, drinks liquor, and grows drunk on the taste of the senses. He sits and mocks other people, with no remembrance of Govinda. Yama grinds his teeth, waiting for him, until the rope of his lifespan is fully paid out. Tuka says: who will free you, when you have never once remembered Narayana?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips the value out of a life spent in talk that leaves out the Name. Gossip about other people pours out freely while Rama, lord of the world, never reaches the tongue, so all the chatter is wasted breath. The same person gathers a crowd, drinks, and gets intoxicated by sense pleasures, and uses his sitting hours to mock others, never once remembering Govinda. Over all of this Yama waits, grinding his teeth, until the measured rope of the lifespan runs out. The closing question turns on the listener: with Narayana never once remembered, who is left to save you?

GATHA 2884 The Saints

Devotion to the saints, the only rite

मराठी मूळ

संत गाती हरिकीर्त्तनीं । त्यांचें घेइन पायवणी ॥1॥
हें चि तप तीर्थ माझें । आणीक मी नेणें दुजें ॥ध्रु.॥

संत महंत माझी पूजा । अनुभाव नाहीं दुजा ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे नेणें कांहीं । अवघें आहे संतापायीं ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the saints sing in Hari's kirtan, I shall take the dust of their feet. This alone is my pilgrimage, my austerity; I know no other.

I will sacrifice my body as an offering and wave it as a lamp before the saints and holy ones. The saints are my worship; I know no other practice.

Says Tuka, I know nothing else; everything resides at the feet of the saints.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the saints sing in Hari's kirtan, I will take the water that washed their feet. This alone is my austerity, my holy pilgrimage; I know no other. I will offer up my body for them; I will wave it as a lamp before the saints and the great ones. The saints and the great ones are my worship; I have no other experience. Tuka says: I know nothing else. Everything is there at the feet of the saints.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram collapses all religious practice into devotion to the saints. The water that has washed their feet is his whole pilgrimage and austerity; he claims no other. He offers his very body, waving it before the saints and the holy ones as one waves a lamp in worship, and says plainly that the saints themselves are his only object of worship and his only spiritual experience. The poem's force is in its exclusiveness: he refuses every other rite. For Tukaram, the whole of the path rests at the feet of the saints.

GATHA 2885 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the harvest of Vitthal

मराठी मूळ

जालें भांडवल । अवघा पिकला विठ्ठल ॥1॥
आतां वाणी काशासाटीं । धीर धरावा च पोटीं ॥ध्रु.॥
आपुल्या संकोचें । ह्मणऊनि तेथें टांचे ॥2॥
घेतों ख÷या मापें । तुका देखोनियां सोपें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The capital has been secured; Vitthal has blossomed everywhere. Now why should I worry about running short? Let courage fill the chitta.

It is only through one's own hesitation that scarcity appears. Says Tuka, seeing how easy it is, I draw out the goods in heaping measure.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The capital is made. Vitthal has ripened everywhere. Now why should I worry about the merchant's count? Hold the heart steady. It is only my own holding back that makes things run short. So I reach in there. Tuka says: seeing how easy it is, I scoop the goods out in heaping measure.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the image of a trader whose stock is secured. His capital is in hand because Vitthal has ripened like a crop on every side, so there is no reason to fret over the merchant's accounting; the heart can stay steady. He admits that whatever scarcity he feels comes only from his own hesitation, his shrinking back from the abundance. Once he sees how freely available it is, he stops holding back and draws the goods out in heaping measure. The mood is delighted abundance: God is so plentiful that only one's own reserve can make it seem scarce.

GATHA 2886 The Nature of God

Nature of God, the untouched sun

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Here is pure Brahman-knowledge; make the mind attentive. The sun evaporates all waters yet is untouched by their qualities or impurities.

It has no hidden dealings with anyone; it shines equally upon all. Says Tuka, this is the truth. See it in this teaching.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Here is pure Brahman-knowledge. Make the mind attentive. The sun draws up all the waters, yet is not stained by their good or their fault. It has no secret dealing with anyone; it stands equal over all. The truth is just this. Tuka says: see it in this teaching.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram offers a single image to carry pure knowledge of Brahman. The sun draws up water from everywhere, clean or foul alike, yet nothing of their quality or impurity clings to it. In the same way the divine has no private favors and no hidden partiality; it shines equally on all. The lesson is that God touches everything yet remains untouched and impartial. Tukaram tells the listener to make the mind attentive and to see this truth held inside the teaching itself.

GATHA 2887 The Nature of God

Nature of God, drawn by your own need

मराठी मूळ

अग्न हा पाचारी कोणासी साक्षेपें । हिंवें तो चि तापे जाणोनियां ॥1॥
उदक ह्मणे काय या हो मज प्यावें । तृषित तो धांवे सेवावया ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Does fire call anyone with special invitation? The one who is cold comes to warm himself of his own accord. Does water say, 'Please come and drink me'? The thirsty one runs to it eagerly.

Does a cloth say, 'Come and wear me'? The world is drawn by its own desire. Says the Lord of Tuka, 'Do I say, remember me?' You do it for your own salvation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Does fire call out to anyone with a special invitation? The one who is cold comes of himself to warm himself, knowing where the heat is. Does water say, come and drink me? The thirsty one runs to it to drink. Does the cloth say, come and wear me? The world is drawn by its own wish. The Lord of Tuka says: do I say, remember me? You do it for your own deliverance.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses three plain examples to show that God makes no appeal. Fire never invites the cold man; he comes on his own because he knows it will warm him. Water never asks to be drunk, yet the thirsty run to it; cloth never asks to be worn, yet the world reaches for it out of its own desire. In the same way God does not beg you to remember him. The remembrance is for your own deliverance, and the lack, if there is one, is only in the one who does not come.

GATHA 2888 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, God and devotee bound as one

मराठी मूळ

भक्त देवाघरचा सुना । देव भक्ताचा पोसणा ॥1॥
येर येरां जडलें कैसें । जीवा अंगें जैसें तैसें ॥ध्रु.॥
तुका ह्मणे अंगें । एक एकाचिया संगें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The devotee is like a daughter-in-law in God's household, and God is sustained by the devotee's love. How inseparably they are joined to each other, just as the jiva is bound to the body.

Says Tuka, they are one with each other, each living in the other's company.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The devotee is the daughter-in-law in God's house; God is the foster-child the devotee feeds. See how the two are fastened to each other, just as the soul is to the body. Tuka says: in their very being, each lives in the company of the other.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the bond between God and devotee as a mutual dependence. The devotee belongs in God's household like a daughter-in-law, and God is nourished by the devotee like a child the devotee raises and feeds; the need runs both ways. He compares their union to the way the soul and the body are inseparably joined, neither one able to stand apart. The closing line drives it home: in their very being the two are one, each living always in the other's company.

GATHA 2889 Devotion to Vitthal

Adoration, the feet on the brick

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Beautiful, most beautiful, standing straight and even upon the brick: those cooling feet I have clasped within my heart. They are the source of all sacred waters; Lakshmi Herself massages them.

Says Tuka, even the saints have begged for a place at those feet as their final resting ground.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Beautiful, most beautiful. The feet stand level and straight upon the brick. I have held those feet in my heart. They are feet that cool every fever. They are the source of all the sacred waters. Lakshmi Herself presses and serves them. Tuka says: at the end, even the saints have begged for a place at those feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praising Vitthal's feet as they stand on the brick at Pandhari and naming what those feet are worth. He has taken them into his own heart, and they cool every burning of the body and the mind. He stacks the claims high: those feet are the well from which all holy rivers and pilgrimage waters come, and Lakshmi, the goddess of all fortune, attends them with her own hands. The closing line sets the standard: even the saints, who already have so much, ask for nothing greater than a place at these feet when life ends.

GATHA 2890 The Nature of God

God's hunger for devotion

मराठी मूळ

मासं चर्म हाडें । देवा अवघीं च गोडें ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Flesh, skin, bones: all is sweet to God. Whatever has been dyed in Hari's color, nothing of it goes to waste.

When the demon Shankhasura devoured the Vedas, the Lord carried the demon's very carcass on His person. Says Tuka, such is the Lord; He is greedy for the taste of devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Flesh, skin, bones: to God it is all sweet. Whatever has been dyed in Hari's color, none of it is wasted. The demon Shankhasura swallowed the Vedas. The Lord still carried that demon's body upon Himself. Tuka says: such is the Lord. He is greedy for the taste of devotion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says God does not weigh devotion by its outward dignity; flesh, skin, and bone, the lowest stuff, all taste sweet to Him. The point is the dye, not the cloth: whatever has soaked up Hari's color is kept and nothing of it is thrown away. He gives the example of Shankhasura, who devoured the Vedas, yet whose very carcass the Lord still bore on His person, because even that had touched Him. The closing image is startling on purpose: God is greedy, hungry for the taste of love, and so no one who turns toward Him is too low to be taken in.

GATHA 2891 Worldly Life

Social criticism, the half-hearted devotee

मराठी मूळ

कोणा चिंता आड । कोणा लोकलाज नाड ॥1॥

स्मरणाचा राग । क्रोधें विटाळलें अंग ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जडा । काय चाले या दगडा॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For some, worldly anxiety stands in the way. For others, the fear of public opinion is the obstacle.

Where then is Rama for such unfortunate ones? They make a futile fuss for nothing. Their attempt at remembrance is polluted by anger within.

Says Tuka, what progress can be made with such dull stones?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For one, worry gets in the way. For another, fear of what people will say is the trap. Where is Rama for such unlucky people? They make a useless fuss for nothing. Their remembrance is soured by anger; the body is defiled with rage. Tuka says: these are dull stones. What can you do with a stone?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at people who never reach God and names what stops them. For one it is anxiety about the world; for another it is the fear of public opinion, of how their devotion will look. So their remembrance of Rama is only noise, and worse, it is spoiled from inside by anger, which defiles the very body that should be a temple. He calls them dull stones, not in contempt for the persons but to expose the pattern: a heart hardened by worry, vanity, and rage cannot take the impress of the Name. The question turns back on the listener: examine which of these is blocking your own remembrance.

GATHA 2892 Autobiography

Autobiography, the watchman of souls

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For my own sake, I have cast aside all shame. I remain only to keep you awake to your own welfare.

You are oblivious to the body's transience; I am the one who recognizes merit and sin. Says Tuka, I have stayed behind solely to tell the people what must be told.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For my own good, I have thrown away all shame. I stay only to keep you awake to your own welfare. You are blind to the body, forgetting it will pass; I am the one who knows sin from merit. Tuka says: I have stayed behind only to tell people what must be told.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram explains why he keeps speaking so plainly even though it costs him his standing. He has dropped shame for his own sake, because his work is to keep others awake. He names the gap between himself and his hearers: they are oblivious, treating the body as if it will last, while he sees clearly what is sin and what is merit. So his whole reason for remaining among people is service, to say out loud the truth that no one else will say. The line carries both humility and urgency: he stays not for himself but as a watchman over sleeping souls.

GATHA 2893 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, parents are the pilgrimage

मराठी मूळ

मायबापें केवळ काशी । तेणें न वजावें तीर्थासी॥1॥
पुंडलीकें काय केलें । परब्रह्म उभें ठेलें ॥ध्रु.॥
तैसा होई सावधान। हृदयीं धरीं नारायण ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे मायबापें । अवघीं देवाचीं स्वरूपें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One's parents are themselves a living Kashi; there is no need to travel to any other pilgrimage. See what Pundalik did: by serving his parents, he made the Supreme Brahman stand still.

Be alert like him and hold Narayana in your heart. Says Tuka, one's mother and father are the very forms of God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Your mother and father are themselves a living Kashi. With them at home, you need not travel to any holy place. Look at what Pundalik did: by serving his parents he made the Supreme Brahman stand still and wait. Be alert like him; hold Narayana in your heart. Tuka says: mother and father are the very forms of God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram collapses the whole machinery of pilgrimage into the parents standing in your own house. They are Kashi already, so there is no merit waiting at some distant shrine that is not already here. He points to Pundalik, whose service to his parents was so complete that the Supreme Brahman came and waited on a brick rather than interrupt it; that brick is why Vitthal stands at Pandhari. The instruction follows: be that attentive, and carry Narayana in the heart while you serve. The claim is radical and literal, not figurative: father and mother are forms of God, and to honor them is to worship Him.

GATHA 2894 Autobiography

Autobiography, true coin not rubbish

मराठी मूळ

सत्य आह्मां मनीं । नव्हों गाबाळाचे धनी ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We hold truth in our minds; we are not masters of rubbish. Let everyone know this and fill the mint with pure, unadulterated coin.

I give sharp answers so that good may come of it in the future. Says Tuka, when a thing is done well, its fame travels across the land.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We hold truth in our minds. We are not the masters of rubbish. Let everyone know this: fill the mint with pure, clean coin. I give sharp answers so that good may come of it later. Tuka says: when a thing is done well, its fame travels from land to land.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram defends his honesty using the image of a mint. His mind is set on truth alone; he refuses to deal in counterfeit or worthless stuff. He calls everyone to do the same: strike only pure, unalloyed coin, meaning words and devotion with no falseness mixed in. This is why his answers are sharp, even cutting, because the harshness now serves a good that comes later. The closing line is the assurance: what is made honestly does not stay hidden; genuine work carries its own reputation across the land.

GATHA 2895 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, teach for the other's good

मराठी मूळ

त्याग करुं नये खरें । ऐसें विचारावें बरें ॥ध्रु.॥
तुमचिया तोंडें । धर्माधर्म चि खंडे ॥2॥
मजसाटीं देवा । कां हो लपविला हेवा ॥3॥
जाला सावधान । त्यासी घालावें भोजन ॥4॥
तुका ह्मणे पिता । वरी बाळाच्या तो हिता ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One should teach what is beneficial and set others on the right path. One should not abandon what is truly good; this should be carefully considered.

It is through your own words that right and wrong are determined. Why, O God, have You hidden this treasure away from me? Once one has become alert, one should be given nourishment.

Says Tuka, a father always looks after the welfare of his child.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Teach what helps. Set people on the right path; that is the rule. Do not throw away what is truly good; think this over carefully. By your own mouth, right and wrong are decided. For my sake, O God, why have you hidden away this treasure? When someone has grown alert, feed them. Tuka says: a father always looks after his child's good.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays down a rule for anyone who guides others: teach only what is beneficial and steer people toward the right way, never abandoning what is genuinely good. He reminds the teacher of the weight of speech, because by their own mouth right and wrong get settled for those who listen. Then he turns to God with a near complaint, asking why the treasure of grace has been kept hidden from him. The instruction closes with a measured care: when a person has truly woken up, that is the moment to nourish them, not before. The whole is held by the final image, the father who watches over his child's welfare without ceasing, which is how God, and a true guide, must act.

GATHA 2896 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, bliss meeting bliss

मराठी मूळ

सुख सुखा भेटे । मग तोडिल्या न तुटे ॥1॥
रविरिश्मकळा । नये घालितां पैं डोळां ॥ध्रु.॥
दुरि तें जवळी । स्नेहें आकाशा कवळी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे चित्त । माझें पायीं अखंडित॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When bliss meets bliss, the bond cannot be broken. The sun's radiance cannot be captured in the eyes.

What seemed distant draws near; love embraces the very sky. Says Tuka, my mind rests unbroken at His feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When bliss meets bliss, the bond cannot be cut. The sun's blaze cannot be caught and held in the eye. What was far comes near; love takes the whole sky in its arms. Tuka says: my mind rests unbroken at His feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tries to say what union feels like and admits it cannot be measured by ordinary means. When his own bliss meets God's bliss, the two fuse into a bond that no force can sever. Like the sun's light, which the eye cannot seize and contain, this joy is too vast to be grasped from outside. In that state the distance collapses, what was far is suddenly near, and love grows large enough to embrace the whole sky. The plain fact underneath all the images is the last line: his mind now rests at God's feet without a break.

GATHA 2897 Prayers

Prayer, grace costs You nothing

मराठी मूळ

तुह्मां न पडे वेच । माझा सरेल संकोच ॥1॥
फुकासाटीं जोडे यश । येथें कां करा आळस ॥ध्रु.॥
कृपेचें भुकेलें। होय जीवदान केलें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे शिकविलें । माझें ऐकावें विठ्ठलें॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It costs You nothing, and my hesitation will end. Glory is gained for free; why then be lazy about it? One who hungers for grace: to give such a one life is a deed of mercy.

Says Tuka, O Vitthal, hear what I have taught; it is my earnest plea.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It costs you nothing, and my shyness will be over. Glory is gained for free; why be lazy about it here? Here is one who hungers for grace. To give such a one life is an act of mercy. Tuka says: O Vitthal, listen to what I have taught you; it is my plea.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses God with a kind of holy bargaining. Saving him costs God nothing, and it would end his own embarrassment of standing as a beggar; so why delay? He points out that the glory of mercy is gained at no price, so there is no reason for God to be slow about it. Then he names himself plainly: a man starving for grace, and to grant life to such a one is exactly what mercy is for. The closing turns the usual order on its head, with the devotee gently instructing God to listen, which is itself the boldness that intimacy with Vitthal allows.

GATHA 2898 Confession and Sin

Confession, the blade in Your hand

मराठी मूळ

लोक ह्मणती मज देव । हा तों अधर्म उपाव ॥1॥
आतां कळेल तें करीं । सीस तुझे हातीं सुरी ॥ध्रु.॥
अधिकार नाहीं। पूजा करिती तैसा कांहीं ॥2॥
मन जाणे पापा । तुका ह्मणे मायबापा॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

People call me a god; that is a sinful notion. Now do whatever You know to be right; the blade is in Your hand.

I have no authority, yet people worship me as though I do. Says Tuka, O Mother and Father, the mind knows its own sins.

IN PLAIN WORDS

People call me a god. That is a sinful idea. Now do whatever you see is right; the knife is in your hand, and my head beneath it. I have no such authority, yet people worship me as if I do. Tuka says: O Mother and Father, the mind knows its own sins.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is recoiling from the reverence others place on him. To be called a god is to him a sin, a false claim he refuses to wear. He surrenders himself completely to Vitthal, laying his head under the blade and inviting God to do whatever is just. The danger he feels is real: people worship him as though he holds an authority he knows he does not have, and he will not let the lie stand. The last line is the heart of the confession, that whatever others see, his own mind knows the truth of its sins, and he speaks it openly to God as a child to a parent.

GATHA 2899 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, still the tongue

मराठी मूळ

एका ह्मणे भलें । आणिका सहज चि निंदिलें ॥1॥
कांहीं न करितां आयास । सहज घडले ते दोष ॥ध्रु.॥
बरें वाइटाचें। नाहीं मज कांहीं साचें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे वाणी । खंडोनि राहावें चिंतनीं॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One person calls it good, another naturally finds fault. Without any effort on my part, blame comes of its own accord.

I possess nothing real of either good or bad. Says Tuka, still the tongue and remain absorbed in inner contemplation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One man calls it good. Another finds fault without trying. I do nothing, and the blame still comes on its own. I have nothing truly good or bad of my own. Tuka says: stop the tongue and stay in inner contemplation.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram notices that praise and blame have nothing to do with him. The same act one person calls good another condemns, and the fault-finding comes whether or not he has done anything at all. So he lets go of ownership: he claims no real good and no real bad as his, since both are only the world's verdicts. The conclusion is the practice, to stop arguing back, still the tongue, and sink into inner contemplation. The point is that the answer to the world's contradictory judgments is not defense but silence turned inward toward God.

GATHA 2900 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, no more evasion

मराठी मूळ

आणिलें सेवटा । आतां कामा नये फांटा ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have brought this to its conclusion; no more evasion will serve. Claim me as Your own, O Narayana, and accept me.

I have spent all my speech as an offering at Your feet. Says Tuka, I hold Your feet; forgive my offenses.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have brought this to the end. Now no dodging will do. Call me your own, O Narayana; take me up. I have spent all my speech as an offering at your feet. Tuka says: I hold your feet. Forgive my wrongs.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reaches the final point of his surrender and shuts the door on any way out. He has carried things as far as they go, and there is no room left for evasion or excuse on either side. He asks Narayana to claim him outright, to say this one is mine and lift him up. He reports that everything he had, all his words and skill, has already been poured out as an offering at God's feet, so nothing is held back. The poem ends in the simplest posture of refuge: gripping the feet, asking forgiveness for his offenses, with nothing left to bargain with.

GATHA 2901 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the harvest of God

मराठी मूळ

न करा टांचणी । येथें कांहीं आडचणी ॥1॥
जिव्हा अमुप करी माप । विठ्ठल पिकला माझा बाप ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे सर्वकाळ । अवघा गोविंद गोपाळ ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not stint or create obstacles here. My tongue makes an immeasurable measure; Vitthal, my father, has ripened fully within me.

Says Tuka, at all times, everywhere, there is only Govinda Gopal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not hold back. There is no trouble here, nothing to block the way. My tongue measures and measures, and the measure never runs out. Vitthal, my father, has ripened full inside me. Tuka says: at all times there is only Govinda Gopal, everywhere.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is in the overflow of a name that cannot be exhausted. He tells whoever is listening not to ration the Name or set up obstacles, because there is no shortage to fear. His tongue keeps measuring out God like grain, yet the store never empties; he calls Vitthal a crop that has fully ripened in him, his own father grown sweet and ready. The poem ends in the only thing he can see now: at every moment, everywhere he looks, there is nothing but Govinda Gopal.

GATHA 2902 The Power of the Name

The Name, refusal of Vaikuntha

मराठी मूळ

तुझ्या नामाची आवडी । आह्मी विठो तुझीं वेडीं॥1॥
आतां न वजों अणिकां ठायां । गाऊं गीत लागों पायां ॥ध्रु.॥
काय वैकुंठ बापुडें । तुझ्या प्रेमासुखापुढें ॥2॥

तुका ह्मणे तुझ्या पायीं । जन्ममरणा ठाव नाहीं ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have fallen in love with Your Name, O Vittho; I am mad for You. Now I will not go to any other place; I will sing songs and cling to Your feet.

What is Vaikuntha, that poor thing, compared to the joy of Your love? In the gathering of saints there is an abundance of love's bliss. Says Tuka, at Your feet, birth and death find no foothold.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have fallen in love with Your Name, Vittho; I am mad for You. Now I will not go anywhere else. I will sing the song and cling to Your feet. What is poor little Vaikuntha next to the joy of loving You? Where the saints gather, the bliss of love is in abundance. Tuka says: at Your feet, birth and death have no foothold.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram has lost his heart to the Name and admits he is mad for Vittho. Having found this, he refuses to wander to any other refuge; his whole plan is to sing and hold the feet. Then he weighs even heaven against this love and calls Vaikuntha a poor little thing beside the joy of loving God, especially as it pours out where devotees gather. The closing claim is the boldest: at those feet there is no place left for birth and death to stand, so love of the Name is itself release.

GATHA 2903 The Power of the Name

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Because of the sugar within, the king regards the wrapping paper with respect. In the same way, our human worth exists solely because of Rama's Name.

Because of the blade within, the king handles the wooden handle. Because of the jewel within, the wealthy wear a lac ornament around the neck.

Because of the deity within, the idol sits upon the altar. Says Tuka, because of the bliss of Brahman, Tuka has become dear to all good people.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Because of the sugar inside, the king treats even the wrapping paper with respect. In the same way, all our human worth comes only from Rama's Name. Because of the blade inside, the king grips the wooden handle. Because of the jewel inside, rich people wear a lac ornament at the throat. Because of the deity inside, the idol sits on the altar. Tuka says: because of the bliss of Brahman, Tuka has become dear to good people.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram explains why anything humble is honored: it is the precious thing hidden inside that earns the respect. Plain paper is handled with care only because it wraps sugar; a wooden handle is gripped only for the blade it holds; a cheap lac bead is worn at a rich neck only for the jewel set in it; an idol is enthroned only for the deity it carries. He turns this on us: human life has worth solely because Rama's Name lives in it. And he applies it to himself last, saying he is dear to the good not for his own sake but for the bliss of Brahman that fills him.

GATHA 2904 Worldly Life

Worldly life, the fickleness of wealth

मराठी मूळ

धनवंतालागीं । सर्वमान्यता आहे जगीं ॥1॥
माता पिता बंधु जन । सर्व मानिती वचन ॥ध्रु.॥
जव मोठा चाले धंदा । तंव बहिण म्हणे दादा ॥2॥
सदा शृंगारभूषणें । कांता लवे बहुमानें॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे धन । भाग्य अशाश्वत जाण ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The wealthy man is honored by all the world. Mother, father, brothers, and the whole community respect his word.

As long as his business thrives, even a sister lovingly calls him 'brother.' His wife adorns herself and serves him with great regard. Says Tuka, know that wealth and fortune are impermanent.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The whole world honors the rich man. Mother, father, brothers, everyone treats his word as law. As long as the big business is running, even his sister calls him 'dada.' His wife dresses up and bows to him with great respect. Tuka says: know that wealth and fortune do not last.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out, coldly and exactly, how the world bends toward money. The wealthy man's word is taken as final by parents, siblings, and neighbors alike, and the respect tracks the cash, not the man. He sharpens it with the family scene: while the business thrives, even his own sister sweetens to him and his wife adorns herself and defers. Then he pulls the floor out: all of this rests on wealth, and wealth is not permanent, so the honor it buys is borrowed and will be recalled. The warning is not against the relatives but against trusting a regard that money alone holds up.

GATHA 2905 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the senseless one

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A donkey brays without considering the time or place. The wicked and reckless receive punishment as they deserve.

Such a one never learns in any age that kicking will bring consequences. Says Tuka, he does not know what is proper, nor what is right, nor what is in his own best interest.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A donkey brays without thinking of time or place. The wicked, reckless fool gets the punishment he earns. He never learns, in any age, that kicking out brings a beating. Tuka says: he does not know what is fitting, or what is right, or what is good for him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the pattern of a person who acts with no sense of where or when, like a donkey that brays anywhere. Such a one lashes out and is then surprised by the consequences, never connecting the kick to the beating that follows. The point is not contempt for any single man but a warning about reckless heedlessness, which earns the punishment it brings on itself. He closes flatly: this kind of mind cannot tell what is proper, what is just, or what is in its own true interest, and that blindness is its own undoing. Read it as a mirror for the moments we act without weighing time, place, and consequence.

GATHA 2906 The Power of the Name

The Name, the chain that frees

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे नाम सिका । पटीं बैसलों निजसुखा॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let the Name be the chain upon your throat; then Death itself is pushed aside. Accept this bond or refuse it; the bond and the cash are equal in value.

If you refuse the bond and refuse the instruction, then guard your nose and ears. Ravana refused the teaching, and his entire lineage was destroyed.

Shiva accepted the lethal poison, and his entire body became cool and blissful. Says Tuka, learn the Name, and sit in the seat of inner peace.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let the Name be the chain on your throat; then Death is pushed back. Accept the bond or accept the order: the bond and the cash are equal. If you refuse the bond and refuse the order, then guard your nose and ears. Ravana refused the teaching, and his whole line was wiped out. Shiva accepted the deadly poison, and his whole body went cool. Tuka says: learn the Name, and sit in the seat of your own peace.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram offers the Name as a willing chain: wear it on your throat and even death is held off. He frames it as a debtor's choice, a bond or a written order, and says the promise and the coin are worth the same, so there is no loss in accepting. To refuse is dangerous; he points to two opposite fates. Ravana rejected the teaching and his whole dynasty was destroyed; Shiva swallowed the world's poison and it turned cool and blissful in him. The lesson he draws is simple: take the Name in, and you sit down in your own native peace.

GATHA 2907 Autobiography

Autobiography, God in all beings

मराठी मूळ

भूतीं देव ह्मणोनि भेटतों या जना । नाहीं हे भावना नरनारी ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे नाहीं पडत उपवास । फिरतसे आस धरोनियां॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Seeing God in all beings, I greet every person I meet; I make no distinction of man or woman. Panduranga knows the devotion within; there is no need for outward display.

Out of compassion I have taken on this outward show of activity, so that through story and discourse dull jivas may cross over. Says Tuka, I am not observing a fast; I move about carrying this hope within.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I greet every person I meet because God is in all beings; I do not divide them into man and woman. Panduranga knows the devotion inside me; I do not need to give an outward proof. Out of compassion I have spread out this show of activity, so that through story and discourse heavy souls may cross over. Tuka says: I am not keeping a fast; I move about carrying this hope inside me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram explains his own conduct as a man others may misread. He bows to whoever he meets, man or woman alike, because he sees God in every being, and he does not need to perform piety since Panduranga already knows what is in his heart. He admits that his visible round of activity, the singing and the telling, is itself a deliberate show, taken on out of compassion so that dull, weighed-down souls can cross the world on the boat of these stories. He ends by clearing up a misreading: he is not fasting or performing austerity; he simply wanders carrying one hope, that others be carried over.

GATHA 2908

Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the unburdened mind

मराठी मूळ

हारपल्याची नका चित्तीं । धरूं खंती वांयां च ॥1॥
पावलें तें ह्मणा देवा । सहज सेवा या नांवें ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे मोकळें मन । अवघें पुण्य या नांवें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not hold sorrow in your chitta over what has been lost. Accept what has come as God's gift; that is the meaning of effortless service.

Whatever is destined comes through experience; gain is won through right intention. Says Tuka, a free and unburdened mind is itself the whole of merit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not keep grieving in your heart over what is lost; the sorrow is wasted. Say of whatever has come, 'It is God's'; that is what easy service means. Whatever is destined happens through experience; the real gain is won by right intention. Tuka says: a free, unburdened mind, that itself is the whole of merit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram teaches a quiet surrender about loss and gain. He tells you to stop nursing grief over what is gone, since the grieving changes nothing and only wastes you. Instead, take whatever does arrive as given by God; receiving it that way is what effortless service actually is. He notes that what is fated will play out through experience anyway, and the gain that matters is decided by the intention you hold, not the outcome you grab. His conclusion makes the whole teaching simple: a mind left free and unburdened is itself the entire stock of merit you need.

तुका ह्मणे विटंबना । नारायणा चुकली ॥6॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The cloth had slipped and was about to fall; the people were watching in amusement. But the one who adjusted it in time sees the world as good and himself as whole.

Through this alert wakefulness the link to careless behavior was broken. Whatever service the body was performing, the awareness fell into place swiftly.

Everything was straightened out properly under the gaze of those watching. Fortunate that the eyes opened from that state of distress.

Says Tuka, the disgrace before Narayana has been averted.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The cloth had come loose and was about to fall, and the people were watching, enjoying it. But the one who set it right in time sees the world as good and himself as whole. By this waking alertness, the tie to careless behavior was cut. Whatever the body was doing, awareness dropped into place quickly. It was straightened out properly, under the watching eyes in front. Lucky that the eyes opened, out from that distress. Tuka says: the disgrace before Narayana has been averted.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses a homely image of a garment slipping off in public, with onlookers ready to be amused by the shame. The one who catches and adjusts it in time is saved, and afterward sees the world kindly and himself as intact. Read as the inner life, the slipping cloth is heedless conduct, and the saving move is a flash of wakefulness that cuts the habit before it exposes you. Whatever the body was busy with, awareness snapped back into place just in time and set things right before watching eyes. He counts it good fortune that the eyes opened out of that near-disgrace, and says the shame that would have fallen before Narayana was averted.

तुका ह्मणे ऐशी जयाची सत्ता । कां तया अनंता विसरलेती ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The tongue knows bitter, sweet, and salty, but the rest of the body cannot. The eyes see, the mouth speaks, and the mind perceives joy and sorrow.

The nose knows fragrance, the ears receive sound; one organ's function cannot be done by another. Within a single body, distinct capacities have been placed; the puppeteer pulls the strings and the puppet dances.

Says Tuka, such is the power of that One; why then have you forgotten the Infinite?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The tongue knows bland, sweet, and salty; the rest of the body cannot. The eyes see, the mouth speaks, and the mind feels joy and sorrow. The nose knows smell, the ears take in sound; one organ's work cannot be done by another. In one body these separate powers are placed, and the puppeteer pulls the strings and the puppet dances. Tuka says: such is the power of that One; why then have you forgotten the Infinite?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram points to the ordinary marvel of the body to argue for its hidden master. Each sense does only its own work: the tongue tastes but cannot see, the eyes see but cannot taste, the nose smells and the ears hear, and none can trade places. Yet all these unlike powers are set together in a single body and made to act in concert, like a puppet whose limbs move only because a hand pulls the strings. He names the conclusion: that ordering hand is the power of the One. And he turns it into a reproach to the listener: if that Infinite runs your every sense, how have you managed to forget the very One who works you?

GATHA 2911 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the treasure at hand

मराठी मूळ

न लगे द्यावा जीव सहज चि जाणार । आहे तो विचार जाणा कांहीं ॥1॥
तुका ह्मणे कई होईल स्वहित । निधान जो थीत टाकुं पाहे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There is no need to give up your life; it will leave on its own soon enough. Know this much and reflect upon it.

Says Tuka, how will one's own good be served if one tries to abandon the treasure that is right at hand?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There is no need to throw your life away; it will leave on its own soon enough. Know just this much, and think it over. Tuka says: how will your own good be served if you try to throw away the treasure that is right at hand?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers the impulse to discard the body, whether by despair or harsh austerity, with plain sense. There is no need to give up your life on purpose, he says, because it will depart by itself in good time anyway. The real point is what you do while you have it. He calls this human birth a treasure lying right in your hand, and asks how throwing it away could ever serve your own good. The exhortation is to use the life you have for what truly profits the soul, not to waste or destroy it.

तुका ह्मणे तुज काय मागों आह्मी । फुकाचे कां ना भी ह्मणसी ना ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

People spend money searching for servants, while I offer myself to You for nothing and ask forcefully for the privilege. Even without being near You, I will work earnestly for Your good, placing my life and devotion at Your feet.

I will not give this body the pleasures it craves, so that You, O generous Lord, may be pleased. I will spread Your glory through my own effort; why then are You indifferent, O Panduranga? Says Tuka, what should we ask of You? Why do You not at least say no to what is given freely?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

People spend money to find servants; I offer myself to You for free, and I ask for it forcefully. Even when I am not near You, I will work hard for Your good and lay my life and love at Your feet. I will not give my body the pleasures it wants, so that You, generous Lord, may be pleased. I will spread Your glory by my own effort; why then are You indifferent, Panduranga? Tuka says: what should we even ask of You? Why will You not at least say no to what is offered free?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses a loving complaint at God. Others have to pay to get servants, but he comes offering himself for nothing, and even demands the privilege of serving. He promises to labor for God's glory even from a distance, to set his whole life and devotion at the feet, and to deny his own body its pleasures only to please his generous Lord. Having given all this freely, he protests the silence: why does Panduranga stay so unmoved? The closing line turns the hurt into wit; he is not even asking for a reward, so the least God could do is acknowledge the free offering instead of ignoring it. Under the teasing is the ache of a devotee who wants to be received.

GATHA 2913 Devotion to Vitthal

Humility, the unneeded servant

मराठी मूळ

काय लवण किळकेविण । एके क्षीण सागरा ॥1॥
मां हे येवढी अडचण । नारायणीं मजविण ॥ध्रु.॥
कुबेरा अटाहासे जोडी । काय कवडी कारणें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे काचमणि । कोण गणी भांडारी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What is one pinch of salt more or less to the vast ocean? Is my absence such a great difficulty for Narayana? What is a single cowrie to the heaping wealth of Kubera? Says Tuka, who counts a glass bead in a treasury of gems?

IN PLAIN WORDS

What is one pinch of salt to the vast ocean? Will the sea grow less by it? Is my absence such a great trouble to Narayana? Does he need me to fill it? What is a single cowrie to the heaped wealth of Kubera? Tuka says: who counts one glass bead in a treasury of gems?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures his own worth against God's fullness and finds it tiny, and he says so plainly. He is not begging; he is reasoning. The ocean is no smaller for one grain of salt, Kubera's hoard is no greater for one cowrie, a treasury of jewels does not miss one glass bead. By the same logic Narayana lacks nothing if Tukaram is gone. The point is not despair but truth: God is complete in himself, and the devotee comes to him owning that he adds nothing and is welcomed anyway.

GATHA 2914 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the names reversed

मराठी मूळ

तुज मज नाहीं भेद । केला सहज विनोद ॥1॥
तूं माझा आकार । मी तों तूं च निर्धार ॥ध्रु.॥
मी तुजमाजी देवा । घेसी माझ्या अंगें सेवा ॥2॥
मी तुजमाजी अचळ । मजमाजी तुझें बळ॥3॥
तूं बोलसी माझ्या मुखें । मी तों तुजमाजी सुखें ॥4॥
तुका ह्मणे देवा । विपरीत ठायीं नांवा ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Between You and me there is no real difference; this is a spontaneous play. You are my form and I am truly You.

I dwell within You, O God, and You take service through my body. I am immovable within You, and Your strength resides within me.

You speak through my mouth, and I rest happily within You. Says Tuka, O God, in this paradox the names are reversed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Between you and me there is no difference; this is a play that happened on its own. You are my form, and I am you, for certain. I live inside you, God, and through my body you take service. I am unmoving inside you, and inside me is your strength. You speak through my mouth, and I rest happily inside you. Tuka says: God, in this turning the names are reversed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the moment when the line between worshipper and worshipped has dissolved. He does not say he has become great; he says the two have folded into each other so completely that you cannot tell which is doing what. His body is where God acts, his mouth is where God speaks, his stillness rests in God and God's power rests in him. The closing line is the key: at this depth the labels of "you" and "me" swap and stop meaning anything separate. This is union spoken from inside the union, not described from outside it.

GATHA 2915 The Saints

The saints, company that purifies

मराठी मूळ

वैराग्याचें भाग्य । संतसंग हा चि लाग ॥1॥
संतकृपेचे हे दीप । करी साधका निष्पाप ॥ध्रु.॥
तो चि देवभक्त । भेदाभेद नाहीं ज्यांत ॥2॥
तुका प्रेमें नाचे गाये । गाणियांत विरोन जाये ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The fortune of dispassion is found in the company of saints alone. The lamp of the saints' grace purifies the seeker of all sin.

A true devotee of God is one in whom no sense of division or separation remains. Says Tuka, he sings and dances with love, losing himself entirely in the song.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The fortune of dispassion is found only in the company of saints; that is the way to it. The lamp of the saints' grace makes the seeker free of sin. He alone is a true devotee of God in whom no sense of division is left. Tuka says: he dances and sings with love, and melts away into the song.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram points to where detachment actually comes from: not solitary effort but the company of saints. Their grace is a lamp; standing near it, the seeker is cleansed. He then sets the test of a real devotee, which is that no sense of "me and you," no inner division, remains in him. The closing image shows what that looks like from the outside: a man so given over that he loses himself in singing and dancing. The path here is relational, not solitary; you are purified by keeping such company.

GATHA 2916 The Power of the Name

The Name, kirtan is enough

मराठी मूळ

जप तप ध्यान न लगे धारणा । विठ्ठलकीर्त्तनामाजी सर्व ॥1॥
राहें माझ्या मना दृढ या वचनीं । आणिक तें मनीं न धरावें ॥ध्रु.॥
कीर्तनसमाधि साधन ते मुद्रा । राहतील थारा धरोनियां॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे मुक्ति हरिदासांच्या घरीं । वोळगती चारी ऋद्धिसिद्धि ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

No japa, austerity, meditation, or concentration is needed; everything is contained within Vitthal's kirtan. O my mind, remain firm in this truth and entertain no other thought.

Kirtan is the true samadhi, the true practice, the true seal; all other pursuits will settle down of their own accord. Says Tuka, liberation itself dwells in the home of Hari's devotees, and all four forms of supernatural power wait upon them.

IN PLAIN WORDS

No japa, no austerity, no meditation, no holding the mind still is needed; everything is held inside the kirtan of Vitthal. Stay firm in this word, my mind, and keep no other thought. Kirtan is the true samadhi, the true practice, the true seal; all other things settle down on their own. Tuka says: liberation lives in the house of Hari's servants, and all four powers wait upon them.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sweeps aside the whole ladder of disciplines, japa, penance, meditation, breath control, and says one practice contains them all: singing Vitthal's praise. He is not dismissing the disciplines as worthless but claiming kirtan already holds whatever they were reaching for. He calls it the true samadhi and the true seal, the thing the other methods only point at. Then he raises the stakes: in the home of Hari's devotees, liberation is not pursued but simply present, and the supernatural powers that others strain for come and wait at the door. The devotee who sings has already arrived where the others are still climbing.

GATHA 2917 Prayers

Prayer, only remembrance

मराठी मूळ

नाहीं तुज कांहीं मागत संपत्ती । आठवण चित्तीं असों द्यावी ॥1॥
सरलिया भोग येईन सेवटीं । पायापें या भेटी अनुसंधानें ॥ध्रु.॥
आतां मजसाटीं याल आकारास । रोकडी हे आस नाहीं देवा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे मुखीं असो तुझें नाम । देईल तो श्रम देवो काळ ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I do not ask You for any wealth; just let Your remembrance abide in my chitta. When worldly experience has run its course, I shall come to Your feet at the end, through the thread of that remembrance.

I do not ask that You take form in this world just for my sake; that is not my present desire, O God. Says Tuka, let Your Name remain on my lips; let time and labor take their course.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I ask you for no wealth; only let your remembrance stay in my mind. When my worldly portion is used up, I will come to your feet at the end, on the thread of that remembrance. I do not ask you to take a body in this world for my sake; that is not my present wish, God. Tuka says: let your Name stay on my lips; let time and toil do whatever they do.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips his prayer down to a single request: not riches, not even a miraculous appearance of God in the flesh, but only that the memory of God never leave his heart. He is content to let his ordinary life run its full course; he does not want it cut short or rescued. His one provision for the end is the thread of remembrance, which he trusts will carry him to God's feet when the body is spent. The last line hands everything else over: let time and hardship come as they will, so long as the Name stays on his lips. It is a prayer that asks for almost nothing and stakes everything on it.

GATHA 2918 Autobiography

Autobiography, words for waking

मराठी मूळ

हितावरी यावें । कोणी बोलिलों या भावें ॥1॥
नव्हे विनोदउत्तर । केले रंजवाया चार ॥ध्रु.॥
केली अटाअटी । अक्षरांची देवासाटीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे खिजों । नका जागा येथें निजों ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let someone come to benefit from these words; that is the spirit in which I have spoken. These are not casual remarks made merely to amuse.

I have wrestled with words for God's sake alone. Says Tuka, do not be angry; here is a place to awaken, not to sleep.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let someone come and gain by these words; that is the spirit in which I spoke them. They are not jokes made to amuse you. I have struggled hard with these letters, and only for God's sake. Tuka says: do not be angry. This is a place to wake up, not to sleep.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells us why he made his poems and how he wants them taken. They were not written to entertain; they were hard labor over each word, done for God alone. He hopes the listener will actually benefit, will be changed, rather than merely enjoy the verses. The closing line warns against two wrong responses: do not take offense at the sharpness, and do not drowse through it. His abhangas are meant to wake a person, and he asks the reader to come awake rather than be lulled or stung.

GATHA 2919 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, all become Narayana

मराठी मूळ

संचित प्रारब्ध क्रियमाण । अवघा जाला नारायण॥1॥
नाहीं आह्मांसी संबंधु । जरा मरण कांहीं बाधु ॥ध्रु.॥
द्वैताद्वैतभावें। अवघें व्यापियेलें देवें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे हरि । आह्मांमाजी क्रीडा करी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Past karma, destiny, and present action have all become Narayana. We have no connection any longer with old age, death, or any affliction.

Through duality and non-duality alike, everything has been pervaded by God. Says Tuka, Hari plays within us.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Stored karma, ripened fate, present action: all of it has become Narayana. We have no tie left to it. Old age, death, none of it can harm us. Through duality and non-duality alike, God has filled everything. Tuka says: Hari is at play inside us.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names the three kinds of karma the tradition counts, the stored, the ripening, and the freshly made, and says all three have turned into God himself. Once that is seen, the chain that bound him to consequence is cut: aging and death no longer have a hold on him. He insists this fills both sides of every distinction, whether you speak in terms of difference or of oneness, God pervades it. The verse ends not in escape but in delight: what is happening inside him is simply Hari's own play. Liberation here is not a future reward but a present recognition that there was never anything but God.

GATHA 2920 Prayers

Prayer, the drowning man's cry

मराठी मूळ

नेणे करूं सेवा । पांडुरंगा कृपाळुवा ॥1॥
धांवें बुडतों मी काढीं । सत्ता आपुलिया ओढीं ॥ध्रु.॥
क्रियाकर्महीन । जालों इंद्रियां अधीन ॥2॥
तुका विनंती करी । वेळोवेळां पाय धरी॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I do not know how to serve You, O compassionate Panduranga. Come running; I am drowning.

Pull me out by the strength of Your own will. I have become helpless, a slave to the senses, devoid of right action.

Says Tuka, making his plea again and again, clinging to Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I do not know how to serve you, merciful Panduranga. Come running and pull me out; I am drowning. Drag me up by your own power. I have no good deeds; I have become a slave to the senses. Tuka says, pleading again and again, holding your feet over and over.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays from the bottom, admitting he cannot even do the one thing a devotee is supposed to do, namely serve. He casts himself as a man going under and asks God to come at a run. The rescue, he says plainly, must be God's doing and not his own merit, because he has none and has fallen under the rule of his senses. There is no bargaining here, only the bare cry of helplessness thrown on God's mercy. He clings to the feet again and again, which is the only act left to a man who cannot save himself.

GATHA 2921 The Nature of God

Nature of God, beyond the Vedas

मराठी मूळ

जयापासोनि सकळ । महीमंडळ जालें ॥1॥
तो एक पंढरीचा राणा । नये श्रुती अनुमाना ॥ध्रु.॥
विवादती जयासाठीं। जगजेटी तो विठ्ठल ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे तो आकळ । आहे सकळव्यापक॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He from whom this entire earth was born is the one King of Pandhari, beyond the reach of even the Vedas' speculation. It is over Him that the scriptures debate.

That Lord of the world is Vitthal. Says Tuka, He is beyond comprehension, yet He pervades all things.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He from whom this whole earth was born is the one King of Pandhari. The Vedas cannot reach him by guessing. The one the scriptures argue over is Vitthal, the master of the world. Tuka says: he cannot be grasped, yet he spreads through everything.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram identifies the source of all creation with the figure who stands on the brick at Pandhari. The same God the Vedas strain after and cannot pin down by reasoning, the one the scriptures dispute among themselves, is simply Vitthal, near and present at the shrine. He sets two truths side by side without softening either: this God is beyond comprehension, and this God fills all that exists. The unspoken claim is that what the learned chase through argument, the devotee finds standing plainly at Pandhari.

GATHA 2922 The Nature of God

Nature of God, formless yet near

मराठी मूळ

नाहीं रूप नाहीं नांव । नाहीं ठाव धराया ॥1॥
जेथें जावें तेथें आहे । विठ्ठल मायबहीण ॥ध्रु.॥
नाहीं आकार विकार । चराचर भरलेंसे ॥2॥
नव्हे निर्गुण सगुण । जाणे कोण तयासी॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे भावाविण । त्याचें मन वोळेना ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He has no form, no name, no place that can hold Him. Yet wherever you go, Vitthal is there, like a mother and sister.

He has no shape, no modification; He fills all that moves and does not move. He is neither formless nor with form; who can truly know Him? Says Tuka, without sincere devotion, His heart will not turn toward you.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He has no form, no name, no place that can hold him. Yet wherever you go, there is Vitthal, like a mother and a sister. He has no shape, no change; he fills all that moves and all that does not. He is neither without form nor with form; who can really know him? Tuka says: without true love, his heart will not turn to you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram holds together two things that sound opposite. God has no form, no name, no fixed place, and yet he is met everywhere, as close and tender as one's own mother and sister. He is beyond the categories the mind reaches for, neither merely formless nor merely embodied, so no one can simply know him by thinking. The last line gives the one key that does open him: love. Knowledge fails where devotion succeeds; God's heart turns only toward the one who comes with true feeling, not toward the one who comes with clever definitions.

GATHA 2923 The Nature of God

Nature of God, the hidden puppeteer

मराठी मूळ

आहे सकळां वेगळा । खेळे कळा चोरोनि ॥1॥
खांबसुत्राचिये परी । देव दोरी हालवितो ॥ध्रु.॥
आपण राहोनि निराळा । कैसी कळा नाचवी ॥2॥
जेव्हां असुडितो दोरी । भूमीवरी पडे तेव्हां ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे तो जाणावा । सखा करावा आपुला ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He remains apart from all, yet plays His hidden arts. Like a puppeteer with strings and a pole, God pulls the threads and makes everything move.

Remaining separate and detached, He makes the show dance. When He releases the strings, the puppet falls to the ground.

Says Tuka, know who He is and make Him your own beloved friend.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He stands apart from all things and plays his arts in secret. Like a puppeteer with a pole and strings, God pulls the cords and makes everything move. Staying separate himself, see how he makes the show dance. When he lets go of the strings, the puppet falls to the ground. Tuka says: know him, and make him your own friend.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram offers an image for how God works in the world: a puppeteer who stays offstage while the whole show moves at his hand. Everything that lives and acts is moved by strings it cannot see; the moment God releases them, the figure drops lifeless. The point is that no creature has its own independent power; all motion is borrowed and on loan. But the verse does not end in fear of this hidden controller. Tukaram turns it warm: since he is the one moving everything, the wise response is to recognize him and take him as your own dear friend rather than a distant operator.

GATHA 2924 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, dyed in his color

मराठी मूळ

आतां पुढें मना । चाली जाली नारायणा ॥1॥
येथें राहिलें राहिलें । कैसें गुंतोनि उगलें ॥ध्रु.॥
भोवतें भोंवनी । आलियांची जाली धणी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे रंग रंग । रंगलें पांडुरंगे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now the mind has set forth on its journey toward Narayana. What was here has been left behind; how silently it has released its hold.

The rounds of those who kept circling have come to an end. Says Tuka, color upon color; everything has been dyed in the hue of Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now, my mind, you have set out toward Narayana. What stayed here has been left behind; how quietly it has let go. The rounds of those who kept circling have come to an end. Tuka says: color upon color, everything is dyed in the hue of Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram watches his own mind finally turn and move toward God, and he marvels at how silently the old attachments slipped their hold. The image of "those who kept circling" is the endless wandering of the unsettled mind, or of birth after birth; that circling is over now, the going-round has reached its end. What remains is one saturating image: everything has been dipped and dyed in the color of Panduranga, so that no part of him keeps its former tint. The mind that once roamed has come to rest by being wholly colored through with God.

GATHA 2925 Prayers

Prayer, slow to desire

मराठी मूळ

आळस पाडी विषयकामीं । शक्ती देई तुझ्या नामीं॥1॥
हे चि विनवणी विनवणी । विनविली धरा मनीं ॥ध्रु.॥
आणिक वचना मुकी वाणी । तुमच्या गजाॉ द्यावी गुणीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे पाय डोळां । पाहें एरवी अंधळा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Make me sluggish toward sensual desires, and grant me strength in Your Name. This is my one and only prayer; hold it in your minds.

Let my tongue be mute for any other speech, and give it eloquence only for singing Your praise. Says Tuka, let me see Your feet with my eyes; otherwise I am blind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Make me slow toward the cravings of the senses. Give me strength in Your Name. This is my one prayer, my only prayer; hold it in Your mind. Let my tongue go mute for any other speech. Give it eloquence only for singing Your praise. Tuka says: let me see Your feet with my eyes; without them I am blind.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks not to be strong against desire by force, but to be made sluggish toward it, as if the appetite for the senses simply lost its pull. The strength he wants is not his own willpower but a power lodged in the Name. He narrows everything to one request and presses God to keep it in mind. Then he asks for his very speech to be retuned: dumb toward small talk, fluent only in praise. Without the sight of God's feet, he counts himself blind, however much else he can see.

GATHA 2926 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, one work only

मराठी मूळ

कोण वेची वाणी । आतां क्षुल्लका कारणीं ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who would waste their speech now on trifling matters? From now on, this alone is my work: to hold Vitthal in the heart. I will not allow the mind's tendencies to rise up any further.

Says Tuka, after instructing the world, I become the madman myself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who would spend speech now on trifling things? From now on this alone is my work: to hold Vitthal in the heart. I will not let the mind's tendencies rise up again. Tuka says: after instructing the world, I become the madman myself.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram declares a single occupation and lets everything else fall away as not worth a word. The one work is to keep Vitthal held in the heart, and to refuse the old habits of mind the moment they try to stir. The closing line turns the irony on himself: he has spent his life teaching others, yet by the world's measure he is the one who looks deranged. He owns that name gladly, because the madness is only that he wants God and nothing smaller.

GATHA 2927 Prayers

Prayer, spare me bad company

मराठी मूळ

मागेन तें एक तुज । देई विचारोनि मज ॥1॥
नको दुर्जनांचा संग । क्षणक्षणा चित्तभंग ॥ध्रु.॥
जन्म घेईन मी नाना । बहु सोसीन यातना ॥2॥
रंक होईन दीनांचा । घायें देहपात साचा॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे हें चि आतां । देई देई तूं सर्वथा ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I ask You for only one thing; consider it and grant it to me. Never give me the company of the wicked, which shatters the mind moment by moment.

I will take any number of births and endure great suffering. I will become the poorest of the poor, and bear wounds upon this body.

Says Tuka, this one boon, give it to me now, give it without fail.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I ask You for one thing only; weigh it, and grant it to me. Do not give me the company of the wicked, which shatters the mind moment by moment. I will take any number of births. I will endure great suffering. I will become the poorest of the poor. I will bear wounds upon this body. Tuka says: this one boon, give it to me now, give it without fail.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a single request and stakes everything on it: keep him out of bad company. He is not asking to be spared pain; he volunteers for the opposite. He will accept endless rebirths, deep suffering, poverty, even a body broken by blows. What he will not accept is the constant company of the wicked, because it breaks the mind again and again and pulls it from God. The prayer measures the danger by what he is willing to trade for safety from it.

GATHA 2928 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, You are the doer

मराठी मूळ

जाणसी उचित । पांडुरंगा धर्मनीत ॥1॥
तरि म्यां बोलावें तें काई । सरे ऐसें तुझे पायीं ॥ध्रु.॥
पालटती क्षणें । संचितप्रारब्धक्रियमाण ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे सत्ता । होसी सकळ करिता॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You know what is proper, O Panduranga; You understand the ways of righteousness. Then what more should I say? Let my words be fulfilled at Your feet.

In an instant You can transform the store of past, destined, and present karma. Says Tuka, all power rests with You; You are the doer of everything.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You know what is right, Panduranga; You understand the ways of righteousness. So what is left for me to say? Let it be settled at Your feet. In an instant You can change the store of past karma, the destined karma, and the karma now ripening. Tuka says: all power rests with You; You are the doer of everything.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays down even the work of asking. Since Panduranga already knows what is proper and just, there is nothing he can add by speaking; he simply lets the matter rest at God's feet. He then names the full weight of karma, the stored, the destined, and the active, and says God can overturn all three in a single moment. The point is that the laws which bind a person are not above God; the very ledger of one's deeds is His to revise. So surrender, not argument, is the right posture before the one who does everything.

GATHA 2929 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, I will not let go

मराठी मूळ

तुह्मी कांटाळलां तरी । आह्मां न सोडणें हरी ॥1॥
जावें कवणिया ठाया । सांगा विनवितों पायां ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे ठाव । न सोडणें हा चि भाव ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if You grow weary, O Hari, we will not let You go. Where else should we turn? I ask this at Your feet.

I have staked my very life on this; now You may gladly pursue me. Says Tuka, this is my fixed resolve: I will not abandon this place.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even if You grow weary of us, Hari, we will not let You go. Where else are we to go? Tell me; I ask it at Your feet. I have staked my very life on this. Now You may gladly chase after me. Tuka says: this is my fixed resolve. I will not let go of this place.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the usual posture inside out. Instead of begging God not to leave, he warns that even if God tires of him, he will not loosen his grip. He has no other refuge, so the question, where else could I go, is not rhetorical but real. Having bet his life on this hold, he tells God the pursuit may now run the other way. The whole stance is one stubborn vow: he has found his place at the feet and he refuses to be pried loose.

GATHA 2930 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, only Hari is my trade

मराठी मूळ

येउनि संसारीं । मी तों एक जाणें हरी ॥1॥
नेणें आणिक कांहीं धंदा । नित्य ध्यातसें गोविंदा ॥ध्रु.॥
कामक्रोधलोभस्वार्थ। अवघा माझा पंढरिनाथ ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे एक । धणी विठ्ठल मी सेवक ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Having come into this world, I know only one thing: Hari. I know no other occupation; I ceaselessly meditate upon Govinda.

Desire, anger, greed, and self-interest: all of these are, for me, none other than the Lord of Pandhari. Says Tuka, Vitthal is the master and I am the servant, and that is the whole of it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Having come into this world, I know only one thing: Hari. I know no other trade. I meditate on Govinda without stopping. Desire, anger, greed, self-interest: for me these are all none other than the Lord of Pandhari. Tuka says: there is one thing only. Vitthal is the master, and I am the servant.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a life reduced to a single skill. He has no occupation but to remember Hari and to dwell on Govinda without pause. Then he says the boldest thing: even desire, anger, greed, and self-interest, the usual inner enemies, have become for him nothing but the Lord of Pandhari. The forces that drag others down he now turns entirely toward God, so they no longer pull him away. All of it collapses into one relation: Vitthal is the master, he is the servant, and that is the whole account.

GATHA 2931 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the ordinary turned divine

मराठी मूळ

सर्वपक्षीं हरि साहेसखा जाला । ओल्या अंगणीच्या कल्पलता त्याला ॥1॥
सहजचाली चालतां पायवाटे । चिंतामणींसमान होती गोटे ॥2॥
तुका तरी सहज बोले वाणी । त्याचे घरीं वेदांत वाहे पाणी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When Hari has become one's companion in every way, the wish-fulfilling trees spring up in one's own courtyard. Walking along the ordinary path with a natural gait, the pebbles underfoot become wish-fulfilling gems.

Says Tuka, when one speaks simply from the chitta, the Vedanta itself comes to carry water in one's home.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When Hari has become your friend and helper in every way, wish-granting trees spring up in your own courtyard. Walk the ordinary footpath with an easy gait, and the pebbles underfoot turn into wish-granting gems. Tuka says: when one speaks simply from the heart, the Vedanta itself comes to carry water in that one's home.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes what happens when God is wholly a companion, not a distant deity. The world does not change its furniture; it changes its worth. The common courtyard grows the tree that grants every wish, and the gravel of an everyday path becomes the gem that does the same. The point is that the divine quietly transfigures the ordinary for one who walks with God. The last image is the most daring: the lofty Vedanta, the crown of scripture, becomes a household servant fetching water, because plain speech from a heart full of God outranks all learning.

GATHA 2932 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, undeserved haste of grace

मराठी मूळ

काय पुण्य ऐसें आहे मजपाशीं । तांतडी धांवसी पांडुरंगा ॥1॥
काय ऐसा भक्त वांयां गेलों थोर । तूं मज समोर होसी वेगा ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे नाहीं ठाउकें संचित । येणें जन्महित नाहीं केलें ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What merit do I possess that You rush toward me so eagerly, O Panduranga? Am I such a great devotee that You should appear before me with such haste? Have You seen my laborious service and called me near so swiftly? Says Tuka, I do not know my store of past deeds; in this birth I have done nothing to merit such grace.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What merit do I have, that You come running to me in such a hurry, Panduranga? Am I such a great devotee that You appear before me so fast? Have You seen some hard service of mine, that You call me near so quickly? Tuka says: I do not know my store of past deeds. In this birth I have done nothing to earn this.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is amazed, not proud, that God rushes toward him. He runs through the obvious reasons one by one, merit, greatness as a devotee, hard service rendered, and rejects each as not true of him. He cannot point to any past store of good deeds, and he plainly says this life has earned nothing. The poem leaves only one explanation standing, unspoken but clear: God's haste is sheer grace, given to one who has no claim on it. The wonder is the whole point; deserving was never the cause.

GATHA 2933 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the bold reminder to God

मराठी मूळ

आमुचिया भावें तुज देवपण । तें कां विसरोन राहिलासी ॥1॥
समर्थासी नाहीं उपकारस्मरण । दिल्या आठवण वांचोनियां ॥ध्रु.॥
चळण वळण सेवकाच्या बळें । निर्गुणाच्यामुळें सांभाळावें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आतां आलों खंडावरी । प्रेम देउनि हरी बुझवावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It is by our devotion that You received Your divinity; why then have You forgotten this? The powerful do not remember the favor done to them; they recall only what they themselves have given. All Your movement and activity depend on the devotee's strength; as the Formless, You should be especially watchful.

Says Tuka, I have now come to the breaking point; console me, O Hari, by pouring out Your love.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Your godhood comes from our devotion. Why then have You sat there and forgotten it? The powerful do not remember a favor done to them; they remember only what they themselves have given. All Your moving and acting rests on the strength of Your servants. As the Formless, You should be all the more watchful over them. Tuka says: I have come now to the breaking point. Console me, Hari, by pouring out Your love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks to God with startling boldness, almost as a creditor. His claim is that the formless God takes on a knowable, worshipped divinity through the devotion of His servants, so the relationship is not one-sided. He charges that the powerful tend to forget favors received and recall only favors given, and asks God not to behave that way. If God's whole presence in the world rests on devotees, then God owes them special care. The poem ends not in accusation but in need: he has reached his limit and asks to be steadied by an outpouring of love.

GATHA 2934 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, beyond the body

मराठी मूळ

आह्मी मेलों तेव्हां देह दिला देवा । आतां करूं सेवा कोणाची ॥1॥
सूत्रधारी जैसा हालवितो कळा । तैसा तो पुतळा नाचे छंदें ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे तुह्मी आइका हो मात । आह्मी या अतीत देहाहूनी ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I died long ago; I gave this body to God. Now whose service could I possibly perform? As a puppeteer moves the puppet's limbs, so the figure dances at His will.

I speak as God makes me speak; what doubt could remain for me? The merit and sin belong to Him who controls it all; I have no connection to any of it. Says Tuka, hear this truth: we are beyond and apart from this body.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I died long ago; then I gave this body to God. Now whose service could I still perform? As a puppeteer moves the puppet's limbs, the figure dances at His will. I speak as God makes me speak. What doubt is left for me? The merit and the sin belong to the one who controls it all; I have no connection to any of it. Tuka says: hear this truth. We are beyond this body, apart from it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a death that happened while he is still alive: the sense of being a separate doer has ended, and the body has been handed over to God. With the doer gone, the question of doing service for anyone else no longer makes sense. He sees himself as a puppet on God's strings, even his speech moved by God, so no doubt can disturb him. Because he is not the one acting, the ledger of merit and sin is not his to carry; it belongs to the one who works the strings. His final claim is that the real self stands beyond the body altogether.

GATHA 2935 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, the vow that guards His feet

मराठी मूळ

लागों नेदीं बोल पायां तुझ्या हरी । जीव जावो परि न करीं आण ॥1॥
परनारी मज रखुमाईसमान । वमनाहूनि धन नीच मानीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे याची लाज असे कोणा । सहाकारी दीना ज्याची तया ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I will not let any stain touch Your feet, O Hari, even if my life should depart. I regard another's wife as equal to Mother Rukmini, and I consider wealth more vile than vomit.

Says Tuka, who should feel shame before such a vow? Only the one whom God Himself supports in his hour of need.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will not let any stain touch Your feet, Hari, even if my life leaves me. Another man's wife is to me the same as Mother Rukmini. Wealth I count lower than vomit. Tuka says: who should feel shame before such a vow? Only the one whom God Himself upholds in his hour of need.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram binds his conduct to his devotion: he will guard against any disgrace that could be charged against the God he serves, even at the cost of his life. He names the two great snares plainly. Another man's wife he regards as he would Mother Rukmini, beyond all desire, and wealth he holds more disgusting than vomit. These are not boasts but vows, and he says no one can stand by such vows alone. Only the person whom God Himself supports in the testing hour can keep them; the purity is real, but its strength is borrowed from grace.

The Name, the lame made to walk

तुका ह्मणे त्याची कोण जाणे कळा । चालवी पांगळा पायांविण ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The true meeting is the remembrance of His form; the jiva has found its rest in that love. Guard this treasure of joy carefully; partaking of it, both hunger and thirst vanish.

What seemed far away drew near of its own accord; the chitta embraced the jiva from within. Says Tuka, I take the Name again and again, and all my pulses become cool and calm. A starling sings in a sweet voice, yet the one who taught it stands apart.

What words can a wretch like me utter? Yet the Lord of the universe has made me speak. Says Tuka, who can know His art? He makes the lame walk without legs.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is the true meeting: the remembrance of His form. In that love the jiva has found its rest. Guard this treasure of joy with care. Taste it, and hunger and thirst both go. What was far off drew near on its own. The mind embraced the life within. Tuka says: I take the Name again and again, and all my pulses turn cool and calm. The starling sings in a sweet voice, but the master who taught it stands apart. What words could a wretch like me speak? Yet the Lord of the universe has made me speak them. Tuka says: who can know His art? He makes the lame walk without legs.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says the real meeting with God is not a vision but the steady remembrance of His form, and in that love the soul finally rests. He calls this remembrance a treasure to be guarded, one that quiets even hunger and thirst. What had seemed distant comes close by itself, and taking the Name over and over leaves him cooled and still in body and mind. Then he points away from himself: a sweet-voiced starling only repeats what its master taught, and likewise his own words are not his but spoken through him by the Lord of the universe. The closing image names the wonder of that art: God makes the lame walk without legs, doing through a helpless instrument what the instrument could never do on its own.

GATHA 2937 Appeals and Exhortations

Moral counsel, the true friend

मराठी मूळ

हित सांगे तेणें दिलें जीवदान । घातकी तो जाण मनामागें ॥1॥
बळें हे वारावे अधर्म करितां । अंधळें चालतां आडरानें ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे ऐसें आहे हें पुराणीं । नाहीं माझी वाणी पदरींची ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who gives you sound counsel gives you life itself; one who follows the whims of your mind is truly your slayer. One should forcibly restrain those headed toward unrighteousness, as one would stop a blind person walking into a wilderness.

Give them money and send them on pilgrimage; do not lend strength to thieves. Says Tuka, this is what the Puranas declare; these are not words from my own pocket.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The one who tells you what is good for you gives you your very life. The one who follows your mind's whims is your killer; know it. When someone is heading into wrong, restrain them by force, as you would stop a blind man walking into the wilderness. Give them money and send them on pilgrimage; do not lend your strength to a thief. Tuka says: this is what the Puranas declare. These words are not my own; they are not from my pocket.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram redraws the line between a friend and a flatterer. The one who tells you the hard, good thing is saving your life; the one who simply agrees with your impulses is leading you to ruin. Love, he says, is sometimes restraint: you stop a person walking into harm the way you would grab a blind man before he steps into a wasteland. Spend on what helps them and refuse to fund what destroys them. He closes by disclaiming originality, anchoring the teaching in scripture rather than his own opinion, so the demand lands as duty, not preference.

GATHA 2938 Renunciation

Renunciation, killing the will

मराठी मूळ

ऐसा घेई कां रे संन्यास । करीं संकल्पाचा नास॥1॥
मग तूं राहें भलते ठायीं । जनीं वनीं खाटे भोई ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे नभा । होई आणुचा ही गाभा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Take sannyasa in this way: destroy all mental intention. Then you may dwell anywhere at all, in the crowd or in the wilderness, on a cot or on the bare ground.

Cut through the cleverness of self-awareness and become free of all mental modification. Says Tuka, become the very essence of the sky, even finer than the atom.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why not take up sannyasa like this: destroy all your willing, all your intention. Then you can live anywhere at all, in the crowd or in the forest, on a cot or on the bare ground. Cut through the cleverness of self-awareness. Become free of every movement of the mind. Tuka says: become the sky itself, finer even than the atom.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram redefines renunciation as inward, not outward. The real sannyasa is not robes or a forest hut but the destruction of saṃkalpa, the willing and scheming that drives the mind. Once that is gone, place no longer matters: a crowd or a wilderness, a bed or bare earth, all are the same. He pushes past even the subtle pride of being self-aware, the cleverness that watches itself, and asks for freedom from every mental movement. The aim is to become spacious as the sky, yet subtler than the smallest atom, with nothing of the ego left to occupy room.

GATHA 2939 Prayers

Prayer, strip away the clinging self

मराठी मूळ

सोळा सहस्र होऊं येतें । भरलें रितें आह्मापें ॥1॥
ऐसे तुह्मां ठायाठाव । देव ह्मुण संपादे ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे पांडुरंगा । अंगलगा भिन्न करा॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I could have become sixteen thousand, filling and emptying at will. Such, O God, is the capacity You hold, making room wherever needed.

What stacking of logs upon logs is this? The mind simply takes what pleases it. Says Tuka, O Panduranga, separate what clings to the body.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I could have become sixteen thousand, filling and emptying at will. Such is the room You hold, O God; You make space wherever it is needed. What stacking of logs upon logs is this? The mind just takes whatever pleases it. Tuka says: O Panduranga, take this clinging to the body away from me; set it apart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts God's boundless capacity with the cramped grasping of his own mind. God can fill and empty endlessly, making room wherever it is needed; the human mind instead piles up whatever it fancies, log upon log, cluttering itself. He sees his own attachment as this useless heaping. So the prayer is plain: Panduranga, separate me from what clings to the body, the bodily identification that keeps me grasping. He asks God to do the work of detachment that he cannot do alone.

GATHA 2940 Autobiography

Self-portrait, the wealth of poverty

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे एक सेवटीं राहाणें । वर्ततों या जना विरहित ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In this world, shabbiness is our ornament: a gourd, a coarse blanket, and begging for alms. This is a wealth free of care and fear; the mind is content at all times.

Our dwelling is full of holes, home to mice and rats. Our wealth is the Name of God and nothing else.

Says Tuka, in the end we must dwell alone, moving through this world without attachment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In this world, shabbiness is our ornament: a gourd, a coarse blanket, and alms. This is wealth without fear, without care; the mind is content at all times. Our home is full of holes, a colony of mice and rats. Our only wealth is the Name of God. Tuka says: in the end one must dwell alone. I move through these people without attachment.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns poverty into a boast. His begging bowl, ragged blanket, and alms are not shame but ornament, because they come without the fear that guards real property. His leaky house, overrun by mice, holds no treasure but the Name of God, and that is enough to keep the mind always at peace. He names the truth that frightens the rich: in the end each person dwells alone, so he practices that solitude now. He lives among people, but free of the attachments that would weigh him down.

GATHA 2941 Autobiography

Self-portrait, holy destitution

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We are the fortunate ones, truly fortunate. Our vessels are made of gourds.

Other homes have cows and buffaloes; our home has only rats and mice. Other homes have elephants and horses; we have half-broken sandals.

Says Tuka, we are stripped bare, and seeing us, even Death is afraid.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We are the fortunate ones, truly fortunate. Our vessels are made of gourds. In others' homes there are cows and buffaloes; in our home, only mice and rats. In others' homes, elephants and horses; we have a pair of half-broken sandals. Tuka says: we are stripped bare, and seeing us, even Death takes fright.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the same boast pressed harder and turned to comedy. Tukaram counts himself rich precisely because he owns nothing worth counting: gourd pots instead of vessels, mice instead of cattle, broken sandals instead of horses. The mock inventory exposes how wealth ties people down with what they must guard. The sharp turn comes at the end: stripped of everything, he has nothing left for Death to seize, so Death itself flinches before him. Having nothing to lose has made him untouchable.

GATHA 2942 Autobiography

Devotion, the shameless singer

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I do not know the arts and techniques of singing; holding my ears, I simply cry out 'Hari.' O Vitthal, give Your attention to my stammering words. People will laugh at me, yet I will sing without hesitation.

In singing Your Name I am shameless; what business have I with the opinion of others? Says Tuka, this is my humble plea; hear it, O Lord of Kamala.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I do not know the arts and skills of singing. Holding my ears, I just cry out, Hari. O Vitthal, give Your attention to my stammering words. People will laugh at me, but I will sing without fear. In Your Name I am shameless; what business have I with what people think? Tuka says: this is my plea; hear it, O Lord of Kamala.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram offers his own clumsiness as the whole of his devotion. He claims no musical skill; he just holds his ears and calls out Hari like a child, and he asks Vitthal to attend to those stammering words. He knows people will laugh, and he tells them plainly that he does not care. The Name has made him shameless, free of the fear of human opinion that silences most people. His closing plea to the Lord of Kamala asks only that God, not the crowd, be the one who listens.

GATHA 2943 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, nature shows its kind

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A serpent carries poison within, and all creatures fear its menace. The five elements are not separate from one another; their interplay brings suffering and weariness.

Sandalwood is beloved for its fragrance; it gives according to its nature. Says Tuka, a bitter seed should never be mixed in with good grain.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A serpent carries poison inside, and everyone fears its menace. The five elements are not separate from each other; their qualities give pain and weariness. Sandalwood is loved for its scent; each thing gives according to its nature. Tuka says: a bitter, spoiled seed should never be mixed into good grain.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reads character through the things of nature. As the snake holds poison and the sandal holds fragrance, each creature gives out only what its nature contains, for good or ill. The interplay of the elements that makes up a person likewise yields its own qualities, and with them its own measure of pain. The closing image carries the warning: a single bitter, rotten seed should not be mixed into sound grain, because it spoils the whole. He is pointing at the way one corrupt element, in a person or a company, taints everything around it.

GATHA 2944 The Moral Ideal

Moral test, the slander that ruins all

मराठी मूळ

देव अवघें प्रतिपादी । वंदी सकळां एक निंदी ॥1॥
तेथें अवघें गेलें वांयां । विष घास एके ठायां ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे चित्त । नाहीं जयाचें अंकित ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who praises God and all His ways yet slanders even a single being: all is lost thereby, like a single morsel of poison mixed into a whole meal. One who caresses the whole body yet pulls out even one hair causes pain.

Says Tuka, one whose mind is not devoted and disciplined cannot truly be called God's own.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One who praises God and honors all His ways, yet slanders even a single being: with that, everything is lost, like one morsel of poison dropped into a whole meal. One who strokes the whole body, yet pulls out a single hair, still causes pain. Tuka says: the one whose mind is not surrendered cannot be called God's own.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets a single, exacting test for devotion. You may worship God and revere all his works, but if you slander even one being you have undone it all, the way one bite of poison spoils a whole meal. He drives it home with the body: caress the whole of someone and still tear out one hair, and you have hurt them. Reverence is not an average; it is broken by a single exception. The mark of belonging to God, he says, is a mind so surrendered that it makes no such exception. He turns the test inward, against the self that flatters God while wounding a neighbor.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My own teaching is meant for myself; let no one else be vexed by it. You are all forms of Panduranga; I alone am the wicked one, and all of you are good.

I am your refugee; please do something for my welfare. Says Tuka, I hold Your feet: remove this 'mine' from within me. One who knows the secret does not know the ritual; without actually practicing dharma, its truths cannot be known.

The bliss of union, if merely described, remains empty; without direct experience it cannot be understood. Says Tuka, let mere verbal knowledge burn away; the true mark of Vithoba is known only to the rare one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My teaching is for myself. Let no one else be vexed by it. You are all forms of Panduranga; I alone am the wicked one, and all of you are good. I am your refugee; do something for my welfare. Tuka holds Your feet: take this 'mine' away from me. One who knows the secret does not know the ritual; without practicing dharma, its truths are never known. The bliss of union, merely described, is empty; without experience it cannot be understood. Tuka says: let mere word-knowledge burn. The mark of Vithoba is known to a rare one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram first turns all judgment back on himself: his teaching is aimed at his own faults, and he sees every other being as a form of God and himself alone as the flawed one. From that low place he begs God to remove the one root word, mine, the sense of possession that fuels the ego. Then he states the deeper point: spiritual truth is not information. The one absorbed in the living secret may not even know the outward rituals, and dharma cannot be known without being practiced. He compares it to the joy of union: describe it all you like, words stay empty until you have lived it. So he asks that bookish, verbal knowledge burn away, for the true sign of Vithoba is reached only by the rare soul who has tasted it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Panduranga stands as your champion; what then is there to fear? Follow Him without delay; do not stop to deliberate. Where can sins possibly remain once genuine repentance has arisen? Says Tuka, this very moment, He will carry you to the far shore.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Panduranga is your champion. What is there to fear then? Take refuge in Him at once; do not stop to deliberate over anything. Where can sins remain once true repentance has arisen? Tuka says: this very moment, He will set you, standing as you are, on the far shore.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram urges immediate, unhesitating surrender. If Panduranga himself stands as your defender, fear has no ground; so take refuge now and stop weighing and calculating, which only delays you. He answers the fear that holds people back, the dread of their own sins: once genuine repentance has truly risen, the sins have nowhere left to stay. And the rescue is not far off or earned over years. This very moment, just as you are, standing where you stand, God carries you to the far shore.

GATHA 2947 The Power of the Name

The Name, God caught in love

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The saints have revealed Your secret to me. I will hold the Name on my lips and in my throat, and store You entirely within my chitta.

I will first surround You with the nine forms of devotion; You have been caught in the trap of love. Says Tuka, O mighty Lord, even Death falls at Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The saints have handed me Your secret; they told it to me plainly. I will hold the Name on my lips and in my throat, and store You whole inside me. First I will surround You with the nine forms of devotion. You are caught now, in the trap of love. Tuka says: O mighty Lord, even Death falls at Your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes devotion as a kind of holy capture, with the saints letting him in on the trick. The secret they revealed is the Name: keep it on the lips, in the throat, and hold the whole of God within. He turns the nine traditional forms of bhakti into a net thrown around God, so that the Lord is caught in the very love offered to him. The tone is bold and intimate, the devotee binding God rather than being bound. And once the devotee has hold of this Lord at whose feet even Death bows, what power is left to fear?

माझ्या मना लागो चाळा । पहावया विठ्ठला डोळां॥1॥

तरि च फळ जन्मा आलों । सरता पांडुरंगीं जालों ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे देवा । देई चरणांची सेवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let my mind be absorbed in the delight of beholding Vitthal with these eyes. I have no other desire; the sweetness of worldly life is not needed.

Only then has this birth borne fruit, when one is wholly given to Panduranga. Says Tuka, O God, grant me the service of Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let my mind be caught up in this one play: to see Vitthal with these eyes. I have no other longing. The sweetness of worldly life I do not want. Only then has my birth borne fruit, when I am wholly given to Panduranga. Tuka says: O God, grant me the service of Your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram narrows every desire down to one. He wants his mind absorbed in a single occupation, beholding Vitthal with his own eyes, and he sets aside the so-called sweetness of worldly life as worthless beside it. He measures his life by this alone: a human birth bears fruit only when one is wholly surrendered to Panduranga, and not otherwise. The closing prayer asks for nothing grand, only the service of God's feet, the humble nearness that is, for him, the whole point of being born.

GATHA 2949 Devotion to Vitthal

Adoration, the place that ends sin

मराठी मूळ

अवघें जेणें पाप नासे । तें हें असे पंढरीसी ॥1॥
गात जागा गात जागा । प्रेम मागा विठ्ठला ॥ध्रु.॥
अवघी सुखाची च राशी । पुंडलिकाशीं वोळली हे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जवळी आलें। उभे ठालें समचरणीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

That which destroys all sin stands here at Pandhari. Sing and stay awake, sing and stay awake; ask Vitthal for love.

The entire treasure of happiness has turned toward Pundalik. Says Tuka, it has come close, standing still upon even feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

That which destroys all sin stands here at Pandhari. Sing and stay awake; sing and stay awake. Ask Vitthal for love. The whole treasure of happiness has turned toward Pundalik. Tuka says: it has come close. It stands still upon even feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is pointing to Pandhari as the place where the thing that wipes out all sin is present, standing in plain sight. His instruction is simple and urgent: keep singing, keep awake, and do not ask Vitthal for wealth or rescue but for love itself. He says the whole store of happiness has tilted toward Pundalik, the devotee whose plain duty drew God to the brick. The poem ends on the image that ties the tradition together: God come near, standing motionless on level feet, waiting.

GATHA 2950 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the debt discharged

मराठी मूळ

देह तुझ्या पायीं । ठेवूनि जालों उतराई ॥1॥
आतां माझ्या जीवां । करणें तें करीं देवा ॥ध्रु.॥
बहु अपराधी । मतिमंद हीनबुद्धि ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नेणें । भावभक्तीचीं लक्षणें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Having placed this body at Your feet, I have discharged my debt. Now, O God, do with my life whatever You will.

I am full of offenses, dull of mind, and low of understanding. Says Tuka, I do not even know the marks of true devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have placed this body at Your feet. With that, my debt is paid. Now, O God, do with my life whatever You will. I am full of offenses. My mind is dull. My understanding is low. Tuka says: I do not even know the marks of true devotion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays the whole body down at God's feet and treats that single act as settling every account he owes. From there he hands over the rest: do with my life whatever You will. He does not pretend to deserve this, listing himself as full of faults, slow of mind, poor in understanding. The closing admission sharpens the surrender: he claims he does not even recognize what real devotion looks like, so there is nothing left to do but leave it all to God.

GATHA 2951 Worldly Life

Worldly life, no one stands by you

मराठी मूळ

जाल्या हीन शक्ति नाकडोळे गळती । सांडोनि पळती रांडापोरें ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे माझीं नव्हतील कोणी । तुज चक्रपाणी वांचूनियां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

People's affection lasts only as long as there is giving and receiving; in the hour of death, no one stands by you. When your strength fails, when eyes and nose begin to drip, wife and children flee from your side.

The wife thinks, 'If only this wretched man would die; he has ruined this house with his spitting and coughing.' Says Tuka, none of them are truly mine, except You, O Lord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

People love you only as long as there is giving and taking. In the hour of death, no one stands by you. When your strength fails, when your eyes and nose run, your wife and children flee from your side. The wife thinks: if only this wretched man would die; he has ruined the house with his spitting and coughing. Tuka says: none of them are truly mine, except You, O Lord.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is stripping the comfort out of family attachment by naming what happens at the end. Affection lasts only while there is exchange; once a person is dying and helpless, the same people pull away. He gives the harshest line to the wife wishing her sick husband dead, not to mock her but to show how thin even the closest bond runs when there is nothing left to gain. The point of the cruelty is the turn at the end: if no human tie holds at the last hour, then only the Lord can truly be called his own.

GATHA 2952 Prayers

Prayer, unknowing in the world

मराठी मूळ

जाणोनि नेणतें करीं माझें मन । तुझी प्रेमखूण देऊनियां ॥1॥
मग मी व्यवहारीं असेन वर्तत । जेवीं जळाआंत पद्मपत्र ॥ध्रु.॥
ऐकोनि नाइकें निंदास्तुति कानीं । जैसा कां उन्मनी योगिराज ॥2॥

तुका ह्मणे ऐसें जालियावांचून । करणें तें तें सीण वाटतसे ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Make my mind unknowing, as though it were innocent, by giving it the mark of Your love. Then I shall move through the world like a lotus leaf upon water.

Let me hear yet not hear the praise and blame that reach my ears, like a yogi absorbed beyond thought. Let me see yet not see this worldly existence, as one forgets the world of a dream upon waking.

Says Tuka, until such a transformation happens, everything I do feels like mere weariness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Make my mind unknowing, as if it were innocent. Give it the mark of Your love. Then I will move through the world like a lotus leaf on water. Let me hear praise and blame, yet not hear them, like a yogi gone beyond thought. Let me see this world, yet not see it, the way a dream is forgotten on waking. Tuka says: until this happens, everything I do feels like mere weariness.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is asking for a specific inner change, not for escape from the world. He wants his mind made simple and unknowing, stamped with the mark of God's love, so he can stay in the world untouched, like a lotus leaf that water cannot soak. He spells out what that detachment looks like: hearing praise and blame without being moved, seeing worldly life the way a waking person treats a faded dream. He ends by naming the stakes plainly: without this transformation, every action is just tiring effort that leads nowhere.

GATHA 2953 Longing and Separation

Longing, the silence of God

मराठी मूळ

विठ्ठला विठ्ठला । कंठ आळवितां फुटला ॥1॥
कई कृपा करिसी नेणें । मज दीनाचें धांवणें ॥ध्रु.॥
जाल्या येरझारा । जन्मां बहुतांचा फेरा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नष्टा । अबोलण्या तुझ्या चेष्टा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Vitthal, Vitthal! My throat has cracked from calling out to You. When will You show mercy? I do not know.

Come running to this pitiable one. Many rounds of coming and going, many births have I endured.

Says Tuka, O scoundrel, this silence of Yours is just one of Your tricks.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Vitthal, Vitthal! My throat has cracked from calling out to You. When will You show mercy? I do not know. Come running to this pitiable one. Many rounds of coming and going, many births, I have endured. Tuka says: O scoundrel, this silence of Yours is just one of Your tricks.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a lover's complaint pushed to the edge. Tukaram has called God's name until his throat splits, and still no answer comes, so he openly admits he does not know when mercy will arrive. He begs God to run to him, reminding Him of how many births of coming and going he has already suffered. The closing word is daring: he calls God a scoundrel and accuses Him of playing a game, treating the divine silence not as rejection but as a deliberate trick a beloved plays to draw the lover further in.

GATHA 2954 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the means must match

मराठी मूळ

ज्यासी विषयाचें ध्यान । त्यासी कैंचा नारायण॥1॥
साधु कैंचा पापीयासी । काय चांडाळासी काशी ॥ध्रु.॥
काय पतितासी पिता । काय अधमासी गीता ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे निरंजनी। शट कैंचा ब्रह्मज्ञानी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One whose mind is fixed on sense-pleasures cannot find Narayana. How can a wrongdoer find a saint? What does a wretch gain by going to Kashi? What good is a father to the fallen? What use is the Gita to the wicked? Says Tuka, a fraud can never become a knower of Brahman.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One whose mind is fixed on sense-pleasures cannot find Narayana. How can a wrongdoer find a saint? What does a wretch gain by going to Kashi? What good is a father to one who has fallen? What use is the Gita to the wicked? Tuka says: a fraud can never become a knower of Brahman.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is hammering one point through a string of rhetorical questions: an outward holy thing is useless to a heart that is still turned the wrong way. A mind fastened to pleasure will not meet Narayana; pilgrimage to Kashi, a guiding father, the Gita itself, all are wasted on someone unwilling to change. The blunt close names the trap: a fraud cannot reach knowledge of Brahman simply by handling sacred things. The verse points not at any one person but at the pattern of wanting the reward without doing the inner work, and asks the listener to check which side of that line they stand on.

GATHA 2955 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the singer for hire

मराठी मूळ

वरतें करोनियां तोंड । हाका मारितो प्रचंड ॥1॥
राग आळवितो नाना । गातो काय तें कळेना ॥ध्रु.॥
आशा धरोनि मनीं । कांहीं देईल म्हणऊनि ॥2॥
पोटा एका साटीं । तुका म्हणे जाले कष्टी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He turns his face upward and bellows mightily. He modulates various melodies and sings, but what he sings no one can tell.

He sings holding hope in his mind that someone will perhaps give him something. Says Tuka, all that labor for the sake of one belly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He turns his face upward and bellows loudly. He runs through one melody after another and sings, but no one can tell what he is singing. He sings holding hope in his mind that someone will give him something. Tuka says: all that labor, for the sake of one belly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sketches a performer who makes a great show of singing, face raised, voice booming, running through many tunes, while the meaning is empty and nobody can follow it. The reason for the noise is named plainly: he sings in the hope that a listener will hand him something. The closing line lands the verdict, that all this loud effort is spent only to fill one stomach. The poem holds up the hollow display against true song, and turns the listener toward asking what really drives their own performance and devotion.

GATHA 2956 Prayers

Prayer, dye me in Your color

मराठी मूळ

प्रपंच वोसरो । चित्त तुझे पायीं मुरो ॥1॥
ऐसें करिं गा पांडुरंगा । शुद्ध रंगवावें रंगा ॥ध्रु.॥
पुरे पुरे आतां । नको दुजियाची सत्ता ॥2॥
लटिकें तें फेडा । तुका म्हणे जाय पीडा॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let worldly existence dissolve; let my mind be absorbed in Your feet. Do this, O Panduranga; dye me thoroughly in Your true color.

Enough, enough now; let no other power rule over me. Says Tuka, remove what is false, and the torment will vanish.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let worldly life dissolve. Let my mind sink into Your feet. Do this, O Panduranga; dye me thoroughly in Your true color. Enough, enough now; let no other power rule over me. Tuka says: take away what is false, and the torment will go.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays for two things at once: that the grip of worldly life loosen, and that his mind dissolve into God's feet. He asks Panduranga to soak him fully in the divine color, like cloth taken completely into a dye. The cry enough, enough is a plea to be freed from the rule of any power other than God. The closing line names the cure directly: remove the false, and the suffering that came with it disappears on its own.

GATHA 2957 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the inversions of Kali

मराठी मूळ

ऐका कलीचें हें फळ । पुढें होइल ब्रह्मगोळ ॥1॥
चारी वर्ण अठरा याती । भोजन करिती एके पंक्ती ॥ध्रु.॥
पूजितीअसुरा रांडा । मद्य प्राशितील पेंढा ॥2॥

तुका हरिभक्ति करी । शक्ति पाणी वाहे घरीं॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hear the fruits of this Kali age; ahead lies cosmic dissolution. All four castes and eighteen communities will eat together at one table.

They will worship demons and their women, and degenerate people will drink liquor. Eating with the left hand and other inversions of proper conduct will drag people into downfall.

Says Tuka, the devotee of Hari will carry water and sweep the floor of his own home in service.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hear the fruit of this Kali age; ahead lies cosmic dissolution. All four castes and eighteen communities will eat together at one table. They will worship demons and their women, and degenerate people will drink liquor. Eating with the left hand and other inversions of proper conduct will drag people down. Tuka says: the devotee of Hari carries water and sweeps the floor of his own home in service.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reads the disorder of the Kali age as a slide toward ruin, listing the breakdown of the boundaries he knew: shared tables, worship turned toward demons, drinking, and reversals of conduct he counts as degradation. The list is a lament over a world losing its order, voiced in the categories of his time. He sets one image against all of it at the end: while others chase inversion, the devotee of Hari quietly carries water and sweeps his own floor. The contrast lands the claim that humble service, not show or transgression, is the steady ground when everything else is coming apart.

GATHA 2958 Social Criticism

Social criticism, gurus who sell initiation

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे ऐसे गुरु शिष्य पूर्ण । विठोबाची आण नरका जाती ॥7॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Straying from the true guru's path, they proclaim that caste and clan do not exist in Brahman. They call the ritually pure a nuisance and honor the unknown and unnamed.

They initiate washermen, cobblers, household servants, and all twelve community workers, giving instruction to any and every person. Some brahmins become disciples of such teachers, openly disgracing their own tradition.

They perform invented rituals and eat together, saying there is no sin in it and that this is the way to liberation. They give license to the senses and abolish all rules of propriety.

With no scriptural basis and no discernment of worthy and unworthy, they simply take money for their initiation. Says Tuka, such gurus and disciples are destined for hell; I swear by Vithoba.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Straying from the true guru's path, they declare that caste and clan do not exist in Brahman. They call the pure a nuisance and honor the unknown and unnamed. They initiate washermen, cobblers, servants, all twelve community workers, giving instruction to anyone at all. Some brahmins become disciples of such teachers, openly disgracing their own tradition. They perform invented rituals and eat together, saying there is no sin in it and that this is the road to liberation. They license the senses and abolish every rule of propriety. With no scriptural basis and no sense of who is fit, they simply take money for initiation. Tuka says: such gurus and disciples are bound for hell; I swear it by Vithoba.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks teachers who, in his view, have abandoned the real path and dressed up selling initiation as spiritual freedom. His complaint is that they make a doctrine of having no standards: instructing anyone, inventing rituals, calling the senses free, and waving away every rule, all while pocketing the fee. The phrases about caste and community belong to his world, but the charge underneath is timeless, a warning against the teacher who removes every demand precisely because it sells. He closes by swearing on Vithoba that such trade ends in hell, aiming the heat at the pattern of buying and selling the sacred, and asking the listener to weigh what a teaching actually costs the soul.

GATHA 2959 Autobiography

Autobiography, Hari-katha is my mother

मराठी मूळ

बोलाचे गौरव । नव्हे माझा हा अनुभव ॥1॥
माझी हरिकथा माउली । नव्हे आणिकांसी पांगिली ॥ध्रु.॥
व्याली वाढविलें। निजपदीं निजवलें ॥2॥

विष्णु जोडी कर । माथां रज वंदी हर ॥4॥
तुका ह्मणे बळ । तोरडीं हा किळकाळ ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This is not the grandeur of mere words; this is my lived experience. My Hari-katha is my true mother; she is not parceled out to others.

She gave birth to me, nurtured me, and laid me to rest in my own true nature. She is overflowing with the nectar of the three worlds, the essence of Brahman.

Vishnu folds his hands before her; Shiva bows his head to her dust. Says Tuka, Death itself is held in chains at the feet of this power.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is not the grandeur of mere words. This is my lived experience. My Hari-katha is my true mother; she is not parceled out to others. She gave me birth, she raised me, and she laid me to rest in my own true nature. She is overflowing with the nectar of the three worlds, the essence of Brahman. Vishnu folds his hands before her. Shiva bows his head to her dust. Tuka says: Death itself is held in chains at the feet of this power.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram insists that what he speaks is not fine talk but something he has actually lived. He calls the telling of God's story, the Hari-katha, his true mother, who bore him, raised him, and finally settled him in his own real nature. He raises her higher still, calling her the nectar of all three worlds and the essence of Brahman, so great that even Vishnu joins his palms and Shiva bows to her dust. The final image names the full stake: before this power, death itself stands bound in chains, so the devotional telling he lives by is what conquers even dying.

GATHA 2960 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, come home at last

मराठी मूळ

सेवट तो भला । माझा बहु गोड जाला ॥1॥
आलों निजांच्या माहेरा । भेटों रखुमाईच्या वरा ॥ध्रु.॥
परिहार जाला । अवघ्या दुःखाचा मागिल्या ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे वाणी । गेली आतां घेऊं धणी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My end has turned out beautifully; it has become exceedingly sweet. I have come home to my true family's dwelling and met the Lord of Rukmini.

All the sorrows of the past have been dissolved. Says Tuka, now my tongue has found its true fulfillment; let it drink its fill.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My end has turned out beautifully; it has become very sweet. I have come home to my own family's house and met the Lord of Rukmini. All the sorrows of the past are dissolved. Tuka says: now my tongue has found its fulfillment; let it drink its fill.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from the far side of a long struggle and finds it has ended sweetly. The journey home is the soul's return to its true family and its meeting with the Lord of Rukmini, Vitthal. With that arrival, every past sorrow simply dissolves, as if it never had weight. The closing image is one of fulfillment rather than restraint: his tongue, worn from calling out, has reached what it longed for, so now it may drink the Name to the full without measure.

GATHA 2961 The Power of the Name

The Name, free for all

मराठी मूळ

तुझें नाम गाऊं आतां । तुझ्या रंगीं नाचों था था॥1॥
तुझ्या नामाचा विश्वास । आह्मां कैंचा गर्भवास ॥ध्रु.॥
तुझे नामीं विसर पडे । तरी कोटी हत्या घडे ॥2॥
नाम घ्या रे कोणी फुका। भावें सांगतसे तुका ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now I will sing Your Name and dance with abandon in Your color. With faith in Your Name, how can the womb ever hold us again? If I forget Your Name for even a moment, a crore of sins would come upon me.

Take the Name, everyone, it is free. Says Tuka, this is what I tell you with all my being.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now I will sing Your Name. I will dance in Your color, tha tha. I trust Your Name. So how can the womb hold me again? If I forget Your Name even once, a crore of killings fall on me. Take the Name, anyone, it is free. Tuka says: I tell you this with all my heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes the Name the whole of his practice and names what it costs and what it spares. Trusting it, he says, ends the round of rebirth: no more being held inside a womb. But he holds himself to a sharp standard, that forgetting the Name even for a moment would be a vast load of sin, so the singing must not stop. Then he turns to everyone and presses the point: the Name asks no price, it is free for the taking. He says this not as a teacher reporting a fact but as a man pleading with all his being for others to take what is offered.

GATHA 2962 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the ruinous wife

मराठी मूळ

बाइल तरी ऐसी व्हावी । नरकीं गोवी अनिवार॥1॥
घडों नेदी तीर्थयात्रा । केला कुतरा हातसोंका ॥ध्रु.॥
आपुली च करवी सेवा । पुजवी देवासारिखें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे गाढव पशु । केला नाशु आयुष्या ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A wife of this sort will drag one into inescapable hell. She prevents pilgrimages and sacred journeys, turning the husband into a chained dog.

She makes him serve her every whim and has herself worshipped like a deity. Says Tuka, the one yoked to such a person has been made a donkey; the whole span of life is laid to waste.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A wife like this drags you into hell you cannot escape. She lets you go on no pilgrimage. She has made you a dog on a leash. She makes you serve her every wish. She has herself worshipped like a god. Tuka says: the man yoked to her is made a donkey, a beast; his whole life is wasted.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is attacking a pattern, not a person: the way a household can be ruled by appetite and vanity until a man loses every road to God. He pictures the husband on a leash like a dog, kept from pilgrimage and made to wait on demands, while the one he serves is treated as a deity in the house. The harsh words for the wife are the poem's blunt picture of that domination. The point lands on the man's wasted years, and on the warning to examine where your own life is being spent and who you are really worshipping.

GATHA 2963 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the henpecked man

मराठी मूळ

बाइले अधीन होय ज्याचें जिणें । तयाच्या अवलोकनें पडिजे द्वाड ॥1॥
कासया ते जंत जिताती संसारीं । माकडाच्या परी गारोडएांच्या ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे मेंग्या गाढवाचें जिणें । कुत†याचें खाणें लगबगा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One whose life is governed by his wife makes even the onlooker feel ill. Why do such creatures live at all? They are like monkeys in the hands of a street performer.

Whatever the wife's mind desires, that becomes the truth; the unfortunate man is entirely her creature. Says Tuka, his is the life of a wretched donkey, eating hurriedly like a dog.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A man whose life is ruled by his wife: even to look at him makes you sick. Why do such creatures live at all? They are like monkeys in a street performer's hands. Whatever her mind wants becomes the truth. The wretched man is wholly hers. Tuka says: his is the life of a wretched donkey, eating in a hurry like a dog.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is again pointing at a pattern of total surrender to appetite and to another's will, dressed up as a portrait of the henpecked man. The monkey on the performer's string is the image: the man no longer moves himself, he is pulled. When another's wants become the only truth, the self that should turn to God is gone. The contempt in the lines is aimed at that bondage and meant to make the listener look hard at his own leash, not to despise the man for sport.

GATHA 2964 Autobiography

Autobiography, poetry from God or vanity

मराठी मूळ

जगीं मान्य केलें हा तुझा देकार । कीं कांहीं विचार आहे पुढें ॥1॥
करितों कवित्व जोडितों अक्षरें । येणें काय पुरें जालें माझें ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे तुज पुंडलिकाची आण । जरी कांहीं वचन करिसी मज ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The world has accepted my words; is this Your doing, or is there some plan behind it? I compose verses and string together syllables, but has that truly fulfilled my purpose? This inner turmoil of mine will not cease until You Yourself speak through me. Says Tuka, I place You under oath by Pundalik: speak some word to me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The world has accepted my words. Is this Your doing, or is there some plan still ahead? I make verses, I string syllables together. Has that fulfilled my purpose? This nagging in me will not end until the thought comes from Your own mouth. Tuka says: I put You under oath by Pundalik, if You will speak even one word to me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is anxious about the very thing that has made him famous: his poetry. He will not take the world's praise as proof of anything, and he asks God plainly whether the acclaim is God's work or just his own clever stringing of words. The fear underneath is that craft without God is empty, and his unrest cannot settle until the words come from God rather than from himself. So he presses God hard, swearing him by Pundalik, the devotee for whom Vitthal came to Pandhari, to speak just one word and quiet the doubt.

GATHA 2965 Worldly Metaphors

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The pride has been cornered; the door has been blocked. Post a guard here and do what must be done.

Hari has been caught stealing; seize Him and hold Him tight, for He has come to torment the very jiva. That which was placed before as bait has become a snare for the one who craved it; tie it up and quietly slip away.

The fortress of doubt has been breached through His meeting; now that the bond is broken, seize whatever you can. Says Tuka, coming humbly in supplication: release these false bonds. We have surrendered our burden entirely.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The pride is cornered. The door is blocked. Set a good guard here; do what must be done. Here, here is Hari. He was caught in the act of stealing. Throw him down, seize him by the knot, so the jiva torments him no more. What was put out as bait has become a snare for the one who craved it; tie up his hands and slip away. The fortress of doubt is broken open by His meeting. The bond is cut; now seize whatever you can. Tuka says, coming humbly: let the false bonds go. We have laid down our whole burden.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the soul's struggle into a chase, with God playing both the cornered thief and the prize. Pride is trapped behind a blocked door, and Hari is caught in the act, to be seized by the knot and held fast. The twist is that the very world that was set out as bait to trap the soul has become the snare that catches the trapper, once God is held. The fortress of doubt falls open in the meeting with God, the bond breaks, and the instruction is to grab the moment while it lasts. He ends in surrender: drop the false ties, the whole burden is now laid on God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have sat down firmly at the feast, uninvited. To remove me now would disgrace the host.

Is that fitting? Do You not see this, O Panduranga? Why do You shut Your eyes? I will ask for everything my chitta desires; now is not the time to say no. Says Tuka, I have earned the right to claim what is mine; it is not the people I am ashamed of, but You, O God. This is the mark of the non-devotee: one who does not know Vitthal is not worthy of association.

A mouth that does not utter the Name is like a pit of tanned leather. Says Tuka, that person's fortune is like a woman who has eloped from her home.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have sat down firmly at the feast, uninvited. To make me rise now would shame the host. Is that fitting? Why do You not see it? Why do You shut Your eyes, Panduranga? I will ask for everything my heart wants. This is no time to say no. Tuka says: I have earned the right to my share. It is not the people I am ashamed before, it is You, God. This is how you know him: it is the mark of the non-devotee. One who does not know Vitthal, do not keep his company. A mouth that does not say the Name is only a pit of tanned hide. Tuka says: that one's day is ruined, like a wife who has run off.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses his claim on God like a guest who has taken a seat at the feast and will not be turned out, since throwing him out would disgrace the host himself. The boldness is the devotee's privilege: he asks for everything and says now is no time for God to refuse, and his only shame is before God, not before people. The poem then turns to the opposite kind of person, marking the non-devotee: keep no company with one who does not know Vitthal. A mouth that never speaks the Name he calls a mere pit of raw hide, dead and useless, and such a life he counts as ruined. The contrast is the lesson: cling to God shamelessly, or let the Name go and become hollow.

Prayer, the fallen one's surrender

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am fallen and sinful, yet I have come to surrender to You. Protect my honor, O Panduranga.

You have saved many devotees; the end of Your mercy cannot be fathomed. I am the greatest of wrongdoers, O Panduranga.

When Draupadi, Your sister, was tormented by enemies, You made her Your equal, O Panduranga. For Prahlad's sake You emerged from the pillar; have You then forgotten me, O Panduranga? When the brahmin Sudama was crushed by poverty, You raised him to Your own station, O Panduranga.

Says Tuka, I have surrendered to You with my whole being; destroy my sins, O Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am fallen, I am a sinner, and I have come to surrender to You. Guard my honor, Panduranga. You have saved so many; the limit of Your mercy cannot be found. I am the greatest of the fallen, Panduranga. When Draupadi, Your sister, was tormented by enemies, You made her Your own equal, Panduranga. For Prahlad You came out of the pillar. Then why forget me, Panduranga? When the brahmin Sudama was crushed by poverty, You raised him to Your own station, Panduranga. Tuka says: I have surrendered to You with my whole heart. Destroy my sins, Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram comes empty-handed, calling himself the worst of sinners, and stakes everything on God's record of rescue. He recites the proofs: Draupadi shielded and honored, Prahlad saved when God burst from the pillar, the destitute Sudama lifted to God's own level. Each story is an argument: a mercy this wide cannot stop at me. So his prayer turns the praise into a claim, asking God to guard his honor and burn away his sins. The whole strength of the plea is that he brings no merit, only complete surrender and the memory of what God has done before.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The appearance of musk is most humble and plain, yet its essence within holds great value. So too with sandalwood trees; it is their fragrance that makes them precious.

Is a touchstone beautiful to look at? Yet it raises base metal to the worth of gold. A diamond looks small, worth barely a few coins by appearance, yet by its quality it sells for thousands.

Says Tuka, caste is not the measure of a person. One in whose mouth the Name dwells is the truly blessed one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Musk looks very poor and plain, yet the essence inside it holds great worth. So with sandalwood trees: it is their fragrance that makes them precious. Is a touchstone good to look at? Yet it lifts base metal to the worth of gold. A diamond looks small, barely worth a few coins to the eye, yet by its quality it sells for thousands. Tuka says: caste is no measure of a person. The one in whose mouth the Name lives, he alone is blessed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lines up things that look worthless but carry hidden value: dull musk with its rich scent, plain sandalwood with its fragrance, an unlovely touchstone that turns base metal to gold, a small diamond worth thousands. Each one teaches the same thing, that worth lives inside, not in the surface. He then turns this on the social order and says it outright: caste is no measure of a person at all. What makes someone truly blessed is the Name in the mouth, and nothing about birth or appearance can rank above that.

GATHA 2969 Prayers

Prayer, the helpless refugee

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am not independent, not master of my own limbs, nor can I ward off the forces that assail me from all sides. I must call upon You at every step; spread the shade of Your mercy over me.

Though I am without strength, I have become Your refugee, knowing well my own condition. Says Tuka, out of fear of worldly existence I have grasped Your feet; I know no other remedy.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am not free, not even the master of my own body. I cannot ward off the forces that come at me from every side. I must call on You at every step. Spread the shade of Your mercy over me. I have no strength, yet I have become Your refugee, for I know my own state well. Tuka says: out of fear of this worldly life I have grasped Your feet. I know no other remedy.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips away every claim to self-sufficiency. He says he does not even command his own body, and cannot fend off the assaults of existence, so he must lean on God at every single step. His surrender is clear-eyed: he takes refuge precisely because he has measured his own weakness and faces it honestly. The fear of samsara, the endless round of worldly life, is what drives him to clasp God's feet. He ends by closing every other door: there is no other remedy he knows.

GATHA 2970 The Power of the Name

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If I try to study the scriptures, life is too short. I lack the intellect to grasp their meaning.

Let whatever must happen happen in Vithoba's Name; I will hold in my chitta whatever my conduct has earned. If some particular practice takes hold in the body, the more you analyze it, the more techniques multiply.

Says Tuka, when a child pleads sweetly, the parents' chittas are moved to compassion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If I try to study the scriptures, life is too short to finish them. I do not have the mind to grasp their meaning. Let whatever must happen happen in Vithoba's Name. I will hold in my heart only what my own conduct has earned. If some practice takes hold in the body, the more you analyze it, the more methods keep multiplying. Tuka says: when a child pleads sweetly, the parents' hearts fill with pity.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets aside the scholar's path as too long and too hard for him: a short life and a plain mind cannot master the texts. So he stakes everything on Vithoba's Name instead, willing to live with whatever his own conduct has truly earned. He notices a trap in the learned approach, that the more you analyze practice, the more techniques pile up without end. Against all that he sets one homely image: the Name is like a child crying sweetly to its parents, and the parents' hearts cannot help but melt. Simple, trusting appeal moves God more than endless study.

Krishna, the all-pervading son of Nanda

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Gazing upon His form, the eyes are filled; no inner distance remains. He sets up His playful games at will, casting aside everything external.

He is the son of Nanda, O women; what offering can match His beauty? He appears ordinary, but He pervades every direction. His charm is such that once He embraces you, He never lets go.

Therefore I stand still, having turned back from all other roads. Says Tuka, He uses me as a screen to show Himself to the world.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Gazing on His form, the eyes are filled. No distance is left inside. He sets up His games as He pleases and casts everything else outside. He is the son of Nanda, women. What can match His beauty? He looks ordinary, but He fills every direction. His charm is such that once He embraces you, He will not turn back. So I stand still here, having turned away from every other road. Tuka says: He uses me as a screen, and through me He shows Himself to the world.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as one swept up in Krishna's beauty, in the voice of the gopis addressing each other. To look at His form is to be filled, with no inner gap left between the self and Him, while He plays freely and pushes all else aside. The seeming paradox is that this ordinary-looking cowherd boy, Nanda's son, actually pervades every direction, and once He embraces a soul He never lets go. So the poet turns back from every other path and stands fixed in Him. The last line names his own role: he is only the screen God stands behind to reveal Himself to others.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My heart, that sealed treasure, has been broken open by grief; a sob chokes my throat. What have You done, O friend of Sumitra? You have cast us away into the forest.

The children cry out in piteous words; the very earth seems ready to split at their sorrow. Did You not have the power to take Your own offspring with You? You know well that without You we have no friend in either world.

Says Kanha, separated from You, these little ones have been orphaned. O my brother, grant us Your meeting.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Grief has broken open my heart, that sealed treasure. A sob chokes my throat. What have You done, friend of Sumitra? You have thrown us away into the forest. The children cry out in piteous words. The very earth seems ready to split with their sorrow. Did You not have the power to take Your own children with You? You know we have no friend in either world but You. Kanha says: cut off from You these little ones are orphaned. O my brother, give us Your meeting.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes up the voice of those abandoned and pours out grief at being cast into the forest, addressing the friend of Sumitra, that is Rama, Sumitra's son in the wider family of the epic. The complaint is intimate and almost accusing: You had the power to keep us with You, so why leave Your own behind, when You alone are our friend in both worlds. The crying children and the earth ready to split are the measure of the abandonment. Beneath the mythic scene lies the soul's cry of separation from God. The poem closes signed not with Tuka's usual name but with Kanha, begging the divine brother for the one thing that answers grief: His meeting.

Repentance, blaming the touchstone

मराठी मूळ

पावलों आपुलें केलें लाहें रास । निद।वां परिस काय होय ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I presumed upon friendship and took liberties with You, not knowing, unfortunate as I am, the depth of Your greatness. I have received what I deserved; how can I blame the touchstone for my own failings? I, a wretch, have burdened You with worldly toils.

Even so, You continue to instruct me. Says Kanha, what more can I say about what is fitting and what is not?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I came close in friendship and took liberties with You. I did not know, unlucky as I am, how great You are. I have received only what I earned; how can I blame the touchstone for my own faults? Wretch that I am, I have burdened You with the toils of this world. And even so, You go on teaching me. Kanha says: what more can I say now about what is right and what is wrong?

WHAT IT MEANS

The poet looks back on a closeness he treated too casually, presuming on friendship with God before he understood Whom he was speaking to. Now he sees his own smallness and refuses to put the blame outside himself; the touchstone turns iron to gold, so the failure is the iron's, not the stone's. He confesses that he dragged God into his worldly troubles, and yet God keeps instructing him patiently. The honesty is the prayer: he stops arguing over right and wrong and simply admits the fault is his.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let us set aside complaint and self-pity. Who will come here begging for sympathy? For a few more days, let us make the effort and cling to the thread of devotion.

People may call us pitiful when we weep, but in the end, no one comes to our true aid. Says Tukya-bandhu, cast alone in the wilderness, I have spoken the thought that arose in my mind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let us set complaint and self-pity aside now. Who here will come begging for our sympathy? For a few more days let us make the effort, and hold fast to the thread of devotion. When we weep, people may call us poor pitiful things, but in the end not one of them comes to our real help. Tukya-bandhu says: cast alone in the wilderness, I have spoken the thought that rose in my mind.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poet talks himself out of grief and into endurance. He notices that complaining wins no real sympathy: people pity the weeping man with words, but no one actually rescues him when it matters. So he decides the only thing worth holding is the thread of devotion, kept up through a few more hard days of effort. Speaking of himself as alone in a wilderness, he records this not as despair but as a resolution made plainly to his own mind.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Fretting only breeds more grief, and sorrow only multiplies sorrow. The root of all accomplishment lies with patience.

Considering all this, it seems to me that the worry one carries is itself false and futile. What is destined cannot be avoided by abandoning one's courage; to do so would only be a pointless loss.

Says Tukya-bandhu, unless the mind is firmly restrained, one cannot attain the hidden treasure.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Fretting only breeds more fretting; grief only makes more grief. The root of everything that gets done lies with patience. When I look at it, it seems to me that the worry one carries is itself false and empty. What is destined cannot be escaped by throwing away your courage; that would only be a loss for nothing. Tukya-bandhu says: unless the mind is held firmly in check, the hidden treasure cannot be reached.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a teaching against the spiral of worry. The poet sees that fretting feeds on itself and that grief multiplies grief, while patience is the actual ground from which anything is accomplished. He calls the worry we carry false, because what is going to happen will happen whether or not we surrender our nerve; abandoning courage only adds a pointless loss to the unavoidable one. The real work is restraint of the mind, and only a mind held steady can reach the treasure that is being sought.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now there is no need for anxiety. The root cause has come to hand; my brother's departure has revealed it.

The thief who broke into the house is found; the blessing is right here. I clasp both his feet.

From his own mouth the truth has emerged; there is no need to argue further. Says Tukya-bandhu, when he brings my brother back to meet me, only then will I release this Vitthal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There is no need for worry now. The root cause has come to hand; my brother's leaving has shown it to me. The one who broke into the house is right here, and that is the blessing; I clasp both his feet. From his own mouth the truth has come out; there is no need to argue back and forth. Tukya-bandhu says: when he brings my brother back to meet me, only then will I let go of this Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poet treats his brother's departure, his renunciation, as a theft, and he claims to have caught the thief: Vitthal Himself. Far from being a disaster, this is the blessing, because now he has hold of God's own feet and will not let go. He says the truth came out of God's own mouth, so no more disputing is needed. The bargain is set plainly: he will release Vitthal only when Vitthal restores the brother, turning grief into a grip on God that refuses to slacken.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

His original home is on the banks of the Gomati; it is He who pulls all the strings of this puppet-show. Let everyone know this: the thief is none other than Him.

These Vaishnavas are His keepers; this is the sure sign I am giving you. Says Tukya-bandhu, I have witnessed it firsthand; it is He who has beguiled us.

IN PLAIN WORDS

His first home is on the banks of the Gomati; it is He who pulls all the strings of this puppet-show. Everyone should know this: the thief is none other than Him. These Vaishnavas are His watchmen; that is the sure sign I am giving you. Tukya-bandhu says: I have seen it for myself; it is He who has stripped us bare.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poet names the culprit openly: the God whose home is by the Gomati works every figure in the world like a puppeteer, so the one who took his brother is God Himself. He wants this known to all, and offers a sign by which to recognize the truth, that the devotees, the Vaishnavas, are God's own keepers. The closing line is not bitter contempt but rueful confession from experience: he has watched it happen, and the one who beguiled and emptied them out is the very Lord he loves.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Well done, O formless One, O wretched Narayana, O destroyer of homes; You have come to meet me. In one household You have set everyone against the other; such havoc You have wrought upon us.

Says Kanha, why, because You found us desireless, You felt free to do as You pleased?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Well done, O formless One, O wretched Narayana, O wrecker of homes; You have come to meet me. In one household You have turned everyone against everyone; such strange havoc You have made of us. Kanha says: why, just because You found us free of desire, did You feel free to do whatever You pleased?

WHAT IT MEANS

The poet scolds God with the rough affection of someone who knows Him too well. He calls Narayana a destroyer of homes because devotion has scattered ordinary household ties, setting kin at odds once one of them turns wholly toward God. The real complaint is in the last line: God seems to take liberties precisely with those who want nothing for themselves, as if their desirelessness left Him free to do as He liked. Under the rebuke is the recognition that being claimed by God upends every settled human arrangement.

The situation has come to a point where one must be ready to die or to kill. Let this be clearly understood, O Panduranga.

Says Tukya-bandhu, the showdown between You and me has begun; I will spare no courtesy.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will raise a din and a clamor at Your door. Is that what You take me for, You fool? Bring my brother back to meet me and all will be well; if not, I have begun the wrecking. It has come to this: one must be ready to die or to kill. Let that be clearly understood, O Panduranga. Tukya-bandhu says: what was left between You and me has fallen away; I will keep no courtesy now.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poet stages an open showdown with God, dropping every politeness. He threatens to make a scene at the temple door and warns that he will start tearing things apart if his brother is not returned. The language of dying or killing is the language of a desperate love that has nothing left to lose, not literal violence; the bond has reached the point where decorum no longer holds. Addressing Panduranga directly, he serves notice that he will press his claim without restraint.

Let Your worldly blessings and liberation and Brahman-knowledge all burn. Bring my brother back to me at once.

Keep Your supernatural powers and salvation bundled up; bring my brother back quickly. Do not take him away to Your Vaikuntha; bring my brother to me without delay.

Do not try to appease me with any boon; just bring my brother back. Says Tukya-bandhu, look here, if You do not, the sin of his death will fall upon Your head, O Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let Your worldly gifts and Your liberation and Your knowledge of Brahman all burn. Bring my brother back to me at once. Bundle up Your powers and Your salvation and put them away; bring my brother back quickly. Do not carry him off to Your Vaikuntha; bring my brother to me without delay. Do not try to win me with any boon; just bring my brother back. Tukya-bandhu says: look here, if You do not, the sin of his death will fall on Your head, O Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poet refuses the whole catalogue of things devotees are supposed to crave, enjoyment, liberation, supernatural powers, even the knowledge of Brahman and the heaven of Vaikuntha, and wants none of them in place of the one person he loves. The repeated demand makes the point sharp: no spiritual reward can stand in for the brother. He even refuses to be appeased by a granted wish, and lays the responsibility squarely on God, warning that if the brother is lost, the blame is Vitthal's. It is a fierce statement that love of the particular outweighs every promised reward.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Our chief concern is our mother's darling; who regards You, O Panduranga? Do not try to match wits with us; think carefully and look ahead. Endure the holy people and the saints You have made great; I am no longer afraid of You.

Says Tukya-bandhu, through this oneness of kinship, O Infinite One, suffering only breeds more suffering.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Our first care is our mother's darling; who reckons You as anything, O Panduranga? Do not try to match wits with us; look far ahead and think it over. Bear with the holy people and the saints You have made great; I am no longer afraid of You. Tukya-bandhu says: through this oneness of kinship, O Infinite One, suffering only breeds more suffering.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poet sets his human bond above God in a deliberate provocation: the brother, their mother's beloved, comes first, and just now Vitthal counts for little. He dares God not to outmaneuver him and tells Him to think about the consequences. Having lost his fear, he speaks as an equal rather than a suppliant. The closing line names the cost of this drawn-out contest: as long as the two of them stay locked together in this struggle of kinship, the grief only keeps multiplying on both sides.

Reconciliation, lay down the quarrel

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This quarreling with Hari brings no remedy; it only blackens the face of the complainer. I ask for only this much, with folded hands and my head upon Your feet.

Since You and we have lived together under the same roof, what good is enmity and hostility between us? Says Tukya-bandhu, in every possible way, O Infinite One, hear this humble petition.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This quarreling with Hari brings no cure; it only blackens the complainer's own face. I ask for just this much, with folded hands and my head laid on Your feet. Since You and we have lived together under one roof, what good is division and hatred here? Tukya-bandhu says: in every way there is, O Infinite One, hear this humble plea.

WHAT IT MEANS

After all the threats, the poet turns and lays the fight down. He sees that wrangling with God heals nothing and only shames the one who keeps it up. So he folds his hands and bows his head to God's feet, asking only to be heard. His argument now is intimacy itself: those who share one home should not nurse enmity. The abhanga moves from confrontation to surrender, the same love now expressed as petition rather than protest.

Resolve, the nectar of tears

मराठी मूळ

लालुचाईसाटीं बळकाविसी भावा । परी मी जाण देवा जिरों नेदीं ॥1॥
असों द्या निश्चय हा मनीं मानसीं । घातली येविशीं दृढ कास ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Out of greed You have snatched away my brother, but know, O God, I will not let this rest. Let this resolve remain firm in my mind; I have girded myself with unshakable determination.

I have the power of a fierce and mighty plea; I will split open Your very mind. Says Tukya-bandhu, with the nectar of tears I will beguile You and reclaim what is mine.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Out of greed You have seized my brother, but know this, O God: I will not let it pass. Let this resolve stand firm in my mind; about this I have girded myself tight. I have the strength of a fierce, insistent plea; I will split open Your very heart. Tukya-bandhu says: with the nectar of tears I will beguile You, and take back what is my own.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poet accuses God of taking his brother out of a kind of greed and vows not to accept it quietly. He fixes his resolve and names his weapon: not force but the sheer pressure of an insistent, tearful pleading that can break open even God's heart. The nectar of tears is the means by which he means to win, melting God rather than overpowering Him. It is the conviction that persistent, weeping love is itself a power that can reclaim what was taken.

Reproach, God feigns ignorance

मराठी मूळ

तुझीं वर्मे आह्मां ठावीं नारायणा । परी तूं शाहाणा होत नाहीं ॥1॥
मग कालाबुली हाका देते वेळे । होतोसि परी डोळे नुघडिसी ॥ध्रु.॥
जाणोनि अज्ञान करावें मोहरें । खोटी खोडी हे रे तुझी देवा ॥2॥
तुकयाबंधु ह्मणे कारण प्रचीति । पाहातों वेळ किती तेच गुण ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I know Your every secret, O Narayana, yet You refuse to learn sense. When I call out lovingly, You pretend to stir, yet You do not open Your eyes.

Though You know all, You feign ignorance; this deceitful trick is Your specialty, O God. Says Tukya-bandhu, I am simply testing to see how long You can keep up this game.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I know Your every secret, O Narayana, yet You will not come to Your senses. When I call out to You in my confusion, You stir a little, but You will not open Your eyes. You know everything, and still You play the innocent; this is Your nasty old trick, O God. Tukya-bandhu says: the proof is what matters; I am watching to see how long You can keep up these same ways.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poet speaks as one who has known God long enough to see through Him. He claims to know all God's secrets, while God pretends not to understand and refuses to truly wake to the cry. Calling this God's habitual trick is the teasing reproach of a familiar, not real contempt. The closing lines turn it into a patient test of faith: the poet will judge by experience, watching to see how long the seeming indifference can last, confident that the response must finally come.

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All of us are Your children, yet You do not treat us the same. This astonishes me, O Panduranga.

You call Yourself the mother of all, yet You hold some close and push others away. Some You take upon Your lap and give them joy; others You leave straining at Your door.

Some You feed with butter, pressing it upon them; others must beg for a single morsel. Some You never wish to leave Your side; others You despise when they draw near.

Says Tukya-bandhu, why did You give birth to those You do not love, O Narayana? This is a stain upon You. The name Vitthal suits You well.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We are all Your children. Yet You do not treat us the same. This astonishes me, O Panduranga. You call Yourself the mother of all; have You no shame? You hold some close and push others away. Some You take on Your lap and give them joy. Others You leave straining at Your door. Some You feed with butter, pressing it on them. Others must beg for a single morsel. Some You never want to leave Your side. Others You despise when they come near. Tukya-bandhu says: why did You give birth to the ones You do not love, O Narayana? This is a stain on You. The name Vitthal suits You well.

WHAT IT MEANS

Kanhoba, Tukaram's brother, presses one charge against God by holding Him to His own claim. If Vitthal is the mother of all, a mother cannot play favorites; yet some souls are fed butter on His lap while others beg at the door for a crumb. The poem names the unfairness plainly: God draws some near and pushes others away, and that is no way for a parent to act. The closing taunt, that the very name Vitthal fits Him, turns His title into the indictment. The frame the poem leaves unspoken is the bhakta's ache to be among the held, not the turned-away, and the audacity of love that dares to scold God to His face.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A fine trick: You have slipped a thorn into the midst of the torn cloth. Did You even consider what You were doing, mixing merit and sin like this? You cast a spell upon my brother all at once.

Ritual marks, garlands, forehead-paste, and sweet, tender words; yet the hands hold coils of deceit. What kind of trick is this to play upon a householder? Says Tukya-bandhu, You sit there smirking.

Look at the ruin You have caused; You have torn apart the household. You say there is not a moment to spare, yet it is You who have attached Yourself to him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A fine trick. You have slipped a thorn into the torn cloth. Did You even think what You were doing, mixing merit and sin like this? You cast a spell on my brother all at once. Ritual marks, garlands, forehead paste, sweet and tender words. Yet the hands hold coils of deceit. What kind of trick is this to play on a householder? Tukya-bandhu says: You sit there smirking. Look at the ruin You have caused. You have torn the household apart. You say there is not a moment to spare, yet it is You who have fastened Yourself onto him.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem accuses God of working His way into a settled household under a holy disguise and wrecking it. The outward signs of piety, the marks, the garland, the soft pious words, sit on top of hands full of deceit; the devotion that pulled the brother in looks, from the family's side, like a con. Kanhoba points at the gap between the sacred costume and the upheaval it caused: a working householder has been hollowed out and God only smirks. Read against oneself, it is a warning about a piety that is all marks and tender talk while real obligations collapse. The bitterness is the bitterness of love betrayed, not of unbelief.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hrishikesha must now answer for everything. You snatched my blanket, knowing full well I am poor and helpless.

You pulled me out of human society and stripped me bare. I had been quietly nurturing my life, worshipping You privately on the side.

From where did You emerge, O thief of the body? Says Tukya-bandhu, You have laid me open. What was it that You lacked so terribly?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hrishikesha must answer for everything now. You snatched my blanket, knowing full well I am poor and helpless. You pulled me out of human society and stripped me bare. I had been quietly nurturing my life, worshipping You privately on the side. Where did You come from, O thief of the body? Tukya-bandhu says: You have laid me wide open. What was it that You lacked so badly?

WHAT IT MEANS

The complaint here is that God did not stay a private comfort but came as a thief and took everything. The speaker had kept his devotion modest and on the side, tending an ordinary life; God stripped that life bare and pulled him out of the world of ordinary men. Calling Vitthal the thief of the body names the stakes: it is not goods that were stolen but the whole self. The unanswerable question, what did You lack that You had to take this from me, throws the demand for an accounting back on God. Beneath the grievance is the recognition that grace, once it comes, leaves nothing of the old life standing.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You call Yourself compassionate, merciful, generous, and kind, yet You look like nothing but a throat-cutter. What had we ever done to You in any single birth? Now that You have become the master, You wield such authority.

You have made a fine show of Your goodness, plain for all to see: You drove my brother mad and broke apart our bond. Says Tukya-bandhu, how can people call You good? You have taken our very life and tested us to the limit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You call Yourself compassionate, merciful, generous, and kind. Yet You look like nothing but a throat-cutter. What had we ever done to You, in any single birth? Tell me. Now that You have become the master, You wield such power over us. You made a fine show of Your goodness, plain for all to see. You drove my brother mad and broke our bond apart. Tukya-bandhu says: how can people call You good? You have taken our very life and tested us to the limit.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem holds God's tender titles against the hard thing He has done. Compassionate, merciful, kind: He is called all of these, yet to the family it feels like a throat being cut, the bond between brothers severed and one of them carried off into God-madness. The stinging line is that He showed off His goodness by this very ruin. By demanding what crime in any birth deserved it, Kanhoba refuses the easy verdict that what God does must be good. The grief is real and the love is real; the poem lets the bhakta say out loud that grace can feel exactly like cruelty when it takes someone you love.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now Your qualities have become clear from all of this. You have seized our home with an innocent face.

You call Yourself an ocean of mercy, a friend of the helpless, but to me You appear nothing but a scoundrel. There is no genuine compassion in Your belly; You are as hard and deceitful as ever.

You will not even return the blind man's walking stick. Says Tukya-bandhu, it is a good thing You are not fully capable, O Infinite One; otherwise You would have drained the last drop.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now Your qualities are clear, from all of this. You seized our home wearing an innocent face. You call Yourself an ocean of mercy, a friend of the helpless. But to me You look like nothing but a scoundrel. There is no real compassion in Your belly. You are as hard and as deceitful as ever. You will not even give back the blind man's stick. Tukya-bandhu says: it is a good thing You are not fully able, O Infinite One. Otherwise You would have drained the last drop.

WHAT IT MEANS

Here the speaker says God's true character has finally shown through the gentle titles. Ocean of mercy and friend of the helpless are exposed, in his eyes, as a robber's cover; the home was taken by a face that pretended innocence. The sharpest image is the blind man's walking stick, the one support a helpless person cannot spare, which God will not return. The grim relief at the end, that He is not fully able or He would have taken everything, measures how total the loss feels. The poem dares to strip God of His comforting names and stand in the place of the one left with nothing, while still addressing Him as the Infinite.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What can I tell You, O Hrishikesha? Such remorse has seized me that I want to swallow the moments and not let a single breath pass. You have ruined my home and left the children wandering door to door, crying and struggling.

Whether to give up this life or to carry on, that is all that remains, O Keshava, because of my brother. Says Tukya-bandhu, let the world call it good or bad; still, I will not abandon this pursuit under any condition.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Tukya-bandhu says: let the world call it good or bad. Still I will not give up this pursuit, no matter what.

WHAT IT MEANS

The grief has turned inward into remorse so heavy the speaker wishes he could stop time itself. The home is wrecked and the children are out begging at doors; the only question left is whether to keep living or let go. Yet the poem turns at the end: whatever the world says, he will not abandon the very pursuit of God that cost him everything. That refusal is the heart of it. Even when devotion has ruined him, he cannot and will not let go of God; the complaint and the clinging are the same act.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

After our parents died, my brother was placed in my care. He too, O Hari, has now become estranged from us, following You.

Are these the rewards of devotion? You have destroyed a thriving household. This is the fulfillment, the settlement You have finally delivered.

I was maintaining two families on one life; now You come shamelessly to tempt the remaining one. Says Tukya-bandhu, what more can I call You? The one who befriended You was made into a madman.

IN PLAIN WORDS

After our parents died, my brother was put in my care. He too, O Hari, has now grown estranged from us, following You. Are these the rewards of devotion? You have destroyed a thriving household. This is the settlement You have finally delivered. I was keeping two families alive on one life. Now You come shamelessly to tempt the one that is left. Tukya-bandhu says: what more can I call You? The one who befriended You was made into a madman.

WHAT IT MEANS

The speaker recounts a plain duty: with the parents dead, he was raising his brother, and on one set of shoulders he was holding up two households. God's return on all that devotion, he says, is the household broken and the brother estranged. The bitter word settlement names what feels like a cruel final accounting. Now, with one family barely left, he sees God reaching for that one too. The line that whoever befriends God is turned into a madman captures the fear running under the whole cycle: that nearness to the divine is not safe, that it unmakes ordinary life rather than blessing it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have heard that this is how it was in generations past: our ancestors were drawn into Your service, and You gave them Your assurance. Why then, O Hrishikesha, do You pursue us? How long will You test us? Birth after birth, O Keshava, there is a claim between us.

Why do You keep up this pretense? Says Tukya-bandhu, how long will You remain so blind, O Narayana? You cannot bear to see one eating when another goes hungry.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I had heard that this is how it was with our ancestors long ago. They were drawn into Your service, and You gave them Your assurance. Why then, O Hrishikesha, do You pursue us? Tell me. Even now You will not stop. How long will You test us? Birth after birth, O Keshava, there is a claim between us. Why do You keep up this pretense? Tukya-bandhu says: how long will You stay so blind, O Narayana? You cannot bear to see one man eating while another goes hungry.

WHAT IT MEANS

The speaker sees a family pattern: the ancestors too were pulled into God's service, so this pursuit reaches back through the generations as an old standing claim. He asks why God will not relent, why the testing goes on birth after birth. The closing charge is the sharpest: God cannot stand to see one man fed while another starves, so He keeps taking. Read kindly, it names a divine hunger for souls that will not leave a family in peace. The poem voices the strange grief of being chosen, of belonging to a God who treats devotion as a debt that is never fully paid.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We were living a quiet, hard-working life, filling our bellies without complaint. Then You contrived this upheaval and showed off Your divinity.

Why did You uproot the entire vine, branch and root together? Your desire is still unsatisfied. I alone remain at the frayed end, and even that is unbearable to watch.

A clean break has been made between the two of us, right before my eyes. Says Tukya-bandhu, the sweet has become overly abundant, which is why You insist on eating the roots along with the fruit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We were living a quiet, hard life, filling our bellies, not complaining. Then You stirred up this upheaval and showed off Your divinity. You uprooted the whole vine, branch and root together. Why? And still Your hunger is not satisfied. I alone remain at the frayed end, and even that is unbearable to watch. A clean break has been made between us two, right before my eyes. Tukya-bandhu says: the sweet has grown far too plentiful. That is why You insist on eating the roots along with the fruit.

WHAT IT MEANS

The image is a vine torn up entire, branch and root, to describe how God uprooted a whole settled family instead of taking one fruit. The speaker, left dangling at the frayed end, watches the bond between the brothers cut clean before his eyes. The closing line is a wry, bitter explanation: the harvest of devotion grew so sweet and so abundant that God, greedy, ate not just the fruit but the roots too. It names a sense that grace did not stop at enough but consumed everything. The grief sits inside a complaint that God's appetite for this devout household had no limit.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You know well the laws of right conduct, what is fitting and what is not, O Lord. Yet You act as if Your eyes are closed, doing as You please in the dark.

Now give whatever answer You will, O Lord of the world; You have brought the full circle of consequences around Yourself. It was for the sweetness of service that I willingly held on to ignorance; but that devotion will return to its rightful owner in the end.

Says Tukya-bandhu, I have nothing more to say; You took what You wanted by planting Yourself at Your own feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You know well the laws of right conduct, O Lord, what is fitting and what is not. Yet You act as if Your eyes are shut, doing as You please in the dark. Now give whatever answer You will, O Lord of the world. You have brought the whole circle of consequences around onto Yourself. It was for the sweetness of service that I willingly held on to ignorance. But that devotion will return to its rightful owner in the end. Tukya-bandhu says: I have nothing more to say. You took what You wanted by planting Yourself at Your own feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

The speaker turns God's own knowledge of right and wrong against Him: He knows the law of fit conduct yet acts as though His eyes are shut, doing as He pleases in the dark. The case is now closed and God must answer, with the whole chain of consequences ringed back onto Himself. There is a confession folded in too: the speaker admits he clung to ignorance for the sweetness of serving, and trusts that the devotion will find its rightful place at last. The final image, God taking what He wanted by planting Himself at His own feet, names a self-sufficient deity who answers to no one. The poem holds both rebuke and surrender at once.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What if some calamity now befalls our children, O Infinite One? See what there is to say about it. All has turned out well without any effort; everything runs and speaks on its own, free of all toil.

You have been caught in the act, O Lord, struck right at the vulnerable spot. You have no excuse left.

Says Tukya-bandhu, You had set a fine trap, but by good fortune we have seen through it. O God, You still owe us the debt of our forefathers; why have You not repaid it?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What if some calamity now falls on our children, O Infinite One? See. What is there to say about it? It has all turned out fine, with no effort. Everything runs and speaks on its own now, free of toil. You have been caught in the act, O Lord, struck right at the tender spot. You have no excuse left. Tukya-bandhu says: You had set a fine trap, but by good luck we have seen through it. O God, You still owe us the debt of our forefathers. Why have You not repaid it yet?

WHAT IT MEANS

The speaker fears for the children who might suffer next, then, half mocking, says the family's life now runs on its own with no effort, as if abandoned to fate. The pivot is triumphant: God has been caught in the act, struck where He is vulnerable, with no excuse left. The trap He laid for this household has been seen through in time. And the speaker presses an old claim, the debt owed since their forefathers, asking why it remains unpaid. The poem mixes dread, defiance, and a creditor's demand, treating the relationship with God as an unsettled account the bhakta has every right to call in.

Complaint, dragging God before the saints

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You have dodged and squirmed, but know that I will not let this pass while I live. I will bring this into the open and stand You before the saints.

Is Your claim so great that You should fear our small request? Until now I was ignorant and You had Your way, O Infinite One. But now I will not let You off for even a cowrie's worth.

Says Tukya-bandhu, I have staked my life on this. My throat and Your feet are bound together.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You have dodged and squirmed. But know this: I will not let it pass while I live. It will come out into the open. I will stand You before the saints. Is Your claim so great that You should fear our small request? Until now I was ignorant, and You had Your way, O Infinite One. But now I will not let You off for even a cowrie's worth. Tukya-bandhu says: I have staked my life on this. My throat and Your feet are bound together in one place.

WHAT IT MEANS

The speaker threatens to take his grievance public: he will haul God before the assembly of saints and force the matter into the open, the way one drags a debtor before a council. His earlier ignorance let God have His way, but now he will not forgive even a cowrie's worth of the debt. The closing image is total: his throat tied to God's feet in a single knot, so that God cannot leave without him and he will not survive being cut loose. It is the language of a man who has bet his whole life on this bond. The audacity is the point; the bhakta turns his helplessness into a hold on God that cannot be shaken off.

The debtor God, settle the account

मराठी मूळ

तेणें चि काळें केला । असता अवघा निवाडा ॥1॥
इतका न लगता उशीर । न धरितों भीडभार ।
सिद्धासी वेव्हार । कासयासी लागला ॥ध्रु.॥
असोनियां माल खरा । किती केल्या येरझारा ।
धरणें ही दिवस तेरा । माझ्या भावें घेतलें ॥2॥
अझुन तरी इतक्यावरी । चुकवीं जनाचार हरी ।
तुकयाबंधु ह्मणे उरी । नाहीं तरी नुरे कांहीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If the settlement had been made at the proper time, all this would not have been necessary. There would have been no need for such delay or formality.

When the goods are genuine, why haggle? Even a thirteen-day debt can be cleared if the debtor is honest. Even now, at this late stage, O Hari, settle this account and spare us the public disgrace.

Says Tukya-bandhu, if there is any honor left, let it be preserved; otherwise nothing will remain.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If you had settled at the right time, none of this would have been needed. There would be no delay, no awkward standing on ceremony. When the goods are genuine, why haggle? Even a debt of thirteen days is cleared if the debtor is honest. I cleared mine by my own faith. Even now, this late, Hari, settle the account and spare us the public shame. Tukya-bandhu says: if any honor is left, let it be kept. Otherwise nothing will remain.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram's brother presses God like a creditor pressing a debtor who keeps stalling. The whole abhanga runs on one image: the soul has paid in full with honest devotion, and now God owes the goods and is dragging His feet. The poet warns that the longer the settlement is put off, the more it becomes a public scandal that touches God's own name. The plea is not for mercy but for fair dealing: close the account, spare both of us the disgrace. The stakes are God's honor itself, which is what the bhakta holds as collateral.

The debtor God before elders

मराठी मूळ

आतां न राहें क्षण एक । तुझा कळला रे लौकिक। नेदीं हालों एक । कांहीं केल्यावांचूनि ॥1॥
संबंध पडिला कोणाशीं। काय डोळे झांकितोसी । नेईन पांचांपाशीं । दे नाहींतरी वोढूनि॥ध्रु.॥
सुखें नेदीस जाणवलें । नास केल्याविण उगलें । तरि तें ही विचारिलें । आह्मी आहे तुज आधीं ॥2॥
असें च करूनि किती । नागविलीं नाहीं नीती । तुकयाबंधु ह्मणे अंतीं । न सोडिसी ते खोडी॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now I will not rest for a single moment. Your true character has been revealed.

I will not let You move an inch without getting what is mine. What connection have You formed? Why do You close Your eyes? I will drag You before the five elders if You do not give willingly.

If sweetness fails and You will not yield without destruction, know that I have already considered that option too. How long will You go on cheating in this way? Says Tukya-bandhu, in the end You never give up Your tricks.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now I will not rest a single moment. I have seen your true ways. I will not let you move one step until I get what is mine. What bond did you make with me? Why do you shut your eyes? Give it willingly, or I drag you before the five elders. If gentleness fails and you will yield only when ruined, know that I have already weighed that too. How long will you keep cheating like this? Tukya-bandhu says: in the end you never drop your tricks.

WHAT IT MEANS

The bhakta turns relentless: God is the debtor who keeps looking away, and the soul refuses to let Him slip past until the debt is paid. The threat to drag God before the five village elders, the panchayat, casts grace as a matter of justice that can be tried in open court. The poet even says he has thought through the harsher options, that he will press the case to the point of ruin if sweet asking does not work. The harshness is aimed at God's evasions, the way grace seems forever deferred, not at any contempt for God. What looks like rude bargaining is actually a love that will not be put off.

The debtor God, stubborn farmer

मराठी मूळ

तुज ते सवे आहे ठावें । घ्यावें त्याचें बुडवावें । परि ते आह्मांसवें आतां न फावे कांहीं ॥1॥
नव्हों सोडायाचे धणी । कष्टें मेळविलें करोनि । पाहा विचारोनी । आढी धरोनि काम नाहीं॥ध्रु.॥
अवघे राहिले प्रकार । जालों जीवासी उदार । असा हा निर्धार । कळला असावा असेल ॥2॥
आतां निदसुर नसावें । गाठ पडली कुणब्यासवें । तुकयाबंधु ह्मणे राखावें । देवा महत्व आपुलें॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You know very well that Your way is to take from people and ruin them. But that will not work with me any longer.

I am not one to let go of what I have earned through toil. Think it over carefully; stubbornness will serve no purpose here.

All pretenses are over. I have become reckless with my own life.

Let this determination be clearly understood. Now do not be complacent; You have met a tenacious farmer.

Says Tukya-bandhu, O God, protect Your own honor.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You know your own habit well: you take from people and then ruin them. But that will not work on me now. I am not one who lets go of what I earned by hard toil. Think it over; stubbornness will get you nowhere. All pretending is finished. I have grown reckless with my own life. Let this resolve be clearly understood. Do not be careless now: you have run into a tenacious farmer. Tukya-bandhu says: God, protect your own honor.

WHAT IT MEANS

Here the soul names itself a kunbi, a dogged peasant farmer who will not be cheated of what his labor earned. The devotion is the hard-won crop, and God is the cunning landlord who usually takes and ruins; the poet declares the old trick has met its match. He says he is past caring for his own safety, which is the surrender that makes him impossible to scare off. The closing line flips the pressure onto God: it is your honor on the line, so guard it by paying. The whole stance is that fierce, single-minded clinging is the surest way to corner grace.

The debtor God, no empty words

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Too much talk serves no purpose; empty words are useless, O Purushottama. Tell me plainly in one sentence what You intend.

Will You repay what is owed, or shall there be a quarrel? Tell me frankly, brother. Let no one hold back now; all courtesy is past.

What happened before is done; I hold no grudge. But from this point forward, what is Your plan? Every moment is not the same; that much is clear to everyone.

Says Tukya-bandhu, whatever tumult is stirred up now will remain for good. This matter will not be dropped or forgotten; why do You waste time with feeble words?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Too much talk is useless; empty words help nothing, Purushottama. Tell me plainly, in one sentence, what you mean to do. Will you repay what is owed, or will there be a quarrel? Speak frankly, brother. Let no one hold back now; all politeness is past. What is done is done; I hold no grudge for it. But from here on, what is your plan? Not every moment is the same, and everyone knows it. Tukya-bandhu says: whatever uproar is raised now will stay for good. This will not be dropped or forgotten. Why waste time on feeble words?

WHAT IT MEANS

The bhakta demands a straight answer from God, addressed as Purushottama, the Supreme Person: pay or quarrel, but no more soft delaying talk. He waives the past grievance to make the point sharper, fixing all the pressure on what God will do next. The warning that every moment is not the same names the stakes: there is a time when accounts come due, and that time has arrived. He promises the matter will not be quietly let go. The abhanga is a portrait of prayer that refuses to be fobbed off with vague comfort and insists on a real reckoning.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have alienated myself from all people and the world, and all of it was for Your sake. When what I have will not suffice, things will not go well.

Your true nature has been revealed: You have sat down and declared the body itself bankrupt. You look presentable and speak gently, but the hallmarks of a cheat are showing at this moment.

What should I do, having trusted You so completely? Says Tukya-bandhu, You appear blind to what is seen, deaf to what is heard. What more can happen now, after all of this? On every count the same cry goes up: they call it a pure, clear crystal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I cut myself off from all people and the world, and I did it all for your sake. When what I have will not stretch far enough, things go badly. Your true nature is out: you have sat down and declared the body itself bankrupt. You look respectable and speak softly, but right now the marks of a cheat are showing. What should I do, having trusted you so completely? Tukya-bandhu says: you seem blind to what is seen and deaf to what is heard. What more can happen now, after all this? On every side the same cry goes up: they call it a pure, clear crystal.

WHAT IT MEANS

The devotee lays out what he has staked: he gave up the whole world to belong to God, and now finds God acting like a debtor who declares bankruptcy of the very body. The complaint is that God looks trustworthy yet behaves like a swindler, blind and deaf to the soul's plea. This is the dark night of devotion, where the one you bet everything on seems to have vanished into silence. The harshness points at that experience of unanswered trust, not at real scorn for God. The last image, the pure crystal everyone praises, holds the irony: the world calls Him flawless even as the bhakta feels cheated.

The debtor God, abuse to praise

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You have drowned all reputation and cheerfully sent everyone begging. Your name is the peerless crown, without equal in all three worlds, which is precisely why the clever ones never sit at Your door.

Formless, shameless, nameless, rascal, scoundrel, deceitful God, swindler: these are the only names I hear for You. In all Your qualities You have proved Yourself complete.

Says Tukya-bandhu, now I will not release Your feet even at the cost of my life.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You have drowned all my reputation and cheerfully sent everyone out begging. Your name is the matchless crown, with no equal in the three worlds, which is exactly why no clever person ever sits at your door. Formless one, shameless one, nameless one, rascal, scoundrel, deceitful God, swindler: these are the only names I hear for you. In all your qualities you have shown yourself complete. Tukya-bandhu says: now I will not let go of your feet, not if it costs me my life.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poet piles up abuse, calling God formless, shameless, a cheat and a swindler, and then in the same breath crowns Him as peerless in all three worlds. The insults are the bhakta's joke against himself and the world: only a fool would trust a God who beggars His devotees, yet that very God has no equal. Naming God nirguna, formless, slides the scolding toward truth, since the formless one cannot be pinned to ordinary fair dealing. The turn comes at the end: having called Him every bad name, the poet seizes His feet and vows never to let go. The whole quarrel was love in disguise, and surrender is where it lands.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The right moment has come of its own accord; keeping the secret is no longer wise. Unless I cast aside shame, I see no way forward.

You still refuse to see reason; what I tell You does not enter Your mind. Let me now try what must be tried.

Waiting and watching the road does no good; present the evidence plainly. Gird up properly and conduct yourself with propriety before the assembly.

Now there is no reason for weariness; one must not become indifferent. Says Tukya-bandhu, without this there will be no resolution.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The right moment has come on its own; keeping the secret no longer helps. Unless I throw off shame, I see no way ahead. You still will not see reason; what I tell you does not sink in. So let me now try what must be tried. Watching the road and waiting does no good; lay the plain proof on the table. Gird yourself up properly and behave fittingly before the assembly. There is no room for weariness now, no becoming indifferent. Tukya-bandhu says: without this, the matter will never be settled.

WHAT IT MEANS

The bhakta decides the time for quiet patience is over and the case must be argued out in the open. He casts off shame because polite waiting has gotten him nowhere with a God who will not listen. The language of evidence and the assembly continues the courtroom image: bring the proof, stand up properly, let it be judged before all. He warns himself most of all against weariness and indifference, the temptations to give up the pursuit. The point is that some prayer must become persistent and public, refusing to fade out, or it reaches no resolution.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Slowly, slowly, this entanglement has grown thicker. If You do not settle the account, know what lies ahead.

I have given You fair warning; I am discharged of my duty. From here onward, brother, act according to Your own judgment.

Twenty-eight cosmic ages have passed, day by day; the interest upon the principal is crushing You, O God. Says Tukya-bandhu, preserve what You have.

Discard those pleasures of Yours; the matter is public knowledge and has not been resolved.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Slowly, slowly this tangle has grown thicker. If you do not settle the account, know what lies ahead. I have given you fair warning, so I am clear of my duty. From now on, brother, act by your own judgment. Twenty-eight ages have passed, day after day; the interest on the principal is crushing you, God. Tukya-bandhu says: save yourself. Now let go of those pleasures of yours. The matter is known to the whole world and is still not closed.

WHAT IT MEANS

The debt is recast as ancient, twenty-eight cosmic ages old, with the unpaid interest now mounting against God Himself. The bhakta says he has done his part by giving fair warning, so the consequences fall on God's side now. The crushing interest is a witty reversal: the longer grace is withheld, the heavier the obligation grows on the one who withholds it. He urges God to save His own name by paying and to set aside His comfortable detachment. The closing note, that the matter is public and unresolved, keeps the pressure of a debt that everyone can see.

The debtor God, letter as witness

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have opened this letter with effort, only to have a witness. Otherwise, by Your merit, what could we possibly lack? In Your name alone we have been living comfortably, filling our bellies.

Should I have kept silent, You would have said, 'He never informed me.' Now, after all this, give what is owed and do not do anything reckless. People will say You owe us an enormous debt.

Says Tukya-bandhu, this was done to invoke Panduranga; there was no real need to ask for anything.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I opened this letter with effort, only to have a witness on record. Otherwise, by your merit, what could we ever lack? Living in your name alone, we fill our bellies in comfort. I made the demand so you could not later say, He never told me. Now, after all this, give what is owed and do nothing reckless. People will say you owe us an enormous debt. Tukya-bandhu says: this was done only to call out to Panduranga; there was no real need to ask for anything.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poet explains why he bothered to make the demand at all: to put it on the record, so God can never claim He was not informed. The honest admission follows that living in God's name, he already lacks nothing, which softens the whole quarrel. The point of the lawsuit was never the goods but the calling, the chance to summon Panduranga by name. So the fierce dunning turns out to be a pretext for closeness, a way to make God show up. The last line quietly confesses that the debt-collecting was love's device all along.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Through my brother's devotion, a fortune was amassed that will not be exhausted in a billion ages. He has brought the whole of Vaikuntha down in one consignment.

Now there is no need to come and go or to do anything anywhere; we may eat in comfort for lifetime upon lifetime. The wealth is beyond counting, immeasurable, boundless; the sky is packed with bliss that cannot be contained in all three worlds.

Everything is filled to overflowing; mountains of happiness have arisen. Says Tukya-bandhu, a wondrous, supreme treasure has been found.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Through my brother's faith a fortune was gathered that will not run out in a billion ages. He has brought the whole of Vaikuntha down in one load. Now there is no more coming and going, nothing left to do anywhere; we may eat in comfort for lifetime upon lifetime. The wealth is past counting, immeasurable, boundless; the sky is packed with bliss the three worlds cannot hold. Everything is filled, always full; mountains of happiness have risen. Tukya-bandhu says: a wondrous, supreme treasure has been found.

WHAT IT MEANS

The mood turns from collecting a debt to receiving an infinite fortune, the answered prayer overflowing. Vaikuntha, the highest heaven, is pictured as a single consignment brought down to the house, so the bliss is no longer chased but possessed. The end of coming and going names the end of striving and the cycle of births; nothing more needs doing. The wealth is deliberately measureless, too vast for the three worlds, to mark grace as boundless rather than rationed. The treasure is the supreme aim, paramartha, found at last, and the only response is delight.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now the wandering in foreign lands is over, whether in action or inaction. The master of all accomplishments has come home.

I have become wealthy with an inexhaustible treasure; an infinite jewel of divine qualities has been found. The poverty and suffering of lifetimes has been destroyed.

A ship upon the ocean was tossed about and has washed ashore here by accident, drawn by the pull of past merit. Says Tukya-bandhu, there is no limit to our fortune now.

Such a great merchant, O Purushottama, has been found.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now the wandering in far lands is over, in doing and not-doing alike. The master of all powers has come home. I have grown rich with a treasure that never empties; an endless jewel of divine qualities is mine. The poverty and pain of many lives is destroyed. A ship tossed on the ocean has washed ashore here as if by chance, drawn in by stored-up merit, the gift of the past. Tukya-bandhu says: there is no limit to our fortune now. Such a great merchant, Purushottama, has been found.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poet gathers three images of arrival: the end of restless wandering, the homecoming of the master of all powers, and a storm-tossed ship reaching shore. Each says the same thing, that the long search has ended in possession rather than effort. He credits the landing to past merit, sanchit, so the grace feels both undeserved and quietly prepared for. The poverty of many lifetimes, the soul's bondage, is what the treasure cancels. Naming God a great merchant, Purushottama the Supreme Person, turns the earlier debt-quarrel inside out: the one accused of cheating is now the trader who delivered an endless fortune.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The old heirloom of our ancestors has been recovered. Narayana has shown His grace through the merit of past lives.

We are now content in bliss because of this. All worry has ceased; the cycle of debt is over.

The household wealth is the priceless Name of Vitthal. My brother's devotion has revealed its true worth.

Says Tukya-bandhu, the obligation is discharged. There is nothing more to say, and no other desire besides Vitthal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

An old heirloom of our ancestors has been recovered. Narayana showed His grace through merit earned in past lives. We live now as bliss itself because of this. Worry is gone; the giving and taking is finished. The household wealth is the priceless Name of Vitthal. My brother's devotion has shown its true worth. Tukya-bandhu says: the obligation is discharged. There is nothing more to say, and no desire left except Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

The treasure is now named outright: it is the Name of Vitthal, an old family inheritance that was lost and has been found again. Narayana's grace, earned by past merit, is what restored it, so the wealth is both ancestral and given. The end of giving and taking closes the long debt-quarrel of the earlier poems: the account is settled, worry is over. Devotion, the brother's bhava, is what revealed the Name's real value, which is beyond price. The closing line empties out every other want, leaving Vitthal alone as both the wealth and the only thing still desired.

Prayer, only Pandhari and the Name

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Grant me birth in Pandhari always; I ask nothing else of You. Grant me grace, O Hari, grant me the gift of mercy.

Dispel the darkness and show me Your feet. Fulfill my longing by granting Your meeting; do not disregard one who has come in surrender.

Let the Name remain unbroken in my heart and on my tongue; let me not forget it for a single moment, waking or dreaming. Grant me the company of saints, and besides them I know nothing but You.

Enough of the road to Yama's city; this ocean of worldly existence was never meant to stand in the way. Across the three worlds there is no other refuge.

Says Tukya-bandhu, with head bowed at Your feet, I make this prayer.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Grant me birth in Pandhari, always. I ask nothing else of you. Give me grace, O Hari; give me the gift of mercy. Burn away the darkness and show me your feet. Fill my longing; come and meet me. Do not turn away one who has come in surrender. Let the Name stay unbroken in my heart and on my tongue. Let me not forget it for a single moment, awake or in dream. Give me the company of the saints. Apart from you I know nothing else. Enough now of the road to Yama's city; this ocean of the world was never meant to block my way. In all three worlds there is no other refuge. Tukya-bandhu prays this, with his head laid at your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a prayer that asks for almost nothing the world prizes. Tukya-bandhu wants only one birthplace, Pandhari, and one possession, the Name held without a break in heart and on tongue. The grace he begs for is to have the inner darkness burned away and the Lord's feet shown, and to be kept in the company of saints. He sets aside the dread of death's road and the whole ocean of worldly existence as no real obstacle, because once God is the refuge there is no other refuge to seek across the three worlds. The poem narrows desire down to God alone and lets everything else fall away.

Social Criticism

Social criticism, the brute who honors no one

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A man of a rude and aggressive nature knows no restraint; he kicks at the great and the small alike. Such a person forfeits his humanity and dishonors his elders.

A tasteless donkey knows neither mother nor sister and brays without meaning. Says Tukya-bandhu, a goat drunk on its own mating season does not consider that it urinates upon its own mouth.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A brute by nature carries no shame, no weight of respect. He kicks out at the great and the small alike. He has become a man, yet he tears down the honor of his elders. A tasteless donkey knows neither mother nor sister; it brays at anything, with no meaning. Tukya-bandhu says: a goat drunk on its rut does not even notice that it urinates on its own mouth.

WHAT IT MEANS

Here the poem looks hard at the man who respects no one. Born human, he still kicks at high and low alike and strips the honor from those he should revere. The harsh animal images, the braying donkey that knows no kin, the rutting goat that fouls its own mouth without noticing, all point at one thing: a person so driven by his own impulses that he degrades himself and cannot see it. The warning is to examine that blind, honor-destroying drive in oneself, not to despise the man caught in it.

Social criticism, the mark of contempt for the wise

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The offspring of a donkey is recognized by its nature; it shows itself plainly. One who disrespects the word of the wise: that is the mark by which to know him.

For a drunkard of the lowest sort, the teaching of wisdom is wasted. Says Tukya-bandhu, a rabid dog does not distinguish between friend and stranger.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The offspring of a donkey shows its nature on its own; you can tell it easily. The man who insults the word of the wise: that is the very mark by which to know him. For a drunkard of the lowest sort, all good teaching is wasted. Tukya-bandhu says: a rabid dog does not tell friend from stranger.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem says a person's nature gives itself away, just as a donkey's breeding shows plainly. The clearest sign of a coarse nature is contempt for the word of the wise. To one drunk and degraded, instruction lands as nothing; like a rabid dog, such a person can no longer tell who means him well from who does not. The images are sharp, but the point is the pattern: when the heart is intoxicated with itself it cannot receive teaching or recognize a friend. Tukya-bandhu turns the eye toward that closed condition so the listener can check for it within.

The nature of God, the one who carries every weight

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The cosmic fish, the tortoise, and the great serpent Shesha: who supports them as they bear the weight of the earth? What fear or worry need we have when such a helper is at our side? He carries the conch, discus, mace, and countless weapons, bearing their weight for the sake of His devotees. He stood as the champion and protector of the Pandavas with great skill.

He is the champion of Tukya's brother as well.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The fish, the tortoise, and the serpent Shesha: who holds them up as they bear the weight of the earth? What is there for us to fear, what is there to worry about, when such a helper stands by us? He carries the conch, the discus, the mace, weapons beyond counting; he bears them all for the sake of his devotees. He saved the Pandavas with his own skill. He is the champion of Tukya's brother too.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem builds a single argument out of God's cosmic forms. The same Lord whose incarnations as fish, tortoise, and serpent uphold the earth is the one who stands beside the devotee. If he carries the whole world and bears every weapon for the protection of those who love him, then fear and worry have no ground. The reminder that he guarded the Pandavas seals it with a known rescue. Tukya-bandhu ends by claiming that protection for himself: the cosmic protector is also his own personal champion.

The Name, what saying Rama does

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By saying Rama, desire and anger are burnt to ash, and pride is banished far away. By saying Rama, the bond of karma is severed; not even the shadow of hardship or weariness can touch you.

By saying Rama, there is no rebirth, no dwelling in the womb, no poverty ever. By saying Rama, even Yama surrenders, helpless before that immovable state.

By saying Rama, all righteousness is fulfilled, and the veil of darkness is destroyed in a flash. Says Tukya-bandhu, by saying Rama, the ocean of worldly existence is crossed beyond doubt.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Say Rama, and desire and anger burn to ash; pride is driven out of the country. Say Rama, and the work of karma snaps, the bond of the world breaks; not even in a dream does toil or weariness come near. Say Rama, and there is no birth, no dwelling in the womb, never again a fitness for poverty. Say Rama, and even Yama becomes a helpless suppliant; what immovable state stands beyond that? Say Rama, and every duty is fulfilled, and the veil of darkness is destroyed in a flash. Tukya-bandhu says: say Rama, and the ocean of the world is crossed. There is no doubt of it.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a litany on the single act of saying the Name of Rama, and each line names one bondage it dissolves. Inwardly it burns away lust, anger, and pride; outwardly it cuts the chain of karma and rebirth so that even the womb and future poverty are escaped. It strips death of its terror, since Yama himself becomes a beggar before it, and it accomplishes the fruit of all duties at once while tearing away the veil of ignorance. The poem stakes everything on this one practice and ends with no hedge: the ocean of worldly existence is crossed, beyond doubt, by the Name.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I will die upon Your blessed Name and qualities, O Lord, my Mother and Father. The grip of illusion has been broken; the snares of desire have been cut through by this grace.

This body has been made cool and calm, free from the burning of anxiety. Death itself has turned away with a blackened face, and all beings have become friendly companions.

Says Tukya-bandhu, by Your merit, O Supreme Lord, all directions stand liberated.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will die upon your Name and your praises, O Lord who holds the discus, my mother and father. The grip of illusion is undone; its snares of desire are cut by that grace. This body has been made cool and calm, with no burning of anxiety left in it. Death has turned away with a blackened face; every creature has become a friendly companion. Tukya-bandhu says: by your goodness, O Supreme Lord, every land and every direction stands set free.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poet gives his death itself over to the Name: he will die singing God's qualities, and on the way the Name has already done its work. Maya's grip is broken and the cords of desire are cut, so the body that once burned with anxiety is now cool and still. Death has been faced down and slinks away ashamed, and where there was fear of others, all beings now feel like friends. Tukya-bandhu widens this to the whole world: by God's grace, freedom spreads to every direction. Calling the Lord both mother and father marks the grace as wholly tender, not earned but given.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now hear what I ask of You, O Narayana, from the depths of a sincere chitta. Let my tongue remain free if it will sing Your praise; if not, then nail it shut.

Let my eyes see all women other than my wife as mothers; if they cannot, then I do not need those eyes. Let my ears feel repelled by both blame and praise; if they cannot, then take the ears as well.

Bring all the senses under control and keep them separate; break the delusion that binds them. Says Tukya-bandhu, the moment I forget You, O Narayana, let that be the death of my breath.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now hear what I ask of you, Narayana, in earnest, from the heart. Let my tongue stay free if it will sing your praise; if it will not, then nail it shut and cast it away. Let my eyes see every other woman as a mother; if they cannot, then I do not want eyes. Better that my ears recoil from both blame and praise; if they will not, then deal with the ears as well. Take all the senses, master them, hold them apart; break the delusion that binds them. Tukya-bandhu says: the moment I forget you, Narayana, let that be the death of my breath.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a fierce, conditional prayer about the senses. The poet does not ask to enjoy his faculties; he asks God to keep each one only insofar as it serves devotion and to destroy it otherwise. A tongue that will not sing should be silenced, eyes that will not see other women as mothers are not worth keeping, ears that crave praise or blame should be taken away. He wants every sense mastered and held apart from its delusion. The closing line names the real stake: forgetting God even for a moment is the one death he fears, worse than the loss of any sense.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who bows to all beings, forgetting caste, has known the state of the Self. One who has spent all energy in service to others has known the state of the Self.

One whose chitta holds no trace of duality or division has known the state of the Self. One from whose speech neither praise nor blame issues has known the state of the Self.

One who understands what is fitting and what is not, who knows the way of righteousness, and whose devotion is firm: that is a true human being. Says Tukya-bandhu, the rest are mere pack-animals carrying the burdens of worldly existence.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One who bows to all beings, forgetting caste, has known the state of the Self. One who has poured out all his strength in serving others has known the state of the Self. One in whose heart there is no duality, no sense of two, has known the state of the Self. One from whose mouth no blame and no praise comes has known the state of the Self. One who knows what is fitting and what is not, who knows the way of right conduct, whose faith and devotion are firm: that one is a true human being. Tukya-bandhu says: the rest are only donkeys, hauling the loads of the world.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem gives a test for self-realization, and the test is conduct, not claim. The one who truly knows the Self bows to every creature without regard for caste, spends himself in service, holds no inner sense of division, and speaks neither flattery nor slander. Add discernment of right and wrong and steady devotion, and you have a true human being. Everyone else, however learned or busy, is dismissed with a blunt image: a beast of burden carrying worldly loads. The sting is meant to make the listener ask which of the two he is living as.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He who swallows all fourteen worlds and the three realms in His jaws is found contained within a tiny morsel of food. He who creates, sustains, and destroys calls Himself the son of Nanda.

The slayer of demons and the terror of the wicked became the doorkeeper of King Bali. The Lord of Lakshmi, master of the ocean of milk, stretches out His hand for a morsel of leftover food.

Says Tukya-bandhu, the King of the clever has been made a fool by love. Such is the glory of devotion; it has been brought within arm's reach.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He who holds all fourteen worlds and the three realms in his jaws is the same one found inside a small morsel of food. He who creates, sustains, and destroys lets himself be called the son of Nanda. The slayer of demons, the death of the wicked, became the doorkeeper at Bali's gate. The Lord of Lakshmi, master of the ocean of milk, opens his mouth for a scrap of leftover food. Tukya-bandhu says: the King of the wise has been made a fool by love. Look at the power of this: it has been brought right into our hands.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem heaps up God's cosmic greatness only to show him stooping low for love. The one who swallows all the worlds is content inside a single morsel; the creator and destroyer answers to the name son of Nanda; the demon-slayer takes a post as Bali's doorkeeper; the husband of Lakshmi begs a scrap of leftovers. Each contrast says the same thing: devotion makes the all-powerful God small and reachable. The closing line names the wonder directly. The infinitely wise Lord lets himself be made a fool by love, and so he comes within the devotee's own hands.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A great vessel, a king of the earth: such wondrous fame was won. Blessed, O Pundalik, blessed indeed.

Your greatness can never be fully described. You tricked the whole world and stored the Imperishable One away.

You established a shop unlike any other, and its shelves overflow at all times, bursting with joy. This is the blessed city of Pandhari.

Says Tukya-bandhu, you placed the keys in the hands of the saints; casting off all personal claim, you became a guest in your own home. Look at the power of this Kali age: the world has fallen in love with falsehood.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A great ship, a king of the earth: wondrous fame was won. Well done, Pundalik, well done; your greatness cannot be told. You tricked the whole world and stored away the Imperishable One. You set up a shop like no other; its counters are always full, ringing with joy. This is the fortunate city of Pandhari. Tukya-bandhu says: you handed the keys to the saints, gave up all claim of your own, and became a guest in your own house. Look at the power of the Kali age: people have fallen in love with falsehood.

WHAT IT MEANS

This poem praises Pundalik, the devotee whose call held Vitthal standing on the brick at Pandhari. By his love he caught the Imperishable Lord and kept him for everyone, like a merchant whose shop never runs empty; this is what makes Pandhari fortunate. The striking turn is that Pundalik claims nothing for himself: he hands the keys to the saints and lives as a guest in his own home, so the treasure stays open to all. The closing line breaks the mood with a lament: in the Kali age, while this true treasure stands ready, people give their hearts to falsehood instead.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

People applaud sin and mock the saints. Such is the strength of unrighteousness; the whole populace has been deceived.

Dharma has been uprooted; the final dissolution has begun. The wonder of this age is great: brahmins, whose highest duty is the Vedas, have abandoned their calling and worship foreign idols.

Such is the ruin of truth. Righteousness has drowned.

Never before has such a state been seen; a terrible spirit has descended. Patience, forgiveness, compassion, devotion, faith, and right conduct find no haven.

Courage and fortitude have been shattered. Caste duties have collapsed; all castes perform one another's rituals at random.

To utter the name of Rama is considered a great burden. People rush after omens and spirits in a frenzy.

At the mention of scriptural discourse, faces twist in irritation. For the sake of sensual greed, they stake their lives; yet from one who walks the spiritual path, they will not part with a fistful of flour.

The wealthy and nameless are honored as indispensable, while Vedic scholars and the virtuous are insulted. Sons treat their own fathers as servants.

Daughters-in-law have turned their mothers-in-law into their maids. Truth has been lost and all boundaries destroyed.

Husbands treat their wives like paupers. People are ashamed to bow to a devotee of Hari, yet for the belly's sake they fawn upon the foreigner.

Sin has swelled beyond all measure. None call the lowest 'impure,' for everyone has lost all sense of purity.

On Ekadashi they eat grains; brahmins, after accepting betel-leaf offerings, utter obscene words. Virtuous women of good families are dishonored, while the faces of servants are kissed.

Adulteresses are pampered while faithful wives live in penury. See how mighty sin has become, O Lord.

The saints have been driven away and their merit dragged off to the wastelands. The rains have grown fearful and scanty, the earth trembles in dread.

The gods have retreated behind closed doors; violence has spread everywhere. Crops yield less grain day by day, cows and buffaloes give thin milk, cities look ruined, and heresies have flourished in abundance.

Sacred fires, offerings, Vedic rituals, and daily observances have all disappeared. All eighteen communities have taken up one another's trades; brahmins engage in thievery, abandoning their pure white garments for dark clothing.

The Gita is forgotten, the Gayatri is suppressed, and mantras are loaded with trickery. Vedic scholars sell unmarried girls as though they were horses.

Those who study the Vedic texts are mocked and ridiculed. Delight in scholarship has been overtaken by corruption.

The wicked parade with great cunning, deceit, and charm. Cleverness, skill, and logical debate are all deployed for calumny and backbiting.

Not a single soul has been spared the ruin of scriptural discipline. Those who took up sannyasa, austerity, celibacy, or renunciation are now consumed by lust and anger and cannot free themselves from desire.

In this time of destruction, kings have become the destroyers of their people. Fathers, sons, and brothers slaughter one another.

How vast is the power of this seductress Maya: she has bewitched all people, all castes, all four orders, trampling and defiling them. What the saints prophesied of old has come true to the letter; what we once only heard, we now see with our own eyes.

But let all this be as it may. There is no shelter to be found within the age of Kali.

One must cry out to God with compassion and remember Him urgently in the chitta. O Lord of Vaikuntha, what are You watching for? The people are tormented by Kali.

Come running. Tuka's servant calls out to You.

IN PLAIN WORDS

People applaud sin and mock the saints. Such is the strength of unrighteousness; the whole world has been deceived. Dharma is uprooted; the time of dissolution has begun. This is the wonder of the age: brahmins, whose highest work is the Veda, abandon it and worship foreign idols. Truth has come to ruin; the higher good has drowned. Such a thing was never seen before; a terrible spirit has come. Peace, forgiveness, mercy, faith, devotion, right action find no place to stay; courage and steadiness are shattered. Caste duties have collapsed; everyone does everyone else's rites at random. To say Rama is felt as a heavy burden. People run after omens and spirits like creatures after bait. At the mention of holy story or Purana, their heads throb with irritation. For sensual greed they will stake their lives, yet from one on the spiritual path they will not part with a fistful of flour. The rich and the nameless are treated as indispensable; Vedic scholars and the good are insulted. Sons take service from their fathers as from servants. Daughters-in-law have made maids of their mothers-in-law. Falsehood has come in and all limits are gone; husbands treat their wives like beggars. People are ashamed to bow to a servant of Hari, yet for the belly they fawn on the stranger. Sin has swelled past all measure; no one calls the lowest impure, for no one holds to purity at all. See how ruined the present is: on Ekadashi they eat grains, and brahmins, after taking betel offerings, speak foul words. Women of good families are dishonored while the faces of servant-girls are kissed; people parade purity for show. The unfaithful are pampered, the faithful wife lives in want. See how mighty sin has grown, O Lord. The saints are driven off and their merit dragged to the wastelands. The rains have turned fearful and thin; the earth trembles in dread. The gods have retreated behind shut doors; violence spreads on every side. Crops yield less grain by the day, cows and buffaloes give thin milk, cities look ruined, and heresies grow thick. Sacred fires, offerings, sacrifices, and daily rites have vanished. All eighteen communities take up one another's trades; brahmins turn thief and trade their white robes for dark cloth. The Gita is forgotten, the Gayatri suppressed, mantras filled with trickery; reciters of the Veda sell their daughters like horses. Those who study the scriptures are mocked, and delight in learning is overrun by corruption. The wicked parade with great cunning and charm; skill and clever argument are all spent on slander. Not one soul is spared this ruin of discipline. Those who took up renunciation, austerity, celibacy are now swallowed by lust and anger and cannot free themselves from desire. See the strange play of this age of ruin: kings have become the death of their own people, and fathers, sons, and brothers cut one another down. See the power of this seductress: she has bewitched all people, all four orders, fouling and trampling them. What the saints foretold long ago has come true to the letter; what we only heard, we now see with our own eyes. But let all this be. There is no refuge to be found within the age of Kali. One must cry out to God for mercy and remember him at once in the heart. O Lord of Vaikuntha, what are you watching for? The people are tormented by Kali. Come running. Tuka's servant calls out to you.

WHAT IT MEANS

This long abhanga is a sustained cry of grief over a world turned upside down in the age of Kali. It catalogs the collapse one ruin at a time: sin praised and saints mocked, dharma uprooted, the Name felt as a burden, hospitality refused to seekers while greed is fed, families inverted so fathers serve sons and the faithful are scorned. It widens to nature and society together, thin rains, failing crops, kings who destroy their people, scholars who sell their children, renunciates eaten by the lust they renounced. The poet names Maya as the seductress behind it all and notes that the saints foretold exactly this. The point is not despair but where to turn: there is no shelter inside the age itself, only in crying out to God and holding him in the heart, which is why the servant of Tuka ends by calling on the Lord of Vaikuntha to come running.

Devotion, the feast that never perishes

मराठी मूळ

केली हार्णाळां अंघोळी । येऊनि बैसलों राउळीं॥1॥
अजिचें जाले भोजन । राम कृष्ण नारायण ॥2॥
तुकयाबंधु ह्मणे नास । नाहीं कल्पांती जयास ॥3॥ ॥12॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We bathed at the sacred steps and came to sit in the temple. Today the feast has been taken: Rama, Krishna, Narayana.

Says Tukya-bandhu, that which knows no destruction even at the end of the cosmic age has been received.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We bathed at the sacred steps and came to sit in the temple. Today the meal has been eaten: Rama, Krishna, Narayana. Tukya-bandhu says: this is the thing that knows no ruin, not even at the end of the age.

WHAT IT MEANS

A small, glad poem about what truly nourishes. After bathing and coming to sit in the temple, the poet describes the day's real food as the names Rama, Krishna, Narayana, taken as a feast for the soul. The closing line gives the reason for the joy: ordinary meals are eaten and gone, but this food does not perish even when the cosmos itself dissolves. The Name is set apart as the one nourishment that outlasts everything.

GATHA 3027 Longing and Separation

Longing, mad for the unseen

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My jiva has gone mad for You, O Panduranga; I gaze in every direction searching for You. I have abandoned all commerce, all worldly custom and illusion; this single longing fills my mind without cease.

My ears have heard of You, and now my eyes suffer with the urge to behold that form. My life-breath grows faint and restless, like a fish torn from the water.

Says Tuka, what remedy remains? Let me find whatever path leads to Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My soul has gone mad for you, Panduranga; I keep looking in every direction for you. I have dropped my business, my dealings, the customs of the world; this one longing fills my mind without a break. My ears have heard of you, and now my eyes ache to see that form. My breath grows faint and frantic, like a fish pulled out of the water. Tuka says: what is left for me to do? Let me find whatever way leads to your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

A pure cry of viraha, the ache of separation. Tukaram has let the whole world fall away, business, custom, everything, leaving a single longing that gives him no rest. He has only heard of God, not yet seen him, and the gap between hearing and seeing is unbearable: his eyes ache, his breath fails like a fish out of water. The poem makes no argument and asks for no boon but one, the way to God's feet. It is the state in which longing itself has become the whole of the practice.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In what town does this Vitthal dwell? If any of you know, please tell me. I fall at your feet, I come rolling on the ground; will someone give me news of Him? The saints praise His virtues and His form; hearing of Him even from afar brings me joy.

I will place my life, my all, at His feet. Will someone show me that Panduranga? Says Tuka, like a cow torn from her calf, every passing moment tears at me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In what town does this Vitthal live? If any of you knows, please tell me. I fall at your feet, I come rolling on the ground before you: will someone give me word of him? The saints praise his beauty and his ways, and even hearing of him from afar brings me joy. I will lay my whole life down at his feet; will someone show me that Panduranga? Tuka says: like a cow separated from her calf, each passing moment tears at me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram plays the part of a desperate seeker going from person to person, begging for news of a beloved who seems to live in some unknown town. The posture is total: he falls at strangers' feet, rolls on the ground, ready to give his whole life just to be shown the way. Even secondhand praise of God from the saints is sweet to him, because it is all he has. The closing image, the cow torn from her calf, fixes the feeling: this is not calm seeking but the bodily anguish of separation, in which every moment apart is a wound.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Binding words into poetic form to please one particular patron: what is truly gained by it? What does one get by husking chaff? What use is it to suppress the truth? By the prestige of poetic craft one may bring the world to one's feet, but after that momentary pleasure, one goes straight to hell. Says Tuka, unless one has truly realized God, the false one ends up humiliated.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Tying words into verse to flatter some particular patron, what is really gained by that? What do you get by husking empty chaff? What is the use of crushing the truth to do it? The prestige of clever poetry may bring the whole world to your feet, but after that brief pleasure you go straight to hell. Tuka says: unless you have actually realized God, the fraud is left humiliated in the end.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram, himself a poet, turns on poetry written for patronage and applause. Verse composed to flatter a patron or win fame is husking chaff: a great deal of noise and nothing nourishing. Worse, it suppresses the truth for the sake of effect, and the renown it wins is a brief pleasure bought at a steep price. His standard is the one he applies everywhere: the words are worthless unless they come from real realization of God. Craft without that is not just empty but ruinous, and the clever fraud is finally exposed.

GATHA 3030 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, gentle speech

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे बहु । लागे ऐसें बरें मऊ ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the presence of a good person, only auspicious words should be spoken. This is the way of righteousness to follow; anger does not lead to well-being.

Propriety is a fine thing; the wise know how to read the moment. Says Tuka, soft and gentle speech makes a deep and lasting impression.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the presence of a good person, speak only kind and auspicious words. This is the way of dharma to keep; anger never leads to anyone's good. A sense of propriety is a fine thing, and the wise know how to read the moment. Tuka says: soft, gentle speech is what leaves a deep and lasting mark.

WHAT IT MEANS

A small teaching on speech and tact. Tukaram counsels kind, auspicious words, especially before the good, and rejects anger as something that never produces real benefit. He prizes a sense of fitness and propriety, and the wisdom to read the moment and say what suits it. The closing point is practical and humane: it is gentleness, not force or heat, that actually moves people and leaves a lasting impression. Soft speech is not weakness here; it is the more powerful instrument.

GATHA 3031 The Nature of God

Nature of God, conquered by love

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Out of love, He has taken on many names, and through tender affection He is contemplated. The Lord has gone mad, truly mad; He has been bribed by devotion.

He cherishes the small and humble; He begs for a single tulsi leaf. Once He is caught, He no longer uses force.

Says Tuka, He has been brought to His knees.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Out of love he has taken on many names, and through tender affection he is held in mind. The Lord has gone mad, truly mad; he has let himself be bribed by devotion. He cherishes the small and the humble, and begs for a single leaf of tulsi. Once he is caught, he puts up no struggle. Tuka says: he has been brought to his knees.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the usual picture of God upside down. The Almighty, out of love, has taken many names and let himself be bound by simple affection; he is, Tukaram says, mad for his devotees, bribable not by wealth but by love. He prefers the lowly, and the price he asks is nothing more than a single tulsi leaf offered with feeling. Most startling is the surrender: once devotion has caught him, God uses no force to escape, but lets himself be held, brought to his knees by love. Power has been conquered by tenderness.

GATHA 3032 Prayers

Prayer, the Name and love

मराठी मूळ

कंठीं राहो नाम । अंगीं भरोनियां प्रेम ॥1॥

संतांचिये पायीं । वेळोवेळां ठेवीं डोई ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे तरें । भवसिंधु एका सरें॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let the Name remain in my throat, and let my whole being be filled with love. Grant me at least this much, for I have come to You in surrender, a wrongdoer at Your door.

Let me bow again and again at the feet of the saints. Says Tuka, let me cross this ocean of existence in one swift stroke.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let the Name stay in my throat, and let my whole being be filled with love. Grant me at least this much, for I have come to your door in surrender, a wrongdoer. Let me bow again and again at the feet of the saints. Tuka says: let me cross this ocean of the world in one swift stroke.

WHAT IT MEANS

A short, humble petition. Tukaram asks for only two things, the Name always on his lips and a heart full of love, and he asks them as a confessed wrongdoer throwing himself on God's mercy. He adds a third that he treats as the same gift: the chance to bow over and over at the feet of the saints, his surest road to God. The closing wish is bold against the humble opening: with the Name and that love, let the whole ocean of worldly existence be crossed in a single stroke. Little is asked, and everything is expected of it.

GATHA 3033 The Power of the Name

The Name, roar it in kirtan

मराठी मूळ

विठ्ठल विठ्ठल येणें छंदें । ब्रह्मानंदें गर्जावें ॥1॥
वाये टाळ टाळ्याटाळी । होइल होळी विघ्नांची ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे विठ्ठलवाणी। वदा कानीं आईका ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

With the chant of Vitthal, Vitthal, roar with the bliss of Brahman. Clap your hands and strike the cymbals; the obstacles will be burnt to cinders.

At the beginning and at the end, remember Vitthal; hold Vitthal always in the mind. Says Tuka, let the word Vitthal be ever on your tongue and in your ears.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Chant Vitthal, Vitthal, and roar it out with the bliss of Brahman. Clap your hands, strike the cymbals, and every obstacle will burn to cinders. At the beginning and at the very end, remember Vitthal; keep Vitthal always in the mind. Tuka says: let the word Vitthal be forever on your tongue and in your ears.

WHAT IT MEANS

A rousing call to kirtan, the communal chanting of the Name. Tukaram urges not a quiet murmur but a roar, full-throated, with clapping and cymbals, and promises that such full-bodied remembrance burns up every obstacle. The instruction to remember Vitthal at the beginning and the end, and to keep him constantly in mind, makes the Name the frame of the whole of life and of each undertaking. And the close asks for total saturation: the Name on the tongue and in the ears at once, so that hearing and speaking are both filled with God. The Name is to be lived in, not merely said.

GATHA 3034 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the pilgrims' birthright

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे खरें जालें । एका बोलें संतांच्या ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The pilgrims of Pandhari are the true heirs to liberation. Vitthal, the compassionate Lord, granted this boon to Pundalik.

However dull, sinful, or fallen they may be, He ferries them across by tying them to His purpose. Says Tuka, it has come true by the single word of the saints.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The pilgrims of Pandhari are the rightful heirs to liberation. The compassionate Vitthal granted this boon to Pundalik. However dull, however sinful or fallen they may be, he ties them to himself and ferries them across. Tuka says: it has come true on the strength of a single word of the saints.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram declares liberation to be the birthright of the Varkari pilgrims, the ordinary people who walk to Pandharpur. He grounds it in the founding story: Vitthal, moved by Pundalik's devotion, granted this grace and stayed at Pandhari for all. The sweep of it is the point: no matter how dull or sinful or low a pilgrim may be, none is turned away; God binds each to himself and carries them across. And the guarantee rests not on the pilgrim's merit but on the saints' word, which Tukaram treats as already fulfilled. Grace here is democratic and certain.

GATHA 3035 The Saints

Saints, the fragrance of company

मराठी मूळ

अमृताचीं फळें अमृताची वेली । ते चि पुढें चाली बीजाची ही ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे तैसें होइजेत संगें । वास लागे अंगें चंदनाच्या ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A vine of nectar bears fruit of nectar, and from its seed the same lineage continues. Grant me the company of such souls, O Narayana; let me be addressed by their sacred words.

Noble company is cooling to the throat, and its nourishment and radiance show upon the body. Says Tuka, one becomes like those one keeps company with, just as the body takes on the fragrance of sandalwood.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A vine of nectar bears fruit of nectar, and from its seed the same sweet lineage goes on. Grant me the company of souls like that, Narayana, and let their sacred words be spoken to me. Such noble company is cooling to the throat, and its nourishment and glow show on the body itself. Tuka says: you become like the company you keep, just as the body takes on the scent of sandalwood held against it.

WHAT IT MEANS

A poem in praise of holy company, satsang. Tukaram begins with a law of likeness: a nectar-vine yields nectar fruit whose seed yields the same, so good begets good down the line. From this he prays for the company of such souls and for their words to reach his ears. The benefit is not abstract; like cool water or good food, holy company shows its effect visibly, in nourishment and radiance. The closing image is his clinching argument: as sandalwood lends its fragrance to whatever it touches, so you slowly take on the quality of those you keep near. Choose your company, and you choose what you will become.

GATHA 3036 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, God waits on the road

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Go to Pandhari, O you who have come into this world. The friend of the poor, Panduranga, stands there watching the road, eager and impatient with love for the meeting.

All past sorrows are dissolved, and no future weariness remains, once you have had His darshan even a single time. Says Tuka, He does not hand you over to anyone else; once He has entered your heart, He never leaves.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Go to Pandhari, all of you who have come into this world. Panduranga, the friend of the poor, is standing there, watching the road, eager and impatient for the meeting. Once you have his sight even a single time, every past sorrow dissolves and no weariness lies ahead. Tuka says: he does not hand you over to anyone else; once he has settled in your heart, he never leaves.

WHAT IT MEANS

An invitation that reverses the usual direction of longing. We think of the devotee yearning for God, but here it is God, Panduranga, who stands at Pandhari watching the road, impatient with love for the meeting. To anyone simply born into the world, Tukaram says: go. A single darshan dissolves all past sorrow and removes all future weariness. And the bond, once made, is permanent and exclusive: God does not pass you off to any other power, and once he has taken up residence in your heart he never moves out. The eagerness, remarkably, is mostly on God's side.

GATHA 3037 The Power of the Name

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What could not be known will become known effortlessly, through Vitthal's Name alone. What could not be seen will become visible, through Vitthal's Name alone.

What could not be spoken will find expression, through Vitthal's Name alone. What could not be met will come of its own accord, through the contemplation of Vithoba.

The gain that seemed impossible will be attained beyond all measure, by chanting the Name ceaselessly. Says Tuka, those who devote their whole being to God will be carried across by the Name of Vithoba.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What cannot be known will come to be known, easily, through the one Name of Vitthal. What cannot be seen will come into sight, through the one Name of Vitthal. What cannot be spoken will find its words, through the one Name of Vitthal. What cannot be met will come to you of its own accord, when you hold Vithoba in mind. The gain that seemed impossible will be yours beyond all measure, by saying the Name without ceasing. Tuka says: souls who give their whole being to God will be carried across by the Name of Vithoba.

WHAT IT MEANS

A litany of the Name's power, built on a single repeated turn: each thing that is beyond reach, beyond knowing, seeing, speaking, meeting, is opened by Vitthal's Name alone. Tukaram is not promising magic but pointing to how the Name dissolves the very limits that block the soul, and does so effortlessly, of its own accord, rather than by strain. The unreachable becomes reachable, and the impossible gain comes beyond all measure. The condition in the last line is the whole of it: the Name carries across those who give it their whole being. Half-hearted repetition is not what he means; total devotion to the Name is.

GATHA 3038 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the hard-won chance

मराठी मूळ

बहुजन्में केला लाग । तो हा भाग लाधलों ॥1॥

गेलें मग नये हाता । पुढती चिंता वाटतसे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे तांतड करूं । पाय धरूं बळकट ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Through many lifetimes of striving, I have at last received this portion. I will offer my very life and make a bonfire of worldly existence.

What is gone cannot be brought back; the thought of that fills me with urgency. Says Tuka, let us make haste and grasp those feet with a firm and mighty hold.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Through many lifetimes of striving I have at last been given this portion. I will offer up my very life and make a bonfire of worldly existence. What is gone can never be brought back, and that thought fills me with urgency. Tuka says: let us make haste, and take hold of those feet with a firm and mighty grip.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram treats the present chance, this human birth turned toward God, as the hard-won fruit of striving across many lives, and resolves to spend it completely: to offer his life and burn the whole of worldly existence like a bonfire. The urgency comes from a plain fact about time, that what is gone does not return, so a wasted moment is lost for good. The poem ends in action rather than reflection: make haste, and grip God's feet with everything you have. It is the resolve of someone who has understood that the opportunity is both rare and perishable.

GATHA 3039 Devotion to Vitthal

The bliss of devotion, hidden from the learned

मराठी मूळ

आत्मनिष्ठ जरी जाले जीवन्मुक्त । तरी भक्ती सुख दुर्लभ त्यां ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कृपा करिल नारायण । तरि च हें वर्म पडे ठायीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The joy of devotion and love is unknown to others: to scholars, reciters, and even to the wise. Though they may have attained the state of living liberation through self-knowledge, the bliss of devotion remains rare even for them.

Says Tuka, only when Narayana bestows His grace does this secret truly find its home.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The joy of love and devotion is not known to others. The scholar does not know it. The reciter does not know it. Even the wise do not know it. Some have come to rest in the Self; they are liberated while still alive. Even for them the bliss of devotion is hard to reach. Tuka says: only when Narayana gives his grace does this secret find its home.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is marking a kind of joy that learning cannot reach. Scholars, reciters of scripture, and even those wise ones who have realized the Self and are liberated while alive: none of them holds the sweetness of bhakti by their effort or knowledge. He places devotion above even self-knowledge here, not by dismissing realization but by saying its bliss is rarer still. The point lands in the last line: this is not earned by study or attainment. It opens only when Narayana grants his grace, and then the hidden truth comes to rest in you.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if a she-donkey began to give milk, would it match the worth of a cow? A garland of flowers around a crow's neck does not give it the grace of a swan. A monkey may bathe and wear a sacred mark, yet it cannot behave as a brahmin does.

Says Tuka, even if a brahmin has fallen from his duties, he remains honored in all three worlds.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Look, even if a she-donkey gave milk, could she ever match a cow? Hang a garland of flowers on a crow's neck. It will never know the grace of a swan. A monkey may take a bath and wear the holy mark. It still cannot live as a brahmin lives. Tuka says: even a brahmin who has fallen from his duties is honored in all three worlds.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is testing the difference between an imitation and the real thing. A donkey that gives milk, a crow draped in flowers, a monkey marked and bathed: each puts on the appearance of something higher and still cannot become it. The sharp turn comes at the end, where he says even a brahmin lapsed in his duties keeps his honor across the three worlds. Read against his own life as an outcaste devotee, this is the voice of a settled social order, and it can sting. The examination it invites is honest: do not mistake borrowed marks and gestures for the inward thing they imitate.

GATHA 3041 The Nature of God

Nature of God, the love that refuses to comfort

मराठी मूळ

देव भक्तालागीं करूं नेदी संसार । अंगें वारावार करोनि ठेवी ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

God does not let His devotee settle into comfortable worldly life; again and again He keeps the devotee on edge. If He were to grant wealth, the devotee's body would stiffen with pride; therefore He keeps the devotee poor.

If He were to give a virtuous wife, the devotee would be entangled in desire; therefore He saddles the devotee with a quarrelsome one. Says Tuka, I have seen this proven in my own life. What more can I tell the world?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

God will not let his devotee settle into worldly ease. Again and again he keeps the devotee on edge. If he gave wealth, the body would stiffen with pride. So he keeps the devotee poor. If he gave a good and gifted wife, the devotee would get tangled in desire. So he sets a quarrelsome one at his back. Tuka says: I have seen this proven in my own life. What more can I tell the world?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is reading his own hardships as the deliberate care of God, not as God's absence. He says the Lord refuses to let a devotee grow comfortable, because comfort breeds the pride and desire that pull the heart away. Wealth would harden into arrogance, so poverty is given; an agreeable wife would feed attachment, so a harsh one is sent instead. The frame the poem leaves unspoken is that every deprivation is a guardrail keeping the devotee turned toward God. And he stakes it on experience, not theory: I have seen this in my own life, so what more is there to say.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A tiger preached to a fox: 'Let me eat you in peace. In the end you will die anyway; and meanwhile you cause me hunger.' The fox replied, 'Well said, well said.

The verdict has been pronounced from your own mouth.' The body will perish regardless; at least let this one good deed be done. The fox reflected and said, 'Yes, one should go into it with full understanding.' And so the two were matched, fraud to fraud.

Says Tuka, his own creed the tiger preaches.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A tiger preached to a fox. "Let me eat you in peace. You will die in the end anyway, and meanwhile your living only makes me hungry." The fox said, "Well said, well said. The verdict has come from your own mouth. The body is going to perish in any case; so let this one good deed be done through me." In his mind the fox thought, "Best to go into it knowing exactly what it is." So the two were matched, fraud to fraud. Tuka says: the tiger preaches only his own creed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells a small fable about self-serving talk dressed as wisdom. The tiger wraps his hunger in lofty reasoning, that death is certain so the fox may as well be eaten now, and the fox plays along with mock agreement while seeing right through him. Neither is fooled; the poem names them both as frauds, perfectly matched. The point is that the tiger's high-sounding sermon is nothing but his own appetite given a noble voice. The self-examination it asks is to notice when our own arguments are just hunger preaching its own creed.

GATHA 3043 The Power of the Name

The Name, the place made holy by remembrance

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Wherever the Lord's feet are remembered, that is the noblest place, a beautiful site. Whether in the forest or at home, in solitude or in a crowd, the moment when the mind rests in contentment is the blessed moment.

Blessed is that time which passes in the form of bliss, carrying the thought of Govinda. Says Tuka, to live with profit is to live remembering Narayana; that is the highest fortune.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wherever the Lord's feet are remembered, that is the noblest place, a lovely spot. Forest or house, alone or in a crowd: the moment the mind rests in peace, that is the blessed moment. Blessed is the time that passes in the form of joy, carrying the thought of Govinda. Tuka says: to live with profit is just this, to live remembering Narayana. That is the highest fortune.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram moves the measure of holiness from the place to the act of remembrance. No site is sacred in itself; the noblest place is wherever the Lord's feet are held in mind, and so forest, home, solitude, and crowd are all equal. What makes a moment blessed is the mind coming to rest in God, and what makes time well spent is its passing in the thought of Govinda. The claim he lands is a redefinition of a profitable life: not gain or status, but a life lived remembering Narayana, which he calls the highest fortune.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I do not fear you, O Death. The Name is my very lifeblood.

You do not know who my protector is: Narayana stands with the saints. He slew the demon Shankhasura in the ocean and brought back the four Vedas.

As the tortoise He slew the great demon, hiding His hands and feet within His shell. In the mighty boar form He lifted the earth upon His tusks.

He tore apart Hiranyakashipu and delivered the devotee Prahlad. As Vamana He became the Lord of the lowly, sending the demon Bali to the nether world.

He severed a thousand arms and brought back the wish-fulfilling cow. He made stones float across the sea, installed Vibhishana, and slew Ravana.

He killed King Kamsa and freed His father Vasudeva. When enemies tormented Draupadi, Hari Himself became her endless garment.

When the elephant Gajendra cried out to Rama, the Lord carried him to Vaikuntha. Says Tuka, all who took on Hari's form were freed and never born again.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I do not fear you, Death. The Name is my lifeblood. You do not know who my protector is: Narayana stands with the saints. He slew the demon Shankha in the ocean and brought back the four Vedas. As the tortoise he slew the great demon, hiding his hands and feet within his shell. In the mighty boar form he lifted the earth on his tusks. He tore apart Hiranyakashipu and saved the devotee Prahlad. As Vamana he became the Lord of the lowly and sent the demon Bali down to the nether world. He cut off the thousand arms and brought back the wish-granting cow. He floated stones across the sea, set up Vibhishana, and killed Ravana. He killed King Kamsa and freed his father Vasudeva. When enemies tormented Draupadi, Hari himself became her unending cloth. When the elephant Gajendra cried out Rama, Rama, the Lord carried him to Vaikuntha. Tuka says: those who took on Hari's form were freed and never born again.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers his own fear of death by reciting the long record of God's rescues. The Name is his lifeblood, and his protector is Narayana, who stands with the saints, so Death has no claim on him. He runs through the deeds and avatars, Shankhasura and the Vedas, the tortoise and boar, Prahlad, Bali, Parashurama, the bridge to Lanka, Kamsa, Draupadi's endless sari, Gajendra carried to Vaikuntha, as so much evidence already on the table. The frame is simple: a God who has reached down to save so many across the ages will not abandon the one who holds his Name. And the final stake is release itself: those who became one with Hari were freed and never born again.

GATHA 3045 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, giving with discernment

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One should give food to all beings, but distribute wealth only after discerning the worthy recipient. Where the cause is right, there one should plant the seed.

A meritorious deed can turn sinful: feeding milk to a serpent only nourishes its venom; performing fierce rites only purchases suffering. All land looks alike, yet some is barren, some middling, and some exceedingly fertile.

Therefore one must act with discernment. Says Tuka, a bland dish will not acquire flavor by being mixed with fine delicacies.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Give food to every living being. But give wealth only after weighing the worthy receiver. Where the cause is right, there plant the seed. A good deed can turn into sin. Feed milk to a snake and you only feed its venom. Do fierce austerities for the wrong end and you have bought your own suffering. All land looks the same at a glance, yet some is barren, some middling, some richly fertile. So act with discernment; that is what is good. Tuka says: a bland dish gets no flavor by being mixed with fine delicacies.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram draws a line between two kinds of giving. Food may go to all beings without question, but wealth and effort must be placed where they will bear good fruit, like seed sown only in fit ground. He warns that a good act misdirected becomes harmful: milk given to a snake strengthens its poison, and severe austerity aimed wrongly only purchases grief. Fields look alike to a careless eye but differ from barren to fertile, and people are the same. The lesson is to give and act with discernment, since pouring something fine onto an unfit recipient no more improves him than mixing delicacies into a bland dish gives it taste.

GATHA 3046 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the one strength of faith

मराठी मूळ

देवावरी भार । वृत्त अयाचित सार ॥1॥
देह देवाचे सांभाळी । सार योजे यथाकाळीं ॥ध्रु.॥
विश्वासीं निर्धार । विस्तारील विश्वंभर ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे व्हावें । बळ एक चि जाणावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Place your burden upon God and live by the unsolicited sustenance He provides. God looks after the body and arranges what is needed at the proper time.

Have firm faith; the Lord of the universe will provide in abundance. Says Tuka, know this: you need only the single strength of devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Lay your burden on God. The best living is the kind that asks for nothing. God looks after the body and arranges what is needed at the right time. Hold firm in trust, and the Lord of the universe will provide in plenty. Tuka says: know that you need only one strength, this alone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a life lived by leaning the whole weight on God. The highest way is ayachit, taking only what comes unasked, because the one who trusts does not have to scheme or beg. He says God himself tends the body and supplies what is needed in its proper time, so anxious provision is unnecessary. The promise is that firm faith is met by the Vishvambhara, the all-sustaining Lord, who gives abundantly. The single claim he lands is that devotion's trust is the only strength a person actually needs.

GATHA 3047 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, fix the mind before the days run out

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

As the days pass, what use is this body? Keep your mind tied firmly to His feet. Do not let your awareness scatter in any direction, O Lord.

Says Tuka, blessed are those who have made their birth worthwhile.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The days keep passing. What is this body finally good for? Set your mind, fixed and fixed again, on your feet. Do not let your awareness scatter anywhere, O Lord. Tuka says: blessed are those who, having come into this birth, have made it worthwhile.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses the shortness of life as a reason to act now. Days slip by and the body itself comes to nothing, so its mere upkeep is no answer. The one thing worth doing is to bind the mind firmly to God's feet and refuse to let attention wander off in every direction. The poem turns into a prayer, asking the Lord not to let the devotee's mind scatter. The claim it lands is what a human birth is for: those who use this life to keep the mind fixed on God are the ones who have truly made their birth count.

GATHA 3048 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the pledge to reach Pandhari

मराठी मूळ

केली प्रज्ञा मनाशीं । तई मी दास सत्यत्वेशीं । नेईन पायांपाशीं । स्वामी मूळ पंढरिये ॥1॥
तोंवरी हें भरीं पोट । केला तो मिथ्या बोभाट । नाहीं सांपडली वाट । सइराट फिरतसें ॥ध्रु.॥
घडे तैसें घडो आतां । मायबापाची सत्ता। तुका ह्मणे चिंता । काय पाहें मारगा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I made a pledge to my own mind: that truly, as a faithful servant, I would bring it to the feet of the Lord at Pandhari. Until then, I was merely filling my belly, making an empty clamor.

I had not found the road and was wandering aimlessly. Says Tuka, let happen what may; the authority lies with the Divine Parents. Why should I watch and worry about the path?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I made a pledge to my own mind: that truly, as a faithful servant, I will carry it to the feet of the Lord, to the source at Pandhari. Until now I was only filling my belly, making an empty noise. I had not found the road, and I wandered with no direction. Tuka says: now let happen whatever happens; the power lies with the Mother and Father. Why should I keep watching the road and worrying?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks back on a life spent astray and tells the resolve that turned it. He has vowed within himself to be a true servant and to bring his own mind home to Vitthal's feet at Pandhari, the source. Before this he sees only wasted motion, feeding the body and raising empty noise while never finding the road. The release comes in the surrender at the end: now that the direction is set, he hands the outcome to God as Mother and Father. With the authority resting in them, there is no reason left to stand anxiously scanning the path.

GATHA 3049 The Power of the Name

The Name, the open mantra over secret ritual

मराठी मूळ

नेत्र झाकोनियां काय जपतोसी । जंव नाहीं मानसीं भावप्रेम ॥1॥
उघडा मंत्र जाणा राम कृष्ण ह्मणा । तुटती यातना गर्भवास ॥ध्रु.॥
मंत्र यंत्र कांहीं करिसी जडी बुटी । तेणें भूतसृष्टी पावशील ॥2॥
सार तुका जपे बीजमंत्र एक । भवसिंधुतारक रामकृष्ण ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What use is sitting with eyes shut in japa when there is no love or devotion within the mind? Know the open, revealed mantra: say Rama, say Krishna; the torments of the womb will be severed. Whatever mantras, yantras, herbs, or charms you practice, they will only lead you to the realm of ghosts and spirits.

Says Tuka, chant the one true seed-mantra, Rama-Krishna, the savior who carries one across the ocean of existence.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why do you sit there in japa with your eyes shut, when there is no love or devotion in your heart? Know the open mantra: say Rama, say Krishna. The torments of the womb are cut off. Whatever mantras, diagrams, herbs, and charms you work, they will only bring you to the world of ghosts and spirits. Tuka says: the essence is to chant the one seed-mantra, Rama-Krishna, which carries you across the ocean of existence.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips ritual down to its one needful thing. Closed-eyed recitation is hollow if the heart holds no love, so outward practice without inner feeling counts for nothing. Against secret techniques, diagrams, herbs, and charms, which he says lead only to lower realms of ghosts and spirits, he sets the plain Name that anyone may speak. Saying Rama and Krishna openly cuts off the suffering of being born again. The essence he lands is that this single seed-mantra, Rama-Krishna, is the boat that ferries one across the whole ocean of birth and death.

GATHA 3050 The Saints

The saints, the dust of their road

मराठी मूळ

संत मारगीं चालती । त्यांची लागो मज माती ॥1॥
शेष घेईन उच्छिष्ट । धाय धणीवरी पोट ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे संतां पायीं । जीव ठेविला निश्चयीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let the dust from the road where the saints walk fall upon me. I will eat their leftovers and fill my belly to the brim.

Says Tuka, at the feet of the saints I have placed my life with full conviction.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The saints walk along the road. Let their dust fall on me. I will eat what they leave behind, their leftovers, and fill my belly full. Tuka says: at the feet of the saints I have set down my life, and I am sure of it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram puts himself as low as he can before the saints. He asks not for their company as an equal but only for the dust raised by their feet to touch him, and for their leftover food to fill him. This is the language of total humility, where nearness to holy people is itself the blessing he wants. The claim he lands is one of settled conviction: he has laid his very life at the saints' feet, with no doubt about it. The unspoken frame is that the company and service of the saints is, for him, the surest way to God.

GATHA 3051 The Nature of God

Tenderness, God loves us as we are

मराठी मूळ

जैसें तैसें बाळ मातेसी आवडे । बोलतां बोबडे शब्द गोड ॥1॥
आपुले आवडी लेववी खाववी । पाहोनियां जीवीं सुख वाटे ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A mother loves her child just as it is. Its babbling words are sweet to her ears.

She feeds it and adorns it as she pleases, and watching it brings her joy. Says Tuka, what return can I offer? I truly know nothing of real value.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A mother loves her child just as it is. Its babbling words are sweet to her. She feeds it and dresses it as she pleases, and watching it fills her heart with joy. Tuka says: what return can I give? I truly know nothing of any worth.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reaches for the plainest love he knows, a mother and her small child, to say how God holds the devotee. The child cannot speak clearly, cannot earn its keep, cannot give anything back; the mother delights in it anyway, feeds it, adorns it, and is glad simply to watch. That is the relationship Tukaram claims with God. His closing line is the point: he has nothing of value to offer, no payment that could match this love, and that is exactly why it is grace. You are loved before you have done anything to deserve it.

GATHA 3052 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the misplaced devotee

मराठी मूळ

देवाचिया वस्त्रा स्वप्नीं ही नाठवी । स्त्रियेसी पाठवी उंच साडी ॥1॥
गाईचें पाळण नये चि विचारा । अश्वासी खरारा करी अंगें ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He never thinks of offering fine cloth to God, even in his dreams, but sends costly saris to his wife. He gives no thought to tending the cow, yet he curries his horse with his own hands.

He rushes to wash his own child's leavings but will not wash the feet of a holy man. Says Tuka, spit upon the face of such a person; he goes straight to Yama's realm to suffer.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He never thinks of fine cloth for God, not even in a dream, but sends costly saris to his wife. He gives no thought to caring for the cow, yet he grooms his horse with his own hands. He runs to wash his own child's mess, but will not wash the feet of a holy man. Tuka says: spit on the face of such a person. He goes straight to Yama's realm to suffer.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lines up a man's choices side by side and lets the contrast indict him. Lavish cloth for the wife but nothing for God; hands-on care for the horse but none for the sacred cow; eager service to his own child's filth but disgust at a holy man's feet. The pattern is the charge: his love and labor flow only toward what serves his own attachment, never toward the holy. The harsh closing is aimed at that inversion of values, the way a person can pour himself out for self-interest while withholding everything from God. Read it as a mirror, not a verdict on someone else.

GATHA 3053 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the divided heart

मराठी मूळ

उरा लावी उर आळंगितां कांता । संतासी भेटतां अंग चोरी ॥1॥
अतीत देखोनि होय पाठमोरा । व्याहएासी सामोरा जाय वेगीं ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He embraces his wife chest to chest, but when meeting a saint he shrinks away. Seeing a holy wanderer, he turns his back, yet he rushes to greet his in-laws.

He bows to a brahmin without any feeling in his mind, yet he becomes a slave to his mistress's child. Says Tuka, do not be angry with such people. What can anyone do against their ingrained nature?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He holds his wife chest to chest in embrace, but when a saint comes near he shrinks away. Seeing a holy wanderer, he turns his back; yet he hurries to greet his in-laws. He bows to a brahmin with no feeling in his mind, but becomes a slave to his mistress's child. Tuka says: do not be angry with such people. What can anyone do against an ingrained nature?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram catalogs a man whose warmth and reverence are all spent in the wrong direction: tenderness for the wife and in-laws, cold avoidance of saints and wanderers, an empty bow to the brahmin while he serves a mistress's household with real devotion. The point is not the particular people but the misdirection itself, a heart fully capable of love that simply never turns toward the holy. The closing turn is striking: do not be angry, Tukaram says, because this is svabhava, deep-grained habit, and anger will not move it. He names the pattern and then, instead of contempt, asks for a clear-eyed sorrow at how fixed such a nature can become.

GATHA 3054 The Necessity of Experience

The path, why the saints are needed

मराठी मूळ

ब्रह्मज्ञान जरी कळें उठाउठी । तरि कां हिंपुटी वेदशास्त्रें ॥1॥
शास्त्रांचे भांडण जप तीर्थाटणें । उर्वीचें भ्रमण या च साटीं ॥ध्रु.॥

या च साटीं संतपाय हे सेवावे । तरि च तरावें तुका ह्मणे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If the knowledge of Brahman could be grasped in an instant, then why all the labor of the Vedas and Shastras? The debates of scripture, the japa, the pilgrimages, the roaming across the earth: all of it is for this very purpose. For this same end is japa, for this same end is tapas.

Even Vyasa composed countless texts for this reason. For this very purpose, one should serve the feet of the saints.

Says Tuka, only then can one truly cross over.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If the knowledge of Brahman could be had in an instant, why would the Vedas and Shastras labor so? The arguments of scripture, the chanting, the pilgrimages, the wandering over the earth: all of it is for this one thing. For this is the chanting, for this the austerity; even Vyasa composed countless books for this. For this same reason, serve the feet of the saints. Tuka says: only then does one truly cross over.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers a tempting shortcut: that the highest knowledge could be grasped at once, with no effort. If that were so, he says, the whole vast apparatus of scripture and practice would be pointless, and it is not. The Vedas, the chanting, the pilgrimages, even Vyasa's mountain of texts, all exist for the single goal of knowing Brahman. Then he names where that long labor actually lands: at the feet of the living saints. Books and rites point the way, but it is service to those who have realized God that carries you across; only there does the seeking finally arrive.

GATHA 3055 Social Criticism

Social criticism, selling the sacred

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who sell the Gayatri mantra to fill their bellies will find their destination in Yama's realm. Those who sell their daughters for a price will fall into the worst of hells.

Those who sing the Name of God and then beg for money: I cannot imagine what fate awaits them. Says Tuka, our companion is Hari Himself; there is no need for the company of the corrupt.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those who sell the Gayatri to fill their bellies end up in Yama's realm. Men who sell their daughters for a price fall into the worst of hells. Those who sing God's Name and then beg for money: I cannot say what fate awaits them. Tuka says: our companion is Hari himself. We have no need of the company of the corrupt.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names three ways of turning the holy into a transaction: trading the sacred Gayatri mantra for a living, selling a daughter for money, and singing the divine Name only to beg coins afterward. Each makes the sacred a means to greed, and he marks where that leads, into suffering and the lowest hells. The sin he attacks is the buying and selling itself, the reduction of God to a tool for the belly. His own answer closes the poem cleanly: Hari is his companion, so he simply has no need to keep company with those who have made devotion a trade.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You are ashamed to visit a saint, O fool, yet you carry flowers to a courtesan's door. A courtesan, a concubine, a dancing girl: she is the refuse of the world.

How can she appear pure to you? Says Tuka, now feel some shame, you wretch. Beat yourselves soundly with your own shoes.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You are ashamed to go for a saint's darshan, you fool, yet you carry flowers to a courtesan's door. A courtesan, a servant-girl, a dancing girl: she is the refuse of the world. How can she seem pure to you? Tuka says: now feel some shame. Beat yourselves soundly with your own shoes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram catches a man with his shame pointed exactly backwards. He blushes to be seen visiting a saint, but feels no embarrassment carrying offerings to a courtesan. The poem's charge is this reversal of judgment, treating what is sacred as something to hide and what is degrading as something to honor. The hard closing, beat yourself with your own shoe, is the language of self-correction, a demand that the man turn his shame around and feel it where it belongs. The target is the inverted sense of purity, not any contempt for the woman; the call is to wake up to what you actually revere.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Going to the temple feels like a great burden to him, but he sits at the crossroads with eager relish. He does not bathe, does not pray, does not say Rama's name, yet he is devoted to his tobacco pipe day and night.

He will not bow to God or to the brahmin, yet he worships at the feet of a maidservant. He abandons fragrant sandalwood and sits in stinking filth with great reverence.

Says Tuka, listen, O unfortunate one: why do you forget the Lord Rama?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Going to the temple feels like a great burden to him, but he sits at the crossroads with eager pleasure. He does not bathe, keeps no prayers, never says Rama Rama, yet he loves his tobacco pipe day and night. He will not bow to God or to the brahmin, yet he reverently honors a servant-girl's feet. He leaves fragrant sandal and sits in stinking filth with great care. Tuka says: listen, you unlucky man, why do you forget Rama, the Lord?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram draws a man who finds every holy thing tiresome and every empty thing delightful. The temple is a chore, but loitering at the crossroads is a pleasure; prayer and the Name are skipped, but the pipe is loved all day; he withholds his bow from God and gives his reverence to the wrong feet; he turns from sandalwood toward filth. The poem stacks these reversed choices to show a life with its loves exactly inverted. The closing is not scorn but a plea: he calls the man unlucky, bhagyahina, and asks the real question underneath all of it, why do you keep forgetting Rama? The forgetting is the loss being mourned.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

May evil thought never arise in my mind, O Narayana. Now do this one thing: let me hold Your feet firmly in my chitta.

May the devotion that has arisen come to fruition by Your grace. Says Tuka, there is no gain greater than this.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let no evil thought ever rise in my mind, O Narayana. Now do this one thing: let me hold your feet in my heart. Let the devotion that has arisen come to fruition by your grace. Tuka says: there is no gain greater than this.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a small, direct prayer with one request at its center. Tukaram asks Narayana to keep wrong thoughts from ever rising and to fix his attention on the divine feet held within the heart. He knows the longing for God has already begun in him, and he asks only that grace carry it through to completion, since he cannot finish it on his own strength. The last line settles the whole prayer: there is no greater gain than this, so he asks for nothing else. A steadied mind resting on God is itself the prize.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The tree lies within the seed, and the seed is found at the end of the tree. So it is between You and us; one is contained within the other.

The wave rises upon the water; the wave is the very limb of the water. Says Tuka, the reflection has merged back into the original; the image and its source have become one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The tree lies inside the seed, and the seed waits at the tree's end. So it has become between you and us: each is held within the other. The wave rises on the water, and the wave is the water's own body. Tuka says: the reflection has dissolved back into its source; the image and the original have become one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the union of the devotee and God in three images that each undo the line between two things. The seed holds the whole tree, and the tree comes back to seed; there is no telling where one starts. The wave looks like its own thing, yet it is nothing but the water moving. The reflection seems separate from what it mirrors, yet it merges back and the two are one. He is saying his relationship with God has reached this point: not a worshipper standing before a separate Lord, but each contained in the other, the seeming twoness collapsing into one.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sacks of sugar are loaded upon a bull's back, yet the bull receives only the sting of the prod. Camels carry chests of merchandise, yet they eat only thorns.

Such is the futile toil of those who increase their own desires; they are tied up and handed over to Yama. Only the one who earns the profit knows its sweetness; the rest, poor creatures, have labored in vain.

Says Tuka, become wise, O fool. Do not go round and round the cycle of eighty-four hundred thousand births.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sacks of sugar are loaded on the bull's back, but all the bull gets is the prod. Camels carry chests of goods, but all they eat is thorns. Such is the useless toil of those who keep feeding their desires; they are bound and handed over to Yama. Only the one who takes the profit knows the sweetness; the rest, poor creatures, have worn themselves out for nothing. Tuka says: grow wise, you fool. Do not keep going round the cycle of eighty-four lakh births.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the beast of burden to picture a wasted life. The bull carries sugar and tastes none of it; the camel hauls rich goods and eats only thorns. So it is, he says, with a person who labors endlessly to feed his own cravings: he carries the weight, but the sweetness never reaches him, and in the end he is bound over to death. Someone else, the master who profits, knows the real reward, while the laborer is exhausted for nothing. The closing is a wake-up call rather than mockery: become wise, stop carrying desire's load through birth after birth, the long cycle of eighty-four lakh lives.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

She stuffs rags under her garment and flaunts a swollen belly, making a great commotion before the world. She mimics the cravings of pregnancy and puts on a show, yet there is no milk in the breast and no child in the womb.

Says Tuka, in the end she is proven barren; a second disgrace follows amid the people.

IN PLAIN WORDS

She stuffs rags under her clothes and shows off a swollen belly, making a loud commotion before everyone. She fakes the cravings of pregnancy and puts on a whole show, yet there is no milk in the breast and no child in the womb. Tuka says: in the end she is proven barren, and a second disgrace follows before all the people.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells a sharp little parable of pretended fruitfulness. A woman pads her belly with rags, mimics a pregnant woman's cravings, and makes a public scene of it, but there is no child and no milk; the whole display is hollow. The point is the pretense of inner attainment without the reality: a show of devotion or holiness with nothing actually grown inside. He notes that such a fraud cannot last; time exposes it, and the exposure is a second, worse shaming before the same crowd that was impressed. The warning is against performing a fullness you do not have.

GATHA 3062 Devotion to Vitthal

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All my care rests with Vithoba; I do not stray from His feet for a moment. If I forget that dear, dark form for even one instant, my chitta cannot bear it.

If I forget Hari for even a single moment, the treasury of a hundred thousand gains is lost. Says Tuka, the feet of my Vithoba are the life-giving herb lodged within my heart.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All my care rests with Vithoba; I do not leave his feet for a moment. If that dear dark form slips from my mind for even one instant, my heart cannot bear it. If I forget Hari for even a single moment, a treasury of a hundred thousand gains is lost. Tuka says: the feet of my Vithoba are the life-giving herb within my heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a love that will not tolerate a single gap. He has handed his whole anxious mind over to Vithoba and refuses to step away from his feet, because even an instant's forgetting of that dark, beloved form is unbearable to him. He weighs the cost in plain terms: one moment without Hari is a fortune lost, a hundred thousand gains gone. The closing image makes the stakes physical; Vithoba's feet are the sanjivani, the herb that brings the dead back to life, lodged in his own heart. To forget would be to lose the very thing keeping him alive.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What use are these precious monkeys, dancing before the world? When the time of reckoning comes, they bare their teeth, and the messengers of death seize them with rods. They shake their hands, teeth, ears, and heads to impress the people.

Says Tuka, how long will they endure this disgrace, for they have no righteousness to carry them forward.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What use are these hired monkeys, dancing before the world? When the reckoning comes, they bare their teeth, and the messengers of death seize them with rods. They wave their hands, gnash their teeth, wag their ears, and shake their heads, all to impress the people. Tuka says: how long will they bear this disgrace? Behind them there is no righteousness to carry them through.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming a pattern, not a person. The performer who plays to the crowd is like a trained monkey, all motion meant to win applause: gestures, grimaces, a show. The point lands at the reckoning, when death's agents come, because the performance was never backed by any inner righteousness, and a show cannot stand in for a life. The display that impresses people here buys nothing for what comes after. The poem asks each of us to look at how much of our own piety is performance for an audience.

GATHA 3064 True Worship

True worship, the burden of ego

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे धरा निष्ठावंत भाव । जरी पंढरीराव पाहिजे तो॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

First, the great burden of ego must fall away; only then does receiving instruction bring joy. Memorizing scriptures by rote is useless so long as the chitta remains impure.

A horse carries heavy loads, yet gains nothing from them; recitation without devotion is just the same. Says Tuka, hold steadfast faith, if you truly seek the Lord of Pandhari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

First the great pride must fall away; only then does instruction bring joy. Heaping up scripture by rote is useless while the heart stays impure. A horse carries no small load, yet gains nothing by it; recitation without devotion is just the same. Tuka says: hold steadfast faith, if it is the Lord of Pandhari you truly want.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the order of things straight: the ego has to go down before any teaching can take hold. Where pride is intact, instruction cannot even be received with joy, and memorized scripture is dead weight on an unpurified heart. His image is exact: a packhorse carries a heavy load all day and is none the wiser for it, and rote learning without devotion carries you nowhere the same way. If you actually want the Lord of Pandhari, the path is not more recitation but steadfast faith and a heart made clean.

GATHA 3065 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, go to Pandhari

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Go, go to Pandhari! Become a pilgrim, a Warkari! Why do you sit in the barren wasteland longing for Vaikuntha? Carry the banners on your shoulders, wear garlands of tulsi and smear yourself with abir. Says Tuka, prostrate yourself before the gathering of saints and sages.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Go, go to Pandhari. Become a Warkari, become one. Why do you sit in the barren sand still longing for Vaikuntha? Carry the weight of the banners on your shoulders, wear garlands of tulsi, and smear yourself with abir. Tuka says: go and fall flat in the crowd of saints and sages.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a call to stop waiting and start walking. Tukaram tells the listener to go to Pandhari and become a Warkari, an actual pilgrim, rather than sitting idle and hankering after a far-off Vaikuntha. The point is that the heaven you long for is already present in the pilgrimage itself: the banners on the shoulder, the tulsi garland, the abir on the body, the company of the road. The crowning act is to fall full-length before the gathering of saints and sages, because the goal is reached by joining that company, not by dreaming of paradise alone.

GATHA 3066 The Saints

Veneration of saints, blessed lineage

मराठी मूळ

जगीं ऐसा बाप व्हावा । ज्याचा वंश मुक्तीस जावा॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे मी पोटींचें बाळ । माझी पुरवा ब्रह्मींची आळ ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Blessed is the father whose lineage attains liberation. O Dnyanadeva, O dear parent, when you came into the womb, sin itself was destroyed.

Your father was a man of wisdom, and therefore we too were drawn into contemplation. Says Tuka, I am the child of that very womb; fulfill my longing for union with the Absolute.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let such a father be born into this world, whose lineage goes on to liberation. When he came into the womb, sin itself was undone, O Dnyanadeva, dear father and mother. From the start the father was a man of wisdom, and so we too were drawn into contemplation. Tuka says: I am the child of that womb; fulfill in me this longing for Brahman.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praising Dnyanadeva and claiming his spiritual descent. The truly blessed parent, he says, is the one whose line leads on to liberation, and Dnyanadeva is exactly that: at his very coming, sin was undone. He calls him father and mother both, because spiritual lineage is the real parentage here. Since the source was a man of wisdom, those who follow are drawn into contemplation as if by inheritance. Standing in that line, Tukaram asks for the child's birthright: fulfill in me this longing for Brahman.

GATHA 3067 The Saints

Defense of saints, the slanderer

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे केली प्रज्ञा या च साटीं । कांहीं माझे पोटीं शंका नाहीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The mouth that insults the saints becomes as foul as a pit of leather. The wicked one, tainted in his very nature, knows neither what is his own nor another's.

He who seeks faults in the saints is cast out from grace; one must shun his company as one shuns what is defiling. Says Tuka, my intellect was given for this very purpose, and I have no doubt in my chitta about it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The mouth that mocks the saints is fouled; it is plainly a tanner's pit. By such experience his seed is mixed and base; the wicked one knows neither his own nor another's. He who hunts for faults in the saints is an outcaste; one must shun his touch as a great defilement. Tuka says: my understanding was given for just this purpose, and in my heart there is no doubt of it.

WHAT IT MEANS

This abhanga defends the saints with deliberately harsh imagery, and the heat is aimed at the slandering habit, not at any human soul beyond rescue. The mouth that mocks the holy has fouled itself; the one who lives to find fault has lost the sense of what is his own and what is sacred. Tukaram says such company should be shunned the way one avoids defilement, because the fault-finding spirit is contagious to the heart. He ends by claiming his own clarity was given precisely to say this, and he holds it without doubt. The challenge to the reader is to catch the fault-hunting impulse in oneself before it hardens.

GATHA 3068 Appeals and Exhortations

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When there is too much evasion and delay, a quarrel brews all around. It will not end well; let fear remain in your chitta.

He will twist your ears and throttle you, so be alert. Says Tuka, do not dismiss my silence as mere wordlessness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When there is much putting off and delay, a quarrel brews all around. It will not end well; keep fear inside you. He will twist your ear and throttle you, so stay alert. Tuka says: do not take my silence to mean I have nothing to say.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is warning against endless evasion and delay. Where a person keeps stalling and dodging, trouble gathers and a reckoning builds that will not turn out well, so a healthy fear should be kept alive inside. The harsh image of an ear twisted and a throat throttled names the grip that consequences finally take on the one who keeps putting things off. His last line is pointed at himself: his quietness is not emptiness or consent, and no one should mistake his silence for having nothing to say.

GATHA 3069 The Power of the Name

The Name, the tongue cannot stop

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My tongue has become restless; not a moment passes without utterance. I rise calling out to God and store Him within my chitta.

There is no pull of wind or current; whatever occasion arises is good. Says Tuka, this speech of mine has become utterly uncontrollable.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My tongue has grown restless; the moment will not let go. With this very thing I rise up overflowing, having stored God inside me. There is no pull of wind or current; whatever the occasion, it is good. Tuka says: this speech of mine has become more than I can hold back.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing the Name taking over the body. His tongue has become restless, unable to let a moment pass without uttering it, and he rises up brimming because God is now stored within. He says there is no outer push at work, no wind or tide; the impulse comes from inside, so any occasion at all is the right occasion to speak the Name. The closing line is almost a confession of helplessness: this speech has passed beyond his control. What the poem celebrates is exactly that loss of control, the Name speaking itself through him.

GATHA 3070 Worldly Life

Worldly life, vows for greed

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The mother makes vows that her son should return home safely to the village. But what merit can she gather when she spends her vows only for worldly greed? She prays for more offspring, for wealth and grain in the house.

She barters away a touchstone in exchange for mere pebbles. Says Tuka, she pays a price and receives only worthless goods in return.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let my husband come home to the village: so the wife makes her vows. What merit can she gather, when she spends her vows for greed? More children, she asks, and wealth and grain in the house. She begs for a pebble in exchange for the touchstone. Tuka says: she pays the price and takes home worthless goods.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at how people spend their devotion on the wrong things. The wife makes vows, but for worldly aims: the husband home safe, more children, wealth and grain in the house. He says no real merit can come of vows poured out for greed. His sharp image carries the whole point: the touchstone turns iron to gold, yet she trades it away for a common pebble, mistaking the lesser thing for the prize. The same bargain is offered to anyone who turns the practice of devotion toward worldly gain and walks away thinking they got something.

GATHA 3071 Worldly Life

Worldly life, childhood passes in play

तुका ह्मणे ऐसें बाळपण गेलें । मग तारुण्य आलें गर्वमूळ ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Twelve years of childhood pass in play, with all manner of games. Bat and ball, tipcat, leapfrog, hide and seek, all sorts of childhood pastimes.

Wrestling, spinning tops, chasing and tumbling, lifting stones with youthful strength. Says Tuka, thus childhood slipped away, and then youth arrived, the root of all pride.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In childhood twelve years go by like this, the boy playing all kinds of games. Tipcat and bat and ball, leapfrog and tag, throwing stones, hide and seek. Wrestling matches, spinning tops, racing and chasing, tumbling and kissing-games. Sliding and whirling about, lifting heavy stones with the strength of his body. Tuka says: childhood went by like this, and then youth came, the root of all pride.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the first stage of a life laid out plainly, the early years counted off through their games. Tukaram piles up the children's pastimes, bat and ball, tipcat, leapfrog, tops, wrestling, until the sheer list makes the point: twelve whole years slip away in play, with not a thought given to anything higher. The sting is in the last line, where childhood passes only to hand over to youth, and youth is named the root of pride. The poem is the opening of a portrait of a life squandered stage by stage, asking the listener where the years are actually going.

GATHA 3072 Worldly Life

Worldly life, the youth drunk on pride

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Drunk on youth, he respects no one, always smirking like a madman. With his turban tied in fancy knots, he roams among people like a buffalo.

A betel leaf in hand, his head held high, he shows no honor to the good. Like a dog he wanders door to door, casting his sinful gaze on other men's wives.

Says Tuka, what a great wastrel, spending his whole life in idle mischief.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Drunk on youth, he honors no one, forever smirking like a fool. His turban tied in fancy folds, he wanders among people like a buffalo. A betel leaf in hand, his chin held high, he shows no respect to good men. Like a dog he roams from door to door, eyeing other men's wives with a sinful gaze. Tuka says: what a great wastrel he is; his life went by in idle mischief.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram draws the second stage of the wasted life: youth swollen with self-importance. The man honors no one, struts with a smirk and a fancy turban, chews his betel with his chin up, and gives the good no respect at all. The animal images are deliberate, the buffalo and the door-to-door dog, because appetite and vanity have crowded out everything human, down to the leering eye on other men's wives. The verdict is that the whole season of strength was spent on idle mischief. The poem is holding up a mirror to the swagger of youth, not condemning a person past hope.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In old age come sneezing, colds, and coughing. He sits with his hand pressed to his forehead.

His mouth has shriveled like a coconut shell, and mucus flows from his nose without cease. When he tries to speak, the words come out garbled, his throat rattling with phlegm.

The neighbors say, why does this wretch not die already, he has brought us nothing but vexation. Says Tuka, abandon all other concerns now and remember Rama, Rama, every moment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In old age come the running cold and the cough. He sits with his hand pressed to his brow. His mouth has shriveled like a coconut shell, and mucus runs from his nose in a stream. When he tries to speak the words will not come out straight; his throat rattles, thick with phlegm. The neighbors say, why does this wretch not just die? He has brought us nothing but disgust. Tuka says: now drop every other concern and remember Rama, Rama, every moment.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the last stage, and Tukaram spares nothing in showing the body's collapse: the endless cough, the shriveled mouth, the running nose, the speech gone to a phlegmy rattle. He even lets us hear the neighbors wishing the old man dead, to drive home how the world treats a body it no longer values. But the unsparing picture exists for the turn at the end: if childhood went in play and youth in pride, only this remains, to drop every other concern and say Rama, Rama, with every breath that is left. The point is not to mock the old man but to ask why we wait until then to begin.

Moral ideal, take no pay for kirtan

तुका ह्मणे द्रव्य घेती । देती ते ही नरका जाती ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Where you perform kirtan, do not accept food. Do not apply sacred ash to your forehead or wear a garland around your neck.

Do not beg for grain or fodder from those who keep temple bulls. Says Tuka, those who take money for devotion, and those who give it, both go to hell.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Where you sing kirtan, do not eat the food there. Do not let them mark your brow with paste, do not let them hang a garland on your neck. Do not beg grain or fodder from those who keep temple bulls, know this. Tuka says: those who take money for it, and those who give it, both go to hell.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is laying down a rule of clean conduct for the singer of God's praise. Take no meal where you have sung, accept no paste on the brow, no garland on the neck, beg no grain or fodder; in short, draw no reward from the devotion you offer. The reasoning is that the moment kirtan is paid for it stops being worship and becomes a transaction. He makes the warning unsparing by condemning both sides at once: the one who takes money for the Name and the one who pays it both go to hell. The standard he sets is that devotion must stay free of any price.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hear how many houses there were in Lanka; I will tell you the count as it truly was. Five hundred thousand houses of stone, seven hundred thousand built of brick.

Ten million houses of brass and copper, and seventy million of pure gold. Says Tuka, he whose wealth was so vast could not take even a single cowrie shell with him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hear how many houses there were in Lanka. I will tell you the count, just as it was. Five hundred thousand houses of stone. Seven hundred thousand built of brick. Ten million houses of brass and copper. Seventy million of pure gold. Tuka says: he whose wealth was this vast could not take a single cowrie shell with him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram piles up Ravana's riches house by house, stone to brick to brass to gold, until the numbers turn unreal. He builds the heap only to knock it flat in the last line: the lord of all that gold could not carry off one cowrie shell, the smallest coin there is. The frame the poem leaves unspoken is your own grasping. Every fortune you stack up stays behind when you go, so measure what you are storing against what you can actually keep.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The wrongful courtesan, a woman of ill repute, held unwavering faith in Rama within her mind. Even such a wrongdoer was carried to heaven in a celestial chariot and placed in an eternal realm.

The Purifier of the Fallen, His renown resounds in all three worlds; He is compassionate and a shelter for the destitute. Says Tuka, hold fast to Vitthal's path, for I know of no other remedy.

IN PLAIN WORDS

She was a courtesan, a woman of ill repute. Yet in her mind she held firm faith in Rama. Even this sinful woman was carried up in a celestial chariot. She was set in an unshakable realm. He purifies the fallen; His mark is on all three worlds. He is merciful, a shelter for the helpless. Tuka says: hold fast to Vitthal's path. I know of no other remedy.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes the most disreputable person he can name, a woman the world counts as wholly fallen, and shows her lifted to an eternal heaven. What carried her was not virtue or good standing but unwavering faith in Rama held in the mind. The point is that the Lord is the purifier of the fallen, so no past disqualifies you. Do not examine your record and conclude you are beyond saving; examine instead whether you are holding fast. Tuka ends by refusing all backup plans: cling to Vitthal, because he knows nothing else that works.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The great elephant Gajendra was tormented by a crocodile in the waters for a thousand years. All his companions abandoned him, none would endure his suffering, and at last he looked only to You, O Vitthal.

O ocean of mercy, my Narayana, You delivered them both. Says Tuka, You carried them aloft in a celestial chariot, and hearing this, I too have placed my trust in You.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Gajendra the great elephant was tormented in the water by a crocodile for a thousand years. His companions left him; none could bear his suffering. At the end he watched only for You, Vitthal. O ocean of mercy, my Narayana, You delivered them both. Tuka says: You carried them up in a celestial chariot. Hearing this, I too have put my trust in You.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram retells Gajendra to name the moment faith is for: when everyone who could help has walked away and the suffering has no end in sight. The elephant's friends abandon him, and only then does he look to the Lord alone, who delivers both the captive and even the crocodile. The unspoken frame is the hearer's own desperation. Tuka does not stand outside the story; he says that simply hearing it was enough to make him trust too. The stakes are stated plainly: at the end, the one you watch for is the one who comes.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the demon Shankhasura stole the Vedas from Brahma, You assumed the form of a fish. It was not as though Brahma's soul had been stolen away or that he lacked knowledge.

Yet because he called out to You with love, You, Narayana, ocean of mercy, came to his rescue. Says Tuka, O Vitthal, I am a bearer of Your name; nourish this servant and grant me Your audience.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the demon Shankhasura stole the Vedas from Brahma, You took the form of a fish. It was not that Brahma's soul had been carried off, or that Brahma lacked knowledge. Yet because he called out to You with love, You, Narayana, ocean of mercy, came. Tuka says: O Vitthal, I am a bearer of Your name. Feed this servant and grant me Your sight.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a sharp distinction: Brahma, the creator, was not ignorant and his self was never in danger, yet his own knowledge did not recover the stolen Vedas. What brought the Lord as the fish was the loving cry, not the learning. The unspoken claim is that knowing about God is not the same as calling on him, and the second is what moves him. Tuka then places himself in the same posture, owning no merit but the Name he carries, and asks to be fed and granted a sight of the Lord like a servant fed by his master.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the gods and demons churned the ocean, the earth could not bear the weight. You became the tortoise and held the burden upon Your back; O Hari, the care of all beings rests with You.

At that time the gods sang Your praise, calling You the merciful Lord. Says Tuka, Your glorious deeds are beyond count; even Shesha with a thousand tongues grows weary recounting them.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The gods and the demons churned the ocean. The earth could not bear the weight. You became the tortoise and held the burden on Your back. O Hari, the care of all beings rests with You. At that time the gods sang Your praise, calling You the merciful Lord. Tuka says: Your glorious deeds are so many that even the serpent with a thousand tongues grows weary telling them.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells the churning of the ocean to make one point: when the weight grew too great even for the earth, the Lord took the tortoise form and carried it on his own back. The care of all beings rests with him, which is why the gods turn from their effort to his praise. The frame left unspoken is your own load. What you cannot carry is not yours to carry alone, and the same Hari bears it. Tuka closes by confessing that the Lord's deeds outrun all praise: the thousand-tongued serpent tires before the list is done.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the demon Hiranyaksha grew drunk with power, strengthened by Shankara's boon, he seized Indra's kingdom by force, and the gods cried out to the Lord to come to their aid. Then, O Panduranga, You became the great boar and slew that demon lord.

Says Tuka, You restored their kingdoms to those they belonged to; such is Your motherly care, O Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There was a time when the demon Hiranyaksha grew drunk with power, made strong by Shankara's boon. He seized Indra's kingly throne by force. The gods cried out: Lord, holder of the discus, come quickly. Then, O Panduranga, You became the boar and killed that lord of demons. Tuka says: You gave their kingdoms back to those they belonged to. Such a mother You are, O Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram retells the boar avatar to show what the Lord does when the strong rob the weak. A demon emboldened by a boon takes Indra's throne, the gods cry out, and Panduranga comes as the boar to kill the usurper and restore each kingdom to its rightful owner. The unspoken frame is justice that no one else can deliver. Notice the final image: Tuka calls this fierce, world-rescuing Lord a mother, because the same force that destroys the wrongdoer is tenderness toward the wronged. The stake is trust that what was stolen will be set right.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For the sake of Prahlada You became Narasimha, making his words come true. Rama, Krishna, Govinda, Narayana, Hari, the royal devotee thundered these names at the king's gate.

Vitthal, Madhava, Mukunda, Keshava, these names made the demon king tremble. Says Tuka, for the sake of Your devotees You assumed a visible form and proved the words of the faithful to be true.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For Prahlada's sake You became Narasimha. You made his words come true. Rama, Krishna, Govinda, Narayana, Hari: the royal devotee thundered these names at the king's gate. Vitthal, Madhava, Mukunda, Keshava: at these names the demon king trembled. Tuka says: for Your devotees' sake You took a visible form and made the words of the faithful come true.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram retells Narasimha around a single act: the Lord made the devotee's word true. Prahlada had insisted God was everywhere, and to keep that word the Lord took form at the pillar. The Names themselves are the weapon here; the boy thunders them and the tyrant shakes. The unspoken claim is about how God meets faith: when a devotee stakes everything on a promise, the Lord puts on a body to make it stand. The pattern to examine is not the demon but our own half-belief, which never forces the issue the way Prahlada's whole-hearted word did.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why do you squander the power of the Name? Why do you forget these glorious deeds? They struck Prahlada again and again with swords, yet not the slightest wound appeared on his body. When he cried out Rama, Krishna, Hari, even his tormentor was seized with terror.

Says Tuka, set aside all other powers and glories; just grant this Tuka the longing of Your meeting.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why do you throw away the power of the Name? Why do you forget these glorious deeds? They struck Prahlada again and again with swords, yet not the slightest wound appeared on his body. He cried out Rama, Krishna, Hari, and at that his tormentor was seized with terror. Tuka says: let all such powers and famous glories be. Just grant this Tuka the longing to meet You.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram opens by scolding the listener, and himself, for squandering something already proven: the Name guarded Prahlada so that swords left no mark and his attacker, not he, was the one who shook with fear. That is the deed we forget when we treat the Name as small. Then comes the turn the plain poem only states: Tuka waves away even these miracles and asks for one thing instead, the meeting. The stake is that the Name's real prize is not protection or wonders but God himself, and that is what he begs for.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A cup full of poison was given to Prahlada, but his mind was fearless by Your strength. O Narayana, he drank what was offered, and by Your power it became life-giving nectar.

Through remembrance of the Name, the poison was transformed into water before everyone's eyes. Says Tuka, such are Your wondrous glories that even the thousand-hooded serpent grows weary and cannot describe them all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A cup full of poison was given to Prahlada. His mind was fearless, by Your strength. O Narayana, he drank what was offered, and by Your power it became life. By thinking on the Name, the poison turned to water before everyone's eyes, O Narayana. Tuka says: such is Your greatness that even the hooded serpent grows weary and cannot tell it all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram takes the poisoning of Prahlada to show what holding the Name does inside a person under attack. The boy is fearless not by his own nerve but by the Lord's strength, and the poison he drinks turns to life-giving water in plain sight. The unspoken frame is the poison handed to any devotee: fear, threat, the world's malice. Remembrance of the Name changes its nature before it can do its work. Tuka ends as he often does, owning that the Lord's greatness exceeds all telling; even the thousand-hooded serpent tires before he can finish.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Prahlada was cast into a pit of fire, yet he would not forget Govinda. He told his father that Hari pervades all things, that the Lord dwells everywhere.

Prahlada roared and called out: Narayana is my friend, present even in this fire! Says Tuka, the fire became cool; such is the mighty power of Vitthal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Prahlada was thrown into a pit of fire. Still he would not forget Govinda. He told his father that Hari fills all things, that Murari lives everywhere. He roared out: Narayana, my friend, is here even as this fire. Tuka says: the fire turned cool. Such is Your mighty power, Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram retells the fire to test the claim that God is everywhere. Thrown into the flames, Prahlada does not abandon the teaching he held when it was safe; he insists the Lord pervades all things, even the fire meant to kill him, and calls that fire his friend. The unspoken stake is whether you believe in God's presence only when comfortable. The boy holds it at the worst moment, and the fire turns cool. The lesson points at our own faith, which usually goes silent exactly where Prahlada's grew loud.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The enraged father demanded of Prahlada: tell me, where is your Hrishikesha? The boy replied: He is in wood, in stone, in everything; the Lord is everywhere. The wicked one kicked the pillar in fury, and the moment the name Narayana was uttered, the pillar burst apart.

Says Tuka, see how the pillar thundered and split, and Brahma himself was startled in his celestial abode.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The father, in fury, said to Prahlada: tell me where your Hrishikesha is. The boy answered: He is in wood, in stone, in everything; Vanamali is wherever you look. The wicked one kicked the pillar in anger. The moment the name Narayana was spoken, the pillar burst. Tuka says: see how the pillar cracked open with a roar, and Brahma himself was startled in his high heaven.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram stages the confrontation at the pillar to make the doctrine of God's presence land as fact. The father demands proof of where God is; the boy says everywhere, in wood and stone alike. When the tyrant strikes the pillar in scorn and the Name is uttered, the pillar splits and the Lord comes out of it. The unspoken claim is that the all-pervading God is not an idea but answers when called from anywhere. The shock that reaches even Brahma is the measure of it: God is precisely where mocking certainty swore he could not be.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Mount Meru and Mandara trembled, and the great serpent in the netherworld shook his heads. The sun and moon were dimmed by the radiance, and Indra shook with fear.

Hari assumed that fearsome form and slew the demon upon His lap. Says Tuka, for the sake of His devotees, Hari has destroyed even the most wicked of wrongdoers.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Mount Meru shook, and Mandara too. In the netherworld the great serpent shook his hoods. The sun lost its light, and the moon as well. Indra trembled and trembled. Hari took on that terrible form. He killed the demon across His lap. Tuka says: for His devotees' sake, Hari has destroyed even the worst of wrongdoers.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lets the whole cosmos quake, mountains, serpent, sun, moon, Indra, before he names what caused it: Hari taking the fierce Narasimha form to kill the demon laid across his lap. The terror is real, but the reason is tender. The Lord put on that dreadful shape for the sake of a devotee. The frame left unspoken is that even the worst wrongdoer is not beyond the Lord's reach when his devotees are at stake. The aim of the fierceness is protection, and what it answers is faith, not power.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Most compassionate, merciful to the lowly, Your name in the world is the Lover of Devotees. You valued the offering of Bali so deeply that even now You stand guard at his door.

Are You bound there out of fear of him, or is it that Your mercy knows no bounds, O Hari? Says Tuka, Your love for Your devotees, O Ananta, is truly extraordinary.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You are most kind, merciful to the lowly. In the world Your name is Lover of Devotees. You held Bali's offering dear in Your heart. Even now You guard his door. Do You sit at his door out of fear of him? No, Hari, it is that Your mercy is vast. Tuka says: Your tenderness toward Your devotee, O Ananta, is beyond anything.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram marvels that the highest Lord chooses to stand watch like a servant at the door of His devotee Bali. He names two readings and rejects the false one: God is not bound there by fear, but by His own boundless mercy. The poem turns the usual order upside down: the master becomes the doorkeeper, because love for the devotee is greater than majesty. Calling Him Ananta, the endless one, sharpens the wonder: what is limitless has gladly made itself small for love.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Panduranga, how shall I recount Your virtues? Your glorious deeds in this world are truly blessed. When the gods and demons harassed Durvasa, he came running to You for refuge.

You were seated at the entrance of Bali's realm, and Durvasa entreated You with devotion. Says Tuka, O ocean of mercy, O Hari, Your loving shade shelters all Your devotees.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Panduranga, how shall I tell Your virtues? Your great deeds in this world are blessed. The gods and demons punished Durvasa. He came running to tell his trouble. You were sitting at Bali's door. Durvasa pleaded with You with feeling. Tuka says: ocean of mercy, Srihari, Your loving shade rests over Your devotee.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram confesses he cannot fully count God's glories, then points to the story where the sage Durvasa, hounded by gods and demons alike, runs to the Lord for refuge. He finds the Lord seated as doorkeeper at Bali's gate, and there pleads his case. The poem lands on the image of a sheltering shade: God's love spreads over the devotee like cool cover. Naming Him ocean of mercy, Tukaram says this shelter has no measured edge; it is simply what God is toward those who turn to Him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Durvasa, I am bound by My promise. Go and ask Bali for his permission to release Me.

Without his leave, I cannot depart, for I have become his gatekeeper. Durvasa went and asked Bali, but Bali replied: do not even speak of it.

Says Tuka, when Bali renounced all else, Panduranga became his constant companion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Durvasa, lord, I am caught by my promise. Go and ask Bali; let him give the word. Without his leave I cannot come. I have become his doorkeeper. Durvasa went to Bali and asked. The other said: do not even speak of it. Tuka says: when Bali gave up everything else, then Panduranga became his friend.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells the scene where God Himself says He cannot leave Bali's door: He is bound by His own vow and has become the king's gatekeeper, and only Bali can release Him. When the sage Durvasa asks, Bali refuses outright, will not even hear of letting the Lord go. The closing line gives the law behind the tale: God became Bali's constant companion only because Bali first renounced all else. The lesson is that total surrender is what binds God to a devotee; God will not be held by half a heart.

Durvasa turned back from there, troubled and agitated in his mind. Says Tuka, are You beholden to only one? Be gracious to all, O Lord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Bali says: today, Durvasa, lord, do not ask me for Narayana. I won Srihari with great effort. I have seated Him at my door to guard it. Durvasa turned back from there. He was anxious and troubled in his mind. Tuka says: are You the property of one alone? Be gracious to all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram shows Bali refusing to surrender the Lord even to a sage in need: he won God by hard effort and has set Him to guard his own door. Durvasa walks away shaken, and the poem voices his protest, which is also Tukaram's own ache. If God belongs so completely to one devotee, what of the rest who are left waiting? The closing plea, be gracious to all, turns a mythic quarrel into a prayer: let the love that bound God to Bali reach every soul that calls.

तुका ह्मणे ऐसें बोलिला दुर्वास । वाटला संतोष पांडुरंगा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You are the Lord of the three worlds, the support of all, yet You have made Bali's doorstep Your home. You have left us abandoned.

To whom have You entrusted us? To whom have You given the three worlds? Brother of the helpless, champion of the servants, Your pledges are going to waste, O Hari. Says Tuka, thus spoke Durvasa, and Panduranga was pleased.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Lord of the three worlds, support of all, You have made Bali's house Your home. You have left us behind. To whom did You hand us over? Into whose hands did You give the three worlds? Brother of the helpless, defender of servants: Your pledges, Hari, are going to waste. Tuka says: thus Durvasa spoke, and Panduranga was pleased.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram puts a sharp complaint into Durvasa's mouth: the Lord of all worlds has shut Himself inside one devotee's house and abandoned everyone else. The protest hits at God's own titles, brother of the helpless, defender of servants, and warns that those promises are being broken while He stands guard at Bali's door. The point is examination of how we picture God's favor, not contempt for Bali. And the last line is the surprise: God is pleased by the complaint, because it is the cry of one who wants Him near, not one who has given up on Him.

Holding God's feet, no bargain

मराठी मूळ

बोलिलेती ते देवऋषी दुर्वासया । जाय पुसावया मागत्यानें ॥1॥
मागुता दुर्वास पुसे बिळराया । निरोप जावया देई देवा ॥ध्रु.॥
बळी ह्मणे त्यासी जाय मी न ह्मणें । जाईल नारायण लागला ची ॥2॥
मजपाशीं राहें कोठें तरीं जाय । तुका ह्मणे पाय न सोडीं मी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The divine sage spoke, and the Lord told Durvasa to go and ask Bali once more for permission to leave. Durvasa again approached the king of the netherworld and asked for leave.

Bali replied: I do not say go, but I shall not let Narayana depart once He is here. Stay with me, or go wherever you wish.

Says Tuka, I will not release these feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The divine sage spoke to Durvasa: go again and ask, since he is the one to ask. Once more Durvasa asks the king of the underworld: give the word for Him to leave, lord. Bali says to him: I do not say go; once Narayana has come, He will be made to leave only over me. Stay with me, or go where you will. Tuka says: I will not let go of these feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

The scene repeats: the sage is sent back to beg Bali for the Lord's release, and again Bali refuses to be the one who sends God away. He offers the sage a place or his leave, but will not loosen his own hold on the Lord. The closing line, I will not let go of these feet, is the whole abhanga's heart, spoken now in the devotee's own voice. It is the posture Tukaram holds out as the goal: once you have grasped God's feet, you do not bargain them away for anything, not even at a sage's request.

Mythic origin, breaking the door

मराठी मूळ

दुर्वासें निरोप आणिला ये रिती । मग वाढलेती नारायणा ॥1॥
ठेविलें चरण बिळचिये द्वारीं । शीर अंगावरी लांबविलें ॥ध्रु.॥
पाडियेलें द्वार द्वारावतियेसी । वरि हृषीकेशी निघालेती ॥2॥
तेथूनियां नाम पडिलें द्वारका । वैकुंठनायका तुका ह्मणे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Durvasa brought back this reply, and then the Lord stretched Himself. He placed His feet at Bali's doorway and extended His head above.

He broke through the gateway of Dwaraka and emerged on the other side. From that event the city received its name Dwaraka.

Says Tuka, O Lord of Vaikuntha.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Durvasa brought back this answer. Then Narayana grew large. He set His feet at Bali's door. He stretched His head up over the body. He broke open the doorway at Dwaravati. Hrishikesha came out above. From that the name Dwaraka was given. Tuka says: O Lord of Vaikuntha.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells the strange exit: refused release at Bali's door, the Lord simply grows vast, plants His feet at the gate, and breaks through the opening above. The poem reads the city's name Dwaraka, gate, out of this very act of breaking through a door. It is a playful, vivid retelling, not a doctrine: God is so committed to His word at Bali's door that even leaving becomes a wonder. The closing address, Lord of Vaikuntha, sets the cosmic scale of the one who would stoop to such a game for love.

Plea, God's hidden care

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे ये चि वेळे काय जालें । कां सोंग धरिलें मोहनाचें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The two demons Muru and Kushu were slain, and the sage Durvasa was set at ease. Because You killed Muru, the name Murari became Yours, O Hari.

From the very beginning You have protected Your devotees in this manner, O Narayana. Says Tuka, what has changed now? Why have You put on this disguise of indifference?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You killed both the demons, Muru and Kushu. You set the sage Durvasa at ease. Because You killed Muru You are called Murari. That name became Yours, Hari. From the beginning You have guarded Your devotees this way. You kept them safe, Narayana. Tuka says: what has happened this time? Why have You put on the mask of indifference?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram recites God's old record of rescue: demons slain, the sage saved, even the name Murari earned by protecting devotees. Against that long history he sets his present complaint: from the start You have always shielded Your own, so why now do You seem cold and far off? The poem names the felt distance as a mask, a disguise of indifference, not the truth of God. It is the cry of a devotee who trusts the past enough to demand the same care now, refusing to believe the silence is real.

GATHA 3095 The Saints

Fierce rebuke, contempt for the guru

मराठी मूळ

गुरुपादाग्रींचें जळ । त्यास मानी जो विटाळ ॥1॥
संतीं विाळला जो खळ । नरकीं पचे चिरकाळ ॥ध्रु.॥
गुरुतीथाअ अनमान । यथासांग मद्यपान ॥2॥
गुरुअंगुष्टा न चोखी । मुख घाली वेश्येमुखीं ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे सांगों किती । मुखीं पडो त्याचे माती ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He who considers the water from the guru's feet to be impure is cast out and condemned by the saints; he rots in hell for ages. To hesitate before the holy water of the guru is as sinful as drinking wine.

He who refuses to honor the guru's toe yet presses his mouth to a faithless woman's lips is beneath contempt. Says Tuka, how much more shall I say? Let dirt fill the mouth of such a person.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The water from the tips of the guru's feet: whoever thinks it is unclean, that wicked one, cast out by the saints, rots in hell for a long age. To doubt the guru's holy water is the full sin of drinking wine. He who will not touch the guru's toe, yet puts his mouth on a harlot's mouth. Tuka says: how much shall I tell? Let dirt fall in such a person's mouth.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks an inversion of values that disgusts him: the man who shrinks from honoring his guru while throwing himself at base pleasures. He ranks the slights bluntly, treating scorn for the guru's feet as grave as forbidden drink, and the refusal to bow as the mark of a heart already turned the wrong way. The harshness is aimed at the pattern, the soul that holds the holy cheap and the cheap holy, and is meant as a mirror for self-examination, not as license to despise a person. The closing curse is shock, a way of saying such a mouth has nothing worth speaking.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why, O Panduranga, have You made me grow so great? What desire had I that I should make such a clamor? To conduct the feeding of Brahmins, to perform kirtan before the people. Says Tuka, no one knows the true Master behind this occasion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why, Panduranga, have You made me grow so large? What need had I to make all this noise? The feeding of Brahmins; the kirtan done before people. Tuka says: no one knows who the real master behind the occasion is.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns on his own visible greatness and asks God why He has raised him so high, into feedings and public kirtans and all their stir. He disowns any personal appetite for the show: none of it was his wanting. The last line carries the point: people see Tukaram at the center of these events, but the true doer behind every occasion is God, and that goes unrecognized. It is a confession that the devotee is only the instrument, and a quiet refusal to take the credit that onlookers assign.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The Supreme Lord Hari, who stands beyond the reach of all six philosophies, that very Rama plays in Dasharatha's home. He who is the innermost treasure of Shiva, the secret of Valmiki's cave, that Rama eats the berries offered by the tribal woman Shabari.

He whom yogis cannot reach through meditation whispers stories into the ears of monkeys. He liberates a stone by the touch of His feet and saves a courtesan by His Name; that Rama becomes a guest in Koliya's humble home.

He whom the gods cannot attain even for a moment's salutation grants His loving embrace to bears and monkeys. Tuka bows at the feet of Rama, the dark-complexioned Lord, the lotus-eyed one, the meditation of all yogis.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The Supreme, Srihari, is far beyond the six philosophies. That same Rama plays in Dasharatha's house. He is Shiva's own self, the secret of Valmiki's cave. That Srirama eats the fruit the tribal woman offers. Yogis cannot catch Him in their thought. He tells stories into the ears of monkeys. He raises a stone with His feet. He saves a courtesan by His name. That Rama is a guest in Koli's house. The gods cannot win a moment's bow from Him. That Rama gives His grace to a bear and to monkeys. Rama is dark and full of form, the meditation of yogis. Rama is lotus-eyed. Tuka bows at His feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets the unreachable Lord beside the homely one and shows they are the same. The being whom six schools of thought cannot grasp and whom yogis cannot hold in meditation is the same Rama who eats a forest woman's berries, talks with monkeys, and stays as a guest in a poor man's house. Each pair is the whole devotional claim in miniature: the highest stoops to the lowest, and chooses the lowly over the proud. He liberates a stone, a courtesan, bears and monkeys, those whom rank and ritual would pass over. Tukaram answers all this grandeur with the only fitting response, bowing at the feet of the dark, lotus-eyed Rama.

GATHA 3098 Devotion to Vitthal

Total belonging, Vitthal is everything

मराठी मूळ

विठ्ठल माझा जीव विठ्ठल माझा भाव । कुळधर्म देव विठ्ठल माझा ॥1॥
विठ्ठल माझा गुरु विठ्ठल माझा तारूं । उतरील पारु भवनदीचा ॥ध्रु.॥
विठ्ठल माझी माता विठ्ठल माझा पिता । विठ्ठल चुलता बहिणी बंधु ॥2॥
विठ्ठल हे जन विठ्ठल माझें मन। सोयरा सज्जन विठ्ठल माझा ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे माझा विठ्ठल विसावा। नश्वरित गांवा जाइन त्याच्या ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Vitthal is my life, Vitthal is my devotion, Vitthal is my family deity. Vitthal is my guru, Vitthal is my raft that will carry me across the river of worldly existence.

Vitthal is my mother, Vitthal is my father, Vitthal is my uncle, my sister, my brother. Vitthal is my people, Vitthal is my mind, Vitthal is my truest companion.

Says Tuka, Vitthal is my resting place; I shall go to His imperishable abode.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Vitthal is my life, Vitthal is my feeling. Vitthal is my family deity, my god. Vitthal is my guru, Vitthal is my boat that will carry me across the river of the world. Vitthal is my mother, Vitthal is my father, Vitthal is my uncle, my sister, my brother. Vitthal is the people, Vitthal is my mind. Vitthal is my kinsman, my good friend. Tuka says: Vitthal is my rest. I will go to His undying town.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names everything a life is held together by, family, teacher, parents, kin, friends, even his own mind, and assigns every single one to Vitthal. It is not that Vitthal stands beside these things; Vitthal has replaced them all and become each in turn. The river-crossing boat names the stakes: this total belonging is also his only passage out of worldly existence. The poem closes in rest, not striving: having made God his all, he is sure of going to God's imperishable abode.

GATHA 3099 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, no more worry

मराठी मूळ

न मनावी चिंता । कांहीं माझेविशीं आतां ॥1॥
ज्याणें लौकिक हा केला । तो हें निवारिता भला ॥ध्रु.॥
माझे इच्छे काय । होणार ते एक ठाय ॥2॥
सुखा आणि दुःखा । ह्मणे वेगळा मी तुका ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let no anxiety trouble me any longer. He who created this worldly show is perfectly capable of setting it right.

Nothing happens by my will alone; everything unfolds in its own place and time. Says Tuka, I stand apart from both pleasure and pain.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let no worry trouble me now. Nothing about me is mine to fret over. The one who made this whole worldly show is well able to set it right. What happens by my will alone? Everything comes to rest in its own place. In pleasure and in pain, Tuka says: I stand apart from both.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is laying down his anxiety and naming who carries the weight instead. He reasons that the same power that set this whole worldly show in motion is the one fit to put it right, so his fretting adds nothing. He renounces the illusion that things turn on his own will; events settle where they are meant to, in their own time and place. From that release he can say he stands apart from both pleasure and pain, no longer tossed by either, because he has handed the outcome over.

GATHA 3100 The Necessity of Experience

Testimony, God made my own

मराठी मूळ

माझा पाहा अनुभव । केला देव आपुला ॥1॥
बोलविलें तें चि द्यावें । उत्तर व्हावें ते काळीं ॥ध्रु.॥
सोडिलिया जग निंद्य । मग गोविंद म्हणियारा ॥2॥
तुका म्हणे धीर केला । तेणें याला गोविलें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

See my own experience: I have made God my own. Whatever He prompts me to speak, that answer must come forth at the right time.

Once I let go of the world's approval, Govinda became my constant companion. Says Tuka, I held firm patience, and by that I won Him over.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Look at my own experience: I have made God my own. Whatever he prompts me to say, that answer comes out when the time is right. I let go of the world's praise and its blame, and then Govinda became the one I call my own. Tuka says: I held firm and patient, and by that I bound him to me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is offering his own life as the proof, not an argument. He says God has become his own so completely that even his words are no longer self-generated; what he is prompted to speak comes out at the right moment. The turning point was letting go of the world's approval and blame; once that grip was gone, Govinda became his constant. The closing claim is bold: patient, unwavering holding-on did not just earn God's notice, it bound God to him.

GATHA 3101 Worldly Life

The true warrior, conquering the world

मराठी मूळ

जिंकावा संसार । येणें नांवें तरी शूर ॥1॥
येरें काय तीं बापुडीं । कीर अहंकाराचीं घोडीं ॥ध्रु.॥
पण ऐशा नांवें । देवा धरिजेतो भावें ॥2॥
तुका म्हणे ज्यावें । सत्य कीर्तीनें बरवें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He alone is truly a warrior who conquers the worldly life. All others are mere wretches, horses ridden by ego.

By this very determination one can hold God through devotion. Says Tuka, one should live nobly, adorned by the beauty of truthful fame.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Conquer the worldly life: by that name alone are you truly brave. All the rest are only poor creatures, horses that ego rides. By this same resolve a man holds God through love. Tuka says: it is good to live by truth, adorned with true fame.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram redefines bravery away from conquest in the world toward conquest of the world's pull. The hero is the one who masters worldly life; everyone else, however fierce they look, is just a mount that ego sits on and steers. He then ties this inward victory to devotion: the same firm resolve that masters the world is what lets a person take hold of God through love. The poem ends with the standard he sets, a life built on truth and a fame that is real, not flattering noise.

GATHA 3102 Prayers

Prayer, give me what endures

मराठी मूळ

सरे ऐसें ज्याचें दान । त्याचे कोण उपकार ॥1॥
नको वाढूं ऐसें काचें । दे वो साच विठ्ठला ॥ध्रु.॥
रडत मागें सांडी पोर । ते काय थोर माउली ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कीतिन वाढे । धर्म गाढे ते ऐसे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What good is a gift that runs out? What obligation does such a giver earn? O Vitthal, do not give me anything brittle; give me what is real. What kind of mother leaves her crying child behind on the road? Says Tuka, true righteousness is that which endures and whose glory only increases.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A gift that runs out, what good is it? What thanks does such a giver earn? Do not give me brittle things, O Vitthal; give me what is real. What kind of mother leaves her crying child behind on the road? Is she a great mother? Tuka says: glory grows where the gift endures; such are the strong, lasting ways of dharma.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praying, but he is also pressing Vitthal to give rightly. He measures a gift by whether it lasts: anything that runs out is brittle and earns no real gratitude, so he asks only for what is real and enduring. The image of a mother who abandons her crying child on the road is his test of true care; a giver who lets the devotee fall short is no better than that. The close names the standard for both God's giving and a person's living: only what endures, in gift and in dharma, carries real glory.

GATHA 3103 The Power of the Name

The Name, the easy stairway

मराठी मूळ

तुटे मायाजाळ विघडे भवसिंधू । जरि लागे छंदु हरिनामें ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे वर्म दावियेलें संतीं । यापरती विश्रांति आणिक नाहीं ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The web of illusion breaks and the ocean of worldly existence crumbles when one takes up the Name of Hari with passion. Tell me, in this dark age, who has been saved by other rituals and duties alone? The Vedas cannot be studied, the scriptures are too complex; learn instead the compositions of the Name.

Yoga is too difficult, renunciation too hard; win the fortune of devotion through the company of saints. Austerities are beyond our reach, the knowledge of Brahman eludes us; make the stories of Krishna your easy stairway.

Says Tuka, the saints have revealed this secret, and there is no greater peace than this.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The web of illusion snaps, the ocean of worldly life breaks apart, if you take up the Name of Hari with longing. In this dark age, tell me, who has crossed over by other rites and duties alone? You cannot master the Vedas, the scriptures are beyond you; then learn the songs of the Name. You cannot do yoga, you cannot manage renunciation; win the good fortune of devotion through the company of saints. Ritual is not for you, the knowledge of Brahman escapes you; make the stories of Krishna your easy stairway. Tuka says: the saints have shown this secret; there is no rest greater than this.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is clearing away every harder path so the simplest one stands alone. He names what most people honestly cannot do in this age, master the Vedas, hold to yoga, sustain renunciation, perform ritual, grasp the knowledge of Brahman, and grants that each is out of reach. In place of all of it he sets one accessible thing: take up Hari's Name with longing, sing it, keep the company of saints, make Krishna's stories the stairway. The point is not that the Name is a lesser substitute but that it is the secret the saints themselves revealed, and the only resting place that actually holds.

GATHA 3104 The Moral Ideal

Moral warning, the greedy judge

मराठी मूळ

लोभावरी ठेवुनि हेत । करी असत्य न्याय नीत॥1॥
त्याच्या पूर्वजां पतन । नरकीं किडे होती जाण ॥ध्रु.॥
कोटिगोहत्यापातक। त्यासी घडेल निष्टंक ॥2॥
मासां श्रवे जे सुंदरा । पाजी विटाळ पितरां ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे ऐसियासी । यम गांजील सायासी ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He who sets his mind on greed and renders false judgments as though they were fair, know that his ancestors fall into hell and become worms there. The sin of a million cow-slaughters clings to him without a doubt.

The one who listens to the praises of a wicked beauty feeds pollution to his forefathers. Says Tuka, Yama will torment such a person with great severity.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The man who fixes his heart on greed and twists false rulings to look like fair justice, know this: his ancestors fall, and become worms in hell. The sin of a million cow-slaughters fastens on him beyond all doubt. He who delights in the praises of a wicked beauty feeds defilement to his forefathers. Tuka says: Yama will torment such a man with hard labor.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming a specific corruption, the official or judge who serves his own greed and dresses injustice up as fairness. He drives home the weight of it with the harshest measures his world knew: ancestors dragged down to become worms, the guilt of a million cow-slaughters, the pollution of one's own forefathers. The warning is aimed at the pattern of selling justice for gain, not at any one person; it asks the listener to examine where greed is quietly bending his own sense of right. The closing line places the reckoning with Yama, the lord of death's justice, where no bribe reaches.

GATHA 3105 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, wake before Time takes you

मराठी मूळ

देह जाईल जाईल । यासी काळ बा खाईल ॥1॥
कां रे नुमजसी दगडा । कैचे हत्ती घोडे वाडा ॥ध्रु.॥
लोडें बालिस्तें सुपती । जरा आलिया फजिती ॥2॥
शरीरसंबंधाचें नातें । भोरडए बुडविती सेतातें ॥3॥
अझुनि तरी होई जागा । तुका ह्मणे पुढें दगा॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This body will perish, it will surely perish; Time will devour it. Why do you not understand, O stone-minded one? How long will your elephants, horses, and mansions last? Your soft pillows and cushions will bring only disgrace when old age arrives.

The bonds of bodily relations are like floods that sweep away the very bridge they stand upon. Says Tuka, wake up at least now, for treachery lies ahead.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This body will go, it will surely go; Time will eat it. Why do you not understand, O stone-headed one? Where will your elephants, your horses, your mansions be? Your soft pillows and cushions will only shame you when old age comes. The bonds of bodily kin are floods that drown the very field they water. Tuka says: wake up even now, for treachery lies ahead.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is shaking a complacent listener awake by holding the fact of death right up to his face. The body is already promised to Time, so the wealth he counts on, elephants, horses, mansions, soft bedding, will not stand by him; in old age it turns to disgrace. He warns that family bonds are not the safety they seem: like a flood that overruns the field it was meant to nourish, they can sweep a person away. The plea is urgent and present, wake up now, because the comfort ahead is a trap, and the time to turn is not later but already passing.

GATHA 3106 Longing and Separation

Longing, the cry at the last hour

मराठी मूळ

मागें बहुतां जनां राखिलें आडणी । धांवसी निर्वाणी नाम घेतां ॥1॥
ऐसें ठावें जालें मज बरव्या परी । ह्मणऊनि करीं धांवा तुझा ॥ध्रु.॥
माझेविशीं तुज पडिला विसरु । आतां काय करूं पांडुरंगा ॥2॥
अझुनि कां नये तुह्मासी करुणा । दुरि नारायणा धरिलें मज ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे जीव जाऊं पाहे माझा । आतां केशीराजा घालीं उडी ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the past You have sheltered many, rushing to their aid when they called Your Name at the final hour. I have learned this well, and therefore I cry out to You.

Have You forgotten me, O Panduranga? What am I to do now? Why does compassion not yet stir in You, O Narayana? Why have You kept me at a distance? Says Tuka, my very life is leaving me; O Lord of Keshi, take the plunge and save me now.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the past you have saved many at the edge of ruin; you come running when they call your Name in their last extremity. I have come to know this well, and so I cry out to you. Have you forgotten me? What am I to do now, Panduranga? Why does no pity stir in you yet? You have kept me far off, Narayana. Tuka says: my very life is slipping away; now, O Lord of Keshi, leap in and save me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays out of his own desperation by holding up God's own track record. He recalls how God has rushed to others at their final, hopeless hour the moment they called the Name, and uses that known mercy as the ground of his plea. Then he names his own bewilderment: he is calling, yet feels forgotten, kept at a distance, met with no answering pity. The cry sharpens to the breaking point, his life is leaving him, so he begs Panduranga not to deliberate but to leap in at once, as the savior he is famed to be.

GATHA 3107 Longing and Separation

Longing, the despair of being forgotten

मराठी मूळ

कळलें माझा तुज नव्हे रे आठव । काय काज जीव ठेवूं आतां ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे माझी मांडिली निरास । करितों जीवा नास तुजसाटीं ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I see now that You have no thought of me. What use then is it to keep this life? What will You do with my accumulated fate? Cursed is this living, O Ananta.

I stayed on, hoping in Your reputation as the Purifier of the Fallen, having heard the fame of Your glory. Now who will accept me? I see that You have become heartless.

Says Tuka, I am driven to despair. I will give up my very life for Your sake.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I see now that you hold no memory of me. Then what use is it to keep this life? What will you do with all my stored-up fate? Cursed is this living, O Ananta. I stayed on, hoping in your name as the Purifier of the Fallen, having heard the fame of your glory. Now who will take me in? I see you have turned hard. Tuka says: I am brought to utter despair; I will give up my life for your sake.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pushes his complaint to its sharpest edge: if God keeps no thought of him, then living itself has lost its point. He had clung to one hope, the famous title Purifier of the Fallen, and stayed alive on the strength of that reputation; now that hope seems to mock him. The accusation that God has turned heartless is not unbelief but the protest of a love that feels abandoned. The vow to give up his life is meant to be heard by the beloved as a final, desperate appeal, a way of laying the whole weight of the relationship at God's feet.

GATHA 3108 Longing and Separation

Longing, holding God to his word

मराठी मूळ

तरि कां मागें वांयां कीर्ती वाढविली । जनांत आपुली िब्रदावळी ॥1॥
साच करितां आतां फिरसी माघारा । ठायींचें दातारा नेणवेचि ॥ध्रु.॥
संतांसी श्रीमुख कैसें दाखविसी । पुढें मात त्यांसी सांगईन ॥2॥

तुका ह्मणे आधीं राहिलों मरोनि । तूं कां होसी धनी निमित्याचा ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Then why did You spread Your fame throughout the world for nothing? Why did You trumpet Your own pledges among the people? When it comes to making good on Your word, You turn away, O benefactor; one cannot fathom Your true nature. How will You face the saints? I will speak of this matter to them.

I will proclaim abroad that You are no true protector of the helpless. Says Tuka, I would rather have died before all this; why do You take ownership of causes You will not fulfill?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Then why did you spread your fame through the world for nothing? Why did you proclaim your own pledges among the people? When it is time to make them good, you turn back, O giver; your true nature cannot be known. How will you show your face to the saints? I will tell them of this. I will beat the drum and announce your Name abroad: this one is no true Lord of the helpless. Tuka says: I would sooner have died first; why do you take ownership of a cause you will not carry out?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is doing something daring: holding God to his own advertised promises. If God let his fame as rescuer of the helpless spread everywhere, then turning away now makes that fame a lie. The threat to expose this to the saints and to proclaim it abroad is the language of a devotee who feels his trust was solicited and then betrayed. Underneath the bold accusation is a plea: by warning that he will publish God's failure, he is really begging God to keep faith and not let the relationship end in shame.

GATHA 3109 Longing and Separation

Longing, where is such a rule

मराठी मूळ

आह्मी तुझ्या दासीं । जरि जावें पतनासी ॥1॥
तरि हें दिसे विपरीत । कोठें बोलिली हे नीत ॥ध्रु.॥
तुझें नाम कंठीं । आह्मां संसार आटी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे काळ । करी आह्मांसी विटाळ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If we, who are Your servants, are allowed to fall into ruin, then something is truly amiss. Where has such a rule ever been spoken? Your Name is on our lips, yet worldly life torments us.

Says Tuka, even Death will not come near us, yet troubles come all the same.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We are your servants. If we are still to fall to ruin, then something here is plainly wrong. Where has such a rule ever been spoken? Your Name is on our throats, yet worldly life grinds us down. Tuka says: even Death keeps its distance from us, yet defilement still touches us.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses a simple, almost legal objection: a master does not let his own servants fall to ruin, so if that is happening, the order of things has been broken. He insists no scripture or settled rule supports such an outcome. The grievance is concrete, the Name is constantly on their lips, yet worldly life keeps grinding them down, and even though death itself holds back, trouble still soils them. The whole abhanga is a servant's appeal, reminding the Lord that the bond of belonging carries an obligation he expects to be honored.

GATHA 3110 Longing and Separation

Longing, the Name put to shame

मराठी मूळ

लाजती पुराणें । वेदां येऊं पाहे उणें ॥1॥
आह्मी नामाचे धारक । किविलवाणीं दिसों रंक ॥ध्रु.॥
बोलिले ते संतीं । बोल वायांविण जाती ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे देवा । रोकडी हे मोडे सेवा॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The Puranas are put to shame, the Vedas seem diminished. We who bear the Name appear pitiable and poor.

The words the saints have spoken seem to go in vain. Says Tuka, O God, this living devotion is being broken before our very eyes.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The Puranas are put to shame; the Vedas look diminished. We who bear the Name appear pitiful and poor. The words the saints once spoke seem to go to waste. Tuka says: O God, this living devotion is breaking before our eyes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram protests that the bhakta's hardship does not just hurt him; it discredits the whole tradition. If those who carry the Name end up looking pitiful and poor, then the Puranas and Vedas that promised refuge seem shamed, and the saints' assurances seem spoken in vain. The complaint is on behalf of the path itself: the credibility of devotion is at stake in how the devotee fares. By saying the living devotion is breaking before everyone's eyes, he is urging God to act so that faith is vindicated rather than mocked.

GATHA 3111 The Moral Ideal

Moderation, the inner sign of peace

मराठी मूळ

आहारनिद्रे न लगे आदर । आपण सादर ते चि होय॥1॥
परमितेविण बोलणें ते वांयां । फार थोडें काया पिंड पीडी ॥ध्रु.॥
समाधान त्याचें तो चि एक जाणे । आपुलिये खुणे पावोनियां ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे होय पीडा ते न करीं । मग राहें परी भलतिये ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Food and sleep need no invitation; they come of their own accord. Speech without measure is wasted; too much or too little only afflicts the body.

Only one who attains true contentment knows it, having reached his own inner sign. Says Tuka, do not do what causes suffering; then remain in whatever way suits you.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Food and sleep ask for no invitation. They come on their own. Speech without measure is wasted. Too much or too little only hurts the body. Only the one who has true contentment knows it. He reaches his own inner sign and knows. Tuka says: do not do what brings suffering. Then live in whatever way suits you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is drawing a simple rule for the body and the tongue. Appetite and sleep look after themselves, so they need no fussing over; speech is the one thing to keep measured, since too much or too little of it only wears you down. Real peace is not something another can certify for you: you know it from your own inner sign, the felt mark that you have arrived. From that he frees the seeker: avoid only what actually causes harm, and beyond that you are at liberty to live as suits you.

GATHA 3112 The Nature of God

Nondual vision, the impurity is desire

मराठी मूळ

भूमि अवघी शुद्ध जाणा । अमंगळ हे वासना ॥1॥
तैसे वोसपले जीव । सांडी नसतां अंगीं घाव ॥ध्रु.॥
जीव अवघे देव । खोटा नागवी संदेह ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे शुद्ध । मग तुटलिया भेद ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Know that all earth is pure; it is desire that is impure. Likewise, beings cry out in anguish, carrying wounds that are not truly there.

All jivas are God; it is false doubt that deceives and strips them bare. Says Tuka, once differences are dissolved, all becomes pure.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Know this: all the earth is pure. It is desire that is impure. So too the living cry out in pain, carrying wounds that are not really there. All jivas are God. It is false doubt that robs them and leaves them bare. Tuka says: it is pure. Once the difference breaks, it is pure.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram locates impurity not in the world but in the wanting mind. The ground itself is clean; it is vasana, craving, that stains. In the same way beings groan over wounds that have no real existence, suffering a hurt their own seeing has invented. He states the radical claim plainly: every jiva is God, and only false doubt deceives a being into feeling stripped and lost. When the sense of difference dissolves, what is left is the purity that was always there.

GATHA 3113 The Nature of God

Letting go of mine and yours, true purity

मराठी मूळ

सरतें माझें तुझें । तरि हें उतरतें ओझें ॥1॥
न लगे सांडावें मांडावें । आहे शुद्ध चि स्वभावें ॥ध्रु.॥
घातला तो आशा। मोहोजाळें गळां फासा ॥2॥
सुखदुःखाचा तो मान । नाहीं दुःखाचा तो शीण ॥3॥
करितां नारायण । एवढें वेचितां वचन ॥4॥
लाभ हानि हे समान । तैसा मान अपमान ॥5॥
तुका ह्मणे याचें । नांव सोंवळें साचें ॥6॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the distinction of mine and yours dissolves, the burden falls away. Nothing need be taken up or set down; by nature all is already pure.

It is longing and the snare of illusion that have placed this noose around our necks. Where there is no pride of pleasure or measure of pain, there is no suffering either.

By simply uttering the name Narayana, spending only the coin of speech, gain and loss become equal, as do honor and dishonor. Says Tuka, the name of this state is true purity.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When mine and yours end, the load comes down off you. Nothing must be taken up or set down. By its own nature it is already pure. It is longing that put the noose on us. The snare of attachment is around the neck. Where there is no pride in pleasure, no reckoning of pain, there is no weariness of pain either. Just say Narayana. Spend only that much, the coin of a word. Then gain and loss are the same. Honor and dishonor are the same. Tuka says: the name of this is true purity.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names the one knot and the one release. The weight we carry is the dividing of the world into mine and yours; let that fall and the burden falls with it, for nothing needs to be grasped or renounced when things are already pure by their own nature. What tightens the noose is longing and the snare of attachment, the very mohajala that hangs at our throats. Once you stop totting up pleasure as gain and pain as loss, the ache of suffering loses its grip, and gain and loss, honor and dishonor, come out even. The whole turn costs only one thing, the uttering of the name Narayana; that state, he says, is what truly deserves to be called pure.

GATHA 3114 The Nature of God

God's sport, the secret none can grasp

मराठी मूळ

तुज करितां होती ऐसे । मूढ चतुर पंडित पिसे॥1॥

उलंघितें पांगुळ गिरी । मुकें करी अनुवाद ॥2॥
पापी होय पुण्यवंत । न करी घात दुर्जन ॥3॥
अवघें हेळामात्रें हरि । मुक्त करी ब्रह्मांड॥4॥
तुका ह्मणे खेळे लीळा । पाहे वेगळा व्यापूनि ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By Your doing, the foolish become wise, the learned go mad. Yet none knows the secret; all must endure their share of suffering.

At Your will the lame scale mountains, the mute become eloquent. The wrongdoer becomes virtuous, the wicked ceases to harm.

In a single effortless gesture, Hari can liberate the entire universe. Says Tuka, He plays His divine sport, pervading everything yet watching from beyond.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By your doing it happens: the fool turns clever, the learned man goes mad. Yet no one knows the secret of it. They go on suffering, mine after mine of pain. At your will the lame man crosses mountains. The mute man holds forth in speech. The sinner becomes full of merit. The wicked one stops doing harm. With a single careless touch, Hari can free the whole universe. Tuka says: he plays his sport. He pervades it all, yet watches apart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is marveling that every reversal in the world traces back to one hand. By God's doing the dull turn wise and the clever lose their minds, and yet the secret of why stays hidden, so people keep digging their own mines of suffering. He piles up the impossibilities God grants at will: the lame crossing mountains, the mute speaking, the sinner made virtuous, the cruel laying down their cruelty. For Hari to liberate the entire cosmos costs no more than an offhand gesture. The poem ends in awe at a Lord who is both inside everything, pervading it as its play, and standing apart from it as the one who watches.

GATHA 3115 Appeals and Exhortations

The Name as wealth, three syllables

मराठी मूळ

पिकवावें धन । ज्याची आस करी जन ॥1॥
पुरोनि उरे खातां देतां । नव्हे खंडन मवितां ॥ध्रु.॥
खोलीं पडे ओली बीज। तरीं च हाता लागे निज ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे धणी । विठ्ठल अक्षरें या तिन्ही ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Cultivate the wealth that everyone longs for, wealth that remains abundant no matter how much is given or spent, that never diminishes or decays. When a seed falls into moist earth, only then does the true harvest come to hand.

Says Tuka, the master of all this is Vitthal, contained in those three sacred syllables.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Grow the wealth that everyone longs for. It stays full as you eat from it and give it away. It is never cut short, however much you measure out. When the moist seed falls deep into the ground, only then does your own harvest come to your hand. Tuka says: the master of it is Vitthal, those three syllables.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram offers a crop worth raising: the one wealth everybody secretly wants. Unlike money, it grows fuller the more you spend and share, and no measuring ever diminishes it. He gives the farmer's image: the seed must fall deep into moist earth before any true harvest reaches your own hand, so the Name must be sown inwardly, not held on the surface. The whole treasure, he says, is owned by Vitthal, held in those three sacred syllables of the name itself.

GATHA 3116 The Nature of God

Complaint to the player God, drop the games

मराठी मूळ

करिसी लाघवें । तूं हें खेळसी आघवें ॥1॥

येथें भुतें यावें । दावूं लपों ही जाणावें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे हो श्रीपती । आतां चाळवाल किती॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You play all these games with Your wondrous skill. Ego stands in the way, leading us and the whole world astray.

Spirits must come here, and You must know how to both reveal and conceal Yourself. Says Tuka, O Lord, how long will You keep toying with us?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You do it by sleight of hand. You play this whole thing as a game. Ego stands in the way. It trips up us and the whole world. Beings have to come here. You know how to show yourself and how to hide. Tuka says: O Shripati, how much longer will you keep toying with us?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram half complains, half pleads with a God who runs the world like a conjuror. The whole show is divine play, but the trap inside it is ego, which trips up the poet and everyone else. Souls are made to come and take birth here, while the Lord keeps the trick of revealing and concealing himself at will. The poem ends with affectionate impatience: O Shripati, how long do you mean to go on playing with us before you let us see you plainly?

GATHA 3117 Prayers

Plea to be saved, do as good people do

मराठी मूळ

घालिती पव्हया । वाटे अनाथाच्या दया ॥1॥
तैसें कां हें नये करूं । पांडुरंगा आह्मां तारूं ॥ध्रु.॥
रोगियासी काढा । देउनि वारितील पीडा ॥2॥
बुडत्यासाटीं उडी । घालितील कां हे जोडी ॥3॥
सारितील कांटे । पुढें मागिलांचे वाटे ॥4॥
तुका ह्मणे भार । घेती भागल्यांचा फार ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

People offer food to the hungry and show compassion for the destitute. Why then, O Panduranga, can You not do the same and ferry us across? They give medicine to the sick and relieve their pain.

They leap into the water to save the drowning. They clear thorns from the path for those who follow behind.

Says Tuka, they carry the heavy loads of the weary; why do You not do likewise?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

People set out drinking water for travelers. They feel pity for the helpless. Why can you not do the same, Panduranga, and ferry us across? They give the sick man his medicine and take away his pain. They jump in to save the drowning. Will you not earn that same merit? They clear the thorns from the path ahead for those who come behind. Tuka says: they take up the heavy loads of the worn-out and weary.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses God by holding up ordinary human kindness as the standard. People set out water for travelers, pity the helpless, dose the sick, dive in after the drowning, clear thorns from the road for those who follow, and shoulder the burdens of the exhausted. Each example is a gentle accusation: if mere people do this much for one another, why does Panduranga not do as much for the one crying to be ferried across the ocean of worldly life? The prayer turns God's own compassion into a debt he is being asked, lovingly, to honor.

GATHA 3118 The Necessity of Experience

Lived experience over hollow words

मराठी मूळ

नका दंतकथा येथें सांगों कोणी । कोरडे ते मानी बोल कोण ॥1॥
अनुभव येथें व्हावा शिष्टाचार । न चलती चार आह्मांपुढें ॥ध्रु.॥
निवडी वेगळें क्षीर आणि पाणी । राजहंस दोन्ही वेगळालीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे येथें पाहिजे जातीचें । येरा गाबाळाचें काय काम॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let no one come here telling stale stories. Who values dry and hollow words? What is needed here is lived experience and right conduct; mere cleverness does not pass muster before us.

The royal swan separates milk from water, telling the two apart. Says Tuka, only those of true substance are welcome here; what use is mere chaff?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let no one come here telling old hand-me-down tales. Who values dry words? What is asked here is experience and right conduct. Clever talk does not pass before us. The royal swan picks them apart, the milk and the water. It keeps the two separate. Tuka says: here you must be of the true breed. What use is the rest, the worthless chaff?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets a hard door at the entrance to the spiritual life. Borrowed stories and dry, hollow words count for nothing here; what is demanded is anubhava, what you have actually lived, joined to right conduct. Mere cleverness does not pass the test. He uses the old image of the royal swan that can separate milk from water, the genuine from the diluted. Only those of the true breed belong in this company; the rest is chaff. The sharpness is aimed at the pretense of secondhand wisdom, and so at one's own temptation to talk instead of live it.

GATHA 3119 Faith and Trust

Faith, Narayana stands ready

मराठी मूळ

न करि त्याचें गांढेपण । नारायण सिद्ध उभा ॥1॥
भवसिंधूचा थडवा केला । बोलाविला पाहिजे ॥ध्रु.॥
याचे सोई पाउल वेचे । मग कैचे आडथळे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे खरें खोटें । न ह्मणे मोटें लहान ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

No weakness can prevail when Narayana Himself stands ready. He has bridged the ocean of worldly life; one need only call upon Him.

Once you walk in His footsteps, all obstacles vanish. Says Tuka, He does not judge true or false, great or small.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not be weak about it. Narayana stands ready, right there. He has bridged the ocean of worldly life. You only have to call him. Once you walk in step with him, where can any obstacle stand? Tuka says: he does not weigh true against false, nor large against small.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells the seeker to drop all faintheartedness, because the help is already in place: Narayana stands ready and has built the bridge across the ocean of birth and death. Nothing more is required than to call on him. Walk in his footsteps and obstacles simply lose their footing. The last line is the consolation that opens the door wide: God does not sort people into true or false, great or small, before he saves them, so no one is too flawed or too small to be received.

GATHA 3120 The Power of the Name

The Name, do not let the mind sit idle

मराठी मूळ

रिकामें तूं नको मना । राहों क्षणक्षणा ही ॥1॥
वेळोवेळां पारायण । नारायण हें करीं ॥ध्रु.॥
भ्रमणांच्या मोडीं वाटा। न भरें फाटा आडरानें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे माझ्या जीवें । हें चि घ्यावें धणीवरी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O mind, do not remain idle even for a single moment. Again and again, recite the name of Narayana.

Break off the paths of wandering; do not stray into the wild thickets. Says Tuka, my jiva desires nothing else; take this Name until you are fully satisfied.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O mind, do not stay empty. Do not rest idle, even for a moment. Again and again make your reading; say Narayana, Narayana. Break off the roads of wandering. Do not turn down the side-paths into the wild brush. Tuka says: with my whole life this is all I would take, and take it till I am full.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is instructing his own restless mind. He forbids it the smallest idle moment, because emptiness is where wandering begins. The remedy is constant parayana, repeating the name Narayana over and over until it fills the time the mind would otherwise squander. He tells the mind to break off its habitual roads and not stray onto the side-paths that lead into the wild thickets of distraction. For himself he wants nothing else: only to take this Name, with his whole being, until he is wholly satisfied.

GATHA 3121 Confession and Sin

Confession, the self-made noose

मराठी मूळ

पंचभूतांचिये सांपडलों संदीं । घातलोंसे बंदीं अहंकारें॥1॥
आपल्या आपण बांधविला गळा । नेणें चि निराळा असतां हो ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे आतां देह देऊं बळी । करुनि सांडूं होळी संचिताची ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am caught in the trap of the five elements, imprisoned by my own ego. I have tied the noose around my own neck, not realizing that I was always free.

Why did I take this worldly life to be real? Why did I cling to mine and thine? Why did I not surrender to Narayana? Why did I not restrain my desires? For the sake of a little pleasure I brought great ruin upon myself. Says Tuka, now I shall offer this body as a sacrifice and burn away my accumulated karma.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am caught in the cleft of the five elements. Ego has thrown me into prison. With my own hands I tied the noose on my neck, not knowing that I stood apart all along, untouched. Why did I count this worldly life as real? Why did I keep saying mine, mine? Why did I not go to Narayana for refuge? Why did I not hold my craving back? For a little pleasure I brought great ruin on what was coming. Tuka says: now I will give this body as the offering. I will make a bonfire of my stored-up karma.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a full confession of how the trap was self-built. The five elements hold him in their cleft, but it is his own ego that locked the prison and his own hands that tied the noose, while all along he was the separate, untouched witness and never knew it. He pours out the questions of remorse: why he treated the passing world as real, clung to mine and thine, never took refuge in Narayana, never reined in his cravings. The whole ruin came of chasing a scrap of pleasure. The poem turns at the end into resolve: he will offer the body itself as sacrifice and burn his whole hoard of accumulated karma to ash.

GATHA 3122 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, all beings have become God

मराठी मूळ

देव जाले अवघे जन । माझे गुण दोष हारपले ॥1॥
बरवें जालें बरवें जालें । चित्त धालें महालाभें ॥ध्रु.॥
दर्पणीचें दुसरें भासे । परि तें असे एक तें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे सिंधुभेटी । उदका तुटी वाहाळासी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All people have become God to me; my own merits and faults have vanished. How wonderful, how wonderful! My chitta is full with this supreme gain.

What appears as a second image in a mirror is in truth the same one. Says Tuka, when the stream meets the ocean, there is no more separation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

All people have become God to me. My merits and my faults have vanished. It is well, it is well. My mind is filled full with the great gain. In a mirror a second thing seems to be there. But that thing is only the one. Tuka says: when the river meets the ocean, the water of the stream is cut off no more.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is reporting a moment of breakthrough. The dividing line between self and others has dropped: everyone he looks at has become God, and with that his own ledger of virtues and faults simply disappears. He repeats his joy that the mind is now full, sated by a supreme gain. The mirror gives him his image for it: what looks like a second thing reflected back is in truth the one and only. And the river running into the sea gives the last image, where the stream loses its separateness and the parting of its water from the ocean is over.

GATHA 3123 Worldly Metaphors

The Name, taste ever new

मराठी मूळ

बहुत प्रकार परि ते गव्हाचे । जिव्हा नाचे आवडी॥1॥
सरलें परि आवडी नवी । सिंधु दावी तरंग ॥ध्रु.॥
घेतलें घ्यावें वेळोवेळां । माय बाळा न विसंबे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे रस राहिला वचनीं । तो चि पडताळूनि सेवीतसें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Wheat appears in many forms, yet the tongue delights in each one. The taste is complete, yet the appetite is ever new, just as the ocean displays fresh waves.

What has already been received must be taken again and again; a mother never tires of her child. Says Tuka, the nectar remains in the words; I savor them by testing their truth over and over.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wheat comes in many forms, and the tongue delights in every one. The taste is complete, yet the hunger for it is always new, the way the ocean keeps showing fresh waves. What I have taken, I must take again and again. A mother never tires of her child. Tuka says: the nectar stays in the words; I keep tasting it by testing its truth over and over.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing why the Name and the words of God never grow stale. Wheat can be cooked a hundred ways and the tongue loves each, and that is his picture for the divine word: fully satisfying, yet leaving the appetite renewed, like an ocean that never stops sending new waves. He compares the longing to a mother's love for her child, which does not wear out with repetition. The point he lands is that the nectar lives inside the words themselves, and he draws it out not by hearing them once but by returning to them and proving their truth again and again.

GATHA 3124 The Saints

Saints as true kin

मराठी मूळ

आह्मां सोइरे हरिजन । जनीं भाग्य निकंचन ॥1॥
ज्याच्या धैर्या नाहीं भंग । भाव एकविध रंग ॥ध्रु.॥
भुके तान्हे चित्तीं। सदा देव आठविती ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे धन । ज्याचें वित्त नारायण ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My true kin are the people of God, those whose fortune lies beyond worldly riches. Their steadiness never breaks; their devotion is single-minded and unwavering.

Even when hungry and thirsty, they remember God always in their chitta. Says Tuka, blessed are those whose only wealth is Narayana.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The people of God are my kin. In this world their fortune is to own nothing. Their courage never breaks; their devotion is of one kind, one color. Hungry and thirsty, they keep God in mind always. Tuka says: their wealth is this, that their only riches is Narayana.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is redrawing the lines of kinship and wealth. He claims the harijans, the people of God, as his real family, and he counts their worldly poverty as their good fortune rather than a lack. What marks them is unbroken steadiness and a devotion that has only one direction. Even pressed by hunger and thirst they do not forget God, and Tukaram names the reversal plainly: the man whose entire fortune is Narayana is the truly rich man, however empty his hands look to the world.

GATHA 3125 Confession and Sin

Confession, the false servant

मराठी मूळ

ह्मणवितों दास न करितां सेवा । लंडपणें देवा पोट भरीं ॥1॥
खोटें कोठें सरे तुझे पायांपाशीं । अंतर जाणसी पांडुरंगा॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I call myself a servant but do no real service; I fill my belly through sheer idleness in Your name. Falsehood has no place at Your feet, O Panduranga; You know the innermost truth.

My conduct is corrupt and I know it myself; I speak fine words to others that are all pretense. Says Tuka, I am indeed a great offender; but You, O treasury of mercy, know me through and through.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I call myself Your servant but I do no service. Like a lazy good-for-nothing I fill my belly in Your name. Where can falsehood pass at Your feet, Panduranga? You know what is inside me. My conduct is false and I know it myself; the fine words I speak to others are all a lie. Tuka says: this is the kind of offender I am. Still, treasury of mercy, You know me through and through.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the inspection on himself and names the gap between the title he claims and the life he lives. He calls himself a servant of God but does no real service, and admits he uses God's name to feed himself in idleness. The force of the confession is that no pretense survives at Vitthal's feet, because God reads the inner self that other people cannot see. He owns that his outward fine talk is a performance and his actual conduct is corrupt, and rather than hide it he hands the whole exposed self over to the one he calls a treasury of mercy.

Moral warning, the unsteady mind

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Outward appearances are worthless when the inner being is flawed. The essential thing has been lost, even as one claims to be good.

Such a one flares up in a moment and calms down just as quickly. Says Tuka, there is no patience in him, no steady intellect.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Outward show is burnt to nothing when the inside is flawed. The thing that matters has been lost, even while one is called good. Such a person spoils in a moment and is pleased again in a moment. Tuka says: there is no patience in him, no single steady mind.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram weighs a person by what is inside, not by appearance. An impressive outward display counts for nothing if the inner being is defective, and the essential thing can be missing even in someone the world calls good. His test is steadiness: the flawed person flares into anger and then is appeased just as fast, swinging with every moment. The pattern he points to is the restless, reactive mind that has no patience and never settles into one fixed resolve, and that instability, not any outer failing, is the real defect to examine in oneself.

Devotion, the unbroken thread

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What the chitta has bound close, that dwells near; what shines in the light, shines at all times. Let the meeting take place within, so that no separation can ever occur.

For the sake of remembrance one can embrace the whole universe; it is good to keep that space within the chitta. Says Tuka, the profit lies right at home, so long as the thread of love remains unbroken.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What the mind has bound close stays near; what shines in the light shines all the time. Let that best meeting live inside me, so that no break can ever come between us. For the sake of remembering, one can hold the whole universe; it is good to keep that space inside the heart. Tuka says: the gain is right here at home, as long as the thread of love is not let go.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is teaching where the meeting with God actually happens. Whatever the mind binds close to itself stays present, and he wants that highest meeting to live within him so that no separation can ever open up. He says one can hold the entire universe in the heart for the sake of remembrance, so it is worth keeping that inner room ready. The closing turn is that nothing has to be sought far away: the whole profit is found at home, in the heart, for as long as the thread of love is never released.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My chitta has been hurt by today's events; the world has caused me great pain, O God. I do not know when You will sever this bond, but I keep my mind fixed on Your feet.

The feelings of others come and go, mixed with joy and sorrow, good and bad. Says Tuka, only if I can dwell in solitude will this web of worldly ties be destroyed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My mind is hurt by what happened today; the world has given me much pain, God. I do not know when You will cut this bond, but I remember it and keep Your feet before me. Other people's feelings keep coming and going inside me, mixed good and bad, joy and sorrow. Tuka says: only if I can live in solitude will this web of ties be destroyed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is speaking out of a wounded day and turning the wound into a prayer. The world's dealings have hurt him, and he confesses he does not know when God will sever the bond that keeps tying him to it; meanwhile he holds Vitthal's feet in mind as his anchor. He names the source of the disturbance: other people's moods and affairs keep entering him, dragging in their mixture of pleasure and pain. The conclusion he reaches is that the only thing that will finally break this web of worldly attachment is dwelling in solitude with God.

Destiny, the thread in Vitthal's hand

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Some rich men are deaf and blind; some bear white leprosy or dark afflictions upon their bodies. The ways of destiny are inscrutable and strange; the thread of it all is in Vitthal's hands.

How many more diseases shall I name? They cling to people without end. Says Tuka, such is the gift of past karma; it gives one the means to enjoy, yet denies all happiness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One rich man is deaf, another blind; some carry white leprosy, some dark disease in the body. The course of past karma is strange and cannot be read; the thread of it is in Vithoba's hands. How many more names of diseases can I count? They cling to people without end. Tuka says: this is the gift of ruined karma; it gives you the means to enjoy, yet gives you no happiness.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at how fortune and suffering are spread out among people and refuses to make it tidy. Wealth and affliction land together: a rich man may be deaf, blind, or diseased, and the workings of accumulated karma are too strange to decode. He places the whole control beyond human reach, in Vitthal's hands. The hard truth he lands is about prarabdha, the karma now ripening: it can hand a person every means to enjoy life and still withhold the actual happiness, so outward provision is no proof of inward peace, and the only steadying point is that the thread is held by God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The lock of discrimination and non-discrimination cannot be opened by force. Remember Narayana now.

By this one practice, everything falls into place, through devotion and the name of the Imperishable One. Whirlpools, raging currents, and thieves lurk along the path, ambushing travelers near the border.

Says Tuka, without sincere devotion there is no crossing over; this is the essential truth.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The lock of difference and no-difference will not open by forcing it. Remember Narayana now. By this one thing everything is set right, through the name and the love of Achyuta, the One who does not fall. Whirlpools, rushing waters, and thieves wait along the path and strike travelers near the border. Tuka says: here there is no crossing without true devotion; this is the heart of it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets aside the philosophical quarrel over whether the soul is the same as or different from God; he says that lock cannot be forced open by argument and tells you instead to remember Narayana right now. He claims that this single practice, the name and love of the imperishable Achyuta, quietly puts everything in order. He pictures the spiritual path as a dangerous river crossing, full of whirlpools, currents, and bandits who ambush travelers just at the boundary. The settled conclusion is that no one crosses this river by cleverness; only sincere devotion gets you over, and that is the essential point.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who sing the songs of Vitthal without ceasing, I will place my chitta at their feet. Those who love the Name of Vitthal are my dearest friends and companions.

Those whose eyes delight in seeing Vitthal, I will accept the dust of their feet. Those who have surrendered everything to Vitthal, I will beg for a place at their feet.

Says Tuka, let me become the dust of their feet, those who are called the servants of Hari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those who sing Vitthal's song without stopping, at their feet I will set my mind. Those who love the Name of Vitthal are my dearest friends, dear as my life. Those whose eyes delight in seeing Vitthal, I will take the water that has washed their feet. Those who have given their whole heart to Vitthal, I will beg for a place at their feet. Tuka says: let me become the dust at the feet of those who are called the servants of Hari.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pours out his love not at God directly but at God's devotees, and ranks them as the people who matter most to him. Those who never stop singing of Vitthal, who love the Name, whose eyes feast on Vitthal, who have surrendered everything to him: these he calls his dearest companions, closer than life. He lowers himself before them with deliberate humility, asking to set his mind at their feet, to accept even the water that washed their feet, and to beg for a place there. The final wish is the smallest one possible, to become the dust at the feet of those known as the servants of Hari, treating nearness to the devotees as the highest thing he could want.

GATHA 3132 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, devotion over debate

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let all debate about difference and non-difference be set aside. Attain the supreme bliss through single-pointed devotion.

Life is slipping away moment by moment; reflect upon your true welfare without delay. Says Tuka, sincere devotion is the only means; pride and pretense bring nothing but ruin.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let that quarrel about difference and no-difference be set aside. Reach the supreme bliss by single-hearted devotion. Life is leaving, slipping out hand over hand; think about your own good, and quickly. Tuka says: heartfelt devotion is what does it; pride and pretense only strip you bare.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram waves off the endless debate over whether soul and God are one or two and points to the practical aim: the supreme bliss, reached by undivided devotion rather than argument. He presses the urgency by reminding you that life is running out moment by moment, so attending to your true welfare cannot wait. The contrast he draws is sharp: sincere devotion is the one effective means, while pride and outward show, far from adorning you, leave you exposed and ruined. The warning points at the temptation to mistake clever religious display for the real surrender.

GATHA 3133 Krishna Leela

Krishna, caught and never let go

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The Son of Devaki has done this through His own contemplation. He has driven me mad with longing, making me His very own.

He enchanted the cowherd boys and drew them into His play. Says Tuka, once He enters your company, He can never be made distant again.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The Son of Devaki did this by thinking of me. He made me His own, fastening a madness onto my mind. He fixed His play upon the cowherds and the cowherd boys and drew them in. Tuka says: once He keeps your company, He does not then go far away.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes being claimed by Krishna as something Krishna himself begins. The Son of Devaki turned his attention toward Tukaram and made him his own, planting a kind of glad madness in his mind so that the longing is not even self-chosen. He recalls how the same Krishna once drew the cowherds and gopas into his play, as a sign of how he captures those he loves. The reassurance Tukaram lands on is that this is not a passing visit: once Krishna takes up company with you, he does not afterward withdraw to a distance.

GATHA 3134 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, content with the form

मराठी मूळ

माझिया जीवासी हे चि पैं विश्रांति । तुझे पाय चित्तीं पांडुरंगा ॥1॥
भांडवल गांठी आलें सपुरतें । समाधान चित्तें मानियेलें ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This alone is the rest my jiva seeks: Your feet held in my chitta, O Panduranga. The modest capital I possess is enough; my mind has accepted this contentment.

I have spread out my wares in abundant utterance, loading them with the love of Your form. Says Tuka, I have a taste for devotion; I have no impatience for formless union.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For my life this alone is rest: Your feet held in my mind, Panduranga. The little capital in my purse has turned out to be enough; my mind has settled into contentment. With abundant chanting I have spread out my wares, loading them with love for Your form. Tuka says: I have a taste for devotion; I am in no hurry for formless union.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names where his soul finds rest and declares himself satisfied with little. The one resting place for his life is Vitthal's feet held in the heart, and he says the modest spiritual capital he has is enough, so his mind has accepted contentment instead of craving more. He pictures his practice as a merchant spreading out goods, his abundant chanting offered up and loaded with love for God's visible form. The deliberate closing choice is that he prefers devotion to the beloved form over the formless absolute, and feels no impatience to dissolve into a union without distinction; loving the Lord with a face is what he wants.

GATHA 3135 Surrender and Acceptance

Single-minded surrender, the inner witness

मराठी मूळ

एकविध आह्मी न धरुं पालट । न संडूं ते वाट सांपडली ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am single-minded; I will not waver or leave the path I have found. Therefore, watch over me; my only strength of intellect rests at Your feet.

I cannot express all that I feel in words; the inner distance between us is itself the witness. Says Tuka, O life of all lives, You alone, O Narayana, are my witness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am of one mind. I will not change. I will not leave the path I have found. So watch over me. All the strength of my mind is in your feet. I cannot tell it all in words. The inner space between us is itself the proof. Tuka says: O life of all that lives, you alone, Narayana, are my witness.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pledges a fixed devotion and asks for nothing but protection in return. He has found the way and refuses to waver or to leave it, placing all his cleverness and capacity at Vitthal's feet rather than in his own judgment. He admits the feeling cannot be put into speech: the silent distance from heart to heart is the only testimony there is. So he calls on Narayana, the life within all life, as the one who sees the love no words can carry.

GATHA 3136 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, plunging into the Name

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let my devotion remain here at Your feet. I will contemplate Your Name and not allow my mind to wander anywhere.

I will plunge deep into this nectar with all my being. Says Tuka, O God, I have staked my very life on this.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let it stay right here: my love at your feet. I will hold the Name in my thoughts. I will not let my mind go anywhere. I come into this nectar; now I sink down, completely, in every part. Tuka says: O God, I have staked my very life on it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks that his devotion be planted at the feet of the Lord and never move. The discipline is simple and total: keep the Name in mind, and refuse the mind permission to wander off anywhere else. He describes this not as duty but as nectar he is diving into, letting himself go under entirely rather than tasting it from the edge. The closing line names the stake: he has wagered his whole life on this single resting place.

GATHA 3137 Devotion to Vitthal

Belonging to the Lord, no begging elsewhere

मराठी मूळ

तैसे नहों आह्मी विठ्ठलाचे दास । यावें आणिकांस काकुलती ॥1॥
स्वामिचिया सत्ता ठेंगणें सकळ । आला किळकाळ हाताखालीं ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे आह्मां इच्छेचें खेळणें । कोड नारायणें पुरवावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We who are servants of Vitthal need not beg before anyone else. Under our Master's authority, everything stands humbled; even death itself is under His command.

We rest at His feet, surrendering all selfish longing, taking pride only in belonging to Him. Says Tuka, we are His playthings; let Narayana fulfill our every wish.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We are not like that. We are servants of Vitthal. We need not go begging to anyone else. Under our Master's rule everything is brought low; even death has come under his hand. The marked servant has his pride, O God: I give up all craving and stay at your feet. Tuka says: we are playthings of his will. Let Narayana grant us our heart's wish.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts the servant of Vitthal with those who must plead before lesser powers. Because his Master rules over all, every threat is humbled and even death itself falls under that hand, so there is no one else worth begging from. The only pride he keeps is the pride of being branded as the Lord's own; the price of it is surrendering every selfish longing and simply staying at the feet. He ends by handing over even his wishes, content to be a toy of God's will and trusting Narayana to fulfill the rest.

GATHA 3138 The Nature of God

Warning, liberation is no commodity

मराठी मूळ

मोक्ष देवापाशीं नाहीं । लटिक्या घाई विळवतें॥1॥
काय खरें न धरी शुद्धी । गेली बुद्धी भ्रमलें ॥ध्रु.॥
अहंकारास उरलें काई । पांचांठायीं हें वांटे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कुंथे भारें । लटिकें खरें मानुनियां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Liberation does not reside with God as some commodity. Why do you pursue empty illusions? Why do you not hold fast to what is real? Your intellect has gone astray.

What remains of the ego? It is divided among the five elements. Says Tuka, one strains under a burden, having taken the false to be true.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Liberation does not sit beside God like a thing to be had. You wear yourself out chasing a lie. Why will you not hold to what is real? Your sense is gone; your mind has lost its way. What is left of this ego of yours? It is shared out among the five elements. Tuka says: he groans under the load, taking the false to be true.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks the idea that liberation is some prize stored with God, to be collected by effort. The person who hunts for it that way is exhausting himself over an illusion while ignoring what is actually real and present. He points to the body's makeup: the ego that grasps so hard is only borrowed from the five elements and will be returned to them. The whole strain comes from one mistake, treating the false as if it were true, and the way out is to stop chasing and hold to the real.

GATHA 3139 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, choose the one imperishable God

मराठी मूळ

आपला तो एक देव करुनि घ्यावा । तेणेंविण जीवा सुख नव्हे ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे एका मरणें चि सरें । उत्तम चि उरे कीतिन मागें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Make one God your own, for without Him the jiva can find no happiness. All else is illusory, a breeding ground of sorrow with no end in sight.

Make the imperishable Lord your own, and set your mind ablaze with longing for Govinda. Says Tuka, a single death settles everything; only noble fame remains behind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Make one God your own. Without him the soul finds no happiness. All other things are false, and they give birth to sorrow; from beginning to end they have no lasting hold. Make the one who never perishes your own. Set your mind mad with longing for Govinda. Tuka says: one death and it is all settled; only the good you did remains behind.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram urges a single, decisive choice: take one God as your own and stop dividing your heart. Everything else is unreal and breeds grief, with no stability at the start or the finish, so it cannot hold a soul up. The remedy is to bind yourself to the imperishable Lord and to let longing for Govinda take over the mind like a happy madness. He reminds the listener that death comes once and clears the account; what survives is not possessions but the noble life lived, so spend it on the one thing that lasts.

GATHA 3140 The Saints

Gratitude to the saints, the child adorned

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Today, O holy parents and saints, you have given me the gift of your grace. Nectar-words have flowed from your mouths, and I can never repay them in this lifetime.

Says Tuka, you generous and compassionate ones have adorned this child with love.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Today you have given me this gift of grace. You holy ones, you mothers and fathers, have given it. Words of nectar came from your mouths. I cannot repay them in this lifetime. Tuka says: you are generous, you are kind; you have dressed up this child with love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram thanks the saints as though they were his own parents, who have handed him grace this very day. What they gave was speech itself, words like nectar from their lips, and he knows a single lifetime cannot clear so large a debt. He sees their kindness as utterly free, asking nothing back. In the closing image he is a small child the elders have lovingly dressed and made beautiful, owing everything he wears to their care.

GATHA 3141 The Power of the Name

On speech, slander fills the tongue with hell

मराठी मूळ

स्तुती अथवा निंदा करावी देवाची । अधम तो वेची व्यर्थ वाणी ॥1॥
आइकोनि होती बहिर हे बोल । वेचूनि ते मोल नरका जाती ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे माप वाचेऐसें निकें । भरलें नरकें निंदेसाटीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whether one praises or blames God, at least the tongue is engaged with Him. But the wretch who wastes his speech on idle talk gains nothing.

Those who hear sacred words yet remain deaf, spending their hearing on worthless things, are bound for hell. In this world, spit flies in the face of the slanderer, and the stench of his wicked deeds clings to him.

Says Tuka, no vessel is as fine as the tongue; yet through slander, it fills itself with hellfire.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Praise God or blame God: at least the tongue is busy with him. But the low one wastes his speech for nothing. They hear holy words and stay deaf. They spend that gift on worthless things and go to hell. In this world spit flies in the slanderer's face; the stench of his foul deeds clings to him. Tuka says: no measure is as fine as the tongue, yet through slander it is filled up with hell.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram weighs how speech is spent. Even blaming God keeps the tongue turned toward him, which is better than squandering it on empty chatter that earns nothing. Worse are those who hear sacred words and stay deaf to them, wasting the gift of hearing and bringing ruin on themselves. He drives the point home with disgust at slander, the spit and the stench that mark the slanderer, but the warning is about the habit, not contempt for any one person. The tongue is the finest vessel a person owns; turn it to slander and you pack it with hell.

GATHA 3142 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, water merging with water

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Iron, flux, and bellows are all prepared; the fire reveals itself in the ringing of the anvil. What can be told and what cannot? True experience arises in the chitta of its own accord.

One can speak of the satisfaction of food, but one must make the effort and partake of it oneself. Says Tuka, when water merges with water, who can give a name to either?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Iron, flux, and the bellows are all ready; the fire shows itself in the ring of the anvil. What is there to tell? What is there to tell? The knowing arises in the heart on its own. You can speak of being filled by food, but you must make the effort and eat it yourself. Tuka says: when water joins water, who can put a name to either?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says realization cannot be handed over in words, only undergone. He uses the smith's forge: all the materials and fire are present, and the proof is heard in the strike, but the real knowing rises in the heart by itself, beyond telling. Like the fullness after a meal, it can be described, yet no description feeds you; you have to eat. His last image dissolves the question entirely: when water pours into water there are no longer two things to name, which is what union with God is like.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A mother knows her child's hunger and thirst. What entreaty shall I make? Let my head simply rest at Your feet.

I keep my mind fixed wherever You have placed it, at Your feet. I offer this service: contemplation of You in all things.

Whatever is lacking, may You, the generous Lord, supply it. Says Tuka, my intellect is small and I am full of faults.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A mother knows her child's life. She knows its hunger and its thirst. What plea can I make? Let my head simply rest at your feet. Wherever you have set me, there I keep my mind, here at your feet. This is the service I do: to think of you in all things, God. Whatever is short, make it enough. Take it up and complete it, generous Lord. Tuka says: my intellect is small, and I am a man of faults.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram drops all argument and rests like an infant who needs no words, since the mother already knows its hunger and thirst. He makes no demand, only lays his head at the feet and keeps his mind exactly where God has placed it. The one service he claims is constant remembrance, thinking of God in everything. Knowing his own understanding is small and his faults many, he asks the generous Lord to make up whatever is lacking and finish what he cannot.

Prayer, knowing the right yet unable

मराठी मूळ

जाणतों समये । परि मत कामा नये ॥1॥
तुह्मी सांगावें तें बरें । देवा सकळ विचारें ॥ध्रु.॥
फुकाचिये पुसी । चिंता नाहीं होते ऐसी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आहे । धर पाय मज साहे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I know the right path when the moment comes, yet my mind refuses to follow it. You alone, O God, can advise me truly, considering everything.

Without being asked, worries would never arise of their own. Says Tuka, I know You are here; hold my feet steady so I may endure.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I know the right path when the time comes. But my own mind is no use to me. You must tell me what is good, God, weighing everything. Without being asked, such worry would never rise on its own. Tuka says: you are here. Hold my feet so I can stand.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram confesses a common helplessness: he can see the right course when the moment arrives, yet his own mind will not carry him to it. So he hands the deciding over to God, who can weigh all sides and tell him what is good. He admits the anxiety itself is something stirred up, not natural, and would not arise if he were not divided. The prayer ends plainly: God is present, so steady his feet and let him stand where he cannot stand alone.

GATHA 3145 Prayers

Prayer, the doorkeeper's plea

मराठी मूळ

द्वारपाळ विनंती करी । उभे द्वारीं राउळा ॥1॥
आपुलिया शरणागता । वाहों चिंता नेदावी ॥ध्रु.॥
वचना या चित्त द्यावें । असो ठावें पायांसी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कृपासिंधू । दीनबंधू केशवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The doorkeeper makes a plea, standing at the temple gate. Do not let Your devotees carry any burden of worry.

Listen to this prayer; let it be known to Your feet. Says Tuka, O ocean of compassion, O Keshava, friend of the lowly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The doorkeeper makes his plea, standing at the temple gate. Let no burden of worry fall on those who have come to you for refuge. Give your mind to this prayer; let it be known to your feet. Tuka says: O ocean of compassion, O Keshava, friend of the lowly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram casts himself as a servant standing guard at the Lord's gate, speaking up for those who have taken shelter there. His single request is that none of these refuge-seekers be left to carry the weight of worry. He asks only that the prayer reach the Lord's feet and be heard. He closes by naming the Lord's own nature as the guarantee: an ocean of compassion and Keshava, the friend of the lowly, who will not turn such people away.

GATHA 3146 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, ready at the Lord's command

मराठी मूळ

दोहीं बाहीं आह्मां वास । असों कास घालूनि ॥1॥
बोल बोलों उभयतां । स्वामीसत्ता सेवेची ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I dwell in both Your arms, girded and ready for service. I speak the words of both parties, under the authority of devoted service.

Once the command is given, I follow that path without deviation. Says Tuka, I salute You; I was, I am, and I remain in that very place.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I stand at both your sides. Let me be girded and ready. I will speak for both parties, under the Master's right to be served. Once the command is given, let me keep to that conduct, that right way. Tuka says: I salute you. I was, I am, and I remain in that same place.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures himself as a servant posted close at the Lord's side, belt tied and ready to act the moment he is needed. He speaks for both sides because his whole standing comes from the Master's claim to be served. Whatever order is given, he means to follow it without straying from the right way. The closing line is a vow of constancy: bowing, he declares he was, is, and will go on being fixed in that one place of service.

GATHA 3147 Prayers

Prayer, head at the feet

मराठी मूळ

ऐका जी देवा माझी विनवणी । मस्तक चरणीं ठेवीतसें ॥1॥
सन्निध पातलों सांडूनियां शंका । सन्मुख चि एकाएकीं पुढें ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे माझे हातीं द्या उद्धार । करीं करकर ह्मणवूनि ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hear me, O God, this is my humble prayer. I place my head at Your feet.

I have come near, casting aside all hesitation, standing squarely before You. Wherever I reach, let it be at Your feet, for I have staked my very life.

Says Tuka, grant me salvation with Your own hands; I say this because I feel my own helplessness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hear me, O God. This is my plea. I lay my head at your feet. I have dropped all hesitation and come close. I stand straight before you, face to face, all at once. Wherever I reach, let it be at your feet. I have staked my life on it. Tuka says: put my rescue in your own hands. I keep asking, because I am helpless.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram comes to God not with an argument but with his head on the ground, and he names exactly what he wants. He says he has thrown off every hesitation and walked right up, standing face to face, because half-measures will not do. He stakes his whole life on one thing: that wherever he ends up, it will be at God's feet. The closing turn is the sharp one. He will not save himself; he hands the work of his rescue into God's own hands and admits, without shame, that the reason he keeps pestering is that he cannot do it alone.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have been seated right on Your lap; I am not far away or separate from You. This has come to pass after many, many days; now I shall fulfill my chitta's longing.

There was so much weariness and suffering, not a moment of rest. The separation of I and You caused such pain; I did not know You were so near.

The hope I had been nurturing has at last been fulfilled. Says Tuka, O mother and father, O Vitthal, please do not be angry.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am seated right on your lap. I am not far off. I am not separate. This took many, many days to happen. Now I will fulfill my heart's longing. There was so much weariness, so much pain, not one moment of rest. The split of I and You hurt me. I did not know you were this close. The hope I had been holding has come true. Tuka says: O mother, O father, O Vitthal, please do not be angry with me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the end of a long separation as a child climbing into a parent's lap, no distance left, no division left. He does not hide how hard the waiting was: years of weariness and pain with no rest, all of it caused by the sense of an I set apart from a You. The discovery that undoes the pain is simple and devastating: God was this near the whole time, and he did not know it. Reunited, his last word is not triumph but a child's anxious tenderness, asking the mother and father he calls Vitthal not to be angry, as though the closeness is too precious to risk.

GATHA 3149 Longing and Separation

Complaint, the Name and misfortune

मराठी मूळ

तुझें नाम मुखीं तयासी विपित्त । आश्चर्य हें चित्तीं वाटतसे ॥1॥
काय जाणों काय होसील निजला । नेणों जी विठ्ठला मायबापा ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे माझें दचकलें मन । वाटे वांयांविण श्रम केला ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

That one who has Your Name upon his lips should still face misfortune fills me with wonder. What could have happened? Have You fallen asleep? I cannot fathom this, O Vitthal, O mother and father.

The bonds of worldly existence should have been shattered, yet here they remain, neglected. Says Tuka, my mind is startled; it seems all my effort has gone to waste.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One who has your Name on his lips still meets misfortune. This astonishes my heart. What can have happened? Have you fallen asleep? I cannot understand it, O Vitthal, O mother and father. The bonds of this worldly life should have broken by now. Why are they still here, left untouched? Tuka says: my mind is startled. It seems all my effort has gone to waste.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lodges a genuine complaint with God, and he does not soften it. The promise he trusted was plain: the Name on the lips should break the bonds of worldly existence. So he stares at the misfortune still gripping a devotee and asks the blunt question, has God fallen asleep on the job. The frame the poem leaves open is the test of faith itself: when the promised rescue does not come, the devotee is left wondering whether the whole effort was wasted. He says it out loud rather than pretending to be serene, because honest alarm before God is itself a kind of trust.

GATHA 3150 Longing and Separation

Complaint, the master's duty

मराठी मूळ

सेवकें करावें सांगितलें काम । सिक्याचा तो धर्म स्वामी राखे ॥1॥
काय देवा नेणों आलें गांढेपण । तुह्मी शक्तिहीन जाले दिसां ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे मूळ पाठवा लौकरी । किंवा करूं हरी काय सांगा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A servant should carry out the work assigned; it is the master's duty to look after the wages. What, O God, has this helplessness come to? You seem to have lost Your power these days.

We are servants of Vishnu, confident in His strength, yet that strength seems abandoned in these times. Says Tuka, send word quickly, or tell me, O Hari, what I should do.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The servant should do the work he is told. Looking after the wages is the master's job. What helplessness has come over you, God? You seem to have lost your power these days. We are servants of Vishnu, sure of his strength. Now that strength looks abandoned. Tuka says: send word quickly, Hari, or tell me what I should do.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses his case with a sharp household image: a servant only owes the labor, while paying the wages is the master's responsibility. By that logic, if the devotee keeps up his devotion and rescue still does not come, the failure is God's, not his. He goes further and needles God directly, asking what weakness has come over him, saying his power looks lost. It is bold, even insolent, but it is the boldness of someone whose entire confidence rests on the master's strength. The demand at the close is honest: either act, or tell me plainly what else I am supposed to do.

GATHA 3151 Worldly Metaphors

Surrender, the strong father's child

मराठी मूळ

खेळतां न भ्यावें समर्थाच्या बाळें । तयाच्या सकळ सत्तेखालीं ॥1॥
तरी लेवविला शोभे अळंकार । नाहीं तरी भार मानाविण ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे माझें ऐसें आहे देवा । ह्मणऊनि सेवा समर्पिनली ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The child of a powerful lord plays without fear, for everything is under his father's dominion. If adornments are given, they look beautiful upon him; without honor they are only a burden.

Every direction should be open and free, for his parents are mighty. Says Tuka, this is my condition, O God; therefore I have surrendered my service to You.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The child of a powerful lord plays without fear. Everything stands under his father's rule. Ornaments put on such a child look fine on him. Without that honor they are only a weight. Let every direction lie open and free, because his parents are mighty. Tuka says: this is how it is with me, God. So I have given my service over to you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram explains his fearlessness with a single picture: a great lord's child plays without a care because the whole estate is under the father's power. The ornaments matter here too; on the protected child they are beautiful, but stripped of that backing they would be dead weight, mere burden without honor. He claims the same open freedom for himself, in every direction, on one ground only: his parents are strong. The conclusion is not pride in himself but surrender. Because his safety is entirely God's strength and none of his own, he has simply handed his whole service over.

GATHA 3152 The Nature of God

Nondual play, God hides in His own world

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the formless solitude, He was utterly alone, knowing no second companion. See how He beguiled Himself, creating the illusion of the cowherd world.

He hid within forms, disguising Himself as His own company. Says Tuka, it was not known before; through devotion the whole circle came into being.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the formless solitude he was alone. He knew no second companion. See how he tricked himself. He set the cowherd world spinning like a madness. He hid form inside form. The company he kept, he gave himself. Tuka says: none of this was there before. Through love the whole circle came to be.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks straight at the deepest mystery and states it without flinching. Before anything, there was only the formless One, utterly alone, with no second beside it. Then, in his telling, God beguiles himself: he sets the whole cowherd world turning and hides as form inside form, so the one company there is, he is giving to himself. This is the nondual claim left unspoken in plainer bhakti, that the lover, the beloved, and the world between them are all the one God playing. The closing line names what set it in motion: nothing was there before, and the entire circle of creation came into being through love.

GATHA 3153 The Necessity of Experience

The sweet theft, plundered by God

मराठी मूळ

नव्हती भेटी तों चि बरें । होतां चोरें नाडिलें ॥1॥
अवाघियांचा केला झाडा । रिता वाडा खोंकर ॥ध्रु.॥
चिंतनांचें मूळ चित्त । नेलें वित्त हरूनि ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे मूळा आलें । होतें केलें तैसें चि ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Before we met, all was well. But once the thief appeared, I was utterly robbed.

Everything was swept clean; the house stands empty and hollow. The mind, which is the root of all contemplation, has been plundered of its wealth.

Says Tuka, it has come full circle; what was done has returned to its origin.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Before we met, things were fine. Once the thief came, I was robbed clean. He swept everything away. The house stands empty and bare. The mind is the root of all my thinking. He carried off its wealth. Tuka says: it has come full circle. What was done has gone back to where it began.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the meeting with God into a robbery, and he means it as the best thing that could happen. Before the meeting he was comfortable, holding his own; then the thief came and stripped the house bare. What was stolen is named precisely: the mind, the root of all his thinking, looted of the wealth it hoarded. The frame the poem leaves implied is that this emptying is the point, not the loss it looks like. Everything has returned to its source, the self handed back to the One it came from, and the empty house is what is left when there is nothing of one's own to cling to.

GATHA 3154 Longing and Separation

Longing, do not hide your form

मराठी मूळ

जये ठायीं आवडी ठेली । मज ते बोली न संडे॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे नारायणा । सेवाहीना धिग वृत्त ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Wherever my love has taken root, that speech will never leave me. Fulfill the desire of my chitta; let our meeting be sweet, Yours and mine.

You have brought me this far; do not push Your form away now. Says Tuka, O Narayana, without Your service, life itself is a disgrace.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wherever my love has settled, that word will never leave me. Fulfill the longing in my heart. Let our meeting be sweet, yours and mine. You have brought me this far. Do not push your form away now. Tuka says: O Narayana, a life without your service is a disgrace.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from the place where love has already taken root and cannot be talked out of it; the word it gives him will not leave his mouth. His prayer is direct and a little possessive: bring me the sweet face-to-face meeting my heart aches for. He reminds God of the obligation already begun, you carried me this far, so do not now pull your visible form away and leave me halfway. The closing line raises the stakes past mere wanting: for him, a life that gets no chance to serve Narayana is not a quiet loss but an open disgrace, a life not worth the name.

GATHA 3155 Longing and Separation

Longing, give me back what is mine

मराठी मूळ

सरलियाचा सोस मनीं । लाजोनियां राहिलों ॥1॥

माझें तें चि मज द्यावें । होतें भावें जोडिलें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे विश्वंभरा । आळीकरा बुझावा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The longing for what has been lost remains in my mind, and I stay quiet out of shame. I call to You with love, yet You hide away.

Give me back what is mine, what I had gathered through devotion. Says Tuka, O sustainer of the universe, comfort and console me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The longing for what I lost is still in my mind. I keep quiet out of shame. I call you with love, and you hide. Give me back what is mine. I gathered it through devotion. Tuka says: O sustainer of all, console me, for I am crying like a stubborn child.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram catches himself in a tangle of feeling: the longing for what he lost will not leave, yet he is ashamed to keep asking. So he calls God with love, and God seems only to hide further away. His demand is grounded, not grasping; he wants back what is rightly his, the nearness he earned through his own devotion. Naming himself a stubborn, fretful child, he asks the sustainer of the whole world to come and console him. The honesty is the point: he does not pretend to be a serene saint, he admits he is sulking and crying, and trusts that God will quiet him anyway.

GATHA 3156 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the body moved by God

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My mind wants to dance, captivated by Your qualities. You have moved my limbs; they sway under Your power and command.

Name and form have come alive in color; this has become my natural way. Says Tuka, Panduranga has touched my very being, and I am steeped in His hue.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My mind wants to dance. The delight is held under your qualities. You have set my limbs moving. They sway by the strings of your power. Name and form have come alive in color. This is now my natural way. Tuka says: Panduranga has touched my whole body, and I am steeped in his hue.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes ecstasy not as something he produces but as something done to him. The urge to dance rises in his mind, ruled by God's qualities, and his own limbs move as if pulled by strings he does not hold. The hidden frame is the surrender of agency: the dancer is not the doer. Name and form have caught fire with color, and this overflow has become his second nature rather than a passing fit. The close seals it bodily; Panduranga has touched him through and through, and he is dyed in God's own color, the worshipper now soaked in the One he worships.

GATHA 3157 Ecstasy and Joy

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The sport I play is by the grace of Your feet; these joys are not fleeting or perishable. My mother and father stands upon the brick, bestowing the gift of grace with delight.

The words I speak are offered as Your blessing; they are not composed from any partisan school. Says Tuka, the flavor of devotion grows ever richer, for Panduranga has spread His sheltering shade above me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The sport I play is by the grace of your feet. These joys are not fleeting; they do not perish. My mother and father stands on the brick, giving grace with delight. The words I speak come as your gift. I have not pieced them from any school of opinion. Tuka says: the taste of devotion keeps growing in me, for Panduranga has spread his shade above me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is careful to say where his joy and his words come from. The play he plays is not his own doing but the grace of God's feet, and so, unlike worldly pleasures, it does not perish. He keeps the image of Vitthal standing on the brick at Pandhari, the same mother and father who gives grace gladly. The point he insists on is that his verses are received gifts, not opinions stitched together from rival schools of thought; he is not arguing a position but reporting grace. The taste of devotion only deepens, he says, because Panduranga has stretched a sheltering shade over his head.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The endless drudgery and torment of worldly bondage has at last been bid farewell. Now I shall see that misery no more.

Like a servant in someone else's household, the soul endured suffering under many masters. Says Tuka, the root has been cut in a single stroke, and all bondage is severed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The endless drudgery, the constant nagging of a hard household, is over. I have said goodbye to it. Now I will not see that weariness again. Like a servant girl in another's home, the soul lived under many masters. Tuka says: the root has been cut in one stroke, and the whole thing is finished at once.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells of liberation through the image of a married woman freed from a cruel in-laws' house, the endless thankless drudgery and nagging at last bid farewell. The bondage he means is worldly existence itself, where the soul lived like a servant girl in someone else's home, bowing under many masters and never her own. The release is not gradual; he says the root was cut in a single stroke and the whole thing finished at once. The frame the poem leaves unspoken is grace's suddenness: what years of weary service could not end, the meeting with God severs in one cut, and the misery is simply not seen again.

GATHA 3159 The Saints

The saints as touchstone, the lost path

मराठी मूळ

अवघा भार वाटे देवा । संतसेवा न घडतां ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Everything feels like a burden, O God, when service to the saints does not happen. This is the touchstone at hand: that God truly dwells in all beings.

I seem to have lost the path that the saints once walked. Says Tuka, pretense is useless; what matters is this direct experience.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Everything feels like a weight, O God, when I cannot serve the saints. The test is right here in my hand: God truly lives in all beings. I feel I have lost the path the saints once walked. Tuka says: pretense is useless; what counts is this direct experience.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names how he checks whether his devotion is real. Service to the saints is the touchstone, the assay that tells true gold from false, because the saints are where he meets the God who dwells in every being; when that service does not happen, life turns heavy. He confesses he feels off the road the saints walked, and he refuses to settle for keeping up appearances. The only thing that proves anything, he says, is anubhava, the firsthand experience itself.

GATHA 3160 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the burden laid at the saints' feet

मराठी मूळ

आतां तुह्मी कृपावंत । साधु संत जिवलग ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now you, O compassionate saints, are my dear ones. Do what is good for me; I lay my burden upon you.

Whatever was hidden has come to Your feet; there is nothing apart from this. Says Tuka, I have loosened all knots and embraced Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now you, compassionate ones, the saints, are my own dear ones. Do what is good for me; I lay my whole load and weight on you. Whatever I had hidden is now at your feet; nothing is kept apart from this. Tuka says: I have loosened every knot, and I have embraced your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram hands his whole life over to the saints he loves. Instead of managing his own good, he asks them to decide what is good for him and accepts the cost: the burden becomes theirs to carry. He brings out even what he had concealed and sets it at their feet, keeping nothing back. The closing image is total release: he undoes every knot he had tied around himself and simply holds on to their feet.

GATHA 3161 Devotion to Vitthal

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I feel joy, yet I cannot discern what is right from wrong. All I know is to sing and dance and shamelessly cry out Vitthal.

This is my entire wealth and all my spiritual practice. Says Tuka, I bow at your feet with delight, O saints.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I feel joy, but I cannot tell right from wrong. All I know is to sing and dance and cry out Vitthal, shameless. This is all my wealth; this is my whole practice. Tuka says: I fall at your feet with delight, O saints.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a confession that doubles as a boast. He admits he has no grasp of dharma and adharma, the fine sorting of right from wrong; what he has instead is joy, and one thing he can do: sing, dance, and call Vitthal's name without shame. That singing is not a part of his path but the whole of it, his entire wealth and his only spiritual practice. He ends bowing gladly at the saints' feet, content that this simple love is enough.

GATHA 3162 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the longing fulfilled like a child's gift

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What I had held in my chitta now appears before my eyes. The fruit of longing has come; everything has aligned.

I will playfully beg for my gifts, asking with childlike wonder. Says Tuka, Vitthal will fulfill every wish and delight.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What I held in my heart now appears before my eyes. The fruit of my longing has come; everything has fallen into place. I will beg playfully for my treats, asking with childlike wonder. Tuka says: Vithoba will fulfill every wish and delight.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the moment when inward longing becomes plain sight. What he had only carried in his heart now stands before his eyes, and every condition that had to be met is met. He approaches Vithoba not as a petitioner but as a child wheedling for sweets, asking with delight and play. The confidence is complete: Vithoba will grant whatever the child asks, fulfilling every fond wish.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

After so many days, the meeting has taken place at last. The separation caused by the march of time has ended.

Here I shall take my fill at leisure, for all difficulties have been resolved. The household duties had given me great sorrow, and exhaustion had only grown with each labor.

For so long I had watched for this path, and today the burden of suffering is cast off. So much pretense and worldly management had to be endured; at last I have emerged from the grip of appearances.

Says Tuka, here the journey reaches its end, and the mind rests in supreme bliss.

IN PLAIN WORDS

After many days the meeting has come at last. The break caused by the march of time is over. Here I will take my fill slowly, for every difficulty has been cleared away. The household work had given me much sorrow, and the exhaustion only grew with each labor. For a long time I watched for this path, and today the load of suffering is set down. So much pretense and worldly managing I had to keep up; at last I have come out from the grip of appearances. Tuka says: here the journey ends, and the mind rests in supreme bliss.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells of a reunion that ends a long separation, the rupture that mere time had forced upon him. Now that he is here, he means to take his fill without hurry, because the obstacles are gone. He counts what he is leaving behind: the sorrow of household duties, the mounting fatigue, the long watch for the way, the endless keeping up of appearances and worldly affairs. All of that he calls the grip of the laukika, the outward and social world, and he has stepped out of it. The journey reaches its end and the mind finally settles into paramananda, supreme bliss.

Social criticism, the thief-son the parents cheer

तुका ह्मणे बेटएा ॥ भांडवल न लगे खटएा ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The son has become a thief, and the parents are overjoyed. Now why should he toil? He robs and swindles at every turn.

He brings home stolen goods and fills the house with them. Both parents have settled into the certainty that they are all headed for hell together.

In the womb of wickedness, the seed and its fruit are both wretched. Says Tuka, the scoundrel needs no capital for his trade.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The son has become a thief, and the parents are overjoyed. Now why should he work for a living? He robs and swindles at every turn. He brings stolen goods home and fills the house with them. Both parents have settled into the certainty that the whole household is bound for hell together. In the womb of wickedness, the seed and the fruit are both wretched. Tuka says: the scoundrel needs no capital for his trade.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns a hard light on a household that has made peace with corruption. The son steals and cheats, and rather than grieve, the parents are delighted at the easy haul; so he never needs honest work. They have grown comfortable in a settled certainty that is really the road to hell, and they walk it together. The line about womb, seed, and fruit names the pattern: a family that nurtures wickedness raises only more of it. The closing barb, that the scoundrel needs no capital, points at how cheap and self-feeding theft becomes once shame is gone; the warning is for any house tempted to cheer the easy gain.

Social criticism, the shameless man past disgrace

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

After such disgrace and notoriety, if he still shows his face, spit on him, spit at the very sight. His life is as dark as death itself; though alive, he exists as though already dead.

Says Tuka, his qualities are an evil omen; even seeing him brings misfortune.

IN PLAIN WORDS

After such disgrace, after hearing his own shaming, if he still shows his face, then spit on him, spit at the very sight of him. His life is dark as death; alive, he stays as if already dead. Tuka says: his only quality is an evil omen; even seeing him brings bad luck.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a man so far gone that public disgrace no longer touches him. Once a person has been openly shamed and still parades himself, his shamelessness has become the offense, and Tukaram answers it with contempt sharp enough to spit. He calls such a life as dark as death: the man breathes, but lives like a corpse. The point is not hatred of a person but a warning about the deadness that sets in when a man loses all capacity for shame, until his very presence feels like a bad omen to those around him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The great devotee-king Pundalik accomplished the supreme task and brought the Absolute, the supreme Brahman, down from Vaikuntha itself. Panduranga, that youthful form, came in the company of cows and cowherd boys, and out of love stood still upon that very spot.

That place is a singular, matchless syllable, a second Vaikuntha; other holy places call themselves sacred but are not of this order. Within a radius of five kroshi, sin itself cannot enter; how then could any worldly law of do and do-not dwell there? The Puranas declare that the people there are four-armed beings, and upon the Sudarshana chakra no evil can approach even until the end of time.

This great pilgrimage site Pandhari is beyond all comparison. Says Tuka, blessed, truly blessed, are the pilgrims who belong to that place.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The great devotee-king Pundalik did the supreme thing: he brought the Absolute, the supreme Brahman, down from Vaikuntha itself. Panduranga, that childlike form, came with the cows and the cowherd boys, and out of love stood still upon that very spot. That place is a single, matchless syllable, a second Vaikuntha; other holy places call themselves sacred, but they are not of this kind. Within five kroshi all around, sin itself cannot enter; how then could the law of do and do-not live there? The Puranas say the people there are four-armed beings, and over the Sudarshana even evil cannot approach until the end of time. This great holy place, Pandhari, is beyond all comparing. Tuka says: blessed, truly blessed, are the pilgrims who belong to it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram praises Pandhari as a place set utterly apart, and credits the devotee Pundalik with making it so: his love drew the supreme Brahman down from Vaikuntha to stand on a brick at Pandharpur as Panduranga, the cowherd boy. He stacks claim upon claim to mark its uniqueness. It is a second Vaikuntha, a place no sin can enter for miles around, where even the categories of ritual right and wrong no longer apply because there is nothing to forbid. Drawing on the Puranas, he says its people are themselves divine, guarded so that no evil approaches. The praise lands on the pilgrims, the Varkaris: blessed beyond measure simply for belonging to that place.

GATHA 3167 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the body as death's plaything

मराठी मूळ

देह मृत्याचें भातुकें । कळों आलें कवतुकें ॥1॥
काय मानियेलें सार । हें चि वाटतें आश्चर्य ॥ध्रु.॥
नानाभोगांची संचितें । करूनि ठेविलें आइतें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कोडीं । उगवून न सकती बापुडीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The body is but a plaything for death; this has become clear to me with wonder. What have you taken to be of lasting value? This itself is the great mystery.

People amass fortunes of varied pleasures, storing them up as though they are permanent. Says Tuka, these wretched ones cannot even begin to solve the riddle of their own fate.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The body is only a toy for death; I have seen this clearly, with wonder. What have you taken to be the real, the lasting thing? That is the great riddle. People pile up fortunes of every pleasure and store them as if they were permanent. Tuka says: the poor wretches cannot even begin to untie the riddle of their own fate.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses a single hard fact: the body is a plaything in the hands of death, and once you truly see this it astonishes you. He turns it into a question for the listener. What exactly have you decided is solid and lasting, when death holds the body so lightly? He watches people heap up pleasures and treat them as if they will never end, and calls this the real mystery, that anyone could be so deceived. The closing line pities rather than mocks: these people cannot unravel even the basic riddle of their own mortality, and the abhanga means to wake them to it.

GATHA 3168 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, hide me within Yourself

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे आतां नको उजगरा । लपवीं दातारा अंगीं मज ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If pleasures and enjoyments come to fill my being through renunciation, then what shall I do, O generous Lord? Let this bundle of body, senses, and mind now rest at Your feet. The business of dos and don'ts, the ground of ritual injunctions, if devotion slips away without being understood, all is lost.

Says Tuka, now let there be no more sleepless anxiety; hide me within Yourself, O Lord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If pleasures and enjoyments come back to fill me through my renunciation, then what shall I do, O generous Lord? So let this bundle, my senses, my body, my mind, now rest at Your feet. The whole business of dos and don'ts, the ground of ritual rules: if devotion slips away without my noticing, all of it is lost. Tuka says: now let there be no more sleepless dread; hide me within Yourself, O Lord.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names a subtle trap of the spiritual life. Even renunciation can backfire, since giving things up can quietly bring back a new kind of enjoyment and self-regard, and he asks God what he is to do about that. His answer is to stop managing himself: he lays the whole bundle of body, senses, and mind at God's feet. He fears that while he is busy with the bookkeeping of ritual rights and wrongs, the living devotion at the heart of it could slip away unnoticed, and then everything would be wasted. So he asks for the deepest shelter: no more anxious wakefulness, only to be hidden inside God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The one who raises rebellion and yet does not see it through is a mere pretender. Cursed be such a life, deceitful and shameful.

Once you have assumed a role, see it through properly and completely. Says Tuka, God does not neglect the one who perseveres with patience.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The one who starts a revolt and does not carry it through is just a pretender. Cursed, cursed be such a life, deceitful and shameful. Once you have taken up a role, see it through well and to the end. Tuka says: God never neglects the one who holds on with patience.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays down a plain ideal of integrity. The man who raises a banner and then fails to follow through is exposed as a fraud, and Tukaram pours scorn on a life lived that way, half-hearted and false. The standard he sets is simple: whatever role you have taken on, carry it out fully and well rather than abandoning it midway. He frames this as spiritual counsel, not just worldly grit. God does not overlook the one who endures with patience, so steadiness in what you have begun is itself rewarded.

GATHA 3170 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, the diamond and the sandalwood

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

True nature does not change to save its life; what is within is the same as what appears without. Inside and out, the hue remains the same; there is no weariness or ruin in its essence.

The diamond, struck by the hammer's blow, enters deeper into the earth, yet never abandons its own steadfastness. Says Tuka, sandalwood cools even the axe that cuts it; such is the power of one's inborn nature.

IN PLAIN WORDS

True nature does not change to save its life; what is inside is the same as what shows outside. Within and without, the color is one; there is no weariness, no breaking in its essence. The diamond, struck by the hammer, drives deeper into the ground, but never lets go of its own firmness. Tuka says: sandalwood cools even the axe that cuts it; such is the strength of one's inborn nature.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram defines integrity through what does not change under pressure. A true nature will not bend itself even to save its own life, so its inside and its outside match exactly, one unbroken color with no fatigue or fracture at the core. The diamond shows the same thing under the hammer: it sinks deeper rather than shatter, never surrendering its hardness. The sandalwood completes the picture by adding sweetness to strength: it gives its cooling fragrance even to the axe that cuts it down. Such, he says, is the power of an inborn nature that stays itself no matter how it is struck.

GATHA 3171 The Moral Ideal

Moral counsel, honor and refuge

मराठी मूळ

दिली मान तरी नेघावी शत्रूची । शरण आलें त्यासी जतन जीवें ॥1॥
समर्थासी असे विचाराची आण । भलीं पापपुण्य विचारावें ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे यश कीतिन आणि मान । करितां जतन देव जोडे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if the enemy offers honors, do not accept them. One who comes seeking refuge must be protected with one's very life.

The powerful must abide by the law of discernment; the good must weigh merit and sin carefully. For the sake of someone's pleading, truth must never be forgotten; no gap should be allowed to appear.

Says Tuka, by guarding fame, honor, and glory, one wins God Himself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even if the enemy offers you honors, do not take them. The one who comes to you for refuge, protect him with your own life. The strong are bound by the rule of discernment. The good must weigh sin and merit with care. Do not forget the truth because someone pleads with you. Do not let any gap open up. Tuka says: guard your fame, your good name, and your honor, and in guarding them you find God Himself.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out a code for the powerful and the good. Honor handed to you by an enemy is poisoned; refuse it. A person who throws himself on your protection has the first claim on you, even before your own life. He warns against the soft trap of pity: when someone pleads hard enough, you are tempted to bend the truth, and that bent place is the gap through which everything fails. The reward is not abstract: holding to fame, good name, and honor without compromise is itself the road on which God is found.

Testimony, rescued from despair

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I first deliberated within my own mind: how shall I survive here and by what means? Then the One who dwells within came to my aid and gave me the wisdom that leads beyond destruction. I had fallen into an ocean of despair, wondering how I could ever cross.

Says Tuka, suffering had consumed my lifespan, and my jiva was in utter anguish.

IN PLAIN WORDS

First I asked inside my own mind: how am I to survive here, by what door? Then the One who lives in the heart came to help me. He gave me wisdom that does not perish. I had fallen into an ocean of despair. How would I ever cross it? Tuka says: suffering had eaten my years. My very life was in anguish.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as one who has come out the far side of despair. He had reasoned to a dead end, asking how a person could survive at all and by what means, and found no door. The rescue did not come from his own thinking but from the One who dwells in the heart, who gave a wisdom that cannot be destroyed. He names the depth he was in plainly: an ocean of despair, years devoured by suffering, the soul in agony. The poem is a witness that the help came from within when his own deliberation had run out.

Warning, the cost of indulgence

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे दुःख उमटे परिणामीं । लंपटासी कामीं रतलिया ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He who spends his own capital to shackle his own feet, such a person is of low intellect. In the company of sense pleasures the lifespan is wasted, and one's own welfare lies barren.

The body of one who is deluded becomes a stranger to himself; it moves only at the bidding of desire. Says Tuka, suffering blossoms at the end for one who remains lost in sensual indulgence.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A man who spends his own wealth to put his own feet in the stocks is of low mind. In the company of the senses, his lifespan is destroyed. His own good lies barren and empty. The body of a deluded man becomes a stranger to him. It moves only as his cravings command. Tuka says: in the end, suffering breaks out for the man who stays sunk in lust.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names the self-defeat in a life of indulgence. The image is sharp: a man paying out his own capital, his own life and energy, in order to lock his own feet in shackles. Keeping company with the senses burns up the years and leaves what truly serves him untended and barren. Worse, his own body no longer belongs to him; it has become a stranger that obeys desire instead of its owner. The warning points not at any one person but at the pattern itself: pleasure taken on these terms ripens into suffering at the end.

GATHA 3174 Faith and Trust

Resolve, no turning back

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे जीणें । देवा काय हीनपणें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The journey has begun under auspicious signs; now who would turn back? Let whatever will happen, happen. The body is offered as a sacrifice; what is there to worry about? Whatever has fallen into my lap, I carry its weight in my heart.

Says Tuka, O God, why live a life of cowardice?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The journey has begun under good omens. Who would turn back now? Let whatever is to happen, happen. The body is offered as a sacrifice; why should I worry? What has fallen to my lot, I carry its weight in my heart. Tuka says: O God, why live a life of cowardice?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks with a soldier's resolve once the road is taken. The signs were favorable when he set out, so there is no honest reason to retreat now. He has already given his body away as an offering, so the fear of what comes next has lost its grip. Whatever burden has landed on him, he simply carries it. The closing line is the whole point: he asks God why anyone should crouch through life in cowardice, when the path has already been committed to.

GATHA 3175 The Moral Ideal

Discernment, when silence is best

मराठी मूळ

वेगळें तें देहभावा । भ्रम जीवा माजिरा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कवतुक केलें । किंवा भलें दवडितां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When I see that someone is tasteless and indifferent, silence is the best response. There is no use wasting words; do not walk alongside fools to the oil press.

What is separate from bodily identity is something else entirely; the bewildered jiva is caught in an inner labyrinth. Says Tuka, was this all a sport, or have we been throwing away what was good?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When you see that someone is dull and indifferent, silence is the better answer. Do not waste your words. Do not walk to the oil press alongside fools. What is apart from the body-sense is something altogether else. The bewildered soul is caught in an inner maze. Tuka says: was all this a game, or have we been throwing away what was good?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram counsels restraint with those who cannot or will not hear. When a person is tasteless and unmoved, words are wasted breath, and to keep their company is to be ground down with them like grain at the oil press. He then turns to the real distinction: what lies beyond bodily identity is a wholly different order, and the confused soul keeps wandering a maze inside itself. The poem ends in honest self-questioning rather than scorn, asking whether the whole effort was sport or whether something genuinely good has been squandered.

GATHA 3176 The Nature of God

Nature of God, the silent mover

मराठी मूळ

चित्ताचा चाळक । त्याचें उभय सूत्र एक ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे उठी । लोह चुंबकाचे दृष्टी॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The mover of the mind holds both strings as one. He makes us dance in all manner of moods, delighting in His own playful joy.

The moon does not send a message to the lotus, yet the lotus blooms at its gaze. Says Tuka, iron rises of its own accord at the mere glance of the magnet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He moves the mind. He holds both its strings as one. He makes us dance in every kind of mood, delighting in his own play. The moon sends no message to the lotus. Tuka says: yet iron rises by itself at the mere glance of the magnet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes how God works on the soul without a word being spoken. He is the one who moves the mind, holding both its strings, and he sets us dancing through every mood for the sheer joy of his own play. The two images make the point: the moon never sends instructions, yet the lotus opens to it, and iron is drawn upward by nothing more than the magnet's nearness. The lesson is that the pull of God needs no command or explanation; presence alone moves the soul, the way the magnet moves the iron.

GATHA 3177 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the mutual longing

मराठी मूळ

करितां तडातोडी । वत्सा माते सोई ओढी ॥1॥
करित्याचा आग्रह उरे । एक एकासाटीं झुरे ॥ध्रु.॥
भुके इच्छी अन्न। तें ही त्यासाटीं निर्माण ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Try as you may to part them, the calf is drawn toward its mother. The longing of the seeker endures; each one yearns for the other.

When hunger craves food, food itself is created for that very purpose. Says Tuka, each dwells in the chitta of the other.

IN PLAIN WORDS

However hard you try to pull them apart, the calf is drawn back to its mother. The longing of the one who seeks does not end; each pines for the other. When hunger craves food, food itself is made for that very purpose. Tuka says: each one lives in the other's heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures the bond between the soul and God as a longing that runs both ways. Try as you might to separate them, the calf turns back to its mother; the seeker's yearning never wears out, and the two ache for each other. He adds a striking claim: when hunger arises, the food it craves was itself created for that hunger, so the wanting and its fulfillment are made for one another. The closing line lands it: the devotee and the Lord each dwell in the heart of the other, so the pull is never one-sided.

GATHA 3178 The Necessity of Experience

Inner experience, the lamp within

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

God's store has gone bankrupt; His cover is blown. Now there is no need to spend words; one should contemplate within the mind alone.

The bundles have been wrapped up, and the wick has been lit from within. Says Tuka, do this, and He will remain inside the house.

IN PLAIN WORDS

God's shop has gone bankrupt. His cover is blown. Now there is no need to spend words. Think it over within the mind alone. The bundles have been wrapped up. The wick has been lit inside. Tuka says: do this, and he will stay inside the house.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the language of a closing-down shop to describe a turn inward. God's outward trade is finished and his secret is out, so there is nothing left to argue about with words; the work now happens silently in the mind. The bundles are packed away and a wick is lit within, an image of attention drawn back from the outside and a light kindled in the heart. The promise is simple and intimate: do this inward work, and God will not depart but will remain dwelling in the house of the self.

GATHA 3179 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, sit at the root of the mind

मराठी मूळ

तीर्थाचिये आस । पंथ तो निट देव । पाविजेतो ठाव अंतराय ॥1॥
ह्मणऊनि भलें निश्चळ चि स्थळीं । मनाचिये मुळीं बैसोनियां ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे कामा नाहीं एक मुख । जिरवितां सुख होतें पोटीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

On the path toward a sacred place, God is the straight road; one reaches the destination despite obstacles. Therefore it is good to sit firm at the root of the mind, in one steady place.

Life built on mere intention is ruled by destiny; causes only multiply further causes. Says Tuka, desire has no single face; when joy is digested within, it fills the belly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If you long for a holy place, God himself is the straight road. You reach the destination in spite of every obstacle. So it is good to sit still in one place, at the root of the mind. A life built on mere intention is ruled by destiny. Causes only breed more causes. Tuka says: desire has no single mouth. When you digest joy within, it fills the belly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram redirects the urge to go on pilgrimage back into the heart. If you crave a sacred destination, God is himself the straight road that gets you past every obstacle, so the better course is to sit still at the root of the mind. He warns that a life run on personal plans is at the mercy of destiny, where every cause only spawns further causes and nothing is finished. Desire, he says, has no single mouth to satisfy; it is endless. The contentment that lasts comes from joy taken inwardly and digested, which fills you the way food fills the belly.

GATHA 3180 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, time devours the body

मराठी मूळ

क्षणक्षणा हा चि करावा विचार । तरावया पार भवसिंधु ॥1॥
नाशिवंत देह जाणार सकळ । आयुष्य खातो काळ सावधान ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे येह लोकीच्या वेव्हारें । नये डोळे धुरें भरूनि राहों ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Moment by moment, one must reflect on how to cross the ocean of worldly existence. This perishable body will surely go; Time devours the lifespan, so stay alert.

With loving eagerness, seek the company of saints and pursue the spiritual path with urgency. Says Tuka, do not remain blinded by the smoke of this world's affairs.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Every moment, think on this one thing: how to cross to the far shore of the sea of worldly life. This body perishes; all of it will go. Time is eating your lifespan, so stay alert. With love and longing, keep the company of saints. Hurry toward the highest good. Tuka says: do not stand here with your eyes filled by the smoke of this world's affairs.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses for urgency about the one thing that matters. At every moment the mind should return to a single question: how to cross the ocean of worldly existence. The body is perishable and will certainly go, and time is steadily eating away the lifespan, so there is no room for drowsiness. The practical counsel is to seek out the company of saints with eager love and to pursue the highest good without delay. The closing image is a warning against distraction: do not let the smoke of everyday affairs blind your eyes while the time runs out.

GATHA 3181 Faith and Trust

Resolve, the narrow pass

मराठी मूळ

कोणाशीं विचार करावा सेवटीं । एवढ्या लाभें तुटी जाल्या तरे ॥1॥
सांभिाळतो शूर आला घावडाव । पुढें दिला पाव न करी मागें ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे गडसंदीचा हा ठाव । केला तो उपाव कार्या येतो ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

With whom shall I deliberate at the end, when such a great gain is at stake? A true warrior holds his ground even under heavy blows, pressing forward and never retreating. The real calamity here is any obstacle that separates one from the feet of Govinda.

Says Tuka, this is a narrow mountain pass; the strategy that works here is the one that counts.

IN PLAIN WORDS

With whom shall I take counsel at the end, when so great a gain is at stake, if it should be lost? A true warrior holds his ground when the heavy blow comes. He presses his foot forward and does not step back. The real disaster here is any obstacle that separates one from the feet of Govinda. Tuka says: this is a narrow mountain pass. Only the strategy that works here counts.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram treats the spiritual life as a battle at a decisive point. The stake is so great that there is no one left to consult once it is lost, so everything rides on not losing it. Like a true warrior, he holds his ground under the worst blow and keeps pressing forward rather than retreating. He names the one real calamity precisely: not pain or hardship, but anything that comes between the soul and the feet of Govinda. The closing image of a narrow mountain pass says the moment is tight and exposed, and only a strategy that actually works at the crossing is worth anything.

GATHA 3182 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, contentment in distance

मराठी मूळ

असा जी सोंवळें । आहां तैसे चि निराळे ॥1॥
आह्मीं नयों तुमच्या वाटा । काय लटिका चि ताठा ॥ध्रु.॥
चिंतन चि पुरे । काय सलगी सवें धुरे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे देवा । नका नावडे ते सेवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Remain pure, O Lord; stay apart as You are. I shall not tread upon Your path; why this empty stubbornness? Contemplation alone is enough; why demand the closeness of familiar company? Says Tuka, O God, do not render a service that is unwelcome to You.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Stay pure, O Lord; remain apart, just as you are. I will not walk on your path. Why this empty stubbornness? Contemplation alone is enough for me. Why should I demand the closeness of familiar company? Tuka says: O God, do not let me give you a service you do not want.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks with a striking humility that lets God keep his distance. He tells the Lord to remain pure and apart, and refuses to force his way onto God's own path, calling such insistence empty stubbornness. For him, simply holding God in contemplation is enough; he will not press for the intimacy of being a familiar companion. The closing line turns it into a prayer: he asks not to render any service that is unwelcome to God. The devotion here measures itself not by what the devotee wants to claim, but by what is acceptable to the Lord.

GATHA 3183 The Moral Ideal

Moral warning, ego the destroyer

मराठी मूळ

अहंकार तो नासा भेद । जगीं निंदे ओंवळा ॥1॥
नातळे तो धन्य यासी । जाला वंषीं दीपक ॥ध्रु.॥
करवितो आत्महत्या। नेदी सत्या आतळों ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे गुरुगुरी । माथां थोरी धरोनि॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Ego is the destroyer, breeding division; the world rightly despises its touch. He who refuses to touch it is truly blessed and becomes a light within his lineage.

Ego drives one to self-destruction and prevents one from touching the truth. Says Tuka, it perches upon the head, puffing itself up as guru above all gurus.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Ego destroys. It breeds division. The world is right to despise its touch. The one who will not touch it is blessed. He becomes a lamp in his own line. Ego drives a man to kill his own soul. It will not let him touch the truth. Tuka says: it sits on the head and growls, setting itself up as the great one, the guru above all gurus.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names ego as the one thing that ruins a life and splits people apart, and he says the world is not wrong to recoil from it. The blessing falls on whoever refuses to handle it: such a person becomes a light for everyone after him. He calls ego self-murder, because it cuts a man off from the truth that would have saved him. The sharpest stroke is the last: ego loves to perch on the head and call itself the highest guru, so the warning is to watch for that swelling pride in oneself, not to despise some other person.

GATHA 3184 Faith and Trust

Faith, fortune separates the pure

मराठी मूळ

इच्छलें ते शकुनवंती । होय देती तात्काळ ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे संचित कुडें । तें बापुडें करीतसे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whatever the faithful desire comes to pass for them at once, like a good omen. Vitthal, from above, separates the pure milk from the water.

Without true fortune, how can there be fruit? Within lies only filth and waste. Says Tuka, it is one's own crooked past karma that makes one act so pitifully.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What the faithful want comes to them at once, like a good omen. Vitthal sits above and judges. He parts the milk from the water. Without good fortune, where is the fruit? Inside there is only filth and waste. Tuka says: it is your own crooked past that makes you act so poorly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts two inner conditions before God. To those with real faith, what they long for arrives quickly, and Vitthal, like a discerning swan, separates the pure milk from the water mixed in. But where the fortune of past deeds is missing, no fruit comes, and the inside of a person is only filth and waste. The closing line turns it inward: when a man behaves pitiably, the cause is his own crooked accumulated karma, so the work is on oneself rather than on blaming the world.

GATHA 3185 Longing and Separation

Longing, the burnt life and God's silence

मराठी मूळ

काशासाठीं आह्मी जिाळला संसार । न करा विचार ऐसा देवा ॥1॥
कैसें नेणों तुह्मां करवतें उदास । माझा प्रेमरस भंगावया ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे अवघी मोकलूनि आस । फिरतों उदास कोणासाटीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For Your sake I have burnt my worldly life to ashes; do not think lightly of this, O God. How can You bring Yourself to be indifferent, to shatter my love for You? I have surrendered this entire body to You; do You not feel ashamed to treat it as impure? Says Tuka, I have abandoned every hope and wander desolate. For whose sake then do I suffer?

IN PLAIN WORDS

For whose sake did I burn my worldly life? Do not take this lightly, God. How can you turn cold and break my love for you? I have given you this whole body. Do you feel no shame to call it impure? Tuka says: I have let go of every hope. I wander empty. For whom?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as one who has already burned away his ordinary life for God, and now feels God's indifference like a wound. He presses the complaint as a lover: how can you grow cold and shatter the love I carry for you? He reminds God that he has surrendered his whole body, and asks whether God is not ashamed to treat that offered body as unclean. The last cry exposes the stakes: he has dropped every other hope and wanders desolate, and if not for God, there is no reason left for the suffering.

GATHA 3186 Longing and Separation

Longing, only a place at your feet

मराठी मूळ

नाहीं तुह्मां कांहीं लाविलें मागणें । कांटाळ्याच्या भेणें त्रासलेती ॥1॥
एखादिये परी टाळावीं करकर । हा नका विचार देखों कांहीं ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे तुह्मां मागेन तें आतां । हें चि कृपावंता चरणीं वास ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have asked nothing of You, yet You are troubled as though by the prick of thorns. In one way or another, put an end to this friction; let me not see such indifference from You.

Separation from Your feet is a contest with life itself; I cannot bear this rupture any longer. Says Tuka, all I shall ask of You now, O gracious one, is to dwell forever at Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have asked you for nothing. Yet you are troubled, as if pricked by thorns. Somehow put an end to this friction. Do not let me see such coldness in you. To be parted from your feet is a fight with my own life. I cannot bear this break any longer. Tuka says: all I will ask you now, gracious one, is to live forever at your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram protests that he has made no demands, and still God acts pained, as though his presence were a thorn. He begs that the friction between them be ended somehow, and that he never have to face such indifference. Then he names the cost of separation: being cut off from God's feet is a struggle against life itself, a rupture he cannot endure. He resolves the whole appeal into one request, that he be allowed to dwell forever at those feet, which is the only thing he ever truly wants.

GATHA 3187 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, compassion is the true religion

मराठी मूळ

जग अमंगळ । लागे देखतां विटाळ ॥1॥
धर्म भूतांची ते दया । सत्य कारण ऐसीया ॥ध्रु.॥
नव्हे माझें मत । साक्षी करूनि सांगें संत ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जीवें । दावी उमटूनि अनुभवें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The world without God is impure; merely looking at it brings contamination. True religion is compassion for all beings; this alone is the real principle.

This is not just my opinion; I call the saints themselves as witnesses. Says Tuka, one must show this truth through one's own lived experience, stamped visibly upon one's life.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The world without God is unclean. Just looking at it brings defilement. True religion is mercy to all beings. This alone is the real ground of it. This is not only my opinion. I call the saints as my witnesses. Tuka says: show it with your life. Let it be stamped on you through your own experience.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram cuts straight to what religion actually is: not ritual or appearance, but compassion for every living being, and he calls this the one true principle. He says a world turned away from God is so impure that even looking on it stains you, which sharpens why mercy must be the standard. To keep this from sounding like a private opinion, he stands the saints behind it as witnesses. The final demand is hard: this truth has to be lived and visibly proven in a person's own conduct, not merely held as a belief.

GATHA 3188 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, justice must not be corrupted

मराठी मूळ

दंड अन्यायाच्या माथां । देखोनि करावा सर्वथा।।1।।
नये उगे बहुतां घाटूं । सिसें सोनियांत आटूं ।।ध्रु.।।

तुका ह्मणे देवा । दोष कोणाचा तो दावा ।।3।।

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Punishment should be dealt upon the head of the unjust, seeing their wrong deeds, without fail. One must not allow many wrongs to pass unchecked, nor let lead be mixed into gold.

For the sake of distinguishing sin from merit, justice was established; when authority is corrupted, it is an outrage. Says Tuka, O God, whose fault is this? Let that be demonstrated.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Punishment must fall on the head of the one who does wrong. See the wrong, and deal it without fail. Do not let many wrongs pass unchecked. Do not melt lead into the gold. Justice was set up to tell sin from merit. When power is twisted, that is an outrage. Tuka says: God, whose fault is this? Let it be shown.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram defends real justice: wrongdoing must be answered, the guilty named, and offenses not waved through. His image is exact, do not let lead be melted into the gold, meaning do not let corruption be passed off as sound. He says the whole point of authority was to separate sin from merit, so when that authority is bent, it becomes a scandal against its own purpose. He ends by laying the question before God, asking whose fault the corruption is, which presses each holder of power to examine his own hands.

GATHA 3189 Confession and Sin

Confession, the sinner holds his ground

मराठी मूळ

आह्मी पापी तूं पावन । हें तों पूर्वापार जाण ॥1॥
नवें करूं नये जुनें । सांभाळावें ज्याचें तेणें ॥ध्रु.॥
राखावा तो ठाव। मिरासी करोनि उपाव ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We are wrongdoers and You are the purifier; this has been so from the very beginning. Do not try to make something new of what is old; let each uphold his own role.

Guard your own rightful place and hold it with all your means. Says Tuka, he argues boldly and makes God listen to his case.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We are the sinners; you are the one who makes us pure. This has been so from the beginning. Do not make the old thing new. Let each keep his own part. Guard your place. Hold it as your rightful claim, by every means. Tuka says: he calls out loudly, pressing his case, and makes God listen.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns an old truth into a claim he can hold God to: from the start, the roles have been fixed, we are sinners and God is the purifier. He warns against unsettling that ancient arrangement, urging that each side keep its own role rather than redefine it. The counsel to guard your rightful place applies to the devotee, who should hold his standing before God as an inherited right and not surrender it. The closing line shows Tukaram doing exactly that, arguing boldly and forcing God to hear his case.

GATHA 3190 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, aim high or not at all

मराठी मूळ

पाडावी ते बरी । गांठी धुरेसवें खरी ॥1॥
नये मरों लंडीपणें । काय बापुडें तें जिणें ॥ध्रु.॥
लुटावें भांडार । तरी जया नाहीं पार ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नांवें । कीर्ती आगळीनें ज्यावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When engaging a battle, engage the one at the very front. One must not die in cowardice; what a pitiful life that would be.

If you are going to plunder a treasury, choose one that has no end. Says Tuka, one should live in such a way that one's fame is unmatched.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If you must strike, strike the one at the very front. Do not die a coward. What is such a wretched life worth? If you mean to plunder a treasury, choose the one with no end. Tuka says: live by such a name that your fame stands above the rest.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the language of war and plunder to teach where to set your aim. If you fight, fight the strongest in front, not the weak at the edges, and never settle for a coward's death, which makes the whole life pitiful. The plunder he points to is a treasury without limit, and the unspoken meaning is God himself, the only wealth that never runs out. So the call to win unmatched fame is not worldly ambition but a charge to spend the one life on the highest possible object.

GATHA 3191 Faith and Trust

Faith, the warrior who fears nothing

मराठी मूळ

भजनें चि जालें । मग जीवाचें काय आलें ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Once devotion has been accomplished, what harm can come to the jiva? Do not let fear stand in the way again. When the battle is joined, hold nothing back.

Says Tuka, be a warrior who charges at the front line.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Once devotion is done, what harm can reach the soul? Do not let fear stand in the way again. When the fight is joined, keep nothing back. Tuka says: be a warrior, charge straight at the front.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram assures the devotee that once true devotion is accomplished, nothing can finally injure the soul, so there is no ground left for fear. He uses a soldier's image: in the battle of the spiritual life, hold nothing in reserve and do not flinch. The whole abhanga presses one posture, courage, telling the devotee to charge at the front rank rather than hang back. Fear is named as the single obstacle that must not be allowed to return.

GATHA 3192 Prayers

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Through many lifetimes my conduct was not pure, and that is why Your feet remained distant. Now, looking at what my accumulated karma has brought in this birth, I pray, O Lord of Pandhari, be merciful.

Make Your pledge of being the Purifier of the Fallen come true, O God; take pity on me. I am a wrongdoer, a wrongdoer, corrupt and vile, exhausted by this worldly existence.

Desire and anger and the torments of imagination have kept me from reaching You, O Lord. I have found no refuge anywhere, O Panduranga; nothing I try proves of any use.

Says Tuka, true to Your own Name, O swift deliverer, come to me quickly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Through past lives my conduct was not pure. That is why your feet stayed far from me. I look at what my piled-up karma has brought in this birth. Now, Lord of Pandhari, be merciful. Make your pledge true, God: that you purify the fallen. So take pity on me. I am a sinner, corrupt and vile, worn out by this worldly life. Desire and anger and the torment of imagining have kept me from reaching you, God. I have found no refuge anywhere, Panduranga. Nothing I try is of any use. Tuka says: true to your own Name, swift deliverer, come to me quickly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram traces his distance from God back to impure conduct across many lives, and faces honestly what his accumulated karma has now made of him. Rather than claim worthiness, he reaches for God's own title, Purifier of the Fallen, and asks God to make that pledge true precisely on a case like his. He confesses the real obstacles by name: desire, anger, and the endless churn of imagination, which have blocked the path and left him without any refuge that works. The prayer rests everything on God's reputation, asking Panduranga to live up to the Name and come quickly, since the fallen are exactly whom that Name is for.

GATHA 3193 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the Father who knows before you ask

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

First comes the embrace of love, then the bowing at His feet. Such is my simple and tender Father; Hari draws me close and removes all suffering.

Without my saying a word of weariness or fatigue, Panduranga already knows. Says Tuka, the gracious Lord gives what is needed even before it is asked.

IN PLAIN WORDS

First the embrace of love, then the bowing at his feet. Such is my simple, tender Father. Hari draws me close and takes away the heat of my pain. I need not speak of my weariness. Panduranga already knows it. Tuka says: the gracious Lord gives what is needed before it is even asked.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes how God meets him not with formality but with affection: the embrace of love comes first, and only then the bowing at the feet. He calls Vitthal his simple, tender Father, one who pulls him close and lifts away the heat of his suffering. The heart of it is that he does not have to report his exhaustion, because Panduranga already knows what is inside him. The closing line lands the claim: this grace runs ahead of need, giving before the asking even begins.

GATHA 3194 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, God speaks through the saint

मराठी मूळ

वचनाचा अनुभव हातीं । बोलविती देव मज ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The truth of these words is in my hands; it is God who makes me speak. But this cannot be understood by the faithless, by those souls sunk in dull matter.

These are unheard-of gifts of grace, alms of mercy from the Master. Says Tuka, I keep telling you as I go along, ascending ever higher.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The truth of these words is in my hands. It is God who makes me speak them. But the faithless cannot grasp this. Souls sunk in dull matter cannot grasp it. These are unheard-of gifts of grace, the alms of mercy from the Master. Tuka says: I keep telling you as I go, climbing higher all the while.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says the words he speaks are not mere opinion but a tested experience he holds in hand, and that God himself is the one speaking through him. He admits this cannot land on the faithless or on people sunk in dull, material living, since such grace is recognized only by those open to it. He calls what he has received unheard-of gifts, alms of mercy handed down by the Master. The closing line shows him still in motion, passing on the teaching as he goes and rising higher in experience as he speaks.

GATHA 3195 The Necessity of Experience

Joy received, the veil lifted

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why do you attribute this to many causes? It was my own past merit that brought it about. The sweetness of devotion and love has settled deep within my core, and bliss has filled my innermost being.

Vitthal has wiped away the veil of darkness; the whole world stands flooded with the joy of Brahman. Says Tuka, I have been freed from all desire; my love rests solely upon the cowherd Lord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why do you blame this on so many causes? It was my own past merit that brought it about. The sweetness of love and devotion has settled deep in my heart. Joy has come, and filled me within. Vitthal has wiped away the veil of darkness. The whole world is flooded with the bliss of Brahman. Tuka says: I have been made free of all desire. My love rests only on Govinda, the cowherd.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers people who want to explain his joy by outside reasons, and he points back to his own ripened past instead. He describes the joy as something tasted, a sweetness lodged in the heart, not an idea he holds. Then he names what made it possible: Vitthal himself wiped away the film of darkness over his sight, and once that veil was gone the same world that looked ordinary now looks soaked in the bliss of Brahman. The release from desire is not a discipline he achieved but the natural result of his whole love settling on one place, the feet of Govinda.

GATHA 3196 Ecstasy and Joy

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sitting, sleeping, eating, all is Govinda now. The three worlds are filled with His bliss.

Time has severed all other ties at once; not a single fleeting moment should be wasted. The shares of the body have been parceled out, and the pull of duality has been cut away.

Love itself has taken the shape of nourishment; all separate intentions have dissolved. When desire goes, anger and intellect and mind all cease; peace has swallowed the phantom coils of illusion.

Says Tuka, the hue of Lord Ranganatha has settled upon the mind, unbroken and single-pointed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Sitting, sleeping, eating, all of it is Govinda now. The three worlds are filled with his bliss. Time has cut away every other tie at once. Not one moment is to be wasted. The shares of the body have been parceled out. The pull of the other thing, of duality, has been cut. Love itself has become my food. Every separate plan has melted away. When desire goes, anger and intellect and mind all cease. Peace has swallowed the coils of illusion. Tuka says: the color of Shriranga has settled on my mind, unbroken, one and the same throughout.

WHAT IT MEANS

This abhanga describes total absorption, where ordinary acts have stopped being ordinary: sitting, sleeping, eating are now done as and toward Govinda. Tukaram says time itself has severed his other attachments, so that no moment is left over for anything else. As desire dissolves, its whole train follows, anger, scheming intellect, the restless mind, and what remains is a peace that simply absorbs the tangled coils of illusion rather than fighting them. He ends with the image that holds the rest: the mind has taken on a single color, the hue of Shriranga, dyed through evenly with no break.

The Name, the cure laid open

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To the feverish patient one gives medicine and a healing diet; to the foolish I prescribe the remembrance of Narayana. By this, the disease of worldly existence will be cured at once, when one sweeps everything clean with conviction.

Other remedies require harsh regimens; with good fortune, the cure comes swiftly and the suffering ends. Says Tuka, I have laid out my wares in the open; fortune itself has arrived at my door.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For the feverish patient you give medicine and a healing diet. For the foolish I prescribe the remembrance of Narayana. By this, the disease of worldly existence will be cured right now, when you sweep it all clean with conviction. Other remedies need harsh regimens. With good fortune the cure comes quickly and the suffering ends. Tuka says: I have laid out my wares in the open. Fortune itself has come to my door.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the frame of a physician: just as fever calls for medicine and a careful diet, the sickness of worldly bondage has one remedy, the remembrance of Narayana's name. He insists the cure is immediate, not gradual, provided it is done with full conviction that sweeps the heart clean. Against this he sets the harsh, complicated disciplines other paths demand, and says the Name works swiftly where they labor. The closing image is a shopkeeper opening his stall: he has put the remedy out in plain view for anyone, and calls his own good fortune the customer that arrived.

GATHA 3198 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the show of piety

मराठी मूळ

जपाचें निमित्त झोपेचा पसरु । देहाचा विसरू पाडूनियां॥1॥
ऐसीं तीं भजनें अमंगळवाणी । सोंगसंपादणी बहुरूप्याची ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे मानदंभ जया चित्तीं । तयाची फजीती करुं आह्मी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Under the pretense of chanting, he sprawls out in sleep, forgetting the body entirely. Such devotions are impure, mere costume changes of a traveling performer.

Service done out of greed has no God remaining in it. Says Tuka, those whose chittas are filled with vanity and pretense, I shall expose them.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Under the excuse of chanting, he sprawls out in sleep, forgetting the body entirely. Such devotions are foul. They are the costume-changes of a traveling impersonator. Service done out of greed has no God left in it. Tuka says: those whose minds are full of vanity and pretense, we will expose.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming a pattern, not a person: outward acts of piety that are really cover for self-indulgence. The man who dozes off and calls it chanting has made worship a disguise, like a quick-change performer who puts on holy roles for an audience. The sharp claim follows: when service is driven by greed, God has already left it, however devout it looks. The point of self-examination is the same vanity and pretense he says he will expose; the test is whether our own worship is for God or for the watching crowd.

GATHA 3199 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, conduct proven by experience

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे नित । बरवें अनुभवें उचित । तरी काय हित । मोलें घ्यावें लागतें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He whose mind does not touch another's wealth or another's wife is not bound by action, no matter what he does. This is direct, verifiable experience; one should trust it as the truest companion of the jiva.

Solitude alone can unravel everything before such a person. Fermented food is the same as wine when examined closely; impurity is distinguished from purity by intent alone.

Says Tuka, what is good is confirmed by experience as fitting and right; if so, does one need to purchase one's own welfare?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The one whose mind does not touch another's wealth or another's wife is not bound by action, whatever he does. This is direct, plain experience. Trust it as the truest companion of the soul. Solitude alone will unravel everything before such a person. Look closely, and fermented food is the same as wine. Pure and impure are told apart by intent. Tuka says: what is good is confirmed by experience as fitting and right. If so, must you buy your own welfare for a price?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets out a moral test that is inward, not ceremonial: the man whose mind never reaches for another's money or another's wife stays free even in the thick of action. He calls this verifiable experience, something the soul can lean on rather than a borrowed rule, and he says solitude will then open everything to such a person. His examples sharpen the point, that intent is what divides pure from impure, the way fermentation can turn food into something like wine. The closing question presses it home: if good conduct is already confirmed from within by experience, your own welfare costs nothing to acquire, so why act as though it must be purchased?

GATHA 3200 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, hunger against greed

मराठी मूळ

भूक पोटापुरती । तृष्णा भरवी वाखती । करवी फजीती । हांवें भार वाढला ॥1॥
कुिळकेसी लांस फांस । डोई दाढी बोडवी दोष । अविहितनाश । करवी वजन चुकतां ॥ध्रु.॥

आज्ञापालणें ते सेवा । भय धरोनियां जीवा । तुका ह्मणे ठेवा । ठेविला तो जतन ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hunger asks only for enough to fill the belly, but greed makes one reach for more and brings disgrace. Greed makes one shave one's head and endure fasts, and when one slips from proper conduct, it brings ruin.

What is taken in proper measure for the right purpose does not feel like deprivation; one who rejects the ways of the base is a true renunciant. Says Tuka, obedience to command is true service; hold fear within the chitta and guard the treasure that has been entrusted to you.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hunger asks only for enough to fill the belly. Greed makes you reach for more, and brings disgrace. Greed makes you shave your head and endure fasts, and when you slip from right conduct it brings ruin. What you take in proper measure, for the right purpose, never feels like deprivation. The one who rejects the ways of the base is a true renouncer. Tuka says: obedience to the command is true service. Hold fear within the mind, and guard the treasure that has been entrusted to you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts plain hunger, which asks only for enough, with greed, which keeps reaching and ends in shame. He notices that greed can even wear religious dress, shaving the head and keeping fasts, while inwardly it stays grasping, and one slip then turns it to ruin. The measure he offers is purpose: take what is right and needed, and nothing feels like deprivation; turning away from the cravings of the base is what real renunciation means. He closes by reframing devotion as obedience and trusteeship, keeping a wary fear in the mind and guarding what has been entrusted rather than treating it as one's own to spend.

GATHA 3201 The Power of the Name

The Name, the guide on the road

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे मोल । न लगें द्यावें वेचावे बोल । विठ्ठल विठ्ठल । ऐसा छंद मनासी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whether you understand dharma or not, listen, I will tell you the secret. Cry out the Name of my Vitthal with full-throated fervor.

He will show you the paths you need, whatever they may be; the compassionate One will answer your yearning. When you lose your way, He walks beside you as a gracious guide; He will not let thorns prick you or thieves assail you.

Says Tuka, no price need be paid, no words need be spent; just let the mind chant Vitthal, Vitthal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whether you understand dharma or not, listen, I will tell you the heart of it. Call out the name of my Vithoba with all your force. He will show you the paths you need, whatever they are. The greatly compassionate One will answer your longing. When you lose your way he walks beside you as a kind guide. He lets no thorn prick you. He takes the road away from thieves. Tuka says: no price need be paid, no words need be spent. Just keep the mind set on this: Vitthal, Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks to people anxious about whether they grasp dharma, and sets that worry aside: the secret is simply to cry out Vithoba's name with full force. He casts God as a guide on a dangerous road who shows the right paths, walks alongside the one who has lost the way, keeps thorns from the feet, and steers clear of thieves. The compassion is what answers, not the seeker's learning or effort. The closing line strips the cost down to nothing: no payment, no elaborate words, only the mind held steady on the repeated name, Vitthal, Vitthal.

GATHA 3202 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the hollow renouncer

मराठी मूळ

तरी कां वोळगणे । राजद्वारीं होती सुने ॥1॥
अंगीं दावुनि निष्कामता । पोकळ पोकळी ते वृथा ॥ध्रु.॥
कासया मोकळ। भोंवतें शिष्यांचे गाबाळ ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे ढाळे । बाहेर गुदे तें निराळें॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Then why do they haunt the royal courts, hovering at the doorstep like empty vessels? They display renunciation outwardly, but inside they are hollow and vain. Why do they trail crowds of disciples around them for no real purpose? Says Tuka, what spills out and what churns inside are two very different things.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Then why do they hang about the royal courts, waiting at the doorstep like empty vessels? They show renunciation on the outside, but inside they are hollow and false. Why do they drag crowds of disciples around them for no real purpose? Tuka says: what spills out and what churns inside are two very different things.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram catches the contradiction in a renouncer who has supposedly given up desire yet loiters at the doors of kings hoping for favor. He calls the displayed detachment hollow, an outside that does not match the inside, and questions the entourage of disciples gathered for show rather than for any true teaching. The closing line is the test: the words and gestures a person spills out in public are one thing, what actually churns within them is another. The aim is to weigh our own inner state against our outer reputation, not to despise the man.

GATHA 3203 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the easy secret

मराठी मूळ

हरिच्या दासां सोपें वर्म । सर्व धर्म पाउलें ॥1॥
कडिये देव बाहेर खांदी । वैष्णव मांदी क्रीडेसी ॥ध्रु.॥
सरती येणें आटाआटी । नाहीं तुटी लाभाची ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The servants of Hari possess an easy secret: all duties are fulfilled at His feet. God is at their hip, carried upon their shoulders; the company of the faithful is their playground.

Everything is accomplished through this simple exchange; the profit of devotion never runs out. Says Tuka, our minds are forever at peace.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For the servants of Hari the secret is easy: at his feet every duty is fulfilled. God is on their hip, carried on their shoulders. The company of the faithful is their playground. Everything gets done by this simple exchange. The profit of it never runs short. Tuka says: our minds are always at peace.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the path of Hari's servants as the easy one, where bowing at God's feet completes every religious duty at once. The intimacy is domestic and tender, God carried like a child on the hip or shoulder, the gathering of devotees treated as a playground rather than a labor. He frames it as an exchange that always yields and never runs dry, so there is no anxiety about loss. The plain conclusion is the fruit of all this: the mind of such a servant rests permanently at peace.

GATHA 3204 The Nature of God

Nature of God, the one within all

मराठी मूळ

भूतांचिये नांदे जीवीं । गोसावी च सकळां ॥1॥
क्षणक्षणां जागा ठायीं । दृढ पायीं विश्वास ॥ध्रु.॥
दावूनियां सोंग दुजें । अंतर बीजें वसतसे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जाणे धने । धरी तें वर्म चिंतन ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He who dwells in all beings is the true lord of all. Moment by moment, stay alert in that place, with firm faith at His feet.

Though He assumes different outward guises, the inner seed remains the same. Says Tuka, the one who is wise and the master knows the secret of this contemplation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He who dwells in the life of all beings is the lord of them all. Stay awake to that place, moment by moment, with firm faith at his feet. Though he shows different outward forms, the inner seed stays the same. Tuka says: the one who is wise, the true owner, holds to this secret of contemplation.

WHAT IT MEANS

This abhanga points to the one presence living inside every being as the real master of all. Tukaram counsels constant alertness to that indwelling presence, kept up moment by moment and anchored by firm faith at the feet. He distinguishes the changing outer forms from the unchanging inner seed: the disguises differ, but what dwells within is one and the same. The closing line names who actually possesses this, not the outwardly clever, but the one who keeps the inner seed in steady contemplation.

GATHA 3205 The Saints

Saints, the poor host's welcome

मराठी मूळ

संत आले घरा । तों मी अभागी दातारा ॥1॥
कासयानें पूजा करूं । चरण हृदयीं च धरूं ॥ध्रु.॥
काया कुरवंडी। करुन ओंवाळून सांडी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे भावें । हात जोडीं असो ठावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When saints come to my home, I am so poor, O generous Lord. With what shall I worship them? I will simply hold their feet within my heart.

I will offer my body as a sacrifice, waving it around them as an offering. Says Tuka, with devotion I fold my hands; let this be known.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Saints have come to my house, and I am so poor, O generous Lord. With what shall I worship them? I will hold their feet within my heart. I will make my body an offering, waving it around them and casting it away. Tuka says: with all my heart I fold my hands. Let this be known.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram greets the arrival of saints as the highest visit, and confesses he has nothing fit to honor them with. The poverty is not only material; it is the helplessness of love that cannot find an offering equal to the guests. So he gives what he has: their feet held inside his heart, and his own body waved around them like a lamp and surrendered. The folded hands at the end are the whole of his worship, offered in pure feeling and openly declared, since that sincerity is the one gift a poor host can truly give.

GATHA 3206 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the spoiled child's claim

मराठी मूळ

भेद तुटलियावरी । आह्मी तुमचीं च हो हरी ॥1॥
आतां पाळावे पाळावे । आह्मां लडिवाळांचे लळे ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे हेवा । माझा हेत पायीं देवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Once the boundary of separation has fallen away, we are entirely Yours, O Hari. Now please indulge us, indulge the whims of Your playful children.

I know no other service but Yours, O God. Says Tuka, my longing and my purpose rest at Your feet, O Lord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now that the wall of separation has fallen, we are entirely yours, O Hari. So indulge us now, indulge the whims of your pampered children. I know no service other than yours, O God. Tuka says: my longing and my whole aim rest at your feet, O Lord.

WHAT IT MEANS

Once the sense of being separate from God has broken, Tukaram speaks from inside belonging rather than from outside it. From that footing he makes a child's demand, asking God to indulge his whims, the boldness allowed only because the relationship is now beyond question. He admits he has learned no other service, no other devotion to fall back on, which leaves him wholly dependent. The closing line gathers his desire and his purpose into a single place, the feet of the Lord, so that surrender and longing become the same thing.

GATHA 3207 Devotion to Vitthal

Adoration, bowing at the threshold

मराठी मूळ

आमुची विश्रांति । तुमचे चरण कमळापती ॥1॥
पुढती पुढती नमन । घालूंनियां लोटांगण ॥ध्रु.॥
नीच जनालोकां । तिळले पायेरीस तुका ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Your lotus feet, O Lord, are our true resting place. Again and again I bow and prostrate before You.

Says Tuka, lowly among all people, I press my forehead to the dust of Your threshold.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Your lotus feet, O Lord of Lakshmi, are our resting place. Again and again I bow; again and again I throw myself flat on the ground before You. Tuka says: I am the lowest of all people; I press my forehead to the dust at the step of Your door.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names where he finally comes to rest: not in any achievement of his own, but at the feet of God. The bowing is not done once and finished; it is repeated, over and over, until the body is flat on the ground. He places himself below everyone else, at the very threshold, in the dust where feet are wiped. The whole posture is the prayer: rest is found only by going low, and the lowest place is the safest place to be.

GATHA 3208 Prayers

Prayer, the Name on the lips

मराठी मूळ

विनवितों सेवटीं । आहे तैसें माझे पोटीं ॥1॥
कंठीं राहावें राहावें । हें चि मागतसें भावें ॥ध्रु.॥
पुरली वासना । येणें होईल नारायणा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जो देहाडा । तो चि वर्णीन पवाडा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In this final plea I speak what is truly in my chitta. May Your Name remain upon my lips; this is all I ask with devotion.

If this desire is fulfilled, it will satisfy everything, O Narayana. Says Tuka, whatever day remains, I will spend it singing Your glory.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is my last plea, and I will say what is really in me. Stay in my throat; stay there. This is all I ask, and I ask it with my whole heart. If that one desire is granted, O Narayana, everything in me is satisfied. Tuka says: whatever days are left to me, I will spend them singing Your glory.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips his asking down to a single request and lays it bare. He does not want wealth, rescue, or heaven; he wants the Name of God to stay on his lips and never leave. He tells God plainly that if this one wish is met, nothing else is lacking. The vow that follows is the proof of the request: whatever life remains will be poured out in singing of Narayana, so the prayer and the rest of his life become the same thing.

GATHA 3209 True Worship

True worship, loving nearness over formality

मराठी मूळ

आवडीची सलगी पूजा । विषम दुजा भाव तो ॥1॥
ऐसीं उफराटीं वर्मे । कळों भ्रमें न येती ॥ध्रु.॥
न लगे समाधान मोल । रुचती बोल प्रीतीचे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे एका जीवें । सूत्र व्होवें गुंतलें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Loving familiarity is the truest worship; formality and distance are signs of a divided chitta. These are upside-down truths that cannot be seen through the fog of confusion.

Contentment cannot be bought; it is won by the words of love. Says Tuka, when a single jiva is wholly absorbed, the thread winds itself into one skein.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Loving closeness is the truest worship. To hold God at a formal distance is a divided heart. These truths run the opposite way from what people expect, and a confused mind cannot see them. Peace cannot be bought for a price; it is words of love that please God. Tuka says: when one life is wholly given, the thread is gathered into a single skein.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram overturns the common idea that worship means keeping a respectful distance and following correct form. He says intimacy is the real offering, and stiff formality betrays a heart still split between God and other things. This looks upside down to a confused mind, but it is the truth: God is not won by purchase or ceremony, only by speech that comes from love. When a single life surrenders completely, all its scattered strands wind together into one, and that gathered-ness is the worship he means.

GATHA 3210 Worldly Metaphors

The mother's love, devotion that draws no offense

मराठी मूळ

बाळ माते लाते वरी । मारी तेणें संतोषे ॥1॥
सुख वसे चित्ता अंगीं । तें हें रंगीं मिळालें ॥ध्रु.॥
भक्षी त्याचा जीवमाग। आले भाग तो बरा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे ऋणानुबंधें । सांगें सुदें सकळां॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A child kicks its mother, yet she is delighted by it. Joy dwells in the chitta and body; it has merged completely into the color of love.

The mother feeds the child the very substance of her own life; whatever portion comes, she welcomes. Says Tuka, by the bonds of love spanning lifetimes, this happiness comes to all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The child kicks its mother, and that very kicking delights her. Joy lives in her heart and in her body; it has all merged into the one color of love. She feeds the child the very substance of her own life; whatever comes to her, she takes it as good. Tuka says: by the bonds of love that run across lifetimes, this happiness comes to everyone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the mother and her infant to show how love receives even rough treatment. The baby strikes her, yet she is only pleased, because love has dissolved all sense of injury into one feeling. So it is with God: He feeds the devotee from His own being and welcomes whatever the devotee gives, harsh or clumsy. The closing line widens it to all souls: the tie of love is older than this life, a bond carried across births, and that is why such happiness is offered to everyone.

GATHA 3211 Worldly Metaphors

Discernment, knowing when enough is enough

मराठी मूळ

शिजल्यावरी जाळ । वांयां जायाचें तें मूळ ॥1॥
ऐसा वारावा तो श्रम । अतिशयीं नाहीं काम ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे कळे । ऐसें कारणाचे वेळे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Once the cooking is done, adding more fire is pointless and wasteful. Therefore, restrain unnecessary effort; excess serves no purpose.

Guard the secret of timing; do the right thing at the right moment. Says Tuka, this becomes clear at the decisive hour.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Once the food is cooked, more fire only ruins it. So spare yourself that wasted effort; pushing past the point serves nothing. Guard the secret of the right measure; do the right thing at its proper time. Tuka says: this is understood only at the moment it is needed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram teaches discernment with a kitchen image: heaping fire on food already cooked does not improve it, it spoils it and wastes labor. He warns against straining beyond the point where effort is fruitful, in practice as in cooking. The real skill is timing, knowing when to act and when to stop, and doing each thing in its proper season. He admits this wisdom cannot be learned in advance as a rule; it becomes clear only in the living moment when the choice is upon you.

GATHA 3212 The Moral Ideal

Discernment, against rash haste and sloth

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Just because one stands on this bank does not mean one should leap into the water. What good does it do to attempt remedies after the moment has passed? Do not be drawn in by everything that appears inviting.

Says Tuka, the assault of laziness has led many astray.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Standing on this near bank, do not leap into the water for that. What use are the remedies meant for later, if you do them now, out of place? Do not be pulled along by everything that looks good to you. Tuka says: the raid of laziness has ruined many.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram warns against two opposite failures on the spiritual road. One is rash haste: jumping into the river simply because you are standing at the edge, acting before the time is right, applying later remedies too soon. The other is being lured by whatever merely looks inviting, letting appearances drag you wherever they please. Against both he sets the final blow: laziness comes like a raiding party and has destroyed many who never even started. Right timing, not impulse and not drift, is the path.

GATHA 3213 True Worship

True worship, the heart over the offering

मराठी मूळ

शक्ती द्याव्या देवा । नाहीं पदार्थी सेवा ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे सोसें । लागे लाविल्याचें पिसें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Offer your full strength to God; true service lies not in material offerings alone. This is the highest law of dharma; those who are wise should know this secret.

God sees into the chitta and knows your devotion as it truly is. Says Tuka, whatever longing you have planted, that very passion will take hold of you.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Give your full strength to God; service is not in objects alone. This is the chief law; you who are wise, know this secret. God is in your heart and knows your feeling exactly as it is. Tuka says: whatever longing you have planted, that very madness takes hold of you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lifts true worship above the things laid on the altar. What God asks is your whole strength and your inward devotion, not the value of the items you offer. Since God lives within and reads the heart directly, no display can fool Him and no poverty can shortchange Him. The closing line states the law of the inner life: whatever desire you sow becomes the passion that grips you, so what you plant in the heart is exactly what you will be ruled by.

GATHA 3214 Longing and Separation

Longing, craving that exhausts itself

मराठी मूळ

कार्य चि कारण । तृष्णा पावविते सीण ॥1॥

रूपीं नाहीं गोडी । हांवें हांवें ऊर फोडी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे पडे भारी । ऐशा वरदळाचे थोरी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Craving itself is the cause and the effect; thirst leads only to more exhaustion. Why, O Panduranga, do You keep company with such suffering? When there is no sweetness in the form, one only beats one's chest in vain.

Says Tuka, the weight grows heavier, and that is the glory of this excess.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The thing done becomes the cause again; craving only brings more weariness. What is the use of such company, when You alone are the longing, Panduranga? When there is no sweetness in the form, one beats one's chest in vain desire. Tuka says: the burden grows heavy, and that is the whole glory of this excess.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at how craving feeds itself: each thing you do plants the cause of the next want, and thirst leads only to fresh exhaustion. He turns to Panduranga and asks why keep such company with suffering, when God Himself is the only longing worth having. Without real sweetness, devotion turns into empty self-beating, all show and ache and no nourishment. He ends with a sharp irony: the only thing this overload of craving produces is a heavier and heavier weight, and he names that weight, mockingly, its glory.

GATHA 3215 The Power of the Name

The Name, the world washed clean

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे सुख समाधि हरिकथा । नेणें भववेथा गाईल तो ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By placing a zero over the name of worldly life, the growing merit of dharma has been accomplished. Through the devotion of Hari, the world has been cleansed, and the grip of death and time has been escaped.

No one need labor over complicated spiritual practices; what is required is the renunciation of body-consciousness. Says Tuka, the joy and peace of Hari's story is supreme; one who sings it knows nothing of worldly suffering.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Put a zero over the name of worldly life, and the merit of true dharma keeps growing. Singing Hari has made the world white and clean; the grip of death and time is escaped. No one needs the burden of hard practices; what must be done is to give up body-consciousness. Tuka says: the joy and stillness of Hari's story is the highest; whoever sings it knows nothing of worldly sorrow.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets worldly life and the singing of Hari side by side and crosses out the first. Cancel the value placed on samsara, and true merit grows on its own; sing the Name, and the world is washed white and slips free of the noose of death and time. He insists the path needs no elaborate apparatus of technique; the one renunciation that matters is letting go of the belief that you are the body. What remains is the joy and the deep stillness of telling Hari's story, and the one who lives in that singing simply no longer knows worldly grief.

GATHA 3216 Faith and Trust

Faith, the effortless coming of grace

मराठी मूळ

विश्वासिया नाहीं लागत सायास । रंग अनायासें अंगा येतो ॥1॥
लेंकराच्या हातें घास मागे माता । वोरसोनि चित्ता सुख पावे ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The faithful one needs no exertion; divine color comes to his body effortlessly. A mother begs a morsel from the hand of her child, and by accepting it she is filled with joy.

She takes the child's harsh words as a mark of honor and wears that speech as an ornament. Says Tuka, You are the witness of all. Panduranga is always on my side.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For the one who trusts, no straining is needed; the color of God comes to the body on its own. A mother begs a morsel from her own child's hand, and taking it she is filled with joy. She counts the child's rough words as honor and wears that speech as an ornament. Tuka says: You are the witness of everything; Panduranga is always on my side.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the ease of faith. Where there is trust, grace does not have to be wrestled into being; it colors the devotee effortlessly. The mother shows the relationship: she will beg food from her own little child's hand and rejoice in it, and even the child's harsh words she treats as praise and wears like a jewel. So God receives the devotee's crude offerings and clumsy speech as ornament. Tukaram closes in confidence: God sees all and stands on his side, so anxious effort is unnecessary.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The master of all glory becomes a refuge to all. When the chitta is offered with sincerity, God does not let anything remain apart from Himself; by the force of devotion He fills every place.

Whether knowingly or unknowingly, once the state comes upon you, He Himself becomes your very desire. Says Tuka, how beautiful is the life of the little one, for the mother nourishes it with her own milk.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The master of all glory becomes refuge to everyone. When the heart is offered in truth, God lets nothing of you stay apart from Him; by the force of devotion He fills every place. Knowing it or not knowing it, once the state comes upon you, He Himself becomes your desire. Tuka says: how good is the life of the little one, for the mother raises it on her own milk.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the kind of God this is: the owner of all splendor, yet the one who makes Himself a shelter for all who come. Offer the heart sincerely and He leaves no part of you standing outside Himself; the strength of devotion fills every space until there is no separate you. Then, whether you understand it or not, once that state arrives, your own wanting is no longer yours, it is Him. The mother and her nursing infant carry it home: the little one need only depend, and the mother grows it from her own body.

Longing, yearning for the feet

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When will such a state come over my being? My chitta yearns for You, O Panduranga. Forgetting the body, let me contemplate Your feet without a single moment's pause.

Will I ever become worthy of such a gain? I do not know if You, O Hrishikesha, will be pleased. Says Tuka, I shall count my past merit blessed if I can take that eternal bliss of love.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When will such a state come over me? My heart is wasting away for You, Panduranga. Let me forget the body and dwell on Your feet, with not one moment's break in between. Will I ever become fit for such a gain? I do not know whether You, O Hrishikesha, will be pleased. Tuka says: I will count my stored merit blessed if I can take that eternal joy of love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from inside an unfulfilled longing rather than from arrival. His heart is pining for Panduranga, and what he aches for is unbroken contemplation of God's feet, the body forgotten and not a single moment's gap in the attention. He does not presume he deserves it; he openly wonders whether he is worthy and whether Hrishikesha will even be pleased with him. The hope at the end is humble: if all the merit gathered across his life can buy him that one thing, the endless bliss of love, he will count every bit of it well spent.

Surrender, the weight given to God

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I do not carry the burden of self-importance; my resolve is for the Master's service alone. Whatever the Master commands is my law; this is the firm conviction in my chitta, and by it every burden is lifted.

With childlike insistence I pray with a single-pointed mind, and my divine parents respond in kind. Says Tuka, this is the nature of my service: I have placed the entire weight upon God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I do not carry the load of self-importance. My one resolve is to serve the Master. Whatever the Master commands is my law; this is fixed in my mind, and by it every burden is lifted. With childlike insistence I pray with a single mind, and my mother and father answer in the same way. Tuka says: this is the kind of service I do. I have laid the whole weight on God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a service that begins by putting down something most people never set down: the burden of one's own importance. He keeps only one rule, that the Master's command is law, and he reports that this single conviction is what actually lightens the load. The childlike insistence is not weakness but trust: he presses on God the way a child presses on its parents, and he says the divine parents respond in kind. The closing line names the whole transaction: he has not divided the weight with God, he has placed all of it on God.

Nature of God, the puppet on His strings

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे दोरी खांब सूत्र्या हातीं । नाचवी नाचती जडें तैसीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Does He not dwell within my own chitta? He is the all-pervading One who lives in every being. Whatever stirs in the mind is His own grace moving it; the mind simply follows that current.

All powers of the jiva remain dormant; nothing I do is accomplished by my own effort. Says Tuka, the strings and the puppeteer's rod are in His hands; the lifeless puppets dance only as He moves them.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Does He not dwell within me? He pervades all beings and lives in every one. Whatever stirs in the mind is His grace moving it; the mind only follows that current. All the powers of the living being lie dormant; nothing I do is done by my own effort. Tuka says: the strings and the puppeteer's rod are in His hands. The lifeless puppets dance only as He moves them.

WHAT IT MEANS

This poem pushes God's pervasiveness all the way into the question of who is actually acting. Tukaram first locates God within himself and within every being, then draws the hard conclusion: even the movement of his own mind is God's grace, not his initiative. The image of the puppet makes the claim sharp, that what we call our powers and our deeds are dormant on their own and dance only when the hidden hand pulls. Held wrongly this could excuse anything; held as Tukaram means it, it is the end of self-credit and the ground of surrender, since the doer was never the one we took ourselves to be.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who touches the remains of what has been offered to God? Whatever intention arises, doubts spring up with it. This body has been offered to God once and for all; whatever happens through that offering will be good.

The burden that was here has been lifted, and its worry has been removed; now the vessel stands empty and clean. Says Tuka, it was desire that brought all the trouble; once desire departed, so did ruin.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who would touch the leavings already offered to God? Whatever intention you form, doubts spring up beside it. This body has been offered to God once and for all; whatever comes through that offering will be good. The burden that was here is lifted, and its worry with it; now the vessel stands empty. Tuka says: it was desire that brought all the trouble. Once desire left, ruin left too.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram treats his own body as something already given away, like food offered to God that no one would now take back for themselves. He notices that fresh intentions only breed fresh doubts, so he stops forming them and rests on the single offering already made, trusting that whatever follows from it will be good. The empty vessel is the point: with the burden handed over, the worry that rode with it is gone. He names the root plainly, that desire was the source of his suffering, and when desire departed, the ruin it was carrying departed with it.

GATHA 3222 The Nature of God

Moral ideal, the fault is in the seer

मराठी मूळ

देव तीर्थ येर दिसे जया ओस । तोचि तया दोष जाणतिया ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे विश्वंभराऐसें वर्म । चुकविल्या धर्म अवघे मिथ्या ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He who sees God and holy places as empty and meaningless, that fault belongs to the one who sees. He who manages to avoid God is ruled by the power of his own past karma.

Pure and impure grounds, the seeds of sin and merit, will each bring their respective fruit of experience. Says Tuka, when one bypasses the essential truth of the all-sustaining Lord, all dharma becomes false.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If a man sees God and holy places as empty and meaningless, that fault is his own, the seer's. The man who manages to dodge God is ruled by the power of his own past deeds. Pure ground and impure ground, the seeds of sin and of merit, each will bring its own fruit to be tasted. Tuka says: when you bypass the heart of it, the all-sustaining Lord, every duty you keep is false.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns a complaint into a mirror. When someone declares God and pilgrimage empty, he refuses to grant the verdict; the emptiness is in the one who sees, not in what is seen. He explains the dodge as the working of past karma, and he insists the moral ledger is exact, that pure and impure ground each yield their own harvest. The closing claim is the radical one, that ritual and duty are worthless if they skip the living center, the all-sustaining Lord, so the test is not how much dharma you perform but whether you have kept your eye on Him.

GATHA 3223 Worldly Life

Worldly life, you cannot argue truth in

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What am I to do when the secret cannot be understood even after being told? The delusion that is already present keeps generating more confusion. Only one who has first brought the mind under control can exercise authority over it.

In one who has not tasted the truth, there is neither flavor nor relish; forced argument is mere stubborn obstinacy. Says Tuka, guard yourself first; there is no need to impose yourself on anyone else.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What can I do when the secret cannot be grasped even after it is told? The delusion already sitting there keeps breeding more confusion. Only one who has first brought his own mind in hand can rule over it. In a man who has not tasted it, there is no flavor and no relish; forced argument is only stubborn obstinacy. Tuka says: guard yourself first. There is no need now to press yourself on anyone else.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram admits the limit of teaching: the secret can be told and still not land, because the hearer's existing delusion keeps manufacturing new confusion. He locates real authority in self-mastery, since you can only govern a mind you have first brought under your own hand. The line about flavor is the diagnosis, that for one who has never tasted the truth there is nothing to relish, and pushing arguments at such a person is just stubbornness on both sides. So the counsel turns inward: tend to your own guarding rather than imposing yourself on others.

GATHA 3224 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, patience the pure seed

मराठी मूळ

आदरासी मोल नये लावूं केजें । धीर शुद्धबीजें गोमटा तो ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे चाडे करा वेवसाव । आह्मांसी तो वाव धीर आहे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When nectar is tossed aside with contempt, poison becomes the necessity of suffering beings. One should not bargain over the price of eagerness; the one with patience and a pure seed is truly blessed.

A body afflicted with disease moves on its own distorted course; what good are cosmetics applied over it? Says Tuka, you may hurry and bustle as you please; we have the patience and the space for it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When nectar is thrown away in contempt, poison becomes what suffering beings must take. Do not haggle over the price of eagerness; the one with patience, the pure seed, is the truly good one. A body riddled with disease moves on its own twisted course; what use is paint laid over it? Tuka says: hurry and bustle as you please. We have the patience, and the room, for it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts two responses to what is offered. Reject the nectar in scorn and you are left with poison, which is all the suffering then have to swallow. He refuses to price eagerness like a commodity and praises instead the patient one, whose patience is a pure seed that grows into something good. The diseased body that moves by its own distortion is his image for a corrupted nature: cosmetics laid over it change nothing, only the inner ground matters. The closing lines are quietly steady, letting the hurried do their bustling while he keeps the patience, and the space, to wait.

GATHA 3225 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, ground first then the harvest

मराठी मूळ

अनुभवाचे रस देऊं आर्त्तभूतां । सोडूं चोजवितां पुढें पोतीं ॥1॥
आधीं भाव सार शुद्ध ते भूमिका । बीज आणि पिका चिंता नाहीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे ज्याचें नाम गुणवंत । तें नाहीं लागत पसरावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I will give the nectar of experience to those in need, opening the storehouse before them. First the foundation of pure devotion must be laid; after that, there is no worry about seeds or harvest.

Says Tuka, one whose name is itself virtuous has no need to advertise it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will give the juice of experience to those in need, opening the storehouse before them. First the ground must be laid, pure devotion as the foundation; after that there is no worry about seed or harvest. Tuka says: a name that is virtuous in itself has no need to be advertised.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram offers to share not doctrine but the actual juice of experience, and he describes himself opening a storehouse to the needy. He sets the order plainly: lay the ground first, which is pure devotion, and then the seed and the crop take care of themselves, so the work is in preparing the heart, not in chasing results. The final line carries his characteristic refusal of show: what is genuinely good announces itself and does not need to be cried in the market, whether that is the Lord's name or the worth of true experience.

GATHA 3226 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, let the master carry it

मराठी मूळ

काय मज एवढा भार । हे वेव्हार चाळवाया ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Am I burdened with the weight of managing all this worldly business? The master knows how to sort it out; my only concern is to eat the meal He provides. Let the one whose worry it is carry it upon his head; the child should simply play.

Says Tuka, when the final reckoning comes, God Himself will take responsibility for these words.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Is so great a weight mine, to manage all this business? The master knows how to untangle it; my only concern is the meal. Let the one whose worry it is carry it on his head; the child should just play. Tuka says: when the final reckoning comes, God will answer for these words.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram refuses to take on the management of the whole affair of living, handing it back to the master whose job it is. He keeps for himself only the smallest of cares, the meal set before him, and likens his proper posture to a child at play while the parent shoulders the worry. The image is deliberately small and trusting against a large anxiety. The closing line stakes everything on God: when the final accounting arrives, it is God, not Tukaram, who will stand behind these confident words.

GATHA 3227 Longing and Separation

Longing, the fish out of water

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I cannot bear it, I cannot bear it, I cannot bear it without Hari. Bring me my dark Lord, someone, bring Him to me.

My jiva writhes like a fish out of water; all directions appear empty and desolate. I forget hunger and thirst; my mind has grown distracted; a single moment feels as long as an age.

If you do not recognize Him, listen: He is the friend of Tuka's brother, the life of the world.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I cannot bear it, I cannot bear it, I cannot bear it without Hari. Bring me, someone bring me, my dark Lord, my Shyam. My life writhes like a fish out of water; every direction looks empty and desolate. I forget hunger and thirst, my mind has come undone, and a single moment stretches as long as an age. If you do not know Him, then listen: He is the friend of Tuka's brother, the very life of the world.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the cry of separation, and the threefold repetition is the sound of someone past composure. Tukaram, here speaking as Tuka's brother, reaches for the most exact image of unbearable lack: a fish thrown out of water, thrashing and unable to live. The world drains of meaning, hunger and thirst no longer register, and time itself swells so that one moment feels like an age. The last lines turn outward to the listener who may not recognize this Lord, naming Him not by power but by intimacy, the friend of the singer and the life of the whole world.

GATHA 3228 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the litany of the Name Vitthal

मराठी मूळ

विठ्ठला रे तुझे वर्णितां गुणवाद । विठ्ठला रे दग्ध जालीं पापें ॥1॥
विठ्ठला रे तुझें पाहातां श्रीमुख । विठ्ठला रे सुख जालें नयना ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O Vitthal, in describing Your virtues, O Vitthal, all my sins are burned away. O Vitthal, seeing Your divine face, O Vitthal, my eyes are filled with bliss.

O Vitthal, embracing You, O Vitthal, my arms and body and mind are cooled. O Vitthal, hearing Your glory, O Vitthal, my being finds rest through Your remembrance.

Says Tuka's brother, O Vitthal, when I held Your feet, all sense of bodily self dissolved.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O Vitthal, in telling Your virtues, O Vitthal, my sins are burned away. O Vitthal, looking on Your blessed face, O Vitthal, my eyes are filled with joy. O Vitthal, in embracing You, O Vitthal, my body and mind and arms are cooled. O Vitthal, in hearing Your glory, O Vitthal, my being finds rest through remembering You. Tuka's brother says: O Vitthal, when I held Your feet, all sense of being a body slipped away.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem is built as a litany, each line opening and closing on the name Vitthal until the name itself becomes the act of worship. Tukaram, speaking here as Tuka's brother, moves through the senses one by one: speaking the Lord's virtues burns sins, seeing His face delights the eyes, the embrace cools the whole body, hearing His glory gives the soul rest. The progression climbs from outer acts to inner stillness. It ends at the feet, where the last and deepest thing happens: holding them, the very sense of being a separate body dissolves, which is the whole aim the senses were leading toward.

GATHA 3229 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the storehouse left open

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे आह्मां विश्वासाच्या बळें। ठेविलें मोकळें देवें येथें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In solitude or in the crowd, I shall raise a joyful commotion. There is not the least trace of impurity here.

I give and take by my own authority; I do not see anyone else to consult. The key to the storehouse is in my hands; whoever wishes may come and see the wares.

Says Tuka, by the strength of faith, God has left everything open and free for us.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Alone or in the crowd, I will raise a glad uproar. There is not the least speck of impurity here. I take and I give by my own authority; I see no one else I must ask. The key to the storehouse is in my hand; whoever wishes, let him come and see the goods. Tuka says: by the strength of faith, God has left it all open and free for us here.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sounds a note of fearless abundance. Whether by himself or in a crowd, he will make his joyful noise, and he insists there is nothing impure in it to hide. The boldest stroke is the claim of authority: he gives and takes freely, answering to no one, because the key to God's storehouse has been put in his own hand and anyone may come inspect the wares. He names the source of this freedom in the last line, that it was not seized but granted: by the strength of faith, God has thrown the treasury open and left it free for His own.

GATHA 3230 Confession and Sin

Confession, only You can pull me out

मराठी मूळ

स्मरणाचे वेळे । व्हावें सावध न कळे ॥1॥
पडिलों विषयांचे ओढीं । कोणी न दिसेसें काढी ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे कळे । तूं चि धावें ऐसें वेळे॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

At the moment of remembrance, one should be alert, yet I do not know how. I have fallen into the pull of sense-pleasures, and I see no one who will pull me out.

My capital is spent; it has become a useless burden upon the earth. Says Tuka, I know that only You can rush to my aid at such a time.

IN PLAIN WORDS

At the moment of remembrance, I should be awake and alert; I do not know how. I have fallen into the pull of the senses, and I see no one who will drag me out. My capital is spent; what is left has become a useless weight on the earth. Tuka says: I know that at such a time it is You alone who can come running.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks here as one who has failed at the one thing he wanted, to stay awake and remember God, and he confesses he does not even know how to do it. He pictures himself dragged off by the pull of the senses with no rescuer in sight. The image of spent capital is bleak self-accounting: the resource he was given is wasted, and what remains of him is dead weight on the ground. Yet the confession turns at the end into its only hope, that the very God he could not remember is the one who can come running to him at exactly such a moment.

GATHA 3231 The Nature of God

Wonder, God's varied creation

मराठी मूळ

पाहा हो देवा कैसे जन । भिन्न भिन्न संचितें ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे जे जे जाती । तैसी िस्थति येतसे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Behold, O God, how varied are these beings, each with a different destiny. No two are alike; You display the pure and the lowly in every shade.

The five elements form a single heap, yet You make them dance on different strings. Says Tuka, whatever class one belongs to, that is the condition one receives.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Look, O God, how varied these people are. Each carries a different store of past deeds. No two are alike. You show the pure and the lowly, every shade of them. The five elements lie in one heap, yet You make them dance on different strings. Tuka says: whatever class one is born into, that is the condition that comes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is marveling at how one God produces such endless difference among beings. The raw material is the same for everyone, the same five elements piled together, yet each life turns out pure or lowly, in its own shade. He points to the hand behind it: God pulls the strings and makes the elements dance into all these forms and fates. The closing line names the order Tukaram sees, that the condition each person receives matches the store of deeds and the station they come with.

GATHA 3232 Prayers

Refusal of opinion, call on Govinda

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let me not fall under anyone's sway; I will call upon Govinda alone. The opinions of the many are manifold, yet all are hollow and empty within.

Let me not agitate my mind over this or that, nor endure needless suffering. Says Tuka, Panduranga has come to fill my portion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let me not fall under anyone's spell. I will call on Govinda alone. The many have many opinions, and all of them are hollow, empty inside. Let me not stir up my mind over this and that; I will not wear myself out with it. Tuka says: Panduranga has come to fill my share.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is refusing to be swayed by the crowd of competing teachings and instead fixing on one name. He calls the many opinions of clever people hollow and empty, not worth tangling his mind in. The discipline he sets himself is to stop agitating over rival views and to stop exhausting himself chasing them. The relief at the end is that he no longer has to fill the gap by his own effort, because Panduranga himself has come to fill what was missing in him.

Plea for release, the vow of the feet

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For once, free me from this sorrow, O God, by untangling the web of sin. I will remember Your feet; this is my vow, day and night, O Panduranga.

For too long I have been made to suffer these painful consequences. Says Tuka, I will offer my body as a sacrifice, bowing and casting even my head before You.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For once, set me free from this sorrow. Untangle the net of my sins. I will remember Your feet; this is my vow, by night and by day, O Panduranga. For too long I have been made to suffer these consequences. Now, Panduranga, release me. Tuka says: I will offer my body as a sacrifice; I will wave even this head of mine before You and cast it down.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is begging for release from a long stretch of suffering he traces to his own sins, picturing them as a net he cannot untangle alone. In return he makes a vow: he will hold God's feet in memory day and night, without break. He says the consequences have run on long enough and asks God to cut them off now. The last line is an offering of his whole self, body and head laid down before God, the gesture of one who keeps nothing back.

तूं वो माझी सखी होसी पांडुरंगे । लवकरी ये गे वाट पाहें ॥ध्रु.॥
तुका ह्मणे माझी पुरवीं हे आस । घालीं ब्रह्मरस भोजन हें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To whom else shall I appeal? Who else will be of help at the hour of death? You alone are my companion, O Panduranga; come quickly, I am watching the road for You. Says Tuka, fulfill this longing of mine; serve me the feast of divine nectar.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To whom else should I go and cry? Who else comes to my aid at the hour of death? You are my friend, O Panduranga. Come quickly; I am watching the road for You. Tuka says: fulfill this longing of mine. Set before me this feast, the food that is the taste of Brahman.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming God as the one refuge precisely because the test is the moment of dying. He asks who else could possibly help then, and answers that no one can, so there is no point appealing elsewhere. He pictures himself waiting at the roadside, a friend watching for the friend who must come quickly. The longing he asks God to fulfill is not for relief alone but for the feast of divine taste, the nourishment of Brahman itself, the highest thing he can name.

GATHA 3235 The Power of the Name

The Name, our only strength

मराठी मूळ

हें आह्मां सकळा । तुझ्या नामाचें चि बळ ॥1॥
करूं अमृताचें पान । दुजें नेणों कांहीं आन ॥ध्रु.॥
जयाचा जो भोग । सुख दुःख पीडी रोग ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे देवा । तुझे पायीं माझा हेवा॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All our strength comes from Your Name alone. We drink this nectar and know nothing else besides.

Whatever one's lot may be, joy or sorrow or the pain of disease, each receives accordingly. Says Tuka, O God, my sole longing rests at Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For all of us, the strength comes from Your Name alone. We drink this nectar; we know nothing else besides. Whatever a person's lot, joy or sorrow or the pain of disease, each receives his own. Tuka says: O God, my one longing rests at Your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is saying that the only real power he and his fellow devotees have is the Name, which he calls a nectar they drink to the exclusion of everything else. He sets this against the ordinary lottery of life, where each person simply receives his own portion of pleasure, pain, and sickness. Against that uncertain lot, the Name is the one thing he chooses and holds to. His single desire, he says, is fixed at God's feet, and he wants nothing outside that.

GATHA 3236 Longing and Separation

Longing, the ache of separation

मराठी मूळ

आर्त माझ्या बहु पोटीं । व्हावीं भेटी पायांशी ॥1॥
यासी तुह्मी कृपावंता । माझी चिंता असों द्या ॥ ।ध्रु.॥
तळमळ करी चित्त । अखंडित वियोगें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे पंढरिनाथा । जाणें वेथा अंतरिंची ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My chitta aches deeply to meet Your feet. O gracious one, keep Your concern upon me.

My mind writhes ceaselessly in the pain of separation from You. Says Tuka, O Lord of Pandhari, You know the suffering of my inner being.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There is a deep ache in me to reach Your feet, to meet them. O gracious one, keep Your care upon me. My mind writhes without rest in the pain of being apart from You. Tuka says: O Lord of Pandhari, You know the suffering inside me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is describing the pain of separation as a physical ache, a longing in the gut to touch God's feet. He asks only that the gracious God keep watching over him while the ache lasts. He admits his mind cannot settle, twisting ceaselessly because he is parted from the one he loves. The comfort he reaches for at the end is that nothing of this hidden suffering is unseen: the Lord of Pandhari already knows the wound within him.

GATHA 3237 Prayers

Plea for release from rebirth

मराठी मूळ

बहु जन्मांतरें फेरे । केले येरे सोडवीं ॥1॥
आळवितों करुणाकरे । विश्वंभरे दयाळे ॥ध्रु.॥
वाहवतों मायापुरीं । येथें करीं कुढावा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे दुजा कोण । ऐसा सीण निवारी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Through many births I have taken so many rounds of existence; deliver me from all this. I call out to You, O merciful one, O Lord of the universe, O compassionate Lord.

I am being tossed about in the city of illusion; take pity on me here. Says Tuka, who else but You can put an end to this suffering?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Through many births I have gone round and round. Set me free from it. I call out to You, O merciful one, O sustainer of the world, O compassionate Lord. I am being swept along in the city of illusion. Take pity on me here. Tuka says: who else but You can end this exhaustion?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is asking to be released from the endless wheel of birth after birth, a circling he is worn out by. He calls on God by the names that name God's nature: merciful, the one who holds up the world, compassionate. He names his condition as being carried helplessly along in the city of illusion, unable to get free by himself. The closing question is also his argument: no one else has the power to end this weariness, so to God alone he turns.

GATHA 3238 Prayers

Surrender to providence, last resort

मराठी मूळ

कराल तें काय नव्हे जी विठ्ठला । चित्त द्यावें बोला बोबडिया ॥1॥
सोडवूनि घ्यावें काळचक्रा हातीं । बहुत विपत्ती भोगविल्या ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे दुजा खुंटला उपाय । म्हणऊनि पाय आठविले ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Is there anything You cannot do, O Vitthal? Listen to my stammering words. Rescue me from the clutches of the wheel of Time; I have endured too many afflictions.

Let it burn what it will and starve what it will and strike what it will; let past karma be exhausted once and for all. Says Tuka, every other remedy has failed; therefore I remember Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Is there anything You cannot do, O Vitthal? Give Your attention to my stammering words. Take me out of the hands of the wheel of Time. I have suffered many disasters. Let it starve what it will, let it kill what it will; let my past karma be spent once and for all. Tuka says: every other remedy has run out. That is why I have remembered Your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is throwing himself on God's power after exhausting his own. He owns that his prayer is clumsy, stammered, and asks God to listen anyway. The bold middle is a kind of consent: let the wheel of Time and past karma do their worst, starve and strike, so long as the debt is finally cleared. His point is not despair but surrender, the choice to let the consequences burn out rather than dodge them. The honest reason he turns to God's feet is that he has tried everything else and nothing was left.

GATHA 3239 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, devotion over liberation

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am drunk with the joy of devotion; let me drink this nectar with my own lips. I shall spend my days in the company of saints, in a flood of blissful love.

This joy that fills the earth is envied even by Brahma and the other gods. Vaikuntha makes no claims; Panduranga Himself runs to attend the kirtan.

Why seek liberation at all? What meeting could match the sweetness of this devotion? Says Tuka, this sweetness is enough; this alone fulfills all my desires.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am drunk with the joy of devotion. Let me drink this nectar with my own mouth. I will spend my days in the company of the saints, in a flood of the joy of love. This joy that fills the earth, even Brahma and the gods envy it. Vaikuntha makes no claim on me; Panduranga himself runs to the kirtan. Why should I want liberation at all? What meeting could come from it that matches this taste? Tuka says: this is sweet; this alone is enough to satisfy my whole desire.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praising loving devotion as higher than the goals other paths chase. He says the bliss of bhakti, drunk in the company of saints, is something even the gods and Brahma look on with envy. He sets it above heaven and above release: he does not need Vaikuntha, since God himself comes running to where the singing is. Then he asks the radical question plainly, why want liberation, when no reward it offers could equal the present sweetness. For him the devotion itself is the fulfillment, and he asks for nothing beyond it.

GATHA 3240 The Power of the Name

The Name, the open storehouse

मराठी मूळ

फोडिलें भांडार । माप घेऊनियां खरें ॥1॥
केली हरिनामाची वरो । मागितलें आतां सरो ॥ध्रु.॥
देशांत सुकाळ । जाला हारपला काळ ॥2॥
घ्यावें धणीवरी । तुका ह्मणे लाहान थोरीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The storehouse has been broken open, and the true measure has been taken. The marketplace of Hari's Name has been established; let all that has been asked for now be given.

Abundance has spread across the land; the shadow of death has disappeared. Says Tuka, take your fill, young and old alike.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The storehouse has been broken open, and the true measure has been taken out. The market of Hari's Name has been set up; let everything asked for now be handed over. Plenty has spread across the land; the time of want has vanished. Tuka says: take your fill, small and great alike.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures the Name of Hari as a treasury thrown open to everyone, with the grain measured out honestly and given to all who come. The market is now selling freely, so whatever anyone asks for is to be handed over without holding back. He says the famine is over and abundance has spread everywhere. The invitation is for everyone without distinction, young and old, low and high: come and take as much as you can hold, because the wealth of the Name is unlimited.

GATHA 3241 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, bliss beyond telling

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे तैसा ओतलासे ठसा । अनुभव सरिसा मुखा आला ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the pool of bliss arise waves of bliss; the very body of bliss is made of bliss. What can I say has happened beyond all telling? My love will not let me move forward.

Just as a mother's craving during pregnancy reflects the child within, so the inner feeling imprints itself. Says Tuka, the impression has been poured in; the experience has risen to my very lips.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the deep pool of bliss, waves of bliss rise. The very body of bliss is made of bliss. What can I say has happened? It is beyond all telling. My love will not let me go a step further. As a mother's craving in pregnancy reflects the child within her, so the inner feeling shows itself there. Tuka says: in that same way the impression has been poured in me; the experience has risen all the way to my lips.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is trying to describe an inward state of joy that overruns description, where everything, the water, the waves, even the body, is nothing but bliss. He admits language fails him: his love stops him, and he cannot move past it to explain. To say something of it he reaches for an image, the way a pregnant mother's longings mirror the child she carries, the inner reality pressing out into the outer. So with him, he says, the experience has been poured into him so completely that it has risen to his very lips and become his speech.

GATHA 3242 Prayers

Surrender to the Mother, plea for peace

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

That is why I have held Your feet, O Mother Vitthal. Make me Your own and give me Your assurance.

This growing restlessness and worry within me must now be calmed. Says Tuka, You dwell within my very being and are never apart from me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

That is why I have held Your feet, O Mother Vitthal. Make me Your own, and give me Your assurance. This restlessness and worry have grown in me; calm them now. Tuka says: You live within my life, and You are never apart from me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram clings to God as a child to a mother, addressing Vitthal as Mother and gripping the feet. His two requests are simple: claim me as Your own, and give me the reassurance I need. The trouble he brings is a swelling restlessness and anxiety, and he asks plainly that it be quieted. The ground of his confidence is in the last line: this God is not far off but dwells within his own life, never separate, so the comfort he asks for is already close at hand.

GATHA 3243 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the blessing that ends division

मराठी मूळ

कल्याण या आशीर्वादें । जाती द्वंद्वें नासोनि ॥1॥
आश्वासिलें नारायणें । प्रेमदानें अंतरिंच्या ॥ध्रु.॥
गेली निवारोनि आतां । सकळ चिंता यावरि ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे गातां गीत । आलें हित सामोरें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By this auspicious blessing, all dualities have been destroyed. Narayana has given me assurance through the gift of inner love.

All worry has been dispelled once and for all. Says Tuka, while singing His glory, well-being came rushing out to meet me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This blessing is my welfare. All the pairs that pull me apart fall away and die. Narayana has reassured me. He gave me the gift of love inside my heart. Now every worry is cleared away. Tuka says: as I sang the song, my own good came out to meet me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names a blessing whose work is to end the inner split, the pairs of opposites that keep a person torn. The reassurance does not come as advice from outside; Narayana plants it as love within the heart. From that one gift everything else follows: dualities dissolve, worry is cleared off for good. The closing line is the surprise of bhakti, that singing is not a request that may go unanswered but a meeting, where the singer's own welfare walks toward him.

GATHA 3244 The Power of the Name

The Name, do not let the sweetness slip

मराठी मूळ

हरिनामवेली पावली विस्तार । फळीं पुष्पीं भार बोल्हावला ॥1॥
तेथें माझ्या मना होई पिक्षराज । साधावया काज तृप्तीचें या ॥ध्रु. ॥
मुळळिचया बीजें दाखविली गोडी । लवकर चि जोडी जालियाची ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे क्षणक्षणां जातो काळ । गोडी ते रसाळ अंतरेल ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The vine of Hari's Name has grown and spread wide, laden with the weight of flowers and fruit. Let my mind become a royal bird there, to feast upon it and attain satisfaction.

From the very first seed the sweetness was revealed, and the harvest came quickly. Says Tuka, time passes moment by moment; do not let this luscious sweetness slip away.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The vine of Hari's Name has grown and spread wide. It is heavy with flowers and fruit. Let my mind become a royal bird there, to feed and be satisfied. From the very first seed the sweetness showed itself, and the harvest came quickly. Tuka says: time goes by moment after moment. Do not let this rich, juicy sweetness be lost.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures the Name as a vine grown enormous, bent under flower and fruit, and asks his mind to perch on it like a bird and eat its fill. The point of the image is its ease: from the very first seed the taste was there, and the harvest was quick, so the reward of the Name is not far off or hard-won. Against that he sets the warning of the last verse, that time runs out moment by moment. The sweetness is offered now, and the only loss is to let the passing minutes carry it away unenjoyed.

GATHA 3245 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the merit of many births bearing fruit

मराठी मूळ

बरवें ऐसें आलें मना । नारायणा या काळें ॥1॥
देव आह्मा प्राणसखा । जालें दुःखा खंडण ॥ध्रु. ॥
जन्मांतरिंच्या पुण्यरासी । होत्या त्यांसी फळ आलें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे निजठेवा । होईल हेवा लाधलों ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How beautiful that this has entered my chitta, O Narayana, at this very time. God has become my soul's dearest friend; the sorrow of lifetimes has been shattered.

The store of merit accumulated over many births has at last borne its fruit. Says Tuka, I shall count myself blessed for having found this innermost treasure.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Something good has come into my mind, O Narayana, at this very time. God has become the dearest friend of my life. My sorrow is cut to pieces. The heap of merit gathered through many births has now borne its fruit. Tuka says: I have found the treasure that is my own. I will count myself blessed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram marks a moment when, all at once, God arrives as the closest friend of his life and the grief of lifetimes is broken. He reads this not as luck but as harvest: the store of good gathered across many births has finally ripened into fruit. The treasure he names is nijatheva, the wealth that was always his own, now recovered. The mood is gratitude shading into awe, a man astonished that the long accounting of his births has paid out in this single nearness to God.

GATHA 3246 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, shame cast aside

मराठी मूळ

जरि हे आड यती लाज । कैसें काज साधतें ॥1॥
कारण केलें उठाउठी । पायीं मिठी घातली ॥ध्रु.॥
समपिनला जीव भाव । धरिला भाव अखंड ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आड कांहीं । काळ नाहीं घातला ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If shame had stood in my way, how would this work have been accomplished? The deed was done without delay; I clasped His feet at once. I surrendered my life and my love and held on to Him without a break.

Says Tuka, I allowed no obstacle and wasted no time.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If shame had stood in the way, how would the work ever get done? I did the one thing that mattered at once. I clasped His feet and held on. I offered my life and my love. I held to that love without a break. Tuka says: I let nothing block me. I wasted no time.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram puts his finger on the obstacle that stops most people, self-consciousness, the shame of throwing oneself at God's feet in front of others. He refuses it outright: had he honored that shame, the one needful thing would never have been accomplished. So he acted without hesitation, gripped the feet, and surrendered life and love in an unbroken hold. The poem is a self-examination turned into instruction: the only thing that delayed nothing was a man willing to look foolish, because the work of surrender cannot wait on dignity.

GATHA 3247 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, truth staked with one's life

मराठी मूळ

पात्र शुद्ध चित्त गोही । न लगे कांहीं सांगणें ॥1॥
शूर तरी सत्य चि व्हावें । साटी जीवें करूनि ॥ध्रु.॥
अमुप च सुखमान । स्वामी जन मानावें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जैसी वाणी । तैसे मनीं परिपाक ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the chitta is pure and true, no further instruction is needed. If you would be a real warrior, stake your very life on truth.

The immeasurable honor is this: consider the Master as your own people. Says Tuka, let the words on the tongue match the ripeness within the chitta.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the heart is pure, it is its own witness. Then nothing more needs to be told. If you would be a true warrior, be truthful, and stake your very life on it. The measure of real honor is this: treat the Master, and all people, as your own. Tuka says: let the words on your tongue match what has ripened inside your heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram redraws courage in moral terms: the real warrior is the one who will stake his life on truth, not on the battlefield but in plain honesty. He grounds it in a pure heart, which needs no instruction because it bears witness to itself. From there he asks for two things, that the Master and other people be held as one's own, and that speech match the inner ripeness rather than running ahead of it. The thread is integrity: no gap between tongue and heart, no honor higher than treating others as your own.

GATHA 3248 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, hearing is not knowing

मराठी मूळ

प्रगटलें ज्ञान । नारायण भूतीं तें ॥1॥
अनुभव च घेऊं व्हावा । विनंती देवा करूनियां ॥ध्रु.॥
देखोवेखीं वदे वाणी। पडिल्या कानीं प्रमाणें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे योगक्षेम । घडे तें वर्म साधावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The knowledge of Narayana dwelling in all beings has come to light. One should take this experience within by making earnest prayer to God.

The tongue speaks merely by repeating what the ears have heard. Says Tuka, pursue the secret that brings you well-being and security.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It has come to light: Narayana lives in all beings. You must take this in as your own experience. Pray earnestly to God for it. The tongue only speaks what the ears have heard. Tuka says: pursue the secret that brings you real welfare and keeps you safe.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram states the truth, that Narayana dwells in every being, and then refuses to let it stay a piece of borrowed knowledge. The decisive line is that the tongue merely repeats what the ears caught; secondhand truth is not yet yours. So he tells the seeker to ask God in earnest prayer for the thing itself, the lived experience behind the words. The yogakshema he names is the soul's true welfare and safety, and his counsel is to chase the inner secret rather than rest in talk about it.

GATHA 3249 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, detachment levels the road

मराठी मूळ

मुख्य आधीं विषयत्याग । विधिभाग पाळणें ॥1॥
मन पावे समाधान । हें चि दान देवाचें ॥ध्रु.॥
उदासीन वृत्त देहीं। चाड नाहीं पाळणें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नाहीं भय । सम सोय विषमाची॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The foremost step is the renunciation of sense-pleasures and the observance of sacred law. When the mind attains contentment, that itself is God's gift.

An attitude of detachment toward the body, without care for its maintenance, is the way. Says Tuka, then there is no fear; the uneven path becomes level.

IN PLAIN WORDS

First, before all else, give up the chase after sense-pleasures, and keep the sacred rules. When the mind comes to rest, that contentment is itself God's gift. Hold the body with an indifferent heart, with no anxious care to keep it. Tuka says: then there is no fear. The rough and the smooth become the same to you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out an order of practice: first let go of the appetite for sense-pleasures and keep the sacred discipline, and the fruit is a settled mind. He insists that this contentment is not the practitioner's achievement but God's gift. The next step is detachment toward the body, dropping the constant anxious tending of it. The payoff is freedom from fear, where the uneven and even, the hard and the easy, are received the same way, because a person no longer clinging to comfort has nothing left to dread.

GATHA 3250 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, love answers love

मराठी मूळ

आतां हें चि सार हें चि सार । मूळबीज रे आइका॥1॥
आवडीनें आवडी उरे । जें ज्या झुरे तें त्यासी ॥ध्रु.॥
प्रेमाचिया सूत्रदोरी । नाहीं उरी उरवी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे चिंतन बरें । आहे खरें ख†यापें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This alone is essential, this alone is essential. Listen to this root-seed truth.

Love begets love; whatever one yearns for, that very thing yearns in return. Along the thread of love, nothing is held back.

Says Tuka, contemplation is good; it is a sure and true remedy.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now this alone is the heart of it, this alone is the heart of it. Listen, this is the root-seed. Love makes love remain. Whatever one yearns for, that very thing yearns back for him. On the thread of love nothing is held back, nothing left over. Tuka says: contemplation is good. It is a true and real remedy.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram drops every other teaching to hand over one root-seed truth. Its center is that love is answered in kind: whatever you yearn for yearns back toward you, so devotion is never a one-way reaching into silence. He pictures love as a single thread on which nothing is withheld, the heart and its object fully given to each other. The closing turns this into practice, naming contemplation as the sure remedy, the way the seed is actually planted and the mutual love kept alive.

GATHA 3251 Prayers

Prayer, carry the dull soul's burden

मराठी मूळ

केला तैसा अंगीकार । माझा भार चालवीं ॥1॥
होऊं अंतराय बुद्धी । कृपानिधी नेदावी ॥ध्रु.॥
आह्मी तरी जड जीव। कैंचा भाव पुरता ॥2॥
अनन्यभावें घ्यावी सेवा । आह्मां देवा घडेसी ॥3॥
तुह्मीं आह्मी शरणागतें । कृपावंतें रक्षीजे ॥4॥
तुका ह्मणे भाकुं कींव । असों जीव जड आह्मी ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Accept me as I am and carry my burden. Do not allow my intellect to become an obstacle, O treasury of mercy.

I am indeed a dull jiva; how can my devotion ever be adequate? Accept my service as offered with undivided surrender, O God; that is all I can give. We are Your refugees, O gracious one; please protect us.

Says Tuka, I appeal to Your compassion, for we are heavy and dull.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You have taken me as Your own, so now carry my load. Do not let my own intellect become the obstacle, O treasury of mercy. I am a heavy, dull creature. Where would I find devotion that is enough? Take the service I offer with undivided surrender, O God; let that be counted from me. We have come to You for refuge; gracious one, protect us. Tuka says: I beg for Your pity. We are heavy, dull souls.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays from the position of someone who has already been accepted and now asks God to make good on it by carrying the burden himself. He confesses his own intellect as the likely obstacle and asks that it not be allowed to get in the way. The honesty is the heart of the poem: he claims no adequate devotion, only a dull, heavy soul whose single offering is undivided surrender. Everything is thrown on God's mercy, the one who took him in being asked to be the one who protects and pities, because the refugee has nothing else to bring.

GATHA 3252 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the body that feeds you betrays you

मराठी मूळ

सोसें बहुगर्भवासीं । मेलों असों उपवासीं । नाहीं सखीं ऐसीं । तेथें कोणी भेटलीं ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे धनमानें । माझ्या बाटलों मीपणें । नाहीं दिला जनें । देखों लाभें हा लाभ ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have suffered through many wombs, starving and dying. In those places no companion or friend ever appeared.

Therefore, attend to your own salvation; this body is impermanent. You have not given your mind over to freeing yourself from delusion.

That which feeds you mouthful by mouthful will one day become hostile; it torments you, yet it never sets you free. Says Tuka, blinded by my own wealth, honor, and ego, I have not recognized the true gain that lies before me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have suffered through many wombs, starving and dying. In those places no friend, no companion, ever met me. Do your own good, do it now: this body does not last. You have not given your mind to freeing yourself from delusion. The thing that feeds you mouthful by mouthful turns hostile in the end; it torments you and never sets you free. Tuka says: blinded by wealth, by honor, by my own I-ness, I did not see the real gain set right in front of me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram preaches first against complacency by recalling the long agony of repeated births, where no friend ever came to help. From that he presses the one urgent task: tend to your own salvation now, because the body is impermanent and the mind has not yet been turned toward freedom from delusion. The sharp image is the body itself, fed mouthful by mouthful, which still turns against you and never grants release. He ends by turning the charge on himself, confessing that wealth, honor, and ego blinded him to the true gain lying right before him, so the warning is self-examination, not contempt.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let those who wish seek the formless; my longing is for the state of His living presence. My devotion is no different now; my desires are bound to His feet alone.

A child cannot behave like one who is all-knowing; how could I hold the distance? This love for the Name, once tasted, cannot be abandoned; do not break my bond of devotion. You may try to entice me with the allure of liberation; go and beguile the seekers of abstract Brahman-knowledge instead.

Says Tuka, why do You try to drain my devotional bliss by luring me toward emptiness?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let those who wish for it seek the formless. My longing is for the state of His living form. My heart is not different now. My desires are tied to His feet alone. A child cannot act like one who knows everything; how could I keep my distance from You? This love for the Name, once it has caught hold, will not let go. Do not break my bond of devotion. You may try to tempt me with the lure of liberation; go and beguile the seekers of bare Brahman-knowledge instead. Tuka says: where is the bliss of my devotion? Why do You try to lure me into emptiness and drain it away?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram draws a clear line between two paths and plants himself on one: let others chase the formless absolute, but his longing is fixed on God with form and on His feet. He defends his choice with a child's logic, that a child cannot pretend to be an all-knowing sage and cannot hold itself at a distance from its mother. The poem reads almost as an argument with God, refusing the offer of liberation as a temptation meant for knowledge-seekers, not for him. His fear is precise: that the lure of formless emptiness would drain off the bliss of devotion, and he asks God plainly not to break the bond.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We devotees are of a single nature, O Lord; eloquent speech and fine argument cannot serve us. You know our signals, O Mother; do not let agitation disturb the mind.

Calm us and put us to Your breast, O compassionate one. You can become anything, but I should not be made to feel otherwise; nothing should appeal to me besides worship.

Let me imagine Your form and speak Your Name with my lips. Says Tuka, wherever I look, on land or water, I see only You.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We who have faith are of one single kind, O Lord. Fine speech and clever argument cannot serve us. You know our signs, O Mother. Do not let agitation rise up in our minds. Calm us, and hold us to Your breast, O merciful one. You can become anything at all, but do not let my heart feel otherwise; nothing should appeal to me except worship. Let me picture Your form and say Your Name with my lips. Tuka says: wherever the people look, on water or on land, I see only You.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks for all simple devotees, people of a single, straightforward nature whom eloquence and argument cannot help. He turns to God as Mother, the one who reads the wordless signs of her child and is asked to soothe its agitation and draw it to her breast. The one request he makes for himself is constancy: God may take any form, but the devotee's heart must not be made to want anything besides worship. The poem ends in that fulfilled state, where imagining the form and speaking the Name has opened into seeing God everywhere, on land and water alike.

Steadiness, courage over shame

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why live in humiliation? To what purpose? When worldly life is ruled by destiny, at least maintain your courage. Whatever will be will be; there is no degradation in that.

Says Tuka, all is well when God is gracious.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why live in a low, beaten way? What is the use of it? Worldly life is ruled by what was already written. So keep a firm footing of courage. Whatever is going to happen will happen. There is no disgrace in that. Tuka says: when God is gracious, all of it turns out well.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is steadying a person worn down by life. He says the shape of your worldly fortune is already set by destiny, so cringing and living in shame changes nothing and serves no purpose. The one thing still in your hands is your courage: keep that footing firm. Accept that whatever comes will come, and refuse to read it as humiliation. The poem rests the whole thing on grace, that when God is kind, the outcome is good even when you cannot control it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How many troubles will you endure before you become utterly helpless? You are tormented and worn down by the demands of worldly life. Take refuge in my Lord, the compassionate Panduranga.

He keeps His faithful ones close by His side. Without asking for anything, the right thing will happen of its own accord.

Hold no wish other than a single-pointed surrender. Says Tuka, sincere devotion will bring you to the right place, if you dedicate your life wholly to His service.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How many sorrows will you carry, you poor soul, before you give up? The pressures of worldly life have left you tormented and worn. Go and take refuge with my Lord, the merciful Panduranga. He keeps those who trust him close beside him, body against body. Without your asking for anything, the right thing gets done on its own. Hold no other wish than a single, undivided surrender. Tuka says: true feeling will bring you to your place, if you give your whole life to his service.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is pleading with someone exhausted by the demands of daily life. His point is that you keep absorbing blow after blow and waiting until you are completely helpless, when the way out is open now: take shelter in Panduranga. He promises that God draws the trusting one physically near and arranges what is needed without being asked. The condition is total, single-pointed surrender, wanting nothing else. The closing line names the stakes: it is sincere devotion, not bargaining, that carries a life to its true resting place, and only a life given wholly to that service arrives.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A father labors to build an inheritance for his child, drying up his own hands in the effort. He makes the child the sole heir of his estate, carrying him on his hip and shouldering every burden.

He adorns the child with ornaments and watches with delight, showing him the great treasure he has stored up. Says Tuka, he will not let anyone else torment his child, for he is generous with his own very life.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A father builds up an inheritance, pulled along by love for his child, drying out his own hands with the work. All at once he made me the sole heir of his estate, carrying me on his hip and taking the load on his shoulder. He puts ornaments on me and looks with delight, and shows me, making much of it, the great treasure he has saved. Tuka says: he will not let anyone else trouble his child, for he is generous with his very own life.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures God as a father and himself as the child, to say what kind of love he is held in. The father wears himself out earning, and then hands the whole estate to the child for no reason the child earned: that is grace, an inheritance given, not deserved. He carries the child, shoulders every burden, decks him out, and proudly shows him the treasure that is now his. The last line lands the protection in it: this father guards his child from all harm, holding back nothing, spending his own life freely. The point is that the devotee is not a servant who earns wages but a cherished heir.

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Come, O devotees of Hari, let us conquer death itself! How small is its power before our strength! In full color and pageantry, in many moods and playful joys, let us sport as our hearts desire. Through this or that form of praise, all find happiness; the inner worship of Narayana takes place naturally.

Let the crooked-necked ones speak their harsh words; whoever catches the rhythm, let them chant the name of Govinda. Each one as they love, one outdoing the next, dancing and playing; here there is no great or small.

Says Tuka, let no one break the current of love here; to separate God and devotee is a sin.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Come, you servants of Hari, let us conquer death itself. How small is its power before our strength. In bright colors and pageantry, in many moods and playful joy, in laughter and delight as the heart loves, let us play. By one way or another, many people find happiness, and the inner worship of Narayana happens of itself. Let the crooked-necked ones speak their harsh words. Whoever catches the rhythm, let them chant Govinda. Each one as they love, one outdoing the next, dancing and acting; here there is no great one and no small one. Tuka says: let no one break the current of love here. To split apart God and devotee is a sin.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is rallying the singers of Hari's name into a kirtan that he says overpowers death itself, because the gathered love of devotees is stronger than time. He blesses the whole noisy, colorful, playful display: many roads of praise bring people joy, and through it the real worship, the inner adoration of Narayana, happens without effort. He brushes aside the sour critics, the crooked-necked ones who sneer; let them grumble, while anyone who finds the beat joins the chanting of Govinda. In this circle there is no rank, no high and low, only people losing themselves in love. The closing claim names the one offense: to break that current of love, or to drive a wedge between God and devotee, is sin.

Renunciation, letting it all burn

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When injustice is everywhere, what can a single person do? Let it all be burned away in one stroke, and let what is pure remain. What can I truly call my own? Let me guard at least this much.

Says Tuka, now let the mind find no more need for debate and remedy.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Everything here is in the wrong; what can one person alone do about it? Now let it all burn away at once, and let what is set apart, the pure, remain. What of it is truly mine? Let me keep safe only that much. Tuka says: now the mind has no need of any remedy or argument.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at a world full of injustice and admits a single person cannot set it right. So he stops trying to patch it and lets the whole tangle burn off in one stroke, asking only that what is genuinely apart and pure be left standing. He tests his attachments with one question, what is actually mine, and answers that the only thing worth guarding is that pure remainder. The poem ends in a settled mind: no more scheming for fixes, no more inner debate, because once you see what truly belongs to you, the struggle to remedy everything else falls away.

GATHA 3260 Social Criticism

Social criticism, a base nature stays base

मराठी मूळ

काय वृंदावन मोहियेलें गुळें । काय जिरें काळें उपचारिलें ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे नये पाकासी दगड । शूकरासी गोड जैसी विष्ठा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Has the sacred basil plant been won over with sweetness? Has the bitter cumin been tamed by tender care? Just so, a lowborn nature remains low; all instruction lavished upon it is wasted labor. The scorpion does not understand your caresses; it only shows its own colors.

Says Tuka, you cannot cook a stone; the pig delights only in filth.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Has the basil plant ever been won over with sweetness? Has the bitter cumin been cured by gentle treatment? In the same way, a base nature stays base; the effort of instructing it is only wasted labor. The scorpion does not know your stroking of its body; it just shows its own colors. Tuka says: a stone will not turn into cooked food, and to the pig, dung is sweet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is being blunt about how little outward kindness changes a hardened, base disposition. His images all make one point: you cannot sweeten what is bitter by nature, you cannot pet a scorpion into gentleness, you cannot cook a stone soft, and a pig will relish filth no matter what you offer it. So teaching and care lavished on a person set in a low pattern can be wasted effort. The sting is aimed at the pattern itself, the fixed appetite that turns every kindness back into its own ugliness, and at the honest question of whether the instruction can land at all, rather than at writing anyone off as worthless.

GATHA 3261 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the flatterer of men

मराठी मूळ

स्तवूनियां नरा । केला आयुष्याचा मातेरा ॥1॥

जीव ज्याचें दान। त्याचा खंडूनियां मान ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे वाणी । आइके त्या दोष कानीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By flattering mortals, he has squandered his life. By neglecting Narayana, he has earned nothing but sin.

He dishonors the very one who gave him the gift of life. Says Tuka, the tongue that speaks such words pours sin into its own ears.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By praising mere men, he has wasted his whole life. By neglecting Narayana, he has piled up nothing but sins. He cuts down the honor of the very one who gave him the gift of life. Tuka says: the tongue that speaks like this pours its own sin into its ears.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks the habit of flattering powerful men while ignoring God. He says a life spent buttering up mortals is a life thrown away, and that turning your back on Narayana is itself how the sins accumulate. The sharpest line points out the ingratitude: God is the one who gave you the very life you live, and by withholding honor from God to spend it on men, you dishonor your own benefactor. The closing image makes the offense self-poisoning: the praising tongue does not just speak the sin outward, it funnels it straight back into the speaker's own ears. The warning is about where we aim our praise, and a call to examine whose approval we are really chasing.

GATHA 3262 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the belly-driven coward

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे धर्म । न कळे माजल्याचा भ्रम॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He shows no reverence to the saints but bows before anyone of worldly power. Driven by his belly, he has degraded devotion to God.

He prostrates and honors the feet of the unworthy. Says Tuka, the arrogant fool does not understand true dharma.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He gives no honor to the saints, yet treats worldly power as a god. Such people, beaten down by their own bellies, have disgraced themselves through their craving. He throws himself flat on the ground and reveres the feet of the low. Tuka says: the swollen, arrogant man does not know what dharma is.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram exposes the person who slights holy people while groveling before whoever holds power and can fill his stomach. The driving force he names is the belly: hunger and craving have made the man cheapen his own devotion and bow where there is nothing worth bowing to. He prostrates fully and honors the feet of the unworthy, mistaking position for holiness. The last line lands the diagnosis: such a man, puffed up and deluded, has lost the very sense of what dharma is. The hard look is meant to turn back on us, to ask whom we bend to and what appetite is bending us.

GATHA 3263 Prayers

Prayer, give me saving wisdom

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

O gracious Lord, grant me that wisdom by which I may attain liberation and find my place at Your feet. Says Tuka, O God, come and dwell within my chitta.

IN PLAIN WORDS

O gracious one, become the giver of right understanding to me. Give me the wisdom by which I am lifted up and find a footing at your feet. Tuka says: O God, come and live inside my heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays for one gift only: the understanding that saves. He addresses God as the merciful giver and asks to be made wise, not for worldly cleverness but for the kind of knowing that lifts a soul up and sets it firmly at God's feet. The poem treats liberation as something granted by grace through right understanding, not won by the seeker alone. It ends with the deepest version of the request, that God not merely teach from outside but come and dwell within his heart, so the wisdom and the giver are one.

GATHA 3264 Autobiography

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have not sought mantras from anyone; I have kept it alive within my own jiva. My mind is fixed upon the brick where He stands; I contemplate those two equal feet.

By holding firm faith, I have been carried across, girded with an unshakable resolve. Says Tuka, those who were saved before me left this very foothold for us to stand on.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I did not go begging a mantra from anyone; I have kept it alive within my own soul. I have fixed my mind, with feeling, on the brick where he stands, contemplating those two equal feet. I was carried across because I held firm faith and girded myself with an unshakable resolve. Tuka says: those who were saved before me left this very foothold behind for us to stand on.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is testifying to how his own deliverance came. He did not collect a secret mantra from any teacher; he kept his living faith inside himself, fixing his mind with devotion on Vitthal's feet set level on the brick at Pandhari. What carried him across was not technique but firm faith and a resolve he refused to loosen. The closing line widens it past himself: this same simple foothold, devotion to those feet, is what every saint who was saved before him left behind for later seekers to stand on. The point is that the path is already proven and available, requiring trust rather than esoteric instruction.

GATHA 3265 The Nature of God

Nature of God, the rope and the snake

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

With the restless it is restless, with the still it is still; it makes the water ripple and churn. The secret is simple, yet the mind is not in our hands; the strong ghost of delusion haunts the chitta.

The sun's image in water never truly separates from the sun; do not compare a shadow with its source. Says Tuka, one trembles at a rope mistaking it for a snake; the fear persists until the truth is known.

IN PLAIN WORDS

With the restless it is restless, with the still it is still; it makes the water ripple and roar. The secret is simple, yet the mind is not in our hands; this strong ghost of delusion haunts the heart. The sun's reflection in water never really breaks off from the sun; do not treat the shadow as equal to its source. Tuka says: a man trembles at a rope, taking it for a snake, and the fear stays until the truth is known.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is explaining why God seems near or far, calm or stirred, depending on us: the one reality takes on restlessness in the restless and stillness in the still, like water that ripples or lies quiet. The secret of it is simple, he says, but the trouble is the mind, which we do not control and which is haunted by a stubborn ghost of delusion. He gives two images: the sun reflected in water is never actually cut off from the sun, so do not mistake the reflection for the real thing; and a man who sees a coiled rope in the dark trembles, sure it is a snake. The fear is wholly produced by the false seeing and lasts exactly as long as the ignorance. Once the truth is known, both the imagined snake and the fear simply dissolve.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When love stirs within, it makes itself known through signs and symptoms. What is in the chitta stands upon the lips; the chitta consents to the mind.

Just as a pregnant mother's cravings reveal what the womb holds, so one's inner radiance is reflected outwardly. Says Tuka, accept what arises; eat what you feel like eating.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When love comes, it can be known; its qualities and signs show themselves. What is in the heart stands upon the lips; the heart goes along with the mind. Just as a pregnant woman's cravings tell what the womb holds, the inner light is reflected outward. Tuka says: accept what arises; eat what you feel like eating.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram observes that real love for God cannot stay hidden; it betrays itself through signs you can read. What fills the heart rises to the lips, and the inner state and the outward speech move together. His homely image is the pregnant woman whose cravings reveal what the womb is forming: in the same way, what is growing inside a devotee shines out and can be seen. The closing line trusts that inner pull as a guide, accept whatever rises within you and follow the genuine craving, because the longing that surfaces is itself the reliable sign of what is truly being carried within.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What kind of inauspicious hour has dawned? Today my chitta was hurt during the time of sacred discourse. Because of accumulated sin, wicked people appeared at this very hour.

Says Tuka, they came to pour poisonous words into my ears.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What hour is this? Something foul has fallen across it. Today my mind is hurt. During the holy discourse I was worn down. By the working of sin, at that very hour, those people showed their faces. Tuka says: they came to pour wicked words into my ears.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is mourning a kirtan that was spoiled. He had set the hour aside for sacred discourse, and into that hour came people who poured ugly, hostile words into his ears, leaving his mind bruised and exhausted. He does not curse them; he reads the intrusion as the ripening of sin, an inauspicious turn that crossed a holy time. The complaint is about how easily the noise of malice can soil the very space meant for God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How many times must one be born, only to be humiliated again and again? Therefore the jiva took fright and surrendered to Vitthal. Past karma pursues relentlessly; one cannot simply walk away from it.

Says Tuka, this disgrace is happening right before our eyes.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How many times must I be born, only to be shamed again and again? So my soul took fright and went for refuge to Vithoba. Past karma rides heavy on my back; I cannot just walk on past it. Tuka says: look, this disgrace is happening right now, before our eyes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names the fear that drives him to surrender. Birth after birth ends in the same humiliation, and the weight of past deeds clings to him so closely that he cannot outrun it by his own effort. That dread, not any calm calculation, is what sends the frightened soul running to Vithoba for refuge. He points to the disgrace as something visible right now, so the listener cannot dismiss the danger as distant or merely theological.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I had been trapped in forced labor on the road to worldly existence. Then, along the way, grace was shown and a meeting with Vitthal took place.

There was an immeasurable burden upon my head. Says Tuka, I had been wondering anxiously: what generous soul will come to my rescue?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I had been caught in forced labor, trapped while travelling the road of worldly life. Then on that very road grace was shown, and I met Vithoba. There was a load on my head, a burden beyond measure. Tuka says: I had been worrying, who, what generous one, will ever come to meet me?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells his rescue as a story of the road. He pictures samsara as a journey of forced, unpaid labor, with an immeasurable burden pressed on his head and no relief in sight. While he was still anxiously wondering whether any generous soul would ever come to help, grace met him on that very road in the form of Vithoba. The point is that the deliverance was unearned and unexpected, arriving exactly where he was bound and breaking.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A dog barks and runs after an elephant, then collapses worn out and suffers for it. What can a mosquito do to such a beast? By its own nature it only torments itself. A swollen goat provokes the lion; it has taken hold of its own death. Tuka says: the wicked who trouble the saints only blacken their own faces.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers the malice of the wicked with three images of self-defeat. The dog chasing the elephant, the mosquito against the great beast, the goat that picks a fight with the lion: each attacker harms no one but itself, exhausted, stung by its own nature, seizing its own death. The lesson is aimed at the impulse, not at scorn for the person. Those who torment the saints think they are striking a target, but the harm and the blackened face come back upon the one who attacks.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Go, all of you, to Pandharpur! He is the true companion of the lowly. He does not hold virtues or faults in His mind; He makes you like Himself.

He stands with upraised arms, ready to ferry you across the ocean of existence. Says Tuka, the urgency is great, and many meetings have taken place.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Go, all of you, to Pandharpur. He is the kinsman of the lowly. He weighs no virtue and no fault in his mind; he makes you like himself. He stands with his arms held up, ready to carry you across the ocean of existence. Tuka says: the urgency is great, and the meetings have been many.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram calls everyone to set out for Pandharpur without delay. He frames Vithoba as the kinsman of the lowly, one who does not sit in judgment over your merits and faults but instead lifts you to his own level. The image of the upraised arms is the deity's posture at Pandhari, read here as readiness to ferry the soul across samsara. The closing urgency tells the listener this offer is open and already being taken up; do not be the one who hangs back.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

March onward chanting the Name, clapping your hands with love. By this joy, God Himself comes rushing forward to meet you, the cowherd Lord.

Prostrate yourselves at the saints' feet and bow to the dust beneath them. Says Tuka, raise the cry, Victory to Vitthal!.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Go on chanting the string of Names, clapping your hands with love. By this joy he comes running forward to meet you, the cowherd Gopal. Throw yourself flat on the ground; honor the dust of the saints. Tuka says: raise the cry, Victory to Vitthal, lift up your arms.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram gives a simple practice and promises a swift answer. Chant the Names aloud, clap with love, and that very joy draws Gopal himself running forward to meet you. He sets the inward singing beside outward lowliness: prostrate full length and bow to the dust of the saints, since reverence for them is part of the path. The raised arms and the shout of Victory to Vitthal turn private devotion into a shared, audible cry that pulls God near.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He who follows God becomes immortal and is freed from worldly existence. The servants of Vishnu never again see the womb of rebirth.

Just as a mother never neglects her child, so must this tender bond be nurtured. He whose sovereignty spans all three worlds, that very Lord has made Himself a servant for Tuka's sake.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The one who follows God has become deathless; he has slipped free of worldly life. The servants of Vishnu never again see the womb of birth. As a mother never forgets her child, so this tender bond must be tended. He whose rule covers all three worlds has become Tuka's protector.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram states the reward of giving oneself wholly to God. The one who follows is made deathless and is freed from samsara, and Vishnu's servants are spared from ever entering the womb of rebirth again. He likens the bond to a mother who never neglects her child, a closeness that must be kept warm on both sides. The wonder he lands on is the reversal: the Lord whose sovereignty spans all three worlds has stooped to become the guardian and servant of one small devotee.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now, O Lord Keshi, this is my prayer. I place my head at Your feet.

Let this body go wherever it will, but let my mind remain at Your feet. May remembrance of You defeat the power of death.

Let me be free of attachment to wealth, honor, and worldly ties. When the bodily constitution fails at last, keep away the sins that would assail me then.

While my senses are still alert, let me call out to You with all of them at once. Says Tuka, You are the father of all beings; You hear everyone here.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now, O Keshiraja, this alone is my plea; I lay my head at your feet. Let my body be wherever it must be, but let my mind stay at your feet. Let remembrance of you break the power of death; turn me away from wealth, honor, and people. When phlegm, wind, and bile rise as the body ends, drive these evils away. While all my senses are still alert, I have called out to you with them at once, all together first. Tuka says: you are the father of all these; here you hear everyone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays for the one thing he most fears losing: a mind fixed on God at the end. He lets the body go wherever it must, asking only that his attention stay at the Lord's feet, so that remembrance can break the grip of death. Knowing how the dying body is seized by its failing humors, he asks that the assault of those last evils be kept off, and that craving for wealth, honor, and human approval be turned away in the meantime. The urgency is that he wants to call out now, while his senses are still alert, to the Lord who is father of all and hears everyone present.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The mind is the rush of imagination and desire, ever increasing the cravings of the senses. The hands, feet, and body appear to move, but it is the jiva's own authority that names these divisions.

The sun possesses the quality of radiance, yet we speak of its rays as something separate. Says Tuka, words create the impression of measure; can silence then sort out the different hues?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The mind is the rush of imagination, the running of thought, swelling each craving of the senses. Hands, feet, the body seem to move; yet it is the one life within that is named under these many names. The sun has the single power of shining, and speech alone gives its rays a separate name. Tuka says: words lay a measure on what has no parts; what could silence ever pick out by color?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram examines how language splits a single reality into many. Mind, thought, craving, the moving hands and feet: these look like separate powers, but it is one life that gets carved up under different names. His example is the sun, which has only the single quality of shining, while speech alone makes its rays sound like something apart from it. The closing turn is sharp: words impose a measure and a division on what is really one, and in true silence there are no separate hues left to sort.

GATHA 3276 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, contemplation as service

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What can I show You by merely speaking? You are the very life of the world. This alone is my service now: I contemplate You, O God.

For the detached one, the body is trivial; there is no clinging to it. Says Tuka, may my desire be only this: to arrive at Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What can I show you just by speaking? You are the life of the whole world. This alone is my service now: I hold you in my thoughts, O God. To one set apart in longing, the body is a trifle; there is no clinging to it. Tuka says: let this be my one desire, that I come to rest at your feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram admits that words can prove nothing to the One who is the life of all the world. So he reduces his whole offering to a single act: holding God constantly in mind, and he calls that contemplation his service. Caught in the ache of separation, he counts the body as a trifle and lets go of any clinging to it. The one desire he keeps is small and total at once: to arrive and stay at the Lord's feet.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I cannot sleep in the morning, and at night worry gnaws without cease. The wretch has latched on to my back and made my life miserable.

He gathers the neighbors together and insists on sitting in the temple. Says Tuka, when I come home, I face the scolding of my wife.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I cannot sleep in the morning, and at night worry gnaws and gnaws. The wretch has fastened on my back and ground my life down. He gathers the neighbors and will sit nowhere but in the temple. Tuka says: and when I come home, I face the ugly scolding of my wife.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram complains, half wryly, of a life pressed in from every side. A troublesome man has latched onto him, robbing his mornings of sleep and his nights of peace, and even drags the neighbors along to take over the temple, the one place that should be his refuge. Worn down outside, he comes home only to meet his wife's harsh scolding. The poem voices the squeeze of ordinary domestic and social pressure on someone trying to keep to God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Neither parents nor wealth can accompany you; one must earn and enjoy one's own store of merit. Therefore consider what is truly profitable; do not set your heart on passing customs.

At the end of life you will leave everything behind; this body is not real or lasting. Says Tuka, Time has taken its measure and keeps a ledger of both sin and merit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Parents do not go with you, nor does wealth; what you gather and what you spend is your own to bear. So weigh what the true gain is; do not set your heart on the way things are usually done. At the end of life you go, leaving all behind; this body is not real, not lasting. Tuka says: Time has set down its measure and keeps the ledger of sin and merit. The bundle is opened, the knot loosed in the market, the goods laid out for sale. To each I gave his own share and cleared it, settling the whole tangle as a gift. I sat down holding the true measure in my hand, and the four who weigh acknowledged it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses the listener to reckon with what actually accompanies the soul. Parents and wealth stay behind; only the store of one's own deeds, what was gathered and what was spent, must be carried and answered for. So he warns against setting the heart on mere custom and the usual way of doing things, since the body itself is neither real nor lasting and is left behind at the end. He pictures Time keeping a ledger of sin and merit, and himself as a trader settling accounts in the open market, opening the bundle, giving each his due, and sitting with the true measure in hand that the appointed reckoners accept.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

True wealth draws connoisseurs to it; the saints are its worthy customers. The cloth is spread, the market opens at dawn, and the best goods go first.

Come quickly if you wish to buy; these are our people. Some goods are superior, some middling, some inferior, for wealth comes in three kinds.

Many people bring many kinds of needs; some gain, some lose their principal, some fall into debt. Some are half-entangled, trapped in varying measure.

Says Tuka, all came to the same fair from different towns; the road out is never the same as the road in. Coming and going, there is no fixed accounting; Time swallows some in its dark mouth.

Past debts bind the future; what the elders owe, the younger ones must pay. Do not delay, but secure your own shelter now.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The true wealth is here, and it draws those who can recognize it. The saints are its worthy buyers. The cloth is spread out, the market opens at dawn, the best goods go first. Come quickly if you mean to buy; these are our own people. The goods are of three kinds: best, middling, and least, for wealth comes in three grades. Many people come, with many kinds of need; each carries a different wish. Some gain, some lose their principal, some fall into debt. Some are half caught, tangled in this measure and that, a few like this, many like that. All came to one fair, but from different towns; the road out is never the same as the road in. Coming and going, there is no fixed accounting at the office, and Time swallows some in its dark mouth. Old debts bind the ones who follow; what the elders owed, the younger ones must pay. Tuka says: now do not stand waiting and looking around. Secure your own resting place.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes the soul's chance at God into a one-day market that opens at dawn and closes at dusk. The true wealth is the Name, and the saints are the buyers who know its worth; the grades of goods are the grades of seeker. He presses the urgency: the fair is open now, but Time has a dark mouth that swallows people, the road out of this life is never the road by which you came, and the debts of past lives bind those who follow. So the closing word is practical and stern: stop loitering and comparing, and buy your own shelter, your own refuge in God, while the market is still open.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hurry, hurry, take the road to Pandhari while death has not yet struck its blow. There is no other who can pull you out of this fear; make this settled resolution now.

When the limbs grow feeble at the time of the setting sun, use your hands and feet while they are still free. Why do you endure such pain? How does this seem right to you? Says Tuka, when will you get another chance like this?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hurry, hurry, get moving. Take the road to Pandhari, before the blow falls, before Time strikes you down. There is no other who can pull you out of this fear; so make this your settled resolve right here. The limbs go slack; the day is sinking toward dusk. Use your hands and feet while they are still free. Why have you taken on all this suffering? How does this seem right to you? Tuka says: when will you ever get a chance like this again?

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a blunt summons to act now. Tukaram tells the listener to take the road to Pandhari, the path of devotion to Vitthal, before death lands its blow, and he insists no one else can rescue you from that fear. The image of slack limbs at sunset is old age and the closing of the day: the body is the only instrument you have, so use it while it still moves freely. The final question turns on the listener: this human life is the one opening you may never get again, so why squander it in needless pain?

GATHA 3281 Prayers

Surrender, I cannot plead further

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now make the effort on my behalf, O generous Lord, by Your own authority. I have placed my faith upon Your feet, O Hari, and there I remain.

I know nothing else, no other way or practice. Says Tuka, I have come to You as a refugee; I do not know how to plead any further.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now you make the effort for me, generous Lord, by your own power. I have laid my trust upon your feet, Hari, and there I stay. I know nothing else, no other way, no other practice. Tuka says: I have come to you for refuge. I do not even know how to plead.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram hands the whole burden to God. He asks the Lord to act on his behalf by God's own authority, because he has nothing of his own to rely on. He confesses that he knows no technique, no other path, and cannot even string together a proper petition. The poem is pure surrender: the only thing he has done is place his trust on Hari's feet and refuse to move, and that, he implies, is enough, because the doing now belongs to God.

GATHA 3282 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, holding God like a mother

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Your feet are the sustenance of the helpless; I have stored them within my chitta as my treasure. My body has grown radiant, and joy overflows from my mind.

In playful love I sing and dance with exultation. Through words of tender mercy I call upon Hari, and I will not let Him go far; love and devotion hold Him fast.

Just as a mother's affection binds her child, so it is, O Keshava. Says Tuka, I know no other service than this.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Your feet are the very life of the helpless; for us, your feet are everything. I have gathered them up and held them in my heart. My body has grown radiant, and joy will not fit inside my mind. In playful love I sing and dance with delight. With words of tender pleading I call on Hari, and I will not let him go far off; love and devotion hold him close. As a mother's love keeps her child bound to her, so it is, Keshava. Tuka says: I know no other service than this.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the joy of one who has caught hold of God and refuses to let go. Tukaram has stored Vitthal's feet in his heart as the treasure of the helpless, and the effect shows in the body: it glows, and the mind cannot contain the gladness, so it spills out as song and dance. The striking move is the reversal of roles: he holds God close the way a mother holds her child, binding the Lord with love rather than being held by him. He ends by saying this clinging love is the only worship he knows, naming devotion itself as his whole practice.

GATHA 3283 Ecstasy and Joy

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By your grace, O Lord, happiness has taken up residence within my very jiva. Again and again I recall Your form within; it has lodged itself in my innermost core.

Says Tuka, Vitthal has made me forget everything else.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Happiness has come to live in my very soul, by your grace, my Lord. Again and again I call your form to mind within me; it has sat down deep in my heart and stayed. Tuka says: Vitthal has now made me forget everything else.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reports a settled inner state, given not earned: by the Lord's grace, joy has taken up residence in his soul. He keeps recollecting God's form, and it no longer comes and goes but has lodged permanently in his innermost heart. The last line names the result plainly: Vitthal has erased everything else from his attention. What looks like forgetfulness is the fruit of single-pointed love, where one presence fills the mind so completely that nothing else can compete for it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We have no claim, we have no claim, not any longer by these old terms. State the price, state the price; let the buyers inquire.

How can there be, how can there be, any quarrel between You and me? The principal is pledged, the principal is pledged, and the profit lies within it. Says Tuka, I shall store it at home; if anyone asks in troubled times, I shall share it then.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Something for us, something for us, but now there is no claim left in these old words. State the price, state the price; let the buyers ask. How can it happen, how can it happen, that there be quarreling between you and me? The principal is pledged, the principal is pledged, and the profit lies inside it. Tuka says: I will store it at home; if anyone asks in hard times, I will share it then.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram returns to the language of trade to describe his settled account with God. The old terms of bargaining no longer apply: there is no place for haggling or quarrel between him and the Lord, because the deal is done. The principal has been pledged, and the gain is already contained within that pledge, the surrender itself carries its own reward. The closing image is generous: he will keep this treasure at home and hand it out to whoever comes asking in a time of need, so the wealth of devotion is meant to be shared, not hoarded.

The stock is open, the stock is open; once it runs out, everything turns false. The shop is open, the shop is open; once night falls, who will unlock it again? Says Tuka, at the hour of death, those who waited will sit there clapping in regret.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Take it, brothers, drink it, brothers, some of you a little, some a lot. At this very market, at this very market, test the goods and tie up your bundle. The stock is here, the stock is here; once it runs out, what is left turns false. The shop is open, the shop is open; once night falls, who will unlock it again? Tuka says: at the hour of death, those who waited will sit there clapping in regret.

WHAT IT MEANS

Again the Name is offered as goods at an open market, free for anyone to take as much as they can hold. Tukaram urges the listeners to test it and tie it up now, while the shop is open, because the supply does not last: when the stock is gone or the day ends, nothing genuine remains and no one will reopen the door. The closing image is the cost of delay: those who put it off will sit at the hour of death striking their hands together in helpless regret. The whole poem is one long warning against treating the chance as something that will always be there.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I had lost my way in a foreign land, all alone, with no sense of direction. Someone took me by the hand and brought me home.

What can I give in return for such kindness? Just so, O Lord Keshi, I was pitiable and shivering, unable to serve You, ashamed of myself. Like a mother who abandoned her newborn, with the ground itself left uncleansed.

In the scorching heat, suffering hunger and thirst in that desolation, to be taken upon the lap, what can one call it? A stake upon the shoulders and the dread of death along the road, even great injustices were borne as though they were just. What was in my hand was snatched away, and I was cast behind.

Says Tuka, such is the turn my fate has taken.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I had lost my way, alone in a foreign land, and on top of that I lost all sense of direction. Someone took me by the hand and led me home. What can I give in return for such kindness? Just so was I, Lord Keshiraja: trembling and wretched, unable to serve you, ashamed of myself. I was like a child a mother abandoned out of weariness, left on unclean ground, not cared for. In scorching heat, in hunger and thirst, in such desolation, to be lifted onto the lap, what can one call that? A stake on the shoulder and death along the road, and even great wrongs were borne as if they were just. What was in my hand was snatched away, and I was thrown behind. Tuka says: this is the turn my fate has taken.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells his own rescue as the story of a lost traveler. He was alone in a strange country and had lost even his sense of direction, an image for a soul astray with no way back, when God took him by the hand and brought him home. He measures his own unworthiness honestly: shivering, wretched, unable to serve, like a child a tired mother had left on dirty ground. Against that he sets the wonder of being lifted onto the lap in the middle of heat and hunger, of having harsh things turned to good, of being relieved of his own grasping and set safely behind the Lord. The poem is a confession of helplessness answered by sheer grace, and the only response left is gratitude that cannot be repaid.

Mother and child, faltering speech is dear

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

However faltering the child's speech, the mother takes delight in it. Out of love for her little one, she finds sweetness in its every sound.

The child runs behind and clings to her belly, enduring every bump and push. Tuka prays to Panduranga: this is truly how it is.

IN PLAIN WORDS

However broken the child's words, the mother takes them to heart. Out of love for her little one she finds them sweet, just for that. The child runs behind her and clings to her belly; she puts up with all its bumping and pushing. Tuka prays to Panduranga: this is truly how it is.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the image of a mother and her small child to explain how God receives the devotee's clumsy prayer. The child cannot speak clearly, yet the mother delights in every garbled sound simply because she loves it, and she endures all its pushing and clinging without complaint. He then turns the image into a plea to Panduranga: this is exactly how the Lord treats his devotees. So the faltering, imperfect worship of a sincere heart is not rejected for its faults; it is loved for the love behind it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Lost in the love of His qualities, my tongue has spread itself wide, and all else has been forgotten. From beginning through middle to end there is no pause; life has merged into life.

The garland of the names Rama and Krishna is strung together, beautiful and fitting for the throat. Says Tuka, my entire body has become cool, bathed in the bliss of Brahman.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Out of love for his qualities my tongue has spread itself wide, and everything else is forgotten. From beginning to middle to end there is no pause; life has merged into life. The garland of the names Rama and Krishna is lovely, strung fine and fit for the throat. Tuka says: my whole body has grown cool, soaked through with the bliss of Brahman.

WHAT IT MEANS

This describes the state of unbroken Name-chanting. Tukaram's love for God's qualities keeps his tongue at work without rest, and that constant praise has crowded everything else out of his mind. The names of Rama and Krishna become a garland worn at the throat, a beautiful, fitting ornament that is also the act of repeating them. He ends with the felt result: the whole body turns cool, the heat of craving gone, drenched in the bliss of Brahman, where his small life has merged into the larger life of God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am the steward of God's storehouse, dispensing its income and its expenditure. Now my hands and feet move without stain; I did not know such a thing was possible.

God has taken away all worry and become the doer of everything. Says Tuka, He is the master, and He provides all that is needed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am the keeper of God's storehouse; I handle its income and its spending. Now my hands and feet do their work without stain; I did not know such a thing was possible. God has carried away my worry and become the doer of it all. Tuka says: he is the master, and he supplies everything that is needed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the relief of having handed the whole charge over to God. He still acts, calling himself the steward who manages the storehouse, but the ownership and the doing belong to the Lord. Because of this his actions no longer leave a stain on him, a freedom he says he never knew was possible: work done as God's servant does not bind. God has taken away anxiety by becoming the true doer, and as master he provides whatever is required, so the steward need only carry out the tasks without fear of the outcome.

GATHA 3290 Confession and Sin

Confession, the beaten animal of the mind

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Like a stubborn animal beaten upon its back that will not rise from where it sits, just so has my mind become, O God. I was running headlong in ego and have now collapsed.

Driven by what pursues me, I leap off cliffs, not knowing death from life. Says Tuka, I have become as pitiable as that beast, and I keep calling out to Panduranga.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A worn-out beast takes blows on its back, but once it sits down it will not rise from that spot. So has my mind become, O God. I ran headlong in pride, and now I have collapsed. Out of fear of what comes behind me I leap off cliffs, no longer telling death from not-death. Tuka says: I have become as wretched as that beast, and I keep calling out to Panduranga.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram confesses the broken state of his own mind through the image of an exhausted pack animal that, once it sits, will not get up no matter how it is beaten. His pride drove him on until he collapsed, and now fear sends him leaping blindly off cliffs, unable even to tell living from dying. It is a portrait of a will that has run itself into the ground and lost all judgment. The one thing left in that wretchedness is the cry to Panduranga; the poem turns the honest sight of one's own helplessness into a call for rescue.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Once I behold You, I shall serve You; I need nothing else, O God. Let destiny provide what the body needs for food and clothing; I will keep my mind steady at Your feet.

Come, O come, O come, compassionate Hari; soothe my inner being with the gift of Your presence. My mind thirsts for You as for life-giving water; You have made me love Your Name and form.

Have You no capital at Your disposal? Do my words then go to waste? Does the touchstone examine the virtues and faults of iron? It touches and turns it to gold. Says Tuka, let all of mine remain as it is; just make Your own promise come true.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Once I see You, I will serve You. I want nothing else, O God. Let my destiny bring the food and clothing this body needs; I will keep my mind still at Your feet. Come, come, come, merciful Hari. Cool me within by giving me Your meeting. My mind thirsts for You as for water. You have made Your Name and form sweet to me. Have You no wealth of Your own? Then are my words for nothing? Does the touchstone weigh the iron's faults and virtues? It touches the iron and turns it to gold. Tuka says: let all that is mine stay as it is. Make Your own promise come true.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks for only one thing, a sight of God, and offers his whole service in return; everything else, the body's food and clothing, he leaves to destiny. He calls and calls, thirsting, and then he presses God with an argument. The touchstone does not examine the iron before transforming it; it simply touches and turns it to gold. So Tukaram refuses to let his own worthlessness be the test. He asks God to act on God's own nature and keep God's standing promise to lift the fallen, rather than wait for the devotee to qualify.

GATHA 3292 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the inexhaustible feast

मराठी मूळ

येथें आड कांहीं न साहे आणीक । प्रमाण तें एक हें चि जालें ॥1॥
गाऊं नाचों टाळी गाऊं गाऊं गीत छंदें । डोलवूं विनोदें अंग तेणें ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे जगा लाविली शिराणी । सेवितां हे धणी होत नाहीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Nothing else stands in the way here; this alone has become the final authority. Let us sing and dance, let us sing songs in joyful rhythm, swaying our bodies in delight.

The essence has been churned out; all the dross has been separated and set aside. Says Tuka, a feast has been laid out for the world; no matter how much is tasted, the appetite is never satisfied.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Here nothing else can stand in the way. This one thing alone has become the proof. Let us sing and dance and clap; let us sing songs in rhythm; let us sway our bodies in joy. The essence has been churned out and brought into the open; the rest, the dross, has been set aside. Tuka says: a feast has been laid for the whole world. However much you eat of it, you are never full.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the joy of the Name as a settled certainty: nothing else holds authority anymore, so singing and dancing simply pour out. The image of churning points to what devotion does, separating the essence from the dross, keeping the butter and discarding the rest. The feast laid out for the world is open to all, yet it works unlike ordinary food: the more it is tasted, the deeper the hunger for it grows. That endless appetite is itself the proof that this is the true food of the soul.

GATHA 3293 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the end of scheming

मराठी मूळ

शरणागत जालों । तेणें मीपणा मुकलों ॥1॥
आतां दिल्याची च वाट । पाहों नाहीं खटपट ॥ध्रु.॥
नलगे उचित । कांहीं पाहावें संचित ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे सेवा । माने तैसी करुं देवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Having surrendered, I have lost all sense of I. Now I simply wait for what is given; there is no more striving or scheming.

I need not weigh what is fitting or consult the ledgers of karma. Says Tuka, I shall serve God in whatever way pleases Him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have taken refuge, and so I have lost my sense of I. Now I only wait for what is given. I do not strive or scheme. I need not weigh what is fitting. I need not look at my store of past deeds. Tuka says: I will serve God in whatever way pleases Him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names what surrender actually costs and frees: when he takes refuge, the sense of a separate self managing its own fate falls away. With that gone, the whole machinery of striving, calculating, and weighing the karmic ledger stops too, because none of it is his to run anymore. He simply waits for whatever is given. The poem ends by handing even the form of his service over to God, so that nothing is left for the I to decide.

GATHA 3294 Ecstasy and Joy

Joy, Brahman drawn near by the Name

मराठी मूळ

वाचेचिया आळा कविळलें ब्रह्म । चुकविला श्रम पृथक तो ॥1॥
सुलभ जालें सुलभ जालें । जवळी आलें पंढरिये ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे वाटे चुकली वसती । उद्धार तो हातीं आणियेला ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Through the longing of my speech, Brahman itself has been drawn near; the toil of separateness has been bypassed. How easy it has become, how easy! Pandhari has come close.

Name and form have been bundled together, and the whole lot has been settled at once. Says Tuka, the wandering has ceased, and salvation has come into my hands.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By the longing of my speech, Brahman has been drawn close. The toil of separateness has been escaped. It has become easy, it has become easy. Pandhari has come near. The bundle of Name and form was tied up, and the whole load was settled in a single moment. Tuka says: the wandering off the road has ended. Salvation has come into my hands.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts two paths to the same goal. The hard way is to labor at overcoming separateness; the easy way is the longing cry of the Name, which draws the formless Brahman near as the near presence of Pandhari. He bundles Name and form together and says the whole account was cleared at once, in a moment, rather than through long effort. The wandering that had taken him off the road is over. He holds his liberation in his own hands now, and he insists it came easily.

GATHA 3295 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the nearness of the nectar

मराठी मूळ

सवंग जालें सवंग जालें । घरा आलें बंदरींचे ॥1॥
आतां हेवा करावा सोस । भक्तिरस बहु गोड ॥ध्रु.॥
पाउल वेचे चिंता नाहीं । आड कांहीं मग नये ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे संचिताचें । नेणें काचें राहों तें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Everything has become affordable, as if the goods from the distant port have arrived at our very doorstep. Now pursue this longing with zeal, for the nectar of devotion is exceedingly sweet.

Every step you take removes worry; nothing can stand in the way after that. Says Tuka, I do not know how the store of past karma can hold out any longer.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It has become cheap, it has become cheap. The goods from the far port have come home. Now long for it with all your heart, for the nectar of devotion is very sweet. Each step you take, your worry falls away; after that nothing can block the road. Tuka says: I do not know how the store of past deeds can hold out now.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the image of distant, costly goods suddenly arriving at the door to say that what once seemed far and dear, God, is now cheap and near to whoever wants it. So he urges the listener to crave it openly; this nectar is too sweet to be modest about. Each step on this road dissolves anxiety and clears the way ahead. He ends by wondering aloud how the accumulated weight of past karma can possibly survive such a force; devotion is burning the ledger faster than it can be read.

GATHA 3296 The Saints

Praise of the saints, the sandalwood nature

मराठी मूळ

तुह्मी संत मायबाप कृपावंत । काय मी पतित कीर्ती वाणूं ॥1॥
अवतार तुह्मां धराया कारणें । उद्धरावें जन जड जीव॥ध्रु.॥
वाढविलें सुख भक्ति भाव धर्म । कुळाचार नाम विठोबाचें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे गुण चंदनाचे अंगीं । तैसे तुह्मी जगीं संतजन ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You saints are my parents, my benefactors. How can I, a lowly wrongdoer, begin to praise your glory? You have taken birth for this very purpose: to uplift the dull and fallen jivas of this world.

You have nourished the joy of devotion, righteous conduct, and the Name of Vitthal as the family tradition. Says Tuka, just as sandalwood carries fragrance in its very nature, so do you saints pervade the world with goodness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You saints are my mother and father, full of mercy. What glory can I, a fallen one, sing of you? You took birth for this very reason: to lift up the dull and heavy jivas of the world. You grew the joy of devotion, of faith, of dharma, and made the Name of Vithoba the custom of the family. Tuka says: as fragrance lives in the body of sandalwood, so do you saints live in the world.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram addresses the saints as his true parents and confesses he is too low to praise them rightly. He names what they are for: they take birth in order to raise the dull and burdened souls who could not raise themselves. Their work is to make devotion, faith, and the Name of Vithoba into something handed down like a family custom, so that ordinary people inherit it. The sandalwood image lands the claim: goodness is not something the saints perform, it is their very nature, given off to everyone near them as scent is given off by the wood.

GATHA 3297 Worldly Metaphors

Devotion as watchdog, guarding the door

मराठी मूळ

पाठी लागे तया दवडीं दुरी । घालीं या बाहेरी संवसारा ॥1॥
येउनि दडें तुमच्या पायीं । धांवें तई छो ह्मणा ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे लाविला धाक । नेदी ताक खाऊं कोणी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When worldly life pursues me, I drive it away and cast it out. I come running to Your feet; then say to me, Hush, be at ease.

When a stranger's presence is sensed, the watchdog leaps up in alarm. Says Tuka, he has set up such a guard that he will not let anyone even touch the buttermilk.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When worldly life chases me, I drive it far off; I throw it out. I come and crouch at Your feet; I run when You say, Sic him. When a stranger's scent falls near, the clamor rises up. Tuka says: he has set such a guard that he lets no one even eat the buttermilk.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram casts himself as God's watchdog and worldly life as the intruder he drives off. He stays crouched at God's feet and springs into action at God's command, sensing a stranger and raising the alarm the moment anything foreign comes near. The point is the fierceness of a guarded devotion: the dog he has become will not let even the cheapest thing, the buttermilk, be carried off by an outsider. The vigilance is offered as love, the soul standing watch over its master's house against everything that is not God.

GATHA 3298 Worldly Metaphors

Devotion as watchdog, kept for the task

मराठी मूळ

सांखिळलों प्रीती गळां । भुंके वेळा जाणोनियां॥1॥
तुमचें मी केशीराजा । सुनें या काजा पिाळलों ॥ध्रु.॥
आलें गेलें कळे वाटा । कोण निटा वाकडिया ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आलें वारी । दुरितें दुरी नातळतां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am chained with love around my neck, and I bark at the proper hours. I am Your watchdog, O Lord Keshi, kept for this very purpose.

I can tell who comes and goes, who walks the straight path and who the crooked. Says Tuka, I have kept sins at a distance, not letting them come near.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am chained at the neck by love, and I bark at the right hours, knowing the time. I am Yours, O Keshiraja; You keep me as a dog for this very work. I can tell who comes and who goes along the road, who is straight and who is crooked. Tuka says: I have come on guard, keeping sins far off, not letting them touch.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram continues the watchdog image and shows what binds him: not an iron chain but love, fastened at the neck, which makes his service willing. He belongs wholly to God, here called Keshiraja, and is kept for exactly this task, to bark at the right moments. His worth is discernment: he can read the road, telling the honest passerby from the crooked one. The work he reports is steady guarding, keeping sins at such a distance that they cannot even brush against the house he watches.

GATHA 3299 Worldly Metaphors

Devotion as watchdog, trusting only God

मराठी मूळ

सुनियांचा हा चि भाव । आपला ठाव राखावा ॥1॥

केली याची फाडाफाडी। तडामोडी क्षेत्राची ॥2॥
पातेजत नाहीं लोकां । तुका देवावांचूनि॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The nature of a watchdog is to guard its master's ground. Do not let the wind of another's influence blow over this house.

It has been marked and bounded; the territory has been staked out with clear lines. Says Tuka, I trust no one in this world except God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This alone is the watchdog's nature: to guard its own ground. We will not let another's wind blow over the house. The boundary has been torn out and marked; the field has been staked with clear lines. Tuka says: I trust no one in this world except God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram keeps the watchdog before us to define faithfulness as the guarding of one ground and no other. He will not let even the wind of another influence pass over the house; the territory of the heart has been measured and fenced so the line is unmistakable. The closing turn states the whole stance plainly: he places his trust in no one in the world, in God alone. The fierce guarding of the earlier verses resolves here into a single loyalty that refuses every rival claim on the soul.

GATHA 3300 Worldly Metaphors

Devotion as watchdog, won by affection

मराठी मूळ

सुनियांची आवडी देवा । घेत सेवा नाहीं कांहीं ॥1॥
सिकविलें जवळी बैसों । जेथें असों तेथें चि ॥ध्रु.॥
नेदी दुजें बोलों करूं । गुरुगुरु न साहे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कृविाळतां । अंग सत्ता संगाची ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The devotion of a faithful dog asks for nothing in return. It has been taught to sit close by, right where it is.

It will not allow another to speak or act out of turn; it will not tolerate even a murmur. Says Tuka, when stroked with affection, the power of companionship works upon it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The dog's love is this, O God: it takes the service and asks for nothing. It is taught to sit close by, to stay right where it is kept. It lets no other speak or act out of turn; it will not bear even a growl. Tuka says: when it is stroked with kindness, the power of that nearness takes hold of its body.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lets the watchdog reveal what devotion wants in return for its service: nothing. The dog serves and asks for no wage; it stays exactly where it is set, refusing to let any rival voice intrude. The last line names what actually rules it. It is not commanded by force but governed by affection: a single stroke of kindness, the touch of nearness to the master, holds its whole body. So the bond between soul and God is not bought or compelled; it is held fast by love alone.

GATHA 3301 Worldly Metaphors

Devotion as watchdog, fed by the Lord's hand

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे मी जुनाट । मोहो आट परतला ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Tired of eating stale food, the faithful dog stands with paw raised. Krishna knows the sign and feeds it warm, fresh morsels.

One should receive what comes from one's own master and be nourished by His grace. Says Tuka, I am an old, tested one; the pull of delusion has turned back from me.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Tired of eating stale scraps, the bold dog stands with its paw raised. Kanhoba knows the sign and lays warm, fresh morsels in its mouth. One should take what comes from one's own place and be reared by love. Tuka says: I am old and tested; the pull of delusion has turned back from me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures the devotee as a dog worn out on stale leavings, raising its paw to beg better food. Krishna, here Kanhoba, reads the sign at once and feeds it warm, fresh morsels from his own hand. The lesson is to receive only what comes from one's true master and to be raised by that love rather than scavenging elsewhere. He closes by speaking as a seasoned old dog, long kept and proven, for whom the lure of delusion has finally lost its grip and turned away.

GATHA 3302 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the boat on the rising tide

मराठी मूळ

लागलें भरतें । ब्रह्मानंदाचें वरतें ॥1॥
जाला हरिनामाचा तारा । सीड लागलें फरारा ॥ध्रु.॥
बैसोनि सकळ । बाळ चालिले गोपाळ ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे वाट । बरवी सांपडली नीट ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The rising tide of Brahman's bliss has swelled. The star of Hari's Name has appeared, and the sails are filled with wind.

All the children, the cowherd boys, have taken their seats aboard. Says Tuka, the right path has been found, straight and true.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The tide has come in, the rising tide of the bliss of Brahman. The star of Hari's Name has appeared; the sail has caught the wind and runs. All of them sit aboard; the cowherd boys, the children, have set off. Tuka says: the road has been found, good and straight.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns the whole scene into a voyage. The bliss of Brahman is a flood tide that lifts the boat, the Name of Hari is the guiding star, and the wind that fills the sail and carries it forward is devotion itself. The cowherd boys, the simple children of Krishna, climb aboard together, so the crossing is shared and easy, not solitary toil. The poem ends with the assurance that the right course has been located, straight and sure; once the tide, the star, and the wind are given, the soul has only to sit aboard and be carried home.

GATHA 3303 The Power of the Name

The Name, true wealth

मराठी मूळ

धनें वित्तें कुळें । अवघियानें ते आगळे ॥1॥
ज्याचे नारायण गांठीं । भरला हृदय संपुटीं ॥ध्रु.॥
अवघें चि गोड । त्याचें पुरलें सर्व कोड ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे अस्त । उदय त्याच्या तेजा नास्त॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In wealth, property, and lineage, he excels beyond all others whose heart holds Narayana, treasured within the casket of his breast. Everything becomes sweet for him; every desire of his is fulfilled.

Says Tuka, his radiance knows neither sunset nor end.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In wealth, in money, in family, he stands above everyone else. Who is he? The one who has Narayana tied in his knot, packed into the casket of his heart. For him everything is sweet. Every longing of his is filled. Tuka says: his light has no sunset and no end.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram redefines what it means to be rich. The truly wealthy person is not the one with money, property, and lineage, but the one who carries Narayana close, knotted into the cloth at his waist, sealed inside his own chest. To such a person everything tastes sweet and every desire is already met, because the wanting has been answered at its root. Tuka closes by naming the difference between this and worldly fortune: ordinary light rises and sets, but this radiance never goes down and never ends.

GATHA 3304 The Necessity of Experience

Teaching, rain that does not choose

मराठी मूळ

मेघदृष्ट कांहीं न विचारी ठाव । जैसा ज्याचा भाव त्यासी फळो ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नाहीं समाधानें चाड । आपणा ही नाड पुढिलांसीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The speech I shall now speak is silence itself, one single word addressed to all. Like the rain cloud that does not choose where it falls, let each receive the fruit of his own devotion.

Says Tuka, one who lacks inner peace misleads not only himself but others as well.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What I am about to speak is itself silence. One word, spoken to everyone alike. The rain cloud does not pick out a place to fall. Let each one's fruit match the faith he brings. Tuka says: a person with no peace inside misleads himself, and misleads the people who come after him.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes how he teaches and warns about who teaches. His words are offered the way a cloud rains, without choosing where they land; one saying goes out to all, and what each listener receives is set by his own devotion, not by favoritism. The image guards both sides: the teacher gives freely, and the result depends on the heart that receives. Then the sharp turn at the end points at a danger to examine in oneself: anyone still without inner peace who sets up as a guide does not just stumble alone, he pulls his followers off the road with him.

तुका ह्मणे फांसे वाघुरा कु†हाडी । प्रसंगी तों काढी पारधी तो ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Give instruction according to the capacity of the listener; give each one only the burden he can bear. Placing an elephant's saddle upon an ant accomplishes nothing.

Says Tuka, the hunter brings out traps, snares, or axes as the occasion demands.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Teach a person according to what he can hold. Give him only the load he can carry. Put an elephant's saddle on an ant: what is gained by that? Nothing. Tuka says: the hunter brings out trap, snare, or axe as the moment calls for it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is laying down a rule for spiritual instruction: it must be fitted to the capacity of the one in front of you. Lay only the weight a person can actually bear, because pressing the whole teaching onto someone unready is as useless as strapping an elephant's saddle on an ant, it crushes rather than helps. The closing image of the hunter is not cruelty but readiness: a skilled guide, like a skilled hunter, reaches for the right instrument for each occasion. The point to take home is humility about where each learner stands, including oneself.

GATHA 3306 Worldly Metaphors

Teaching, the honest physician

मराठी मूळ

नव्हों वैद्य आह्मी अर्थाचे भुकेले । भलते द्यावे पाले भलत्यासी ॥1॥
कुपथ्य करूनि विटंबावे रोगी । का हे सलगी भीड त्याची ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे लांसू फांसंू देऊं डाव । सुखाचा उपाव पुढें आहे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We are not physicians hungry for fees, prescribing random leaves to just anyone. Why ruin the patient with wrong remedies out of some false courtesy? Says Tuka, we may lance and probe and set painful traps, but the path to true comfort lies ahead.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We are not doctors hungry for a fee, handing any leaf to anyone. Why wreck the patient with the wrong cure out of soft politeness? Tuka says: we will lance and probe and set a painful trap. The way to real comfort lies ahead.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram defends hard, true teaching against flattery. A teacher chasing approval is like a quack who prescribes whatever pleases the patient and ruins him; Tukaram refuses that, because false courtesy that spares a person discomfort actually harms him. So he will do what a real physician does: cut, probe, and apply the painful remedy, even when it stings. The point to sit with is that ease bought by avoidance is not healing; the genuine comfort comes only after the hard treatment, on the far side of it, not in skipping it.

GATHA 3307 Confession and Sin

Confession, claiming the servant's name

मराठी मूळ

नव्हें परि ह्मणवीं दास । कांहीं निमित्तास मूळ केलें॥1॥
तुमचा तो धर्म कोण । हा आपण विचारा ॥धृ. ॥
नाहीं शुद्ध आचरण । परी चरण चिंतितों ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे पांडुरंगा । ऐसें कां गा नेणां हें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am not worthy, yet I call myself Your servant; I have at least made a beginning with some pretext. What then is Your duty? Consider this for Yourself.

My conduct is not pure, yet I contemplate Your feet. Says Tuka, O Panduranga, how can You not know this about me?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am not worthy, yet I call myself Your servant. On some pretext, I have at least made a start. What is Your duty here? Think about that Yourself. My conduct is not pure, and still I keep thinking of Your feet. Tuka says: O Panduranga, how can You not know this about me?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram comes before God admitting he has no right to the title he has taken. He knows he is unworthy, yet he has dared to call himself a servant and made some small beginning toward God. Then he turns the burden back: if I have claimed You, what does that lay upon You to do; consider it for Yourself. He owns that his behavior is impure even while his mind stays fixed on Vitthal's feet, and his final note is intimate, almost reproachful: You, Panduranga, who know everything, surely You already know me as I am, so You cannot pretend not to.

GATHA 3308 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the ending of longing

मराठी मूळ

मागें चिंता होती आस । केला नास या काळें ॥1॥
तुह्मी आह्मां उदासीन । भिन्नाभिन्न वारिलें ॥ध्रु.॥
मोहजाळें दुःख वाढे । ओढे ओढे त्यास तें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कोण देवा । आतां हेवा वाढवी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Before, there was worry and longing; this present time has destroyed them. You have made me indifferent, dissolving all separation between us.

The net of delusion only increases sorrow; it pulls those caught in it deeper still. Says Tuka, O God, who now will increase my longing?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Before, there was worry. There was wanting. This time has destroyed them. You have made me indifferent. You have wiped out the line between us, between same and separate. The net of delusion only grows the sorrow; it drags the one caught in it deeper and deeper. Tuka says: O God, who is left now to make my longing grow?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reports a state where the old ache is gone. The worry and craving that used to drive him have been destroyed in this present moment; God has emptied him of restless wanting and dissolved the very distinction between self and God, same and separate. Against this he sets the alternative he has escaped: the net of attachment, which never satisfies but only deepens grief and pulls a person further down. His closing question is the voice of someone who has nothing left to crave: now that the longing itself has been fulfilled, who could there be to revive it?

GATHA 3309 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the cycle ended

मराठी मूळ

आहो उभा विटेवरी । भरोवरी चुकविली ॥1॥
निवारलें जाणें येणें । कोणा कोणें रुसावे ॥ध्रु.॥
संकल्पासी वेचे बळ । भारे फळ निर्माण ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे उभयतां । भेटी सत्ता लोभाची ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He stands upon the brick, and the cycle of coming and going has ceased. There is no more need for anyone to quarrel with anyone.

Mere intention now bears fruit; no effort is required. Says Tuka, the meeting of both, God and devotee, is held together by the power of mutual love.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Look, He stands on the brick. The back-and-forth is over. Coming and going has stopped. So who has anyone left to sulk at? When mere intention spends its strength, fruit is born of the weight of it. Tuka says: the meeting of the two, God and devotee, is held together by the power of love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram fixes the scene at Pandhari, where Vitthal stands on the brick, and from that standing figure draws the end of all wandering. The cycle of coming and going, birth and return, has ceased, so there is no longer anyone to quarrel or sulk against. In this state effort drops away: bare intention is enough, and fruit ripens by its own weight rather than by striving. The last line names what binds it: the meeting of God and devotee is not held by rule or transaction but by the force of mutual love between them.

GATHA 3310 Prayers

Prayer, lay the head at the feet

मराठी मूळ

असो खटपट । आतां वाउगे बोभाट ॥1॥

अपराध करा । क्षमा घडले दातारा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे वेथा । तुह्मा कळे पंढरिनाथा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let all strife and needless commotion be done with now. Hear this my humble plea; let my head rest at Your feet.

Forgive, O generous Lord, whatever offenses have occurred. Says Tuka, You know my pain, O Lord of Pandhari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let the struggle stop. Let the useless noise be over now. Hear this plea of mine: let my head rest at Your feet. Whatever wrongs I have done, forgive them, O generous Lord. Tuka says: You know my pain, O Lord of Pandhari.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks for an end to striving and to his own clamor. He is done with effort and empty outcry and wants only to lay his head at God's feet, the posture of complete surrender. He asks for forgiveness for whatever offenses he has committed, leaning on God's generosity rather than on his own merit. His final word rests everything on God's knowing: the Lord of Pandhari already sees his pain, so the prayer is less a report than a handing over of a hurt that is already understood.

GATHA 3311 Prayers

Prayer, a plea to the pilgrims

मराठी मूळ

वारकरी पायांपाशीं । आले त्यांसी विनविलें ॥1॥

चिंतावोनि चिंता केली । हे राहिली अवस्था ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे संसारा । रुसलों खरा यासाठीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The pilgrims came to Your feet, and I made my plea to them. Listen to what I said: do not forget this poor wretch.

I have exhausted my chitta with worry, and this is the state I am left in. Says Tuka, I have truly turned away from worldly life for this very reason.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The pilgrims came to Your feet, and I made my plea to them. Hear what I said: do not forget this poor wretch. I wore my mind out with worry, and this is the state it has left me in. Tuka says: it is for this very reason that I have truly turned away from worldly life.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks through the Varkari pilgrims, sending his appeal to God by their hands. He begs them to carry one message to Vitthal: do not forget this destitute man. He confesses that endless worry has exhausted his mind and reduced him to the broken condition he is now in. The closing line names the cost and the choice together: it is precisely because of this exhaustion with anxiety and the world that he has genuinely turned his back on worldly life and thrown himself on God.

GATHA 3312 Longing and Separation

Longing, keep the conversation going

मराठी मूळ

जीवींचें कां नेणां । परि हे आवडी नारायणा ॥1॥
वाढवावें हें उत्तर । कांहीं लाज करकर ॥ध्रु.॥
कोठें वांयां गेले । शब्द उत्तम चांगले ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे बाळा । असतात ि्रय खेळा॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do You not know what is in my chitta? Yet this is my love for You, O Narayana. Please extend this conversation; I feel some hesitation and awkwardness.

Where have all those beautiful and excellent words gone? Says Tuka, children are always dear when they are at play.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do You not know what is in my heart? Yet this is my love for You, Narayana. Stretch this talk out longer. I feel some shyness, some awkwardness. Where have they gone, all those good and beautiful words? Tuka says: children are dear when they are at play.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram, sure that God already knows his inmost heart, still wants the exchange to continue, because the loving back-and-forth is itself the joy. He asks Narayana to draw the conversation out, confessing a tender shyness that makes the words come hard. He misses the fine words that used to flow and wonders where they have gone. The closing image explains the asking: just as a child is most dear to its parent when it is at play, the devotee delights in playing before God, and that playful nearness is what he is begging not to lose.

GATHA 3313 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, carried like a child

मराठी मूळ

वोडविलें अंग । आतां करूनि घ्यावें सांग ॥1॥
काय पूजा ते मी नेणें । जाणावें जी सर्वजाणें ॥ध्रु.॥
पोटा आलें बाळ। त्याचें जाणावें सकळ ॥2॥
चुका ह्मणे हरी । वाहावें जी कडियेवरी॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have offered my body to You; now make of it what You will. I do not know what proper worship is; You, O all-knowing one, must understand.

When a child is born, the mother knows everything it needs. Says Tuka, O Hari, carry me upon Your hip.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have offered my body to You. Now make of it whatever You will. I do not know what proper worship is. You, who know all, must know it for me. When a child is born, the mother knows everything it needs. Tuka says: Hari, carry me on Your hip.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram hands his whole body over and tells God to do with it as He pleases, keeping nothing back. He admits he does not know the right way to worship and places that not-knowing on the all-knowing one: You understand what I cannot. The mother and child image carries the surrender: a newborn knows nothing of its own needs, and the mother knows them all and provides without being asked. So Tuka asks to be treated exactly that way, lifted and carried on God's hip like an infant who simply trusts and is held.

GATHA 3314 Prayers

Prayer, the crowning plea

मराठी मूळ

सेवटींची हे विनंती । पाय चित्तीं रहावे ॥1॥
ऐसे करा कृपादान । तुह्मां मन सन्निध ॥ध्रु.॥
भाग्याविण कैंची भेटी । नव्हे तुटी चिंतनें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कळसा आलें । हें विठ्ठलें परिसावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This is my final prayer: may Your feet remain in my chitta. Grant me this gift of grace, that my mind stays ever near You.

Without fortune there is no meeting, but through contemplation the bond is never severed. Says Tuka, this is the crowning plea; may Vitthal hear it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is my last request: let Your feet stay in my heart. Grant me this gift of grace, that my mind keeps close to You. Without good fortune there is no meeting; but through remembering You, the bond is never broken. Tuka says: this is the plea that crowns it all. May Vitthal hear it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram offers what he calls his final prayer, the one petition that gathers up all the rest: that God's feet remain settled in his heart and his mind stay forever near. He asks for this only as grace, a gift, not something earned. He acknowledges that meeting God depends on fortune one cannot command, yet insists that constant remembrance keeps the connection unbroken even so. He ends by marking this as the crowning request, the pinnacle of his asking, and begs that Vitthal will listen to it.

GATHA 3315 Appeals and Exhortations

The Name, the dissolving of self

मराठी मूळ

करुंनियां शुद्ध मन । नारायण स्मरावा ॥1॥
तरीच हा तरिजे सिंधु । भवबंधू तोडोनिया ॥ध्रु.॥
तेथे सरे शुद्ध साचें । अंतरींचे बीज तें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे लवणकळी । पडतां जळीं तें होय ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Purify the mind and remember Narayana. Only then can you cross this ocean of existence, cutting through the bonds of worldly life.

What works there is what is pure and true, the inner seed of sincerity. Says Tuka, when a lump of salt falls into water, it becomes the water itself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Make the mind pure. Remember Narayana. Only then do you cross this ocean. Only then are the bonds of worldly life cut. What counts there is what is truly pure: the inner seed of sincerity. Tuka says: a lump of salt, falling into water, becomes the water itself.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names the single condition for crossing the ocean of birth and death: a mind made pure, holding the Name of Narayana. The remembering is what cuts the bonds, but only purity and an honest inner seed make the remembering real. His closing image is severe and exact. The salt that falls into water does not float there as itself; it dissolves and becomes water. So the one who truly remembers does not keep a separate self alongside God; the self is undone into what it sought.

GATHA 3316 Prayers

Prayer, to see God everywhere

मराठी मूळ

जिकडे पाहे तिकडे देव । ऐसा भाव दे कांहीं ॥1॥

पडें तेथें तुझ्या पायां। करीं वायां न वजतें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे विषमें सारी । ठाणें धरी जीवासी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Grant me such a vision that wherever I look I see only God. Why have I been made so limited, loaded down with virtues and faults? Wherever I may fall, let it be at Your feet; let nothing I do be in vain.

Says Tuka, the uneven path takes a firm hold upon the jiva.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wherever I look, let me see God. Give me at least this much vision. Why was I made so small, so full of merits and faults? Wherever I fall, let me fall at your feet; let nothing I do go to waste. Tuka says: the uneven road takes a firm grip on the jiva.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks for one gift: eyes that find God in every direction. He looks at himself honestly, a narrow creature loaded with both virtues and faults, and does not pretend otherwise. His petition is not for success but for safety, that whatever befall him, he land at God's feet and nothing be wasted. The closing line warns why the prayer matters: the broken, uneven road of worldly life seizes the soul and holds it fast, so the soul that does not fix its sight on God will be caught by the ground it walks on.

GATHA 3317 Devotion to Vitthal

Total surrender, God as sole wealth

मराठी मूळ

जिकडे जाय तिकडे सवें । आतां यावें यावरी ॥1॥
माझ्या अवघ्या भांडवला । तूं एकला जालासी ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे आतां देवा । नका गोवा यावरी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Wherever I go, You are there with me. Come now, and stay with me from this moment on.

You have become my entire capital, You alone. Do not let me cling to anything apart from Your feet.

Says Tuka, O God, do not entangle me any further.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wherever I go, you come with me. Now come, and stay from here on. You alone have become my whole capital. Do not let me hold anything apart from your feet. Tuka says: now, God, do not tangle me up any further.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram has reached the point where there is nothing of his own left; God has become his entire wealth, his only stock. He asks God, who already walks beside him everywhere, to stay openly and finally. His one fear now is of being made to cling to something other than the feet, so he begs to be kept from any second attachment. The closing plea, do not entangle me further, asks God to stop adding the knots of worldly involvement and to leave him bound to one thing only.

GATHA 3318 The Power of the Name

The Name, no ruin for the devotee

मराठी मूळ

स्मरतां कां घडे नास । विष्णुदास यावरी ॥1॥
ऐसी सीमा जाली जगीं । तरी मी वेगीं अनुसरलों ॥ध्रु.॥
धरिलें तें निवडे आतां । न घडे चित्तावेगळें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नाश नाहीं । पुराणें ही गर्जती ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How can ruin befall a servant of Vishnu who remembers the Name? Such is the proven truth in this world, and that is why I have followed it eagerly. What I have grasped will not be taken from me now; it cannot be separated from my heart.

Says Tuka, there is no destruction in this; even the Puranas proclaim it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How can ruin come to a servant of Vishnu who remembers the Name? This is the settled truth in the world, so I followed it at once. What I have grasped cannot be taken from me now; it will not leave my heart. Tuka says: there is no destruction in this. Even the Puranas proclaim it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram states a promise and then his own act of trust. The one who remembers the Name, as a servant of Vishnu, cannot be brought to ruin; this is established truth, so he wasted no time in following it. Now what he has taken hold of has taken hold of him in return: it cannot be pried from his heart. He stakes the claim not only on his own experience but on the Puranas, which themselves declare aloud that for the devotee of the Name there is no destruction.

GATHA 3319 Devotion to Vitthal

Regret, the remedy found too late

मराठी मूळ

आधी नाहीं कळों आला हा उपाय । नाहीं तरी काय चुकी होती ॥1॥
घालितो पायांसी मिठी एकसरें । नेदीं तो दुसरें आड येऊं ॥ध्रु.॥
कासया पडतों लटिक्याचे भरी । नव्हता का शिरीं भार घेतों ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कां हे घेतों गर्भवास । कां या होतों दास कुटुंबाचा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If only this remedy had been known to me earlier, what a difference it would have made! Now I clasp His feet in one single embrace and refuse to let anything else come between us. Why did I keep falling for false burdens? Why did I not refuse the weight upon my head long ago? Says Tuka, why did I endure the suffering of the womb? Why did I become a slave to family and household?

IN PLAIN WORDS

I did not know this remedy before. If I had, what mistake could have happened? Now I clasp his feet in one embrace, and I let nothing else come between. Why did I keep falling under false loads? Why did I carry that weight on my head? Tuka says: why did I suffer the womb again and again? Why did I become a slave to family and household?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks back with grief at how long he lived without the one remedy he now holds. Had he known to clasp God's feet and let nothing intrude, the long chain of error would never have happened. He counts the cost of his ignorance: the false burdens he kept accepting, the weight he carried for nothing, the repeated births in the womb, the years spent as a bondservant to family and household. The regret is not bitterness at others but a clear self-examination, showing how much was wasted before the simple thing was seen.

GATHA 3320 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender at the hour of reckoning

मराठी मूळ

आतां बरें जालें । माझें मज कळो आलें ॥1॥
खोटा ऐसा संवसार । मज पायीं द्यावी थार ॥ध्रु.॥
उघडले डोळे । भोग देताकाळीं कळे ॥
तुका ह्मणे जीवा । होतां तडातोडी देवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now, at last, a good thing has happened: I have come to understand myself. This worldly life is false; grant me a place at Your feet.

My eyes have opened, and I see the truth just as the moment of reckoning arrives. Says Tuka, O God, the jiva is being wrenched apart from the body.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now it is well. I have come to understand my own self. This worldly life is false; give me a place at your feet. My eyes have opened. I see the truth just as the time of reckoning comes. Tuka says: O God, the jiva is being torn away from the body.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram marks the moment of clear seeing as a good thing, even though it arrives late. He has finally understood himself and judged worldly life to be false, and so he asks only for a place at God's feet. The eyes open, he says, exactly as the hour of reckoning arrives, when the soul is being wrenched from the body. The poem holds together two truths at once: the urgency of death, and the calm of a man who has at last surrendered, asking refuge at the only place that will hold.

GATHA 3321 The Necessity of Experience

Fulfillment, the sweet Name made a garland

मराठी मूळ

बोलिलों ते धर्म अनुभव अंगें । काय पांडुरंगें उणें केलें ॥1॥
सर्व सिद्धि पायीं वोळगती दासी । इच्छा नाहीं ऐसी व्हावें कांहीं ॥ध्रु.॥
संतसमागमें अळंकार वाणी । करूं हे पेरणी शुद्ध बीजा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे रामकृष्णनामें गोड । आवडीचें कोड माळ ओऊं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What I have spoken is dharma, confirmed by my own experience. What has Panduranga left unfulfilled? All accomplishments attend His feet like maidservants; I have no wish to become anything.

In the company of saints, I adorn my speech and sow these seeds of purity. Says Tuka, the names of Rama and Krishna are sweet; let me string them into a garland of delight.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What I have spoken is dharma, proven on my own body. What has Panduranga left undone? Every power waits at his feet like a serving maid. I have no wish to become anything. In the company of saints I adorn my speech and sow this pure seed. Tuka says: the names of Rama and Krishna are sweet; let me thread them into a garland of delight.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from completion, not theory: what he teaches is dharma tested in his own life. Panduranga has left nothing wanting, and all the powers and attainments wait at God's feet like servants, so he has no ambition left to be anyone or anything. What remains is to keep good company, to make his speech beautiful, and to plant the pure seed of the Name in others. The sweetness of the names of Rama and Krishna is enough, and he asks only to string those sweet names together like a garland.

GATHA 3322 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the irreversible inner change

मराठी मूळ

परिसाचे अंगें सोनें जाला विळा । वाकणें या कळा हीन नेव्हे ॥1॥
अंतरीं पालट घडला कारण । मग समाधान तें चि गोड ॥ध्रु.॥
पिकली सेंद पूर्वकर्मा नये । अव्हेरु तो काय घडे मग॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आणा पंगती सुरण । पृथक ते गुण केले पाकें॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When iron is touched by the philosopher's stone, it becomes gold; the bending and twisting it undergoes is not a defect. Once the inner transformation has taken place, that very contentment is sweet.

A ripe fruit cannot return to its former bitterness; there is no rejecting what is done. Says Tuka, add the yam to the cooking pot; the right preparation transforms even its harsh qualities.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Touched by the philosopher's stone, the iron blade becomes gold. Its bends and twists are no longer a flaw. Once the inner change has happened, that contentment alone is sweet. A ripened fruit cannot go back to its sourness; what is done cannot be refused. Tuka says: put the yam in the cooking pot. The right cooking changes even its harsh qualities.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the inner transformation of grace as a change that cannot be undone. The crooked iron blade, touched by the philosopher's stone, turns to gold, and its old bends stop being defects because the substance itself is now different. He stacks the images: a ripened fruit cannot return to being sour, and a yam, cooked rightly, loses its harsh raw bite. The point for self-examination is steadying: once God has truly changed you within, that new contentment is the only sweetness, and the old condition has no power to call you back.

GATHA 3323 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, each carries its own burden

मराठी मूळ

ज्याचे माथां जो जो भार । ते चि फार तयासी ॥1॥
मागें पुढें अवघें रितें । कळों येतें अनुभवें ॥ध्रु.॥
परिसा अंगीं अमुपसोनें । पोटीं हीन धातु चि ॥2॥
आपुला तो करि धर्म । जाणे वर्म तुका तें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whatever burden rests on whose head feels heaviest to that person. Before and after, everything else is empty, as experience makes clear.

The philosopher's stone may contain limitless gold, yet its own inner substance is mere base metal. Says Tuka, each acts according to its own dharma; he who knows the secret knows this well.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever load lies on a person's head feels the heaviest to that person. Look before and behind: all the rest is empty. Experience makes this plain. The philosopher's stone holds limitless gold, yet inside its own body it is only base metal. Tuka says: each thing acts by its own nature; the one who knows the secret knows this.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram observes that every person feels their own burden as the heaviest, while everything around them looks empty and weightless by comparison. Experience, he says, teaches this clearly. His sharp image is the philosopher's stone: it turns endless iron into gold, yet in its own substance it stays base metal, never becoming gold itself. The lesson is about acting from one's true nature rather than appearances: a thing does what it is, and only the one who knows this hidden law sees past how things look to what they actually are.

GATHA 3324 Longing and Separation

Longing, the helpless one's only refuge

मराठी मूळ

पाहें तिकडे दिशा ओस । अवघी पास पायांपें ॥1॥
मन चि साच होइल कई । प्रेम देई भेटोनि ॥ध्रु.॥
सर्वापरि पांगुळ असें । न कळे कैंसे तें तुह्मा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कृपावंता । तूं तों दाता दीनाचा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Wherever I look, the horizon stands empty; everything lies clustered near Your feet. When will my mind become true? Grant me Your love through Your presence.

I am lame in every way; do You not see this? Says Tuka, O gracious one, You are the benefactor of the lowly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wherever I look, the horizon is empty. Everything is gathered close at your feet. When will my mind become true? Grant me love by coming to me. I am crippled in every way; do you not see it? Tuka says: O merciful one, you are the giver to the helpless.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks out and finds the whole world barren; the only fullness is at God's feet, where everything he wants is gathered. His longing turns inward and impatient: when will his own mind become true, and when will God come and give him love by his very presence? He confesses he is lame in every way, unable to reach God by his own strength. So he rests the whole appeal on God's nature rather than his own merit: you are the one who gives to the helpless, and I am exactly that.

GATHA 3325 Longing and Separation

Longing, calling the Mother to run

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How can I keep walking, O Mother, with a body such as mine? Run, run to me quickly! My life breath watches the road for You. I come toward You with arms outstretched.

Says Tuka, will You grant me rest? That is my only yearning.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How can I keep walking, O Mother, with a body like mine? Run, run quickly. My life breath is at my throat, watching the road for you. With arms spread wide I come toward you. Will you give me rest? Tuka says: this is my whole longing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram cries out to God as a mother, confessing that his worn body cannot carry him any further. He begs her to run to him quickly, because his very life breath has risen to his throat and waits on the road for her coming. He comes with arms spread wide, the posture of a child reaching to be lifted. The single thing he asks is rest, to be received and carried instead of struggling on, and he says plainly that this longing for the Mother's arms is the whole of his desire.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It has happened just as my chitta desired: the Name of Hari has come to my lips. Now I shall take my fill; I will not leave anything behind.

The store within my mind now holds a treasure beyond measure. Says Tuka, the three syllables of Vitthal have accomplished everything.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It has happened just as I longed. The Name of Hari has come to my mouth. Now I will take my fill; I leave nothing behind. The store within my mind is as great as my heart could wish, and a measureless heap lies ahead. Tuka says: the three syllables of Vitthal have done everything.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from fulfilled desire: the Name of Hari has come freely to his lips, exactly as he wanted. So he resolves to take his fill of it and hold nothing back, because the supply does not run out. The treasure stored in his mind already matches his heart's wish, and beyond it lies a heap without measure. He ends by crediting the whole abundance to the Name itself: the three syllables of Vitthal have accomplished everything, so that nothing more needs to be earned or added.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I bow at the feet of those whose wealth and treasure is Panduranga. Here my jiva has found its rest, and I am filled to overflowing with zeal.

I will take the dust of their feet and press it to my forehead, those feet that walk the path to the temple. I would sacrifice even the fortune of Indra and offer it as a tribute to them.

In the homes of the Vaishnavas God Himself resides; I hold this conviction with true faith in my chitta. Says Tuka, the friends of Hari are His servants; beyond them I have no further longing.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I bow at the feet of those whose only wealth is Panduranga. Here my soul has found its rest, and so I am filled with longing. I will take the dust of their feet and press it to my forehead, those feet that walk the road to the temple. I would give up even the fortune of Indra and offer it to them as tribute. God himself lives in the homes of the Vaishnavas; I hold this with true faith in my heart. Tuka says: the friends of Hari are his servants. Beyond them I want nothing else.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram turns his devotion not only toward God but toward God's people, the Vaishnavas, and explains why. Their one treasure is Panduranga, so to bow at their feet is to bow toward the only wealth that counts; his restless soul finds its rest there. He would press the dust of their feet to his forehead and trade away even Indra's heavenly fortune for it, because he believes God actually dwells in their homes. The claim he lands is that the company of Hari's servants is itself the goal: once he has them, no other longing is left.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Though I be born and die again and again, this alone seems good to me. There is no limit to this love; let no one say it has been enough.

An inexhaustible mine of nectar has been opened. Says Tuka, the name Vitthal truly fills my mouth.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let me be born and die again and again; even this seems good to me. There is no end to this love; let no one say it has been enough. A mine of nectar has been opened, and it never runs dry. Tuka says: the name Vitthal truly fills my mouth.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures his love for the Name against the one thing devotees usually dread, the round of birth and death. He says even endless rebirth is fine if it comes with this love, so far does the love outweigh the fear. The love has no boundary, and he warns against ever calling it sufficient; the supply of sweetness is a mine that cannot be emptied. The whole point lands in the last line: the name Vitthal in his mouth is the inexhaustible nectar he is talking about.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You are truth, You are truth, You are truth, O Vitthal. Then why have You projected this appearance of the world? Protect Your own creation; I cry out to You, O Maya.

Why have You made us live in fear? That which has no form, You have given it a name. You have needlessly multiplied this toil.

Says Tuka, why have You become so clever? You were once formless, desireless, and beyond all qualities.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You are truth, you are truth, you are truth, O Vitthal. Then why have you shown us this whole spread of a world? Look after your own; this Maya keeps calling out. Why have you made us live in fear? You have no form, yet you took a name, and so you only piled up false trouble. Tuka says: why have you turned so clever? You used to be plain, without desire, beyond all qualities.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses a direct grievance against Vitthal, beginning from the one thing he is sure of: God alone is real. If that is so, he asks, why project this entire appearance of a world that holds us in fear? He charges that the formless took on a name and form for nothing but sport, and thereby manufactured needless suffering for souls. The sharpness is aimed at God himself, not softened: Tukaram accuses the once plain, desireless, attributeless one of growing too clever, and asks him to own the creatures caught inside his game.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Alas, upon our foreheads such is Your design: the very purity we would hold cannot be attained through yogic effort. What was the point of all this except sport? You have made us separate from Yourself.

Show me where sin and merit stand as tangible forms. Why do You burden us with intentions and consequences? Says Tuka, now call off this mischief, O Panduranga; this torment is all an illusion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Such is the lot you wrote on our foreheads: the very purity we reach for cannot be won by yogic effort. What was any of this for, except your play? You made us separate from yourself. Show me where sin and merit stand as solid things. Why do you load us with intentions and their results? Tuka says: now call off this trick, Panduranga; this torment is all a lie.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram argues that the whole apparatus of striving, sin, and merit is a fiction God himself set up. He says the purity people chase through yoga is unreachable by such effort, so the effort was never the real path. He challenges God to point to where sin and merit actually exist as tangible things, since they do not, and asks why he is then weighed down by intentions and their consequences. The demand he lands is blunt: the separation and the moral bookkeeping are a game and a false torment, and Panduranga should simply call it off.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I resolve many times over not to give such harsh answers to people. What sin stands in the way, appearing before me and changing the very nature of my inner temperament? I have freed my neck from the grip of worldly life, yet why do these failings keep coming forward? Says Tuka, O Panduranga, if an obstacle arises in my service, what am I to do?

IN PLAIN WORDS

I should not give people such harsh answers; I think this over again and again. What sin keeps stepping in front of me and turning my inner nature around? I have pulled my own neck free of worldly life, so why do these failings keep coming forward? Tuka says: O Panduranga, if this puts an obstacle in my service, what am I to do?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram confesses a fault he keeps falling back into: speaking harshly to people even after resolving not to. He examines himself honestly, asking what it is inside him that overrides his good intention and changes his temper. The pain is sharper because he has already cut himself loose from worldly attachment, yet the failing returns anyway. His real fear, which he lays before Panduranga, is not the harm to his reputation but that this habit could come between him and his service of God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now let the people do what they will with me; let them humiliate me however they please. Even then I shall not release Your feet; the mind, once wearied of all else, will come to rest.

I shall not be repelled by empty speech. Why does such a pitiable tendency persist in me? Says Tuka, if a blow falls upon my head, only then will it stop seeking more room to wander.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now it is right that the people do with me what they will; let them shame me somehow. Even then I will not let go of your feet; the mind, once sick of everything else, will come to rest. I will not flinch at empty, abusive talk. Why does such a low tendency stay in me? Tuka says: if a blow lands on my head, then it will stop looking for more room to roam.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram accepts public humiliation as the very thing that can settle his restless mind on God. He invites people to shame him, because once the mind is worn out by the world's contempt it stops wandering and comes to rest at Vitthal's feet, which he vows never to release. He still catches a base streak in himself that recoils from abuse, and questions it honestly. The image he lands on is stark: only when a blow finally falls on his head will the roving mind give up its search for somewhere else to go.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A child exercises its will over its mother through sheer love; she contains her feelings and nurtures the child all the same. Do not hold my offenses against me, O saints, O parents.

A mother endures the harsh words and tantrums of her child, then gathers it up again in her arms. Says Tuka, she has the power and authority, yet she never turns cruel.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A child rules its mother through sheer love; she holds back her own feelings and raises it anyway. Do not hold my offenses against me, O saints, my mother and father. A mother bears her child's rude words and tantrums, then gathers it up again into her arms. Tuka says: she has all the power, yet cruelty never rises in her.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pleads with the saints to forgive his faults, using the bond of a child and its mother as his whole argument. A small child orders its mother around and throws tantrums, yet her love only contains itself and keeps nurturing. He asks the saints, whom he calls his mother and father, to treat his offenses the same way. The point he lands is that real authority shows itself in patience: the mother has every power to strike back, but cruelty simply never arises in her, and he trusts the saints are like that.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How gracious He becomes, as many saints can testify. He does not ask about caste or birth; He does not allow a moment's delay.

How many have crossed over in this way, one cannot say. He reveals the paths to Vaikuntha, and one sees that He is magnanimous beyond all measure.

He carries no pride within; He will not sit idle while His devotees suffer. Says Tuka, there is no laziness or sloth in Him. Whatever comes, He gives it freely at any hour.

Vitthal is supreme in generosity.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How gracious he becomes, many saints will tell you. He does not ask your caste or birth; he lets no moment be lost. How many have crossed over this way, who can count? He shows the roads to Vaikuntha, and you see how full of riches he is. He carries no pride in him, and he will not sit while his devotees suffer. Tuka says: there is no laziness or sleep in him. Whatever comes, he gives at any hour. Vitthal is greatest in giving.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the character of God's grace as the saints have witnessed it. The first thing he names is that this grace is blind to caste and birth and never delays, so countless people have crossed over by it. He shows God as immensely rich yet utterly without pride, never idle while a devotee is in need. The claim he lands is that there is no sloth or sleep in him at all: he gives freely at any hour, and in sheer generosity Vitthal stands supreme.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Blessed are those pilgrims who behold Pandhari. Those who carry the name Vitthal on their lips at every step have no worldly bondage.

Sins have fled, sins have fled, for the devotees of Hari have arrived. Their bodies are filled with the sustenance of love; shamelessly they dance in His color.

They wear the mark of Gopichandan and the tulsi garland around their necks. Says Tuka, with God in their chitta, liberation is right at hand. Even for the weak and the powerless, He is more than enough.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Blessed are these pilgrims who see Pandhari. Those who keep Vitthal on their tongue at every step, what bondage of the world is left for them? Sins have fled, sins have fled; here come the servants of Hari. Their bodies are full of love; with no shame they dance in his color. They wear the mark of Gopichandan and the tulsi garland at the throat. Tuka says: with God in the heart, liberation is right in hand. Even for the weak and the powerless, he is more than enough.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram celebrates the Varkari pilgrims who reach Pandhari with Vitthal's name on their lips at every step. He says their worldly bondage is simply gone, and that sins flee at the mere arrival of Hari's devotees. He paints them as people soaked in love who dance without self-consciousness, marked with sandal paste and the tulsi garland of the tradition. The point he lands is that this path is open to everyone: with God held in the heart, liberation is already in hand, and even the weak and powerless find him fully sufficient.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now that I know these secrets, I have been freed from delusion. I dance happily in the kirtan, with no apprehension in my mind.

Now that such strength has come into my hands, all worry is gone. Where joy has arisen here, nothing else can compare.

God has arranged it so that nothing more remains to be desired. Says Tuka, my mind has now found complete peace.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now that I know these secrets, my delusion is shaken off. I dance in the kirtan in joy, with no doubt left in my mind. Now that such strength has come to my hand, worry is gone. Where this joy has risen, nothing else can stand beside it. God has arranged it so that nothing more is left to want. Tuka says: my mind has now found its peace.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reports the settled state that comes after the secret of devotion finally opens to him. Knowing it, his delusion falls away and he dances in the kirtan freely, with no doubt or fear left. The new strength he feels dissolves his worry, and the joy that rises leaves nothing able to rival it. The line he lands is the quiet one: God has so arranged things that no desire remains, and his mind has come fully to rest.

Ecstasy, duality dissolved in the Name

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The contemplation of Narayana, Narayana has settled deep within my chitta. Nothing sweet appeals to me now, nothing else at all.

The sense of duality has vanished, and with it the body has become insubstantial. Says Tuka's brother, I have become desireless in this pursuit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The remembrance has settled in my heart: Narayana, Narayana. Nothing tastes sweet to me now, nothing else at all. The sense of two has vanished, and with it the body has become empty. Tuka's brother says: I have become free of all desire in this.

WHAT IT MEANS

This abhanga, spoken in the voice of Tuka's brother, names the loss of the sense of separateness. The constant remembrance of Narayana has taken root in the heart until nothing else holds any sweetness. As that absorption deepens, the feeling of duality, of self set apart from God, disappears, and the body itself seems to lose its substance. What it lands on is that once the dividing line is gone, desire goes with it, leaving the speaker wholly free of wanting.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Govinda has pervaded everything, inside and out, to the very end. He has ensnared me so completely that words fail; what can be spoken has been spoken.

He made a bonfire of my past karma and claimed my jiva as an offering. Says Tuka's brother, now nothing of worldly life remains.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He fills everything, outside and inside, to the very end. Govinda has bound me so completely that speech fails; what could be said has been said. He set fire to my stored-up karma and took my soul as his offering. Tuka's brother says: now nothing of worldly life is left.

WHAT IT MEANS

Again in the brother's voice, this poem describes being wholly taken over by God. Govinda is felt to pervade everything, inside and out, with no remainder, and the experience binds the speaker so fully that words give out. He pictures God burning up his accumulated karma in a single fire and claiming his very life as a sacrifice. The point he lands is the completeness of it: with the past consumed and the self surrendered, nothing of worldly existence remains to hold him.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Our meeting, even this conversation, has become a rare and precious thing. Therefore I offer my salutations to all of you now.

The future rests upon the body's fate; who knows what will come to pass? Says Tuka's brother, this has become our settled conviction.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Our meeting, even this talk between us, has become rare and hard to come by. So now I do this: take my salutation, all of you. The future rests on this body, and who knows what will be? Tuka says: Tuka's brother, this has become our settled feeling.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as one taking leave, naming how precious even an ordinary meeting has become. He bows to everyone present, because he does not assume there will be another time. The body's fate is unknown, and tomorrow is not promised, so the salutation is offered now while it can be. The closing line frames this as a fixed conviction, not a passing mood: live each meeting as if it may be the last, and give your reverence while you still can.

तुका ह्मणे तुकयाबंधु आणीक उपमा । नाहीं या तों जन्मा द्यावयासी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if one performs austerities for countless lifetimes, this human birth is hard to attain. Such is the treasure that has come into one's hands, yet the unfortunate one turns it to dust.

It is the essence of the highest, the storehouse of the Vedas, that by whose presence even sacred waters are purified. Says Tuka, speaking for Tuka's brother, there is no other comparison worthy of this birth.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Even if you do austerities for countless lives, this human body is still hard to reach. Such a treasure has come into your hands, and the luckless one turns it to dust. It is the essence of the highest, the storehouse of the Vedas; by it even holy waters are made pure. Tuka says: Tuka's brother, there is no other thing to compare this birth to.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures what a human birth is worth and warns against squandering it. Even endless lifetimes of penance do not earn it easily, so to hold it is to hold a treasure. The unfortunate person lets that treasure rot, treating the rare chance as if it were nothing. He then raises its value higher: this birth is the very essence of what is best, the Vedas' own storehouse, and so charged that even sacred rivers are purified by it. Nothing else can be set beside it, which is exactly why wasting it is the great loss.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What works for us is pure, simple devotion. Cleverness, worldly knowledge, and subtle arts are not required.

My all-knowing master is Panduranga; it is through intimacy with Him that the cowherd boys were blessed. Says Tuka, God cannot be won by rituals or duties alone; sincere devotees hold true sovereignty over Him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What works for us is one thing: pure feeling. Cleverness, knowing, skill, none of it is needed. My master Panduranga knows all; it was by closeness to him that the cowherd boys were blessed. Tuka says: he does not come into your hands by rites and duties. Over him the sincere ones hold the power.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets simple, pure devotion against worldly intelligence and technique. With God, sincerity is the only currency; learning and subtlety add nothing. He points to Panduranga, who knows everything, and to the cowherds of Vrindavan whose nearness to Krishna, not their cleverness, made them blessed. Then he lands the sharp claim: ritual and duty alone cannot lay hold of God. It is the sincere-hearted who hold a real sway over him, because love, not performance, is what moves him.

The child's claim on God, love as power

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Love grants authority; even the mother and father yield to the child's affection. What force can prevail against a child who clamors and wails? The child seizes the mother's garment, tugs at her, pushes from behind and in front.

He speaks whatever comes to his mind. Says Tuka, Vitthal has endured it all.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Love makes its own authority. Mother and father give way before the child. What strength can stand against a child who frets and wails? He grabs the edge of her garment, frets, pushes her back and pulls her forward. He says whatever comes into his head. Tuka says: Vitthal has borne it all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses the picture of a willful child to show how love overturns ordinary power. A child has no strength, yet its crying and clinging bend even its parents to its will. It clutches the mother's clothes, tugs and shoves, and blurts out whatever it likes, and she endures it because she loves it. Tukaram places himself as that child and Vitthal as the parent who simply bears all of it. The point is that the devotee's claim on God is the helpless, demanding love of a child, and God's response is patient endurance.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the beloved is met, the chitta is soothed and the mind finds rest. The mind delights endlessly in the beauty of Narayana; it is a taste that never palls.

No other flavor can ever match or satisfy this craving; this one never fades. Says Tuka, how wonderful this has turned out; only those who have found it know its worth.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the loved one is met, the heart cools and the mind comes to rest. The mind is set on the beauty; in Narayana there is no surfeit. No other flavor can ever fill or match this; this taste does not fade. Tuka says: how good this has turned out. Only the one who has found it knows.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the settled joy of meeting his beloved God. The encounter cools the restless heart and gives the mind its rest, because the mind has fixed on the beauty of Narayana, a delight that never cloys. He insists no other pleasure can equal or satisfy it, and unlike every other flavor this one does not wear off. The final line keeps the experience honest: he simply marvels at his good fortune, and says only the person who has actually tasted it can know what it is worth.

Steady mind, prayer for lasting sweetness

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Guard well what has been given to you and protect your own store. My intellect is steady, O God; I have no craving for sensory pleasures.

When obstacles arise in devotion, the feet of God grow distant. Says Tuka, may this sweetness endure from the beginning to the very end.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Guard what has been given; keep your own store safe. My mind is steady, O God; I have no craving for the senses. When obstacles come into devotion, the feet grow distant. Tuka says: this is the gain; from the beginning to the end, let the sweetness stay.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks of protecting devotion as one protects a treasure that has been entrusted. He reports his own state: the mind is steady and free of longing for sense pleasures, which is the condition that keeps God near. He names the danger plainly, that when obstacles enter the heart's devotion, God's feet seem to withdraw. So his prayer is for endurance: the real gain is the sweetness of devotion, and he asks that it hold firm from the first to the last.

Prayer, the child running to the breast

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे करीं कासवाचे परी । आहे सूत्रदोरी तुझे हातीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It is in my hands to practice contemplation; You must grant me the gift of loving grace. My capital for this entreaty is the invocation of Your Name, held safe for the giver.

Just as a child runs eagerly to the breast, the mother must let her milk flow with compassion. Says Tuka, I look to You as the tortoise watches over its young; the thread of control is in Your hands.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What is in my hands is to do remembrance; you must give the gift of grace, the gift of love. My only capital for this asking is the Name, kept safe for the one who gives. As a child runs and presses to the breast, the mother must let her milk flow in mercy. Tuka says: hold me as the tortoise holds its young; the thread of control is in your hands.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram divides the work of devotion between himself and God. His part is small: to keep remembering and calling. The grace, the love, the actual gift must come from God. His whole stock for the asking is the Name, held in trust for the giver. He pictures himself as a hungry child pressing to its mother, and asks God, like the mother, to let mercy flow. The closing image is of total dependence: as the tortoise is said to nourish its young by a thread of attention from afar, the controlling thread of his life is wholly in God's hands.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What harm befalls the one who shows the way? It is the one who ignores the warning who is truly ruined. How many in the past have been deceived like this, swallowing the poison even as they are warned.

Consider it carefully: the one who would not go did not lose his life. Says Tuka, he who has turned away from his own jiva, what can even Keshava do for him?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What does the one who shows the way lose? It is the one who, when warned, walks on, who is ruined. How many before have been fooled like this, who swallow the poison even as they are told. Look at it carefully: the one who would not go did not die, was not destroyed. Tuka says: the one who has turned away from his own life, what can Keshava do for him?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram defends the guide who warns and turns the blame back on the one who ignores the warning. The guide loses nothing by pointing out the road; it is the person who walks on despite the caution who is undone. Many before have been deceived this way, drinking the poison even after being told. He asks the hearer to reason it out: refusing the dangerous road never killed anyone. The hard close looks at self-examination, not contempt: if a person has turned away from his own true good, even Keshava cannot help someone who refuses to be helped.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Putting on a show without real inner experience is not the path to one's own good. Do not be deceived by outward appearances; pursue your true welfare quickly.

Narayana Himself plays many roles in many forms, yet after the performance He is exactly as He always was. A stone is called God, and through others' faith it can save them, yet the stone remains the same.

One may bow one's head to a tree made of gold, yet one cannot extract real wealth from it. Says Tuka, it is one's own devotion that saves; the one puffed up with ego meets only with ruin.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To keep up a show with no real experience is not doing yourself any good. So do not be fooled by outward color; take up your real good, and quickly. Narayana himself dresses in many forms and parts, yet after the act he is just as he was. A stone is named God, and by another's faith it can save him, yet the stone stays the same. A tree of gold is bowed to and honored, yet you cannot draw real wealth out of it. Tuka says: a person's own faith saves him; the one swollen with ego meets only ruin.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks the habit of religious performance without inner realization. Putting on the costume of piety with no living experience behind it does nothing for your true welfare, so do not be taken in by outward show, your own or anyone's. He grants that appearances can carry power: Narayana plays many forms yet stays unchanged; a mere stone called God can save through a worshipper's faith, though the stone is still only stone; a golden tree is honored yet yields no usable wealth. The point lands on self-examination: what saves a person is their own genuine faith, while the one inflated by ego, mistaking the show for the substance, is the one who is destroyed.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Pitiable that I am, I have no attachment, no greed, no covetousness, yet my eagerness is excessive. Cursed is this ungrateful body that does not honor the kindness done to it.

Is there anyone more wretched than I, who does not even relish costly, delicious food? I cannot see any virtues of my own; who knows what my past karma truly holds? Says Tuka, seeing whatever it is in me, Panduranga has still kept me at His feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wretch that I am, I have no attachment, no clinging, no greed, yet my eagerness only grows worse. Cursed be this thankless body that does not feel the debt of a kindness. Who is more ruined than I, who does not even relish costly, delicious food? I see no virtues of my own; who knows what my past deeds hold? Tuka says: seeing whatever there is in me, Panduranga has still kept me at his feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a harsh self-accounting and finds nothing in himself to lean on. He admits he is restless and overeager even while claiming freedom from greed, and calls his own body ungrateful for not honoring the kindness shown it. He cannot name a single virtue of his own, and does not know what his past karma has stored up. The honesty turns the searchlight inward, not outward. The last line is the grace: with full knowledge of all this wretchedness, Panduranga has kept him at his feet anyway, so the rescue is mercy, not merit.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Without sufficient intellect, how shall I describe Your meditation, on which even the Vedas fall silent? Yet making it as beautiful as my small mind allows, I have enshrined Your lotus feet in my chitta. I gaze upon Your blessed face from which all sweetness flows, and by that sight my hunger and thirst are quenched.

My tongue has been sweetened by singing Your verses and songs, and my mind has found its contentment. Says Tuka, my gaze rests upon Your feet, those beautiful feet tinged with saffron.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Without enough mind, how can I describe your meditation, before which the Vedas and the scriptures fall silent? So, making it as lovely as my small mind can, I have held your lotus feet in my heart. I look on your blessed face, poured out of joy, and by it my hunger and thirst are taken away. My tongue is sweetened singing your verses and songs, and my mind has found its rest. Tuka says: my gaze rests on your feet, those lovely feet touched with saffron.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram begins by confessing his smallness: even the Vedas go silent before God, so how could his poor intellect describe him. He does not let that stop devotion. With the little mind he has, he makes the contemplation beautiful and enshrines God's lotus feet in his heart. Gazing on the blessed face that pours out joy stills his hunger and thirst, and singing the songs sweetens his tongue and settles his mind. The poem closes simply and concretely, with his eyes resting on the saffron-touched feet, showing that love, not learning, is what completes the worship.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Without You, everything appears ghostly and desolate; I know no one who is truly dear to me. I am frightened by the hordes of wild beasts; I cannot summon courage, O Panduranga.

In this darkness I cannot walk the path; thorns and stumps strike my body. I stand alone and companionless; the roads fork in many directions, and I cannot find my stride.

Says Tuka, the guru showed me the way, but Panduranga has remained far away.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Without you everything turns ghostly and bare; I know no one who is truly dear to me. Fear takes me when I see the herds of wild beasts; I cannot find courage, O Panduranga. In the darkness the path cannot be walked; stumps and thorns catch my body. I am alone and without a companion; the roads fork every way, and I cannot find my stride. Tuka says: the guru showed me the way, but Panduranga has stayed far off.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram cries out from the middle of the journey, where God feels absent. Without God the world looks desolate and empty of anyone he can truly call his own. He names the terrors of the road: wild beasts, darkness he cannot walk through, thorns and stumps tearing at him, and forking paths with no one beside him. The complaint is sharp and not softened: the guru did point out the way, yet Panduranga himself has kept his distance. The poem holds the real anguish of a seeker who has been shown the path but still aches for the presence of God who has not yet come close.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Lakshmi worships You daily with lotuses; yet what has that won from You? Why do You boast of Your generosity in vain? We know who You are, O Lord of Pandhari. You say You alone can grant deliverance, but Your justice has its limits.

Karna, that generous and mighty warrior, You felled him with words alone. Even when he lay on the ground, You showed him no mercy and knocked out both his teeth.

Poor Shiryala, a man of gentle nature, You made him cut and serve his own child as food. Who could be more merciless? You had his head pounded in a mortar.

The emperor Shibi, performing sacred rites, You had his body carved piece by piece. You extracted his very life with relentless demands, caring nothing for what followed.

And what wrong had Bali committed? You pushed him under the earth with Your foot upon his head. You imprisoned him behind closed doors.

Is this how You tell devotional stories? You took Harishchandra's entire kingdom and had him sold to a low-caste household. You drove a wedge between Nala and Damayanti.

Such is Your cunning, O Hari. And how many more of Your deeds shall I recount? You brought calamity upon Your own mother's kin.

You killed Your own uncle. Says Tuka's brother, such is our beloved Lord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Lakshmi worships You every day with lotuses. What has she ever won from You? Why do You boast of Your generosity for nothing? We know who You are, O Lord of Pandhari. You say You alone can grant deliverance, but Your justice has its limits. Karna was a generous, mighty warrior, and You felled him with words alone. He lay on the ground, yet You showed no pity; You knocked out both his teeth. Poor Shiryala was a gentle, devout man, and You made him cut up his own child and serve it as food. Who could be more merciless? You had his head pounded in a mortar. The emperor Shibi was performing sacred rites, and You had his body carved piece by piece. You wrung out his very life and never looked back at what came after. What wrong had Bali done? You pushed him under the earth with Your foot on his head. You shut him behind a closed door. Is this how You tell devotional stories? You took Harishchandra's whole kingdom and had him sold into a low-caste house. You drove a wedge between Nala and Damayanti. Such is Your cunning, O Hari. How many more of Your deeds shall I count? You brought ruin on Your own mother's kin. You killed Your own uncle. Tuka says: such is our beloved Lord.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks to Vitthal in the voice of a hurt lover, listing the famous devotees and kings whom God let suffer terribly. He stacks up Karna, Shiryala, Shibi, Bali, Harishchandra, Nala, even Krishna's own slain uncle, to throw God's boasted generosity back in His face. The point is not to deny God but to protest: if You alone save, why has saving looked so cruel to those who loved You? Behind the accusation is faith, not contempt; only one who is utterly sure of the bond dares to argue with it this hard. The poem leaves the wound open, refusing the easy comfort that devotion always pays off in this life. It asks the listener to face how dark and unaccountable the relationship with God can feel, and still call Him beloved.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All the pleas I made were wasted; nothing remains but my own weariness, O Lord of Pandhari. When did You ever give me contentment? When did anyone honor my wishes? Not even a trace of a dream or a troubled vision, let alone a direct word.

Now I am ashamed, O Panduranga; devotees such as these have arisen in the world. Says Tuka, I no longer have any confidence; it seems You have abandoned me. Why are you not a true Vaishnava? What pretense has blinded you? You are ashamed to say Hari, Hari, and walk about puffed up with pride.

Your youth has made you lazy; you are barren and useless without real strength. You are mad for fame but ashamed to dance before the pilgrims' procession.

You have traded the tulsi garland for the power of mere ornaments. How delicate you have become, claiming you cannot endure even a single Ekadashi fast.

You will not bathe or apply sacred ash to your forehead. You pamper only the outer skin, while the flesh beneath is of no use.

Says Tuka, calling on Padmanabhi and Vishwanath, he is still weeping.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Every plea I made was wasted. All that is left, O Lord of Pandhari, is my own weariness. When did You ever give me peace? When did anyone honor my wishes? Not even a trace of a dream, not even a troubled vision, let alone a word to my face. Now I feel ashamed, O Panduranga; this is the kind of devotee the world has produced. Tuka says: I have no confidence left now; it feels as if You have let me go. Why are you not a true Vaishnava? What pretense has stripped you bare? You are ashamed to say Hari, Hari, and you walk around swollen with pride. Your youth has made you lazy; you are barren and useless, with no real strength. You are mad for fame but ashamed to dance before the pilgrims' procession. You have traded the tulsi garland for the power of ornaments. How delicate you have become, saying you cannot keep even one Ekadashi fast. You will not bathe or wash; you will not put sacred ash on your forehead. You tend only the outer skin; the flesh beneath is good for nothing. Tuka says: calling on Padmanabhi and Vishwanath, he is still weeping.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem turns from grief to a sharp self-examination. First Tukaram cries that all his prayers went unanswered and that he is ashamed to be God's devotee at all, fearing he has been abandoned. Then the voice rounds on a slack, vain pretender who calls himself a Vaishnava but is too proud to chant the Name, too lazy and fashionable to fast or dance with the pilgrims, too fond of ornaments to wear the tulsi beads. The charge is aimed at the pattern of empty, image-conscious religion, the kind that tends the surface and lets the inner life rot. By ending with Tuka still weeping before God, the abhanga turns the accusation back on the singer too: the real question is whether one's own devotion is alive or only worn like jewelry.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A painted imitation may look like a tiger, but it does not have the tiger's true nature within. Outward color is tested by the touchstone; true contact reveals itself of its own accord.

A monkey dances as it has been trained, and no cleverness can change that. Says Tuka, the one who stores up falsehood is quickly exposed and put to shame.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A painted likeness can look just like a tiger, but it has no real tiger inside it. The touchstone sorts out mere outward color; true substance shows itself when it is rubbed and tested. A monkey dances the way it was trained to dance, and no cleverness can make it more than that. Tuka says: whoever hoards up falsehood is exposed quickly and shamed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tests appearance against substance using three plain images: a painted tiger, the goldsmith's touchstone, and a trained monkey. A holy look, a learned manner, a performance of piety can be perfectly convincing and still be hollow; what is real only proves itself under friction and trial. The trained monkey is the sharpest blow: rote, imitated religion can repeat the right moves yet stays a trick, not a transformation. The poem points at the gap between the role we perform and what we actually are inside. Its warning is that stored-up pretense does not last; sooner or later it is rubbed against reality and shown for what it is.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The sighs of an adulteress and the pity of a thief belong to the same company. For a trifle, such a one inherits a share of suffering and plants a thorn upon the road.

Feeding milk to a serpent only wastes the milk and turns the nectar into poison. Says Tuka, without punishing such people, the spread of wrongdoing cannot be stopped.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The sighs of an unfaithful woman and the pity of a thief belong to the same company. For a trifle such a one reaps a share of sorrow and sets a thorn upon the road. Feed milk to a snake and you only waste the milk; you turn nectar into poison. Tuka says: if such people are not punished, the spread of wrongdoing cannot be stopped.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram warns against kindness given to those bent on harm. Sympathy for a corrupt heart or a thief, he says, keeps the same company as the harm itself; indulging it plants a thorn that wounds everyone who walks that way. The image of milk fed to a serpent makes the point exact: good poured into a poisonous nature is not transformed, it is wasted and even turns deadly. The poem urges firm correction rather than soft tolerance, naming the failure to restrain wrongdoing as a way of letting it spread. The target is the pattern of harm and our weakness in coddling it, not a license for cruelty; the firmness is for the sake of the road everyone must share.

By that bliss my whole being has been cooled. I see the world as Vitthal.

With tender love I make my playful plea, speaking in the lisping language of a child. There is no trace of sorrow within me; the very notion of difference has been uprooted entirely.

Says Tuka, joy has filled my jiva; it has been dyed in Your color, O Keshava.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By that bliss my whole body has been cooled. I see this world as Vitthal. Playfully, with tenderness, I make my plea, speaking in the lisping way of a small child. There is no state of sorrow left inside me. The sense of difference has been pulled up by the root. Tuka says: joy has filled my jiva. It is dyed in Your color, O Keshava.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the calm after longing, when the seeking has been answered. Tukaram says his whole being has been cooled, and now he looks out and sees nothing but Vitthal everywhere, the world itself become God. The lisping, childlike speech shows the relationship has gone soft and intimate; there is nothing left to demand, only to play. He names what has changed at the root: the feeling of separation, of me-and-not-me, is gone, and with it all inner sorrow. The closing image of being dyed in Keshava's color says the change is not a passing mood but a soaking-through of the very self.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Vitthal is my kinsman, my good friend, my resting place. I will go to His town to meet Him. I will tell Him all my weariness and pain, for He is my dear one and knows everything. To mother and grandmothers, to brothers and all the people, I will make my plea with folded hands. To saints, mahants, siddhas, great souls, and sages I will go and lay bare my whole inner life. In my true home there is no shortage of happiness. Tuka says: then there is no more coming and going.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram frames God as family and Pandhari as the home he is finally walking back to. He pictures himself arriving worn out and pouring out every pain to Vitthal, the one kinsman who already knows it all. Before the meeting he greets the whole household of the holy, mothers, brothers, saints, and sages, opening his heart to them too. The phrase true home carries the weight: this is not just the pilgrim town but the soul's real origin, where lack and want have no place. The closing line, no more coming and going, hints at the end of restless rebirth and wandering: to reach this home is to stop being driven back and forth.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I will meditate upon Your form and sing Your Name; I will use my tongue and lips for nothing else. I will gaze upon Your feet and lay my eyes there; I will allow no separate thought to enter my mind.

I will listen only to the praise of Your virtues; I have had enough of all other speech. I will serve You with my hands and walk to You with my feet; I will go nowhere without You.

Says Tuka, I have placed my life at Your feet; what else do I have to give to anyone?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I will meditate on Your form and sing Your Name. My tongue and mouth will do no other work. I will look at Your feet and lay my eyes there. I will let no separate thought into my mind. I will hear only the telling of Your virtues in my ears. I have had enough of all other speech. I will do service with my hands and walk to You on my feet. I will go to no other place but You. Tuka says: I have set my life at Your feet. What else do I have left to give to anyone?

WHAT IT MEANS

This abhanga is a vow that gathers every faculty onto one object. Tukaram pledges tongue, eyes, ears, hands, feet, and mind each to a single use: to praise, behold, hear, serve, and approach God, and nothing else. The repeated refusal of anything separate or other is the heart of it; devotion here means closing every door that does not open onto Vitthal. By ending with his life already laid at God's feet, he answers the implied question of cost: there is nothing held back to spend elsewhere. The poem holds up undivided attention as the whole of the path, the self spent entirely in one direction.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why do you not worship God? You are tormented endlessly by cravings. Why can you not surrender to God the way a crane pursues a fish with single-minded focus? Why is there no such sweetness for God in you as there is for the wife who strips you bare and leaves? Why do you not feel the debt to God as you feel obliged to honor parents through hollow rituals? Why do you carry the fear of people's opinions, forgetting the one Narayana? Says Tuka, why have you thrown away your entire life without devotion?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why do you not worship God? You are tormented without rest by your cravings. Why will you not surrender to God the way a crane fixes on its fish, the way a man fixes on what he wants? Why is there no such sweetness in you for God as there is for the wife who strips you bare and then leaves? Why do you not feel your debt to God, when you feel bound to honor your forefathers with hollow rites? Why do you carry the fear of what people will say, and forget the one Narayana? Tuka says: why have you thrown it all away, your whole life gone to waste without devotion?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram interrogates a person who pours intensity into everything except God. He turns the listener's own appetites into a mirror: the single-minded focus you give to desires, to a faithless spouse, to social ritual and reputation, why is none of it spared for God? The crane watching its fish is a stock image of total concentration, and he asks why that same concentration never lands on the divine. Each question exposes a misplaced devotion, energy already present but aimed at things that strip you and leave. The closing line names the stake plainly: a whole human life can be spent and wasted, and the loss is the failure to turn that ready intensity toward Narayana before it runs out.

GATHA 3359 Prayers

Prayer, hold my mind at Your feet

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let my mind remain at Your feet; do something, anything, to make it so. Take me by the arm and carry me across this worldly existence, O generous Lord.

You are the crown jewel among the wise, a mine of beauty and virtue, the crest gem above all. Become the lamp that destroys my darkness, shining with Your own light.

Cut through the bonds of desire and make Your dwelling in my chitta. Says Tuka, I have become entangled without knowing it; let my care rest with You. I place my head at Your feet; protect me now.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let my mind stay at Your feet. Do something, anything, to make it so. Take me by the arm and carry me across this worldly sea, O generous Lord. You are the crown jewel among the wise, a mine of beauty and virtue, the crest gem above them all. You alone are blessed, Vithoba. Destroy my threefold darkness. Become the lamp and shine. Cut the noose of desire. Come and live in my heart. Look, I have been caught without knowing it. Let my worry now be Yours. Tuka lays his head at Your feet. Protect me now.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a plain, urgent prayer to be held steady. Tukaram does not claim he can fix his own restless mind; he asks God to do it, by force if need be, to grab his arm and pull him across the ocean of worldly life. He praises Vitthal as the crest jewel of all the wise, then turns each praise into a request: be the lamp that kills my darkness, cut the rope of craving, take up residence in my heart. The line let my worry now be Yours is the hinge: he is handing over the whole anxious task of his salvation. Laying his head at the feet, he ends not with confidence in himself but with surrender, asking only to be guarded.

Devotion, asking only to be born again in service

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे नाहीं मुक्तीसवें चाड । हें चि आह्मां गोड जन्म घेतां ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The only gift we know how to give is to place our own burden upon You. When hunger strikes, we cry for food.

When cold comes, we ask for a blanket. Whatever desire stirs in the chitta, that is what we beg for at that moment.

Keep sorrow from entering our house; let the Sudarshana discus whirl its protective circle around us. Says Tuka, I have no desire for liberation. This alone is sweet to me: to take birth again and again in Your service.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The one fitting gift we can give is to lay our own burden on You. When hunger strikes, we cry out for food. When the cold comes, we ask for a blanket. Whatever the heart longs for at the moment, that is what we beg for then, whatever we like. Do not let sorrow come into our house. Let the discus whirl its circle around us. Tuka says: I have no craving for liberation. This is what is sweet to me: to take birth again and again in Your service.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a childlike dependence that he treats as the truest offering: we have nothing to give God but our needs, so we hand Him the whole load. The small wants, food when hungry, a blanket when cold, are not dismissed but brought straight to God as a child brings everything to a parent. He asks for protection, picturing Krishna's discus spinning a guarding circle around the home. Then comes the radical turn that the rest of the poem sets up: he refuses even liberation, the prize most seekers crave. What he wants instead is to keep being born, life after life, only so he can go on serving and loving God, which he calls the one sweet thing.

GATHA 3361 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the Lord who runs to His own

मराठी मूळ

मी दास तयाचा जया चाड नाहीं । सुख दुःख दोहळिवरहित जो ॥1॥
राहिलासे उभा भीमरेच्या तीरीं । कट दोहीं करीं धरोनियां ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे त्यास गाईन मी गीतीं । आणीक तें चित्तीं न धरीं कांहीं ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am the servant of that One who has no wants, who stands beyond both joy and sorrow. He stands upon the banks of the Bhima, His hands resting upon His waist.

It is no wonder that He comes when called; He runs even unbidden for the sake of devotion. All my burden is His concern; He alone is my benefactor and the giver of my true welfare.

Says Tuka, I will sing His praises in my songs and hold nothing else within my chitta.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am the servant of the One who wants nothing, who stands beyond both joy and sorrow. He stands on the bank of the Bhima, His hands resting on His waist. It is no wonder He comes when He is called. He runs even when no one remembers Him, for the sake of devotion. All my burden is His care. He alone is my giver, the one who works my true good. Tuka says: I will sing Him in my songs and hold nothing else in my mind.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poem fixes on Vitthal as he famously stands at Pandhari, beside the Bhima river, hands on his hips, needing nothing for himself. Tukaram makes that self-sufficiency the very reason for trust: a Lord who wants nothing has no motive but love. He marvels that this God comes not only when called but unbidden, running of his own accord for the sake of devotion. The middle line carries the comfort: the whole weight of the devotee's life is already God's own concern, and he is the only true benefactor. So Tukaram resolves to keep his mind on nothing else and to spend himself in song.

GATHA 3362 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, the bitter cure of correction

मराठी मूळ

यासी कोणी ह्मणे निंदेचीं उत्तरें । नागवला खरें तो चि एक ॥1॥
आड वाटे जातां लावी नीट सोई । धर्मनीत ते ही ऐसी आहे ॥ध्रु.॥

जन्म व्याधि फार चुकतील दुःखें । खंडावा हा सुखें मान त्याचा ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे निंब दिलियावांचून । अंतरींचा सीण कैसा जाय ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If anyone calls this censure or harsh speech, that person is the one truly deceived. When someone strays onto a wrong path, setting them right is the duty of dharma.

If gentle words go unheeded, stern correction must follow; there is no sin in this, only great merit. The suffering of birth and disease can be avoided if one's pride is cut down for their own good.

Says Tuka, unless the bitter neem is administered, how will the inner ailment be cured?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If someone calls this censure, harsh words, that person is the one truly fooled. When a man wanders onto the wrong path, setting him straight is itself the way of dharma. If gentle words go unheard, then stern correction must come. There is no sin in it; there is great merit. The pains of birth and disease can be spared if pride is cut down for the person's own good. Tuka says: unless the bitter neem is given, how will the inner sickness ever leave?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram defends hard, corrective speech as an act of love, not malice. He says the one who hears such words as mere insult has missed the point: guiding a wanderer back to the right road is dharma doing its work. When soft words fail, firmer treatment is not a fault but a service that can spare a person the long suffering of birth and disease. The neem image is the key: a true remedy is bitter, and the inner sickness, here named as pride, will not lift without it. The whole poem is aimed at the ailment and at the patient's good, not at contempt; the harshness is the medicine, given because the cure matters more than comfort.

GATHA 3363 The Moral Ideal

Moral warning, the final test

मराठी मूळ

निवडे जेवण सेवटींच्या घांसें । होय त्याच्या ऐसें सकळ ही ॥1॥
न पाहिजे जाला बुद्धीचा पालट । केली खटपट जाय वांयां ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे वर्म नेणतां जें रांधी । पाववी ते बुद्ध अवकळा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A meal is judged by its final morsel, and so it is with all things. If the mind has turned astray, then all one's efforts go to waste.

What was carefully prepared becomes a mere pretense, and disgrace follows. Says Tuka, one who cooks without knowing the secret only brings ruin through misguided effort.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A meal is judged by its last mouthful. So it is with everything. If the mind has turned aside, then all the work was for nothing. What was carefully prepared turns into a mere show, and disgrace comes after it. Tuka says: one who cooks without knowing the secret only brings ruin through wasted effort.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures a life by how it ends, not by how it began. A whole meal is judged by its final morsel; in the same way, what counts is where your mind comes to rest at the close. If the mind has wandered from its true aim, all the careful work along the way is wasted, and what looked like genuine practice is exposed as a pretense that ends in shame. The secret he points to is the inner aim, the right knowing that must guide the doing; without it, even diligent effort, like cooking without knowing the recipe, only spoils what it touches.

GATHA 3364 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, shelter beyond death

मराठी मूळ

न लगे मरावें । ऐसा ठाव दिला देवें ॥1॥
माझ्या उपकारासाटीं । वागविला ह्मुण कंठीं ॥ध्रु.॥
घरीं दिला ठाव । अवघा सकळ ही वाव ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे एके ठायीं । कोठें माझें तुझें नाहीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

God has given me a place where I need not die. For my sake, He has carried me at His throat.

He has given me shelter in His home, where all emptiness is dissolved. Says Tuka, in that one place, there is no 'mine' or 'yours' anymore.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There is no more dying for me. God has given me such a place. For my sake he has carried me at his throat. He has given me a place in his home, and all the emptiness is gone. Tuka says: in that one place there is no 'mine' or 'yours' anymore.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is naming the safety he has been given and what it cost the Lord to give it. God has set him in a place where death no longer reaches, carrying him close, at the throat, as one carries what is most precious. Taken into God's own home, every hollow and lack in him is filled. The deepest mark of that home is the end of separation: in that one place the line between 'mine' and 'yours' simply dissolves, and the soul and the Lord are no longer two.

GATHA 3365 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, fed and fearless

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There is no need to chase or beg, for God has hidden the world from my sight. Now I may simply sit and eat what the Lord has provided ready-made.

All fear has been removed, and there is no room for any other concern. Says Tuka, there is nothing left to speak about.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There is no chasing, no begging now. God has hidden the world from my sight. Now I just sit and eat. The Lord has set it ready before me. My fear is taken away. There is no room for any other concern. Tuka says: there is nothing left to say.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the rest that comes when God takes over. The running after things and the begging are finished, because the Lord has hidden the world from his eyes and now feeds him what is already prepared, asking no labor of him. With that providing comes the end of fear, and no second concern is left to crowd in beside God. The poem closes by letting speech itself fall away: when everything is given and nothing is lacking, there is nothing more to ask for and nothing more to say.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the mind calls out, it cannot guard itself, and the senses come rushing in a swarm. Lust, anger, pride, envy, ego, slander, hatred, greed, and attachment all pursue me.

The senses circle like thieves, seeking to break into the house and plunder it. My own valor is of no use here; the secret to mastering them lies in Your hands alone.

Says Tuka, I now undertake the one remedy by which Your feet may be reached.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the mind cries out, it cannot guard itself; the senses come rushing in a swarm. Lust, anger, pride, envy, ego, slander, hatred, much delusion, craving. The crowd of senses circles like thieves; they want to break into the house and rob it. My own strength is no use here. The secret of mastering them is in your hands. Tuka says: now I take up the one remedy by which your feet may be reached.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram admits he cannot win the inner war by his own force. The mind raises an alarm but cannot defend itself, and the passions, lust, anger, pride, envy, ego, slander, hatred, delusion, craving, rush in like a mob. He sees the senses as thieves circling the house, trying to break in and plunder all that is within. Confessing that his own courage and effort fail against them, he says the power to subdue them rests only in God's hands. So he gives up the lone fight and takes up the single remedy that works: turning to the Lord's feet, the one refuge by which the whole gang is finally mastered.

GATHA 3367 Faith and Trust

Faith, God's own reputation

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

All beings, great and small, call me Your servant and claim me as Your own. Now, O Lord, I must guard Your greatness for Your sake alone.

Resting assured, I have become fearless, for Your name is the purifier of the fallen. For You, even a mountain becomes a grain of sand, and nothing is too difficult.

Says Tuka, what hesitation can You have in saving a wretched fly like me?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Your servant: that is what they call me, your bondsman, everyone, small and great. So now this must be guarded: your greatness is yours to keep, O God. I have grown carefree and stay without worry, for your name is the savior of the fallen. For you a mountain becomes a grain of sand; it costs you no more than one leaf touching another. Tuka says: what doubt can you have, when saving a poor little gnat like me is nothing to you?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram leans the whole weight of his rescue onto God's reputation rather than his own merit. Everyone, high and low, already calls him God's servant, so his fate is now bound up with God's name; if the servant is lost, it is the Lord's greatness that is stained, and that honor is God's own to protect. Resting on the name that is famous for saving the fallen, he lets all anxiety go. He reminds the Lord that nothing is hard for him, a mountain shrinks to a grain of sand at his will, so there can be no real hesitation in lifting up someone as small and helpless as a gnat.

GATHA 3368 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, asking only for Oneness

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whom should I ask, and for what? The one I would beg from already dwells within me. If I ask for Indra's throne, even that is not everlasting.

If I ask for Dhruva's seat, even he longed for this earthly joy. If I ask for full heavenly pleasures, once the merit is spent, one must return again.

If I ask for immortal life, the jiva by its very nature never dies. Says Tuka, I ask for only one thing: that Oneness which can never be broken.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What should I ask for, and from whom? The one I would beg from already lives within me. If I ask for Indra's throne, it does not last. If I ask for Dhruva's seat, even he still longed for this world. If I ask for the full pleasures of heaven, when the merit runs out I must come back again. If I ask for a long deathless life, the jiva by its own nature never dies. Tuka says: I ask for one thing only, that Oneness which can never be broken.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram works through every prize a soul might beg for and refuses each as not worth the asking. There is no one outside to petition, since the Lord he would ask from already dwells within him. One by one he sets aside the great rewards: Indra's throne passes away, Dhruva's high seat was won by one still bound to earthly desire, heaven's pleasures end the moment the stored merit is spent and send you back, and unending life is no gift since the self never truly dies anyway. Having cleared away all of these, he asks for the only thing none of them can give: undivided union with God, the Oneness that nothing can break.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He whose servants we are dwells in Pandhari. He is the God of all gods; what fear can time hold over Him? The Vedas sing His praise, and the scriptures declare 'not this, not this.' Says Tuka, His true form is the seed of all reality.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We are his servants. His home is in Pandhari. He is the God even of the gods. What fear can death and time hold? The Vedas sing of him. The scriptures say of him, 'not this, not this.' Tuka says: this very form is the seed of all that is.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram places his whole standing in belonging to the Lord of Pandhari. To be the servant of one who is God even to the gods is to be lifted past the reach of death and time, so no fear remains. He sets the Vitthal standing in Pandhari beside the vast namings of scripture: the Vedas sing of this same Lord, and the Upanishads, unable to fix him in words, can only say 'not this, not this.' The point is that the simple form on the brick and the boundless reality the scriptures grope toward are one, for this form is the very seed and source of all that exists.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

He who loves His devotees, the Lord of the lowly, whose glory resounds through the three worlds. For the sake of Pundalik, He came and stood upon the sands of the riverbank.

He endures the womb for His devotees, the champion of Ambarish. He is the foundation of all gods and the source of the supreme mantra.

Says Tuka, He is the one whom even Shiva meditates upon.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He loves his devotees; he is the Lord of the lowly. His glory is told through the three worlds. For the sake of Pundalik he came and stood upon the sands. He takes on the womb; he is the champion of Ambarish. He is the ground of all the gods, the source of the one mantra. Tuka says: he is the one whom Shiva, holding the trident, meditates upon.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram praises the strange greatness of a God whose majesty is shown in how low he will stoop. Famed through all three worlds and tender to his devotees and to the lowly, this Lord came and stood waiting on the riverbank simply because Pundalik bid him wait. For love of his devotees he even enters the womb and takes birth, as he did to defend Ambarish. The closing turn lifts him highest of all: he is the foundation of every god and the source of the supreme mantra, the one upon whom even Shiva, the trident-bearer, fixes his meditation.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A sham shrine and sham sacred ash, a sham philosophy carried forward. A sham god and a sham devotee bring ruin upon other lives.

Says Tuka, all this world is full of sham; only those with true experience will recognize the mark.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A sham shrine, sham sacred ash, a sham teaching carried along. A sham god, a sham devotee: he brings ruin on other lives. Tuka says: this whole crowd is sham. Only those who have the real experience will know the mark.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strips the costume off counterfeit religion. He runs down the props of false piety, the showy shrine, the smeared ash, the borrowed doctrine passed from mouth to mouth, and calls every one of them hollow. His sharpest words fall on the fake holy man: a sham god and a sham devotee do not merely deceive themselves, they drag other lives to ruin. The warning is not contempt for any one person but a test for the reader: when so much around us is performance, only firsthand experience of God, not the outward signs, can tell the true from the false, and that test begins with one's own practice.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Maya lures with sweet talk and steals away one's gaze. Offering an embrace, she flees with all one's glory.

She sets herself as an obstacle, binding those who desire her with longing, causing anguish, then slipping away. First she comes pleading, casting her spell of delusion; but when you turn back, she is nowhere to be found.

Says Tuka, O Lord, this is the envy that makes her torment souls. Why does this service not please You through sincere devotion?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

She starts up sweet talk and pulls your gaze away. She gives an embrace, then runs off with all your worth. Next she sets herself across your path; the one who craves her, she ruins by that very craving. She leaves you writhing, ties your hands, and slips away. First she comes pleading and casts her spell over you again. But dirt falls in your mouth: when you turn back, where is she? Tuka says: O God, it is her own envy that drives her to torment souls. Why does serving you in sincere love not bring her this same delight?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram dramatizes Maya, the world's deluding power, as a faithless seducer to show how attachment betrays the one caught by it. She wins you with sweet talk and a quick embrace, then flees with everything precious, and the very longing she stirs up is what wrecks the one who longs. She pleads and casts her spell again, but the moment you turn to seize her she is gone, leaving only dirt in the mouth. The closing line turns the whole scene into a prayer and a question to God: this restless torment is Maya's nature, so why does the heart not find its delight instead in the steady, sincere service of the Lord, where there is no such betrayal?

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My eyes long to behold You, O Narayana. Grant them satisfaction; why do You hesitate? My arms yearn to embrace the Lord of Pandhari.

My mind says it will go to Pandhari, meditating ever on Your feet. My chitta declares it will remain firmly at Your feet.

Says Tuka's brother, O Lord, fulfill this sincere longing.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My eyes long for one thing: to see you, Narayana. Set them at rest. Why do you hold back and ponder? My arms ache to embrace the Lord of Pandhari. My mind says, go to Pandhari; this alone is its meditation, your feet. My heart says, I will stay at your feet, surely. Tuka's brother says: O God, fulfill this true longing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Spoken by Tukaram's brother, this abhanga lets each part of the self voice the same single craving for God. The eyes want only to see Narayana, the arms only to hold the Lord of Pandhari, and the poet asks why God still hesitates to satisfy them. The mind has settled on one journey and one object of meditation, Pandhari and the Lord's feet, and the heart vows to stay fixed there for good. With every faculty pointed at the same place, the prayer is simply that God would make real this longing that the whole being already shares.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The mind has become restless and will not remain still. O Lord of Pandhari, grant me Your embrace with arms upraised.

Every limb trembles with longing, hands and feet quiver, and the hair stands on end. Says Tuka's brother, O Krishna, my eyes are starving for Your sight.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My mind is restless. It has grown unsteady and will not stay still. Grant me your sight, Lord of Pandhari, with your four arms raised. My whole body trembles; hands and feet shake, and the hair stands on end. Tuka's brother says: O Krishna, my eyes are starving for the sight of you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Spoken by Tukaram's brother, this is the cry of a longing the body can no longer contain. The mind has lost its footing and will not be stilled, and so he begs the Lord of Pandhari to appear and embrace him with his four upraised arms. The yearning has become physical: limbs tremble, hands and feet shake, the hair rises on the skin. He names the hunger plainly at the end, calling out to Krishna that his eyes are starving, that nothing but the actual sight of God will feed them.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You say You will reveal Your state, but do not do so that way, O Ananta. Be gracious and show me Your beautiful form.

Do not be like a mirage, O Hari, appearing only to vanish. Says Tuka's brother, O Hari, mere force is of no use here.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You say You will show me Your state. Do not do it that way, O Ananta. Be gracious to me. Show me Your beautiful form. Do not be like a mirage, O Hari, that appears and then is gone. Tuka's brother says: O Hari, force is of no use here.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a prayer that refuses to settle for a hint of God. Tukaram's brother asks Vitthal to be gracious and reveal the full, beautiful form, not a flicker that vanishes the moment it is glimpsed. A mirage looks like water and leaves the thirsty man thirstier; he begs God not to be that to him. The closing line says force gets you nowhere here: you cannot seize this vision, you can only be given it, so the whole abhanga stays in the posture of asking.

GATHA 3376 Longing and Separation

Longing, the form face to face

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When I behold that form with my own eyes, then I shall rest quietly with my mind fixed there. When You come as the scriptures describe You, I shall know You in experience.

Says Tuka's servant, I long to see You standing before me face to face.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When I see Your form with shape, with my own eyes, then I will rest quiet, and keep my mind fixed there. Come as the scriptures describe You, and I will know You by experience. Tuka's servant says: I long to see You standing before me, face to face.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poet wants God not as a concept but as a presence he can look at. Only when the form stands before his eyes will his restless mind finally settle and stay fixed. He asks that the God the scriptures describe become real to him in direct experience, not just in words. The longing is plain and bodily: to see the Lord standing face to face, close enough to rest in.

GATHA 3377 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the fallen give God His name

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे आह्मी असोनिया जना । तुज देव पणा आणियेलें ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It is because of us, the fallen, that You received Your form and name; we are Your blessed fortune. Otherwise, who would have asked about You in the formless void, all alone? As darkness gives splendor to a lamp, and a setting gives beauty to a gem, so do we reveal Your glory.

As disease brings the physician to light, and poison gives value to nectar, and base metal reveals the worth of gold. Says Tuka, though we are mere mortals, we have bestowed upon You Your godhood.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It is because of us, the fallen, that You got a form and a name. We are Your good fortune. Otherwise, who would have asked after You, alone there in the formless? Darkness gives the lamp its splendor. The setting gives the gem its shine. Disease brings the healer to light. Poison gives nectar its worth. Base metal shows what gold is worth, high against low. Tuka says: we are only mortals, yet we have brought You Your godhood.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes a daring claim: God needs the devotee in order to be God at all. In the pure formless there is no one to call upon Him, so it is the fallen, the sinners, who give the Lord a form and a name by crying out to Him. He piles up pairings to prove it, darkness and lamp, disease and physician, poison and nectar, base metal and gold, each one showing how a thing's worth appears only against its opposite. The point is not pride but the strange logic of grace: the very wretchedness of the worshippers is what calls divinity into the open. So the boldest line, that mere mortals have bestowed His godhood, is really a hymn to how completely God binds Himself to those who need Him.

GATHA 3378 The Saints

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Happiness is found at the feet of the saints. Therefore I have made my dwelling there, where nothing perishes.

I need not stir or wander, for all anxiety has been removed. Says Tuka, this body cools as the sacred dust touches it.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Happiness is right here, at the feet of the saints. So I have made my home here, in the place where nothing perishes. I need not stir, I need not wander. All my worry is gone. Tuka says: the body grows cool as the sacred dust touches it.

WHAT IT MEANS

The poet has stopped his seeking and settled at the feet of the saints, because that is where happiness actually is. He calls it the place where nothing perishes, so there is no reason left to move on or look elsewhere. With the wandering ended, the anxiety that drove it falls away too. Even the body feels it: the dust from the saints' feet is cooling, like relief after long fever.

GATHA 3379 Prayers

Prayer, awaiting the command

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Should I shut the door, or wait watching for the appointed time? Whatever comes upon my head, I hold Your command in my hands. Should I speak up plainly, or should I keep to solitude? Says Tuka, should I stay awake or let others carry on as they will?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Should I shut the door, or keep watch for the right hour? Whatever falls on my head, I hold Your command in my hands. Should I speak my mind plainly, or keep to my solitude? Tuka says: should I stay awake, or let others carry on as they please?

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the prayer of a servant who will not move without orders. Every line is a real question put to God: close up or keep watch, speak out or stay silent, stay vigilant or leave others to their ways. He refuses to decide on his own; whatever befalls him, he holds the Lord's command as the thing in his hands. The abhanga sits inside that uncertainty on purpose, naming the choices and handing each one back to God to settle.

GATHA 3380 Prayers

Prayer, the child's claim on a parent

मराठी मूळ

मायबापापुढें लेंकराची आळी । आणीक हे पाळी कोण लळे ॥1॥
सांभाळा जी माझीं विषमें अनंता । जवळी असतां अव्हेर कां ॥ध्रु.॥
आणिकांची चाले सत्ता आह्मांवरी । तुमची ते थोरी काय मग ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आलों दुरोनि जवळी । आतां टाळाटाळी करूं नये ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A child's complaints belong before its parents; who else will indulge such tender whims? Protect me, O Ananta; why neglect me when You are right here? If others can exercise power over me, then where is Your greatness? Says Tuka, I have come from afar to draw near; now there should be no more evasion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A child's complaints belong before its mother and father. Who else will put up with such tender demands? Look after my troubles, O Ananta. You are right here, so why turn away? If others can hold power over me, then where is Your greatness? Tuka says: I have come from far off to stand near You. Now do not put me off again.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses his claim on God the way only a child presses it on a parent. A child takes its complaints nowhere else, because no one else will indulge them, and he insists God owes him that same patience. He sharpens it into a challenge: if other forces can still push him around while God stands right beside him, then what has become of God's greatness. Having traveled the long way from far off to near, he asks plainly that there be no more evasion, no more putting him off.

GATHA 3381 The Nature of God

Nature of God, Hari speaks through me

मराठी मूळ

माझ्या मुखें मज बोलवितो हरि । सकळां अंतरीं नारायण ॥1॥
न करावा द्वेष भूतांचा मत्सर । हा तंव विचार जाणों आह्मी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे दोष नाहीं या विचारें । हिताचीं उत्तरें शिकवितां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Hari Himself speaks through my mouth. Narayana dwells in within all.

One should not harbor hatred or envy toward any creature; this truth I know well. Says Tuka, there is no fault in offering words of genuine counsel.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Hari speaks to me through my own mouth. Narayana lives inside everyone. So one should hold no hatred, no envy, toward any creature. This I know well. Tuka says: there is no fault in this, in teaching words that do good.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram grounds his teaching in who is really speaking and where God really lives. The words come through his mouth, but it is Hari who speaks them, and Narayana dwells inside every being alike. From that one fact follows the whole ethic: if God is in all, then hatred or envy of any creature is hatred of God. He adds a quiet defense of his own preaching, that there is no fault in offering words meant for another's good, since they carry this truth and not his opinion.

GATHA 3382 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, the meat-eater's self-harm

मराठी मूळ

मांस खातां हाउस करी । जोडुनि वैरी ठेवियेला॥1॥

पुढिलांसाटीं पाजवी सुरी । आपुली चोरी अंगुळी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कुटिती हाडें। आपुल्या नाडें रडती ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who eats flesh with relish has kept an enemy bound to himself. Who will show pity to him when he does not even recognize life in another life? He sharpens the blade for others while secretly cutting his own finger.

Says Tuka, they crush bones yet weep over their own undoing.

IN PLAIN WORDS

One who eats flesh with relish has tied an enemy to himself. Who will pity him? He cannot see the life in another life. He whets the knife for the one in front of him, while quietly cutting his own finger. Tuka says: they crush bones, and weep over their own ruin.

WHAT IT MEANS

This abhanga turns the act of eating flesh back on the one who does it. To kill for the taste, Tukaram says, is to bind an enemy to yourself, because you blind yourself to the life living in the creature you eat. The sharp image is of a man whetting a blade for the animal before him without seeing that the same edge is cutting his own finger. The harm is not out there; it is the hardening of a heart that no longer recognizes life, and the abhanga points at that pattern and asks the reader to examine it, not to despise the person caught in it.

GATHA 3383 Longing and Separation

Longing, holding God to His own promise

मराठी मूळ

तुज जाणें तानें नाहीं पांडुरंगा । कां जी मज सांगा उपेक्षलें ॥1॥
तुज ठावें होतें मी पातकी थोर । आधीं च कां थार दिधली पायीं ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे आह्मी जिंतिलें तें खरें । आतां उणें पुरें तुह्मां अंगीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You know neither hunger nor thirst, O Panduranga; then why have You forsaken me? You knew all along that I was a great wrongdoer; why then did You first grant me a place at Your feet? The mark has been stamped that I am Hari's servant; there should be no distinction at the feast. Says Tuka, we have won our claim fairly; now any shortcoming belongs to You.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You know neither hunger nor thirst, O Panduranga. So tell me: why have You forsaken me? You knew all along I was a great sinner. Why then did You first give me a place at Your feet? The mark is stamped: I am Hari's servant. At the feast there should be no separating one from another. Tuka says: we have won our claim fairly. Now any shortfall is on You.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram argues with God like a man holding Him to a signed agreement. God lacks nothing, He feels neither hunger nor thirst, so neglect cannot be from need; why then the silence and the distance? The clinching point is that God Himself granted the place at His feet knowing full well the man was a great sinner, so He cannot withdraw it now on that account. The mark of servanthood is already stamped, and at God's own feast no one seated may be set apart from another. So the closing turn is bold but lawful: the devotee has made good his claim, and whatever is still lacking is now God's debt to settle, not his.

GATHA 3384 Autobiography

Autobiography, the Word itself is God

मराठी मूळ

आह्मां घरीं धन शब्दाचीं रत्नें । शब्दाचीं शस्त्रें यत्न करूं ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे पाहा शब्द चि हा देव । शब्दें चि गौरव पूजा करूं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In our home, the wealth is jewels of words, and words are the weapons we wield. Words alone are the life of our jiva; through words we distribute our riches to the world.

Says Tuka, behold, the Word itself is God; with words we worship and offer our praise.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In our house the wealth is jewels of words. Words are the weapons we wield. The word itself is the life of our soul. With words we share out our riches to the people. Tuka says: look, the Word itself is God. With words we honor Him and offer our worship.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names what a poet-saint actually owns and uses. His only treasure is words, and they are jewels and weapons at once, his wealth and his defense. Words are the very life of his soul, and the way he hands that wealth out to ordinary people. He ends on the highest claim: the Word is not a tool pointing at God, the Word itself is God, so to speak it well is already to worship.

GATHA 3385 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the love of God over the knowledge of Him

मराठी मूळ

ब्रह्मज्ञान दारीं येतें काकुलती । अव्हेरिलें संतीं विष्णुदासीं॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The knowledge of Brahman comes pleading to the door, yet the saints and devotees of Vishnu have turned it away. It tries to force its way inside, and so they send it far off.

Says Tuka, no effort avails here; that knowledge has fallen fruitless around their necks.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The knowledge of Brahman comes to the door, pleading. The saints, the servants of Vishnu, have turned it away. It tries to force its way inside, and they drive it far off. Tuka says: no effort works here. That knowledge has fallen, useless, around their necks.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram stands the usual ranking on its head: here the abstract knowledge of Brahman is the beggar at the door, not the prize. The devotees of Vishnu, who want the living God and not a doctrine about Him, refuse it and push it away even when it forces itself in. The point is that loving God directly is higher than knowing Him as a formless absolute, so all the striving of pure knowledge gets no purchase among the bhaktas. It hangs uselessly around the neck of whoever clings to it, a weight rather than a treasure.

GATHA 3386 Autobiography

Autobiography, the settled account with God

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why should the conventions of the crowd apply to one whose original account is already settled? I hold in my hand a deed witnessed by many. Apart from all of you, I stand in my own rightful place, and what was mine remains mine.

The quarrel has ended in unity, and now there should be no more dispute. The treasure that was kept in trust has come into my hands; now, O Lord, You have no claim over it.

Says Tuka, without any vain struggle, I have taken my share and settled down.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why should the crowd's conventions apply to me? My original account is already settled. I hold a deed in my hand, witnessed by many. Apart from all of you, I stand in my own place. What was mine is mine. The quarrel has ended in oneness. Now there should be no more wrangling. The treasure that was kept in trust has come into my hand. Now, O Lord, You have no claim over it. Tuka says: with no more pointless struggle, I have taken my share and settled down.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells his story as a property dispute that has finally been won. The conventions of the crowd no longer bind him, because his original account with God is closed and he holds a deed witnessed by many. He claims his own rightful standing, apart from everyone, where what is his stays his, and the long quarrel has ended not in division but in oneness with God. The treasure that had been held in trust is now in his own hand, so even the Lord, he says playfully, has no further claim on it. The whole abhanga is the rest of a man who has stopped struggling and taken possession of what was always his portion.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One in whom body-consciousness resides takes pleasure in being honored by the world. A great deception has befallen him at the marketplace: thieves have stolen the bundle from his grasp.

Having lost his capital, he is not free, for pride and greed have bound him by the neck. The trade ahead is ruined, and the swindle clings to him.

Says Tuka, this is what the saints declare; who, knowing the danger, would still court destruction?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The man who lives inside his body loves to be honored by the world. He calls that pleasure. A great cheat has happened to him in the marketplace: thieves have cut his purse and carried it off. He has lost his capital, yet he is not free; pride and greed have tied a rope around his neck. The trade he meant to do ahead is ruined. The loss shows; his purse is gone. Tuka says: this is what the saints declare. Who, knowing the danger, would walk into his own ruin?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram watches a man who measures himself by the world's respect and names the loss hidden inside that pleasure. Living wholly as the body, he prizes honor, and while he is busy enjoying it the real wealth is being stolen out from under him. Worse, the theft does not loosen him; pride and greed bind his neck like a rope, so he is robbed and a prisoner at once. The saints say this plainly, and the abhanga turns it into a question for the listener: knowing the cheat lies in wanting honor, who would still chase it straight into his own ruin?

GATHA 3388 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the nature that will not change

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे वेळू चंदना संगतीं । काय ते नसती जविळकें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Even if you water a neem tree with sugar syrup, it will not abandon its bitter fruit. So is the mind of a wicked person: even after vomiting out what is good, it casts it aside.

A potsherd placed against the philosopher's stone does not change its inner nature. Says Tuka, does a bamboo become fragrant simply by standing next to sandalwood?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Water a neem tree with sugar syrup, and still it keeps its bitter fruit. It will not give that up. So is the mind of a low man. He spits out what is good for him and throws it away. Set a broken potsherd against the philosopher's stone; its inner nature does not turn to gold. Tuka says: does a bamboo grow fragrant just by standing near the sandalwood?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is saying that some natures do not change just because good is poured on them. He stacks four pictures: a neem tree fed sugar yet keeping its bitterness, a hardened mind throwing away the very good that could help it, a potsherd that the touchstone cannot turn to gold, a bamboo that gains no scent from the sandalwood beside it. The point is not contempt for any person but a sober warning: nearness to what is good is not the same as taking it in, and one can sit beside the holy and still cast away what is offered. The mirror turns on the listener, to ask whether mere proximity has been mistaken for change.

GATHA 3389 Social Criticism

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A poor wretch wonders when he can strip the fortunate one bare, seeing everyone as being like himself; what can he do against another's nature? A fool in an assembly plots the downfall of the learned. A coward, seeing a warrior, merely grumbles under his breath.

Says Tuka, do not envy others; instead, surrender to God. How much more can I expose the wicked?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The poor wretch wonders when he can strip the fortunate man bare. He sees everyone as being like himself; but what can he do against another's true nature? A fool in the assembly wants the learned man brought down. A coward, seeing a warrior, only grumbles under his breath. Do not envy others; go and take refuge in God. Tuka says: how much more of the wicked man's disgrace shall I lay bare?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram exposes the pattern of envy that wants to pull others down rather than rise. The small-souled man assumes everyone is as grasping as he is and schemes to strip the fortunate, the fool plots against the learned, the coward only mutters at the brave; all of them are powerless against a nature better than their own. The cure he names is not more scorn but surrender: stop envying and take refuge in God. He stops short on purpose, saying the wicked man's own conduct already shames him, so there is little need to go on cataloguing it; the work for the listener is to check the envy in oneself.

तुका ह्मणे काय करूं लापनिक । जनाचार सुख नासिवंत ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let the world now freely mock me, saying I have abandoned all reason. When the true purpose is served, what need is there for social propriety, O Lord? Says Tuka, why should I hide? The happiness of worldly custom is perishable.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Let the world freely mock me now. Let them say I have thrown reason away. When the real purpose is served, what matters, O Lord? Why should I carry the weight of people's opinion? Tuka says: why should I act false to please anyone? The happiness of worldly custom does not last.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers those who call him a man who has lost his sense. He accepts the mockery freely, because once the one true aim, God, is reached, the world's approval weighs nothing. He refuses to bend under social pressure or to wear a false face just to keep people happy. The closing line gives the reason: the contentment that worldly custom offers is perishable, so it is no real loss to set it down for the sake of what endures.

Saints, the ruin of bad company

मराठी मूळ

ढेंकणाचे संगें हिरा जो भंगला । कुसंगें नाडला तैसा साधु ॥1॥
ओढाळाच्या संगें सात्विक नासलीं । क्षण एक नाडलीं समागमें ॥ध्रु.॥

विषानें पक्वान्नें गोड कडू जालीं । कुसंगानें केली तैसी परी ॥3॥
भावें तुका ह्मणे सत्संग हा बरा । कुसंग हा फेरा चौ†याशीचा ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

As a diamond shatters in the company of a hammer, so a saint is ruined by bad company. Good creatures are corrupted by the company of the unruly, undone in a single moment of association.

Gold becomes base in the company of alloy, losing its worth of lakhs and crores. As poison makes sweet dishes taste bitter, so does evil company work its ways.

Says Tuka, with devotion I declare: good company is blessed, while evil company leads to the cycle of eighty-four hundred thousand births.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A diamond shatters when the hammer falls on it; in the same way bad company ruins a saint. Good and pure creatures are spoiled by keeping company with the unruly, undone in a single moment of nearness. Gold becomes base when alloy is mixed in; its worth of lakhs and crores is broken. As poison turns sweet dishes bitter, so bad company works on a person. Tuka says, with all my heart: good company is a blessing; bad company is the wheel of eighty-four lakh births.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram weighs the company we keep and shows how heavily it tells. He piles up images of ruin by association: the diamond broken by the hammer, the good soul spoiled in a moment beside the unruly, pure gold debased by alloy, sweet food poisoned bitter. The stakes are not small manners but the soul's whole worth, which bad company can strip in an instant. He sets the two paths side by side and names them: satsang, the company of the good, is a blessing, while bad company keeps a person turning on the wheel of eighty-four lakh rebirths. The choice of companions, he says, decides which way the life goes.

GATHA 3392 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the Name held through any birth

मराठी मूळ

भलते जन्मीं मज घालिसील तरी । न सोडीं मी हरी नाम तुझें ॥1॥
सुख दुःख तुज देईन भोगितां । मग मज चिंता कासयाची ॥ध्रु.॥
तुझा दास ह्मणवीन मी अंकिला । भोगितां विठ्ठला गर्भवास ॥2॥
कासया मी तुज भाकितों करुणा । तारीं नारायणा ह्मणवुनि ॥3॥
तुका ह्मणे तुज येऊं पाहे उणें । तारिसील तेणें आह्मां तया ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whatever birth You place me in, I will never abandon Your name, O Hari. I offer You both joy and sorrow to endure; then what concern remains for me? I will call myself Your devoted servant, O Vitthal, even while enduring the womb.

Why should I plead for mercy, asking You to save me simply because I call You Narayana? Says Tuka, if any lack should come upon You for saving us, then by that very act You will redeem both us and Yourself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever birth You throw me into, I will not let go of Your name, O Hari. I hand You both my joy and my sorrow to bear; then what is left for me to worry about? I will call myself Your servant, Your bondsman, O Vitthal, even while I suffer the womb again. Why should I beg You for mercy, asking You to save me only because I call You Narayana? Tuka says: if any shortfall should come upon You by saving us, then by that very saving You redeem both us and Yourself.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes an unconditional vow: no matter what birth he is given, he will never release the name of Hari. He surrenders joy and sorrow alike into God's keeping, which empties him of anxiety, and he is content to keep calling himself God's servant even if he must endure the womb again. Then he turns the usual prayer on its head: he will not bargain for rescue simply because he uses God's names. The closing claim is the bold one, that if saving the devotee should somehow diminish God's honor, the very act of saving makes both servant and Lord whole. He stakes everything on belonging to God rather than on getting safety in return.

GATHA 3393 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, abandoned worship beyond rule

मराठी मूळ

गातों नाचतों आनंदें । टाळघागरिया छंदें ॥1॥
तुझी तुज पुढें देवा । नेणों भावे कैसी सेवा ॥ध्रु.॥
नेणों ताळ घात मात । भलते सवां पाय हात ॥2॥
लाज नाहीं शंका । प्रेम घाला ह्मणे तुका ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I sing and dance in bliss, carried by the rhythm of cymbals and drums. What is Yours I place before You, O Lord; I know no other form of worship.

I know neither rhythm nor beat nor measure; my hands and feet move as they will. Says Tuka, there is no shame, no doubt; let there be nothing but pure love.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I sing and I dance in joy, carried away by the rhythm of cymbals and drums. What is Yours I lay before You, O Lord; I do not know any other way to serve. I know nothing of beat or measure or proper time; my hands and feet move however they will. There is no shame in me, no doubt. Tuka says: let there be nothing but pure love.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes worship that has dropped all expertise and self-consciousness. He sings and dances to the cymbals and drums, offering God what is already God's, because he knows no other service than this. He confesses he keeps no rhythm or correct timing and lets his limbs move freely, refusing to make worship into a performance to be judged. The point lands in the last line: he has put away shame and doubt, and asks only that love itself fill the act. The measure of devotion, he says, is not skill but the pure love poured into it.

GATHA 3394 Renunciation

Renunciation, weary of the world, leaning only on God

मराठी मूळ

रुसलों आह्मीं आपुलिया संवसारा । तेथें जनाचारा काय पाड ॥1॥
आह्मां इष्ट मित्र सज्जन सोयरे । नाहीं या दुसरें देवाविण ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे करा होईल ते दया । सुख दुःख वांयां न धरावें ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have turned away from my worldly life, so what use is social convention to me? I have no friend, no companion, no kinsman other than God. I have set aside brothers and close relatives; what further consideration is needed? My ears refuse to hear worldly chatter; my mind is thoroughly weary of it.

Says Tuka, show whatever mercy You will. Do not hold on to fleeting joys and sorrows.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have turned away in anger from my own worldly life; so what hold can social custom have on me? My friend, my companion, my well-wisher, my kinsman: I have none but God. I have set aside my brothers and my own blood relations; what further thought is needed there? My ears will not listen to worldly chatter anymore; my mind is utterly weary of it. Tuka says: show me whatever mercy You will. Do not hold on to passing joys and sorrows.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram declares a complete break with worldly life and the conventions that bind it. He has put away friends and kin and turned to God as his only relation, so the rules of society no longer reach him. His ears refuse worldly talk and his mind is exhausted by it; the renunciation is not a pose but a real fatigue with the world. He hands the outcome to God, asking for whatever mercy God chooses, and asks that he not be made to cling to joys and sorrows that pass away. What remains when every other tie is cut, he says, is God alone.

GATHA 3395 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the Name preferred to liberation

मराठी मूळ

सांडुनि सुखाचा वांटा । मुक्ति मागे तो करंटा ॥1॥
कां रे न घ्यावा जन्म । प्रेम लुटावें नाम ॥ध्रु.॥
येथें मिळतो दहीं भात । वैकुंठीं ते नाहीं मात ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आतां । मज न लगे सायुज्यता ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One who abandons the share of happiness and begs for liberation is a wretch. Why not take birth again and again, and revel in the Name with love? Here one gets curd and rice, while even Vaikuntha cannot match this feast.

Says Tuka, I have no desire now for the state of final union.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The man who throws away his share of happiness and begs instead for liberation is a wretch. Why not take birth again and again, and loot the Name with love? Here you get curd and rice; even Vaikuntha has no such feast to speak of. Tuka says: now I have no use for final union with God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram inverts the usual goal, prizing loving devotion over liberation itself. He calls the man who trades away present joy to beg for release a poor fool, because the real happiness is here, in the Name. He would rather be born over and over if each birth lets him plunder the Name with love, and he says the simple feast of devotion, curd and rice, outshines anything in Vaikuntha. The closing line states it flatly: he wants no sayujya, no merging into God, because the relationship of love is sweeter to him than the dissolving of it. The bhakta's bond, not its ending, is what he holds dear.

GATHA 3396 Prayers

Prayer, the vessel waiting at the door

मराठी मूळ

पदोपदीं पायां पडणें । करुणा जाण भाकावी ॥1॥

जोडोनियां करकमळ । नेत्र जळ भरोनि ॥2॥
तुका उभें दारीं पात्र । पुरवीं आर्त विठोबा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I fall at Your feet again and again, pleading for mercy. Come, O ocean of compassion, come and rest here.

With folded lotus-hands and eyes brimming with tears, Tuka stands at Your door like a vessel waiting. O Vithoba, fulfill this yearning.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Step by step I fall at Your feet, knowing I must plead for mercy. Come, O come and be my rest, ocean of compassion, ocean of mercy. With my lotus-hands folded and my eyes full of tears, Tuka stands at Your door like a vessel waiting to be filled. O Vithoba, fulfill this longing.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is a plain cry of dependence and waiting. Tukaram bows again and again, knowing his only recourse is to plead for mercy, and he calls God the very ocean of compassion to come and be his resting place. He paints himself with folded hands and brimming eyes, standing at the door like an empty vessel held out to be filled. The single request is that Vithoba satisfy this yearning; the prayer rests entirely on God's grace and the devotee's patient, open emptiness.

GATHA 3397 Prayers

Prayer, the last wish at the feet

मराठी मूळ

आतां हें सेवटीं असों पायांवरी । वदती वैखरी वागपुष्प ॥1॥
नुपेक्षावें आह्मां दीना पांडुरंगा । कृपादानीं जगामाजी तुह्मीं ॥ध्रु.॥
वोळवुनी देह सांडियेली शुद्ध । सारियेला भेद जीव शिव ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे मन तुमचे चरणीं । एवढी आयणी पुरवावी॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now at last let me remain at Your feet, offering flowers of speech through my voice. Do not forsake us, the lowly, O Panduranga; in all the world, You are the giver of grace.

I have surrendered this body and abandoned all distinctions; the difference between jiva and God is resolved. Says Tuka, let my mind rest at Your feet; grant me this one last wish.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now, at the last, let me stay here upon Your feet, my voice speaking out flowers of words. Do not overlook us, the lowly, O Panduranga; in all the world it is You who give grace. I have melted this body down and given up its claim; the difference between the soul and God is settled. Tuka says: let my mind rest at Your feet. Grant me this one wish.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram offers a closing prayer with everything already surrendered. His worship now is only words laid like flowers at God's feet, and he begs Panduranga, the one giver of grace in all the world, not to pass over the lowly. He says he has dissolved the body's hold and let the supposed gap between jiva and Shiva, soul and God, fall away. With that done, his single remaining wish is that his mind rest forever at God's feet. After the self has been given up, only this resting place is asked for.

GATHA 3398 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the true hero against the divided heart

मराठी मूळ

तरि च होय वेडी । नग्न होय धडफुडी ॥1॥
काय बोलाचें गौरव । आंत वरी दोन भाव ॥ध्रु.॥
मृगजळा न्याहाळतां। तान न वजाये सेवितां ॥2॥

तुका ह्मणे हें लक्षण । संत अळंकार लेणें॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Only then is one truly mad, when one stands naked and unbowed. What glory is there in mere words when the inside and outside hold two different feelings? Gazing at a mirage does not quench one's thirst.

One who looks to no other for support is the true hero. Says Tuka, this is the mark of a saint, and these are the true ornaments.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Only then is one truly mad: when one stands naked and unashamed, the same all through. What worth is there in grand words, when inside and outside hold two different feelings? Staring at a mirage does not quench your thirst when you go to drink. The man who looks to no one else for support, call him the true hero. Tuka says: this is the mark of a saint, and these are his real ornaments.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram draws the line between show and substance. Grand speech is worthless when the heart inside differs from the face outside; such a divided man is like a mirage that looks like water but leaves the thirst unquenched. Real madness, the holy kind, is to stand utterly transparent, the same within and without, with nothing hidden. The genuine hero is the one who depends on no one else, leaning only where true support lies. These qualities, integrity and self-reliance in God, are the saint's true ornaments; everything else is decoration over emptiness, and the test is whether inside and outside agree.

GATHA 3399 The Moral Ideal

Moral counsel, the burning of desire

मराठी मूळ

आग्रहा नांवें पाप । योगीं सारावे संकल्प ॥1॥
सहजा ऐसें भांडवल । असोनि कां सारा बोल ॥ध्रु.॥
तैं न भेटे तें काय । मना अंगींचे उपाय ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे धरीं सोय । वासनेची फोडा डोय ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Insistence is the name of sin; one should fulfill one's resolves with equanimity. When naturalness itself is the capital, why waste words on anything else? What cannot be obtained through such means? The mind already holds the remedies within itself.

Says Tuka, find the true path, and burst open the eyes of desire.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Insisting on your own way: that is what sin is. The yogi lets his resolves rest in calm. When ease itself is your wealth, why spend words on anything else? What is there that you cannot reach by this? The mind already holds the cure inside itself. Tuka says: find the true road, and break open the eye of craving.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names the root of sin not as a forbidden act but as the will that insists, the grip that demands its own outcome. The remedy he sets against it is equanimity: let your resolves rest without clutching, since natural ease is itself the only capital you need. He insists you already carry the cure within, so no outer machinery is required. The closing image is sharp: do not merely soothe desire but burst its eye, put out the seeing that keeps it alive, and the true path opens.

GATHA 3400 The Power of the Name

The Name, my only practice

मराठी मूळ

न करीं पठन घोष अक्षरांचा । बीजमंत्र आमुचा पांडुरंग ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I do not recite scriptures with loud chanting of syllables; my seed-mantra is Panduranga. At all times, the mind dwells in the contemplation of the Name; this is my meditation, this is my samadhi.

I do not wander on pilgrimages or sit in caves; I go where the Vaishnavas gather. I know no other practice and do not undertake austerities; I dance in the procession and stay awake through the night.

I observe no fasts or vows; I simply repeat Rama, Krishna, Narayana. Says Tuka, I know no other praise or service; there is nothing second to this.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I do not chant scripture aloud, syllable by syllable. My seed-mantra is Panduranga. All the time, in my mind, I dwell on the Name. That is my peace; that is my samadhi. I do not wander on pilgrimage. I do not hide in mountain caves. I go where the Vaishnavas crowd together. I know no other practice. I do not go in for austerities. I dance beside the dindi, awake all night. I keep no fasts, no vows, no breaking of fasts. I just say Rama, Krishna, Narayana. I do not know how to serve or praise anyone else. Tuka says: there is nothing second to this.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays his whole religion on a single thing and refuses every alternative. Against loud recitation, pilgrimage, cave-dwelling, austerity, fasts, and vows, he sets one practice: ceaseless remembrance of the Name, Panduranga as his seed-mantra. He recasts the prized states of the contemplatives, peace and samadhi, as simply what this remembrance already gives. The one company he keeps is the gathering of devotees, where he dances and stays awake through the kirtan night. The point is exclusive devotion: not that other paths are condemned, but that for him nothing stands second to the Name.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

See how He runs at Pundalik's devoted service, crying out with abandon. Narayana has forgotten His own greatness, standing with hands on His hips, never saying He wishes to sit.

Says Tuka, the Lord of the universe fulfills the hopes of His devotees. A child knows nothing of how to sustain life; the mother and father carry all the worry.

With food served and play within, one who belongs to the Lord bears no burden. The body is cared for without one's knowing; the mother protects and indulges with love.

Says Tuka, my Vitthal is my parent, and my authority rests upon Him.

IN PLAIN WORDS

See how He runs to the close service of Pundalik. He comes like a beggar in his eagerness. Narayana has forgotten His own greatness. He stands with His hands on His hips. He does not even say that He would like to sit. Tuka says: the Lord of the world makes good the hopes of His devotees. What does a child know of how to keep itself alive? The mother and father carry every worry. Food is set ready; play fills its heart. The one who belongs has no weight to bear. The body is tended without the child knowing it. The mother guards it and indulges its wants. Tuka says: my Vitthal is my parent, the one over whom I hold my claim.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reads the famous image of Vitthal standing on the brick at Pandhari as God's self-forgetfulness in love. Eager to serve Pundalik, the Lord drops His majesty and stands waiting with hands on hips, asking for nothing. The poem then turns to the parallel he wants: God is the parent and the devotee the helpless child. A child cannot keep itself alive; it only plays, while mother and father carry all the worry and tend the body unawares. So Tukaram claims a child's right over Vitthal, the right to be carried, the burden being entirely God's and not his own.

GATHA 3402 The Power of the Name

The Name, sin burned in an instant

मराठी मूळ

काय करिती केलीं नित्य पापें । वसे नाम ज्यापें विठोबाचें ॥1॥
तृणीं हुताशन लागला ते रासी । जळतील तैसीं क्षणमात्रें ॥ध्रु.॥
विष्णुमूतिनपाद पाहतां चरण । तेथें कर्म कोण राहूं शके ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नाम जाळी महादोष । जेथें होय घोष कीर्तनाचा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What can accumulated sins do to one in whose chitta dwells the name of Vithoba? As fire set to a heap of straw burns it all in an instant, so does the Name consume all sins. When one beholds the feet of the Lord, what karma can remain standing? Says Tuka, the Name burns away the greatest transgressions wherever the sound of kirtan resounds.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What can a lifetime of daily sins do to one in whose heart the name of Vithoba lives? Fire set to a heap of straw: it all burns in a moment. So do the sins burn. When you look upon the feet of Vishnu's form, what karma can keep standing there? Tuka says: the Name burns away the greatest sins wherever the sound of kirtan rises.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers a fear directly: heaped-up sin has no power over the one who carries Vithoba's name in the heart. His image is total and quick, a flame in dry straw that leaves nothing behind in an instant. He grounds this in seeing God's feet, before which no accumulated karma can stand its ground. The claim is deliberately large: not that the Name lessens sin but that it consumes even the gravest, and the place where this happens is the loud, communal kirtan, not private penance.

GATHA 3403 Sacred Stories

Mythology, the cry come quickly

मराठी मूळ

2॥ तुका ह्मणे पद्मनाभा । जेथें पाहें तेथें उभा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The demon Shankhashura stole the Vedas, and Brahma pledged them as security. Run, O merciful Hari, run swiftly! The elephant Gajendra was afflicted and tormented, and he called out to You for help.

Says Tuka, O Padmanabha, wherever I look, there You stand.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The demon Shankhasura carried off the Vedas. Brahma was left to plead for them. Run, run, come quickly! O merciful Hari, be like that. Gajendra the elephant was caught and tormented; he cried out to You. Tuka says: O Padmanabha, wherever I look, there You are standing.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram piles up the old rescue stories to press his own plea. Hari recovered the stolen Vedas for Brahma; He came running when the trapped elephant Gajendra called. The repeated cry, run, run, come quickly, makes the past deliverances into a demand on the present: be that same swift mercy now. The closing line answers the prayer before it is finished, for wherever the poet turns his eyes Padmanabha is already standing there, near and ready.

GATHA 3404 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the essence and the fool

मराठी मूळ

माकडा दिसती कंवटी नारळा । भोक्ता निराळा वरील सारी ॥1॥
एका रस एका तोंडीं पडे माती । आपुलाले नेती विभाग ते ॥ध्रु.॥
सुनियांसी क्षीर वाढिल्या ओकवी । भोगित्यां पोसवी धणीवरी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे भार वागविती मूर्ख । नेतील तें सार परीक्षक ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A monkey sees only the shell of a coconut, while the one who enjoys it savors the flesh within. One gets the essence while another gets only dust in his mouth; each takes his own portion.

If you feed milk to a dog, it vomits, but one who savors it is nourished to fullness. Says Tuka, fools carry the burden, while those with discernment extract the essence.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A monkey sees only the shell of the coconut. The one who enjoys it knows the meat is something else, set apart inside. One gets the juice; another gets only dirt in his mouth. Each carries off his own share. Feed milk to a dog and it vomits it up; the one who can taste it is nourished to the full. Tuka says: fools carry the load, while those who can judge carry off the essence.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts two ways of meeting the same thing, and the difference is in the receiver, not the gift. The monkey and the dog stand for those who handle what is precious yet cannot take its worth, getting only the husk, or even vomiting back what would have fed them. The one who can taste reaches the kernel and is nourished. The closing line sharpens it to a warning about ourselves: the fool labors under the outer burden of religion while the discerning quietly take its essence, so the question is which we are.

GATHA 3405 Longing and Separation

Longing, hold to your old promise

मराठी मूळ

भेटीची आवडी उताविळ मन । लागलेंसे ध्यान जीवीं जीवा ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे तुह्मी करा साचपणा । मुळींच्या वचना आपुलिया ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The mind is restless with longing for union; my very life is fixed in meditation upon You. Now fulfill this celebration of love, O Gopala; come and embrace me.

My eyes have opened wide and remain unblinking, while streams of tears flow like the Ganga. Says Tuka, be true to Your own original promise; show us Your sincerity.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Longing for the meeting makes my mind restless. My very life clings in meditation upon You, life upon life. Now fill out this festival of love: come, Gopala, and embrace me. My eyes stay wide open, fixed and unblinking. A Ganga of tears pours down. Tuka says: now make it true. Keep the word You gave at the very beginning.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is the cry of a soul that cannot wait for the meeting it lives for. Tukaram's whole life hangs on God, his eyes held open and unblinking, tears falling in a flood. He asks Gopala not for a small favor but for the full festival of love, an embrace. The closing turn is pointed: he holds God to a promise. The original word, the bond God Himself first gave, must now be made true, so the longing is also a claim on God's own faithfulness.

GATHA 3406 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the whole world lit

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The world has been illumined, and all darkness has vanished. There is no place left to hide; the whole expanse stands revealed.

The day of truth has arrived, and no amount of talk can suffice. Says Tuka, with life as the stake, I have seized hold of the very source.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Everything has turned bright, the whole shape of the world. The darkness is wiped away. There is no place left to hide. The whole spread of things stands open. The day of what is true has come. No amount of telling can hold it. Tuka says: with my life as the stake, I have flung my arms around the source.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a sudden flooding of light in which the entire world is made luminous and every shadow is gone. With darkness wiped out there is nowhere left to hide, for all things now stand plainly revealed. He calls it the day of truth, an arrival so full that speech cannot keep pace with it. The last line names the cost and the consummation together: staking his life itself, he has seized hold of the very source, an embrace of the origin of everything.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A child does not know the mother's condition, yet she carries all concern for it. Such is the mutual bond between them, like a spinning top to a stone.

A serpent coils around the body of sandalwood, and though the wood cools it, the serpent's nature does not change. Says Tuka, be like the philosopher's stone and make me, mere iron, equal to gold.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What does the child know of the mother's state? Yet she carries every worry for it. Think on it: so it is between the two. A spinning top is held to a stone. The snake coils round the body of the sandal tree. The sandal cools it, yet the snake's nature does not turn to its kind. Tuka says: be like the touchstone. Make me, mere iron, equal to gold.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram strings together images of one-sided bonds to describe the gap between God and himself. The mother carries all the care a child cannot even know it needs; sandalwood cools the snake that coils around it without changing the snake's nature. He places himself on the lower side of each: the unknowing child, the cold metal. Then comes the prayer, sharp and humble at once: be the touchstone, the paras that turns iron to gold by mere contact, and lift me, base as I am, into Your own worth.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

They light a fuse to bring about my destruction. Many such conspirators have caught me in their net.

They watch for any flaw and give their gleeful approval. Says Tuka, I press forward; there shall be no bullying ahead.

IN PLAIN WORDS

They light a fuse to bring about my ruin. Many such schemers have caught me in their trap. They watch for any fault in me, and there they nod their approval. Tuka says: I press on ahead. There has been no bullying that broke me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks plainly of being hunted by enemies who want him destroyed and who lie in wait for any slip. He sees their malice clearly: they gather at his faults and cheer one another on. Yet the poem does not collapse into fear; it ends in steady defiance. He keeps moving forward, and the intimidation has not made him give way. The note to take is not contempt for the schemers but the resolve that refuses to be ruled by their hostility.

Exhortation, spend yourself on what is true

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In such futile toil the wretched ones exhaust themselves. Why do they not take what is true and make it their own for their genuine benefit? Why do they spend their speech on utterly fruitless things? Says Tuka, O Lord, offer something in service and surrender.

IN PLAIN WORDS

On such an empty round the wretched wear themselves out. Why do they not take what is true, enough for themselves, and turn it to their own good? Why spend their speech on what has no use at all? Tuka says: O Lord, let them offer something in service, in surrender.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram watches people exhaust themselves in routines that lead nowhere and asks the obvious question: why not take hold of what is real and bend it to your own benefit? He grieves that breath and speech are poured out on fruitless things when the true good lies within reach. The closing turn is a prayer rather than a scolding: he asks God that they might offer even a little in genuine service and surrender. The aim of the rebuke is the wasteful pattern, and the cure he names is self-giving, not cleverness.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Your companions have already departed. What assurance have you taken? What will you do all alone when death stands near? It is wise to be alert now and find your own way out.

One by one, your faculties are slipping away: ears, hair, and eyes grow feeble. Teeth have fallen, and the gums rattle inside.

The tongue alone writhes in lonely agitation, rolling about aimlessly. Says Tuka, these companions of yours have plotted your downfall.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Your companions have already set out. What certainty have you settled on? What will you do alone, when death has come near? It is good to be watchful now. Work your own way out. They are leaving one by one: ears, hair, eyes, going slack. The teeth have worn down; inside, the back teeth rattle loose. The tongue alone keeps writhing, rolling about anywhere it likes. Tuka says: these companions of yours have begun to lay you out.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes the body itself preach on death. The companions who have already departed are friends and kin gone before, and the question he presses is what certainty you have stored up for when death stands beside you, with no one to help. Then he turns to the slow desertion of the senses: ears, eyes, hair, teeth, and tongue failing one by one, the very faculties you trusted abandoning you. He calls them companions too, and says they have begun to lay you out for the grave. The whole point is urgency: be alert now and find your own way out while there is still time.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not speak to me of worldly matters. My ears will hear no voice now except that of God.

When one comes to know the true form, who looks at merit and sin? All that went before has been stolen away, its measure lost. The leaves have fallen; now look ahead to the ripening fruit.

Says Tuka, do not let any mistake come between us and block the way.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not speak to me. Do not talk to me of the world. From now on my ears will hear no voice but God's. Once you have seen the true form, who still looks at merit and sin? All that came before has been carried off; its measure is stolen and gone. The old leaves have dropped. Now look ahead to the ripening fruit. Tuka says: do not let any mistake fall across the way and block it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is shutting one door so another can stay open. He refuses worldly talk outright and tells his hearers that his ears now admit only God's voice. He explains why: once you have truly seen God's form, the whole bookkeeping of merit and sin loses its grip, because the old accounts have been carried off and cannot be added up again. The fallen leaves and the coming fruit are his image for this turn: the past life is shed so that something is ripening ahead. His closing prayer is that no small slip be allowed to come between him and that ripening and block the road.

Ecstasy, the bond sealed beyond return

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now all accounts are settled; what remains of small and great? We have fallen into each other's hands, and the certainty was established long ago. There is no going back, for the bond is sealed in the presence of the witness.

Says Tuka, O Lord, where is there room for envy now?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The accounts are settled now. What is left of small and great? We have fallen into each other's hands, and from that moment it was certain. There is no going back. It is sealed in the presence of the witness. Tuka says: O God, where is there any room left for envy now?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes union with God as a deal already closed, not a hope. With the accounts settled, the old measuring of high and low, mine and yours, has nothing left to weigh. He and God have fallen into each other's hands, and a witness has sealed the bond, so there is no turning back. The final line draws the conclusion: when the matter is this complete, envy and rivalry have no ground left to stand on.

GATHA 3413 Longing and Separation

Longing, claiming what is already mine

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Give me what is rightfully mine; I am not asking for anything new. You are the one of a thousand names, the pure champion of Your devotees.

If I speak without witness, then let me be punished. Says Tuka, my true treasure is that Vitthal.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Give me what is mine. I am not asking for anything new. You bear a thousand names; you are the pure champion of your devotees. If I am speaking without truth behind me, then punish me. Tuka says: my real treasure is that Vitthal.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses a claim rather than begging a favor. He asks God only for what already belongs to him, insisting it is no new or extra demand, and he leans on God's own titles: the one of a thousand names, the sworn defender of his devotees. Then he stakes everything on his honesty, inviting punishment if his words have no truth behind them. The last line names what he is claiming: Vitthal himself is his true wealth, the only treasure he wants returned.

GATHA 3414 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the child's babbling praise

मराठी मूळ

करूं स्तुती तरि ते निंदा । तुह्मी जाणां हे गोविंदा॥1॥
आह्मां लडिवाळांचे बोल । करा कवतुकें नवल ॥ध्रु.॥

मागतों भातुकें । तुका ह्मणे कवतुकें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If we attempt to praise You, even that becomes insufficient, O Govinda, as You already know. Take the babbling words of us, Your playful children, as a charming wonder.

With stammering speech I try to please You, O Hari. Says Tuka, like a child, I beg for trinkets with innocent delight.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If we try to praise you, even that praise falls short, O Govinda; you know this already. We are your playful children. Take our words as a charming wonder. With stammering, half-formed speech I try to please you, O Hari. Tuka says: like a child, I beg you for little treats, in pure delight.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures his praise against God and admits it can only fall short, then turns that shortfall into tenderness. He casts himself and the devotees as small children whose words are babble, and asks God to receive that babble fondly, the way a parent delights in a child's first sounds. The point is not skill but love: stammering speech offered in delight pleases God more than polished eloquence. His closing image, a child begging for little treats, keeps the whole relationship playful and intimate rather than solemn.

GATHA 3415 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, song made easy in kirtan

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे वर्म जाणती लडिवाळें । जें होतीं निर्मळें अंतर्बाहीं ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There were no austerities, no penances for us; this singing in devotion comes easily. Without meditation or concentration, Hari Himself dances in the kirtan.

The one who has neither form nor shape stands with hands on hips upon the brick. He in whose belly reside infinite universes comes near to us through the power of devotion.

Says Tuka, the beloved children know the secret, for they are pure within and without.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We had no austerities, no penances. For us this is easy: we just sing in the songs. Without meditation, without holding the mind in concentration, Hari himself dances in the kirtan. The one who has no form and no shape stands there, hands on his hips, upon the brick. The one in whose belly the endless universes lie comes close to us through plain devotion. Tuka says: the loving children know the secret. They are clean within and without.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram contrasts the hard road of austerity with the easy road of song, and says God meets him on the easy one. No penance, no disciplined meditation: just singing, and Hari himself comes and dances in the kirtan. He marks the wonder of it, that the formless one stands embodied on the brick at Pandhari and that the one who holds all the universes draws near through simple devotion. The closing line names the price that is not a price: the secret belongs to those who become like trusting children, pure inside and out, which is what devotional singing works in them.

GATHA 3416 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, strength through giving up

मराठी मूळ

आह्मी जालों बिळवंत । होऊनियां शरणागत ॥1॥
केला घरांत रिघावा । ठायीं पडियेला ठेवा ॥ध्रु.॥
हातां चढलें धन। नेणं रचिलें कारण ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे मिठी । पायीं देउनि केली सुटी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We have become powerful by becoming surrendered souls. We entered the house and found the treasure lying there.

Wealth has come into our hands, a cause crafted by forces beyond our knowing. Says Tuka, by embracing the feet, we have won our freedom.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We have become strong by becoming people who surrender. We made our way into the house, and the treasure was lying right there. Wealth has come into our hands; we do not know what set it up for us. Tuka says: clinging to his feet, we have won our freedom.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram states the paradox at the heart of bhakti: surrender is not weakness but the source of his strength. By giving himself up he gained entry to the house, and inside, the treasure was simply waiting to be found, not earned. He confesses he does not understand the hidden cause that arranged this gift, which keeps it grace and not achievement. The last line resolves the paradox: it was by holding on to God's feet, the very act of surrender, that he won his freedom.

GATHA 3417 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the storehouse thrown open

मराठी मूळ

लागपाठ केला । आतां वांटा नित्य त्याला ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A steady pursuit has been made, and now the daily share must be given to Him. Be eager for this gain; what was far has come home.

The storehouses have been broken open and all has been sealed in one stroke. Says Tuka, there is enough for everyone; take it with your own hands.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A steady effort has been made. Now his daily share must be given to him. Set your heart on this gain. What was far away has come home. The storehouses have been broken open; all of it has come ripe at once. Tuka says: there is enough for everyone. Take it with your own hands.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as one calling others to a harvest already ready. Steady practice has earned a daily portion that is now owed and given, so he urges his hearers to fix their longing on this gain, since what once seemed distant has arrived at the door. His images are abundance breaking loose: the storehouses smashed open, a whole crop ripening in a single stroke. The closing line is an open invitation: the supply is not scarce, there is enough for all, so reach out and take it yourself.

GATHA 3418 The Nature of God

Nature of God, differences held in his compassion

मराठी मूळ

एकीं असे हेवा । एक अनावड जीवां ॥1॥
देवें केल्या भिन्न जाती । उत्तम कनिष्ठ मध्यस्ती ॥ध्रु.॥
प्रीतिसाटीं भेद। कोणी पूज्य कोणी निंद्य ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कळा । त्याचा जाणे हा कळवळा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Some feel envy, while others feel aversion. God has made different natures: the high, the low, and the middle.

For the sake of love, distinctions exist; some are honored, and some are scorned. Says Tuka, only He who created this art knows its true compassion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In some there is envy; in others there is no liking at all. God has made the natures different: the high, the low, and the middle. For the sake of love these differences exist; one is honored, another is scorned. Tuka says: only the one who made this art knows the tenderness inside it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at the unequal world, its envy and dislike, its high and low and middling natures, and refuses to read it as cruelty or accident. He says God himself made these differences, and made them for the sake of love, so that honoring and scorning both have their place in a larger design. The point is not to defend the rankings but to humble our judgment of them. Only the maker of this art, he says, knows the compassion folded inside an order that looks unfair from where we stand.

GATHA 3419 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, the gift of his vision

मराठी मूळ

स्वामीचें हें देणें । येथें पावलों दर्षणें ॥1॥
करूं आवडीनें वाद । तुमच्या सुखाचा संवाद ॥ध्रु.॥
कळावया वर्म । हा तों पायांचा चि धर्म ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे सिद्धी । हे चि पाववावी बुद्धी ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

This is the gift of the Master; here I have attained His vision. Let us engage in loving discourse about the joy that is Yours.

To know the secret is itself the dharma of the feet. Says Tuka, this is the wisdom that should be brought to perfection.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is the Master's gift: here I have come to his sight, his darshan. Let us speak together, gladly, of the joy that is yours. To know the secret is itself the work the feet ask of us. Tuka says: let my understanding be carried all the way to this, to its fulfillment.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram receives God's vision as a pure gift from the Master, not as something he produced. Out of that meeting he wants only loving conversation, sharing in the joy that belongs to God. He redefines duty along the way: the real dharma is simply to know the secret of the feet, the truth of refuge, rather than to perform anything outward. His closing prayer is that his mind be brought to completion in exactly this knowing, so the gift ripens into full realization.

GATHA 3420 Renunciation

Renunciation, sulking away from the world

मराठी मूळ

रुसलों संसारा । आह्मी आणीक व्यापारा ॥1॥
ह्मणऊनि केली सांडी । देउनि पडिलों मुरकंडी ॥ध्रु.॥
परते चि ना मागें । मोहो निष्ठ जालों अंगें ॥2॥
सांपडला देव । तुका ह्मणे गेला भेव ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have turned away from worldly life and all other pursuits. Therefore I have cast everything aside and curled up at His feet.

I will not turn back; all attachment has left my being. Says Tuka, God has been found, and all fear has departed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have sulked away from worldly life and from every other trade. So I let it all go and curled up at his feet. I will not turn back, not even a step. All clinging has left my body. God has been found. Tuka says: and the fear is gone.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells his break with the world like a child's sulk, turning his back on worldly life and every other occupation. Having dropped it all, he curls up at God's feet and refuses to take even one step back. The attachment that once held him has drained out of his body, leaving no pull toward the old life. The reward and the reason come in the last lines: God has been found, and with that finding every fear has departed.

GATHA 3421 Longing and Separation

Longing, calling the slow God

मराठी मूळ

हें तों वाटलें आश्चर्य । तुह्मां न धरवे धीर ॥1॥
माझा फुटतसे प्राण । धांवा धांवा ह्मणऊन ॥ध्रु.॥
काय नेणों दिशा। जाल्या तुह्मांविण ओशा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कां गा । नाइकिजे पांडुरंगा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Is it not astonishing that You cannot hold Your patience? My very life is breaking apart, crying 'Come, come quickly!' I do not know why all directions feel desolate without You. Says Tuka, O Panduranga, why do You not listen?

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is the strange thing: that you cannot keep your patience for me. My life is breaking apart, crying, Come, come quickly. I do not know why every direction looks empty and desolate without you. Tuka says: why, O Panduranga, why will you not listen?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram cries out in the ache of separation and even turns the complaint toward God. He marks it as strange that the God who is supposed to be impatient for his devotees now seems to hold back, while his own life feels like it is tearing apart as he calls for him to come. Without God, every direction looks empty and desolate, with nowhere to turn. The closing line is a raw, almost wounded question to Panduranga: why will you not listen to me?

GATHA 3422 Prayers

Prayer, come running, do not delay

मराठी मूळ

धांवा केला धांवा । श्रम होऊं नेदी जीवा ॥1॥

उशीर तो आतां । न करावा हे चिंता ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे त्वरें । वेग करीं विश्वंभरे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Come running, come quickly, and do not let weariness touch my jiva. Pour down showers of nectar and take this child into Your arms.

Do not delay any further; this is my only anxiety. Says Tuka, O Sustainer of the universe, make haste.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Come running, come quickly. Do not let my soul grow weary. Pour down streams of nectar; take this child into your lap. Do not be late now; this is my one worry. Tuka says: hurry, be swift, O Sustainer of the universe.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays as a tired child calling for a parent who is taking too long. He begs God to come running before his soul wears out, and asks not for argument but for nectar poured down and for the simple shelter of being lifted into God's lap. His single anxiety is the delay itself: that help will arrive too late. Addressing God as Vishvambhar, the sustainer of the whole universe, he urges that same vast power to make haste for one small, waiting child.

GATHA 3423 Prayers

Petition, the servant at the door

मराठी मूळ

जोडिले अंजुळ । असें दानउताविळ ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have joined my palms, eager for Your gift. Cast Your merciful gaze upon me and bring these words to experience.

You are the master and I the servant; our union is one and the same. Says Tuka, I stand before You making this humble plea.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have cupped my palms together, eager for your gift. Look at me; carry me; turn your merciful gaze my way. Bring these words into living experience. You are the master, I am the servant; yet our union is one and the same. I make my plea. Tuka says: I stand before you, asking once again.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram comes empty-handed and says so. He folds his palms like a beggar waiting for alms, and the alms he wants is grace itself, the merciful gaze that turns mere words into something he actually tastes and lives. He names the relationship plainly: God is master, he is servant. But then he refuses to leave it there, insisting that master and servant are finally one and the same. The whole poem is the posture of standing face to face and pleading, unwilling to settle for distance.

GATHA 3424 Prayers

Bewilderment, the unmeasurable God

मराठी मूळ

काय तुज कैसें जाणवेल देवा । आणावें अनुभवा कैशा परी ॥1॥
सगुण निर्गुण थोर कीं लहान । न कळे अनुमान मज तुझा ॥ध्रु.॥
कोण तो निर्धार करूं हा विचार । भवसिंधु पार तरावया ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कैसे पाय आतुडती । न पडे श्रीपती वर्म ठावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How shall I come to know You, O Lord? In what manner shall I bring You into experience? Are You with form or without, great or small? I cannot fathom any measure of You. What resolve, what deliberation should I make to cross this ocean of existence? Says Tuka, how shall I reach Your feet, O Lord? The secret remains unknown.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How can I ever know you, O Lord? In what way can I bring you into experience? Are you with form or without form, great or small? I cannot fathom any measure of you. What firm resolve, what plan should I make, to cross this ocean of worldly existence? Tuka says: how can I reach your feet, O Lord of Lakshmi? The secret stays hidden from me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out his helplessness as a string of honest questions. He wants to know God and to actually experience God, but every category he reaches for breaks in his hands: form or formless, great or small, no measure fits. The stakes are not abstract, because he needs a method to cross the ocean of birth and death, and he has none. The poem ends without an answer on purpose: the secret of reaching God's feet is not something the seeker can figure out, and admitting that is itself the prayer.

GATHA 3425 Prayers

Longing, the beggar who will not leave

मराठी मूळ

मी तव बैसलों धरुनियां ध्यास । न करीं उदास पांडुरंगा ॥1॥
नको आतां मज दवडूं श्रीहरी । मागाया भिकारी जालों दास ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे येऊनियां देई भेटी । कुरवाळुनी पोटीं धरीं मज ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have sat down holding fast to my resolve; do not turn me away, O Panduranga. Do not send me off now, O Hari; I have become a beggar at Your door.

I am hungry for a word of Your grace; O Narayana, fulfill this hope. Says Tuka, come and give me Your embrace; caress me and hold me close to Your bosom.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have sat down here, holding fast to my one resolve; do not leave me desolate, Panduranga. Do not drive me away now, Shrihari. To beg from you, I have become your servant. I am hungry for a word of your grace. O Narayana, fulfill this hope. Tuka says: come and meet me; caress me and hold me close against your chest.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram has parked himself at God's door and refuses to move until he is answered. He calls himself a beggar who became a servant only so he would have the right to ask, which turns devotion into a kind of holy stubbornness. What he is starving for is small and enormous at once: a single word of grace. The closing line drops all dignity and asks for something physical and tender, to be pulled into an embrace and held to the chest, the way a child is held by a parent who finally comes.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now that I sing Your name in song, the people honor me. The worry for food and clothing and the body's torments have ceased.

The entanglements with friends and relatives have been cut away; I have truly been freed from bondage. There is no need now for anyone's toil of giving and taking, for all the snares of desire have been swept away.

Says Tuka, do now whatever You see fit, O Ananta, my mother and father.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now that I sing your name in my songs, people honor me. The worry over food and clothing for this belly is gone; the body's great torment has been turned away. The entanglements with friends and relatives have been cut; truly, I have been let out of this prison. There is no need now for anyone's hard bargaining of give and take, for the snares of desire have all been swept away. Tuka says: now do whatever seems right to you, O Ananta, my mother and father.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram counts up what the Name has done for him, and the list is mostly about things falling away. The anxious arithmetic of food, clothing, and bodily survival has stopped; so have the binding obligations of kin, which he names a prison he has been released from. With desire's snares swept off, even the endless social ledger of giving and taking no longer holds him. Having been emptied of all his own wanting, he hands the whole of his life back to God, called mother and father, content to let God decide what happens next.

Complaint, lust and anger on my trail

मराठी मूळ

कामक्रोध माझे लावियेले पाठीं । बहुत हिंपुटीं जालों देवा ॥1॥
आवरितां तुझे तुज नावरती । थोर वाटे चित्तीं आश्चर्य हें ॥ध्रु.॥
तुझिया विनोदें आह्मां प्राणसाटी । भयभीत पोटीं सदा दुःखी ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Lust and anger have been set upon my trail, O Lord, and I am sorely harassed. Even You cannot rein them in, which fills my chitta with wonder.

Your sport puts my very life at stake; I remain fearful within and always sorrowful. Says Tuka, it is the mark of my own fate; who can laugh at You, the Capable One?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Lust and anger have been set loose on my trail, O Lord; I have been worn down again and again. When I try to hold them back, they will not be held; this fills my mind with great astonishment, for they are yours. By your sport my very life is the stake; I am afraid within and always in pain. Tuka says: it is the mark written on my forehead. Who can laugh at you, the all-capable one?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is hounded by lust and anger and admits he cannot rein them in himself. His astonishment turns into a kind of accusation: these forces belong to God, so the chase is finally God's own doing, a game in which the devotee's life is what is wagered. He does not pretend to be unafraid; he is frightened and in constant pain. Yet he stops short of blaming God outright, blaming his own fate instead, because to mock the all-capable Lord would be absurd. The honesty here is in naming how it feels to be the toy and still refuse to let go of the player.

Devotion, the vow of service

मराठी मूळ

निघों आह्मी कांहीं चित्तवित्त घरें । आपुल्या उदारें जीवावरी ॥ध्रु.॥
बोल परस्परें वाढवावें सुख । पाहावें श्रीमुख डोळेभरी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे सत्य बोलतों वचन । करुनी चरण साक्ष तुझे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

May You command Your service to me face to face, O Lord; such is the desire of my chitta. I will give away my mind, my wealth, my home, and my very life for Your sake.

Let us exchange words that increase our mutual joy, and let me gaze at Your blessed face to my full satisfaction. Says Tuka, I speak this as a true vow, with Your feet as my witness.

IN PLAIN WORDS

May you command me to your service face to face, O Lord; this is the desire of my mind. I will set out giving up my mind, my wealth, my home, all of it freely, even my life. Let us trade words back and forth that make our joy grow, and let me gaze at your blessed face till my eyes are full. Tuka says: I speak this as a true word, with your feet as my witness.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram wants God to assign him service directly, not at a distance, and he stakes everything on it. The offering is total and named item by item: mind, wealth, home, and life, all given freely. But this is not grim duty; he pictures it as a back-and-forth conversation between the two of them that keeps increasing their shared joy, and as the simple pleasure of looking at God's face until his eyes are satisfied. He seals it as a vow, swearing on God's feet, so that the longing becomes a binding promise rather than a passing wish.

Longing, come to the orphan

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For the sake of this helpless one, O Keshava, please come. My jiva pines for You; I am watching and waiting.

My chitta is absorbed at Your feet and cannot remain apart from You. Says Tuka, O compassionate one, keep me in Your thoughts.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For the sake of this orphan, please come, Keshava. My life pines for you; in my heart I keep watching the road. My mind is dyed in your feet and cannot stay apart from you. Tuka says: O merciful one, keep me in your thoughts.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks as an orphan, someone with no one else to turn to, and from that emptiness he calls God to come. The longing is physical: his very life withers, and he keeps his eyes on the road like a person waiting for one who is overdue. He says his mind has been dyed in God's feet, soaked through with that color so it can no longer hold a separate shape of its own. The small closing plea, keep me in your thoughts, is the whole of what an orphan dares to ask: simply not to be forgotten.

Longing, life worthless without God

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे आतां पांडुरंगाविण । न वांचतां क्षण जीव भला ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why should I live and be a burden upon the earth, if I have no place at Your feet? What use are these eyes if they cannot behold the Supreme Being? What use is this mouth, wandering like a beast, if it does not constantly utter Your name? Says Tuka, without Panduranga, this life is better ended than lived even for a moment.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why should I go on living and be a weight on the earth, if there is no shelter for me at your feet? What good is the work of these eyes if they never see Purushottama? What use is this mouth, running wild like a beast, if it does not always speak your name? Tuka says: now, without Panduranga, even one more moment of this life is better lost than lived.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures his life only by its nearness to God and finds it worthless without that. If there is no refuge at God's feet, then his existence is just dead weight on the earth. He turns on his own faculties: eyes that never see the Supreme are useless, and a mouth that does not constantly speak the Name is no better than an animal's. The sharp closing claim is not a wish to die but a refusal to value any life that does not have Panduranga in it; a single Godless moment, he says, is not worth keeping.

GATHA 3431 Prayers

Surrender, deliver me from Maya

मराठी मूळ

दुर्धर हे माया न होय सुटका । वैकुंठनायका सोडवीं मज ॥2॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I do not want pride; I do not want arrogance. Without You, my jiva wastes away.

This relentless Maya offers no escape; O Lord of Vaikuntha, set me free. Says Tuka, once Your vision is granted, everything will be resolved.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I do not want stiffness; I do not want pride. Without you, my life wastes away. This Maya is too hard to bear; there is no escape on my own. O Lord of Vaikuntha, set me free. Tuka says: once your sight is given to me, then everything will be resolved.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram begins by throwing away the very things ego clings to, stiff self-importance and pride, because he sees they only drain his life when God is absent. He admits the plain truth about Maya: it is too strong, and he cannot get out of its grip by his own effort. So the only move left is to ask the Lord of Vaikuntha to do the freeing. His confidence is concentrated in one event: the moment God's vision is granted, every tangle dissolves at once, so the whole prayer rests on being seen rather than on striving.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Come home, O Narayana; stand still and let me place my head upon Your feet. Again and again grant me Your loving embrace and look upon me with Your merciful gaze.

Let me wash Your feet and seat You in the inner chamber; steady my chitta, O Panduranga. I will feed You with whatever provisions I have; will You not dine now? O compassionate one, You have not revealed the secret; when You are far, who dispels my confusion? Says Tuka, empowered by love, whatever I have spoken, O Ananta, I will bring to pass.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Come into the house, Narayana; stand here and let me lay my head on your feet. Again and again give me your embrace of welcome, and look down on me with your merciful gaze. Let me wash your feet and seat you in the inner room; steady my mind, Panduranga. I will cook you a meal from whatever I have stored; why would you not eat now? O merciful one, you have not let me know the secret; when you stay far off, who clears away my confusion? Tuka says: now, by the authority of love, whatever I have said, O Ananta, I will make you do.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram treats God not as a distant deity but as a guest he is welcoming into his own home, and he runs through the whole hospitality: head at the feet, repeated embraces, washing the feet, seating God in the innermost room, cooking and serving a meal. The point of all this nearness is one thing he asks for in the middle, that God steady his restless mind. He gently scolds God too, noting that as long as God keeps his distance and withholds the secret, the devotee's confusion has no one to dispel it. The closing line is bold and tender at once: love itself gives him the right to command, and he insists that God will do what he has asked.

Discernment, the marks of God's coming

मराठी मूळ

देवाची ते खूण तोडी मायाजाळ। आणि हें सकळ जग हरी ॥4॥
पहा देवें तेंचि बळकाविलें स्थळ। तुक्यापें सकळ चिन्हें होतीं ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The sign of God's arrival is that the one He visits is stripped of all human pride. The sign of God is that one serves all beings, knowing no one as separate from oneself.

The sign of God is that one is freed from the snare of desire and the bonds of attachment. The sign of God is that He tears apart the web of illusion and fills the whole world with Hari.

See, God has taken hold of that very ground; all these marks were present in Tuka.

IN PLAIN WORDS

This is the sign of God: when he enters someone's house, that person's human pride cracks apart. This is the sign of God: one is made completely undone, holding no one as separate from oneself. This is the sign of God: he lets no desire entangle you, and lets the noose of attachment touch you no more. This is the sign of God: he tears the net of Maya, and fills this whole world with Hari. See, God has seized that very ground; in Tuka all these signs were present.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram gives a checklist for telling whether God has actually arrived in a person, and it is measured by what gets destroyed, not what gets added. The first casualty is human pride, which cracks the moment God enters; next the very sense of a separate self dissolves, so the person sees no one as other. He names the freedoms that follow: desire no longer entangles, attachment's noose can no longer grip, and the whole net of Maya is torn so that the world shows itself as full of Hari. At the end he turns the test on himself, claiming these signs were all visible in his own life, which is both witness and quiet warning to check ourselves by the same marks.

Devotion, the sinner who still hopes

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You will be praised from the lips of Ananta, for countless, O Vitthal, are Your devotees. If anything of mine falls short upon reflection, then I am rightly fit to be turned away.

You are forever abundant, O clever Narayana, the crown jewel among the wise. Says Tuka, such are the jivas of this age of Kali, yet even they, though full of sin, deserve compassion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You will be sung from the mouth of Ananta; countless, O Vitthal, are your servants. If anything of mine is found wanting on reflection, then I am rightly fit to be cast aside. You are always full and complete, O clever Narayana, crown jewel among the wise. Tuka says: such are the creatures of this Kali age, yet even they, full of sin, should not be denied compassion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets his own smallness against God's fullness. God has servants beyond counting and will be praised endlessly, so God loses nothing by anyone; if Tukaram himself falls short, he admits he would deserve to be turned away. But he will not let the matter rest on desert. Pointing to the present age of Kali and its sin-soaked people, he pleads precisely for them, himself included, arguing that the ones least worthy are exactly the ones who most need compassion. The logic is the heart of his bhakti: grace is not a wage earned but a mercy given to those who cannot earn it.

GATHA 3435 Faith and Trust

Faith, no need to defend yourself

मराठी मूळ

न करावी चिंता । भय धरावें सर्वथा ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Do not worry, but maintain your reverence in all things. Narayana bears everything for His servants, even enduring sacrifice Himself.

There is no need for defense or for fashioning clever replies. Says Tuka, do not harbor any doubt; one must simply speak the truth.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not worry. Do not be afraid of anything at all. Narayana stands by his servants; he carries the burden himself. You do not have to answer back. You do not have to think up a clever reply. Do not hold any doubt. Tuka says: do not even argue. Just speak what is true.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is telling the devotee to put down two things: anxiety and self-defense. If Narayana himself carries the weight for those who are his, then there is no situation a servant must rescue himself from by worry, by argument, or by a manufactured answer. The poem treats the urge to defend oneself, to fashion the perfect reply, as a kind of distrust. Drop the doubt, speak plainly and truthfully, and let God be the one who bears it.

Confession, stained through many births

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे करीं गोंवळें यासाटीं । आपल्या पालटीं संगें देवा ॥5॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My capital is tied up in falsehood; this trade is bound to end in loss. With what face shall I look for You, cycling through birth after birth? I have been colored by association with all four forms of life, taking on bodies both good and bad.

Through many disguises and many ages, much dye has stained this being. Even when trying to show what lies within, the folds of the garment keep covering it up.

Says Tuka, O Lord, take charge of this muddled one and transform me by Your own touch.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My whole capital is a bundle of lies. A trade like this can only end in ruin. With what face do I watch for you? I keep turning in the womb, birth after birth, hemmed in on every side. I have been dyed by the company of all four kinds of life, taking bodies good and bad. Through many disguises and many ages I have been changed again and again; dark colors have soaked into me. Even when I try to open myself and show what is inside, the folds of the cloth fall back and cover it. Tuka says: gather up this tangled one, O God. Change me by your own touch.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram confesses that everything he has built his life on is false, so the whole transaction of his existence runs at a loss. The image is of a soul cycling helplessly through birth after birth in every order of creatures, stained like cloth by every association until the original color is lost. He admits he cannot even uncover his own true heart: every time he tries, the layers fall back over it. So he stops trying to clean himself and hands the work to God: gather up this muddled creature and re-dye him by your own touch. The transformation he needs is one only the Lord can make.

GATHA 3437 The Saints

Saints, keep distance from the false

मराठी मूळ

मग तया दोषा नाहीं परिहार । होय अपहार सुकृताचा॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नमस्कारावे दुरून । अंतरीं धरून राहें रूप ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One should not dwell in the company of non-saints, for some fault or blemish may attach itself to you. Then there is no remedy for that fault, and your accumulated merit is stolen away.

Says Tuka, bow to them from a distance, and hold the Lord's form within your chitta.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Do not live in the company of those who are not saints. Some fault, some blemish, will rub off onto you. Then there is no cure for that fault, and the good you had stored up is robbed from you. Tuka says: bow to such people from a distance. Keep the Lord's form held inside your heart.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram warns that company is contagious: stay close to those who lack the saint's spirit and their faults will attach to you, and the merit you had gathered will quietly drain away. He does not call for contempt. The remedy is to bow to them, to honor them, but from a distance. Meanwhile the safe dwelling place is inward: hold the Lord's form in your heart, and let that be the company you actually keep.

GATHA 3438 The Saints

Saints, run to their leavings

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे धांव । पुढें खुंटईल हांव ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Whatever feast they had is the very alms given to the seeker. Now let me go with delight to where the saints abide.

They had eaten their fill, and what remained were their sacred leavings. Says Tuka, run ahead, for soon even this craving will be stilled.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Whatever feast they ate is itself the alms given to the beggar. Now let me go, asking the way, to wherever the saints are living. Their stomachs were full, and behind them they left their sacred leavings. Tuka says: run. Soon even this craving will be cut off.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes himself a beggar at the saints' door, and treats their leftovers as the highest alms; what is mere remnant to them is a feast to him. He pictures himself asking the road, hurrying to wherever they dwell, because their leavings are sacred. The urgency in 'run' is real: he says soon even this longing itself will be stilled, so the time to seek their company is now, while the hunger for it is still alive.

GATHA 3439 The Saints

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One should find a good dwelling place and settle firmly there. Those who reside there wake you when you sleep and fulfill your rest.

They have one single occupation: their company and their very life are one. Goodness begets goodness; each chitta bears witness to the other.

No adversity can come between them; nothing stands in the way. Says Tuka, as one approaches them, blessings come home of their own accord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Find a good place to live and settle firmly there. The ones who live there wake you when you fall asleep; they make sure your true rest is given to you. They have one single occupation. Their company and their very life are the same thing. Good brings out good; each heart bears witness to the other. No trouble can come between them; nothing stands in the way. Tuka says: it is good. As you draw near them, blessings come home of their own.

WHAT IT MEANS

The good dwelling place Tukaram urges is the company of saints, and he praises it for one thing in particular: it will not let you sleep. They wake the drowsing soul and see that it gets its real rest, the rest that is God. Their whole life and their fellowship are one undivided thing, and goodness passes between them, each heart confirming the other. No discord can wedge them apart. The promise is that you do not even have to chase the reward; come near such company and the blessing arrives home on its own.

तुका ह्मणे आह्मांसवें जो रुसला । तयाचा अबोला आकाशासीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If you butt your head against a stone, your skull will crack, but the stone feels no discomfort. To embrace a live ember is to discover what kind of welcome that is.

Says Tuka, whoever quarrels with us has quarreled with the sky itself; his silence reaches no one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Butt your head against a stone and your skull cracks; the stone does not even sweat for your trouble. Go and embrace a live coal, and see what kind of welcome that is. Tuka says: whoever sulks against us has sulked against the sky. His silence reaches no one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram answers those who pick a fight with the saints by showing them where the damage lands. Butt your head on a stone and only your head breaks; clutch a burning ember and you learn what that embrace costs. The one who quarrels is the one who is hurt; the saint, like the stone, is untouched. And to sulk at a saint, he says, is to sulk at the sky itself: your cold silence falls on something so vast and impersonal that it reaches no one and changes nothing. The warning is aimed at the quarreler's own bruised pride, not at the saint.

GATHA 3441 Faith and Trust

Faith, sincerity over eloquence

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे आह्मां जाणीवेचें दुःख । न पाहों त्या मुख दुर्जनाचें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What we value is pure, sincere faith; without it, all ritual observance is hollow. Who will heed eloquent speech on the surface when genuine recognition has not arisen within? Says Tuka, knowledge brings us only sorrow; we will not look upon the face of a wicked person.

IN PLAIN WORDS

With us, one thing carries weight: a pure heart. Without that, all the show of ritual is empty. Who cares for sweet, juicy talk on the surface, when the mind has not truly recognized God? Tuka says: cleverness only brings us grief. We will not even look at the face of a wicked person.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram weighs sincerity against display and finds display worthless. What counts with him is a pure, true heart; elaborate ritual and honeyed eloquence are hollow if the mind has not actually come to know God. He goes further and calls mere cleverness a source of sorrow, not a prize. The closing line is sharp: he will not even meet the face of the wicked. The point is not personal disgust but a refusal to be drawn into the company of those who trade in surface and never in genuine recognition.

GATHA 3442 Faith and Trust

Faith, he will not forsake his servant

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now let this inner agitation be cooled. Place your faith at God's feet and see what He will do.

He alone is the giver of sustenance; no one else holds authority. Says Tuka, I am confident that He will never forsake His servant.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now let this burning restlessness be cooled. Place your trust at his feet, and watch what God will do. He alone is the one who gives food; no one else holds the power. Tuka says: he will not neglect his servant. Of this I am sure.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks to his own agitated heart and tells it to grow quiet. The cure for the inner fever is not more striving but surrender: lay your trust at God's feet and then simply watch what he does. Behind this is a single conviction, that God alone is the giver of sustenance and no other power rules over a life. From that he draws his confidence: the Lord does not abandon those who are his. The poem moves from restlessness to rest by handing the outcome entirely to God.

GATHA 3443 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the half-baked man

मराठी मूळ

लांब धांवे पाय चोरी । भरोवरी जनाच्या ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Feet run far to steal from others, creating turmoil among the people. Now what will become of this, when the uncooked remains raw? One eats and vomits again and again; how can any skill endure? Says Tuka, one devoid of devotion must face the grinding consequences.

IN PLAIN WORDS

His feet run far to steal, off to plunder among other people. Now what will become of him? The thing was set to cook, and it stayed raw. He eats and throws it up again, over and over. How can any real skill last that way? Tuka says: the one without true devotion has to swallow the grinding result of it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram aims this at a person whose energy runs the wrong way: quick on his feet to take what is not his, stirring up trouble among others. The image of food that is set to cook yet stays raw, eaten and vomited again and again, names a life that never ripens into anything; nothing he takes in stays down or becomes nourishment. Without real devotion at the center, no acquired skill or scheme can hold together. The closing is plain consequence, not gloating: a hollow, devotion-less life leaves a man to chew on his own bitter result. The mirror is for any of us whose effort goes everywhere except inward.

तुका ह्मणे ऐसें करीं नारायणा । माझी ही वासना ऐसी आहे ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A quarrel has broken out among my senses. The ears and tongue say they are satisfied, but hands, feet, and forehead are in torment, and a great famine has fallen upon the eyes.

The mouth sings God's glories and the ears listen, but the others cry, 'Our need is different!' When Your vision is granted, the debt of all will be settled, and each will receive its share. Says Tuka, O Narayana, grant this, for such indeed is my longing.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A quarrel has broken out among my senses. The ears and the tongue say they are satisfied. But the hands, the feet, the forehead are in torment, and a great famine has fallen on the eyes. The mouth sings your praises, the ears get to listen, but the others cry, our need is not the same as theirs. When you grant your darshan, every one of them is paid off; each will get its share. Tuka says: do this for me, Narayana. This is what I long for.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram dramatizes longing by setting his own senses against one another. Singing and hearing the Name already feed the tongue and the ears, but the hands that would serve, the feet that would walk to the temple, the forehead that would bow, the eyes that would behold, are all starving for their own portion. Each sense wants its direct contact with God, not a borrowed one. The single thing that satisfies the whole assembly at once is darshan, the sight of the Lord; in that one gift every faculty receives its share. So the abhanga becomes a prayer to Narayana: grant your presence, because nothing less settles the whole of me.

GATHA 3445 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, I fear not time or death

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I am not a slave to supernatural powers, nor am I bound by scripture alone. I will become entirely Yours, O Vitthal.

In our minds dwells a joy that remains at all times, one that knows no destruction. I know neither merit nor sin, nor do I look upon anything other than You, O Panduranga.

I will not strive for liberation and forsake the nectar of loving devotion. Even in the womb I feel no dread, for Your name abides in my mind.

Says Tuka, I have become wholly Yours, O Vitthal; I fear not even time and death.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I am no slave of occult powers, nor bound to scripture alone. O Vitthal, I will be wholly yours. In our minds there is a joy that stays at all times, a joy that has no destruction. I know neither merit nor sin. My eyes look on nothing but you, Panduranga. I will not chase after the labor of liberation and throw away the nectar of loving devotion. Even in the womb I feel no dread, coming or going, because your name lives in my heart. Tuka says: I have become wholly yours; O Vitthal, I do not fear even time and death.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram refuses every lesser prize and keeps only one. He will not be a servant of miraculous powers, nor live bound to scripture, nor even strive for liberation, because all of these would mean letting go of the nectar he actually wants, the joy of loving Vitthal. That joy is steady and indestructible, and it puts him past the bookkeeping of merit and sin; he simply looks at Panduranga and nothing else. The boldest claim comes last: with the Name living in his heart, the womb holds no terror and even time and death lose their grip. Total belonging to God has dissolved the fear that runs every other life.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Blessed is the one who, having taken birth, met a true companion and encountered Panduranga. By that, all the sorrows of worldly life were destroyed; excellent indeed is the practice of chanting the Name.

Blessed are those saints, those perfected great beings, who cherished the abode of Pandhari. They are the true givers of love, the purifiers of the fallen; blessed is the one who beholds them.

By walking the steps of the proven path, the state of absorption and liberation is attained. Where there is love and ease, there is no fear or dread; what worry can touch me in that joy? That which is rare in worldly life lifts the dull souls of the world.

Says Tuka, blessed is the fortune of beholding them.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He took birth, and his birth bore fruit: he met a true companion, and he met Panduranga. By this the sorrows of worldly life were destroyed. The chanting of the Name is the finest of all goods to trade in. Blessed are the saints, the perfected ones, the great souls who held fast to Pandhari. They are the givers of love, the lifters of the fallen; blessed is the one who beholds them. Climbing the steps of this proven path, one reaches absorption and union. Where there is love and ease, there is no fear, no dread; in that joy what worry can touch me? What is rare in this world lifts up the dull, heavy souls of the earth. Tuka says: blessed is the fortune of the one who beholds them.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram measures a human birth by one outcome: did it bring you to a true guide and to God. The one whose life met Panduranga has not wasted his birth, for the Name he then learns to chant burns away worldly sorrow and is the richest thing a person can deal in. He then turns to the saints who clung to Pandhari and calls them the givers of love and the rescuers of the fallen, so that even to see them is a blessing. Their path is a proven staircase that climbs to absorption and union with God, and at the top there is such ease that fear and worry no longer reach. The poem ends in gratitude: what is rarest in the world is precisely this company, which lifts the dullest soul, and blessed is the one given the sight of it.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Have all our days passed in mere merrymaking? Now that same crowd fills the space meant for sacred discourse. The mind does not remain still for even a moment; when will true contentment come? The distaste for sacred discourse becomes the root of downfall, and the means of deliverance turn to dust.

Whatever was hoarded in the past, not even a single moment of it goes with you. Let that same speech now be burnished here; churn forth the jewels of the Word.

Says Tuka, the purpose of speaking is this alone: the welfare of both speaker and listener.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Have all our days gone by in nothing but merrymaking? Now that same crowd crowds into the place meant for sacred discourse. The mind does not stay still for one moment. When will real contentment come? When we lose our taste for the discourse, that is the root of our downfall, and the way across turns to dust. Whatever you hoarded in the past stays behind; not one moment of it goes with you. Let that same speech be made bright here. Churn it and bring up the jewels of the Word. Tuka says: the whole purpose of speaking is this; the good of both the speaker and the listener.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is rebuking a wasted use of time and pointing to its repair. He sees days spent in idle amusement, and now the same restless crowd intrudes even into the satsang, where the mind will not hold still long enough to be fed. Losing your taste for sacred speech is not a small thing; he names it the root of ruin, the place where the way across the world crumbles to dust. Nothing you have hoarded follows you out, so the only worthwhile use of breath is the one that benefits both who speaks and who hears: churning ordinary words until the jewels of the Name come up.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How can pure and impure be distinguished when skin and flesh are one and the same? By what quality is anything more or less before God? Is water different in a stream, a well, a river, or a great waterway? Does the sun distinguish with its light, when its rays feed all alike? Milk is not different by the color of the cow; all cows give the same. Clay is one and the same; only the pots bear different names.

Fire burns in a single manner, knowing no pure or impure. Says Tuka, what matters is the vessel's worthiness, or else nectar itself tastes like poison.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How can pure and impure be told apart, when skin and flesh are one and the same? Nothing is more, nothing is less. By what quality could anything be higher before God? Is water different in a stream, a well, a river, a great waterway? Does the sun sort things out with its light, when its rays feed them all alike? Milk is not different by the color of the cow; every cow gives the same. The clay is one and the same; only the pots get different names. Fire burns in one way and knows no pure or impure. Tuka says: what matters is whether the vessel is fit. Otherwise even nectar will taste like poison.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is denying that caste and birth make any difference before God. He runs through plain things that do not sort or rank: water is water in stream or well, sunlight feeds all alike, milk is the same whatever the color of the cow, clay is one though the pots are named differently, fire burns without asking what is pure. By the same logic, skin and flesh are common to everyone, so the labels of high and low are hollow. The one real distinction he allows is inward fitness: a worthy vessel receives the nectar, while an unworthy heart turns even nectar to poison.

GATHA 3449 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, death respects no one

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे हित तों ह्मणा विठ्ठल । न ह्मणे तो भोगील कळेल तें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Death respects no one's reputation. Why then are you ashamed to say the name of Rama? That which can free you from the clutches of time, why does it not come to your lips again and again? Who in this world has been spared? Everyone goes to the torments of hell.

Says Tuka, as long as it serves you, say Vitthal. One who does not say it will suffer what is due.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Death holds no one's standing in regard. So why are you ashamed to say the name of Rama? The thing that can free you from the grip of time, why does it not come to your lips again and again? Who in this world has ever been spared? They have all gone into the boiling cauldron, into the torments of hell. Tuka says: if you want your own good, say Vitthal. The one who will not say it will suffer whatever comes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is shaming the false shame that keeps people from chanting the Name. Death, he says, respects no rank or reputation, so the pride that makes you embarrassed to say Rama out loud is foolish; the one thing that can free you from time is the thing you withhold from your own lips. He points to a plain fact: no one has been spared by death, and the unredeemed go into the torments named after hell. The whole abhanga turns on a simple choice he lays bare: say Vitthal and be helped, or refuse it and bear the consequence.

GATHA 3450 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, the robbery within

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

One says one will worship Hari but never actually does so; meanwhile, a robbery is underway within the body. The messengers of death have stolen away his lifespan, beguiling him with the colors of desire.

He dislikes sacred stories and going to the temple; his attention is fixed only on spouse, wealth, and children. Who is carrying away his moments and days, one by one? Says Tuka, why are you cheating yourself?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

He says he will worship Hari, but he never does. A robbery is going on inside his own body. The messengers of death have carried off the wealth of his lifespan, while he sits charmed, careless, lost in the colors of desire. He has no taste for sacred stories or for going to the temple; his whole attention is fixed on wife, wealth, and children. Who is it that carries away his hours and his days, one by one? Tuka says: why, then, are you cheating yourself?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a man who keeps promising devotion and never begins. While he delays, his life is quietly being stolen from inside: the messengers of death carry off his days one by one while desire keeps him dazed and content. He cannot be drawn to sacred stories or the temple, because spouse, money, and children hold all his attention. Tukaram's last line turns the loss back on the man himself; no outside thief is to blame, the cheating is self-inflicted.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Sitting attentively at a discourse, sharing the joy together, it is no surprise that one is uplifted; even others are carried across by its fragrance. Take this free merit and abandon the sin of evil desire, for you will reap at last the fruit of whatever seed you sow.

Laziness spoils the discourse, and malice kills its sweetness; like a polluting passenger in a boat, one drags others down with oneself. Says Tuka, let the good remain like sandalwood; let the wicked be sent far away. This is my humble prayer to Hari.

IN PLAIN WORDS

To sit attentively at the discourse, sharing the joy with one another, it is no wonder a person is lifted up; others too are carried across by its fragrance. Take this merit, it is free. Drop the sin of evil longing. Whatever seed you sow, in the end you reap its fruit. Laziness spoils the discourse, and malice kills its sweetness; like a defiling passenger in a boat, such a one drags others down along with himself. Tuka says: let the good stay near, like sandalwood; let the wicked be sent far away. This is my humble prayer to Hari.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is praising the holy assembly and naming what protects it. Sitting in attentive, shared joy lifts the listener and even spreads to others like a fragrance, and the merit of it costs nothing; the sowing-and-reaping line warns that the seed you choose, devotion or evil desire, decides the harvest. Then he names the two things that ruin a satsang: idleness, which drains its life, and malice, which kills its sweetness, comparing the spoiler to a polluting passenger who sinks the whole boat. His prayer is not contempt for any person but a request that good company be kept close like sandalwood and corrupting company kept at a distance.

GATHA 3452 The Nature of God

Nature of God, hidden yet near

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have come to understand Your ways, O Lord; You are my sustainer. You await the moment of remembrance, biding your time for the saints' call.

When called, You come into form, yet You always remain hidden in the formless. Says Tuka, You are the traveler from afar, and here You dwell within us.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have come to see how You live, O God. You are the one who feeds and keeps me. You wait for the moment I remember You; Your power is forever, beyond time. When You are called, You come into form, yet always You hide in the formless. Tuka says: You are the traveler from a far country, and here You make Yourself my own.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is telling God, with affection, that he has finally understood God's ways. God is his sustainer, the one who keeps him, and what God waits for is simply to be remembered, biding the eternal divine power until the call comes. The paradox the poem names is that the same God takes on form when called yet always stays hidden in the formless. Tukaram ends by calling God a stranger from afar who nonetheless becomes intimately his own, near at hand.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now, O Shame, you have no business here; go away and let me remember Rama. Out of deference to you, I suffered great harm and became a slave to the wicked.

You made my own home feel foreign and deceived me with clever disguises. For the sake of one comfort, I carried burdens on my shoulders and gathered a whole crowd of troubles.

Social convention dragged me among the five senses, never allowing clarity or hope. Says Tuka, now I will weigh everything carefully, for I have made God my master and protector.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now you have no work here, O Shame. Go. Let me remember Rama. Out of deference to you I came to great harm; I was made the slave of the wicked. You made my own home feel like a stranger's, and dressed yourself up to fool me as if it were real. For the sake of one comfort I carried a burden on my shoulder, and it gathered a whole crowd of troubles. Social custom dragged me about among the five senses and never let me have clear sight, never let me hold any hope. Tuka says: now I will weigh it all on the scales, for I have made God my master and my defender.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is throwing out worldly shame, the fear of what people will think, which had kept him from openly remembering Rama. He charges that this deference cost him dearly: it enslaved him to bad company, made his true home feel foreign, and tricked him with convincing disguises. Chasing one comfort, he says, only multiplied his troubles, and social convention kept dragging him through the five senses and denying him clarity. Now that he has taken God as his master and protector, he declares he will weigh everything honestly and no longer let shame rule him.

Renunciation, expelling Maya

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Until now I was under your power, O Maya, and you tormented me all that while. Now I will not let you remain in this land, for I have found an almighty Master.

You crept in like a serpent somewhere in childhood; who knew then that you were so wicked? Says Tuka, I have drowned this worldly trade and will now flay your very knees.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Until today I lived under your rule, and all that while you mocked and tormented me. Now I will not let you stay in this country, for I have made an almighty one my master. You crept in like a snake somewhere back in my childhood. Who knew then how wicked you were? Tuka says: I have sunk this whole worldly trade, only to skin your very knees.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram addresses Maya, the deluding power of the world, as a lifelong oppressor he is finally throwing out. He confesses he lived under her authority and was tormented all the while, and that she slipped into him unnoticed in childhood, like a serpent, before he could recognize how harmful she was. The turning point is that he has now taken an almighty Lord as his master, which gives him the strength to refuse her any further foothold. His closing image is fierce and deliberate: he has deliberately ruined the whole worldly transaction, accepting that loss in order to break Maya's grip entirely.

GATHA 3455 Renunciation

Renunciation, the drum against Maya

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By God's command I beat this drum: let no one, out of false shame, give shelter to Maya. This seductress has ruined the righteous path and led the whole world down the road to death.

She has established her own rule through her attendants, and no one sees the deception in her chitta. Says Tuka, seize her and drag her to the temple; let her be exposed and then released.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By God's command I beat this drum: out of false shame, let no one give her shelter. This harlot has broken the good road and led the whole world down the path of death. Through her servants she set up her own custom, and no one sees the falseness she carries in her belly. Tuka says: seize her and drag her to the temple. Let her be shamed in public, and then let her go.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes himself a public crier announcing God's order against Maya, the deluding power. The charge is grave: she has wrecked the good path and herded all the world toward death, and through her agents she has made her own way the accepted custom, so that few even notice the deception she hides. His command to give her no shelter is aimed at the human habit of indulging delusion out of social timidity, not at any person. The remedy he calls for is exposure, dragging the deceiver into the light of the temple where her fraud is seen for what it is.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why do you not sing the pure glories of Hari and dance your way to Vaikuntha in bliss? Was it not a courtesan and a wrongful wretch like Ajamila who were carried to Vaikuntha? Countless such souls beyond counting, great sinners without measure, have been redeemed before. Out of love for his son, the wretch uttered the name Narayana.

Says Tuka, what merit could compare to that?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why will you not sing the pure praises of Hari and dance your way, full of bliss, to Vaikuntha? Did a courtesan and a sinful wretch like Ajamila not have the greater right? They too were carried to Vaikuntha. We do not know how many countless, measureless souls before them, sinners of the five great sins, beyond all counting, were saved. Out of love for his son, the wretch cried out the name Narayana. Tuka says: what deed of merit could match that?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram urges the listener to sing Hari's praises and assures them that no one is too low to be saved. He points to the well-known cases of a courtesan and of Ajamila, who called the Name and were carried to Vaikuntha, as proof that birth and past sin do not bar the door. Countless great sinners before them, he says, have been redeemed the same way. The example of Ajamila, who uttered Narayana only out of love for his son, shows that even a Name spoken almost by accident carries a merit no calculated good deed can match.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Narayana has arranged it so that we may sit and eat our fill in peace, free from all scrambling and strife. Our capital is right here at home; there is no need to spend even a word.

Says Tuka, all the struggle and crowding has come to an end.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We sit down and eat the gain in peace, the scrambling and the tug-of-war all dodged. This is what Narayana has done. The life He gives is good and full of joy. The capital is right here in our own house; not even a word has to be spent. Tuka says: all the toil and all the crowding is over now.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is celebrating the ease of the devotional life as Narayana has arranged it. Where worldly gain demands struggle and elbowing for a share, here the seeker can simply sit and partake in peace. The treasure of the Name is already at home, costing nothing, not even the spending of a word. The whole strain and press of worldly striving, he says, has come to an end.

Devotion, claiming the meal by right

मराठी मूळ

सत्ताबळें आतां मागेन भोजन । केलें तें चिंतन आजिवरी ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It is not out of fear that I have come to this place, but out of the closeness of calling upon You. Now by right I will demand my meal, for I have done my devotion until this day.

You swallowed blows for the sake of butter; who shows mercy for small matters? Says Tuka, I do not need even buttermilk at a loss, O Panduranga; do not put me off with evasions.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It is not out of fear that I have reached this place, but to be near enough to call on You. Now, by right, I will ask for my meal, for I have done my remembering up to this day. This life was eaten up for the sake of butter; who shows mercy over so small a thing? Tuka says: I do not want buttermilk handed to me short of measure. O Panduranga, that is a false dodge.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram comes before God not as a frightened petitioner but as one who has earned the right to be close, having done his devotion faithfully until now. So he claims his reward plainly, as a meal owed to him rather than a favor begged. Drawing on Krishna's love of butter, he insists he will not be fobbed off with a lesser portion or a stingy substitute. The closing line refuses any divine evasion: he asks Panduranga for the full thing, not a watered-down buttermilk given short.

Prayer, the last morsel

मराठी मूळ

सारीन तें आतां एकाचि भोजनें । वारीन मागणें वेळोवेळां ॥1॥
सेवटींच्या घासें गोड करीं माते । अगे कृपावंते पांडुरंगे ॥ध्रु.॥
वंचूं नये आतां कांहीं च प्रकार । धाकल्याचें थोर जाल्यावरी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आतां बहु चाळवावें । कांहीं नेदीं ठावें उरों मागें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now I will finish everything in one meal and put an end to begging again and again. Make the last morsel sweet, O gracious mother Panduranga.

You should not withhold anything now in any way, for the little one has grown up. Says Tuka, stop stalling now; do not let anything remain hidden.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now let me finish it all in one meal. Let me stop begging again and again. Make the last morsel sweet, O mother. O gracious Panduranga. Do not hold anything back now, in any way. The little one has grown up. Tuka says: stop putting me off now; do not let anything stay hidden from me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks for an end to the long round of asking. He has begged again and again, and now he wants one full meal that finishes the hunger for good. He calls Panduranga his mother and asks that the very last morsel be made sweet, the gift held back till now. The child is no longer small, he says, so nothing should be withheld; God has stalled long enough. It is a prayer for the whole of grace given at once, with nothing kept back.

GATHA 3460 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, fed by God's hand

मराठी मूळ

पोट धालें मग न लगे परती । जालिया निंश्चती खेळ गोड ॥1॥
आपुलिया हातें देई वो कवळ । विठ्ठल शीतळ जीवन वरी ॥ध्रु.॥
घराचा विसर होईल आनंद । नाचेन मी छंदें प्रेमाचिया ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे तों च वरी करकर । मग हें उत्तर खंडईल ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Once the belly is full, there is no need to turn back; the game becomes sweet when certainty is reached. O Mother, feed me morsels with Your own hand, and pour the cooling waters of Vitthal upon me.

In the bliss of forgetting home, I will dance in the rapture of love. Says Tuka, until then there will be clamor, but after that, all argument shall cease.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Once the belly is full there is no turning back. When certainty comes, the game turns sweet. Feed me morsels with your own hand, O mother. Pour the cool waters of Vitthal over me. I will forget my home in the joy. I will dance in the rapture of love. Tuka says: until then there is clamor; after that, all argument ends.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks to be fed by God directly, hand to mouth, and poured over with the cooling waters of Vitthal's presence. Once that fullness comes, he says, there is no going back to lack; the whole game of life turns sweet, and certainty replaces the old restlessness. In that bliss he will forget house and home and dance in love. The clamor and arguing, he says, last only until the soul is filled; after the fullness, the noise stops by itself.

GATHA 3461 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, God's mouthpiece

मराठी मूळ

बोलविसी तरी । तुझ्या येईन उत्तरीं ॥1॥
कांहीं कोड कवतिकें । हातीं द्यावया भातुकें ॥ध्रु.॥
बोलविसी तैसें । करीन सेवन सरिसें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे देवा । माझें चळण तुज सवा॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If You make me speak, I will come forth with Your answers. Grant me some little trinket as a playful gift.

Whatever You make me speak, I will faithfully carry out. Says Tuka, O Lord, my movements are at Your command.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If you make me speak, I will come out with your answers. Give some little trinket into my hand, like a treat for a child. Whatever you make me speak, I will carry out the same. Tuka says: O God, my every move is at your command.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram hands over his own words and acts to God. If God speaks through him, what comes out will be God's answer, not his own; he asks only for some small playful gift, the way a child is given a treat. Whatever he is made to say, he will also do, keeping word and act together. The closing line lays it bare: even his movements are not his own but at God's command. It is the prayer of one who wants to be an instrument and nothing more.

GATHA 3462 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the throne of the self emptied

मराठी मूळ

दिला जीवभाव । तेव्हां सांडिला म्यां ठाव ॥1॥
आतां वर्ते तुझी सत्ता । येथें सकळ अनंता ॥ध्रु.॥
माझीया मरणें । तुह्मी बैसविलें ठाणें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे काई । मी हें माझें येथें नाहीं॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When I offered my life and jiva, I gave up my own place. Now Your authority prevails here in everything, O Ananta.

Through my dying to self, You have established Your throne. Says Tuka, nothing of 'I' or 'mine' remains here any longer.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When I gave you my life and my self, I gave up my own place. Now your rule holds here, in everything, O Ananta. By my dying to myself, you have set up your seat. Tuka says: there is no 'I' and no 'mine' left here at all.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes what surrender actually cost. When he offered up his life and his sense of self, he vacated the place where the ego used to sit. Now God's authority reigns over everything in him, and he calls God Ananta, the endless one. He frames it sharply: it took his own death to self for God to take the throne within. Nothing of 'I' or 'mine' is left standing; the self has been emptied so completely that only God's rule remains.

GATHA 3463 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, seized and carried off

मराठी मूळ

एकाचिये वेठी । सांपडलों फुकासाटीं ॥1॥
घेतों काम सत्ताबळें । माझें करूनि भेंडोळें ॥ध्रु.॥
धांवे मागें मागें । जाय तिकडे चि लागे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे नेलें । माझें सर्वस्वें विठ्ठलें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I was caught in one Being's grip, seized for free. He takes work from me by the force of His authority, wrapping me entirely around Himself.

I run after Him wherever He goes, following relentlessly. Says Tuka, Vitthal has taken away my everything.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I was caught in one Being's grip, taken for nothing. He puts me to work by the force of his power, wrapping me up around himself. I run after him, behind him, wherever he goes I am stuck to him. Tuka says: Vitthal has carried off all that was mine.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes being seized by God rather than choosing him. He was caught in God's grip for free, and now God uses him by sheer authority, bundling him up and binding him close. He has no will of his own left; he simply runs after God wherever God goes, fastened to him. The signature line names the loss as a gain: Vitthal has taken away his everything, his whole separate self. To be wholly owned by God is, for Tukaram, exactly the point.

GATHA 3464 Ecstasy and Joy

Longing fulfilled, shade for the scorched

मराठी मूळ

बराडियाची आवडी पुरे । जया झुरे साटीं तें ॥1॥
तैसें जालें माझ्या मना । नुठी चरणावरूनि ॥ध्रु.॥
मागलिया पेणें पावे । विसांवे तें ठाकणीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे छाया भेटे । बरें वाटे तापे त्या ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The longing of one who cries out is fulfilled when what he pines for arrives. Just so has my mind become; it will not rise from Your feet.

The weary traveler, finding shelter, rests at the halting place. Says Tuka, shade meets the one who is scorched, and it feels so good.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The longing of one who cries out is met when what he aches for comes. So it is now with my mind. It will not rise from your feet. The tired traveler reaches shelter and rests at the halting place. Tuka says: shade meets the one who is scorched, and it feels so good.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from the moment when long ache finally arrives at its object. The one who cried out has now received what he pined for, and so his mind, having reached Vitthal's feet, will not get up from them. He gives two homely pictures of the relief: the weary traveler who at last finds the inn and lies down, and the one burnt by sun who steps into shade. The verse is about arrival, the simple physical sweetness of rest after long want.

GATHA 3465 Prayers

Prayer, the hand on the head

मराठी मूळ

आतां द्यावें अभयदान । जीवन ये कृपेचें ॥1॥
उभारोनी बाहो देवा । हात ठेवा मस्तकीं ॥ध्रु.॥
नाभी नाभी या उत्तरें । करुणाकरें सांतवीजे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे केली आस । तो हा दिस फळाचा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now grant me the gift of fearlessness, the life-giving waters of Your mercy. Raise Your arm, O Lord, and place Your hand upon my head.

Comfort me with the words 'Fear not, fear not,' O compassionate one. Says Tuka, the day of fruition has come for the hope I have nurtured.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now give me the gift of fearlessness. Give me the life-giving water of your mercy. Raise your arm, O God, and lay your hand on my head. Comfort me with the words: fear not, fear not, O merciful one. Tuka says: the hope I held has come to the day of its fruit.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks for the blessing of fearlessness, naming it as a kind of water that gives life. He pictures the gesture exactly: God's arm lifted, the hand resting on his head, the spoken words 'fear not, fear not.' This is the classic sign of a granted refuge, protection made into touch and speech. The closing line says the long hope has finally reached its ripening day. The prayer rests on the certainty that the answer is now at hand.

GATHA 3466 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the fruit of many births

मराठी मूळ

बहुजन्में सोस केला । त्याचा जाला परिणाम ॥1॥
विठ्ठलसें नाम कंठीं । आवडी पोटीं संचितें ॥ध्रु.॥
येथुन तेथवरी आतां । न लगे चिंता करावी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे धालें मन । हें चि दान शकुनाचें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

After many births of longing, the fruit has come at last. The name of Vitthal rests on my lips, and love has been stored in my chitta as destiny.

From here to the end, there is no more need for worry. Says Tuka, the mind is satisfied; this is the auspicious gift of grace.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Through many births I longed for it. Now its result has come. The name Vitthal is on my throat. Love is stored up in me as my earnings. From here to the end, there is no more need to worry. Tuka says: the mind is full; this is the gift of good fortune.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram counts the cost in lifetimes. The longing of many births has at last borne its result: the name Vitthal now rests on his tongue, and love is laid up in him like savings carried forward. Because that is secured, he says, there is nothing left to worry about from here to the very end. The mind is finally satisfied. He calls this the auspicious gift, the good fortune that crowns all the births of waiting.

GATHA 3467 Prayers

Prayer, come quickly and take my hand

मराठी मूळ

उसंतिल्या कर्मवाटा । बहु मोटा आघात ॥1॥

भागलों या खटपटे । घटपटें करितां ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कृपावंता । माझी चिंता खंडावी॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The pathways of karma have become exhausted, and the blows have been heavy. Come quickly, come quickly, and take me by the hand.

I am weary of all this struggle and turmoil. Says Tuka, O compassionate one, relieve my anxiety.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The roads of karma have worn me out. The blows have been heavy. Come quickly, come quickly; take me by the hand and lead me. I am tired of all this struggle, this scraping and toiling. Tuka says: O merciful one, cut off my worry.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram cries out from exhaustion. The long roads of action have used him up, and the blows along the way have been hard. He begs God to come fast, to take him by the hand and lead him out, because he is worn down by endless struggle and busywork. The closing line asks the compassionate one to cut his anxiety clean off. It is the plain prayer of someone at the end of his own strength, asking to be carried the rest of the way.

GATHA 3468 Longing and Separation

Longing, is God asleep

मराठी मूळ

तुह्मांसी हें अवघें ठावें । किती द्यावें स्मरण ॥1॥
कां बा तुह्मी ऐसें नेणें । निष्ठपणें टिाळत असां ॥ध्रु.॥
आळवितां मायबापा । नये कृपा अझूनि ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जगदीशा । काय असां निजेले ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You know all of this already; how many times must I remind You? Why, O Lord, do You pretend not to know and keep putting me off so stubbornly? Though I call upon You as a child calls its parents, still Your mercy does not come. Says Tuka, O Lord of the universe, are You asleep?

IN PLAIN WORDS

You already know all of this. How many times must I remind you? Why do you act as if you do not know, and keep putting me off so stubbornly? I call on you as a child calls its mother and father, and still your mercy does not come. Tuka says: Lord of the world, are you asleep?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses God with the boldness of one who is sure of the bond. God knows his whole need already, so why must he keep reminding him, and why does God pretend not to know and stall? He has cried out the way a child cries to its parents, and still no mercy comes. The verse ends with the famous challenge: are you asleep? The complaint is not contempt but the licensed protest of love that trusts enough to demand an answer.

GATHA 3469 Worldly Life

Worldly life, robbed by one's own house

मराठी मूळ

नेलें सळेंबळें । चित्तावित्ताचें गांठोळें ॥1॥
साहए जालीं घरिच्या घरीं । होतां ठायीं च कुठोरी ॥ध्रु.॥
मी पातलों या भावा । कपट तें नेणें देवा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे उघडें केलें । माझें माझ्या हातें नेलें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By force and cunning, the bundle of my mind and possessions has been taken. My own household conspired against me; the treachery was hatched right at home.

I came with innocent faith, knowing nothing of deceit, O Lord. Says Tuka, I was robbed openly, and what was mine was taken by my own hands.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By force and cunning the bundle of my mind and my wealth was carried off. My own household joined in; the plot was hatched right here at home. I came with honest faith, knowing nothing of deceit, O God. Tuka says: I was robbed in the open, and what was mine was carried off by my own hands.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram tells how a man is stripped bare by his own attachments. The bundle of his heart and his goods is taken by force and trickery, and the betrayers are not strangers but his own household, the very ties of family and possession. He came to it all in simple trust, never suspecting the deceit. The sting is in the last line: the robbery happened in broad daylight, and he handed over what was his with his own hands. The pattern to examine is how we surrender ourselves to the very things we cling to.

GATHA 3470 Autobiography

Autobiography, stripped bare and calling it good

मराठी मूळ

जाला हा डांगोरा । मुखीं लहानाचे थोरा ॥1॥
नागविलों जनाचारीं । कोणी बैसों नेदी दारी ॥ध्रु.॥
संचिताचा ठेवा। आतां आला तैसा घ्यावा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे देवें । ह्मणों केलें हें बरवें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

A proclamation has been made from every small and great mouth: I have been stripped bare by worldly convention, and no one lets me sit at their door. The treasure of destiny must now be accepted as it comes.

Says Tuka, God has done this, and let us call it good.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The cry has gone out, in every mouth, small and great. I have been stripped bare by the ways of the world; no one lets me sit at their door. The store of my destiny must now be taken just as it comes. Tuka says: God has done this, and let us call it good.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks of public disgrace. Word has spread from every mouth, high and low, that worldly custom has left him with nothing, and no one will even let him sit at their doorstep. He accepts what destiny has stored up for him exactly as it arrives, without bargaining. The turn comes in the last line: since God is the one who has done this, he chooses to call it good. The verse takes ruin and reads it as God's own work, and so as blessing.

GATHA 3471 Worldly Life

Social bondage, the trapped neck

मराठी मूळ

किती चौघाचारें । येथें गोविलीं वेव्हारें ॥1॥
असे बांधविले गळे । होऊं न सकती निराळे ॥ध्रु.॥
आपलें आपण । केलें कां नाहीं जतन ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे खंडदंडें । येरझारीं लपती लंडें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How many have been ensnared by social convention and worldly dealings? Their necks are bound, and they cannot free themselves. Why did you not guard what was your own? Says Tuka, in the tug-of-war of penalties, the cowardly hide in the back and forth.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How many are caught here, tangled in the world's dealings. Their necks are bound; they cannot break free. What was your own to guard, why did you not guard it? Tuka says: in the back and forth of penalty, the cowards hide.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks at people roped into convention and worldly transactions until their own necks are tied and they cannot get loose. The thing that was theirs to protect, their own life and freedom, they failed to keep watch over, so it was taken. He frames worldly life as a debt that keeps collecting, a tug of penalties paid back and forth. The cowardly do not face it; they hide at the back of the line rather than break the rope. The poem asks the listener to notice the binding and to ask why he let it happen.

GATHA 3472 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, cling to Panduranga

मराठी मूळ

पांडुरंगा ऐसा सांडुनि वेव्हारा । आणिकांची करा आस वांयां ॥1॥
बहुतांसी दिला उद्धार उदारें । निवडीना खरें खोटें कांहीं ॥ध्रु.॥
याचिया अंकिता वैकुंठ बंदर । आणीक वेव्हार चालितना ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे माझे हातींचें वजन । यासी बोल कोण ठेवूं सके ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Abandon all other dealings and cling to Panduranga; all other hopes are vain. He has generously given deliverance to many, without distinguishing between the true and the false.

Under His seal, Vaikuntha's port is open, and no other commerce runs. Says Tuka, the weight in my hand is His endorsement; who can question it?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Drop every other dealing; hold to Panduranga. Every other hope is wasted. He has freely lifted many, not sorting the true from the false. Under his seal the port of Vaikuntha is open, and no other trade runs there. Tuka says: the weight in my hand is his own mark. Who can find fault with it?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram urges the listener to abandon all other ventures and attach himself to Panduranga alone, since every other hope comes to nothing. He points to God's generosity: many have been delivered without God first weighing whether they were genuine or counterfeit. He uses the image of a port and a merchant's seal: only under God's stamp does the harbor of Vaikuntha open, and no rival commerce is allowed there. His closing claim is bold: what he holds carries God's own endorsement, so no one has the standing to question it.

GATHA 3473 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, the trusted storekeeper

मराठी मूळ

ठेवूनि इमान राहिलों चरणीं । ह्मणउनि धणी कृपा करी ॥1॥
आह्मांसी भांडार करणें जतन । आलें गेलें कोण उंच निंच ॥ध्रु.॥
करूनि सांभाळीं राहिला निराळा । एक एक वेळा आज्ञा केली ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे योग्यायोग्य विनीत । देवा नाहीं चित्त येथें देणें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have placed my trust at Your feet, and so the Master shows me grace. My duty is to keep guard over the storehouse, without judging who comes and goes as high or low.

Having entrusted all to my care, He remains apart, having given His command once for all. Says Tuka, God does not trouble Himself with the details of what is fit or unfit; that devotion is left to the humble servant.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have laid my trust at his feet, and so the Master shows me grace. My work is to guard the storehouse; who comes and who goes, high or low, is not mine to judge. He handed it all to my keeping and stayed apart, giving his order once and for all. Tuka says: God does not bother with what is fit or unfit; that care he leaves to his humble servant.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes surrender as a job given to him by God. Because he has placed his trust at God's feet, the Master shows him grace and makes him the keeper of the storehouse. His only duty is to guard it and to receive all who come without ranking them high or low. God, having entrusted everything to him, withdraws and gives his command just once, leaving the servant to carry it out. The point is that the work of sorting the worthy from the unworthy is not God's concern; God simply hands over the keeping, and the devotee receives all without judgment.

GATHA 3474 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the body filled with Brahman

मराठी मूळ

आतां नव्हे गोड कांहीं करितां संसार । आणीक संचार जाला माजी ॥1॥
ब्रह्मरसें गेलें भरूनियां अंग । आधील तो रंग पालटला ॥ध्रु.॥
रसनेचिये रुची कंठीं नारायण । बैसोनियां मन निवविलें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आतां बैसलों ठाकणीं । इच्छेची ते धणी पुरईल ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Worldly life no longer tastes sweet, for a new presence has entered within. The whole body has been flooded with the essence of Brahman, and the old colors have changed.

On the tongue rests the taste of Narayana, and by sitting down in the Name, the mind has been soothed. Says Tuka, I have now settled in my resting place; the fulfillment of all desire will follow.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now worldly life tastes sweet no more, doing what I do. Something else has come to live inside me. The essence of Brahman has filled my body; the old color has changed. On my tongue is the taste of Narayana; my mind has sat down and grown still. Tuka says: now I have settled in my place. The fullness of every desire will come.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reports a change that has already happened inside him. Worldly life has lost its sweetness because a new presence has moved in and taken its place. He describes it physically: the essence of Brahman has flooded his body and changed its former color, and the taste of Narayana sits on his tongue. With this, his restless mind has finally sat down and cooled. He ends in quiet confidence: settled now in his true resting place, he trusts that the fulfillment of all longing will follow on its own.

GATHA 3475 Longing and Separation

Longing, come quickly

मराठी मूळ

आतां काशासाटीं दुरी । अंतर उरी राखिली ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why now keep distance and hold back the chitta? Come quickly and settle this at the root, making the small into the least of concerns. On both sides there is restless longing; only Your vision will bring certainty.

Says Tuka, let there be haste, for such is the eagerness of my jiva.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why now keep your distance? Why hold a gap between us? Come quickly to the root; let the small things be the least of it. On both sides there is restless longing. Only your sight will settle it. Tuka says: let there be haste. Such is the eagerness in my soul.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is impatient for God and cannot understand why any distance is still kept between them. He begs God to come straight to the root of the matter and let the small concerns shrink to nothing. He claims the longing runs both ways, that both sides ache, and that only the actual sight of God will bring certainty and rest. The poem closes on urgency: he names the eagerness in his own soul and asks God to hurry. It is the prayer of a lover who wants the waiting to end now.

GATHA 3476 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, remember death

मराठी मूळ

पडिली हे रूढि जगा परिचार । चालविती वेव्हार सत्य ह्मूण ॥1॥
मरणाची कां रे नाहीं आठवण । संचिताचा धन लोभ हेवा ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे कांहीं उघडा रे डोळे । जाणोनि अंधळे होऊं नका ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The world runs on custom and carries out its dealings as though they were truth. Why do you have no remembrance of death, hoarding wealth in greed and envy? The fear of the body is but a plaything of time, which has devoured and set it aside.

Says Tuka, open your eyes at least; do not knowingly make yourselves blind.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The world has fallen into custom and habit, and runs its dealings as if they were true. Why is there no thought of death in you, while you hoard wealth in greed and envy? The body's fear is only a plaything of time, which has already swallowed it and set it aside. Tuka says: at least open your eyes. Do not knowingly make yourselves blind.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram attacks the way people live on habit, treating worldly transactions as if they were ultimate truth. His sharp question is why they keep no memory of death while they pile up wealth out of greed and envy. He reminds them that the body, and the fear of losing it, is only a toy of time, which has already consumed it and put it aside. The closing plea is for honesty about all this: open your eyes at least, and stop choosing blindness on purpose. The verse points at willful self-deception, not at any one person.

GATHA 3477 Social Criticism

Social criticism, chasing empty juice

मराठी मूळ

जेथें पाहें तेथें कांडिती भूस । चिपाडें चोखूनि पाहाती रस ॥1॥
काय सांगों देवा भुलले जीव । बहु यांची येतसे कींव ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे कां उगे चि खोल । जवळी दाखवी आपणां बोल ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Wherever I look, people are winnowing chaff, chewing on sugarcane rinds, and searching for juice that is not there. What can I say, O Lord? These deluded jivas fill me with pity.

The burden they carry by force is nothing but hollow puffery; having gone to a wealthy house, they still beg for scraps. Says Tuka, why dig an empty well? Show yourself the truth that is right beside you.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Wherever I look, people are pounding chaff and chewing dry rinds, hunting for juice that is not there. What can I say, God? These souls are deluded; great pity comes for them. The forced bundle is only hollow, all puff. They reach a rich house and still beg for scraps. Tuka says: why keep digging an empty well? Show yourself the truth that is right beside you.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram surveys the people around him and sees them working at things that yield nothing: threshing husks, chewing spent sugarcane, squeezing for juice that has already been pressed out. He turns to God with pity rather than scorn, calling these souls deluded. His images sharpen the waste: the load they carry is hollow puff, and even standing at a wealthy house they go on begging for scraps instead of receiving the wealth. The closing line points the rebuke inward, asking why anyone keeps digging a dry well when the real thing is right beside him, waiting to be seen. The target is the pattern of misplaced effort, not contempt for the person.

GATHA 3478 Social Criticism

Social criticism, the self-important talker

मराठी मूळ

जाणिवेच्या भारें चेंपला उर । सदा बुरबुर सरे चि ना ॥1॥
किती याचें ऐकों कानीं । मारिलें घाणीं नाळकरी ॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Weighed down by the burden of self-importance, his chest is crushed, and the endless grumbling never ceases. How long shall I endure hearing this in my ears? He is like an ox yoked to a grinding mill.

His words without salt are flat and tasteless, dry and hollow, grating to hear. Says Tuka, the fool does not recognize what is good for him, no matter how much he is shown.

IN PLAIN WORDS

His chest is crushed under the weight of his own cleverness, and the grumbling in him never stops. How long must I hear this in my ears? He is like an ox yoked to the grinding mill. His words have no salt, flat and tasteless, dry and hollow, grating to hear. Tuka says: the fool cannot see his own good. How many times can I expose him?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a man so loaded with self-importance that it presses on his own chest, and from him comes an endless low grumbling. He compares him to an ox bound to a grinding mill, going round and round without rest or gain. The man's speech is unsalted, flat and dry, painful to listen to, all noise and no substance. The frustration in the closing line is that such a fool cannot recognize what would actually help him, no matter how often the truth is laid bare. The poem aims at the pattern of vain, deaf self-regard, which is also a warning to look for it in oneself.

GATHA 3479 The Saints

Saints, the feet of the holy

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When pride has departed through sincere repentance, one should not forget the words of the ancients. May their feet touch my forehead; blessed is the time when one partakes of their sacred leavings.

Those who have kicked away the six afflictions should quickly come and surrender to the saints. Says Tuka, such souls are swiftly transformed; they become pure within that very instant.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When pride has gone through true repentance, do not forget the words of the ancients. Let their feet touch my forehead; blessed is the hour when I eat their sacred leavings. Those who have kicked away the six urges, let them quickly come and surrender to these saints. Tuka says: such souls turn back fast; in that very place, within, they are made pure.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the turning that begins when pride dies through honest repentance, and urges the seeker not to forget the words handed down by the ancients. He longs to set the saints' feet on his forehead and counts it a blessing to receive even their leftovers, the sacred remains of what they have touched. To those who have struck down the six inner urges he gives a direct instruction: come quickly and surrender to the saints. His promise is that such people are transformed swiftly, made pure inwardly on the spot, in the very moment of surrender.

GATHA 3480 Worldly Metaphors

Metaphor, the seed tested by fire

मराठी मूळ

खोल ओले पडे तें पीक उत्तम । उथळाचा श्रम वांयां जाय ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Seed sown deep in moist soil yields the finest crop, while the shallow sower's labor is wasted. We are not hoarders of falsehood; the genuine one fills his lap with what is truly earned.

Some want a grand display in this world, driven by hypocrisy and the desire to fill the belly. Says Tuka, only that which survives the test of fire is accepted here as pure gold.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Seed sown deep in wet soil gives the finest crop; the shallow sower's labor is wasted. We are not dealers in falsehood; the true man fills his own lap with what he has really earned. Some want a grand spread in this world, driven by show and the need to fill the belly. Tuka says: only what comes through the fire passes here, pure by its very nature.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram uses farming and metal-testing to mark the difference between real and false devotion. Seed planted deep in moist ground yields a fine crop, while shallow sowing wastes the effort, just as superficial practice bears nothing. He sets himself apart from those who trade in falsehood: the genuine person gathers into his own lap only what he has actually earned. Against this he places the people who crave a grand display, moved by hypocrisy and the simple need to fill their stomachs. The closing test is hard and clear: only what survives the fire counts here, accepted as pure by its own true nature.

GATHA 3481 The Moral Ideal

Moral ideal, the love of truth

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे मज सत्याचि आवडी । करितां तांतडी येत नाहीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

From a fine seed come fine fruits; what is within is the same as what shows without. With the contentment of one's true nature, the mind finds rest and never again turns back.

The genuine never suffers loss when tested; the counterfeit is easily cast aside. Says Tuka, I love only what is true; no amount of urgency changes that.

IN PLAIN WORDS

A good seed gives good fruit; what is inside is the same as what shows outside. In the contentment of its own nature the mind finds rest and does not turn back again. The true thing suffers no loss when it is tested; the false is easily set aside. Tuka says: I love only what is true. No hurry of mine can make it come faster.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram states a moral law in the plainest terms: a good seed yields good fruit, and in the genuine person the inside matches the outside exactly. When a being rests in the contentment of its own true nature, the mind finds peace and never turns back to the old ways. He repeats the test of authenticity: the true thing loses nothing under examination, while the counterfeit falls away on its own. The closing confession is patient: he loves only what is true, and no amount of his own hurrying can force truth to arrive before its time. The verse holds integrity above haste.

GATHA 3482 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the mind turned bard

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The mind has become a bard, proclaiming glory with great thundering voice. This path was found and trodden by its own natural movement.

It sings the deeds of God, ever new and ever present, shaping Him as the chitta desires. One stands directly before the Lord, carrying on the work front and behind, offering service as living proof.

A great flood has come pouring forth with the hand of joyful blessing; with its own voice, the Master adorns Tuka.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My mind has become a bard, the glory thundering from its mouth. The path was laid open, and it walks there by its own nature. It sings the deeds of God, ever new, ever present, shaping him just as it loves. Stand right before him; the work goes on, front and back, answering, proving the service true. A flood has rained down with the hand of joyful blessing. With words from his own being, the Master adorns Tuka.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram pictures his own mind turned into a bard, a praise-singer whose mouth thunders with God's glory. The road of praise has opened in front of it and it walks there naturally, singing God's deeds as ever new and ever present, free to shape him in whatever form it loves. He describes the posture of service: standing directly before the Lord, carrying the work front and back, answering and proving the devotion to be real. The close turns to abundance and reversal: a flood of grace pours down from the hand of joyful blessing, and in the end it is the Master who adorns Tuka with words drawn from his own being. The singer is finally the one sung over and decorated by God.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I was distant before out of my own doubt; I did not know the fundamental truth. Now, wherever You go, I will follow; I will not let You hide so completely.

False attachment caused me needless delay, and that is how this distance arose. Says Tuka, why do You show Yourself as separate? This hiding game brings only pointless fatigue.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I stayed far away before, out of my own doubt. I did not know the root truth. Now, wherever you go, I will follow. I will not leave you room enough to hide. False attachment made me late, and that is how this distance came. Tuka says: why do you show yourself as separate from me? This hiding game is only pointless tiredness.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks to God as one player calls out the other in a game of hide-and-seek that is over. He admits the distance was his own: doubt held him back, and false attachment delayed him, so he did not know that he and God share one root. Now he refuses to let God keep his distance, vowing to follow everywhere and leave no hiding place. The harsh line turns the complaint back on the seeming separation itself: if there is no real difference, the hiding is only wasted effort, fatigue for nothing.

GATHA 3484 The Nature of God

Nature of God, the divine sleight of hand

मराठी मूळ

करिसी लाघवें । तूं हें खेळसी आघवें ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You perform all this sleight of hand, playing this game in full. You have placed ego as a barrier, deluding both us and the world.

Come as You truly are; know also that we see through the hiding. Says Tuka, O Lord, how long will You keep up this charade?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You do all this sleight of hand. You play this whole game. You set up ego as a wall, and it trips up us and the whole world. Come as you really are. Know that we see through your hiding too. Tuka says: O Lord, O Shripati, how long will you keep fooling us?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram accuses God of running the whole illusion: the world is a game of trickery, and ego is the barrier God himself sets up to keep the soul and the world deluded. Having named the trick, Tukaram says he is no longer fooled by it; he can see through the hiding and asks God to drop the disguise and come as he truly is. The closing question to Shripati is half complaint, half intimacy: how long will this charade go on? It treats the veil of Maya as something God is responsible for and can lift the moment the devotee stops being deceived.

GATHA 3485 Faith and Trust

Faith, the words are not mine

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Faith itself is God, and so I have held fast to devotion. He who upholds the earth makes my tongue speak.

The words I compose are not the products of mere intellect. I have not labored for the sake of pride or pretense.

Some blessed soul will recognize what is worthy. Says Tuka, the original spring is pure and true from its very source.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Faith itself is God. So I have held to that trust. The one who holds up the earth makes my tongue speak. These words I put together are not answers from my own mind. I have not strained for honor or for show. Some blessed soul will know what is worth keeping. Tuka says: the spring is pure and true right from its source.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes two claims about his own poetry: that faith is not a step toward God but is God, and that his verses do not come from his intellect. The same power that upholds the earth is what moves his tongue, so the words are given, not composed for pride or display. He does not expect everyone to receive them; only a blessed soul will recognize what is worthy in them. The closing image of the spring says the source is what matters: water that is pure at the wellhead is pure all the way down, and so is speech that rises from God rather than from ego.

GATHA 3486 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the cherished child of the house

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I have become the sole beloved child of a noble lineage, both eldest and youngest before You, O Lord. Therefore nothing of neglect can come my way; sweet words and gifts are all I receive.

Nothing has been withheld or separated; I have been steadied by the original root. I have been adorned with Your own ornaments and every form of decoration.

This immeasurable treasury cannot be exhausted; there is no end or limit to its wealth. Says Tuka, I sing of my love, and so I display the abundance that has been given.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I have become the one cherished child of a noble line, both the eldest and the youngest before you, O God. So nothing is ever denied me; sweet words and treats are all I get. Nothing has been held back or kept apart from me. I am settled now in the root of all roots. You have dressed me in your own ornaments, every jewel and adornment. This great treasury never runs out however much you draw from it; there is no end or limit to its wealth. Tuka says: I sing of my love, and so I show off the abundance I have been given.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the soul as the favorite child in God's household, doted on as both eldest and youngest, so that nothing is ever refused and only kindness comes its way. He says nothing has been withheld and he is settled in the original root, the source from which everything comes. The image of being dressed in God's own ornaments says the devotee is adorned not with his own merits but with what God lends him. The treasury that never empties is divine grace itself, inexhaustible no matter how much is drawn; his singing of love is simply showing off this unearned abundance.

GATHA 3487 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, dying to self in one stroke

मराठी मूळ

एका वेळे केलें रितें कलिवर । आंत दिली थार पांडुरंगा ॥1॥
पाळण पोषण लागलें ते सोई । देहाचें तें काई सर्वभावें ॥ध्रु.॥
माझिया मरणें जाली हे वसति । लागली ते ज्योती अविनाश ॥2॥
जाला ऐसा एका घायें येथें नाहीं । तुका ह्मणे कांहीं बोलों नये ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In one stroke I emptied this body and gave its dwelling to Panduranga. All care and nourishment now follow His way; the body is no longer mine.

By my dying to self, this abode was prepared and the imperishable flame was lit. Says Tuka, such a single decisive blow has never been struck before; nothing more need be said.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In one stroke I emptied this body and gave the space inside to Panduranga. All its care and feeding now follow his way; the body is no longer mine in any sense. By my own dying, this dwelling was made ready, and an undying flame was lit there. Such a thing, done with a single blow, has not happened here before. Tuka says: nothing more need be said.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes total surrender as a single decisive act: he emptied himself out and handed the inner space of the body over to Panduranga as a dwelling. From then on the body is no longer his concern; its care belongs to God. The death he means is the death of self-will, and only that dying prepares the place where an imperishable flame, the divine presence, can be lit. He claims this is rare, a thing done in one clean blow rather than by slow effort, and then refuses to explain further: before such a fact, words run out.

GATHA 3488 Autobiography

Autobiography, devotion deepens under blows

मराठी मूळ

पावतों ताडन । तरी हें मोकलितों जन ॥1॥

होती अप्रतिष्ठा । हो तों वरपडा कष्टा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे मान । होतां उत्तम खंडन ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When I suffer blows and abuse, I let go of the world. Then, in my sorrow, I remember God and address Him with calm and measured words.

When I am dishonored and beset by hardship, that is when devotion deepens. Says Tuka, when honor and pride are broken, the highest good emerges.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the blows fall, I let go of people. Then, in my pain, I remember God and speak to him with calm, slow words. When I am dishonored and worn down by hardship, that is when devotion grows. Tuka says: when honor and pride are broken, the highest good comes.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reports from his own life that suffering is what turns him toward God. When he is beaten down and the world abuses him, he stops clinging to people and instead remembers God, speaking to him calmly out of his sorrow. He names the surprising pattern: dishonor and hardship are not obstacles to devotion but the very conditions in which it deepens. The closing line states the principle plainly, pointed at the seeker's own pride rather than at any tormentor: when honor and self-importance are broken, the highest good is what emerges.

GATHA 3489 Faith and Trust

Faith, hold fear lest his feet slip away

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Fear must be held close, lest the feet of God slip away. If the bond with God is severed, what use is living on? Whom should I regard as a stranger when everyone is like myself? Says Tuka, let this life endure, or let it perish now; it matters not.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Fear is the thing to hold on to, or his feet will slip away from me. If the bond with God is cut, what is the use of living on? Whom shall I count as a stranger, when everyone is like myself? Tuka says: let this life last, or let it be destroyed now; it is all the same.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram says the one fear worth keeping is the fear of losing God: a healthy dread that he might let the divine feet slip from his grasp. If that bond were ever severed, living on would be pointless. From that single attachment flows a wide one: he can no longer treat anyone as a stranger, because he sees all beings as himself. The closing line shows how light life itself has become; with God held fast, whether the body endures or perishes now is a matter of indifference.

GATHA 3490 The Saints

Saints, the company that speaks as one

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Those who were once distant have become our companions. They come at the sound of our call; two unite and speak as one.

Their speech is not entangled in other matters or worldly replies. Says Tuka, they look to Vitthal for the true sign in every word.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Those who were once far off have become our companions. They come the moment they hear the call; two of them meet and speak as one. Their speech is not tangled up in other things or in worldly replies. Tuka says: they look to Vitthal for the true sign in every word.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the fellowship of the saints, the company of devotees who were once distant strangers and have become close. They answer the call at once, and when two of them meet they are so of one heart that they speak with a single voice. Their talk is not caught up in worldly matters or idle replies; it stays clear. The closing line gives the reason for their unity: they measure every word against Vitthal, looking for his sign, so it is God himself, not agreement among themselves, that makes them one.

GATHA 3491 Ecstasy and Joy

Ecstasy, the spring of bliss in flood

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The fountainhead of bliss has blossomed, and the spring of joy flows abundantly. Such is the art of the Lord; who can match His power? Those who are marked as His own will surely be brought to their destination.

Says Tuka, He has given this radiant, unblemished gift.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Bliss has found its resting place; the spring of joy has burst into flower. Such is the Lord's art; who can match his power? Those marked as his own will surely be brought to their home. Tuka says: he has given this radiant, unbroken light.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is in a state of overflowing joy and traces it back to its source. The spring of bliss has blossomed and is flooding out, and he says this is the Lord's own art, a power no one can rival or even measure. The flood is not random: those who bear God's mark, who belong to him, will certainly be carried all the way to their true home. The closing line names the gift directly: a radiant, unblemished light that God has given, complete and unbroken.

GATHA 3492 True Worship

True worship, without Rama all work is false

मराठी मूळ

काहे लकडा घांस कटावे । खोद हि जुमीन मठ बनावे ॥1॥
देवलवासी तरवरछाया । घरघर माई खपरिबसमाया॥ध्रु.॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why do you chop wood and cut grass? Why do you dig the earth and build monasteries? Temples offer only the shade of a tree, while in every home there is Maya, death, and ashes. Why not cast off this burden of wandering and toil? The sorrow of Maya will dissolve from your body.

Says Tuka, listen, O seekers: without Rama, everything else is a false occupation.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why chop wood and cut grass? Why dig the earth and build monasteries? Temples give you only the shade of a tree, while in every house there is Maya, death, and ashes. Why not throw off this load of wandering and toil? Then the sorrow of Maya will leave your body. Tuka says: listen, O accomplished ones, without Rama every other business is false.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram challenges religious busyness, the labor of cutting wood and grass, digging, and raising monasteries, as missing the point. A temple gives no more than a tree's shade, and Maya, death, and ashes are waiting in every home, so outward works do not touch the real trouble. He urges the seeker to drop the whole burden of wandering and toil, promising that the grief Maya causes will then dissolve. The closing line aims squarely at the self-satisfied adept: address those who think themselves accomplished and tell them that any occupation without Rama, the Name, is a false business, however holy it looks.

GATHA 3493 The Power of the Name

The Name, pleading with Narayana

मराठी मूळ

आणीक पाखांडें असती उदंडें । तळमिळती पिंडें आपुलिया ॥1॥

तुका ह्मणे किती भाकावी करुणा । कोप नारायणा येइल तुह्मां ॥4॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

There are many other sects and doctrines in abundance, each tormented in its own body. I have no faith in their words; I have bound myself to Your Name alone.

With a firm and single mind, I have committed this life to You; the responsibility for everything now rests with You. Do not let the lowly beasts that belong to You suffer; do what is fitting.

Says Tuka, how much more must I plead for mercy? Will You not grow angry with Yourself, O Narayana?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

There are countless other sects and false paths; each one writhes in its own body. I put no trust in their words. I have bound my waistcloth tight to your Name alone. With one firm mind I have given this life to you; now the shame of everything is yours, not mine. Do not let the helpless beasts who belong to you suffer; do whatever is fitting. Tuka says: how long must I keep begging for mercy? Will you not feel ashamed, O Narayana, that you stay angry with your own?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram sets his single refuge against a crowd of rival sects and doctrines, which he sees as tormented and untrustworthy, and declares he has tied himself wholly to God's Name. Having handed his whole life over with one undivided mind, he argues that the responsibility, the very honor of the matter, has passed to God; if the devotee fails, the disgrace is now God's. He calls the devotees lowly beasts who belong to God and asks their owner not to let them suffer. The closing lines push the plea to its sharpest point, almost daring Narayana: how long must mercy be begged for, and is it not God himself who should be ashamed to keep his own creatures waiting?

GATHA 3494 Renunciation

Renunciation, begging to be free of people

मराठी मूळ

व्हावया भिकारी हें आह्मां कारण । अंतरोनि जन जावें दुरी ॥1॥
संबंध तुटावा शब्दाचा ही स्पर्श । ह्मणऊनि आस मोकलिली ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे दुःखें उबगला जीव । ह्मणऊनी कीव भाकीं देवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The reason I would become a beggar is this: to move far from the world of people. Even the touch of their words should be severed, and so I have released all expectations.

Says Tuka, my jiva is weary of suffering, and therefore I plead for mercy, O God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The reason I would become a beggar is this: so that people will keep their distance from me. Even the touch of their words should be cut off, and so I have let go of every hope. Tuka says: my jiva is weary of suffering, and so I beg you for pity, O God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram explains why he would choose the beggar's life: not for alms but for distance, so that people will keep away and he can be left alone with God. He wants the contact severed down to the very touch of their speech, and to that end he has released every worldly expectation. The plainness here is the point: this is not a pose of holiness but exhaustion. The closing line lays it bare, that his soul is worn out with suffering, and so renunciation arrives less as triumph than as a tired cry to God for mercy.

GATHA 3495 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, seek your good first

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Put aside these dry, empty conversations and attend to your true welfare first. When the right path is blocked, the traveler stalls; then see where the real loss lies.

The grand display of worldly appearances will come in the way, and then the restless coming and going will bring only sorrow. Says Tuka, ornament only causes scratching; without being tested in fire, nothing proves genuine.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Put these dry, empty talks aside. Get up at once and tend to your true good first. When the road is blocked, the traveler stalls. Then look, and see where the real loss lies. The wide show of worldly things will get in your way. After that, the restless coming and going gives you only sorrow. Tuka says: ornaments only cause scratching; until it is tested in the fire, nothing proves true.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is calling for urgency about the one thing that matters. He tells you to drop idle, empty conversation and attend first to your real welfare, because the longer you delay, the more the road of your life stays blocked and you stall. He warns that the spread of worldly appearances will get in the way and leave you with the weariness of endless coming and going. The closing image makes the stakes plain: ornament merely scratches, and gold is known to be genuine only when it has passed through fire. So too a life: it is proved true only when it has been tested, not by its outer show.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The fool does not understand; he is all sighs and pleading on the surface. Do not burn my vessels; the fear within and the sighs on the lips tell the truth.

When death arrives, what use then is brute strength? He accumulates deeds that lead him to hell after death. The thought of serving others does not occur to him at all.

Says Tuka, let me not encounter such a one ever again.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The fool does not know this. On the surface he is all sighs and pleading. Do not burn my vessels, he says; the fear inside and the sighs on his lips tell the truth. When death arrives, what use is brute strength then? He piles up the deeds that send him to hell after he dies. The thought of helping others never comes to him. Tuka says: let me never meet such a one again.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram draws a portrait of the person who lives without preparing for death, and names what is wrong with that pattern. Such a one is loud with surface sighs and pleading, while inside there is real fear; he clings to his possessions and is unwilling to part with anything. When death actually comes, no amount of force will help, yet all he has stored up is the kind of action that leads downward, never a thought of serving others. The point is self-examination: it asks each of us not to be the one who hoards and pleads but never turns toward true good or toward kindness.

GATHA 3497 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, mind resting at the feet

मराठी मूळ

करूनी चिंतन खेळों भोवतालें । चित्त येथें आलें पायांपाशीं ॥1॥
येथें नाहीं खोटा चालत परिहार । जाणसी अंतर पांडुरंगा ॥ध्रु.॥
सुखदुःखें तुज देऊनी सकळ । नाहीं ऐसा काळ केला आह्मी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे जाला देहाचा विसर । नाहीं आतां पर आप दोन्ही ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

While performing devotion, I play all around, yet my mind has come to rest at Your feet. No false excuse works here, for You see the chitta, O Panduranga.

Having surrendered all joys and sorrows to You, I have not kept any moment separate. Says Tuka, the body has been forgotten; there is no longer self or other.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I do my devotion, and I play all around. Yet my mind has come and settled at Your feet. No false excuse works here. You see the inside, Panduranga. I have given You all my joys and sorrows. I have kept no moment back for myself. Tuka says: the body has been forgotten. Now there is no other and no self, neither of the two.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a surrender that has gone all the way through. He may move and play about in the world, but his attention has come to rest at Panduranga's feet and stays there. He knows no pretense can pass, because the Lord sees the heart, so he hands over every joy and sorrow and keeps nothing private for himself. The result he names is the loss of body-consciousness and the dissolving of the line between self and other: when all is given, the very division between me and You falls away.

GATHA 3498 The Nature of God

Nature of God, each thing keeps its kind

मराठी मूळ

काळा च सारिखीं वाहाती क्षेत्रें । करितां दुसरें फळ नाहीं ॥1॥
ऐसें करत्यानें ठेविलें करून । भरिलें भरून माप नेमें॥ध्रु.॥
शीतउष्णकाळीं मेघ वरुषावे । वरुषतां वाव होय शीण॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे विष अमृताचे किडे । पालट न घडे जीणें तया ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Fields produce according to their season, and forcing a second crop yields no result. The Creator has arranged it so, filling each measure with its due allotment.

Clouds rain in their own season; rain at the wrong time brings only weariness. Says Tuka, the worms of poison and nectar alike cannot change their nature.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Fields bear according to their season. Force a second crop and there is no fruit. The Maker has set it up this way. Each measure is filled full, by His rule. Clouds rain in their own time. Rain at the wrong time only brings weariness. Tuka says: the worm of poison and the worm of nectar cannot change what they are.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram is pointing to an order that the Creator has fixed into things, and to the futility of fighting it. A field yields in its own season and not on demand; rain comes in its time, and rain out of season is wasted toil. Each thing has been given its own measure and its own nature, full and exact. The closing image is the sharpest: a creature born of poison and one born of nectar each lives by its own kind and cannot trade natures. So the abhanga asks for acceptance of God's appointed order rather than the strain of forcing what is not yours to force.

GATHA 3499 The Necessity of Experience

Experience, build once on God

मराठी मूळ

बोलणें तें आह्मी बोलों उपयोगीं । पडिलें प्रसंगी काळाऐसें ॥1॥
जयामध्यें देव आदि मध्यें अंतीं । खोल पाया भिंती न खचेसी ॥ध्रु.॥
करणें तें आह्मी करूं एका वेळे । पुढिलिया बळें वाढी खुंटे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे असों आज्ञोचीं धारकें । ह्मणऊनि एकें घायें सारूं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

We speak only words that serve a purpose, fitting the occasion as it demands. When God is present at the beginning, middle, and end, the foundation and walls of one's work stand firm.

What we build, we build once and for all; subsequent additions only weaken it. Says Tuka, we are bearers of the Lord's command, and so we finish the job in a single stroke.

IN PLAIN WORDS

We speak only words that serve. They fit the moment as it comes. When God is there at the start, the middle, and the end, the deep foundation and the walls do not give way. What we do, we do at one stroke. Adding to it later only weakens it. Tuka says: we are bearers of the Lord's command. So we finish it with a single blow.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from settled experience about how work that lasts is done. His words are not idle; he says only what serves the occasion. The test of any work is whether God is present at its beginning, middle, and end, for only then do the foundation and walls hold firm. He insists on doing the thing decisively, all at once, because what is patched on afterward only weakens the whole. The ground of that decisiveness is given in the close: he acts as a bearer of the Lord's command, and so he can finish in a single stroke.

GATHA 3500 Longing and Separation

Longing, holding the Name at the throat

मराठी मूळ

तुझिया विनोदें आह्मांसी मरण । सोसियेला सीण बहु फेरे ॥1॥
आतां आपणें चि येसी तें करीन । नाम हें धरीन तुझें कंठीं ॥ध्रु.॥
वियोगें चि आलों उसंतीत वनें । संकल्प हे मनें वाहोनियां ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे वर्म सांपडलें सोपें । गोवियेलों पापें पुण्यें होतों ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By Your playfulness I have endured death, suffering through many rounds of birth. Now I will do what it takes on my own; I will hold Your name at my throat.

Wandering through forests of separation, I carried these longings in my mind. Says Tuka, the secret turned out to be simple: I was entangled by both sin and merit.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By Your play I have met death. I have borne the strain through many rounds of birth. Now I will do for myself what must be done. I will hold Your name at my throat. Through separation I came wandering into empty forests. I carried these longings in my mind. Tuka says: the secret turned out to be simple. I was tangled up by sin and merit both.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks back over a long ordeal of birth and death and resolves to take hold of the one remedy. He charges that the Lord's play has cost him death many times over, and he decides he will now do his own part: keep the divine Name always at his throat. The separation drove him to wander as if through empty forests, carrying his longing. The simple secret he finally found is that both sin and merit had bound him; even good karma is a tie, and only the Name, not the ledger of deeds, sets him free.

Tukaram Gatha

तुकाराम गाथा

Original Marathi with English translation, a plain-language reading, and an explanation of what each abhanga means

Volume 8: Gatha 3501-4000 - 494 abhangas

About This Edition

This reading edition brings together four layers for every abhanga: the original Marathi, an English translation, a rendering in plain words, and a short explanation of its meaning.

The English layers are devotional reading aids. No translation can fully carry Tukaram's Marathi music, wordplay, cultural setting, or spiritual force. Readers are encouraged to return to the original and to consult Marathi teachers and established scholarly editions.

Marathi source: Tukaram Gatha on Marathi Wikisource. The source dataset identifies the Marathi text as public domain. English reading layers are from the Ananta Satsang online edition.

Editorial note: We ask forgiveness for any inaccuracies in rendering Tukaram Maharaj's original Marathi.

GATHA 3501 Prayers

Prayer, take me out of the trade

मराठी मूळ

पाठीलागा काळ येतसे या लागें । मी माझें वाउगें मेंढीऐसें ॥1॥
आतां अगी लागो ऐसिया वेव्हारा । तूं माझा सोइरा पांडुरंगा ॥ध्रु.॥
वागविला माथां नसतां चि भार । नव्हे तें साचार जाणील तों ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे केलें जवळील दुरी । मृगजळ वरी आड आलें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Death pursues me on this path, and I, with my meaningless 'I' and 'mine,' am helpless as a sheep. Now let fire consume such worldly trade; You are my only kinsman, O Panduranga.

I was carrying a needless burden on my head; by the time I recognized what was unreal, it was almost too late. Says Tuka, what was near was made distant by the mirage that came in between.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Death runs behind me on this road. With my useless I and mine, I am helpless as a sheep. Now let fire fall on such dealings. You are my kinsman, Panduranga. I carried a load on my head that was never mine. By the time I saw it was unreal, it was almost too late. Tuka says: what was near was made far. A mirage came and stood in the way.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram prays from the felt nearness of death and the helplessness of a self built on I and mine. He compares himself to a sheep, defenseless, and asks that the whole worldly trade be burned up, taking refuge in Panduranga as his only true kin. He confesses he carried a burden that was never really his, and only recognized its unreality almost too late. The final image names the trouble: the Lord was always near, but a mirage of the world rose up between them and made what was close seem far. The prayer is to clear that mirage away.

GATHA 3502 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, service with folded hands

मराठी मूळ

आपुलिये टाकीं । करीन कांहीं तरी एकी ॥1॥
करीन पायांशीं वोळखी । करिसी तें करीं सुखीं ॥ध्रु.॥
कायाक्लेशगंगाजळ । समर्पीन तुळसीदळ ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे देवा । कर जोडीन ते सेवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

By my own effort I will do at least something. I will make acquaintance with Your feet, and whatever You do, I will accept with joy.

I will offer the holy water of bodily toil and the tulasi leaf of my devotion. Says Tuka, O Lord, this service of folded hands is my worship.

IN PLAIN WORDS

By my own effort I will do at least some one thing. I will get to know Your feet. Whatever You do, I will take it gladly. I will offer the Ganga-water of bodily toil. I will offer the tulasi leaf of my heart. Tuka says: O God, with folded hands, that is the service I will give.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram offers a humble, doable devotion rather than a grand one. He promises to do at least some single act with his own effort, to make acquaintance with the Lord's feet, and to accept gladly whatever the Lord sends. His offerings are simple and within reach: the sacred water of his own bodily labor and the tulasi leaf of his devotion, the poor man's worship. The point is that worship need not be costly; folded hands, honest toil, and a willing heart are themselves the whole of service.

GATHA 3503 Confession and Sin

Confession, the outer show without the inner

मराठी मूळ

माझे तों स्वभाव मज अनावर । तुज ही देतां भार कांहीं नव्हे ॥1॥
ऐसें कळों आलें मज नारायणा । जागृती स्वपना ताळ नाहीं ॥ध्रु.॥
संपादितों तो अवघा बाहए रंग । तुझा नाहीं संग अभ्यंतरीं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे सत्या नाहीं पाठी पोट । असतें निघोंट एकी जाती ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

My own nature is beyond my control, yet for You, O Lord, bearing this burden is nothing. This much I have understood, O Narayana: between waking and dreaming there is no consistency.

All that I manage is the outer appearance, but Your presence is not yet within. Says Tuka, truth has no front or back; if it were pure, it would go through as one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

My own nature is beyond my control. For You to bear this load is nothing at all. This much I have come to see, Narayana: between my waking and my dream there is no agreement. All I keep up is the outer color. Your company is not yet within me. Tuka says: truth has no front and no back. If it were pure, it would pass straight through as one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes an honest confession about the gap between his outside and his inside. He admits his nature is out of his own hands, while for the Lord such a burden is nothing to carry. What he has seen clearly is his own inconsistency: his waking life and his inner life do not match. He keeps up only the outer color of devotion, while the Lord's true company has not yet entered him. The closing standard is severe and clean: truth has no front or back, no two faces; were he genuine, he would be the same all the way through, passing straight as a single piece.

GATHA 3504 Longing and Separation

Longing, plead of the unworthy servant

मराठी मूळ

नव्हावा तो बरा मुळीं च संबंध । विश्वासिकां वध बोलिलासे ॥1॥
आतां माझें हित काय तें विचारा । सत्यत्वें दातारा पांडुरंगा ॥ध्रु ॥
नाहीं भाव परी ह्मणवितों दास । नका देऊं यास उणेंयेऊं ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे कां हो उद्धरितां दीन । मानीतसां सीण मायबापा॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

It would have been better had this bond never formed at all; a betrayal of trust is a slaying of the faithful. Now consider my true welfare, O Panduranga, with honest intent.

I may lack devotion, yet I call myself Your servant; do not let any lack come to that claim. Says Tuka, why do You grow weary of uplifting the fallen, O Mother and Father?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

It would have been better if this bond had never formed at all. To betray those who trust is to kill the faithful. Now think of my true good, Panduranga, in honesty, O giver. I have no real devotion, yet I call myself Your servant. Do not let that claim fall short. Tuka says: why do You grow weary of lifting up the lowly, Mother and Father?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses a claim on God out of the very relationship between them. He says the bond itself, once made, must not be broken, for to betray one who trusts is as good as killing the faithful; having drawn him in, the Lord owes him his true welfare. He admits frankly that he lacks devotion, yet he has taken the name of servant, and he begs that this claim not be left wanting. The closing question is pointed and tender at once: why should the Lord, who is mother and father, ever tire of the work of raising up the fallen, since that is exactly His nature?

GATHA 3505 Longing and Separation

Longing, why the delay, Panduranga

मराठी मूळ

काय तुमचिया सेवे न वेचते गांठोळी । मोहें टाळाटाळी करीतसां ॥1॥
चतुराच्या राया आहो पांडुरंगा । ऐसें तरी सांगा निवडूनि ॥ध्रु.॥
कोण तुह्मां सुख असे या कौतुकें । भोगितां अनेकें दुःखें आह्मा ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे काय जालासी निर्गुण । आह्मां येथें कोण सोडवील ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Does serving You diminish Your treasury? Why do You keep putting me off out of attachment? O King of the clever, O Panduranga, if that is the case, then tell me plainly. What pleasure do You find in this game while we endure countless sufferings? Says Tuka, have You become formless? Then who will rescue us here?

IN PLAIN WORDS

Does serving You empty Your treasury? Why do You keep putting me off out of fondness? O King of the clever, Panduranga, if that is how it is, then say it plainly. What joy do You take in this game while we go through sorrow after sorrow? Tuka says: have You turned formless? Then who here will set us free?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram complains, with affectionate boldness, about God's delay in helping him. He argues that lifting his devotees costs the Lord nothing, that no treasury is drained by it, so the holding back must be deliberate, and he demands a plain answer from the clever King. He cannot see what pleasure the Lord finds in this game while his devotees suffer on and on. The sharpest line is the last: if the Lord has withdrawn into the formless beyond reach and response, then no one is left who can rescue them, so the abhanga is a plea for God to stay near and act, not retreat into formlessness.

GATHA 3506 Longing and Separation

Longing, surrender at the only door

मराठी मूळ

निष्ठ यासाटीं करितों भाषण । आहेसी तूं सर्वजाण दाता ॥1॥
ऐसें कोण दुःख आहे निवारिता । तो मी जाऊं आतां शरण त्यासी ॥ध्रु.॥
बैसलासी केणें करुनि एक घरीं । नाहीं येथें उरी दुस†याची ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आलें अवघें चि पायापें । आतां मायबापें नुपेक्षावें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I speak so stubbornly because You are the all-knowing giver. What sorrow exists that has another remover? I would go and surrender to that one instead.

But You have filled the entire house with Your presence; there is no room for any other. Says Tuka, everything has arrived at Your feet; now, O Mother and Father, do not turn away.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I speak so boldly only because You are the all-knowing giver. What sorrow is there that has any other remover? If there were, I would go and take refuge with him instead. But You have filled the whole house with Yourself. There is no room left here for any second one. Tuka says: everything has come to Your feet. Now, Mother and Father, do not turn away.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram explains why he keeps clamoring at God and not elsewhere. He speaks so insistently because he knows the Lord is the all-knowing giver; if any other power could remove his sorrow, he would gladly go and surrender there instead. But there is no other: the Lord has filled the whole house of existence, leaving no room for a second refuge. So everything he has, and is, has come down to the Lord's feet by necessity. The closing plea, to the one he calls mother and father, is simply not to turn away from the one who has nowhere else to go.

GATHA 3507 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, the thread tied to the feet

मराठी मूळ

पायांपासीं चित्त । तेणें भेटी अखंडित ॥1॥
असे खेळे भलते ठायीं । प्रेमसूत्रदोरी पायीं ॥ध्रु.॥
केलेंसे जतन । मुळीं काय तें वचन ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे सर्वजाणा । ठायीं विचारावें मना॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the mind remains at the feet, the meeting becomes unbroken. Let the soul play wherever it will; the thread of love is tied to the feet.

What was the promise guarded at the root? Says Tuka, O all-knowing one, let the mind settle this within itself.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Keep the mind at the feet. Then the meeting never breaks. Let the soul play wherever it likes; the thread of love is tied to the feet. What was the promise kept at the root? Tuka says: O all-knowing one, let the mind settle this within itself.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes a love that holds even while life keeps moving. He asks that the mind stay fixed at God's feet, because that single fixity is what makes the meeting unbroken; nothing can interrupt it. The soul may go and play wherever it wishes, since the deeper attachment, the thread of love, is already knotted to the feet and will not come loose. He then turns the question inward: there was a promise made at the very root of things, and rather than argue it out, the mind should quietly settle the matter for itself.

GATHA 3508 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, mutual absorption

मराठी मूळ

तुझे मजपाशीं मन । माझी येथें भूक तान ॥1॥
जिव्हा रतें एके ठायीं । दुजें बोलायाचें काई ॥ध्रु.॥
माझिया कवतुकें । उभा पहासी भातुकें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे साचें । तेथें मागील कईचें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Your mind is with me, and my hunger and thirst are here before You. My tongue is absorbed in one place alone; what else is there to speak of? In playful delight, You stand watching my little gestures.

Says Tuka, where there is sincerity, what place is there for old accounts?.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Your mind is with me; my hunger and thirst are here before You. My tongue rests in one place alone. What else is there to say? In delight, You stand watching my small gestures. Tuka says: where there is sincerity, what room is left for old accounts?

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names a love that has become mutual: God's attention is on him, and his whole appetite is turned toward God. His speech has gone quiet because it rests in one place alone, with nothing else worth saying. He pictures God standing and watching his little movements with affection, the way one watches a child at play. The closing claim is the bold one: where the heart is truly sincere, the old ledger of past faults simply has no place left to stand.

GATHA 3509 Devotion to Vitthal

Servant's love, no equality with God

मराठी मूळ

तुह्मां आह्मां सरी । येथें कईच्या या परी ॥1॥
स्वामिसेवा अळंकार । नाहीं आवडिये थार ॥ध्रु.॥
तुका ह्मणे कोडें । आह्मी नाचों तुज पुढें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

How can we ever be on equal footing, O Lord? The ornament of serving the Master has no place for personal preference in this bond. Says Tuka, we delight in dancing before You as a loving spectacle.

IN PLAIN WORDS

How could we ever be equals, You and I? Serving the Master is the ornament; in this love there is no room for my own preference. Tuka says: gladly we dance before You, for the joy of it.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram refuses any thought of standing level with God. He treats the gap not as a wound but as the whole beauty of the bond: service to the Master is itself the ornament he wears, and personal preference has no place inside that love. To want things on his own terms would spoil it. So he keeps only the one thing a servant can offer freely, the delight of dancing before the Lord for the sheer joy of being seen.

GATHA 3510 Confession and Sin

Confession, faith masked by pretense

मराठी मूळ

कैचें भांडवल खरा हातीं भाव । कळवळ्यानें माव दावीतसें ॥1॥
आतां माझा अंत नको सर्वजाणा । पाहों नारायणा निवडूनि ॥ध्रु.॥
संतांचें उच्छिष्ट मागिले पंगती । करावें संगती लागे ऐसें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आलों दावूनि विश्वास । संचित तें नास पावे ऐसें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What capital do I have? My genuine feeling is all I hold, and even that true intention gets masked by pretense. Now, O all-knowing Narayana, do not test me any further; see me clearly.

In the company of saints I am content with their sacred leftovers, at the last row of their feast. Says Tuka, I have come showing my faith; may my accumulated fate be utterly destroyed.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What capital do I hold? Only true feeling in my hand, and even that gets masked by show. Now, O all-knowing one, do not test me further; O Narayana, look and pick me out. I am content with the saints' leftovers, in the last row of their feast; let me only have their company. Tuka says: I have come showing my faith, so that what I have stored up may be destroyed.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram owns up to how little he has and how easily even that little is faked. The only real wealth he holds is genuine feeling, and he admits that pretense keeps covering it over; this is honesty about his own divided heart, not a charge against anyone else. So he asks God to stop testing and simply pick him out and see him clearly. He wants no high place: the saints' leftovers and the last seat at their table are enough, as long as he stays in their company. He came openly showing his faith for one purpose, that the whole load of accumulated fate, the stored-up karma, would finally be undone.

GATHA 3511 Prayers

Prayer, the ocean of mercy

मराठी मूळ

थोडे तुह्मी मागें होती उद्धरिले । मज ऐसे गेले वांयां जीव ॥1॥
आतां याचा काहीं न मनावा भार । कृपेचा सागर आहेसी तूं ॥ध्रु.॥
तुज आळवितां पापाची वसति । राहे अंगीं किती बळ त्याचें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे उदकीं तारिले दगड । तैसा मी ही जड एक देवा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You have saved only a few in the past, and countless lives like mine have been wasted. Do not consider this a burden now, for You are an ocean of mercy.

When one calls upon You, how long can the grip of sin endure? Says Tuka, You made even stones float upon the water; I am but one more heavy lump, O Lord.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You have saved only a few before, and lives like mine have been wasted. Do not count this as a burden now; You are an ocean of mercy. When one calls on You, how long can sin keep its hold? How much strength is left in it? Tuka says: You floated stones upon the water; I too am only one more heavy lump, O Lord.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses his case as a beggar who will not let go. He notes that few have been rescued so far and many lives wasted, then refuses to let his own rescue be treated as too much trouble, since God is by nature an ocean of mercy. His argument is simple: once a person truly calls on God, sin loses its grip and has no real power left to hold him. He ends with the image that makes the plea unanswerable, that the Lord once made stones float on water, so saving one more heavy, dull lump like himself should be nothing at all.

GATHA 3512 Longing and Separation

Longing, the bold complaint

मराठी मूळ

आह्मी ह्मणों कोणी नाहीं तुज आड । दिसतोसी भ्याड पांडुरंगा ॥1॥
हागे माझ्या भोगें केलासी परता । विश्वंभरीं सत्ता नाहीं ऐसी ॥ध्रु.॥
आह्मी तुज असों देऊनि आधार । नाम वारंवार उच्चारितों ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे मज धरियेलें बळें । पंचभूतीं खळें करूनियां ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I say that no one stands in Your way, yet You appear cowardly, O Panduranga. Perhaps it is my own fate that has made You withdraw; surely it cannot be that the Sustainer of the universe lacks authority.

It is I who gives You support by repeating Your name again and again. Says Tuka, You have trapped me by force within the five elements.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I say no one stands in Your way, yet You look like a coward, O Panduranga. Perhaps my own fate has made You hold back; surely the Sustainer of the universe is not so powerless. It is I who hold You up, naming You over and over. Tuka says: You have caught me by force and shut me inside the five elements.

WHAT IT MEANS

This is Tukaram quarreling with God out of unbearable longing. He insists nothing blocks God's help, so the delay makes God look timid, and he says so to His face; the harshness is the freedom of a lover, not contempt. He half-blames his own fate for God's withdrawal, then refuses that excuse, because the Sustainer of all cannot truly lack the power to come. He turns the relationship upside down, claiming that his constant repetition of the Name is what keeps God present, and complains that meanwhile he himself has been seized and locked inside the body of the five elements, waiting.

GATHA 3513 Surrender and Acceptance

Surrender, devotion alone reaches God

मराठी मूळ

आहेतें सकळ प्रारब्धा हातीं । यावें काकुलती यासी आतां ॥1॥
ऐसा माझ्या मनें सांगितला भाव । तोंवरीच देव दुजा नाहीं ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे तुज ठेवावें पुजून । आणीक ते गुण नाहीं येथें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Everything rests in the hands of destiny; one must come humbly before that alone. My mind has understood this much: until then, there is no other God.

When all the commotion has been sorted out, You can be reached by the strength of devotion alone. Says Tuka, one must worship You and set You above; no other virtue avails here.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Everything lies in the hands of destiny; one can only come humbly before that. My mind has grasped this much: until then, there is no other God. When all the noise is finally settled, You are reached by the strength of devotion alone. Tuka says: one must worship You and set You above all; no other merit counts here.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out where real power lies and where it does not. Outward events are in the grip of destiny, and before that there is nothing to do but bow humbly. His settled conviction is that, short of the final reach, there is no other refuge worth calling God. When all the clamor of life is at last sorted out, the only thing that actually reaches God is the force of devotion, not effort or cleverness. So the whole path narrows to one act: worship Him, set Him above everything, because no other virtue carries any weight here.

GATHA 3514 Faith and Trust

Faith, the burden made sweet

मराठी मूळ

सेवट तो होती तुझियानें गोड । ह्मणऊनि चाड धरीतसों ॥1॥
देऊं भोगाभोग कलिवरचा भार । साहों तुज थार त्याचमधीं ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे आह्मी चेंपलों या भारें । तुमचें तें खरें देवपण ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

In the end, everything turns sweet because of You, and that is why I hold on to this longing. I will offer up the burden of this body, enduring what comes while staying at Your feet.

Through Your strength, no further effort or toil is needed. Says Tuka, we are crushed under this weight; Your divinity alone is the true relief.

IN PLAIN WORDS

In the end it all turns sweet because of You; that is why I keep this longing. I will hand over the burden of this body and bear what comes, staying at Your feet. By Your strength no further struggle or toil is needed. Tuka says: we are crushed under this weight; Your godhood is the true relief.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram holds on through hardship by keeping his eyes on the end, where everything turns sweet because God is the one bringing it. That trust is why he refuses to let go of his longing. He offers up the whole load of the body and its experiences and resolves to endure it all without leaving God's feet. Resting on God's strength, he says no extra striving is even required. The closing line names both the pain and the cure honestly: we are crushed flat under this weight, and the only real relief is that God is truly God and can lift it.

GATHA 3515 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, leave the bond as it is

मराठी मूळ

ऐसा चि तो गोवा । न पाहिजे केला देवा ॥1॥

आह्मांसी न कळे । तुह्मी झाकुं नये डोळे ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे संगें । असों एक एका अंगें॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Let this bond with God remain as it is; do not try to reshape it. The tug and pull of this devotion has come from far away.

We may not understand it, but You must not close Your eyes to it. Says Tuka, let us remain together, body and soul.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Leave this bond as it is, O God; do not try to remake it. The pull and tug of it has come from far away. We may not understand it, but You must not shut Your eyes to it. Tuka says: let us stay together, each at the other's side.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram asks God not to tamper with the love that already binds them. He treats the bond as something settled, with a tug that reaches back a long way, perhaps across lives, and wants it left untouched. He admits he cannot fully understand the pull, but insists God has no right to look away from it. The prayer ends plainly: let the two of them simply remain together, side by side, with no distance allowed between them.

Devotion, God as mother

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Between mother and child there is no distance; harsh words cause no real offense. Send, O Mother, send the gifts of delight, for the joy of pleasing Your child is its own reward.

I have spoken these words out of wonder. Says Tuka, O Mother Panduranga, O gracious one.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Between mother and child there is no distance; sharp words leave no real hurt. Send, O Mother, send the gifts of delight, for the joy of pleasing Your child is its own reward. I have spoken these words out of wonder. Tuka says: O Mother Panduranga, O gracious one.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks to God as a child speaks to its mother, claiming the closeness that excuses everything. Because there is no real distance between mother and child, even harsh or demanding words between them cause no offense and break nothing. From inside that freedom he asks for the gifts of delight, reminding the Mother that pleasing her child is its own joy. He admits his bold words rose simply out of wonder, and signs off by naming God directly as Mother Panduranga, the gracious one, turning the Lord of Pandhari into the mother who indulges him.

Devotion, eat with me, hold nothing back

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Why hold back Your affection? Come, let us sit and eat together. Do not keep anything in reserve; I hold You to Your word.

I have seen how things are, and I will verify them for myself. Says Tuka, the children have told me everything; all the secrets are out.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Why hold back Your love? Come, sit and eat with me. Keep nothing in reserve; I hold You to Your word. I have seen how things are, and I will check it for myself. Tuka says: the children have told me everything; all of it is out.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses for full intimacy, not measured affection. He asks God to stop holding love back and instead sit and share a meal with him, and he insists that nothing be kept in reserve, binding God to a promise already made. With a playful confidence he says he has already seen how matters stand and means to verify it himself. The closing turn is lighthearted: the children have let out the whole secret, so the hidden truth of God's love is already exposed and there is no use pretending otherwise.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

You are not like those other mothers whose words come to nothing and bear no fruit. You are not poor, lacking for anything.

Says Tuka, You are not false, and You are not miserly.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You are not like those other mothers whose words come to nothing and bear no fruit. You are not poor, lacking for anything. Tuka says: You are not false, and You are not miserly.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram reassures himself by listing everything God is not, again under the figure of the mother. Unlike the failing mothers whose promises stay empty and bear no fruit, this Mother's word is reliable. She is not poor and does not run short of what her child needs. The closing line drives it home: she is neither false in her promises nor stingy in giving, so there is every reason to keep asking and trusting.

GATHA 3519 Longing and Separation

Complaint, the Lord who turns away

मराठी मूळ

आह्मां बोल लावा । तुह्मां अनुचित हें देवा ॥1॥
ऐसें सांगा कां व्यालेती । काय नाहीं तुह्मां हातीं ॥ध्रु.॥
आतां धरा दुरी । वांयां दवडाया थोरी ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे ठायीं । ऐसें विचारावें पायीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

To make us speak and then ignore us is unbecoming of You, O Lord. Tell me then, why did You bring this into being? Is there nothing in Your power? Now set aside the habit of squandering Your glory at a distance.

Says Tuka, reflect upon this at Your feet.

IN PLAIN WORDS

You made us speak, and now You ignore us. That is not right of You, Lord. Tell me then: why did You give us birth? Is there nothing in Your power? Now You hold Yourself far away. You waste Your own greatness for nothing. Tuka says: think this over carefully, there at Your own feet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram presses a grievance straight at God, with the boldness of someone who knows he is owed an answer. He says God called these creatures into being, gave them a voice, and then walked away; that is unworthy of a Lord who can do anything. The sting is in the question, why bring us into existence at all if You mean to neglect us. By staying distant, God squanders the very greatness that being a savior would show. Tukaram asks Him to sit with this and weigh it, since the fault, if there is one, is His own.

GATHA 3520 Worldly Life

Worldly truth, only God stays

मराठी मूळ

तुका ह्मणे देवाऐसी । आहों सरसीं आपण ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

When the mother dies and goes, who then asks about her? Who hears the cries of the orphaned children? Such is the way of the world. Forehead meets forehead; it becomes a mere spectacle of amusement.

Says Tuka, we ourselves are the equal of God.

IN PLAIN WORDS

When the mother dies and is gone, who asks about her then? Who hears the cries of the orphaned children? Know that this is the way of the world. Forehead meets forehead, and it becomes a passing amusement. Tuka says: we ourselves are the equal of God.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram looks plainly at how quickly the world forgets its own. Once the mother who held a family together dies, no one inquires after her, and her orphaned children's cries go unheard; closeness that once meant everything becomes mere idle show. He is naming the flimsiness of every worldly bond, not mourning one family. The turn comes in the last line: when all earthly attachments prove this hollow, the soul that holds to God stands on the only ground that does not give way, and so becomes, in worth, God's own equal.

GATHA 3521 Longing and Separation

Reproach, the God who will not let go

मराठी मूळ

संसाराची कोण गोडी । दिली जोडी करूनि ॥1॥
निष्ठ तूं बहु देवा । पुरे हेवा न ह्मणवी ॥ध्रु.॥
पाहोनियां कर्म डोळां । निराळा तो वर्जीना ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे तुज माझें । ह्मणतां ओझें फुकट ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Who gave this sweetness to worldly life, making it a prize to be won? Truly, O Lord, You are very stubborn; You never say that enough is enough. Seeing with Your own eyes the workings of karma, You do not stand apart or refuse.

Says Tuka, my burden is a trifle to You, yet You call it a gratuitous load.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Who gave worldly life its sweetness, and made it a prize to be won? You are very stubborn, Lord; You never say enough is enough. You watch karma working with Your own eyes, yet You stand apart and do not refuse it. Tuka says: my burden is nothing to You, and still You let it weigh on me for no reason.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram argues with God about why the world keeps its grip on us. He asks who made bondage taste sweet, so that people chase it as a prize; the answer he implies is God Himself. He calls God obstinate for never calling a halt, for watching the machinery of karma turn and yet refusing to intervene. The complaint lands in the last line: lifting Tukaram's burden would cost God nothing, and so leaving it on his shoulders is a needless cruelty he can name only because he trusts the One he is scolding.

GATHA 3522 The Necessity of Experience

Resolution, the parting that frees

मराठी मूळ

नव्हतें तें कळों आलें । तरी बोलें अबोला ॥1॥
तुज मज घातली तुटी । एके भेटीपासूनि ॥ध्रु.॥
आतां याची न धरीं चाड । कांहीं कोड कवतुकें ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे यावें जावें । एका भावें खंडलें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What was not known has now become clear, and so let there be either speech or silence. Between You and me, a separation was established from that one meeting onward.

Now I hold no longing for wonder or curiosity. Says Tuka, the coming and going has been resolved in a single devotion.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What was hidden has now become clear, so let there be speech or silence, it is the same. A break was set between You and me from that one meeting on. Now I hold no craving for marvels or curiosities. Tuka says: the coming and going has ended in a single devotion.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram describes the moment a truth he could not see finally became plain. After that, talking or staying quiet no longer matters; the realization stands on its own. He says a clean separation was drawn from the first true meeting, the kind of cut that ends restless seeking rather than wounds. He no longer hungers for wonders or novelties, because one steady devotion has stilled the endless coming and going of birth, desire, and distraction. The poem is about arriving, not losing.

GATHA 3523 Longing and Separation

Reproach, let Godhood be set aside

मराठी मूळ

आतां दोघांमध्ये काय । उरलें होय वाणीजेसें ॥1॥
निष्ठ हें केलें मन । समाधान न करूनि ॥ध्रु.॥
झुरावें तें तेथींच्या परी । घरिच्याघरीं अवघिया ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे देवपण । गुंडाळून असों दे ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

What now remains between us two that can be bartered? This mind has been made obstinate without being granted peace. Let one pine within one's own home, as all do.

Says Tuka, let Godhood be rolled up and set aside.

IN PLAIN WORDS

What is left now between us two that can be bartered? You have made this mind stubborn, and given it no peace. Let me pine here in my own house, as everyone does in theirs. Tuka says: roll up Your Godhood and put it away.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram speaks from the dry stretch where prayer feels unanswered. He asks what is even left to bargain over, since God has hardened his mind and withheld the peace he longs for. With bitter resignation he says he will just stay home and ache, the way everyone quietly suffers in their own walls. The sharp last line tells God to fold up His divine office and set it aside: if Godhood will not act as a Lord should, the title is empty. The harshness is the speech of a wounded lover, not contempt; it is meant to provoke the very response it claims to give up on.

GATHA 3524 Prayers

Pleading, the mother's milk overflows

मराठी मूळ

मागितल्यास आस करा । उरी धरा कांहींबाहीं ॥1॥
ह्मणऊनि सारिली आस । होती यास मूळ तें ॥ध्रु.॥
माझ्या मोहें तुज पान्हा । लोटे स्तना वोरस ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आळवणे । माझ्या देणें उत्तर ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If You have been asked, then fulfill the wish; keep something of Yourself in reserve if You must. That is why all hope was channeled to You, for You are the root of it all.

Your love for me makes the milk of Your breast overflow. Says Tuka, my pleading is itself Your gift, and Your answer is my due.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If I have asked, then grant it; keep a little of Yourself in reserve if You must. That is why I sent all my hope to You, for You are its root. My love for You makes the milk of Your breast overflow. Tuka says: my pleading is itself Your gift, and Your answer is owed to me.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram makes his case for being heard, and the tenderness is striking. He asks God to fulfill what he has begged for, allowing that God may hold something back, but God is the source of every hope, so to God his whole longing was rightly sent. He pictures God as a nursing mother whose milk flows down at the sight of her child's need: Tukaram's love draws God's grace out by its own nature. He even claims his crying out is something God gave him, which means an answer is no favor but a debt. This is the logic of a child certain of its mother.

GATHA 3525 Longing and Separation

Withdrawal, keep to your own house

मराठी मूळ

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

Now it is better that each one stays in one's own home, keeping one's own share to oneself. Then neither good nor bad falls before the eyes, and there is no cause for distress.

The more one speaks, the more words multiply, all hollow chatter to no end. One should come humbly before God, for He desires true service.

The tallying of accounts only leads to disputes that never settle. Says Tuka, I have understood that nothing else is truly good.

IN PLAIN WORDS

Now it is better that each one stays in their own house, keeping their own share to themselves. Then neither good nor bad falls before your eyes, and there is no cause for grief. The more you speak, the more words multiply, all hollow noise to no end. Come humbly before God, for it is true service He wants. Tallying accounts leads only to quarrels that never settle. Tuka says: I have understood that nothing else is truly good.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram counsels a quiet drawing-in from the friction of dealings with others. When each person keeps to their own and minds their own share, the eye is spared the sights of others' good and ill, and the heart is spared the grief that follows. Talk only breeds more talk, empty and endless; and reckoning who owes whom only opens disputes that never close. Against all this he sets the one thing that pays: coming low before God, who asks for real service and not chatter or bookkeeping. The poem points the criticism at the restless, comparing, score-keeping habit in oneself, and names devotion as the only good worth keeping.

GATHA 3526 Appeals and Exhortations

Exhortation, clear the road first

मराठी मूळ

आधीं सोज्वळ करावा मारग । चालतां तें मग गोवी नाहीं ॥1॥
ऐसा चालोनियां आला शिष्टाचार । गोवीचा वेव्हार पापपुण्य ॥ध्रु.॥

तुका ह्मणे येथें शूर तो निवडे । पडिले बापुडे कालचक्रीं ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

First clear the path, and then walking will be free of entanglement. This is the way tradition has always walked, for the trade of sin and merit creates only confusion.

When fleeing, flee and drop the blanket; attachment is the root that lets trouble catch up. Says Tuka, the brave one is the one who prevails here; the rest fall prey to the wheel of time.

IN PLAIN WORDS

First make the road clean, and then walking it will hold no snares. This is how the right way has always gone, for the trade in sin and merit only tangles you. When you must flee, flee, and drop the blanket; attachment is the root that lets trouble catch you. Tuka says: here the brave one comes through; the rest fall under the wheel of time.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram lays out the discipline of the path with a traveler's bluntness. Clear the way before you set out, by settling your conduct, and the walking itself stays free of entanglement; the old, tested way warns that fussing over sin and merit only ties you in knots. His vivid image is flight: when you run, let the blanket go, because the one thing you cling to is exactly what lets the pursuer grab you. The closing line names the stakes plainly. Only the brave, those willing to drop their attachments, get clear; everyone else is ground down by time.

GATHA 3527 The Moral Ideal

Warning, the petted snake

मराठी मूळ

उद्धत त्या जाती । द्रवें रंगल्या उद्धती ॥1॥
ह्मणऊनि बहु फार । त्यांसी असावें अंतर ॥ध्रु.॥
कैंचें पाठी पोट । गोडविषासी सेवट ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे सापा । न कळे कुरविाळलें बापा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

The arrogant grow worse with intoxication. Therefore one should keep a great distance from them.

There is no loyalty in them; sweet poison always ends badly. Says Tuka, one does not know whether a snake has been petted or provoked.

IN PLAIN WORDS

The arrogant only grow worse when their pride is fed. So you should keep a wide distance from them. There is no loyalty in them; sweet poison always ends badly. Tuka says: with a snake, you never know whether it has been stroked or struck.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram warns about the danger of the arrogant and the trap of indulging them. Praise or kindness does not soften such people; it swells their pride, so the wise keep their distance. They give back no faithfulness, and whatever sweetness they offer is poison that ends in harm. The closing image is exact: a snake cannot tell tenderness from a blow and will bite either way, so no amount of care makes it safe. The point is aimed at the pattern of arrogance and the false hope that one can tame it, calling for prudence rather than scorn.

GATHA 3528 The Saints

The saints, sacred discourse our life

मराठी मूळ

आह्मां कथा आवश्यक । येर संपादूं लौकिक ॥1॥
जैसी तैसी माय बरी । मानिल्या त्या माना येरी ॥ध्रु.॥
व्यालीचा कळवळा । जीव बहुत कोंवळा ॥2॥
कवतुकें वावरें । तुका ह्मणे या आधारें ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

For us, sacred discourse is essential; we manage all other worldly matters as they come. A mother is good just as she is; honor those who accept you.

A mother's tender concern springs from a very soft chitta. Says Tuka, it is by such play and movement, by this very support, that we live.

IN PLAIN WORDS

For us, holy discourse is the one thing needful; the rest of worldly business we just manage as it comes. A mother is good just as she is; honor those who take you as their own. A mother's tender care rises from a very soft heart. Tuka says: it is by this play, by this very support, that we live.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names what is essential for those given to God: the company and telling of sacred things, while ordinary affairs are handled only as they fall due. He likens the saints and God to a mother, loved as she is and honored because she receives you as her own. A mother's concern flows from a heart kept tender, and so does the saints' care for the seeker. The poem rests its whole weight on that support: it is by this gentle holding, this play of grace, that the devotee is able to live at all.

GATHA 3529 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, trembling before the holy

मराठी मूळ

पाळतों वचन । परि बहु भीतें मन ॥1॥
करितें पायांशीं सलगी । नये बैसों अंगसंगीं ॥ध्रु.॥
जोडोनियां कर । उभें असावें समोर ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे संत । तुह्मी मी बहु पतित ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

I uphold the promise, yet my chitta trembles greatly. I may approach Your feet with familiarity, but I cannot presume to sit beside You.

With joined hands, I should stand before You at attention. Says Tuka, you saints are exalted, while I am deeply fallen.

IN PLAIN WORDS

I keep my promise, yet my heart trembles greatly. I may come close to Your feet with some familiarity, but I cannot dare to sit beside You. With hands folded, I should stand before You at attention. Tuka says: you saints are exalted, and I am deeply fallen.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram holds together nearness and awe, which is the heart of true reverence. He is faithful to his vow, yet his heart shakes, because intimacy with the holy is not the same as presumption. He may approach the feet familiarly, like a child, but he will not take the liberty of sitting as an equal; the right posture is to stand with folded hands, attentive. The closing line states the gap honestly: the saints are exalted and he counts himself fallen. The humility is not self-loathing but the proper sense of distance that keeps love from curdling into casualness.

GATHA 3530 Devotion to Vitthal

Devotion, an unbreakable vow

मराठी मूळ

जैसा तैसा आतां । मज प्रमाण अनंता ॥1॥
पायां पडणें न संडीं । पोटीं तें च वर तोंडीं ॥ध्रु.॥
एका भावें चाड । आहे तैसें अंतीं गोड ॥2॥
तुका ह्मणे आह्मां । टळणें चि नाहीं नेमा ॥3॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

However You may be, O Ananta, You are my authority. I will not cease falling at Your feet; what is within me is the same as what is on my lips.

With single-minded devotion, whatever comes at the end is sweet. Says Tuka, for us there is no straying from our vow.

IN PLAIN WORDS

However You may be, You are my authority now, Ananta. I will never stop falling at Your feet; what is in my heart is the same as what is on my lips. With single devotion is my longing, and so the end is sweet. Tuka says: for us there is no straying from the vow.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram declares a loyalty that does not depend on how God appears or behaves. Whatever face Ananta, the Endless One, shows him, that is the authority he bows to. He vows to keep falling at the feet, and insists his inner state and his spoken words are one, that his devotion holds no pretense. Because his longing is fixed on a single object, he trusts the outcome will be sweet. The poem closes on the firmness of the vow itself: come what may, he and his fellow devotees will not stray from it.

GATHA 3531 Worldly Life

Bondage of karma, the rope of mine and yours

मराठी मूळ

चुकलों या ऐशा वर्मा । तरी कर्मा सांपडलों ॥1॥

ENGLISH TRANSLATION

If I miss this vital secret, then I fall into the hands of karma. It pursues me and causes ruin, forcing me to endure the womb again and again.

The sense of 'mine' and 'Yours' as separate binds the rope of delusion around my neck. Says Tuka, I was driven to despair, frightened by pursuits that were never real.

IN PLAIN WORDS

If I miss this vital secret, then I fall into the hands of karma. It hunts me down and ruins me. It makes me suffer the womb again and again. The feeling that things are mine and Yours, kept apart, ties the rope of delusion around my neck. Tuka says: I have been driven to despair, frightened by pursuits that were never real.

WHAT IT MEANS

Tukaram names what happens when a person forgets the one essential thing and lives as if the world were really divided into mine and yours. That very sense of separateness, he says, is the noose: it binds you to karma, which then pursues you and forces birth after birth in the womb. The harshness is aimed at the pattern of grasping, not at any one soul; he places himself inside it, confessing that he too has been worn down by chasing things that turned out to be unreal.

GATHA 3532 Prayers

Prayer, wake my mind, Narayana

मराठी मूळ
